enforcement agency shall not refuse to issue a release to a legal owner or the agent of a legal owner on the grounds that it previously issued a release.

Veh. Code § 14602.9*: *Impoundment of Bus or Limousine of Charter-Party Carrier; Notice; Hearing; Release:

(a) For purposes of this section, "peace officer" means a person designated as a peace officer pursuant to Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code.

(b) A peace officer may impound a bus or limousine of a charter-party carrier for 30 days if the officer determines that any of the following violations occurred while the driver was operating the bus or limousine of the charter-party carrier:

(1) The driver was operating the bus or limousine of a charter-party carrier when the charter-party carrier did not have a permit or certificate issued by the Public Utilities Commission, pursuant to Section 5375 of the Public Utilities Code.

(2) The driver was operating the bus or limousine of a charter-party carrier when the charter-party carrier was operating with a suspended permit or certificate from the Public Utilities Commission.

(3) The driver was operating the bus or limousine of a charter-party carrier without having a current and valid driver's license of the proper class, a passenger vehicle endorsement, or the required certificate.

(c) A peace officer may impound a bus or limousine belonging to a passenger stage corporation for 30 days if the officer determines any of the following violations occurred while the driver was operating the bus or limousine:

(1) The driver was operating the bus or limousine when the passenger stage corporation did not have a certificate of public convenience and necessity issued by the Public Utilities Commission as required pursuant to Article 2 (commencing with Section 1031) of Chapter 5 of Part 1 of Division 1 of the Public Utilities Code.

(2) The driver was operating the bus or limousine when the operating rights or certificate of public convenience and necessity of a passenger stage corporation was suspended, canceled, or revoked pursuant to Section 1033.5, 1033.7, or 1045 of the Public Utilities Code.

(3) The driver was operating the bus or limousine without having a current and valid driver's license of the proper class.

(d) Within two working days after impoundment, the impounding agency shall send a notice by certified mail, return receipt requested, to the legal owner of the vehicle, at the address obtained from the department, informing the owner that the vehicle has been impounded. Failure to notify the legal owner within two working days shall prohibit the impounding agency from charging for more than 15 day's impoundment when the legal owner redeems the impounded vehicle. The impounding agency shall maintain a published telephone number that provides information 24 hours a day regarding the impoundment of vehicles and the rights of a registered owner to request a hearing.

(e) The registered and legal owner of a vehicle that is removed and seized under subdivision (b) or (c) or his or her agent shall be provided the opportunity for a storage hearing to determine the validity of, or consider any mitigating circumstances attendant to, the storage, in accordance with Section 22852.

Note: V.C. § 22852 describes the post-impound hearing requirements.

(1) The impounding agency shall release the vehicle to the registered owner or his or her agent prior to the end of the impoundment period under any of the following circumstances:

(A) When the vehicle is a stolen vehicle.

(B) When the vehicle is subject to bailment and is driven by an unlicensed employee of a business establishment, including a parking service or repair garage.

(C) When, for a charter-party carrier of passengers, the driver of the vehicle is not the sole registered owner of the vehicle and the vehicle is being released to another registered owner of the vehicle who agrees not to allow the driver to use the vehicle until after the end of the impoundment period and the charter-party carrier has been issued a valid permit from the Public Utilities Commission, pursuant to Section 5375 of the Public Utilities Code.

(D) When, for a passenger stage corporation, the driver of the vehicle is not the sole registered owner of the vehicle and the vehicle is being released to another registered owner of the vehicle who agrees not to allow the driver to use the vehicle until after the end of the impoundment period and the passenger stage corporation has been issued a valid certificate of public convenience and necessity by the Public Utilities Commission, pursuant to Article 2 (commencing with Section 1031) of Chapter 5 of Part 1 of Division 1 of the Public Utilities Code.

(2) A vehicle shall not be released pursuant to this subdivision without presentation of the registered owner's or agent's currently valid driver's license to operate the vehicle and proof of current vehicle registration, or upon order of a court.

(g) The registered owner or his or her agent is responsible for all towing and storage charges related to the impoundment, and any administrative charges authorized under Section 22850.5.

(h) A vehicle removed and seized under subdivision (b) or (c) shall be released to the legal owner of the vehicle or the legal owner's agent prior to the end of the impoundment period if all of the following conditions are met:

(1) The legal owner is a motor vehicle dealer, bank, credit union, acceptance corporation, or other licensed financial institution legally operating in this state, or is another person who is not the registered owner and holds a security interest in the vehicle.

(2) The legal owner or the legal owner's agent pays all towing and storage fees related to the seizure of the vehicle.

A lien sale processing fee shall not be charged to the legal owner who redeems the vehicle prior to the 10th day of impoundment. The impounding authority or any person having possession of the vehicle shall not collect from the legal owner of the type specified in paragraph (1), or the legal owner's agent, any administrative charges imposed pursuant to Section 22850.5 unless the legal owner voluntarily requested a post-storage hearing.

(A) The legal owner or the legal owner's agent presents either lawful foreclosure documents or an affidavit of repossession for the vehicle, and a security agreement or title showing proof of legal ownership for the vehicle. All presented documents may be originals, photocopies, or facsimile copies, or may be transmitted electronically. The impounding agency shall not require a document to be notarized. The impounding agency may require the agent of the legal owner to produce a photocopy or facsimile copy of its repossession agency license or registration issued pursuant to Chapter 11 (commencing with Section 7500) of Division 3 of the Business and Professions Code, or to demonstrate, to the satisfaction of the impounding agency, that the agent is exempt from licensure pursuant to Section 7500.2 or 7500.3 of the Business and Professions Code.

(B) Administrative costs authorized under subdivision (a) of Section 22850.5 shall not be charged to the legal owner of the type specified in paragraph (1), who redeems the vehicle unless the legal owner voluntarily requests a post-storage hearing. A city, county, or state agency shall not require a legal owner or a legal owner's agent to request a post-storage hearing as a requirement for release of the vehicle to the legal owner or the legal owner's agent. The impounding agency shall not require any documents other than those specified in this paragraph. The impounding agency shall not require any documents to be notarized.

(C) As used in this paragraph, "foreclosure documents" means an "assignment" as that term is defined in subdivision (b) of Section 7500.1 of the Business and Professions Code.

(2) The legal owner or the legal owner's agent shall not relinquish the vehicle to the registered owner until the registered owner or that owner's agent presents his or her valid driver's license or valid temporary driver's license to the legal owner or the legal owner's agent. The legal owner or the legal owner's agent shall make every reasonable effort to ensure that the license presented is valid.

(3) Prior to relinquishing the vehicle, the legal owner may require the registered owner to pay all towing and storage charges related to the impoundment and any administrative charges authorized under Section 22850.5 that were incurred by the legal owner in connection with obtaining custody of the vehicle.

(1) A vehicle removed and seized under subdivision (b) or (c) shall be released to a rental agency prior to the end of the impoundment period if the agency is either the legal owner or registered owner of the vehicle and the agency pays all towing and storage fees related to the seizure of the vehicle.

(2) The owner of a rental vehicle that was seized under this section may continue to rent the vehicle upon recovery of the vehicle. However, the rental agency shall not rent another vehicle to the driver of the vehicle that was seized until the impoundment period has expired.

(3) The rental agency may require the person to whom the vehicle was rented to pay all towing and storage charges related to the impoundment and any administrative charges authorized under Section 22850.5 that were incurred by the rental agency in connection with obtaining custody of the vehicle.

(k) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, the registered owner, and not the legal owner, shall remain responsible for any towing and storage charges related to the impoundment, any administrative charges authorized under Section 22850.5, and any parking fines, penalties, and administrative fees incurred by the registered owner.

(l) The impounding agency is not liable to the registered owner for the improper release of the vehicle to the legal owner or the legal owner's agent provided the release complies with this section.

(m) This section does not authorize the impoundment of privately owned personal vehicles that are not common carriers nor the impoundment of vehicles used in transportation for compensation by charter-party carriers that are not required to carry individual permits.

(n) For the purposes of this section, a "charter-party carrier" means a charter-party carrier of passengers as defined by Section 5360 of the Public Utilities Code.

(o) For purposes of this section, a "passenger stage corporation" means a passenger stage corporation as defined by Section 226 of the Public Utilities Code.

Veh. Code § 14607.6: Forfeiture of Motor Vehicle Driven by Driver with Suspended or Revoked License, or by Unlicensed Driver:

(a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, and except as provided in this section, a motor vehicle is subject to forfeiture as a nuisance if it is driven on a highway in this state by a driver with a suspended or revoked license, or by an unlicensed driver, who is a registered owner of the vehicle at the time of impoundment and has a previous misdemeanor conviction for a violation of subdivision (a) of Section 12500 or Section 14601, 14601.1, 14601.2, 14601.3, 14601.4, or 14601.5.

(b) A peace officer shall not stop a vehicle for the sole reason of determining whether the driver is properly licensed.

(1) If a driver is unable to produce a valid driver's license on the demand of a peace officer enforcing the provisions of this code, as required by subdivision (b) of Section 12951, the vehicle shall be impounded regardless of ownership, unless the peace officer is reasonably able, by other means, to verify that the driver is properly licensed. Prior to impounding a vehicle, a peace officer shall attempt to verify the license status of a driver who claims to be properly licensed but is unable to produce the license on demand of the peace officer.

(2) A peace officer shall not impound a vehicle pursuant to this subdivision if the license of the driver expired within the preceding 30 days and the driver would otherwise have been properly licensed.

(3) A peace officer may exercise discretion in a situation where the driver without a valid license is an employee driving a vehicle registered to the employer in the course of employment. A peace officer may also exercise discretion in a situation where the driver without a valid license is the employee of a bona fide business establishment or is a person otherwise controlled by such an establishment and it reasonably appears that an owner of the vehicle, or an agent of the owner, relinquished possession of the vehicle to the business establishment solely for servicing or parking of the vehicle or other reasonably similar situations, and where the vehicle was not to be driven except as directly necessary to accomplish that business purpose. In this event, if the vehicle can be returned to or be retrieved by the business establishment or registered owner, the peace officer may release and not impound the vehicle.

(4) A registered or legal owner of record at the time of impoundment may request a hearing to determine the validity of the impoundment pursuant to subdivision (n).

(5) If the driver of a vehicle impounded pursuant to this subdivision was not a registered owner of the vehicle at the time of impoundment, or if the driver of the vehicle was a registered owner of the vehicle at the time of impoundment but the driver does not have a previous conviction for a violation of subdivision (a) of Section 12500 or Section 14601, 14601.1, 14601.2, 14601.3, 14601.4, or 14601.5, the vehicle shall be released pursuant to this code and is not subject to forfeiture.

(1) This subdivision applies only if the driver of the vehicle is a registered owner of the vehicle at the time of impoundment. Except as provided in paragraph (5) of subdivision (c), if the driver of a vehicle impounded pursuant to subdivision (c) was a registered owner of the vehicle at the time of impoundment, the impounding agency shall authorize release of the vehicle if, within three days of impoundment, the driver of the vehicle at the time of impoundment presents his or her valid driver's license, including a valid temporary California driver's license or permit, to the impounding agency. The vehicle shall then be released to a registered owner of record at the time of impoundment, or an agent of that owner authorized in writing, upon payment of towing and storage charges related to the impoundment, and any administrative charges authorized by Section 22850.5, providing that the person claiming the vehicle is properly licensed and the vehicle is properly registered. A vehicle impounded pursuant to the circumstances described in paragraph (3) of subdivision (c) shall be released to a registered owner whether or not the driver of the vehicle at the time of impoundment presents a valid driver's license.

(2) If there is a community property interest in the vehicle impounded pursuant to subdivision (c), owned at the time of impoundment by a person other than the driver, and the vehicle is the only vehicle available to the driver's immediate family that may be operated with a class C driver's license, the vehicle shall be released to a registered owner or to the community property interest owner upon compliance with all of the following requirements:

(A) The registered owner or the community property interest owner requests release of the vehicle and the owner of the community property interest submits proof of that interest.

(B) The registered owner or the community property interest owner submits proof that he or she, or an authorized driver, is properly licensed and that the impounded vehicle is properly registered pursuant to this code.

(C) All towing and storage charges related to the impoundment and any administrative charges authorized pursuant to Section 22850.5 are paid.

(D) The registered owner or the community property interest owner signs a stipulated vehicle release agreement, as described in paragraph (3), in consideration for the nonforfeiture of the vehicle. This requirement applies only if the driver requests release of the vehicle.

(3) A stipulated vehicle release agreement shall provide for the consent of the signator to the automatic future forfeiture and transfer of title to the state of any vehicle registered to that person, if the vehicle is driven by a driver with a suspended or revoked license, or by an unlicensed driver. The agreement shall be in effect for only as long as it is noted on a driving record maintained by the department pursuant to Section 1806.1.

(4) The stipulated vehicle release agreement described in paragraph (3) shall be reported by the impounding agency to the department not later than 10 days after the day the agreement is signed.

(5) No vehicle shall be released pursuant to paragraph (2) if the driving record of a registered owner indicates that a prior stipulated vehicle release agreement was signed by that person.

(1) The impounding agency, in the case of a vehicle that has not been redeemed pursuant to subdivision (d), or that has not been otherwise released, shall promptly ascertain from the department the names and addresses of all legal and registered owners of the vehicle.

(2) The impounding agency, within two days of impoundment, shall send a notice by certified mail, return receipt requested, to all legal and registered owners of the vehicle, at the addresses obtained from the department, informing them that the vehicle is subject to forfeiture and will be sold or otherwise disposed of pursuant to this section. The notice shall also include instructions for filing a claim with the district attorney, and the time limits for filing a claim. The notice shall also inform any legal owner of its right to conduct the sale pursuant to subdivision (g). If a registered owner was personally served at the time of impoundment with a notice containing all the information required to be provided by this paragraph, no further notice is required to be sent to a registered owner. However, a notice shall still be sent to the legal owners of the vehicle, if any. If notice was not sent to the legal owner within two working days, the impounding agency shall not charge the legal owner for more than 15-days' impoundment when the legal owner redeems the impounded vehicle.

(3) No processing charges shall be imposed on a legal owner who redeems an impounded vehicle within 15 days of the impoundment of that vehicle. If no claims are filed and served within 15 days after the mailing of the notice in paragraph (2), or if no claims are filed and served within five days of personal service of the notice specified in paragraph (2), when no other mailed notice is required pursuant to paragraph (2), the district attorney shall prepare a written declaration of forfeiture of the vehicle to the state. A written declaration of forfeiture signed by the district attorney under this subdivision shall be deemed to provide good and sufficient title to the forfeited vehicle. A copy of the declaration shall be provided on request to any person informed of the pending forfeiture pursuant to paragraph (2). A claim that is filed and is later withdrawn by the claimant shall be deemed not to have been filed.

(4) If a claim is timely filed and served, then the district attorney shall file a petition of forfeiture with the appropriate juvenile or superior court within 10 days of the receipt of the claim. The district attorney shall establish an expedited hearing date in accordance with instructions from the court, and the court shall hear the matter without delay. The court filing fee of one hundred dollars ($100) shall be paid by the claimant, but shall be reimbursed by the impounding agency if the claimant prevails. To the extent practicable, the civil and criminal cases shall be heard at the same time in an expedited, consolidated proceeding. A proceeding in the civil case is a limited civil case.

(5) The burden of proof in the civil case shall be on the prosecuting agency, by a preponderance of the evidence. All questions that may arise shall be decided and all other proceedings shall be conducted as in an ordinary civil action. A judgment of forfeiture does not require as a condition precedent the conviction of a defendant of an offense which made the vehicle subject to forfeiture. The filing of a claim within the time limits specified in paragraph (3) is considered a jurisdictional prerequisite for the availing of the action authorized by that paragraph.

(6) All right, title, and interest in the vehicle shall vest in the state upon commission of the act giving rise to the forfeiture.

(7) The filing fee in paragraph (4) shall be distributed as follows:

(A) To the county law library fund as provided in Section 6320 of the Business and Professions Code, the amount specified in Sections 6321 and 6322.1 of the Business and Professions Code.

(B) To the Trial Court Trust Fund, the remainder of the fee.

(f) Any vehicle impounded that is not redeemed pursuant to subdivision (d) and is subsequently forfeited pursuant to this section shall be sold once an order of forfeiture is issued by the district attorney of the county of the impounding agency or a court, as the case may be, pursuant to subdivision (e).

(g) Any legal owner who is a motor vehicle dealer, bank, credit union, acceptance corporation, or other licensed financial institution legally operating in this state, or the agent of that legal owner, may take possession and conduct the sale of the forfeited vehicle if the legal owner or agent notifies the agency impounding the vehicle of its intent to conduct the sale within 15 days of the mailing of the notice pursuant to subdivision (e). Sale of the vehicle after forfeiture pursuant to this subdivision may be conducted at the time, in the manner, and on the notice usually given for the sale of repossessed or surrendered vehicles. The proceeds of any sale conducted by or on behalf of the legal owner shall be disposed of as provided in subdivision (i). A notice pursuant to this subdivision may be presented in person, by certified mail, by facsimile transmission, or by electronic mail.

(h) If the legal owner or agent of the owner does not notify the agency impounding the vehicle of its intent to conduct the sale as provided in subdivision (g), the agency shall offer the forfeited vehicle for sale at public auction within 60 days of receiving title to the vehicle. Low value vehicles shall be disposed of pursuant to subdivision (k).

(i) The proceeds of a sale of a forfeited vehicle shall be disposed of in the following priority:

(1) To satisfy the towing and storage costs following impoundment, the costs of providing notice pursuant to subdivision (e), the costs of sale, and the unfunded costs of judicial proceedings, if any.

(2) To the legal owner in an amount to satisfy the indebtedness owed to the legal owner remaining as of the date of sale, including accrued interest or finance charges and delinquency charges, providing that the principal indebtedness was incurred prior to the date of impoundment.

(3) To the holder of any subordinate lien or encumbrance on the vehicle, other than a registered or legal owner, to satisfy any indebtedness so secured if written notification of demand is received before distribution of the proceeds is completed. The holder of a subordinate lien or encumbrance, if requested, shall furnish reasonable proof of its interest and, unless it does so upon request, is not entitled to distribution pursuant to this paragraph.

(4) To any other person, other than a registered or legal owner, who can reasonably establish an interest in the vehicle, including a community property interest, to the extent of his or her provable interest, if written notification is received before distribution of the proceeds is completed.

(5) Of the remaining proceeds, funds shall be made available to pay any local agency and court costs, that are reasonably related to the implementation of this section, that remain unsatisfied.

(6) Of the remaining proceeds, half shall be transferred to the Controller for deposit in the Vehicle Inspection and Repair Fund for the high-polluter repair assistance and removal program created by Article 9 (commencing with Section 44090) of Chapter 5 of Part 5 of Division 26 of the Health and Safety Code, and half shall be transferred to the general fund of the city or county of the impounding agency, or the city or county where the impoundment occurred. A portion of the local funds may be used to establish a reward fund for persons coming forward with information leading to the arrest and conviction of hit-and-run drivers and to publicize the availability of the reward fund.

(j) The person conducting the sale shall disburse the proceeds of the sale as provided in subdivision (i) and shall provide a written accounting regarding the disposition to the impounding agency and, on request, to any person entitled to or claiming a share of the proceeds, within 15 days after the sale is conducted.

(k) If the vehicle to be sold pursuant to this section is not of the type that can readily be sold to the public generally, the vehicle shall be conveyed to a licensed dismantler or donated to an eleemosynary institution. License plates shall be removed from any vehicle conveyed to a dismantler pursuant to this subdivision.

(l) No vehicle shall be sold pursuant to this section if the impounding agency determines the vehicle to have been stolen. In this event, the vehicle may be claimed by the registered owner at any time after impoundment, providing the vehicle registration is current and the registered owner has no outstanding traffic violations or parking penalties on his or her driving record or on the registration record of any vehicle registered to the person. If the identity of the legal and registered owners of the vehicle cannot be reasonably ascertained, the vehicle may be sold.

(m) Any owner of a vehicle who suffers any loss due to the impoundment or forfeiture of any vehicle pursuant to this section may recover the amount of the loss from the unlicensed, suspended, or revoked driver. If possession of a vehicle has been tendered to a business establishment in good faith, and an unlicensed driver employed or otherwise directed by the business establishment is the cause of the impoundment of the vehicle, a registered owner of the impounded vehicle may recover damages for the loss of use of the vehicle from the business establishment.

(1) The impounding agency, if requested to do so not later than 10 days after the date the vehicle was impounded, shall provide the opportunity for a poststorage hearing to determine the validity of the storage to the persons who were the registered and legal owners of the vehicle at the time of impoundment, except that the hearing shall be requested within three days after the date the vehicle was impounded if personal service was provided to a registered owner pursuant to paragraph (2) of subdivision (e) and no mailed notice is required.

(2) The poststorage hearing shall be conducted not later than two days after the date it was requested. The impounding agency may authorize its own officer or employee to conduct the hearing if the hearing officer is not the same person who directed the storage of the vehicle. Failure of either the registered or legal owner to request a hearing as provided in paragraph (1) or to attend a scheduled hearing shall satisfy the poststorage hearing requirement.

(3) The agency employing the person who directed the storage is responsible for the costs incurred for towing and storage if it is determined that the driver at the time of impoundment had a valid driver's license.

(o) As used in this section, "days" means workdays not including weekends and holidays.

(p) Charges for towing and storage for any vehicle impounded pursuant to this section shall not exceed the normal towing and storage rates for other vehicle towing and storage conducted by the impounding agency in the normal course of business.

(q) The Judicial Council and the Department of Justice may prescribe standard forms and procedures for implementation of this section to be used by all jurisdictions throughout the state.

(r) The impounding agency may act as the agent of the state in carrying out this section.

(s) No vehicle shall be impounded pursuant to this section if the driver has a valid license but the license is for a class of vehicle other than the vehicle operated by the driver.

(t) This section does not apply to vehicles subject to Sections 14608 and 14609, if there has been compliance with the procedures in those sections.

(u) As used in this section, "district attorney" includes a city attorney charged with the duty of prosecuting misdemeanor offenses.

(v) The agent of a legal owner acting pursuant to subdivision (g) shall be licensed, or exempt from licensure, pursuant to Chapter 11 (commencing with Section 7500) of Division 3 of the Business and Professions Code.

Cases Law:

> The trial court had authority to deny the State's petitions for forfeiture of motor vehicles under this statute, on a showing that the drivers had obtained valid licenses. (People v. One 1986 Cadillac DeVille (1999), 70 Cal.App.4th 157.)
>
> The California Highway Patrol and two of its officers could not be held liable in a consolidated wrongful death action brought against them under Gov't. Code § 815.6 for failing to perform mandatory duty because Veh. Code § 14602.6(a)(1) confers only discretionary authority on law enforcement to impound an individual's vehicle if an individual is arrested for driving with a suspended license under Veh. Code § 14601.1. The Legislature's use of "shall" instead of "may" in Veh. Code § 14607.6(c)(1) indicates that it understands the distinction between the two words and acts deliberately in choosing its vocabulary, and this clear distinction in the language employed in Veh. Code § 14602.6 and Veh. Code §14607.6, as well as that employed in Veh. Code § 14602.5 and Veh. Code § 14602.7, supports the conclusion that Veh. Code § 14602.6(a)(1) confers discretionary authority on law enforcement. (California Highway Patrol v. Superior Court (2008), 162 Cal.App.4th 1144.)
> A police department's policy regarding impounding vehicles, which sought to implement Veh. Code §§ 14602.6 and 14607.6, was within the wide discretion of the police chief because it neither created new law nor conflicted with existing law but, rather, simply implemented existing law, helping to ensure uniform application of the state's laws among the department's sworn peace officers. A taxpayer thus lacked standing to challenge the chief's implementation of the statutes because he failed to demonstrate anything more than an arguable mistake in exercising discretion, and the concern of an association representing sworn peace officers that its members might violate state law by complying with the policy was no longer a basis for its standing. (Los Angeles Police Protective League v. City of Los Angeles (2014) 232 Cal.App.4th 907; depublished at (2015), 2015 Cal. LEXIS 1910.)

"Although California law authorizes impoundment of a vehicle where the driver does not have a valid driver's license, Cal. Veh. Code § 14607.6, this alone does not establish a valid community caretaking purpose that satisfies the Fourth Amendment. (United States v. Anderson (9th Cir. 2022) 56 F.4th 748, 758-759; upholding the applicability of the community caretaking doctrine, finding that having stopped in a third party's driveway who wanted defendant's vehicle removed, "there was no one available to move (defendant's) truck because (defendant) did not have a valid driver's license, he had no passengers with him, and he told the deputies that he was not from the area where he was stopped."

The Court further held that the deputies were not obligated to wait for a friend of the defendant's to come to the scene to move defendant's truck. Per the Court: "(A)n officer 'is not required to consider the existence of alternative less intrusive means when [a] vehicle must in fact be moved to avoid the creation of a hazard or the continued unlawful operation of the vehicle.'" (Id., at p. 760; quoting Miranda v. City of Cornelius (9th Cir. 2005) 429 F.3rd 858, 865, fn. 6.)

Veh. Code § 22650: Limitation on Authority; Burden of Proof at Hearings:

(a) It is unlawful for a peace officer or an unauthorized person to remove an unattended vehicle from a highway to a garage or to any other place, except as provided in this code.

(b) Any removal of a vehicle is a seizure under the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States and Section 13 of Article I of the California Constitution, and shall be reasonable and subject to the limits set forth in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. A removal pursuant to an authority, including, but not limited to, as provided in Section 22651, that is based on community caretaking, is only reasonable if the removal is necessary to achieve the community caretaking need, such as ensuring the safe flow of traffic or protecting property from theft or vandalism.

(c) Those law enforcement and other agencies identified in this chapter as having the authority to remove vehicles shall also have the authority to provide hearings in compliance with the provisions of Section 22852. During these hearings the storing agency shall have the burden of establishing the authority for, and the validity of, the removal.

> Note: V.C. § 22852 describes the post-impound hearing requirements.

(d) This section does not prevent a review or other action as may be permitted by the laws of this state by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Case Law:

> "'The authority of police to seize and remove from the streets vehicles impeding traffic or threatening public safety and convenience is beyond challenge.' (South Dakota v. Opperman (1976) 428 U.S. 364, 369 [49 L.Ed.2nd 1000, 96 S. Ct. 3092].) A vehicle impound search will be upheld if it is reasonable under all the circumstances. (People v. Shafrir (2010) 183 Cal.App.4th 1238, 1247 . . .)" (People v. Quick (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 1006, 1010.)

Veh. Code § 22651*: *Circumstances In Which Removal of a Vehicle Permitted:

A peace officer, as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, or a regularly employed and salaried employee, who is engaged in directing traffic or enforcing parking laws and regulations, of a city, county, or jurisdiction of a state agency in which a vehicle is located, may remove a vehicle located within the territorial limits in which the officer or employee may act, under the following circumstances:

> (a) If a vehicle is left unattended upon a bridge, viaduct, or causeway or in a tube or tunnel where the vehicle constitutes an obstruction to traffic.

(b) If a vehicle is parked or left standing upon a highway in a position so as to obstruct the normal movement of traffic or in a condition so as to create a hazard to other traffic upon the highway.

(c) If a vehicle is found upon a highway or public land and a report has previously been made that the vehicle is stolen or a complaint has been filed and a warrant thereon is issued charging that the vehicle was embezzled.

(d) If a vehicle is illegally parked so as to block the entrance to a private driveway and it is impractical to move the vehicle from in front of the driveway to another point on the highway.

(e) If a vehicle is illegally parked so as to prevent access by firefighting equipment to a fire hydrant and it is impracticable to move the vehicle from in front of the fire hydrant to another point on the highway.

(f) If a vehicle, except highway maintenance or construction equipment, is stopped, parked, or left standing for more than four hours upon the right-of-way of a freeway that has full control of access and no crossings at grade and the driver, if present, cannot move the vehicle under its own power.

(g) If the person in charge of a vehicle upon a highway or public land is, by reason of physical injuries or illness, incapacitated to an extent so as to be unable to provide for its custody or removal.

(h)

(1) If an officer arrests a person driving or in control of a vehicle for an alleged offense and the officer is, by this code or other law, required or permitted to take, and does take, the person into custody.

(2) If an officer serves a notice of an order of suspension or revocation pursuant to Section 13388 or 13389.

(i)

(1) If a vehicle, other than a rented vehicle, is found upon a highway or public land, or is removed pursuant to this code, and it is known that the vehicle has been issued five or more notices of parking violations to which the owner or person in control of the vehicle has not responded within 21 calendar days of notice of citation issuance or citation issuance or 14 calendar days of the mailing of a notice of delinquent parking violation to the agency responsible for processing notices of parking violations, or the registered owner of the vehicle is known to have been issued five or more notices for failure to pay or failure to appear in court for traffic violations for which a certificate has not been issued by the magistrate or clerk of the court hearing the case showing that the case has been adjudicated or concerning which the registered owner's record has not been cleared pursuant to Chapter 6 (commencing with Section 41500) of Division 17, the vehicle may be impounded until that person furnishes to the impounding law enforcement agency all of the following:

(A) Evidence of his or her identity.

(B) An address within this state where he or she can be located.

(C) Satisfactory evidence that all parking penalties due for the vehicle and all other vehicles registered to the registered owner of the impounded vehicle, and all traffic violations of the registered owner, have been cleared.

(Coalition on Homelessness v. City and County of San Francisco (2023) 93 Cal.App.5th 928.)

(2) The requirements in subparagraph (C) of paragraph (1) shall be fully enforced by the impounding law enforcement agency on and after the time that the Department of Motor Vehicles is able to provide access to the necessary records.

(3) A notice of parking violation issued for an unlawfully parked vehicle shall be accompanied by a warning that repeated violations may result in the impounding of the vehicle. In lieu of furnishing satisfactory evidence that the full amount of parking penalties or bail has been deposited, that person may demand to be taken without unnecessary delay before a magistrate, for traffic offenses, or a hearing examiner, for parking offenses, within the county where the offenses charged are alleged to have been committed and who has jurisdiction of the offenses and is nearest or most accessible with reference to the place where the vehicle is impounded. Evidence of current registration shall be produced after a vehicle has been impounded, or, at the discretion of the impounding law enforcement agency, a notice to appear for violation of subdivision (a) of Section 4000 shall be issued to that person.

(4) A vehicle shall be released to the legal owner, as defined in Section 370, if the legal owner does all of the following:

(A) Pays the cost of towing and storing the vehicle.

(B) Submits evidence of payment of fees as provided in Section 9561.

(C) Completes an affidavit in a form acceptable to the impounding law enforcement agency stating that the vehicle was not in possession of the legal owner at the time of occurrence of the offenses relating to standing or parking. A vehicle released to a legal owner under this subdivision is a repossessed vehicle for purposes of disposition or sale. The impounding agency shall have a lien on any surplus that remains upon sale of the vehicle to which the registered owner is or may be entitled, as security for the full amount of the parking penalties for all notices of parking violations issued for the vehicle and for all local administrative charges imposed pursuant to Section 22850.5. The legal owner shall promptly remit to, and deposit with, the agency responsible for processing notices of parking violations from that surplus, on receipt of that surplus, the full amount of the parking penalties for all notices of parking violations issued for the vehicle and for all local administrative charges imposed pursuant to Section 22850.5.

(5) The impounding agency that has a lien on the surplus that remains upon the sale of a vehicle to which a registered owner is entitled pursuant to paragraph (4) has a deficiency claim against the registered owner for the full amount of the parking penalties for all notices of parking violations issued for the vehicle and for all local administrative charges imposed pursuant to Section 22850.5, less the amount received from the sale of the vehicle.

(j) If a vehicle is found illegally parked and there are no license plates or other evidence of registration displayed, the vehicle may be impounded until the owner or person in control of the vehicle furnishes the impounding law enforcement agency evidence of his or her identity and an address within this state where he or she can be located.

(k) If a vehicle is parked or left standing upon a highway for 72 or more consecutive hours in violation of a local ordinance authorizing removal.

(l) If a vehicle is illegally parked on a highway in violation of a local ordinance forbidding standing or parking and the use of a highway, or a portion thereof, is necessary for the cleaning, repair, or construction of the highway, or for the installation of underground utilities, and signs giving notice that the vehicle may be removed are erected or placed at least 24 hours prior to the removal by a local authority pursuant to the ordinance.

(m) If the use of the highway, or a portion of the highway, is authorized by a local authority for a purpose other than the normal flow of traffic or for the movement of equipment, articles, or structures of unusual size, and the parking of a vehicle would prohibit or interfere with that use or movement, and signs giving notice that the vehicle may be removed are erected or placed at least 24 hours prior to the removal by a local authority pursuant to the ordinance.

(n) Whenever a vehicle is parked or left standing where local authorities, by resolution or ordinance, have prohibited parking and have authorized the removal of vehicles. Except as provided in subdivisions (v) and (w), a vehicle shall not be removed unless signs are posted giving notice of the removal.

(1) If a vehicle is found or operated upon a highway, public land, or an off-street parking facility under any of the following circumstances:

(A) With a registration expiration date in excess of six months before the date it is found or operated on the highway, public lands, or the off-street parking facility.

The community caretaking doctrine applies as well to cars parked when unregistered for over six months. (Leslie v. City of Sand City (N.D. Cal. 2009) 615 F. Supp.2nd 1121, 1125-1126.)

(B) Displaying in, or upon, the vehicle, a registration card, identification card, temporary receipt, license plate, special plate, registration sticker, device issued pursuant to Section 4853, or permit that was not issued for that vehicle, or is not otherwise lawfully used on that vehicle under this code.

(C) Displaying in, or upon, the vehicle, an altered, forged, counterfeit, or falsified registration card, identification card, temporary receipt, license plate, special plate, registration sticker, device issued pursuant to Section 4853, or permit.

(i) The vehicle is operating using autonomous technology, without the registered owner or manufacturer of the vehicle having first applied for, and obtained, a valid permit that is required to operate the vehicle on public roads pursuant to Section 38750, and Article 3.7 (commencing with Section 227.00) and Article 3.8 (commencing with Section 228.00) of Title 13 of the California Code of Regulations.

(ii) The vehicle is operating using autonomous technology after the registered owner or person in control of the vehicle received notice that the vehicle's permit required for the operation of the vehicle pursuant to Section 38750, and Article 3.7 (commencing with Section 227.00) and Article 3.8 (commencing with Section 228.00) of Title 13 of the California Code of Regulations is suspended, terminated, or revoked.

(iii) For purposes of this subdivision, the terms "autonomous technology" and "autonomous vehicle" have the same meanings as in Section 38750.

(iv) This subparagraph does not provide the authority for a peace officer to stop an autonomous vehicle solely for the purpose of determining whether the vehicle is operating using autonomous technology without a valid permit required to operate the autonomous vehicle on public roads pursuant to Section 38750, and Article 3.7 (commencing with Section 227.00) and Article 3.8 (commencing with Section 228.00) of Title 13 of the California Code of Regulations.

(2) If a vehicle described in paragraph (1) is occupied, only a peace officer, as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, may remove the vehicle.

(3) For the purposes of this subdivision, the vehicle shall be released under any of the following circumstances:

(A) If the vehicle has been removed pursuant to subparagraph (A), (B), or (C) of paragraph (1), to the registered owner of, or person in control of, the vehicle only after the owner or person furnishes the storing law enforcement agency with proof of current registration and a valid driver's license to operate the vehicle.

(B) If the vehicle has been removed pursuant to subparagraph (D) of paragraph (1), to the registered owner of, or person in control of, the autonomous vehicle, after the registered owner or person furnishes the storing law enforcement agency with proof of current registration and a valid driver's license, if required to operate the autonomous vehicle, and either of the following:

(i) Proof of a valid permit required to operate the autonomous vehicle using autonomous technology on public roads pursuant to Section 38750, and Article 3.7 (commencing with Section 227.00) and Article 3.8 (commencing with Section 228.00) of Title 13 of the California Code of Regulations.

(ii) A declaration or sworn statement to the Department of Motor Vehicles that states that the autonomous vehicle will not be operated using autonomous technology upon public roads without first obtaining a valid permit to operate the vehicle pursuant to Section 38750, and Article 3.7 (commencing with Section 227.00) and Article 3.8 (commencing with Section 228.00) of Title 13 of the California Code of Regulations.

(C) To the legal owner or the legal owner's agency, without payment of any fees, fines, or penalties for parking tickets or registration and without proof of current registration, if the vehicle will only be transported pursuant to the exemption specified in Section 4022 and if the legal owner does all of the following:

(i) Pays the cost of towing and storing the vehicle.

(ii) Completes an affidavit in a form acceptable to the impounding law enforcement agency stating that the vehicle was not in possession of the legal owner at the time of occurrence of an offense relating to standing or parking. A vehicle released to a legal owner under this subdivision is a repossessed vehicle for purposes of disposition or sale. The impounding agency has a lien on any surplus that remains upon sale of the vehicle to which the registered owner is or may be entitled, as security for the full amount of parking penalties for any notices of parking violations issued for the vehicle and for all local administrative charges imposed pursuant to Section 22850.5. Upon receipt of any surplus, the legal owner shall promptly remit to, and deposit with, the agency responsible for processing notices of parking violations from that surplus, the full amount of the parking penalties for all notices of parking violations issued for the vehicle and for all local administrative charges imposed pursuant to Section 22850.5.

(4) The impounding agency that has a lien on the surplus that remains upon the sale of a vehicle to which a registered owner is entitled has a deficiency claim against the registered owner for the full amount of parking penalties for any notices of parking violations issued for the vehicle and for all local administrative charges imposed pursuant to Section 22850.5, less the amount received from the sale of the vehicle.

(5) As used in this subdivision, "off-street parking facility" means an off-street facility held open for use by the public for parking vehicles and includes a publicly owned facility for off-street parking, and a privately owned facility for off-street parking if a fee is not charged for the privilege to park and it is held open for the common public use of retail customers.

(p) If the peace officer issues the driver of a vehicle a notice to appear for a violation of Section 12500, 14601, 14601.1, 14601.2, 14601.3, 14601.4, 14601.5, or 14604 14604, and the vehicle is not impounded pursuant to Section 22655.5. A vehicle so removed from the highway or public land, or from private property after having been on a highway or public land, shall not be released to the registered owner or his or her agent, except upon presentation of the registered owner's or his or her agent's currently valid driver's license to operate the vehicle and proof of current vehicle registration, to the impounding law enforcement agency, or upon order of a court.

(q) If a vehicle is parked for more than 24 hours on a portion of highway that is located within the boundaries of a common interest development, as defined in Section 4100 or 6534 of the Civil Code, and signs, as required by paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of Section 22658 of this code, have been posted on that portion of highway providing notice to drivers that vehicles parked thereon for more than 24 hours will be removed at the owner's expense, pursuant to a resolution or ordinance adopted by the local authority.

(r) If a vehicle is illegally parked and blocks the movement of a legally parked vehicle.

(1) If a vehicle, except highway maintenance or construction equipment, an authorized emergency vehicle, or a vehicle that is properly permitted or otherwise authorized by the Department of Transportation, is stopped, parked, or left standing for more than eight hours within a roadside rest area or viewpoint.

(2) Notwithstanding paragraph (1), if a commercial motor vehicle, as defined in paragraph (1) of subdivision (b) of Section 15210, is stopped, parked, or left standing for more than 10 hours within a roadside rest area or viewpoint.

(3) For purposes of this subdivision, a roadside rest area or viewpoint is a publicly maintained vehicle parking area, adjacent to a highway, utilized for the convenient, safe stopping of a vehicle to enable motorists to rest or to view the scenery. If two or more roadside rest areas are located on opposite sides of the highway, or upon the center divider, within seven miles of each other, then that combination of rest areas is considered to be the same rest area.

(t) If a peace officer issues a notice to appear for a violation of Section 25279.

(u) If a peace officer issues a citation for a violation of Section 11700, and the vehicle is being offered for sale.

(1) If a vehicle is a mobile billboard advertising display, as defined in Section 395.5, and is parked or left standing in violation of a local resolution or ordinance adopted pursuant to subdivision (m) of Section 21100, if the registered owner of the vehicle was previously issued a warning citation for the same offense, pursuant to paragraph (2).

(2) Notwithstanding subdivision (a) of Section 22507, a city or county, in lieu of posting signs noticing a local ordinance prohibiting mobile billboard advertising displays adopted pursuant to subdivision (m) of Section 21100, may provide notice by issuing a warning citation advising the registered owner of the vehicle that he or she may be subject to penalties upon a subsequent violation of the ordinance, that may include the removal of the vehicle as provided in paragraph (1). A city or county is not required to provide further notice for a subsequent violation prior to the enforcement of penalties for a violation of the ordinance.

(1) If a vehicle is parked or left standing in violation of a local ordinance or resolution adopted pursuant to subdivision (p) of Section 21100, if the registered owner of the vehicle was previously issued a warning citation for the same offense, pursuant to paragraph (2).

(2) Notwithstanding subdivision (a) of Section 22507, a city or county, in lieu of posting signs noticing a local ordinance regulating advertising signs adopted pursuant to subdivision (p) of Section 21100, may provide notice by issuing a warning citation advising the registered owner of the vehicle that he or she may be subject to penalties upon a subsequent violation of the ordinance that may include the removal of the vehicle as provided in paragraph (1). A city or county is not required to provide further notice for a subsequent violation prior to the enforcement of penalties for a violation of the ordinance.

Case Law:

It has been held that V.C. § 22651(p) and "established department practices" are enough to meet the "standardized procedures" requirement. (People v. Benites (1992) 9 Cal.App.4th 309; People v. Steeley (1989) 210 Cal.App.3rd 887.)

Towing and impounding a vehicle merely because it is illegally parked, without prior notice to the vehicle's owner and a pre-seizure hearing, absent an exigency requiring immediate action (such as in an emergency, where notice would defeat the entire point of the seizure, or where the interests at stake are small relative to the burden that giving notice would impose; e.g., the car is parked in the path of traffic, blocking a driveway, obstructing a fire lane, or appears to be abandoned, or where there is no current registration stickers and there's no guarantee the owner won't move or hide the vehicle instead of paying the fine for illegal parking), is a Fourteenth Amendment due process violation despite statutes allowing for the towing, and may generate some civil liability for the police. (Clement v. City of Glendale (9th Cir. 2008) 518 F.3rd 1090; an unregistered vehicle with a "planned non-operation (PNO) certificate" filed, parked in a publicly accessible parking lot in violation of V.C. § 22651(o).)

See also Grimm v. City of Portland (9th Cir. 2020) 971 F.3rd 1060, where it was held in an action brought by a car owner against the City of Portland, where plaintiff alleged that the pre-towing notice provided was inadequate under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, that the district court had erred in applying the wrong case law in analyzing the owner's adequacy of notice claim. The Court held that some individualized form of pre-towing notice is required before the City can tow a vehicle where it was not blocking anyone's path, the City is able to obtain current information on the whereabouts of the owner, and the tow was not needed to provide security for the payment of the fine.

Veh. Code § 22651(b) provides that a peace officer may remove a vehicle: "When a vehicle is parked or left standing upon a highway in a position so as to obstruct the normal movement of traffic or in a condition so as to create a hazard to other traffic upon the highway," and is grounds under the Community Caretaking Doctrine to impound a vehicle. (People v. Quick (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 1006, 1010-1011.)

Veh. Code § 22651(h)(1) authorizes the impounding of a vehicle "(w)hen an officer arrests any person driving or in control of a vehicle for an alleged offense" and takes that person into custody." However, impounding a vehicle under authority of this section is constitutional only if impoundment serves some "community caretaking function." Whether or not the community caretaking function justifies the impounding of a vehicle depends upon the location of the vehicle and the police officer's duty to prevent it from creating a hazard to other drivers or from being a target for vandalism or theft. When it was found that an arrested defendant's vehicle was lawfully parked only two houses down from his own home, impounding it was held to be illegal. (United States v. Caseres (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1064, 1074-1075; see also People v. Quick, supra.)

Impounding a vehicle pursuant to Veh. Code § 22651(p), when neither the driver nor the passenger could (or would) produce a valid driver's license, was held to be lawful. (People v. Hoyos (2007) 41 Cal.4th 872, 892.)

> Note: The "Community Caretaking Doctrine" was not raised in this case.

It is also a reoccurring issue whether the Community Caretaking Doctrine applies when the officer's reason for impounding a vehicle is to prevent an unlicensed driver from continuing his unlicensed driving. (See People v. Torres et al. (2012) 205 Cal.App.4th 989, 792; United States v. Caseres (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1064, 1075; and Miranda v. City of Cornelius (9th Cir. 2005) 429 F.3rd 858, 865-866.) None of these cases, however, definitively decide the issue, although they do tend to lean toward not allowing the impounding of a vehicle in such a circumstance.

A police department has discretion to establish guidelines that would allow an impounded vehicle to be released in less than 30 days, under Veh. Code § 22651(p), in situations where a fixed 30-day statutory impoundment period, under Veh. Code § 14602.6(a)(1), may also potentially apply. (95 Ops.Cal.Atty.Gen 1 (2012).)

See "The 'Community Caretaking Doctrine'," below.

Veh. Code § 22651.05*: Removal of Vehicle by Trained Volunteer in Specified Circumstances:

(a) A trained volunteer of a state or local law enforcement agency, who is engaged in directing traffic or enforcing parking laws and regulations, of a city, county, or jurisdiction of a state agency in which a vehicle is located, may remove or authorize the removal of a vehicle located within the territorial limits in which an officer or employee of that agency may act, under any of the following circumstances:

(1) When a vehicle is parked or left standing upon a highway for 72 or more consecutive hours in violation of a local ordinance authorizing the removal.

(2) When a vehicle is illegally parked or left standing on a highway in violation of a local ordinance forbidding standing or parking and the use of a highway, or a portion thereof, is necessary for the cleaning, repair, or construction of the highway, or for the installation of underground utilities, and signs giving notice that the vehicle may be removed are erected or placed at least 24 hours prior to the removal by local authorities pursuant to the ordinance.

(3) Wherever the use of the highway, or a portion thereof, is authorized by local authorities for a purpose other than the normal flow of traffic or for the movement of equipment, articles, or structures of unusual size, and the parking of a vehicle would prohibit or interfere with that use or movement, and signs giving notice that the vehicle may be removed are erected or placed at least 24 hours prior to the removal by local authorities pursuant to the ordinance.

(4) Whenever a vehicle is parked or left standing where local authorities, by resolution or ordinance, have prohibited parking and have authorized the removal of vehicles. A vehicle may not be removed unless signs are posted giving notice of the removal.

(5) Whenever a vehicle is parked for more than 24 hours on a portion of highway that is located within the boundaries of a common interest development, as defined in Section 4100 or 6534 of the Civil Code, and signs, as required by Section 22658.2, have been posted on that portion of highway providing notice to drivers that vehicles parked thereon for more than 24 hours will be removed at the owner's expense, pursuant to a resolution or ordinance adopted by the local authority.

(b) The provisions of this chapter that apply to a vehicle removed pursuant to Section 22651 apply to a vehicle removed pursuant to subdivision (a).

(c) For purposes of subdivision (a), a "trained volunteer" is a person who, of his or her own free will, provides services, without any financial gain, to a local or state law enforcement agency, and who is duly trained and certified to remove a vehicle by a local or state law enforcement agency.

(i) An insurer, insurer's agent, or tow hauler, shall be permitted to pay for towing and storage charges by a valid bank credit card, insurer's check, or bank draft.

(j) Except as otherwise exempted in this section, the requirements of this section apply to any facility that charges for the storage of a vehicle, including, but not limited to, a vehicle repair garage or service station, but not including a new motor vehicle dealer.

(k) A person who violates this section is civilly liable to a registered or legal owner of the vehicle, or a registered owner's insurer, for up to two times the amount charged. Liability in any action brought under this section shall not exceed five hundred dollars ($500) per vehicle.

(l) A suspected violation of this section may be reported by any person, including, without limitation, the legal or registered owner of a vehicle or his or her insurer.

(m) This section shall not apply to the towing or storage of a repossessed vehicle by any person subject to, or exempt from, the Collateral Recovery Act (Chapter 11 (commencing with Section 7500) of Division 3 of the Business and Professions Code).

(n) This section does not relieve a person from the obligation to comply with any other law.

(o) Notwithstanding this section, an insurer shall comply with all of its obligations under Section 2695.8 of Chapter 5 of Title 10 of the California Code of Regulations.

Veh. Code § 22651.1*: Payment of Towing and Storage Costs by Credit Card or Cash.

Persons operating or in charge of any storage facility where vehicles are stored pursuant to Section 22651 shall accept a valid bank credit card or cash for payment of towing and storage by the registered owner, legal owner, or the owner's agent claiming the vehicle. A credit card shall be in the name of the person presenting the card. "Credit card" means "credit card" as defined in subdivision (a) of Section 1747.02 of the Civil Code, except, for the purposes of this section, credit card does not include a credit card issued by a retail seller. A person operating or in charge of any storage facility who refuses to accept a valid bank credit card shall be liable to the owner of the vehicle or to the person who tendered the fees for four times the amount of the towing and storage charges, but not to exceed five hundred dollars ($500). In addition, persons operating or in charge of the storage facility shall have sufficient funds on the premises to accommodate and make change in a reasonable monetary transaction.

Credit charges for towing and storage services shall comply with Section 1748.1 of the Civil Code. Law enforcement agencies may include the costs of providing for payment by credit when agreeing with a towing or storage provider on rates.

Veh. Code § 22651.2: Impoundment of Vehicle Used to Advertise Event or Function:

(a) Any peace officer, as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, or any regularly employed and salaried employee, who is engaged in directing traffic or enforcing parking laws and regulations of a city, county, or jurisdiction of a state agency in which a vehicle is located, may remove a vehicle located within the territorial limits in which the officer or employee may act when the vehicle is found upon a highway or any public lands, and if all of the following requirements are satisfied:

(1) Because of the size and placement of signs or placards on the vehicle, it appears that the primary purpose of parking the vehicle at that location is to advertise to the public an event or function on private property or on public property hired for a private event or function to which the public is invited.

(2) The vehicle is known to have been previously issued a notice of parking violation that was accompanied by a notice warning that an additional parking violation may result in the impoundment of the vehicle.

(3) The registered owner of the vehicle has been mailed a notice advising of the existence of the parking violation and that an additional violation may result in the impoundment of the vehicle.

(b) Subdivision (a) does not apply to a vehicle bearing any sign or placard advertising any business or enterprise carried on by or through the use of that vehicle.

(c) Section 22852 applies to the removal of any vehicle pursuant to this section.

Note: V.C. § 22852 describes the post-impound hearing requirements.

Veh. Code § 22651.3*: *Impoundment of Vehicles in Off-street Public Parking Facility; Multiple Parking Violations:

(a) Any peace officer, as that term is defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, or any regularly employed and salaried employee, who is engaged in directing traffic or enforcing parking laws and regulations, of a city, county, or jurisdiction of a state agency in which any vehicle, other than a rented vehicle, is located may remove the vehicle from an off-street public parking facility located within the territorial limits in which the officer or employee may act when the vehicle is known to have been issued five or more notices of parking violation over a period of five or more days, to which the owner or person in control of the vehicle has not responded or when any vehicle is illegally parked so as to prevent the movement of a legally parked vehicle. A notice of parking violation issued to a vehicle which is registered in a foreign jurisdiction or is without current California registration and is known to have been issued five or more notices of parking violation over a period of five or more days shall be accompanied by a warning that repeated violations may result in the impounding of the vehicle.

(b) The vehicle may be impounded until the owner or person in control of the vehicle furnishes to the impounding law enforcement agency evidence of his or her identity and an address within this state at which he or she can be located and furnishes satisfactory evidence that bail has been deposited for all notices of parking violation issued for the vehicle. In lieu of requiring satisfactory evidence that the bail has been deposited, the impounding law enforcement agency may, in its discretion, issue a notice to appear for the offenses charged, as provided in Article 2 (commencing with Section 40500) of Chapter 2 of Division 17. In lieu of either furnishing satisfactory evidence that the bail has been deposited or accepting the notice to appear, the owner or person in control of the vehicle may demand to be taken without unnecessary delay before a magistrate within the county in which the offenses charged are alleged to have been committed and who has jurisdiction of the offenses and is nearest or most accessible with reference to the place where the vehicle is impounded.

(c) Evidence of current registration shall be produced after a vehicle has been impounded. At the discretion of the impounding law enforcement agency, a notice to appear for violation of subdivision (a) of Section 4000 may be issued to the owner or person in control of the vehicle, if the two days immediately following the day of impoundment are weekend days or holidays.

Veh. Code § 22651.4*: *Impounding of Commercial Motor Vehicles From Other Countries; Release:

(a) A peace officer, as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, may impound a vehicle and its cargo pursuant to Section 34517.

(b) A member of the department may impound a vehicle and its cargo pursuant to Section 34518.

(c) A member of the department may store or impound a vehicle upon determination that the registrant of the vehicle or the driver of the vehicle has failed to pay registration, regulatory, fuel permit, or other fees, or has an outstanding warrant in a county in the state. The impoundment charges are the responsibility of the owner of the vehicle. The stored or impounded vehicle shall be released upon payment of those fees or fines or the posting of bail. The driver or owner of the vehicle may request a hearing to determine the validity of the seizure.

Veh. Code § 22651.5*: *Removal of Vehicle with Activated Alarm Device:

(a) Any peace officer, as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, or any regularly employed and salaried employee who is engaged in directing traffic or enforcing parking laws or regulations, may, upon the complaint of any person, remove a vehicle parked within 500 feet of any occupied building of a school, community college, or university during normal hours of operation, or a vehicle parked within a residence or business district, from a highway or from public or private property, if an alarm device or horn has been activated within the vehicle, whether continuously activated or intermittently and repeatedly activated, the peace officer or designated employee is unable to locate the owner of the vehicle within 20 minutes from the time of arrival at the vehicle's location, and the alarm device or horn has not been completely silenced prior to removal.

(b) Upon removal of a vehicle from a highway or from public or private property pursuant to this section, the peace officer or designated employee ordering the removal shall immediately report the removal and the location to which the vehicle is removed to the Stolen Vehicle System of the Department of Justice.

Veh. Code § 22651.6: Removal of Vehicle Used by Person Arrested for Speed Contest:

A peace officer or employee specified in Section 22651 may remove a vehicle located within the territorial limits in which the officer or employee may act when the vehicle was used by a person who was engaged in a motor vehicle speed contest, as described in subdivision (a) of Section 23109, and the person was arrested and taken into custody for that offense by a peace officer.

Veh. Code § 22651.7: Immobilization of Vehicle as Alternative to Removal; Multiple Parking Violations:

(a) In addition to, or as an alternative to, removal, a peace officer, as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, or a regularly employed and salaried employee who is engaged in directing traffic or enforcing parking laws and regulations, of a jurisdiction in which a vehicle is located may immobilize the vehicle with a device designed and manufactured for the immobilization of vehicles, on a highway or any public lands located within the territorial limits in which the officer or employee may act if the vehicle is found upon a highway or public lands and it is known to have been issued five or more notices of parking violations that are delinquent because the owner or person in control of the vehicle has not responded to the agency responsible for processing notices of parking violation within 21 calendar days of notice of citation issuance or citation issuance or 14 calendar days of the mailing of a notice of delinquent parking violation, or the registered owner of the vehicle is known to have been issued five or more notices for failure to pay or failure to appear in court for traffic violations for which no certificate has been issued by the magistrate or clerk of the court hearing the case showing that the case has been adjudicated or concerning which the registered owner's record has not been cleared pursuant to Chapter 6 (commencing with Section 41500) of Division 17. The vehicle may be immobilized until that person furnishes to the immobilizing law enforcement agency all of the following:

(1) Evidence of his or her identity.

(2) An address within this state at which he or she can be located.

(3) Satisfactory evidence that the full amount of parking penalties has been deposited for all notices of parking violation issued for the vehicle and any other vehicle registered to the registered owner of the immobilized vehicle and that bail has been deposited for all traffic violations of the registered owner that have not been cleared. The requirements in this paragraph shall be fully enforced by the immobilizing law enforcement agency on and after the time that the Department of Motor Vehicles is able to provide access to the necessary records. A notice of parking violation issued to the vehicle shall be accompanied by a warning that repeated violations may result in the impounding or immobilization of the vehicle. In lieu of furnishing satisfactory evidence that the full amount of parking penalties or bail, or both, have been deposited that person may demand to be taken without unnecessary delay before a magistrate, for traffic offenses, or a hearing examiner, for parking offenses, within the county in which the offenses charged are alleged to have been committed and who has jurisdiction of the offenses and is nearest or most accessible with reference to the place where the vehicle is immobilized. Evidence of current registration shall be produced after a vehicle has been immobilized or, at the discretion of the immobilizing law enforcement agency, a notice to appear for violation of subdivision (a) of Section 4000 shall be issued to that person.

(b) A person, other than a person authorized under subdivision (a), shall not immobilize a vehicle.

Case law: A private security firm, acting pursuant to a contract with a property owner, may not immobilize a vehicle that is impermissibly parked in a private parking lot by affixing a "boot" device to the vehicle. (87 Cal. Ops. Cal. Atty. Gen. 114.)

Veh. Code § 22651.8: Satisfactory Evidence of Payment of Parking Violations:

For purposes of paragraph (1) of subdivision (i) of Section 22651 and Section 22651.7, "satisfactory evidence" includes, but is not limited to, a copy of a receipt issued by the department pursuant to subdivision (a) of Section 4760 for the payment of notices of parking violations appearing on the department's records at the time of payment. The processing agency shall, within 72 hours of receiving that satisfactory evidence, update its records to reflect the payments made to the department. If the processing agency does not receive the amount of the parking penalties and administrative fees from the department within four months of the date of issuance of that satisfactory evidence, the processing agency may revise its records to reflect that no payments were received for the notices of parking violation.

Veh. Code § 22651.9*: *Vehicle Left on Street with "For Sale" Sign:

(a) Any peace officer, as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, or any regularly employed and salaried employee, who is engaged in directing traffic or enforcing parking laws and regulations, of a city, county, or city and county in which a vehicle is located, may remove a vehicle located within the territorial limits in which the officer or employee may act when the vehicle is found upon a street or any public lands, if all of the following requirements are satisfied:

(1) Because of a sign or placard on the vehicle, it appears that the primary purpose of parking the vehicle at that location is to advertise to the public the private sale of that vehicle.

(2) Within the past 30 days, the vehicle is known to have been previously issued a notice of parking violation, under local ordinance, which was accompanied by a notice containing all of the following:

(A) A warning that an additional parking violation may result in the impoundment of the vehicle.

(B) A warning that the vehicle may be impounded pursuant to this section, even if moved to another street, so long as the signs or placards offering the vehicle for sale remain on the vehicle.

(C) A listing of the streets or public lands subject to the resolution or ordinance adopted pursuant to paragraph (4), or if all streets are covered, a statement to that effect.

(3) The notice of parking violation was issued at least 24 hours prior to the removal of the vehicle.

(4) The local authority of the city, county, or city and county has, by resolution or ordinance, authorized the removal of vehicles pursuant to this section from the street or public lands on which the vehicle is located.

(b) Section 22852 applies to the removal of any vehicle pursuant to this section.

Note: V.C. § 22852 describes the post-impound hearing requirements.

Veh. Code § 22652*: *Removal of Vehicle From Stall or Space Designated for Disabled Persons:

(a) A peace officer, as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, or any regularly employed and salaried employee engaged in directing traffic or enforcing parking laws and regulations of a city, county, or jurisdiction of a state agency may remove any vehicle from a stall or space designated for physically disabled persons pursuant to Section 22511.7 or 22511.8, located within the jurisdictional limits in which the officer or employee is authorized to act, if the vehicle is parked in violation of Section 22507.8 and if the police or sheriff's department or the Department of the California Highway Patrol is notified.

(b) In a privately or publicly owned or operated off-street parking facility, this section applies only to those stalls and spaces if the posting requirements under subdivisions (a) and (d) of Section 22511.8 have been complied with and if the stalls or spaces are clearly signed or marked.

Veh. Code § 22652.5*: *Removal of Vehicle From Disabled Parking Space; Immunity From Liability of Off-street Parking Facility:

The owner or person in lawful possession of an off-street parking facility, or any local authority owning or operating an off-street parking facility, who causes a vehicle to be removed from the parking facility pursuant to Section 22511.8, or any state, city, or county employee, is not civilly liable for the removal if the police or sheriff's department in whose jurisdiction the off-street parking facility or the stall or space is located or the Department of the California Highway Patrol has been notified prior to the removal.

Veh. Code § 22652.6*: *Removal of Vehicle From Disabled Parking Space by Peace Officer:

> Any peace officer, as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, or any regularly employed and salaried employee engaged in directing traffic or enforcing parking laws and regulations of a city or county, may remove any vehicle parked or standing on the streets or highways or from a stall or space of a privately or publicly owned or operated off-street parking facility within the jurisdiction of the city or county when the vehicle is in violation of a local ordinance or resolution adopted pursuant to Section 22511.57.

Veh. Code § 22653*: *Removal From Private Property of Vehicle Reported Stolen Or Involved in Offense:

> (a) Any peace officer, as that term is defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, other than an employee directing traffic or enforcing parking laws and regulations, may remove a vehicle from private property located within the territorial limits in which the officer is empowered to act, when a report has previously been made that the vehicle has been stolen or a complaint has been filed and a warrant thereon issued charging that the vehicle has been embezzled.
> (b) Any peace officer, as that term is defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, may, after a reasonable period of time, remove a vehicle from private property located within the territorial limits in which the officer is empowered to act, if the vehicle has been involved in, and left at the scene of, a traffic accident and no owner is available to grant permission to remove the vehicle. This subdivision does not authorize the removal of a vehicle where the owner has been contacted and has refused to grant permission to remove the vehicle.
> (c) Any peace officer, as that term is defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, may, at the request of the property owner or person in lawful possession of any private property, remove a vehicle from private property located within the territorial limits in which the officer is empowered to act when an officer arrests any person driving or in control of a vehicle for an alleged offense and the officer is, by this code or other law, required or authorized to take, and does take the person arrested before a magistrate without unnecessary delay.

Case Law:

> When the California Highway Patrol (CHP) did not seek criminal prosecution after seizing a car while investigating a theft report, due process required the CHP to return the car because possession gave rise to presumed ownership, which the CHP proffered no evidence to rebut, and a third-party claimant lacked standing to participate in the proceeding. Mandamus relief was appropriate because the CHP had a clear, present, and ministerial duty to return the car to the person from whom it was seized. (Lawrence v. Superior Court (2018) 21 Cal.App. 5th 513.)

Veh. Code § 22654*: Authorized Moving of Vehicle:

> (a) Whenever any peace officer, as that term is defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, or other employee directing traffic or enforcing parking laws and regulations, finds a vehicle standing upon a highway, located within the territorial limits in which the officer or employee is empowered to act, in violation of Sections 22500 and 22504, the officer or employee may move the vehicle or require the driver or other person in charge of the vehicle to move it to the nearest available position off the roadway or to the nearest parking location, or may remove and store the vehicle if moving it off the roadway to a parking location is impracticable.
> (b) Whenever the officer or employee finds a vehicle standing upon a street, located within the territorial limits in which the officer or employee is empowered to act, in violation of a traffic ordinance enacted by local authorities to prevent flooding of adjacent property, he or she may move the vehicle or require the driver or person in charge of the vehicle to move it to the nearest available location in the vicinity where parking is permitted.
>
> (c) Any state, county, or city authority charged with the maintenance of any highway may move any vehicle which is disabled or abandoned or which constitutes an obstruction to traffic from the place where it is located on a highway to the nearest available position on the same highway as may be necessary to keep the highway open or safe for public travel. In addition, employees of the Department of Transportation may remove any disabled vehicle which constitutes an obstruction to traffic on a freeway from the place where it is located to the nearest available location where parking is permitted; and, if the vehicle is unoccupied, the department shall comply with the notice requirements of subdivision (d).

(d) Any state, county, or city authority charged with the maintenance or operation of any highway, highway facility, or public works facility, in cases necessitating the prompt performance of any work on or service to the highway, highway facility, or public works facility, may move to the nearest available location where parking is permitted, any unattended vehicle which obstructs or interferes with the performance of the work or service or may remove and store the vehicle if moving it off the roadway to a location where parking is permitted would be impracticable. If the vehicle is moved to another location where it is not readily visible from its former parked location or it is stored, the person causing the movement or storage of the vehicle shall immediately, by the most expeditious means, notify the owner of the vehicle of its location. If for any reason the vehicle owner cannot be so notified, the person causing the vehicle to be moved or stored shall immediately, by the most expeditious means, notify the police department of the city in which the vehicle was parked, or, if the vehicle had been parked in an unincorporated area of a county, notify the sheriff's department and nearest office of the California Highway Patrol in that county. No vehicle may be removed and stored pursuant to this subdivision unless signs indicating that no person shall stop, park, or leave standing any vehicle within the areas marked by the signs because the work or service would be done, were placed at least 24 hours prior to the movement or removal and storage.

(e) Whenever any peace officer finds a vehicle parked or standing upon a highway in a manner so as to obstruct necessary emergency services, or the routing of traffic at the scene of a disaster, the officer may move the vehicle or require the driver or other person in charge of the vehicle to move it to the nearest available parking location. If the vehicle is unoccupied, and moving the vehicle to a parking location is impractical, the officer may store the vehicle pursuant to Sections 22850 and 22852 and subdivision (a) or (b) of Section 22853. If the vehicle so moved or stored was otherwise lawfully parked, no moving or storage charges shall be assessed against or collected from the driver or owner.

> Note: Veh. Code § 11850 mandates the storage of an impounded vehicle. Veh. Code §§ 22852 and 22853 describes the post-impound hearing requirements and the procedures to be used when the owner of the vehicle cannot be ascertained, respectively.

Case Law:

> Highway Patrol Officers have the right to move illegally parked vehicles. (8 Ops. Cal. Atty. Gen. 85.)
> The State Park Commission has the legal authority to adopt rules for removal of vehicles left in parking areas after closing time. (28 Ops. Cal. Atty. Gen. 66.)
> A County Sheriff has the legal authority to hire a supervisor's towing service where such service is indispensable to performance of the sheriff's prescribed duties. However, a hiring arrangement entered into between the sheriff and the supervisor as contractor is unenforceable. (57 Ops. Cal. Atty. Gen. 458.)

Veh. Code § 22655: Removal of Vehicle Believed to Have Been Involved in Hit-And-Run Accident:

> (a) When any peace officer, as that term is defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code or any regularly employed and salaried employee who is engaged in directing traffic or enforcing parking statutes and regulations, has reasonable cause to believe that a motor vehicle on a highway or on private property open to the general public onto which the public is explicitly or implicitly invited, located within the territorial limits in which the officer is empowered to act, has been involved in a hit-and-run accident, and the operator of the vehicle has failed to stop and comply with Sections 20002 to 20006, inclusive, the officer may remove the vehicle from the highway or from public or private property for the purpose of inspection.
> (b) Unless sooner released, the vehicle shall be released upon the expiration of 48 hours after the removal from the highway or private property upon demand of the owner. When determining the 48-hour period, weekends, and holidays shall not be included.
> (c) Notwithstanding subdivision (b), when a motor vehicle to be inspected pursuant to subdivision (a) is a commercial vehicle, any cargo within the vehicle may be removed or transferred to another vehicle.

This section shall not be construed to authorize the removal of any vehicle from an enclosed structure on private property that is not open to the general public.

Veh. Code § 22655.3*: *Removal and Storage of Vehicle Used to Flee or Evade a Peace Officer; Storage Fees:

Any peace officer, as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, pursuing a fleeing or evading person in a motor vehicle may remove and store, or cause to be removed and stored, any vehicle used in violation of Section 2800.1 or 2800.2 from property other than that of the registered owner of the vehicle for the purposes of investigation, identification, or apprehension of the driver if the driver of the vehicle abandons the vehicle and leaves it unattended. All towing and storage fees for a vehicle removed under this section shall be paid by the owner, unless the vehicle was stolen or taken without permission.

No vehicle shall be impounded under this section if the driver is arrested before arrival of the towing equipment or if the registered owner is in the vehicle.

As used in this section, "remove and store a vehicle" means that the peace officer may cause the removal of a vehicle to, and storage of a vehicle in, a private lot where the vehicle may be secured by the owner of the facility or by the owner's representative.

This section is not intended to change current statute and case law governing searches and seizures.

Veh. Code § 22655.5*: *Removal of Vehicle Used in Crime; Liens:

A peace officer, as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, may remove a motor vehicle from the highway or from public or private property within the territorial limits in which the officer may act under the following circumstances:

(a) When any vehicle is found upon a highway or public or private property and a peace officer has probable cause to believe that the vehicle was used as the means of committing a public offense.

(b) When any vehicle is found upon a highway or public or private property and a peace officer has probable cause to believe that the vehicle is itself evidence which tends to show that a crime has been committed or that the vehicle contains evidence, which cannot readily be removed, which tends to show that a crime has been committed.

(c) Notwithstanding Section 3068 of the Civil Code or Section 22851 of this code, no lien shall attach to a vehicle removed under this section unless the vehicle was used by the alleged perpetrator of the crime with the express or implied permission of the owner of the vehicle.

(d) In any prosecution of the crime for which a vehicle was impounded pursuant to this section, the prosecutor may request, and the court may order, the perpetrator of the crime, if convicted, to pay the costs of towing and storage of the vehicle, and any administrative charges imposed pursuant to Section 22850.5.

(e) This section shall become operative on January 1, 1993.

Case Law:

The obvious purpose of Veh. Code § 22651(p) (officer may remove vehicle when driver receives citation for being unlicensed and no passenger has valid license), is to prevent an offender who is cited on a public street for driving without a valid license from again committing the offense when the officer has completed the citation process and departs. Similarly, Veh. Code § 22655.5 (officer may remove vehicle used to commit public offense or involved in crime), provides the officer the same means to ensure an unlicensed driver cited on private property will not recommit the same offense upon the officer's departure. Also, although a peace officer may not impound a vehicle that is on private property under Veh. Code § 22651 (circumstances in which removal is permitted), Veh. Code § 22655.5 (removal of vehicle officer believes to be involved in crime), does apply to vehicles on private property. Accordingly, police officers were authorized to impound a vehicle from private property after citing a driver for driving with a suspended license (Veh. Code § 14601.1), a public offense. To the extent both sections apply to vehicles on public streets and property, Veh. Code § 22651, is the more specific of the two. Thus, Veh. Code

§ 22651 will prevail in its application to the specific situations within its terms and is not rendered surplus by Veh. Code § 22655. (People v. Auer (1991) 1 Cal.App.4th 1664.)

When the California Highway Patrol (CHP) did not seek criminal prosecution after seizing a car while investigating a theft report, due process required the CHP to return the car because possession gave rise to presumed ownership, which the CHP proffered no evidence to rebut, and a third-party claimant lacked standing to participate in the proceeding. Mandamus relief was appropriate because the CHP had a clear, present, and ministerial duty to return the car to the person from whom it was seized. (Lawrence v. Superior Court (2018) 21 Cal.App.5th 513.)

Veh. Code § 22656: Removal of Vehicle From Railroad Right-Of-Way, Street Railway, or Light Rail Line:

Any peace officer, as that term is defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, may remove a vehicle from the right-of-way of a railroad, street railway, or light rail line located within the territorial limits in which the officer is empowered to act if the vehicle is parked or abandoned upon any track or within 7½ feet of the nearest rail. The officer may also remove a vehicle that is parked beyond 7½ feet of the nearest rail but within the right-of-way of a railroad, street railway, or light rail if signs are posted giving notice that vehicles may be removed.

Veh. Code § 22658: Removal of Vehicle From Private Property by Property Owner; Requirements; Notice; Recovery for Damages; Liability; Towing Charge; Excessive Charges; Liability; Payment by Cash or Credit Allowed; Written Authorization From Property Owner or Lessee as Prerequisite to Removal; Storage Facility Requirements; Legislative Intent:

(a) The owner or person in lawful possession of private property, including an association of a common interest development as defined in Sections 4080 and 4100 or Sections 6528 and 6534 of the Civil Code, may cause the removal of a vehicle parked on the property to a storage facility that meets the requirements of subdivision (n) under any of the following circumstances:

(1) There is displayed, in plain view at all entrances to the property, a sign not less than 17 inches by 22 inches in size, with lettering not less than one inch in height, prohibiting public parking and indicating that vehicles will be removed at the owner's expense, and containing the telephone number of the local traffic law enforcement agency and the name and telephone number of each towing company that is a party to a written general towing authorization agreement with the owner or person in lawful possession of the property. The sign may also indicate that a citation may also be issued for the violation.

(2) The vehicle has been issued a notice of parking violation, and 96 hours have elapsed since the issuance of that notice.

(3) The vehicle is on private property and lacks an engine, transmission, wheels, tires, doors, windshield, or any other major part or equipment necessary to operate safely on the highways, the owner or person in lawful possession of the private property has notified the local traffic law enforcement agency, and 24 hours have elapsed since that notification.

(4) The lot or parcel upon which the vehicle is parked is improved with a single-family dwelling.

(b) The tow truck operator removing the vehicle, if the operator knows or is able to ascertain from the property owner, person in lawful possession of the property, or the registration records of the Department of Motor Vehicles the name and address of the registered and legal owner of the vehicle, shall immediately give, or cause to be given, notice in writing to the registered and legal owner of the fact of the removal, the grounds for the removal, and indicate the place to which the vehicle has been removed. If the vehicle is stored in a storage facility, a copy of the notice shall be given to the proprietor of the storage facility. The notice provided for in this section shall include the amount of mileage on the vehicle at the time of removal and the time of the removal from the property. If the tow truck operator does not know and is not able to ascertain the name of the owner or for any other reason is unable to give the notice to the owner as provided in this section, the tow truck operator shall comply with the requirements of subdivision (c) of Section 22853 relating to notice in the same manner as applicable to an officer removing a vehicle from private property.

(c) This section does not limit or affect any right or remedy that the owner or person in lawful possession of private property may have by virtue of other provisions of law authorizing the removal of a vehicle parked upon private property.

(d) The owner of a vehicle removed from private property pursuant to subdivision (a) may recover for any damage to the vehicle resulting from any intentional or negligent act of a person causing the removal of, or removing, the vehicle.

(1) An owner or person in lawful possession of private property, or an association of a common interest development, causing the removal of a vehicle parked on that property is liable for double the storage or towing charges whenever there has been a failure to comply with paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of subdivision (a) or to state the grounds for the removal of the vehicle if requested by the legal or registered owner of the vehicle as required by subdivision (f).

(2) A property owner or owner's agent or lessee who causes the removal of a vehicle parked on that property pursuant to the exemption set forth in subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) of subdivision (l) and fails to comply with that subdivision is guilty of an infraction, punishable by a fine of one thousand dollars ($1,000).

(f) An owner or person in lawful possession of private property, or an association of a common interest development, causing the removal of a vehicle parked on that property shall notify by telephone or, if impractical, by the most expeditious means available, the local traffic law enforcement agency within one hour after authorizing the tow. An owner or person in lawful possession of private property, an association of a common interest development, causing the removal of a vehicle parked on that property, or the tow truck operator who removes the vehicle, shall state the grounds for the removal of the vehicle if requested by the legal or registered owner of that vehicle. A towing company that removes a vehicle from private property in compliance with subdivision (l) is not responsible in a situation relating to the validity of the removal. A towing company that removes the vehicle under this section shall be responsible for the following:

(1) Damage to the vehicle in the transit and subsequent storage of the vehicle.

(2) The removal of a vehicle other than the vehicle specified by the owner or other person in lawful possession of the private property.

(A) Possession of a vehicle under this section shall be deemed to arise when a vehicle is removed from private property and is in transit.

(B) Upon the request of the owner of the vehicle or that owner's agent, the towing company or its driver shall immediately and unconditionally release a vehicle that is not yet removed from the private property and in transit.

(C) A person failing to comply with subparagraph (B) is guilty of a misdemeanor.

(2) If a vehicle is released to a person in compliance with subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1), the vehicle owner or authorized agent shall immediately move that vehicle to a lawful location.

(h) A towing company may impose a charge of not more than one-half of the regular towing charge for the towing of a vehicle at the request of the owner, the owner's agent, or the person in lawful possession of the private property pursuant to this section if the owner of the vehicle or the vehicle owner's agent returns to the vehicle after the vehicle is coupled to the tow truck by means of a regular hitch, coupling device, drawbar, portable dolly, or is lifted off the ground by means of a conventional trailer, and before it is removed from the private property. The regular towing charge may only be imposed after the vehicle has been removed from the property and is in transit.

(A) A charge for towing or storage, or both, of a vehicle under this section is excessive if the charge exceeds the greater of the following:

(i) That which would have been charged for that towing or storage, or both, made at the request of a law enforcement agency under an agreement between a towing company and the law enforcement agency that exercises primary jurisdiction in the city in which is located the private property from which the vehicle was, or was attempted to be, removed, or if the private property is not located within a city, then the law enforcement agency that exercises primary jurisdiction in the county in which the private property is located.

(ii) That which would have been charged for that towing or storage, or both, under the rate approved for that towing operator by the Department of the California Highway Patrol for the jurisdiction in which the private property is located and from which the vehicle was, or was attempted to be, removed.

(B) A towing operator shall make available for inspection and copying his or her rate approved by the Department of the California Highway Patrol, if any, within 24 hours of a request without a warrant to law enforcement, the Attorney General, district attorney, or city attorney.

(2) If a vehicle is released within 24 hours from the time the vehicle is brought into the storage facility, regardless of the calendar date, the storage charge shall be for only one day. Not more than one day's storage charge may be required for a vehicle released the same day that it is stored.

(3) If a request to release a vehicle is made and the appropriate fees are tendered and documentation establishing that the person requesting release is entitled to possession of the vehicle, or is the owner's insurance representative, is presented within the initial 24 hours of storage, and the storage facility fails to comply with the request to release the vehicle or is not open for business during normal business hours, then only one day's storage charge may be required to be paid until after the first business day. A business day is any day in which the lienholder is open for business to the public for at least eight hours. If a request is made more than 24 hours after the vehicle is placed in storage, charges may be imposed on a full calendar day basis for each day, or part thereof, that the vehicle is in storage.

(1) A person who charges a vehicle owner a towing, service, or storage charge at an excessive rate, as described in subdivision (h) or (i), is civilly liable to the vehicle owner for four times the amount charged.

(2) A person who knowingly charges a vehicle owner a towing, service, or storage charge at an excessive rate, as described in subdivision (h) or (i), or who fails to make available his or her rate as required in subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) of subdivision (i), is guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500), or by imprisonment in a county jail for not more than three months, or by both that fine and imprisonment.

(1) A person operating or in charge of a storage facility where vehicles are stored pursuant to this section shall accept a valid bank credit card or cash for payment of towing and storage by a registered owner, the legal owner, or the owner's agent claiming the vehicle. A credit card shall be in the name of the person presenting the card. "Credit card" means "credit card" as defined in subdivision (a) of Section 1747.02 of the Civil Code, except, for the purposes of this section, credit card does not include a credit card issued by a retail seller.

(2) A person described in paragraph (1) shall conspicuously display, in that portion of the storage facility office where business is conducted with the public, a notice advising that all valid credit cards and cash are acceptable means of payment.

(3) A person operating or in charge of a storage facility who refuses to accept a valid credit card or who fails to post the required notice under paragraph (2) is guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500), or by imprisonment in a county jail for not more than three months, or by both that fine and imprisonment.

(4) A person described in paragraph (1) who violates paragraph (1) or (2) is civilly liable to the registered owner of the vehicle or the person who tendered the fees for four times the amount of the towing and storage charges.

(5) A person operating or in charge of the storage facility shall have sufficient moneys on the premises of the primary storage facility during normal business hours to accommodate, and make change in, a reasonable monetary transaction.

(6) Credit charges for towing and storage services shall comply with Section 1748.1 of the Civil Code. Law enforcement agencies may include the costs of providing for payment by credit when making agreements with towing companies as described in subdivision (i).

(A) A towing company shall not remove or commence the removal of a vehicle from private property without first obtaining the written authorization from the property owner or lessee, including an association of a common interest development, or an employee or agent thereof, who shall be present at the time of removal and verify the alleged violation, except that presence and verification is not required if the person authorizing the tow is the property owner, or the owner's agent who is not a tow operator, of a residential rental property of 15 or fewer units that does not have an onsite owner, owner's agent or employee, and the tenant has verified the violation, requested the tow from that tenant's assigned parking space, and provided a signed request or electronic mail, or has called and provides a signed request or electronic mail within 24 hours, to the property owner or owner's agent, which the owner or agent shall provide to the towing company within 48 hours of authorizing the tow. The signed request or electronic mail shall contain the name and address of the tenant, and the date and time the tenant requested the tow. A towing company shall obtain, within 48 hours of receiving the written authorization to tow, a copy of a tenant request required pursuant to this subparagraph. For the purpose of this subparagraph, a person providing the written authorization who is required to be present on the private property at the time of the tow does not have to be physically present at the specified location of where the vehicle to be removed is located on the private property.

(B) The written authorization under subparagraph (A) shall include all of the following:

(i) The make, model, vehicle identification number, and license plate number of the removed vehicle.

(ii) The name, signature, job title, residential or business address, and working telephone number of the person, described in subparagraph (A), authorizing the removal of the vehicle.

(iii) The grounds for the removal of the vehicle.

(iv) The time when the vehicle was first observed parked at the private property.

(v) The time that authorization to tow the vehicle was given.

(C)

(i) When the vehicle owner or his or her agent claims the vehicle, the towing company prior to payment of a towing or storage charge shall provide a photocopy of the written authorization to the vehicle owner or the agent.

(ii) If the vehicle was towed from a residential property, the towing company shall redact the information specified in clause (ii) of subparagraph (B) in the photocopy of the written authorization provided to the vehicle owner or the agent pursuant to clause (i).

(iii) The towing company shall also provide to the vehicle owner or the agent a separate notice that provides the telephone number of the appropriate local law enforcement or prosecuting agency by stating "If you believe that you have been wrongfully towed, please contact the local law enforcement or prosecuting agency at [insert appropriate telephone number]." The notice shall be in English and in the most populous language, other than English, that is spoken in the jurisdiction.

(D) A towing company shall not remove or commence the removal of a vehicle from private property described in subdivision (a) of Section 22953 unless the towing company has made a good faith inquiry to determine that the owner or the property owner's agent complied with Section 22953.

(i) General authorization to remove or commence removal of a vehicle at the towing company's discretion shall not be delegated to a towing company or its affiliates except in the case of a vehicle unlawfully parked within 15 feet of a fire hydrant or in a fire lane, or in a manner which interferes with an entrance to, or exit from, the private property.

(ii) In those cases in which general authorization is granted to a towing company or its affiliate to undertake the removal or commence the removal of a vehicle that is unlawfully parked within 15 feet of a fire hydrant or in a fire lane, or that interferes with an entrance to, or exit from, private property, the towing company and the property owner, or owner's agent, or person in lawful possession of the private property shall have a written agreement granting that general authorization.

(2) If a towing company removes a vehicle under a general authorization described in subparagraph (E) of paragraph (1) and that vehicle is unlawfully parked within 15 feet of a fire hydrant or in a fire lane, or in a manner that interferes with an entrance to, or exit from, the private property, the towing company shall take, prior to the removal of that vehicle, a photograph of the vehicle that clearly indicates that parking violation. Prior to accepting payment, the towing company shall keep one copy of the photograph taken pursuant to this paragraph, and shall present that photograph and provide, without charge, a photocopy to the owner or an agent of the owner, when that person claims the vehicle.

(3) A towing company shall maintain the original written authorization, or the general authorization described in subparagraph (E) of paragraph (1) and the photograph of the violation, required pursuant to this section, and any written requests from a tenant to the property owner or owner's agent required by subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1), for a period of three years and shall make them available for inspection and copying within 24 hours of a request without a warrant to law enforcement, the Attorney General, district attorney, or city attorney.

(4) A person who violates this subdivision is guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500), or by imprisonment in a county jail for not more than three months, or by both that fine and imprisonment.

(5) A person who violates this subdivision is civilly liable to the owner of the vehicle or his or her agent for four times the amount of the towing and storage charges.

(1) A towing company that removes a vehicle from private property under this section shall notify the local law enforcement agency of that tow after the vehicle is removed from the private property and is in transit.

(2) A towing company is guilty of a misdemeanor if the towing company fails to provide the notification required under paragraph (1) within 60 minutes after the vehicle is removed from the private property and is in transit or 15 minutes after arriving at the storage facility, whichever time is less.

(3) A towing company that does not provide the notification under paragraph (1) within 30 minutes after the vehicle is removed from the private property and is in transit is civilly liable to the registered owner of the vehicle, or the person who tenders the fees, for three times the amount of the towing and storage charges.

(4) If notification is impracticable, the times for notification, as required pursuant to paragraphs (2) and (3), shall be tolled for the time period that notification is impracticable. This paragraph is an affirmative defense.

(n) A vehicle removed from private property pursuant to this section shall be stored in a facility that meets all of the following requirements:

(A) Is located within a 10-mile radius of the property from where the vehicle was removed.

(A) Remains open during normal business hours and releases vehicles after normal business hours.

(B) A gate fee may be charged for releasing a vehicle after normal business hours, weekends, and state holidays. However, the maximum hourly charge for releasing a vehicle after normal business hours shall be one-half of the hourly tow rate charged for initially towing the vehicle, or less.

(C) Notwithstanding any other provision of law and for purposes of this paragraph, "normal business hours" are Monday to Friday, inclusive, from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., inclusive, except state holidays.

(3) Has a public pay telephone in the office area that is open and accessible to the public.

(1) It is the intent of the Legislature in the adoption of subdivision (k) to assist vehicle owners or their agents by, among other things, allowing payment by credit cards for towing and storage services, thereby expediting the recovery of towed vehicles and concurrently promoting the safety and welfare of the public.

(2) It is the intent of the Legislature in the adoption of subdivision (l) to further the safety of the general public by ensuring that a private property owner or lessee has provided his or her authorization for the removal of a vehicle from his or her property, thereby promoting the safety of those persons involved in ordering the removal of the vehicle as well as those persons removing, towing, and storing the vehicle.

(3) It is the intent of the Legislature in the adoption of subdivision (g) to promote the safety of the general public by requiring towing companies to unconditionally release a vehicle that is not lawfully in their possession, thereby avoiding the likelihood of dangerous and violent confrontation and physical injury to vehicle owners and towing operators, the stranding of vehicle owners and their passengers at a dangerous time and location, and impeding expedited vehicle recovery, without wasting law enforcement's limited resources.

(p) The remedies, sanctions, restrictions, and procedures provided in this section are not exclusive and are in addition to other remedies, sanctions, restrictions, or procedures that may be provided in other provisions of law, including, but not limited to, those that are provided in Sections 12110 and 34660.

(q) A vehicle removed and stored pursuant to this section shall be released by the law enforcement agency, impounding agency, or person in possession of the vehicle, or any person acting on behalf of them, to the legal owner or the legal owner's agent upon presentation of the assignment, as defined in subdivision (b) of Section 7500.1 of the Business and Professions Code; a release from the one responsible governmental agency, only if required by the agency; a government-issued photographic identification card; and any one of the following as determined by the legal owner or the legal owner's agent: a certificate of repossession for the vehicle, a security agreement for the vehicle, or title, whether paper or electronic, showing proof of legal ownership for the vehicle. Any documents presented may be originals, photocopies, or facsimile copies, or may be transmitted electronically. The storage facility shall not require any documents to be notarized. The storage facility may require the agent of the legal owner to produce a photocopy or facsimile copy of its repossession agency license or registration issued pursuant to Chapter 11 (commencing with Section 7500) of Division 3 of the Business and Professions Code, or to demonstrate, to the satisfaction of the storage facility, that the agent is exempt from licensure pursuant to Section 7500.2 or 7500.3 of the Business and Professions Code.

Case Law:

> Absent an allegation that a homeowners' association had not complied with the provisions of Veh. Code § 22658(a) in removing an inoperable van, inappropriate enforcement of an operating rule prohibiting inoperable vehicles could not be found. (Sui v. Price (2011) 196 Cal.App.4th 933.)
> Veh. Code §§ 22651.1 and 22658(k), requiring operators of towing and storage facilities to accept credit cards as payment from the owners of vehicles whose vehicles have been involuntarily towed, are not invalid under the legal tender clause of the federal Constitution (U.S. Const., Art I § 10). They do not establish credit card drafts as legal tender; they simply require that towing and storage facilities accept credit cards as a manner of paying legal tender. Nor do they violate equal protection principles, even if they treat such operators differently from other providers of emergency services. The statutes are rationally related to the goal of expediting the recovery of vehicles by their owners. There is a rational basis for distinguishing towing facilities from other exigent service providers in that the towing services are not sought, nor were they consented to, by the vehicle owner. The Legislature might have required the acceptance of credit cards by other businesses, but a statute is not unconstitutional simply because it might have reached other evils, so long as there is a rational basis for the Legislature's decision to go no farther than it did. And lastly, the operator of a towing and storage facility was not deprived of property without due process of law. The operator was not deprived of property; his property interest was a lien requiring possession of the vehicle, and possession was required to be surrendered upon presentation of a valid bank credit card. (Berry v. Hannigan (1992) 7 Cal.App.4th 587.)

When the Legislature amended Veh. Code § 22658 to articulate its express intent to further public safety purposes by enacting section 22658(l) and (k), but did not do so with respect to section 22658(i), it made an implicit legislative determination that the remaining provisions of section 22658, including the storage fee limitation in section 22658(i), were not enacted in response to public safety concerns. (CPF Agency Corp. v. Sevel's 24 Hour Towing Service (2005) 132 Cal.App.4th 1034.)

Signs posted in a liquor store parking lot which purported to limit parking to customers did not comply with the statutory requirement that a person must post a sign prohibiting public parking before authorizing an impoundment (Veh. Code § 22658(a)), where those parking in the lot could reasonably conclude that so long as they patronized the liquor store they could utilize the lot as a public parking area while doing errands. Thus, the trial court in an unfair business practices action (per Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200 et seq.) properly enjoined the store owner from authorizing impounds unless he posted time limit signs. (People v. James (1981) 122 Cal.App.3rd 25.)

Under Veh. Code § 22851, which provides for a keeper's lien when a vehicle "has been removed to a garage," the lien attaches when the vehicle has been placed within a storage facility. To construe section 22851 to provide for the attachment of a lien when a vehicle has been hoisted from the ground or removed from the private property where parked would be to distort the plain meaning of the statute. (People v. James (1981) 122 Cal.App.3rd 25.)

In the People's civil action alleging a towing company charged more for towing vehicles than the amount allowed by local ordinance, the trial court properly entered judgment in favor of defendant on the ground that the Legislature has preempted the field of excessive charges by towing companies. Although Veh. Code § 21100(g) permits a local entity to license and regulate towing services, that section does not expressly convey to local entities the right to determine what constitutes an excessive towing charge. Also, the ordinance did not clarify Veh. Code § 22658(i) (excessive towing fees from private property) by stating that the city's agreement on behalf of the police department was to be the determinant of what constituted an excessive fee. Instead, the ordinance established a different, conflicting standard from the one set by the Legislature. Further, the evidence showed that defendant had several contracts with local law enforcement agencies to tow cars for fees from $100 to $116. Thus, defendant's charges of $100 for the time covered by the complaint did not exceed the Legislature's standard. The Court further held that Veh. Code § 22658(i) (excessive towing fees from private property), and Veh. Code § 21100(g) (local entity's licensing and regulation of towing services), taken together, state that local authorities may license and regulate tow truck services or drivers whose principal place of business or employment is within their jurisdiction. However, that regulation cannot include setting a separate standard for the determination of "excessive" charges for private tows from that established by the Legislature. (People v. PKS, Inc. (26 Cal.App.4th 400.)

Veh. Code § 22658 and corresponding local regulations governing towing operations were not preempted by the Federal Aviation Administration Authorization Act (FAAA) (49 USC § 14501), since there was a public safety purpose in the protections provided by the state and local provisions, which thus fell within the FAAA Act's safety exception. Because the safety regulations fell within the traditional police powers of the states, and because Congress had expressly excepted safety regulations from the preemption clause, the ability of local municipalities to respond to local safety concerns would not be curtailed without a clear expression that such was the intent of Congress. Accordingly, where, as here, the state had delegated authority to local authorities (Veh. Code § 21100(g)), municipal safety regulations fell within the exception of the FAAA Act and were not preempted. The Court further held that California's unfair competition law prohibits not only unlawful business practices, but also unfair business practices. Accordingly, the conduct of a tow truck operator in violation of Veh. Code § 22658 also constituted an unlawful business practice in violation of Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200 et seq., where the injuries inflicted upon the unwitting victims were substantial and the defendant's conduct was entirely unethical and unscrupulous with no redeeming value. (People ex rel. Renne v. Servantes (2001) 86 Cal.App.4th 1081.)

The Ninth Circuit has also held that Veh. Code § 22658(l)(1) was not preempted by the Federal Aviation Administration Authorization Act of 1994, 49 USC §§ 14501 et seq., as subsequent legislative amendments clarified that the act was safety related and was intended to protect the public from towing mistakes and theft and as a result, the statute fell under 49 USC § 14501(c)(2)(A). (Tillison v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2005) 406 F.3rd 1126.)

Veh. Code § 22658(i)(2) is a regulation relating to the price of tow truck "transportation," as that term is broadly defined in the Federal Aviation Administration Authorization Act of 1994 (FAAAA), performed without the vehicle owner's prior written consent or authorization, while the statutory definition of the FAAAA explicitly broadens "transportation" to include storage related to the movement of property (49 USC § 13102(21)(B)) which has been held to encompass tow truck storage facilities. Accordingly, there is little doubt the storage fee regulation that is a part of the regulatory scheme set out in Veh. Code § 22658 relates to nonconsensual tows. (CPF Agency Corp. v. R&S Towing (2005) 132 Cal.App.4th 1014.)

Although the storage fee regulation of Veh. Code § 22658(i)(2) does not fall within the Federal Aviation Administration Authorization Act of 1994's (FAAAA) safety exception (49 USC § 14501(c)(2)(A)), it does fall within the nonconsensual towing exception of 49 USC § 14501(c)(2)(C), and thus is not preempted by the FAAAA. As a result, a trial court wrongly struck a vehicle owner's causes of action against a towing company that alleged overcharging of storage fees on grounds that Veh. Code § 22658 was preempted by the FAAAA. The Court further held that certain statutory provisions regulating towing companies set out in Veh. Code §§ 22658 and 22851.12 were not preempted by the Federal Aviation Administration Authorization Act of 1994, 49 USCS §§ 14501 et seq. (CPF Agency Corp. v. Sevel's 24 Hour Towing Service (2005) 132 Cal.App.4th 1034.)

Veh. Code § 22659*:  Removal of a Vehicle From State Property:

Any peace officer of the Department of the California Highway Patrol or any person duly authorized by the state agency in possession of property owned by the state, or rented or leased from others by the state and any peace officer of the Department of the California Highway Patrol providing policing services to property of a district agricultural association may, subsequent to giving notice to the city police or county sheriff, whichever is appropriate, cause the removal of a vehicle from the property to the nearest public garage, under any of the following circumstances:

(a) When the vehicle is illegally parked in locations where signs are posted giving notice of violation and removal.

(b) When an officer arrests any person driving or in control of a vehicle for an alleged offense and the officer is by this code or other law required to take the person arrested before a magistrate without unnecessary delay.

(c) When any vehicle is found upon the property and report has previously been made that the vehicle has been stolen or complaint has been filed and a warrant thereon issued charging that the vehicle has been embezzled.

(d) When the person or persons in charge of a vehicle upon the property are by reason of physical injuries or illness incapacitated to that extent as to be unable to provide for its custody or removal.

The person causing removal of the vehicle shall comply with the requirements of Sections 22852 and 22853 relating to notice.

Note: V.C. §§ 22852 and 22853 describe the post-impound hearing requirements and the procedures to be used when the owner of the vehicle cannot be ascertained, respectively.

Veh. Code § 22659.5*:  Nuisance; Abatement; Impoundment:

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a city or a county may adopt an ordinance declaring a motor vehicle to be a public nuisance subject to seizure and an impoundment period of up to 30 days when the motor vehicle is used in the commission or attempted commission of an act that violates Section 266h (pimping) or 266i (pandering) of, subdivision (h) of Section 374.3 (dumping commercial waste matter) of, or subdivision (b) of Section 647 (prostitution) of, the Penal Code, if the owner or operator of the vehicle has had a prior conviction for the same offense within the past three years. An ordinance adopted pursuant to this section may incorporate any combination or all of these offenses. The vehicle may only be impounded pursuant to a valid arrest of the driver for a violation of one of these provisions. An ordinance adopted pursuant to this section shall, at a minimum, contain all of the following provisions:

(a) Within two working days after impoundment, the impounding agency shall send a notice by certified mail, return receipt requested, to the legal owner of the vehicle, at the address obtained from the department, informing the owner that the vehicle has been impounded. The notice shall also include notice of the opportunity for a post-storage hearing to determine the validity of the storage or to determine mitigating circumstances establishing that the vehicle should be released. The impounding agency shall be prohibited from charging for more than five days' storage if it fails to notify the legal owner within two working days after the impoundment when the legal owner redeems the impounded vehicle. The impounding agency shall maintain a published telephone number that provides information 24 hours a day regarding the impoundment of vehicles and the rights of a legal owner and a registered owner to request a hearing. The notice shall include all of the following information:

(1) The name, address, and telephone number of the agency providing the notice.

(2) The location of the place of storage and description of the vehicle, that shall include, if available, the model or make, the manufacturer, the license plate number, and the mileage.

(3) The authority and purpose for the removal of the vehicle.

(4) A statement that, in order to receive a post-storage hearing, the owners, or their agents, shall request the hearing in person, writing, or by telephone within 10 days of the date appearing on the notice.

(b) The post-storage hearing shall be conducted within 48 hours of the request, excluding weekends and holidays. The public agency may authorize one of its own officers or employees to conduct the hearing if that hearing officer is not the same person who directed the seizure of the vehicle.

(c) Failure of the legal and the registered owners, or their agents, to request or to attend a scheduled hearing shall satisfy the post-storage hearing requirement.

(d) The agency employing the person who directed the storage shall be responsible for the costs incurred for towing and storage if it is determined in the post-storage hearing that reasonable grounds for the storage are not established.

(e) Any period during which a vehicle is subjected to storage under an ordinance adopted pursuant to this section shall be included as part of the period of impoundment.

(f) The impounding agency shall release the vehicle to the registered owner or his or her agent prior to the end of the impoundment period under any of the following circumstances:

(1) The driver of the impounded vehicle was arrested without probable cause.

(2) The vehicle is a stolen vehicle.

(3) The vehicle is subject to bailment and was driven by an unlicensed employee of a business establishment, including a parking service or repair garage.

(4) The driver of the vehicle is not the sole registered owner of the vehicle and the vehicle is being released to another registered owner of the vehicle who agrees not to allow the driver to use the vehicle until after the end of the impoundment period.

(5) The registered owner of the vehicle was neither the driver nor a passenger of the vehicle at the time of the alleged violation, or was unaware that the driver was using the vehicle to engage in activities subject to Section 266h or 266i of, or subdivision (b) of Section 647 of, the Penal Code.

(6) A spouse, registered domestic partner, or other affected third party objects to the impoundment of the vehicle on the grounds that it would create a hardship if the subject vehicle is the sole vehicle in a household. The hearing officer shall release the vehicle where the hardship to a spouse, registered domestic partner, or other affected third party created by the impoundment of the subject vehicle, or the length of the impoundment, outweigh the seriousness and the severity of the act in which the vehicle was used.

(g) Notwithstanding any provision of law, if a motor vehicle is released prior to the conclusion of the impoundment period because the driver was arrested without probable cause, neither the arrested person nor the registered owner of the motor vehicle shall be responsible for the towing and storage charges.

(h) Except as provided in subdivision (g), the registered owner or his or her agent shall be responsible for all towing and storage charges related to the impoundment.

(i) A vehicle removed and seized under an ordinance adopted pursuant to this section shall be released to the legal owner of the vehicle or the legal owner's agent prior to the end of the impoundment period if both of the following conditions are met:

(1) The legal owner is a motor vehicle dealer, bank, credit union, acceptance corporation, or other licensed financial institution legally operating in this state, or is another person who is not the registered owner and holds a security interest in the vehicle.

(2) The legal owner or the legal owner's agent pays all towing and storage fees related to the seizure and impoundment of the vehicle.

(1) No lien sale processing fees shall be charged to the legal owner who redeems the vehicle prior to the 15th day of the impoundment period. Neither the impounding authority nor any person having possession of the vehicle shall collect from the legal owner as described in paragraph (1) of subdivision (i), or the legal owner's agent, any administrative charges imposed pursuant to Section 22850.5, unless the legal owner voluntarily requested a post-storage hearing.

(2) A person operating or in charge of a storage facility where vehicles are stored pursuant to this section shall accept a valid bank credit card or cash for payment of towing, storage, and related fees by a legal or registered owner or the owner's agent claiming the vehicle. A credit card or debit card shall be in the name of the person presenting the card. For purposes of this section, "credit card" is as defined in subdivision (a) of Section 1747.02 of the Civil Code. Credit card does not include a credit card issued by a retail seller.

(3) A person operating or in charge of a storage facility described in paragraph (2) who violates paragraph (2) shall be civilly liable to the owner of the vehicle or the person who tendered the fees for four times the amount of the towing, storage, and related fees not to exceed five hundred dollars ($500).

(4) A person operating or in charge of the storage facility described in paragraph (2) shall have sufficient funds on the premises of the primary storage facility during normal business hours to accommodate, and make change for, a reasonable monetary transaction.

(5) Credit charges for towing and storage services shall comply with Section 1748.1 of the Civil Code. Law enforcement agencies may include the costs of providing for payment by credit when making agreements with towing companies on rates.

(6) A failure by a storage facility to comply with any applicable conditions set forth in this subdivision shall not affect the right of the legal owner or the legal owner's agent to retrieve the vehicle if all conditions required of the legal owner or legal owner's agent under this subdivision are satisfied.

(1) The legal owner or the legal owner's agent shall present to the law enforcement agency, impounding agency, person in possession of the vehicle, or any person acting on behalf of those agencies, a copy of the assignment, as defined in subdivision (b) of Section 7500.1 of the Business and Professions Code, a release from the one responsible governmental agency, only if required by the agency, a government-issued photographic identification card, and any one of the following as determined by the legal owner or the legal owner's agent: a certificate of repossession for the vehicle, a security agreement for the vehicle, or title, whether or not paperless or electronic, showing proof of legal ownership for the vehicle. Any documents presented may be originals, photocopies, or facsimile copies, or may be transmitted electronically. The law enforcement agency, impounding agency, or other governmental agency, or any person acting on behalf of those agencies, shall not require any documents to be notarized.

The law enforcement agency, impounding agency, or any person acting on behalf of those agencies may require the agent of the legal owner to produce a photocopy or facsimile copy of its repossession agency license or registration issued pursuant to Chapter 11 (commencing with Section 7500) of Division 3 of the Business and Professions Code, or to demonstrate, to the satisfaction of the law enforcement agency, impounding agency, or any person acting on behalf of those agencies that the agent is exempt from licensure pursuant to Section 7500.2 or 7500.3 of the Business and Professions Code.

(2) Administrative costs authorized under subdivision (a) of Section 22850.5 shall not be charged to the legal owner of the type specified in paragraph (1) of subdivision (i) who redeems the vehicle unless the legal owner voluntarily requests a post-storage hearing. A city, county, city and county, or state agency shall not require a legal owner or a legal owner's agent to request a post-storage hearing as a requirement for release of the vehicle to the legal owner or the legal owner's agent. The law enforcement agency, impounding agency, or other governmental agency, or any person acting on behalf of those agencies, shall not require any documents other than those specified in this paragraph. The legal owner or the legal owner's agent shall be given a copy of any documents he or she is required to sign, except for a vehicle evidentiary hold log book. The law enforcement agency, impounding agency, or any person acting on behalf of those agencies, or any person in possession of the vehicle, may photocopy and retain the copies of any documents presented by the legal owner or legal owner's agent. The legal owner shall indemnify and hold harmless a storage facility from any claims arising out of the release of the vehicle to the legal owner or the legal owner's agent and from any damage to the vehicle after its release, including the reasonable costs associated with defending any such claims.

(l) A legal owner, who meets the requirements for release of a vehicle pursuant to subdivision (i), or the legal owner's agent, shall not be required to request a post-storage hearing as a requirement for release of the vehicle to the legal owner or the legal owner's agent.

(m)

(1) A legal owner, who meets the requirements for release of a vehicle pursuant to subdivision (i), or the legal owner's agent, shall not release the vehicle to the registered owner of the vehicle or an agent of the registered owner, unless the registered owner is a rental car agency, until after the termination of the impoundment period.

(2) Prior to relinquishing the vehicle, the legal owner may require the registered owner to pay all towing and storage charges related to the seizure and impoundment.

(1) A vehicle removed and seized pursuant to an ordinance adopted pursuant to this section shall be released to a rental car agency prior to the end of the impoundment period if the agency is either the legal owner or registered owner of the vehicle and the agency pays all towing and storage fees related to the seizure and impoundment of the vehicle.

(2) The owner of a rental vehicle that was seized under an ordinance adopted pursuant to this section may continue to rent the vehicle upon recovery of the vehicle. However, the rental car agency shall not rent another vehicle to the driver of the vehicle that was seized until the impoundment period has expired.

(3) The rental car agency may require the person to whom the vehicle was rented to pay all towing and storage charges related to the seizure and impoundment.

Veh. Code § 22660*: *Abatement and Removal of Abandoned Vehicles as Public Nuisance; Local Ordinances:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a city, county, or city and county may adopt an ordinance establishing procedures for the abatement and removal, as public nuisances, of abandoned, wrecked, dismantled, or inoperative vehicles or parts thereof from private or public property, and for the recovery, pursuant to Section 25845 or 38773.5 of the Government Code, or assumption by the local authority, of costs of administration and the removal.
> Case Law:
> > A city ordinance that declared certain inoperable vehicles a nuisance per se did not exceed the city's legislative authority. Where the Legislature adopts a general scheme of regulation, control of that subject ceases as to local regulation. However, by enacting the Vehicle Code, the state Legislature did not preempt local regulation of inoperable vehicles. Veh. Code § 22660 clearly allows a local ordinance declaring inoperable vehicles to be a public nuisance. The ordinance was also not preempted by Pen. Code § 372, which prescribes the punishment for maintaining a nuisance "the punishment for which is not otherwise prescribed." (City of Costa Mesa v. Soffer (1992) 11 Cal.App.4th 378.)

Veh. Code § 22661*: *Contents of Ordinance Establishing Procedures for Removal of Abandoned Vehicles: Any ordinance establishing procedures for the removal of abandoned vehicles shall contain all of the following provisions:

> (a) The requirement that notice be given to the Department of Motor Vehicles within five days after the date of removal, identifying the vehicle or part thereof and any evidence of registration available, including, but not limited to, the registration card, certificates of ownership, or license plates.
> (b) Making the ordinance inapplicable to (1) a vehicle or part thereof that is completely enclosed within a building in a lawful manner where it is not visible from the street or other public or private property or (2) a vehicle or part thereof that is stored or parked in a lawful manner on private property in connection with the business of a licensed dismantler, licensed vehicle dealer, or a junkyard. This exception shall not, however, authorize the maintenance of a public or private nuisance as defined under provisions of law other than this chapter.

(c) The requirement that not less than a 10-day notice of intention to abate and remove the vehicle or part thereof as a public nuisance be issued, unless the property owner and the owner of the vehicle have signed releases authorizing removal and waiving further interest in the vehicle or part thereof. However, the notice of intention is not required for removal of a vehicle or part thereof that is inoperable due to the absence of a motor, transmission, or wheels and incapable of being towed, is valued at less than two hundred dollars ($200) by a person specified in Section 22855, and is determined by the local agency to be a public nuisance presenting an immediate threat to public health or safety, provided that the property owner has signed a release authorizing removal and waiving further interest in the vehicle or part thereof. Prior to final disposition under Section 22662 of such a low-valued vehicle or part for which evidence of registration was recovered pursuant to subdivision (a), the local agency shall provide notice to the registered and legal owners of intent to dispose of the vehicle or part, and if the vehicle or part is not claimed and removed within 12 days after the notice is mailed, from a location specified in Section 22662, final disposition may proceed. No local agency or contractor thereof shall be liable for damage caused to a vehicle or part thereof by removal pursuant to this section.

> This subdivision applies only to inoperable vehicles located upon a parcel that is (1) zoned for agricultural use or (2) not improved with a residential structure containing one or more dwelling units.

(d) The 10-day notice of intention to abate and remove a vehicle or part thereof, when required by this section, shall contain a statement of the hearing rights of the owner of the property on which the vehicle is located and of the owner of the vehicle. The statement shall include notice to the property owner that he or she may appear in person at a hearing or may submit a sworn written statement denying responsibility for the presence of the vehicle on the land, with his or her reasons for such denial, in lieu of appearing. The notice of intention to abate shall be mailed, by registered or certified mail, to the owner of the land as shown on the last equalized assessment roll and to the last registered and legal owners of record unless the vehicle is in such condition that identification numbers are not available to determine ownership.

(e) The requirement that a public hearing be held before the governing body of the city, county, or city and county, or any other board, commissioner, or official of the city, county, or city and county as designated by the governing body, upon request for such a hearing by the owner of the vehicle or the owner of the land on which the vehicle is located. This request shall be made to the appropriate public body, agency, or officer within 10 days after the mailing of notice of intention to abate and remove the vehicle or at the time of signing a release pursuant to subdivision (c). If the owner of the land on which the vehicle is located submits a sworn written statement denying responsibility for the presence of the vehicle on his or her land within that time period, this statement shall be construed as a request for hearing that does not require the presence of the owner submitting the request. If the request is not received within that period, the appropriate public body, agency, or officer shall have the authority to remove the vehicle.

(f) The requirement that after a vehicle has been removed, it shall not be reconstructed or made operable, unless it is a vehicle that qualifies for either horseless carriage license plates or historical vehicle license plates, pursuant to Section 5004, in which case the vehicle may be reconstructed or made operable.

(g) A provision authorizing the owner of the land on which the vehicle is located to appear in person at the hearing or present a sworn written statement denying responsibility for the presence of the vehicle on the land, with his or her reasons for the denial. If it is determined at the hearing that the vehicle was placed on the land without the consent of the landowner and that he or she has not subsequently acquiesced to its presence, then the local authority shall not assess costs of administration or removal of the vehicle against the property upon which the vehicle is located or otherwise attempt to collect those costs from the owner.

Case Law:

> Veh. Code § 22661, which sets forth several mandatory provisions to be incorporated into any local ordinance "establishing procedures for the removal of abandoned vehicles," applies to ordinances concerning inoperable vehicles. Although the statute only uses the word "abandoned," it clearly relates back to Veh. Code § 22660, which governs ordinances concerning the control of "abandoned, wrecked, dismantled, or inoperative vehicles or parts thereof." (City of Costa Mesa v. Soffer (1992) 11 Cal.App.4th 378.)

Veh. Code § 23594: Duration of a DUI Impoundment:

(a) Except as provided in subdivision (b), the interest of any registered owner of a motor vehicle that has been used in the commission of a violation of Section 23152 or 23153 for which the owner was convicted, is subject to impoundment as provided in this section. Upon conviction, the court may order the vehicle impounded at the registered owner's expense for not less than one nor more than 30 days.

If the offense occurred within five years of a prior offense which resulted in conviction of a violation of Section 23152 or 23153, the prior conviction shall also be charged in the accusatory pleading and if admitted or found to be true by the jury upon a jury trial or by the court upon a court trial, the court shall, except in an unusual case where the interests of justice would best be served by not ordering impoundment, order the vehicle impounded at the registered owner's expense for not less than one nor more than 30 days.

If the offense occurred within five years of two or more prior offenses which resulted in convictions of violations of Section 23152 or 23153, the prior convictions shall also be charged in the accusatory pleading and if admitted or found to be true by the jury upon a jury trial or by the court upon a court trial, the court shall, except in an unusual case where the interests of justice would best be served by not ordering impoundment, order the vehicle impounded at the registered owner's expense for not less than one nor more than 90 days.

For the purposes of this section, the court may consider in the interests of justice factors such as whether impoundment of the vehicle would result in a loss of employment of the offender or the offender's family, impair the ability of the offender or the offender's family to attend school or obtain medical care, result in the loss of the vehicle because of inability to pay impoundment fees, or unfairly infringe upon community property rights or any other facts the court finds relevant. When no impoundment is ordered in an unusual case pursuant to this section, the court shall specify on the record and shall enter in the minutes the circumstances indicating that the interests of justice would best be served by that disposition.

(b) No vehicle which may be lawfully driven on the highway with a class C or class M driver's license, as specified in Section 12804.9, is subject to impoundment under this section if there is a community property interest in the vehicle owned by a person other than the defendant and the vehicle is the sole vehicle available to the defendant's immediate family which may be operated on the highway with a class C or class M driver's license.

Veh. Code § 2814.2*: *Impoundment of a Vehicle at a Sobriety Checkpoint:

(a) A driver of a motor vehicle who fails to stop and submit to a sobriety checkpoint inspection conducted by a law enforcement agency when signs and displays are posted requiring that stop is guilty of an infraction.

(b) Impoundment of a vehicle at a sobriety checkpoint is prohibited if the driver's only offense is a violation of V.C. § 12500 (driving without a valid license).

(c) Requires a law enforcement officer, in the case of a driver who is in violation of V.C. § 12500, to make a reasonable attempt to identify the registered owner of the vehicle and release the vehicle to him or her if licensed, or to a licensed driver authorized by the registered owner. If a notice to appear is issued to the unlicensed driver, the name and driver's license number of the licensed driver to whom the car is released shall be listed on the officer's copy of the notice. When a vehicle cannot be released, it shall be removed pursuant to V.C. § 22651(p), whether or not a notice to appear is issued.

Note: See V.C. § 14602: A vehicle removed pursuant to V.C. § 2814.2 shall be released to the registered owner or his or her agent at any time the facility to which the vehicle has been removed is open, upon presentation of the registered owner's or his or her agent's valid driver's license and proof of current vehicle registration.

See "DUI (and other regulatory "special needs") Checkpoints," under "Detentions" (Chapter 4), above.

The "Standardized Procedures" Requirement:

Rule: Post impoundment inventory searches are only proper if done according to "standardized procedures" used by the involved law enforcement agency. (United States v. Torres (9th Cir. 2016) 828 F.3rd 1113, 1118; United States v. Anderson (9th Cir. 2022) 56 F.4th 748, 754-758.)

Case Law:

> "Once a vehicle has been legally impounded, the police may conduct an inventory search, as long as it conforms to the standard procedures of the local police department." (United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2012) 703 F.3rd 1135, 1141; United States v. Anderson, supra, at p. 757.)
>
> > "In the context of an inventory search, the individual's privacy interest is protected by routine administrative procedures that limit an officer's discretion in conducting the search." (United States v. Anderson, supra.)
> >
> > Note also that "mixed motives" do not invalidate an otherwise law inventory search. "(A)n 'otherwise reasonable inventory search' is not invalid merely because the police have a mixed motive for the search. (Citation) When an inventory search would have occurred in the absence of a motive to search for evidence of a crime, 'the mere presence of a criminal investigatory motive or dual motive—one valid, and one impermissible—does not render an [inventory] search invalid.'" (United States v. Anderson, supra, at p. 758; quoting United States v. Magdirila (9th Cir. 2020) 962 F.3rd 1152, 1157.)
> >
> > So long as the impounding officers show "substantial compliance" with the procedures with their department's procedures, which itself "supports the conclusion that the deputies performed the search in good faith, meaning it was not conducted solely for the purpose of obtaining evidence of a crime," then the impound and inventory search of a defendant's vehicle will be upheld. The test "applicable to an inventory search is not an administrative policy or a procedural manual, but rather the Fourth Amendment itself, which protects citizens from unreasonable searches and seizures. Under the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard, the question is not how the deputies' performance compares with the officers in other cases, . . . but the extent to which the deputies' noncompliance raises the inference that their sole motive was to obtain evidence of a crime." (United States v. Anderson, supra, at p. 760-762.)

Format:

Such "standardized procedures" need not be formal or even in written form, so long as the searching officer is not allowed to act in his own "unfettered discretion." (People v. Needham (2000) 79 Cal.App.4th 260, 265; oral vehicle inventory search policy of sheriff's department taught to deputies justified an inventory search of property on a motorcycle.)

It has been held that Veh. Code § 22651(p) and "established department practices" are enough to meet this requirement. (People v. Benites (1992) 9 Cal.App.4th 309; People v. Steeley (1989) 210 Cal.App.3rd 887.)

The standard inventory procedures which prevail throughout the country and approved by an overwhelming majority of courts, if followed by the searching officers, will provide the standards necessary to make an inventory search legal. (People v. Green (1996) 46 Cal.App.4th 367.)

The officers' failure to precisely comply with the inventory search policy did not render the search of a vehicle invalid under the Fourth Amendment because, by creating a list of recovered items and incorporating it into the CHP 180 form, the officers complied substantially with the policy's direction to inventory the property in an impounded vehicle. Given the early stage at which an officer decided to impound the vehicle in which defendant was sitting, it was a reasonable view of the evidence that the officer's intent at the time the vehicle was impounded was administrative rather than investigatory (United States v. Magdirila (9th Cir. 2020) 962 F.3rd 1152, 1157-1158.)

"For purposes of the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness test, the issue is whether the inventory search is pretextual, not whether it fails to achieve full compliance with the administrative procedures. '[R]easonable police regulations relating to inventory procedures administered in good faith satisfy the Fourth Amendment,' even if the police implementation of standardized inventorying procedure is 'somewhat slipshod.'" (United States v. Anderson (9th Cir. 2022) 56 F.4th 748, 758, quoting Colorado v. Bertine (1987) 479 U.S. 367, 369, 374 [107 S.Ct. 738; 93 L.Ed.2nd 739].)

> "The failure to complete an inventory form or 'other comparable administrative errors' does not invalidate the search if there is no evidence that the 'the officers were rummaging for evidence.'" (United States v. Anderson, supra, quoting United States v. Garay (9th Cir. 2019) 938 F.3rd 1111-1112.)

Containers in the Vehicle:

This includes closed containers in the vehicle (South Dakota v. Opperman (1976) 428 U.S. 364 [96 S.Ct. 3092; 49 L.Ed.2nd 1000]; People v. Salcero (1992) 6 Cal.App.4th 720; People v. Smith (2020) 46 Cal.App.5th 375, 394.), at least if the department's standardized procedures include closed containers. (Florida v. Wells (1990) 495 U.S. 1, 4 [109 L. Ed. 2d 1; 110 S. Ct. 1632]; citing Colorado v. Bertine (1987) 479 U.S. 367 [107 S.Ct. 738; 93 L.Ed.2nd 739].)

"'A police officer may be allowed sufficient latitude to determine whether a particular container should or should not be opened in light of the nature of the search and characteristics of the container itself.'" (People v. Smith, supra, quoting Florida v. Wells, supra.)

If containers are to be opened, the standardized procedures must cover that topic as well, so as to preclude the inventory search being used as a ruse for a general rummaging for any incriminatory evidence. (Florida v. Wells, supra, at p. 4 [109 L.Ed.2nd at p. 6]; People v. Williams (1999) 20 Cal.4th 119, 138.)

"'When vehicles are impounded, local police departments generally follow a routine practice of securing and inventorying the automobiles' contents. These procedures developed in response to three distinct needs (Italics added): the protection of the owner's property while it remains in police custody, [citation]; the protection of the police against claims or disputes over lost or stolen property, [citation]; and the protection of the police from potential danger.' (Citation.) 'Whether 'impoundment is warranted under this community caretaking doctrine depends on the location of the vehicle and the police officers' duty to prevent it from creating a hazard to other drivers or being a target for vandalism or theft.'" (People v. Smith, supra, at pp. 393-394; quoting People v. Williams (2006) 145 Cal.App.4th 756, 761.)

An inventory search may extend to a car trunk and closed containers located within the car, as well as a locked compartment under the seat of a motorcycle. (People v. Smith, supra, at p. 393; citing Colorado v. Bertine (1987) 479 U.S. 367, 375 [107 S.Ct. 738; 93 L.Ed.2nd 739].)

See People v. Nottoli (2011) 199 Cal.App.4th 531, 545-546, where the lack of any evidence as to the arresting officer's department's policies and procedures concerning the searching of containers, including cellphones, led to the finding that the cellphone in question could not be opened and searched as a part of the inventory search of a lawfully impounded vehicle.

Limitations:

The standardized criteria requirements, however, only relate to an inventory search. They were not intended to necessarily apply to an officer's decision to impound the vehicle in the first place. Although an impoundment decision made pursuant to standardized criteria is more likely to satisfy the Fourth Amendment than one not made pursuant to standardized criteria, it is not legally necessary that that be the case. The reasonableness of impounding a vehicle based upon the circumstances is the test under the Fourth Amendment. (People v. Shafrir (2010) 183 Cal.App.4th 1238.)

Additional Case Law:

Removal of the dashboard console was held to be beyond the scope of an inventory search of an impounded vehicle in that it was inconsistent with the Sheriff's Department's inventory search protocol. (People v. Zabala (2018) 19 Cal.App.5th 335, 340-343; upholding the search instead on a theory of probable cause, under the "automobile exception.")

Unless required by the officer's department inventory procedures, the officer is not required to allow a subject to remove personal items prior to conducting the inventory of an impounded vehicle. (United States v. Penn (9th Cir. 2000) 233 F.3rd 1111.)

Note: The evidence was suppressed in Penn in an unpublished decision on remand and after rehearing, based upon evidence that the officer opened and looked into a closed container in violation of his department's written inventory procedures. (United States v. Penn (Dist. Ct. OR. 2001) 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19649.)

In a prosecution for being a felon in unlawful possession of a firearm, an officer's decision to impound defendant's vehicle after arresting him for driving while under the influence of alcohol, and when the car was parked near a red zone in a parking structure of an apartment complex in which defendant did not live, was permissible under the Fourth Amendment because it was consistent with his police department's policy and served legitimate community caretaking purposes; i.e., to promote other vehicles' convenient ingress and egress to the parking area and to safeguard the car from vandalism or theft. The inventory search of defendant's vehicle, including the air filter compartment of the vehicle, was also proper under the Fourth Amendment because, in fulfilling his duty to search all containers pursuant to department policy, the officer acted within the parameters of that policy when he unlatched the air filter compartment where he found a firearm. (United States v. Torres (9th Cir. 2016) 828 F.3rd 1113, 1122.)

The officers' failure to precisely comply with the inventory search policy did not render the search of a vehicle invalid under the Fourth Amendment because, by creating a list of recovered items and incorporating it into the CHP 180 form, the officers complied substantially with the policy's direction to inventory the property in an impounded vehicle. Given the early stage at which an officer decided to impound the vehicle which defendant was sitting, it was a reasonable view of the evidence that the officer's intent at the time the vehicle was impounded was administrative rather than investigatory (United States v. Magdirila (9th Cir. 2020) 962 F.3rd 1152, 1157-1158.)

Pretext Impounds: Prohibition of an Investigatory Purpose:

The impounding of a vehicle done merely as a pretext for conducting an investigatory search is not lawful, and the resulting evidence will be suppressed. (People v. Aguilar (1991) 228 Cal.App.3rd 1049; People v. Lee (2019) 40 Cal.App.5th 853. 867-869; United States v. Woodard (10th Cir. OK, 2021) 5 F.4th 1148.)

"[A]n inventory search must not be a ruse for a general rummaging in order to discover incriminating evidence." (United States v. Torres (9th Cir. 2016) 828 F.3rd 1113, 1118, quoting Florida v. Wells (1990) 495 U.S. 1, 4 [110 S.Ct. 1632; 109 L.Ed.2nd 1]; People v. Lee, supra.)

See also People v. Valenzuela (1999) 74 Cal.App.4th 1202; noting that the rule allowing a "pretext" stop under Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89] is inapplicable to stops or detentions when the legal excuse is to conduct an "administrative search," such as inspecting the licensing of a taxicab or an inventory search of a vehicle.

The sole legal basis for doing inventory searches is to (1) protect the owner's property while it is in police custody, (2) insure against claims of lost, stolen or vandalized property, or (3) protect the police from danger. (South Dakota v. Opperman (1976) 428 U.S. 364 [96 S.Ct. 3092; 49 L.Ed.2nd 1000].)

Using an inventory search of a vehicle as a "ruse for a general rummaging in order to discover incriminating evidence" is not a legal justification, or at least can't be the only reason why a car is searched. (Florida v. Wells (1990) 495 U.S. 1 [110 S.Ct. 1632; 109 L.Ed.2nd 1]; People v. Williams (1999) 20 Cal.4th 119, 126.)

> Note: Officers must be familiar with their own department's policies for doing vehicle inventory searches and be prepared to testify to the correct factual justifications for conducting such a search.

Impounding a vehicle for the purpose of allowing the officer to do an inventory search of the vehicle in the hopes of finding narcotics-related evidence, when none of the "community caretaking function" elements apply, is illegal. While stopping the vehicle may be for an ulterior purpose, so long as there is also an objectively reasonable basis for doing so (e.g., seeing a traffic violation), the officer's subjective motivations are in issue when evaluating the legality of impounding the vehicle and conducting an inventory search. (People v. Torres (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 775, 785-793; impoundment and inventory search held to be illegal when the officer admitted that his purpose was to look for narcotics-related evidence. See also People v. Lee (2019) 40 Cal.App.5th 853. 867-869.)

The seizure and subsequent inventory search of defendant's car was held not to be justified by the community caretaking exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement. Under the community caretaking exception, police officers may impound vehicles that jeopardize public safety and the efficient movement of traffic. Neither officer provided testimony that defendant's car was parked illegally, posed a safety hazard, nor was vulnerable to vandalism or theft. Although defendant's car was not located close to his home when the officers impounded it, there was no evidence that it would have been vulnerable to vandalism or theft if it were left in its residential location or that it posed a safety hazard. The court concluded that seizure and inventory search of defendant's car was a pretext for an investigatory search for evidence of narcotics trafficking. (United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2012) 703 F.3rd 1135, 1140-1143.)

> Note, however, the dissent's argument that the Court should "necessarily" find that a vehicle left in any public place might be easily subject to vandalism or theft, citing Ramirez v. City of Buena Park (9th Cir. 2009) 560 F.3rd 1012, 1025. (United States v. Cervantes, supra, at p. 1144.)

There must be some evidence in the record that the vehicle was actually impounded. An arresting officer's testimony that he searched the vehicle as a pre-impound inventory search, without any evidence to support the theory that the officers in fact intended to impound the vehicle, or that it was it was actually impounded, is insufficient to sustain the trial court's conclusion that a warrantless search of the vehicle was a valid impound search. (People v. Wallace (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 82, 89-93.)

"The purpose of such a search is to 'produce an inventory' of the items in the car, in order 'to protect an owner's property while it is in the custody of the police, to insure against claims of lost, stolen, or vandalized property, and to guard the police from danger.' Florida v. Wells, 495 U.S. 1, 4, 110 S.Ct. 1632, 109 L.Ed.2nd 1 (1990) (internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, the purpose of the search must be non-investigative; it must be 'conducted on the basis of something other than suspicion of evidence of criminal activity.' (United States v.) Torres, (9th Cir. 2016) 828 F.3rd (1113) at 1118 (emphasis added) (internal quotation marks omitted). The search cannot be 'a ruse for a general rummaging in order to discover incriminating evidence.' Wells, 495 U.S. at 4." (United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2018) 889 F.3rd 1120, 1125.)

> See also Id., at p. 1128: ". . . the purpose of such a search must be unrelated to criminal investigation; it must function instead to secure and to protect an arrestee's property (and likewise to protect the police department against fraudulent claims of lost or stolen property)."

The impoundment of defendant's vehicle was found to be pretextual, and thus illegal, where: (1) It was on private property (a QuikTrip store parking lot) where public safety and convenience are less likely to be at risk; (2) the officers did not consult the QuikTrip employees to see if they wanted the vehicle impounded; (3) the officers had an alternative to impoundment, in that defendant had asked the officers if he could call someone, but the officers refused without providing an explanation (noting that neither party raised the issue of whether the police have a duty to allow an arrestee to contact someone else to pick up a vehicle before impounding it, but that this issue had nothing to do with whether alternatives existed to impoundment); (4) the government conceded that the vehicle was not implicated in a crime, so there was no need to preserve evidence by impounding the car; and (5) defendant did not consent to impoundment. (United States v. Woodard (10th Cir. OK 2021) 5 F.4th 1148.)

Defendant parking his vehicle in a third-person's driveway and where the resident asks law enforcement to remove it warrants the impoundment and inventory search of that vehicle, so long as the inventory search comports with the law enforcement agency's standard procedures. (United States v. Anderson (9th Cir. 2022) 56 F.4th 748, 754-758.)

Inventory Searches as an Exception to the Rule of Whren v. United States:

In Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89], the U.S. Supreme Court established the rule that the use of a "pretext" to make a traffic stop (i.e., using a traffic infraction when the officers' real motivation involved an issue not supported by the necessary reasonable suspicion) was lawful, so long as there was some lawful reason justifying the stop.

"An action is 'reasonable' under the Fourth Amendment, regardless of the individual officer's state of mind, as long as the circumstances, viewed objectively, justify the action.' Brigham City v. Stuart, 547 U.S. 398, 404, 126 S.Ct. 1943, 164 L.Ed.2nd 650 (2006) (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted); see also Bond v. United States, 529 U.S. 334, 338 n.2, 120 S.Ct. 1462, 146 L.Ed.2nd 365 (2000) ('[T]he subjective intent of the law enforcement officer is irrelevant in determining whether that officer's actions violate the Fourth Amendment'); . . ." (United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2018) 889 F.3rd 1120, 1125.)

See "Pretext Stops," under "Detentions" (Chapter 4), above.

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, however, has held that the rule under Whren does not apply to the conducting of an administrative impoundment and inventory search of a vehicle. (United States v. Orozco (9th Cir. 2017) 858 F.3rd 1204, 1210-1212; United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2018) 889 F.3rd 1120, 1125-1126.)

The Ninth Circuit in Johnson cites in the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. al-Kidd (2011) 563 U.S. 731, 736 [131 S.Ct. 2074; 179 L. Ed.2nd 1149], where it is noted that "(t)wo 'limited exception[s]' to this rule are our special-needs and administrative-search cases, where 'actual motivations' do matter (Citation omitted)," for its authority for this argument.

However, see the concurring opinion in United States v. Johnson, supra, at pp. 1129-1133, where the two concurring justices note that "such decision (i.e., Orozco) contradicts earlier Supreme Court precedent and that Orozco therefore ought to be reconsidered by our court," and that the Supreme Court has explicitly—and unanimously—rejected the approach we adopted in Orozco," citing Brigham City v. Stuart (2006) 547 U.S. 398 [126 S.Ct. 1943; 164 L.Ed.2nd 650], as authority for this argument.

> As pointed out by the concurring justices in United States v. Johnson, the U.S. Supreme Court in Brigham City v. Stuart differentiates between the purpose behind conducting what the Court refers to as a "progromatic search" on the one hand, and the individual officers' subjective motivations on the other, noting that while the former (i.e., the purpose of a specific administrative "program," such as inventory searches in general) has to be done for a lawful non-investigatory purpose, the latter (i.e., the individual officers' subjective motivations) is irrelevant to the legality of the search. In discussing this issue, the Supreme Court points out that; "this inquiry is directed at ensuring that the purpose behind the program (such as inventory searches) is not 'ultimately indistinguishable from the general interest in crime control.' . . . The Court underscored that such an inquiry 'has nothing to do with discerning what is in the mind of the individual officer conducting the search.'" (See Brigham City v. Stuart, supra, at p. 405.)
> Note: Aside from this, the Johnson decision ignores the difference between conducting a warrantless, suspicionless inventory search of a lawfully impounded vehicle, and the "plain sight" observations and seizure of evidence of a crime during such a lawful search, noting only in a footnote that the Government having failed to attempt to justify the seizure of incriminating evidence discovered during an otherwise lawful inventory search, the issue is waived. (pg. 1128, fn. 2.) Why this blatantly bad decision has not been taken up to the U.S. Supreme Court is unknown, the record showing only that petitions for rehearing and rehearing en banc had been denied. (Sept. 13, 2018; 2018 U.S. App. LEXIS 26006.)
> See, for instance, United States v. Williams (2nd Cir. N.Y. 2019) 930 F.3rd 44, where the Second Circuit Court of Appeal held that the police did not violate the Fourth Amendment by conducting a second inventory search of defendant's impounded vehicle after detectives overheard a phone call by defendant that aroused their suspicion that they may have missed something of value in the car during their initial inventory search. Both searches were conducted in accordance with police department standardized procedures and the second search was reasonable to ensure a complete inventory, even though the second search was conducted with the subjective expectation that what they were looking for was something illegal (which, it in fact turned out to be; i.e., a firearm.)

There is also California authority for the argument an officer's subjective motivations in conducting an inventory search of a vehicle are in fact relevant, limiting the community caretaking theory to the officer's intent to protect personal valuables in a car and not for the subjective purpose of conducting criminal investigations and looking incriminating evidence. (People v. Lee (2019) 40 Cal.App.5th 853, 867-869; citing People v. Torres (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 775, 791, and Florida v. Wells (1990) 495 U.S. 1, 4 [109 L.Ed.2nd 1; 110 S. Ct. 1632].)

"Unlike the probable cause determination, which rests solely on an objective standard, the inventory search exception evaluates both the objective reasonableness of the impound decision and the subjective intent of the impounding officer to determine whether the decision to impound was "motivated by an improper investigatory purpose." (People v. Lee (2019) 40 Cal.App.5th 853, 867, quoting People v. Torres, supra, at p. 791.)

See also People v. Valenzuela (1999) 74 Cal.App.4th 1202; noting that the rule allowing a "pretext" stop under Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89] is inapplicable to stops or detentions when the legal excuse is to conduct an "administrative search," such as inspecting the licensing of a taxicab or an inventory search of a vehicle.

The "Community Caretaking Doctrine:"

History: The "community caretaking" doctrine was first mentioned by the U.S. Supreme Court in Cady v. Dombrowski (1973) 413 U.S. 433 [93 S.Ct. 2523; 37 L.Ed.2nd 706]. "Local police officers, unlike federal officers, frequently investigate vehicle accidents in which there is no claim of criminal liability and engage in what, for want of a better term, may be described as community caretaking functions, totally divorced from the detection, investigation, or acquisition of evidence relating to the violation of a criminal statute." (At p. 441; upholding the warrantless search of an impounded vehicle for an unsecured firearm.)

See also Coalition on Homelessness v. City and County of San Francisco (2023) 93 Cal.App.5th 928, 939-940, for a description of the facts, circumstances, and law under Cady v. Dombrowski.

> "Cady reasoned that the police had properly exercised control over the disabled car 'for elemental reasons of safety' because it was a 'nuisance along the highway,' and that the search of the car was '"standard procedure" . . . to protect the public from the possibility that a revolver would fall into untrained or perhaps malicious hands.' (Id. at pp. 442-443.) The court emphasized, 'like an obviously abandoned vehicle, [the car] represented a nuisance,' and the search was justified by the 'immediate . . . concern for the safety of the general public who might be endangered if an intruder removed a revolver from the trunk of the vehicle.' (Id. at p. 447.)"

The United States Supreme Court has specifically held that attempts to expand the community caretaking theory to justify a warrantless entry and/or search of a residence were not constitutional. The Court clearly and unequivocally rejected the argument that, "Cady's acknowledgment of these 'caretaking' duties creates a standalone doctrine that justifies warrantless searches and seizures in the home." (Caniglia v. Strom (May 17, 2021) __ U.S. __ [141 S.Ct. 1596; 209 L.Ed.2nd 604].) (See "Welfare Checks; the 'Community Caretaking Function,' 'Exigencies,' and the 'Emergency Aid Doctrine,' under "Searches of Residences and Other Buildings" (Chapter 13), below.)

> Both the United States Supreme Court and California Supreme Court have held that "there is no recognized exception to the warrant requirement for community caretaking outside the vehicular context." (Italics in the original; Coalition on Homelessness v. City and County of San Francisco (2023) 93 Cal.App.5th 928, 940; citing Caniglia v. Strom, supra, 141 S.Ct. 1596, and People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034.)
> Based upon the decisions of People v. Ovieda and Caniglia v. Strom, supra, it can definitively be said that the Community Caretaking exception to the Fourth Amendment requirement applies only to vehicles.

(Coalition on Homelessness v. City and County of San Francisco, supra, at p. 941: "Based on those recent and authoritative pronouncements, it would be inaccurate to state there is a recognized 'community caretaking' exception to the warrant requirement. Instead, there is only a recognized vehicular community caretaking exception." (Italics in original.)

Rule: "The decision to impound the vehicle must be justified by a community caretaking function 'other than suspicion of evidence of criminal activity' [citation] because inventory searches are 'conducted in the absence of probable cause' [citation]." (People v. Lee (2019) 40 Cal.App.5th 853, 867-869; quoting People v. Torres (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 775, 787; see also Rodriguez v. City of San Jose (9th Cir. 2019) 930 F.3rd 1123, 1138.)

See also Miranda v. City of Cornelius (9th Cir. 2005) 429 F.3rd 858, 862-866; United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2012) 703 F.3rd 1135, 1140-1143; United States v. Caseres (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1064, 1074-1075; United States v. Anderson (2022) 56 F.4th 748, 756-762.

An officer impounding a vehicle and conducting an inventory search must have "solid, non-investigatory reasons for impounding a car" and the decision to impound a car may not be a "mere subterfuge" to conduct a criminal investigation. (United States v. Del-Rosario-Acosta (1st Cir. 2020) 968 F.3rd 123; seizure of drugs and a firearm from defendant's impounded vehicle was held to be in violation of the "community caretaking" doctrine, and illegal.)

Case Law:

Under the "Community Caretaking Doctrine," police may, without a warrant, impound and search a vehicle so long as they do so in conformance with the standardized procedures of the local police department and in furtherance of a community caretaking purpose. (People v. Quick (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 1006, 1010; citing People v. Williams (2006) 145 Cal.App.4th 756, 761-762.)

"'The authority of police to seize and remove from the streets vehicles impeding traffic or threatening public safety and convenience is beyond challenge.' (South Dakota v. Opperman (1976) 428 U.S. 364, 369 [49 L. Ed.2nd 1000; 96 S.Ct. 3092].) A vehicle impound search will be upheld if it is reasonable under all the circumstances. (People v. Shafrir (2010) 183 Cal.App.4th 1238, 1247 . . .)" (People v. Quick, supra. See also

> "'Factors relevant to whether a particular impoundment is justified include the location of the vehicle and the likelihood it will create a hazard to other drivers or be a target of vandalism or theft.'" (Coalition on Homelessness v. City and County of San Francisco, supra, at p. 942; quoting Halajian v. D & B Towing (2012) 209 Cal.App.4th 1, 15; and referencing People v. Williams (2006) 145 Cal.App.4th 756, 762-763.)

California courts have approved the use of the Community Caretaking theory to justify the impoundment of a vehicle when a vehicle is parked illegally, blocks traffic or passage, or stands at risk of theft or vandalism. Also relevant to the caretaking inquiry is whether someone other than the defendant could remove the car to a safe location. (People v. Lee (2019) 40 Cal.App.5th 853. 867-869; People v. Torres (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 775, 790; People v. Williams (2006) 145 Cal.App.4th 756, 762–763.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has ruled that impounding a vehicle can be justified under the "Community Caretaker Doctrine" whenever such vehicle may impede traffic, threaten public safety, or be subject to vandalism. (United States v. Jensen (9th Cir. 2005) 425 F.3rd 698, 706; United States v. Torres (9th Cir. 2016) 828 F.3rd 1113, 1118.)

> In Torres (at pp. 1118-1123), in a prosecution for being a felon in unlawful possession of a firearm, an officer's decision to impound defendant's vehicle after arresting him for driving while under the influence of alcohol, and when the car was parked near a red zone in a parking structure of an apartment complex in which defendant did not live, was permissible under the Fourth Amendment because it was consistent with his police department's policy and served legitimate community caretaking purposes; i.e., to promote other vehicles' convenient ingress and egress to the parking area and to safeguard the car from vandalism or theft. The inventory search of defendant's vehicle was also proper under the Fourth Amendment because, in fulfilling his duty to search all containers pursuant to department policy, the officer acted within the parameters of that policy when he unlatched the air filter compartment where he found a firearm.

> In United States v. Anderson (9th Cir. 2022) 56 F.4th 748, 756-762, the Ninth Circuit approved the impoundment of a vehicle where it was parked in a third person's driveway and the resident at that location asks that it be removed, ruling that: "[I]mpoundment serves some 'community caretaking' purpose if a vehicle is 'parked illegally, pose[s] a safety hazard, or [i]s vulnerable to vandalism or theft.'" (Quoting Miranda v. City of Cornelius (9th Cir. 2005) 429 F.3rd 858, 864.)

However, the Ninth Circuit has also held that a statute allowing for the pre-court-hearing impounding of a vehicle may be in violation of the Fourth Amendment absent a legitimate need to prevent it from again being driven illegally, from creating a hazard to others drivers, or being a target for vandalism. (Miranda v. City of Cornelius (9th Cir. 2005) 429 F.3rd 858; driver driving without a license.)

> The mere fact that its driver is cited or even physically arrested does not necessarily implicate the "community caretaking doctrine." (Ibid.)

> On the issue of whether the officer has a duty to make sure the unlicensed driver doesn't continue to illegally drive the car, the Court noted that "the need to deter a driver's unlawful conduct is by itself insufficient to justify a tow under the 'caretaker' rationale." However, the rule is otherwise (thus allowing for a tow) where it can be proved that "the driver is unable to remove the vehicle from a public location without continuing its illegal operation." (Id. at pp. 865-866.)

Where the defendant has been physically arrested and taken to jail, impounding the car merely to prevent him from continuing the offense is unlawful. (United States v. Caseres (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1064, 2074-1075; see also People v. Torres (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 775, 792, indicating that believing defendant may repeat his offense of driving without a valid license is never grounds for impounding his car.)

California is now in accord with the rule as set down in Miranda v. City of Cornelius. (People v. Williams (2006) 145 Cal.App.4th 756; impounding the car, per V.C. § 22651(h)(1), subsequent to the driver's arrest on an outstanding warrant.)

> See also Quezada v. City of Los Angeles (2014) 222 Cal.App.4th 993, 1008: "As part of their '"community caretaking functions," ' police officers may constitutionally impound vehicles that 'jeopardize . . . public safety and the efficient movement of vehicular traffic.' [Citation.] Whether 'impoundment is warranted under this community caretaking doctrine depends on the location of the vehicle and the police officers' duty to prevent it from creating a hazard to other drivers or being a target for vandalism or theft.' [Citation.]" (Quoting Williams, at p. 761.)

Towing and impounding a vehicle merely because it is illegally parked, without prior notice to the vehicle's owner and a pre-seizure hearing, absent an exigency requiring immediate action (such as in an emergency, where notice would defeat the entire point of the seizure, or where the interests at stake are small relative to the burden that giving notice would impose; e.g., the car is parked in the path of traffic, blocking a driveway, obstructing a fire lane, or appears to be abandoned, or where there is no current registration stickers and there's no guarantee the owner won't move or hide the vehicle instead of paying the fine for illegal parking), is a Fourteenth Amendment due process violation despite statutes allowing for the towing, and may generate some civil liability for the police. (Clement v. City of Glendale (9th Cir. 2008) 518 F.3rd 1090; an unregistered vehicle with a "planned non-operation (PNO) certificate" filed, parked in a publicly accessible parking lot in violation of V.C. § 22651(o).)

The vehicular community caretaking exception justified the towing of an unregistered truck from a parking lot because leaving the truck in the lot "would have created a risk that the truck would be driven again while unregistered, either by the unlicensed plaintiff or someone with a driver's license." "Factors relevant to whether a particular impoundment is justified include the location of the vehicle and the likelihood it will create a hazard to other drivers or be a target of vandalism or theft." (Halajian v. D & B Towing (2012) 209 Cal.App.4th 1, 15-16.)

The decision to impound a vehicle following an arrest when made pursuant to standardized departmental criteria is more likely to satisfy the Fourth Amendment than one not made pursuant to such criteria. However, it is not legally necessary that that be the case. The reasonableness of impounding a vehicle based upon the circumstances is the test under the Fourth Amendment. (People v. Shafrir (2010) 183 Cal.App.4th 1238; defendant's newer Mercedes lawfully impounded following his arrest for DUI

Impounding a vehicle for the purpose of allowing the officer to do an inventory search of the vehicle in the hopes of finding narcotics-related evidence, when none of the "community caretaking function" elements apply, is illegal. While stopping the vehicle may be for an ulterior purpose, so long as there is also an objectively reasonable basis for doing so (e.g., seeing a traffic violation), the officer's subjective motivations are in issue when evaluating the legality of impounding the vehicle and conducting an inventory search. (People v. Torres (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 775, 785-793; impoundment and inventory search held to be illegal when the officer admitted that his purpose was to look for narcotics-related evidence. See also People v. Lee (2019) 40 Cal.App.5th 853. 867-869.)

Doing an inventory search of a vehicle under the theory that it is to be impounded, absent any evidence that any of the "community caretaking" factors apply (i.e.; it is abandoned, impeding traffic, or threatening public safety or convenience), is unlawful, particularly in light of the fact that the defendant told the officer that he had a friend who could come out and retrieve his vehicle. (United States v. Maddox (9th Cir. 2010) 614 F.3rd 1046, 1049-1050.)

The seizure and subsequent inventory search of defendant's car was held not to be justified by the community caretaking exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement. Under the community caretaking exception, police officers may impound vehicles that jeopardize public safety and the efficient movement of traffic. Neither officer provided testimony that defendant's car was parked illegally, posed a safety hazard, or was vulnerable to vandalism or theft. Although defendant's car was not located close to his home when the officers impounded it, there was no evidence that it would have been vulnerable to vandalism or theft if it were left in its residential location or that it posed a safety hazard. Also, the court concluded that seizure and inventory search of defendant's car was a pretext for an investigatory search for evidence of narcotics trafficking. (United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2012) 703 F.3rd 1135, 1140-1143.)

The Fourth Amendment did not require suppression of evidence from an inventory search of defendant's vehicle because the trial court found that the vehicle was blocking a driveway and parked far enough out in the roadway to create a traffic hazard and that the inventory search was pursuant to established police policy. (People v. Quick (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 1006, 1010-1011.)

Impounding defendant's vehicle after his arrest for driving while under the influence, when the vehicle was illegally parked blocking a handicap spot and with no one else present who could take charge of the vehicle, was lawful under the community caretaking theory. The discovery and seizure of an unlawful firearm (defendant being a convicted felon) was lawful despite the inventory search being completed, when the officer observed the firearm between the front seats as he was putting the keys to the vehicle in the ignition in order to facilitate its towing. (United States v. Davis (1st Cir. NH 2018) 909 F.3rd 9.)

"(T)he fact that an inventory search is authorized (by statute) is not determinative of the search's constitutionality. Indeed, '[i]nventory search jurisprudence presumes some objectively reasonable basis supports the impounding.' (Citation.) Thus, 'statutory authorization does not, in and of itself, determine the constitutional reasonableness of the seizure.' (Citation)" (People v. Lee (2019) 40 Cal.App.5th 853. 867-869; quoting People v. Torres (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 775, at p. 791, and People v. Williams (2006) 145 Cal.App.4th 756, at p. 762-763.)

The community caretaking theory, however, was held not to apply to an officer's unconsented to opening up of the back lid to defendant's pickup truck shell, even though the officer was only attempting to retrieve defendant's girlfriend's personal items from the truck after a verbal dispute between defendant and the girlfriend. The Court held that the community-caretaking exception did not apply because the government did not establish that "state law or sound police procedure" warranted opening the camper shell nor had it demonstrated how opening the camper was "justified by concern for the safety of the general public." The court noted that the government failed to explain how allowing the girlfriend to open the camper herself to retrieve her belongings would have posed any danger to the officers. Specifically, the government identified "no specific and articulable facts" demonstrating that the deputy needed to stand behind the tail gate, lift the camper's latch, or look into the bed of the truck, nor was opening the camper "necessary to protect" the girlfriend, defendant, the officers, or others. (United States v. Neugin (10th Cir. 2020) 958 F.3rd 924.)

couldn't be driven from the scene, and the actual owner of the car was contacted but showed no interest in coming to the scene to claim the car. Recovery of methamphetamine from a false compartment at the bottom of the center console was upheld as a part of the inventory search in that it was in an area where people would normally store valuables. Also, a firearm was found under a false bottom of the glove compartment. The Court found that this was not an area where people would store items, so searching this area could not be upheld as a part of the inventory search. However, the recovery of the firearm was instead upheld as an exercise of the officers' community-caretaking function, which is separate from an inventory search. Under the community-caretaking function, officers may search a vehicle that is being impounded if they have a reasonable belief that it might contain a firearm. Here, the court concluded that the officer had a reasonable belief that defendant's vehicle contained a firearm. Supplying that "reasonable belief" here was the fact that the officer had found an empty, concealed-carry handgun holster on the front passenger seat. Second, during the initial slow-speed pursuit, Kendall drove eight blocks at ten miles per hour before pulling over, during which time he appeared to be "moving objects around on the passenger seat." These facts gave rise to reasonable belief that there was a firearm somewhere in the vehicle near the front seat. In addition, pursuant to the department's standard inventory policy, the officers were required to inventory any guns in an impounded vehicle and remove them for safekeeping. As a result, the court held that it was reasonable for the officer to search for a hidden firearm in the front-passenger-seat area. (United States v. Kendall (10th Cir. CO, 2021) 14 F.4th 1116.)

California's Third District Court of Appeal discussed two legal theories for searching vehicles in Blakes v. Superior Court (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 904, 910-915. First, the Court ruled, once again, that unless the elements of the "Community Caretaking Doctrine" are met, you cannot impound a person's vehicle and expect a pre-impound inventory search of that vehicle to be upheld. In Blakes, gang detectives observed defendant driving a vehicle with illegally tinted windows. Upon initiating a traffic stop, defendant lawfully parked his car in a parking space in a public parking lot. Defendant was found to be unlicensed (his driver's license having been suspended) so the officers decided to impound his car and do an inventory search of the car. However, "(t)here was no evidence petitioner's car blocked traffic or was at risk of theft or vandalism." Therefore, despite the officers' agency having a policy allowing officers, at their discretion, to impound vehicles driven by unlicensed drivers, this particular vehicle, under these particular circumstances, did not meet the "community caretaking" requirements in that the vehicle was "parked illegally, was not blocking traffic or passage, or at risk of theft or vandalism," as required by the community caretaking doctrine. To be lawful, the impoundment of a vehicle must be both authorized by statute and in compliance with the Community Caretaking Doctrine.

The defendant, Isaac Ramos, was arrested after an altercation at a convenience store. His truck was impounded from the store's parking lot, and a subsequent inventory search revealed a machine gun and ammunition. Defendant was subsequently charged with unlawful possession of a machine gun and being a felon illegally in possession of ammunition. His motion to suppress the evidence was denied by the trial court. However, the Tenth Circuit reversed the lower court's decision, and found that the impoundment was not supported by a reasonable, non-pretextual community caretaking rationale. The court considered the five "Sanders factors:" 1- Whether the vehicle was on public or private property; if on private property, 14 2- Whether the property owner had been consulted; 3- Whether an alternative to impoundment existed; 4- Whether the vehicle was implicated in a crime; and 5- Whether the vehicle's owner and/or driver had consented to the impoundment. (See United States v. Sanders (10th Cir. 2015) 796 F.3rd 1241, 1243.) The court found that all these factors weighed against the reasonableness of the impoundment, and thus, it violated the Fourth Amendment. To be reasonable, a search generally requires the obtaining of a judicial warrant. In the absence of a warrant, a search is reasonable only if it falls within a specific exception to the warrant requirement. One such exception, and the only exception at issue is this case, is a search conducted pursuant to a police officer's community-caretaking function. This exception allows law enforcement to impound an automobile and, in connection with the impoundment, inventory the vehicle's contents. Such an impoundment, however, must be based on "something other than suspicion of evidence of criminal activity," such as "protecting public safety and promoting the efficient movement of traffic;" That is, a community-caretaking impoundment cannot be based on a suspicion or hope evidence of criminal activity will be found in the vehicle. The government has the burden of proving a vehicle impoundment satisfies the Fourth Amendment. The community-caretaking exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement operates differently depending on the nature of the property from which the vehicle is impounded. When the vehicle is located on public property, specifically, including streets, roads, and ways, officers have far greater authority to impound. When, on the other hand, police impound a car located on private property, and that car is neither "obstructing traffic or creating an imminent threat to public safety," a community-caretaking rationale "is less likely to exist." Under these facts, the Court held that it was very feasible to have called the actual owner to come down and move the vehicle. (United States v. Ramos (10th Cir. 2023) 88 F.4th 862.)

Relevant Statutes:

Veh. Code § 22650(b): "Any removal of a vehicle is a seizure under the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States and Section 13 of Article I of the California Constitution, and shall be reasonable and subject to the limits set forth in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. A removal pursuant to an authority, including, but not limited to, as provided in (V.C.) Section 22651, that is based on community caretaking, is only reasonable if the removal is necessary to achieve the community caretaking need, such as ensuring the safe flow of traffic or protecting property from theft or vandalism."

Veh. Code § 22651(b) provides that a peace officer may remove a vehicle: "When a vehicle is parked or left standing upon a highway in a position so as to obstruct the normal movement of traffic or in a condition so as to create a hazard to other traffic upon the highway," and is grounds under the Community Caretaking Doctrine to impound a vehicle. (People v. Quick (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 1006, 1010-1011.)

Veh. Code § 22651(h)(1) authorizes the impounding of a vehicle "(w)hen an officer arrests any person driving or in control of a vehicle for an alleged offense" and takes that person into custody." However, impounding a vehicle under authority of this section is constitutional only if impoundment serves some "community caretaking function." Whether or not the community caretaking function justifies the impounding of a vehicle depends upon the location of the vehicle and the police officer's duty to prevent it from creating a hazard to other drivers or from being a target for vandalism or theft. When it was found that an arrested defendant's vehicle was lawfully parked only two houses down from his own home, impounding it was held to be illegal. (United States v. Caseres (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1064, 1074-1075; see also People v. Quick, supra.)

Veh. Code § 22651(i):

In Coalition on Homelessness v. City and County of San Francisco (2023) 93 Cal.App.5th 928, the Court rejected the government's argument that the towing of vehicles with five or more unpaid parking tickets (per county ordinance) is within the scope of the vehicular community caretaking exception, the government arguing that "[p]arking laws promote the safe and efficient flow of traffic through the City, and thus protect the health and safety of City residents." (Quoting In re Thomas (Bankr. N.D.Cal. 2006) 355 B.R. 166, at p. 174.) The Court ultimately held in Coalition on Homelessness that the community caretaking doctrine does not justify the warrantless impoundment of vehicles in violation of this ordinance.

> (S)ection 22651, subdivision (i)(1) specifically provides that "tows of legally parked cars must be justified by some present, location-based obstacle to public safety or convenience." (pg. 942. fn. 10; Italics in the original; fn. 10.)
> The government argued, unsuccessfully, that towing cars that accrue numerous unpaid tickets will deter violations of parking laws and that tows to achieve such deterrence are within the scope of the caretaking exception, noting instead that "the deterrence rationale is incompatible with the principles of the community caretaking doctrine." (pgs. 935, 939-948.)

Veh. Code § 22651(o)(1)(A): The community caretaking doctrine applies as well to cars parked when unregistered for over six months. (Leslie v. City of Sand City (N.D. Cal. 2009) 615 F. Supp.2nd 1121, 1125-1126.)

Veh. Code § 22651(p): Impounding a vehicle pursuant to V.C. § 22651(p), when neither the driver nor the passenger could (or would) produce a valid driver's license, was held to be lawful. (People v. Hoyos (2007) 41 Cal.4th 872, 892.)

> Note: The "Community Caretaking Doctrine" was not raised in this case.
> A police department has discretion to establish guidelines that would allow an impounded vehicle to be released in less than 30 days, under V.C. § 22651(p), in situations where a fixed 30-day statutory impoundment period, under V.C. § 14602.6(a)(1), may also potentially apply. (95 Ops.Cal.Atty.Gen 1 (2012).)

Impounding a vehicle where the driver was driving on a suspended license, with a Washington state statute allowing for the impoundment of the car where the driver has been cited once before for the same, was assumed to be lawful (without discussing the issue) when the car was on a freeway (Interstate 5), defendant was going to jail, and no one else was available to take possession of the car. (United States v. Ruckes (9th Cir. 2009) 586 F.3rd 713, 719.)

When Alternatives to Impounding a Vehicle are Available:

An inventory search incident to impoundment was reasonable even though defendant could have made other arrangements for the safekeeping of his property. "[T]he real question is not what 'could have been achieved,' but whether the Fourth Amendment requires such steps . . . . The reasonableness of any particular governmental activity does not necessarily or invariably turn on the existence of alternative 'less intrusive' means.'" (Colorado v. Bertine (1987) 479 U.S. 367, 373-374 [107 S.Ct. 738; 93 L.Ed.2nd 739]; quoting Illinois v. Lafayette (1983) 462 U.S. 640, 647 [103 S.Ct. 2605; 77 L.Ed.2nd 65]; see also United States v. Dunn (8th Cir. MN 2019) 928 F.3rd 588.)

"(T)he Fourth Amendment (does not compel) officers to exhaust alternatives before they may impound a vehicle. (Citation)" (United States v. Torres (9th Cir. 2016) 828 F.3rd 1113, 1119, fn. 2; where defendant complained that the officers did not offer her the option of having someone else come to take control of the vehicle.)

"[T]he police had no Fourth Amendment obligation to offer the driver an opportunity to avoid impoundment." (United States v. Penn (9th Cir. 2000) 233 F.3rd 1111, 1116.)

The fact that the owner of a car about to be impounded upon his arrest was given the choice of what impound company was to take his car does not support defendant's argument that he released the car to a friend, negating the officer's right to conduct an impound search. The inventory search of his car was therefore upheld. (United States v. Morris (8th Cir. 2021) 995 F.3d 665.)

Discovery:

> A city's (i.e., Los Angeles') right to access the Vehicle Information Impound Center (VIIC) and Laserfiche data regarding vehicles that towing companies had impounded at the direction of the police department was insufficient to establish constructive possession for purposes of the California Public Records Act (Gov't. Code §§ 6250 et seq.). The city did not direct what information the towing companies placed on the VIIC and Laserfiche databases, and had no authority to modify the data in any way. Nothing in City of San Jose v. Superior Court (2017) 2 Cal.5th 608, which was decided by the California Supreme Court in 2017, supported the view that an agency's contractual right to access a private entity's records qualifies as a form of "possession" of those records within the meaning of Gov't. Code § 6253(c). (Anderson-Barker v. Superior Court (2019) 31 Cal.App.5th 528, 537-541.)
>
> Per City of San Jose v. Superior Court, supra, at p. 623: "'[A]n agency has constructive possession of records if it has the right to control the records, either directly or through another person.' [Citation.]"

The "Protective Search" (or "Patdown") of a Vehicle for Weapons*:

General Rule: Whenever, during a lawful contact with an individual, an officer develops a "reasonable belief," based on specific articulable facts, that the suspect's vehicle may contain a weapon, anywhere within the passenger area of that vehicle that a weapon may reasonably be expected to be found may be checked for that purpose. (Michigan v. Long (1983) 463 U.S. 1032, 1049 [103 S.Ct. 3469; 77 L.Ed.2nd 1201]; authorizing a protective search of a vehicle's passenger compartment "when police have a reasonable belief that the suspect poses a danger.").

> Anything else seen in plain sight during such a check for weapons is admissible in court. (See "Plain Sight Observations," under "Warrantless Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 9), above.)

Subjective vs. Objective Belief that a Vehicle Contains a Firearm:

> Rhode Island officers responding to a "shots fired" call chased, and eventually stopped, a motor vehicle speeding from the area and driven by defendant. A search of the vehicle looking for a gun resulted in the recovery of ammunition only. In Michigan v. Long (1983) 463 U.S. 1032 [103 S.Ct. 3469; 77 L.Ed.2nd 1201], the U.S. Supreme Court held that when law enforcement officers conduct investigative detentions, or Terry stops (Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889].), involving automobiles, they may conduct a warrantless "car frisk" of the areas within the suspect's "grab space," so long as they have a reasonable suspicion that a suspect could immediately access a weapon. Based upon this rule, defendant was charged in federal court with being a felon in the illegal possession of ammunition. The trial court, however, granted defendant's motion to suppress, noting that the law of the Circuit dictated that the officers must have both an "objective belief" that a vehicle contains a firearm, as well as an "actual fear," or "subjective belief," in order to conduct a "frisk" of that vehicle (See United States v. Lott (1st Cir. 1989) 870 F.2nd 778.); sometimes also referred to as a "patdown," or "protective search" of a vehicle. Finding an objective belief only, the trial court suppressed the ammunition. On appeal, the First Circuit Court of Appeal reversed, ruling that despite its prior decision in Lott, subsequent U.S. Supreme Court decisions (E.g., Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89].) indicate that an officer's subjective belief is irrelevant in such a case, and that other circuits (the 5th, 8th, and D.C.) have so held. The Court here, as a result, specifically rejected the relevance of an officer's subjective fear when reviewing the reasonableness of a car frisk under Long. The Court therefore reversed the district court's ruling that had granted defendant's motion to suppress the evidence seized from the vehicle. (United States v. Guerrero (1st Cir. RI 2021) 19 F.4th 547.)

> Note that Arizona v. Gant (2009) 556 U.S. 332 [173 L.Ed.2nd 485; 129 S.Ct. 1710] (warrantless search of a vehicle incident to the subject's arrest) does not apply to a car-frisk situation. Gant applies only when the subject has been arrested, handcuffed, and secured in a patrol car. In such a case, Gant's "incident to arrest" rules kick in. When arresting a person in his vehicle, you can do a warrantless search of the car only when the arrestee remains unsecured and within reaching distance of the passenger compartment at the time of the search. Or, under the alternate theory of Gant, the car can be searched when it is "reasonable to believe evidence relevant to the crime of arrest might be found in the car." (Arizona v. Gant, supra, at pp. 343-344.) If the subject in United States v. Guerrero had been arrested for shooting from his vehicle, then Gant's alternate theory would allow for a warrantless search of that vehicle despite the suspect being arrested and secured in a patrol car. Another argument is that when the subject is stopped for shooting from the vehicle, assuming there is at least a "fair probability" (i.e., probable cause) to believe you have the right car, then you can do a warrantless "probable cause search" of the car for the gun. (E.g.; see Carroll v. United States (1925) 267 U.S. 132, 150-153 [45 S.Ct. 280; 69 L.Ed. 543]; United States v. Ross (1982) 456 US. 798 [102 S.Ct. 2157; 72 L.Ed.2nd 572]; Pennsylvania v. Labron (1996) 518 U.S. 938 [116 S.Ct. 2485; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89]; Maryland v. Dyson (1999) 527 U.S. 465 [119 S.Ct. 2013; 144 L.Ed.2nd 442]; People v. Superior Court [Nasmeh] (2007) 151 Cal.App.4th 85, 100-102; United States v. Davis (9th Cir. 2008) 530 F.3rd 1069, 1084; United States v. Noster (9th Cir. 2009) 590 F.3rd 624, 633-634; People v. Xinos (2011) 192 Cal.App.4th 637, 653-659.) Either way, the warrantless frisk of a vehicle when there is a reasonable suspicion to believe there's a gun in it is lawful.

Case Law:

Observation of a knife in the vehicle in plain sight during a traffic stop, whether the knife is legal or not, justifies a search of the vehicle for additional weapons. (People v. Lafitte (1989) 211 Cal.App.3rd 1429.)

Contact of two people in a car behind a 24-hour market, in a dark area, with knowledge that one of the suspects was recently arrested for a weapons offense, justifies a search of the vehicle for weapons. (People v. Brueckner (1990) 223 Cal.App.3rd 1500.)

Observation of a passenger reaching under the seat (i.e., a "furtive movement") and the sound of metal hitting metal justifies checking under that seat for weapons. (People v. King (1990) 216 Cal.App.3rd 1237.)

An officer may constitutionally search the compartments of a vehicle upon a "reasonable belief" that "the suspect poses a roadside danger" arising from "the possible presence of weapons in the area surrounding a suspect." (People v. Bush (2001) 88 Cal.App.4th 1048; based upon six-year-old information that the person stopped was a kick-boxer and had a history of violence.)

Checking the passenger area of vehicle for firearms based upon a "reasonable suspicion," which came as a result of an identified citizen's report to law enforcement, enhanced by the driver's lack of cooperation, that the occupants may have guns, held to be lawful. (Haynie v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2003) 339 F.3rd 1071.)

Based upon anonymous information that defendant was sitting in his vehicle with a handgun, such information being sufficiently corroborated to amount to a reasonable suspicion, the detention of the defendant and other passengers and a search of the vehicle for the gun was legally justified. (People v. Dolly (2007) 40 Cal.4th 458.)

But, searching a vehicle for weapons, despite the driver's attempt to evade the officer by making a couple of quick turns and hiding in the dark, is illegal absent specific and articulable reasons to believe that the driver is dangerous or that he might gain immediate control of a weapon. (Liberal v. Estrada (9th Cir. 2011) 632 F.3rd 1064, 1083-1084.)

It is irrelevant that the subject has already been removed from the vehicle. The courts feel that the subject may break away from police control, or may be permitted to reenter the vehicle and retrieve a weapon before the "Terry" investigation is over. (Michigan v. Long (1983) 463 U.S. 1032, at pp. 1051-1052 [103 S.Ct. 3469; 77 L.Ed.2nd 1201].)

> Referring to Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889].)

See also McHam v. State of South Carolina (2013) 746 S.E. 2nd 41, where the South Carolina Supreme Court upheld the opening of the defendant's car door by a state trooper during a lawful traffic stop as the vehicle's passengers were rummaging around in the vehicle, ostensibly looking for the vehicle's registration and proof of insurance. When the door was opened, contraband was observed in plain sight. While opening the door was ruled to be a search, it was justified due to the officer's reasonable safety concerns.

Case Law:

Veh. Code § 2805 has been held to meet the standards for a "closely regulated business," and thus have a relaxed search and seizure standard, and are constitutional. (People v. Calvert (1993) 18 Cal.App.4th 1820, 1831-1834; People v. Woolsey (1979) 90 Cal.App.3rd 994, 1001-1002; Solander v. Municipal Court (1975) 45 Cal.App.3rd 664, 667.)

An auto repair garage may be subjected to a warrantless search by auto theft detectives under authority of Veh. Code § 2805, whether or not the business is open to the public. (People v. Potter (2005) 128 Cal.App.4th 611.)

> Such a statute is constitutional under the Fourth Amendment if it serves a substantial governmental interest, the warrantless search is done to further the statutory scheme, and the inspection program serves the two basic functions of a search warrant; i.e., giving the owner notice that the search is being made pursuant to law and limiting the scope of the search. Section 2805 meets these requirements. (Ibid.)

Commercial vehicles may be constitutionally subjected to warrantless administrative inspections under the Fourth Amendment, commercial trucking being a "pervasively regulated industry" under the criteria as set out in New York v. Burger (1987) 482 U.S. 691, 699 [107 S.Ct. 2636; 96 L.Ed.2nd 601, 612]. (United States v. Delgado (9th Cir. 2008) 545 F.3rd 1195; upholding a Missouri statute allowing for such inspections.)

A Legislature may enact statutes authorizing warrantless administrative searches of commercial property without violating the Fourth Amendment. (Donovan v. Dewey (1981) 452 U.S. 594, 598-599 [101 S.Ct. 2534; 69 L.Ed.2nd 262, 268-269]; People v. Paulson (1990) 216 Cal.App.3rd 1480, 1483-1484.)

However, there are limitations:

> Veh. Code § 2805 does not authorize the warrantless search of property not being used for commercial purposes or otherwise open to the public. (People v. Roman (1991) 227 Cal.App.3rd 674; People v. Calvert, supra, at pp. 1828-1829.)
>
> Such a warrantless "search" is justified as an administrative search of a "closely regulated business," and must be done in a reasonable manner. (People v. Potter (2005) 128 Cal.App.4th 611; see also People v. Lopez (1981) 116 Cal.App.3rd 600.) (See "Closely Regulated Businesses or Activities," under "Warrantless Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 9), above.)
> "The regulatory scheme authorizing warrantless inspections must meet three requirements: (1) the scheme must serve a substantial government interest; (2) the warrantless inspections must be necessary to further the regulatory scheme; and (3) the inspection program "must perform the two basic functions of a warrant: it must advise the owner of the commercial premises that the search is being made pursuant to the law and has a properly defined scope, and it must limit the discretion of the inspecting officers." (People v. Potter, supra, at p. 619; citing (New York v. Burger (1987) 482 U.S. 691, 702-703 [107 S.Ct. 2636; 96 L.Ed.2nd 601].)

However, see People v. Turner (1994) 8 Cal.4th 137, 182, where Veh. Code § 2805 was cited by the California Supreme Court as authority for an officer to check an already lawfully stopped vehicle, in an other-than-commercial context, for its registration.

The Fourth Amendment prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures applies to commercial premises as well as private homes. (New York v. Burger (1987) 482 U.S. 691, 699 [107 S.Ct. 2636; 96 L.Ed.2nd 601, 612]; People v. Doty (1985) 165 Cal.App.3rd 1060, 1066.)

Absent a statute authorizing a warrantless, suspicionless administrative inspection of a commercial truck for a permit to drive on a parkway, and without any articulable reasonable suspicion to believe that defendant did not have such a permit, stopping the vehicle to check for a permit is unlawful. (United States v. Feliciana (4th Cir. 2020) 974 F.3rd 519.)

Non-Commercial Property: Section 2805 does not authorize the warrantless search of property not being used for commercial purposes or is otherwise open to the public. (People v. Roman (1991) 227 Cal.App.3rd 674; People v. Calvert (1993)18 Cal.App.4th 1820, 1828-1829.)

Use of Force: Should the owner/occupant of the business refuse, he or she is subject to arrest. However, forcible entry of the business is not lawful. An administrative search warrant must first be obtained. (See People v. Woolsey (1979) 90 Cal.App.3rd 994, 1004; and Colonade Catering Corp. v. United States (1970) 397 U.S. 72, 74, 77 [90 S.Ct. 774; 25 L.Ed.2nd 60, 63-65].)

Statutory Automobile Searches:

Veh. Code § 9951(c)(2)*: Downloading the Contents of an "Event Data Recorder" (i.e., "EDR"):

Court Order Requirement: A court order is required for law enforcement to retrieve data from a "Event Data Recorder" ("EDR"), which is a part of a "Sensing and Diagnostic Module" ("SDM"), also known as a "Black Box."

But see People v. Christmann (Just. Ct. 2004) 3 Misc. 3rd 309, 314 [776 N.Y.S.2nd 437]; holding that downloading data from the SDM does not require a search warrant.

Note: This may not be good law for California.

See People v. Diaz (2013) 213 Cal.App.4th 743, at p. 746, fn. 2, for a complete physical description of an "EDR" and "SDM."

See P.C. § 1524(a)(19), authorizing the issuance of a search warrant for the "recording device" in a vehicle.

Note also that commercial trucks also contain what is known as an "Engine Control Module," or "ECM." (See State v. West (Mo.Ct.App. 2018) 548 S.W.3d 406.) "The ECM is like the brain of the truck. It controls all the functions of braking, throttle, transmission. Without an ECM on a diesel—modern diesel engine, they can't run. They need that ECM to operate. [¶] … [¶] As part of their function, they store data." (at p. 411.) (Referenced at People v. Tran (2019) 42 Cal.App.5th 1, 10, and fn. 3.)

Subd. (b): "Recording Device," Defined: As used in this section, "recording device" means a device that is installed by the manufacturer of the vehicle and does one or more of the following, for the purpose of retrieving data after an accident:

(1) Records how fast and in which direction the motor vehicle is traveling.
(2) Records a history of where the motor vehicle travels.
(3) Records steering performance.
(4) Records brake performance, including, but not limited to, whether brakes were applied before an accident.
(5) Records the driver's seatbelt status.
(6) Has the ability to transmit information concerning an accident in which the motor vehicle has been involved to a central communications system when an accident occurs.

Subd. (d): Information Retrieved for Diagnostic Purposes: Information retrieved by a motor vehicle dealer or automotive technician for diagnostic purposes, as allowed under subd. (c)(3) or (4), may not be released to law enforcement.

Subd. (f): Vehicles Manufactured After July 1, 2004, Only: By its own terms, Veh. Code § 9951 applies only to "motor vehicles manufactured on or after July 1, 2004."

Case Law:

People v. Diaz (2013) 213 Cal.App.4th 743: The warrantless retrieval of data from an SDM from a lawfully seized vehicle where there is probable cause to believe it was driven with the driver under the influence, resulting in a vehicular manslaughter, is lawful as:

(1) A search based upon probable cause (Id., at 753-754);

(2) The vehicle being the instrumentality of a crime (Id., at pp. 754-757); and

(3) There being no reasonable expectation of privacy in the contents of the SDM (Id., at pp. 757-758.)

Violating the court order requirements of the section (i.e., failing to get a search warrant) does not require suppression of the retrieved data in that suppression is not required by the United States Constitution. (People v. Xinos (2011) 192 Cal.App.4th 637, 653-654 [review denied and case depublished May 18, 2011].)

See also People v. Christmann (Just. Ct. 2004) 3 Misc. 3rd 309, 314 [776 N.Y.S.2nd 437]; downloading data from the SDM does not require a search warrant.

In order to invoke the provisions of this section, a criminal defendant must show that she was prejudiced by the warrantless downloading of the data from the SDM, under the standards as provided for in People v. Watson (1956) 46 Cal.2nd 818, 836. (See People v. Diaz, supra, at p. 760.)

I.e.: "(W)hether the error has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." (People v. Watson, supra.)

In Diaz, supra, V.C. § 9951 didn't apply to her vehicle anyway in that she was driving a 2002 Chevrolet Tahoe. (People v. Diaz, supra, at p. 759.)

Veh. Code § 2814.1*: *Vehicle Checkpoints: A County Board of Supervisors is authorized by statute to establish a vehicle-inspection checkpoint to check for violations of V.C. §§ 27153 and 27153.5 (exhaust and excessive smoke violations).

Veh. Code* § 2814.1(d): Motorcycle-only checkpoints are prohibited.

See "Other Regulatory Checkpoints," under "Detentions" (Chapter 4), above.

Veh. Code § 2810.2(d) & (e)*: *Vehicle Stops Involving Agricultural Irrigation Supplies:

> Where a vehicle stop is made pursuant to this section (allowing for the inspection of agricultural supplies that are in plain view for the purpose of inspecting the bills of lading, shipping, or delivery papers, or other evidence, to determine whether the driver is in legal possession of the load, whenever the vehicle is on an unpaved road within the jurisdiction of the Department of Parks and Recreation, the Department of Fish & Game, the Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, the State Lands Commission, a regional park district, the U.S. Forest Service, or the Bureau of Land Management, or is in a timberland production zone), if the driver is in violation of Veh. Code § 12500 (driving without a valid license), the peace officer who makes the stop shall make a reasonable attempt to identify the registered owner of the vehicle and release the vehicle to him or her. Impoundment of the vehicle is prohibited if the driver's only offense is Veh. Code § 12500.

Searching a Vehicle* for a Driver's License and/or Vehicle Registration, VIN Number, Proof of Insurance, etc.:

General Rule: The general rule, now perhaps totally eaten up by the exceptions, not to mention the recognized dangerousness of a traffic stop, is that an officer making a traffic stop must allow an occupant of a motor vehicle to locate and produce his own driver's license and registration. (People v. Jackson (1977) 74 Cal.App.3rd 361.)

Exceptions: Case law has been quick to find exceptions. For instance, a police officer may check for registration without permission when:

- The circumstances call for further investigation of the vehicle's ownership. (People v. Webster (1991) 54 Cal.3rd 411, 430-431.)

- The driver tells the officer where it is and does not object to the officer entering to look for it. (Ingle v. Superior Court (1982) 129 Cal.App.3rd 188, 194; ". . . it would defy common sense not to hold that an officer, who has a right to see a motorist's driver's license, may enter a vehicle to obtain the license when the motorist, who is outside the vehicle, has told him [or her] where it is and has not otherwise objected to his [or her] entering the car without a warrant." (Italics added.)

- Under the circumstances, the officer reasonably felt that it was necessary for his or her own protection. (People v. Martin (1972) 23 Cal.App.3rd 444, 447.)

- Where a legitimate concern for "officer's safety" dictates that the officer control the movements of the occupant of a vehicle. (People v. Faddler (1982) 132 Cal.App.3rd 607, 610-611; see also People v. Hart (1999) 74 Cal.App.4th 479.)

- The vehicle is abandoned. (People v. Turner (1994) 8 Cal.4th 137, 181-183.)

- See also People v. Lopez (2019) 8 Cal.5th 353, below; overturning the contrary decision in In re Arturo D. (2002) 27 Cal.4th 60), ruling that making even a limited search of a vehicle for a driver's license to drive, or other "satisfactory evidenced of identification," after being told by the driver that he did not have any with him, violates the Fourth Amendment.

Warrantless Searches of a Vehicle for the Driver's Identification: Overruling its own prior precedent (See In re Arturo D. (2002) 27 Cal.4th 60; which was joined with a companion case, People v. Hinger under the same cite), the California Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment is violated when an officer, without a warrant, exigent circumstances, and/or probable cause, enters a vehicle to search for a driver's identification when that driver indicates that he/she does not have his/her license with him/her. (People v. Lopez (2019) 8 Cal.5th 353.)

> In so holding, the Court noted that its decision in Lopez is limited to searches for identification, and does not purport to overrule prior cases that have upheld searches of vehicles under similar circumstances where the officer is looking for vehicle documentation. (Id., at p. 385, fn. 3; see below.)
> The Court in Lopez based its decision upon the conclusion that the intrusion into a vehicle driver's privacy is outweighed by the need to locate a driver's license to drive, despite its contrary ruling in Arturo D. Per the Court, this is particularly true due to the fact that an officer has other means of determining the driver's identity and whether or not that driver has been untruthful in verbally identifying himself. E.g.:
> > The officer can require the driver to place a thumbprint on the notice to appear, and the officer can accept that thumbprint as "satisfactory evidence" of identity. (Veh. Code §§ 40302(a), 40500(a); see Veh. Code § 40504.) (Id., at pp. 385-386.)

The officer can make a custodial arrest of the driver for failure to carry a driver's license. (Veh. Code §§ 12500, 12951, 40302; People v. McKay (2002) 27 Cal.4th 601, 618, 625.) The officer can then search the person of the driver incident to that arrest. (United States v. Robinson (1973) 414 U.S. 218 [94 S.Ct. 467; 38 L.Ed.2nd 427].)

But see Arizona v. Gant (2009) 556 U.S. 332, 338 [173 L.Ed.2nd 485; 129 S.Ct. 1710], and the U.S. Supreme Court's restrictions on searching the vehicle itself incident to arrest.) (Id., at p. 386.)

The officer can "ask questions," making routine inquiries via the radio and law enforcement's computers, comparing the driver's physical characteristics with what is available through the government's many data bases, either verifying the fact that the driver is who he says he is or developing probable cause to believe that he is not which in turn would give the officer the right to search the vehicle based upon that newly developed probable cause. (See Pen. Code § 148.9; and Veh. Code §§ 31, 40000.5.) (Id., at p. 370.)

The officer may seek consent to search the vehicle for identification. (Id., at p. 371.)

Checking for a Vehicle's Identification Number ("VIN"):

Merely moving papers off the dash so as to make visible the VIN commonly found in that location, resulting in observation of a gun on the floor, was held to be lawful. (New York v. Class (1986) 475 U.S. 106 [106 S. Ct. 960; 89 L.Ed.2nd 81].)

However, looking under the hood of a car has been held to be a search, and is illegal absent probable cause. (United States v. Soto (9th Cir. 1979) 598 F.2nd 545.)

And lifting an opaque car cover and opening the car's door while looking for a VIN is also illegal. (United States v. $277,000.00 U.S. Currency (9th Cir. 1991) 941 F.2nd 898.)

See also People v. Webster (1991) 54 Cal.3rd 411, 430, and the cases cited therein. "(W)e conclude (the California Highway Patrol officer) acted properly when he removed the occupants of the Chrysler and entered the car for the limited purpose of finding the registration."

See Veh. Code § 2805(a), authorizing "(1) any member of the California Highway Patrol, or (2) a member of a city police department, a member of a county sheriff's office, or a district attorney investigator, whose primary responsibility is to conduct vehicle theft investigations," to "inspect any vehicle of a type required to be registered under this code, or any identifiable vehicle component thereof, on a highway or in any public garage, repair shop, terminal, parking lot, new or used car lot, automobile dismantler's lot, vehicle shredding facility, vehicle leasing or rental lot, vehicle equipment rental yard, vehicle salvage pool, or other similar establishment, or any agricultural or construction work location where work is being actively performed," and to "inspect the title or registration of vehicles, in order to establish the rightful ownership or possession of the vehicle or identifiable vehicle component."

See People v. Turner (1994) 8 Cal.4th 137, 182, where Veh. Code § 2805 was cited by the California Supreme Court as authority for an officer to check an already lawfully stopped vehicle, in an other-than-commercial context, for its registration.

Seizure and Searching of Vessels*:

Har. & Nav. Code § 523*: *Removal of Vessels from Public Waterways:

(a) A peace officer, as described in Har. & Nav. Code § 663, or a lifeguard or marine safety officer employed by a county, city, or district while engaged in the performance of official duties, may remove a vessel from, and, if necessary, store a vessel removed from, a public waterway under any of the following circumstances:

(1) When the vessel is left unattended and is moored, docked, beached, or made fast to land in a position that obstructs the normal movement of traffic or in a condition that creates a hazard to other vessels using the waterway, to public safety, or to the property of another.

(2) When the vessel is found upon a waterway and a report has previously been made that the vessel has been stolen or a complaint has been filed and a warrant thereon issued charging that the vessel has been embezzled.

(3) When the person or persons in charge of the vessel are by reason of physical injuries or illness incapacitated to an extent as to be unable to provide for its custody or removal.

(4) When an officer arrests a person operating or in control of the vessel for an alleged offense, and the officer is, by any provision of this code or other statute, required or permitted to take, and does take, the person arrested before a magistrate without unnecessary delay.

(5) When the vessel interferes with, or otherwise poses a danger to, navigation or to the public health, safety, or welfare.

(6) When the vessel poses a threat to adjacent wetlands, levies, sensitive habitat, any protected wildlife species, or water quality.

(7) When a vessel is found or operated upon a waterway with a registration expiration date in excess of one year before the date on which it is found or operated on the waterway.

(b) Costs incurred by a public entity pursuant to removal of vessels under subdivision (a) may be recovered through appropriate action in the courts of this state.

(1) A peace officer, as described in Har. & Nav. Code § 663, or marine safety officer employed by a city, county, or district, while engaged in the performance of official duties, may remove a vessel from, and, if necessary, store a vessel removed from, public property within the territorial limits in which the officer may act, in either of the following circumstances:

(A) When any vessel is found upon the public property and the officer has probable cause to believe the vessel was used in the commission of a crime.

(B) When a vessel is found upon public property and an officer has probable cause to believe that the vessel itself provides evidence that a crime was committed or the vessel contains evidence of a possible crime that was committed and the evidence cannot be easily removed from the vessel.

(2) Notwithstanding Civ. Code § 3068, or Veh. Code § 22851, no lien shall attach to a vessel removed under this subdivision unless it is determined that the vessel was used in the commission of a crime with the express or implied consent of the owner of the vessel.

> (3) In any prosecution of a crime for which a vessel was removed and impounded under this subdivision, a court may order a person convicted of a crime involving the use of a vessel to pay the costs of towing and storage of the vessel and any administrative charges imposed in connection with the removal, impoundment, storage, or release of the vessel.
> (d) For purposes of this section, "vessel" includes both the vessel and any trailer used by the operator to transport the vessel.

Har. & Nav. Code § 668.5: Impoundment of a Vessel Upon the Owner being Convicted of DUI with the Unlawful Killing of a Person:

> A court, upon the conviction of a vessel owner for a violation of Har. & Nav. Code § 655(b) (operating a vessel, water skis, aquaplane, or similar device while under the influence of alcohol) that resulted in the unlawful killing of a person, is authorized to impound the vessel for between one and 30 days. The court is permitted to consider factors such as whether impoundment would result in the loss of employment by the vessel owner or a member of the owner's family, whether the vessel might be lost due to an inability to pay impoundment fees, unfair infringement on community property rights, or other factors the court finds to be relevant.

Har. & Nav. Code § 651: Operator of a Vessel Defined:

> The definition of a vessel "operator" includes (1) a person aboard a vessel who is steering the vessel while underway, to also include (2) a person aboard a vessel who is responsible for the operation of the vessel while underway, and (3) a person aboard a vessel who is at least 18 years of age and is attentive and supervising the operation of the vessel by a person age 12, 13, 14, or 15, pursuant to H&N § 658.5.
> > Note: Har. & Nav. § 658.8 provides that a person age 12 through 15 is prohibited from operating a specified vessel unless accompanied by a person who is at least 18 years old and who is attentive and supervising the operation of the vessel.

Har. & Nav. Code § 663: Peace Officer Defined: A "peace officer" is "every peace officer of this state or of any city, county, city and county, or other political subdivision of the state . . .", providing such officers authority to "enforce this chapter and any regulations adopted by the department pursuant to this chapter and in the exercise of that duty shall have the authority to stop and board any vessel subject to this chapter, where the peace officer has probable cause to believe that a violation of state law or regulations or local ordinance exists."

Searches of Residences and Other Buildings:

Two Types of Searches*:

> "The Supreme Court has held that a Fourth Amendment search can occur in one of two ways. First, under the Katz test, a search occurs when the 'government violates a subjective expectation of privacy that society recognizes as reasonable.' Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 33, 121 S.Ct. 2038, 150 L.Ed.2nd 94 (2001) (citing Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 361, 88 S.Ct. 507, 19 L.Ed.2nd 576 (1967) . . . . Second, under the 'unlicensed physical intrusion' test, a search occurs when the government 'physically occupie[s] private property for the purpose of obtaining information,' Jones, 565 U.S. at 404, 'to engage in conduct not explicitly or implicitly permitted' by the property owner, Jardines, 569 U.S. at 6. (fn. omitted; see below.) Each test is independently sufficient to determine whether government conduct amounts to a Fourth Amendment search: a search occurs if police conduct satisfies either the Katz test or the unlicensed physical intrusion test, even if that conduct does not amount to a search under the other test. See Jones, 565 U.S. at 406 ('Fourth Amendment rights do not rise or fall with the Katz formulation.')." This rule encompasses categories of visitors whom most homeowners almost certainly wish to allow to approach their front doors--friends, relatives, mail carriers, persons making deliveries. But it also reaches categories of visitors who are less universally welcome—'solicitors,' 'hawkers,' 'peddlers,' and the like. The law might attempt to draw fine lines between categories of welcome and unwelcome visitors, distinguishing, for example, between tolerable and intolerable door-to-door peddlers (Girl Scouts selling cookies versus adults selling aluminum siding) or between police officers on agreeable and disagreeable missions (gathering information about a bothersome neighbor versus asking potentially incriminating questions). But the law of trespass has not attempted such a difficult taxonomy. See Desnick* v. American Broadcasting Cos., 44 F. 3d 1345, 1351 (CA7 1995) ('[C]onsent to an entry is often given legal effect even though the entrant has intentions that if known to the owner of the property would cause him for perfectly understandable and generally ethical or at least lawful reasons to revoke his consent'); cf. Skinner v. *Ogallala Pub. [⁋] Of course, this license has certain spatial and temporal limits. A visitor must stick to the path that is typically used to approach a front door, such as a paved walkway. A visitor cannot traipse through the garden, meander into the backyard, or take other circuitous detours that veer from the pathway that a visitor would customarily use. See, e.g., Robinson v. Commonwealth, 47 Va. Nor, as a general matter, may a visitor come to the front door in the middle of the night without an express invitation. App. 2008) . . . (Cope, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ('[T]here is no such thing as squatter's rights on a front porch. A stranger may not plop down uninvited to spend the afternoon in the front porch rocking chair, or throw down a sleeping bag to spend the night, or lurk on the front porch, looking in the windows'). The license is limited to the amount of time it would customarily take to approach the door, pause long enough to see if someone is home, and (if not expressly invited to stay longer) leave."

Note that this rule applies only to trashcans that were placed out on the curb for pick up, at which time the owner of the trashcan loses any expectation of privacy. A trashcan located within the curtilage of a suspect's home (e.g., at the side of the house) requires a search warrant (or consent) in order to be lawfully searched. (See People v. Lepere (2023) 91 Cal.App.5th 727, and footnote 1, citing Florida v. Jardines (2012) 569 U.S. 1, 6 [185 L.Ed.2nd 495; 133 S.Ct. 1409].)

The Fourth Amendment's search and seizure rules apply "to commercial premises as well as to homes." (Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc. (1978) 436 U.S. 307, 312 [98 S.Ct. 1816; 56 L.Ed.2nd 305]; City of Los Angeles v. Patel (2015) 576 U.S. 409 [135 S.Ct. 2443, 192 L.Ed.2nd 435].)

However, such protection from governmental intrusions apply only to the private areas of a commercial establishment. It is not a Fourth Amendment violation for government officials (i.e., police officers) to enter areas of a commercial establishment that are open to the general public, even when the entry is done for the purpose of conducting an investigation. These cases, however, have since been limited to areas of a business where a person has a reasonable expectation of privacy, as described in Katz v. United States (1967) 389 U.S. 347, 3612 [88 S.Ct. 507; 19 L.Ed.2nd 576, 588]. (See Patel v. City of Montclair, supra., at pp. 898-900.)

Even though the occupant intends to use the motel room for only one night for some illicit purpose, having a home nearby, it is still an "inhabited dwelling" for purposes of finding a first degree burglary and a first degree robbery (Pen. Code §§ 460(a), 212.5(a), respectively.) that occurs in the room. (People v. Villalobos, supra.)

Law In General:

Expired Tenancy:

After a hotel (or motel) guest's rental period has expired, or has been lawfully terminated, or the defendant has abandoned the room, the guest no longer has a legitimate expectation of privacy in the hotel room. (United States v. Haddad (9th Cir. 1977) 558 F.2nd 968, 975; see also United States v. Procknow (7th Cir. 2015) 784 F.3rd 421.)

However, it has also been held that any additional time established by the hotel/motel's pattern and practice for allowing guests to stay past the listed checkout time, and taking into account any specific agreement between the management and the guest, will be added to the time period the guest is lawfully in the room. He or she does not lose his or her expectation of privacy until this occurs, making a warrantless entry up until then unlawful. (United States v. Dorais (9th Cir. 2001) 241 F.3rd 1124.)

> In contrast, however, where defendants did not have a pattern or practice of staying past checkout time and the hotel had a strict policy of enforcing checkout times, defendants' reasonable expectation of privacy in the room expired at the checkout time. (United States v. Kitchens (4th Cir 1997) 114 F.3d 29, 32.)

Defendant lost any expectation of privacy he had earlier in his motel room after the motel's 11:00 o'clock checkout time, allowing for officers' warrantless entry done with the motel manager's permission. (United States v. Ross (11th Cir. 2019) 941 F.3rd 1058.)

Renting a Room by Fraud:

One who rents a hotel room with a stolen credit card does not have standing to challenge the otherwise unlawful entry of the room by law enforcement. (People v. Satz (1998) 61 Cal.App.4th 322.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal disagrees, and has held that despite renting a motel room with a stolen credit card, the defendant did not lose his standing to challenge an unlawful entry until the motel's manager took some affirmative steps to repossess the room. In this case, the manager was still seeking payment for the room. The Court noted that at the time the officers entered the defendant's room, the status of the credit card as stolen was yet to be confirmed. (United States v. Bautista (9th Cir. 2004) 362 F.3rd 584.)

Defendant has not lost his expectation of privacy in his hotel room (which was later, after the fact, discovered to have been rented with a stolen credit card) by the hotel locking him out where he was locked out pursuant to a policy to do so after a dangerous weapon (a firearm) is found in the room by hotel employees. Locking him out, in this case, was not done with the intent to evict him. (United States v. Young (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 711, 715-720.)

However: The Ninth Circuit, straining to differentiate the facts of Bautista, also held that the occupant of a hotel room has no reasonable expectation of privacy when the occupancy is achieved through credit card fraud. (Also see United States v. Cunag (9th Cir. 2004) 386 F.3rd 888.)

> In Cunag, the defendant was never a lawful occupant. In Bautista, the Court ruled that the defendant was a lawful occupant, despite the use of a stolen credit card, until the motel's manager took affirmative steps to repossess the room; a questionable distinction.

Paying the rent with counterfeit bills does not deprive a defendant of her expectation of privacy in her motel room absent evidence that she knew the bills she used were counterfeit. Also, the defendant's expectation of privacy does not abate absent evidence to the effect that the motel manager had attempted to evict the defendant, or enlist the police to help him do so. (People v. Munoz (2008) 167 Cal.App.4th 126.)

Abandonment:

Whether or not a defendant abandoned a motel room is a question of the defendant's intent, as determined by "objective factors" (as opposed to his actual subjective intent) such as the defendant's words and actions. Abandonment does not "necessarily" turn on whether a motel's management elects to repossess. (People v. Parson (2008) 44 Cal.4th 332, 342-348; defendant fled from the motel room in order to avoid arrest.)

> The issue is "whether the person so relinquished his interest in the property that he no longer retained a reasonable expectation of privacy in it at the time of the search." (Id., at p. 346.)
> The Court, in Parson, also rejected the argument that abandonment may not be found where the motel manager did not retake physical possession of the motel room from the guest prior to the challenged search. (Id., at pp. 347-348.)

The Guest Register:

There is no reasonable expectation of privacy in the guest register of a hotel or motel, at least as far as the tenant is concerned. (See City of Los Angeles v. Patel (2015) 576 U.S. 409 [135 S.Ct. 2443; 192 L.Ed.2nd 435].) Police officers, therefore, are not constitutionally precluded from viewing such a register for the purpose of checking the residents for warrants (United States v. Cormier (9th Cir. 2000) 220 F.3rd 1103, 1107-1108.), at least when done with the consent of the hotel or motel.

However, it was also held in Patel that a provision of the Los Angeles Municipal Code (§41.49(3)(a)), authorizing warrantless on–site inspections of hotel (and motel) guest records upon the demand of any police officer, is facially invalid under the Fourth Amendment because a police officer's non-consensual inspection of hotel guest records constitutes a Fourth Amendment search and that such searches are unreasonable where the record inspection scheme does not afford an opportunity for pre-compliance judicial review.

A search warrant, however, is legally unnecessary. All that is needed is to provide a hotel or motel's management an opportunity for a pre-inspection determination of reasonableness by a neutral decision-maker. An administrative subpoena or warrant, even if issued ex-parte, is legally sufficient, so long as the hotel or motel's management is given the opportunity to file a motion to quash.

Note: There is no statutory provision for an "administrative subpoena," at least as issued by a law enforcement agency, in California. Administrative, or "inspection" warrants, are authorized under CCP Code §§ 1822.50-1182.60. (See "Inspection (or Administrative) Warrants," under "Other Warrants," under "Search Warrants" (Chapter 10), above.)

However, a City Council is empowered to issue an administrative subpoena for documentary records, per Govt. Code § 37104. (City of Santa Cruz v. Patel (2007) 155 Cal.App.4th 234.)

The Supreme Court further held, however, that: "(N)othing in our opinion calls into question those parts of § 41.49 that require hotel operators to maintain guest registries . . . . And, even absent legislative action to create a procedure along the lines discussed above . . . police will not be prevented from obtaining access to these documents. As they often do, hotel operators remain free to consent to searches of their registries and police can compel them to turn them over if they have a proper administrative warrant . . . or if some other exception to the warrant requirement applies, including exigent circumstances." (City of Los Angeles v. Patel, supra, 423-424.)

Note: The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal indicated in Patel v. City of Montclair (9th Cir. 2015) 798 F.3rd 895, 900, fn. 3, that it is in accord. "We do not understand the Supreme Court's recent decision in a similar case involving the constitutionality of a city ordinance allowing for warrantless inspection of hotel records to hold otherwise (referring to City of Los Angeles v. Patel, supra.).

Civ. Code § 53.5: Releasing Guest Information to Non-California Peace Officers:

Hotels, motels, lodging establishments, bus companies, or any employee of these entities, are prohibited from disclosing or releasing, except to a California peace officer, guest information to a third party without a court-issued subpoena, warrant, or order.

This section "shall not be construed to prevent a private business from disclosing records in a criminal investigation if a law enforcement officer in good faith believes that an emergency involving imminent danger of death or serious bodily injury to a person requires a warrantless search, to the extent permitted by law."

Note: This prohibition has the effect of preventing the release of the listed guest information to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents, as a part of California's "sanctuary state" policy, in that such federal officers are not peace officers under California law. (See Pen. Code § 830.85, and "Rules as to Others Who are Not California Peace Officers," under "Service and Return," under "Searches with a Search Warrant" (Chapter 10), above.

A rented room in a boarding house receives the same protections. (United States v. McDonald (1948) 335 U.S. 451 [69 S.Ct. 191; 93 L.Ed. 153].)

A garage to one's residence receives the same constitutional protections as the residence itself. (United States v. Oaxaca (9th Cir. 2000) 233 F.3rd 1154.)

A weekend fishing retreat is an "inhabited dwelling." (United States v. Graham (8th Cir. 1992.) 982 F.2nd 315.)

A hospital room may, depending upon the circumstances, be considered an "inhabited dwelling." (People v. Fond (1999) 71 Cal.App.4th 127, 131-132.)

However, a warrantless entry into a hospital room in order to question a suspect, as opposed to searching the room, does not constitute a Fourth Amendment violation. (People v. Brown (1979) 88 Cal.App.3rd 283; In re M.S. (2019) 32 Cal.App.5th 1177, 1186-1187.)

"[N]o Fourth Amendment violation occurs when a nurse permits an officer to enter a sentient patient's hospital room for purposes unrelated to a search, [and] the patient does not object to the visit." (People v. Brown, supra, at p. 292.)

See People v. Caro (2019) 7 Cal.5th 463, 495-498, where the California Supreme Court expressed "concerns about incursions on the privacy we maintain in our bodies (which) are heightened during medical procedures. (See, e.g., Sanders v. American Broadcasting Companie*s* (1999) 20 Cal.4th 907, 917 . . . [citing cases where pictures of a patient in a hospital constituted an actionable intrusion upon seclusion under tort law]; but see Hernandez v. Hillsides, Inc*.* (2009) 47 Cal.4th 272, 294, fn. 9 . . . [indicating that state tort law privacy rights are not necessarily coextensive with the 4th Amend.].)," but finding it unnecessary to resolve the issue of an officer entering the defendant's hospital room during emergency procedures in that any error in admitting evidence of photographs taken there was harmless.)

However, bloody clothing seen in plain view by officers from the hallway that was on a hospital's trauma room floor, and it's later retrieval by investigators after defendant (with a gunshot wound he received during an attempted robbery) had been airlifted to another hospital, did not violate defendant's Fourth Amendment right to privacy. (United States v. Clancy (6th Cir. 2020) 979 F.3rd 1135.)

> As for the investigators' seizure of defendant's clothing, the Clancy Court held that the investigators had lawful access to defendant's clothes. The "lawful access" requirement ensures that police officers do not conduct warrantless entries and trespass onto private property just because they see incriminating evidence located there. In this case, the court found that no trespass occurred in the hospital room in that defendant had been airlifted to another hospital by the time the crime scene investigators seized his clothing from the trauma room. The Court added that even if defendant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in his hospital room while the being treated, this expectation of privacy did not continue after he left the hospital and hospital staff began preparing the room for new patients.

Even a jail cell is considered, at least by one court, to be an "inhabited dwelling." (People v. McDade (1991) 230 Cal.App.3rd 118, 127-128; a first degree robbery case.)

> But see "Jail Cells," under "Prisoner Searches," under "Searches of Persons" (Chapter 11), above.

A shack, located behind the main residence, but with an attached air conditioner and an electrical cord leading from the main residence, was held to be the occupant's residence. (Mendez v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2018) 897 F.3rd 1067, 1074-1984.)

Recreational Vehicles: Where the victim lives in her RV (which had a truck-style cab with doors and was described as a class C-style, with a bed over the cab) full time, entering into the RV with the intent to commit a felony is a residential first degree burglary. (People v. Trevino (2016) 1 Cal.App.5th 120.)

Military Housing:

> Military personnel, living off base in a motel, but with the housing paid for by the military as an alternative to living in the on-base barracks, retain the same privacy protections as anyone else in the civilian world. (People v. Rodriguez (1966) 242 Cal.App.2nd 744.)
>
> > The same rule applies to any off-base military housing, at least when the case is a state case being investigated by state law enforcement officers for presentation in state court. (People v. Miller (1987) 196 Cal.App.3rd 307.)
>
> However, on the base, a commanding officer may authorize a warrantless search of property, including the serviceman's locker (People v. Shepard (1963) 212 Cal.App.2nd 697, 700.) and his room in the barracks. (People v. Jasmin (2008) 167 Cal.App.4th 98.)

> Evidence properly being seized pursuant to a service member's commanding officer's (or "competent military authority's") oral or written authorization to search a person or an area, for specified property or evidence or for a specific person (see Military Rules of Evidence, Rule 315(a) & (b)), the results may be used in state court. (People v. Jasmin, supra, at p. 110.)

Curtilage of the Home:

Rule: The Fourth Amendment protections against warrantless searches and seizures extend to the curtilage around one's home; i.e., that area around the house normally used for living purposes. (Florida v. Jardines (2013) 569 U.S. 1, 6 [133 S.Ct. 1409; 185 L.Ed.2nd 495]; United States v. Warner (9th Cir. 1988) 843 F.2nd 401, 405; United States v. Romero-Bustamente (9th Cir. 2003) 337 F.3rd 1104, 1109; Florida v. Jardines (2013) 569 U.S. 1 [133 S.Ct. 1409; 185 L.Ed.2nd 495].)

> "The Fourth Amendment 'indicates with some precision the places and things encompassed by its protections': persons, houses, papers, and effects. Oliver* v. United States, 466 U.S. 170, 176, 104 S. Ct. 1735, 80 L. Ed. 2d 214 (1984). The Fourth Amendment does not, therefore, prevent all investigations conducted on private property; for example, an officer may (subject to Katz (v. United States (1967) 389 U.S. 347 [88 S.Ct. 507; 19 L.Ed.2nd 576].)) gather information in what we have called 'open fields"—even if those fields are privately owned—because such fields are not enumerated in the Amendment's text. (Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 57, 44 S. Ct. 445, 68 L. Ed. 898 (1924). But when it comes to the Fourth Amendment, the home is first among equals. At the Amendment's 'very core' stands 'the right of a man to retreat into his own home and there be free from unreasonable governmental intrusion.' Silverman v. *United States, 365 U.S. 505, 511, 81 S. Ct. 679, 5 L. Ed. 2d 734 (1961). This right would be of little practical value if the State's agents could stand in a home's porch or side garden and trawl for evidence with impunity; the right to retreat would be significantly diminished if the police could enter a man's property to observe his repose from just outside the front window. We therefore regard the area 'immediately surrounding and associated with the home'—what our cases call the curtilage—as 'part of the home itself for Fourth Amendment purposes.' Oliver, supra, at 180, 104 S. Ct. 1735, 80 L. Ed. 2d 214." (Florida v. Jardines (2013) 569 U.S. 1, 6 [133 S.Ct. 1409; 185 L.Ed.2nd 495].)

> "While law enforcement officers need not 'shield their eyes' when passing by the home 'on public thoroughfares,' . . . an officer's leave to gather information is sharply circumscribed when he steps off those thoroughfares and enters the Fourth Amendment's protected areas." (Id., at p. 7.)

See also People v. Nunes (2021) 64 Cal.App.5th 1, 5-6: The exigent circumstances exception to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement did not justify searching a cabinet in defendant's backyard shed while investigating a report of a possible house fire, and evidence taken from the cabinet thus had to be suppressed under Pen. Code § 1538.5. Because the fire captain became aware of the cabinet only after no active fire was found and because a persistent smell of smoke, without a specific articulation of an emergency threatening life or destruction of property and an explanation of immediate necessity, did not provide a basis to search a cabinet that did not appear to be the source of the smell, no exigent circumstances excused the lack of warrant. Cases applying the exigent circumstances exception to a search for the origin of an extinguished fire were distinguishable because it did not appear that any fire had originated in the cabinet.

General Case Law:

> "At common law, the curtilage is the area to which extends the intimate activity associated with the 'sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of life,' [Citation], and therefore has been considered part of the home itself for Fourth Amendment purposes. Thus, courts have extended Fourth Amendment protection to the curtilage; and they have defined the curtilage, as did the common law, by reference to the factors that determine whether an individual reasonably may expect that an area immediately adjacent to the home will remain private." (Oliver v. United States (1984) 466 U.S. 170, 180 [104 S.Ct. 1735; 80 L.Ed.2nd 214, 225]; see also People v. Strider (2009) 177 Cal.App.4th 1393, 1399, fn. 3.)

The curtilage of a home extends to those areas immediately proximate to a dwelling, which "harbors those intimate activities associated with domestic life and the privacies of the home." (United States v. Dunn (1987) 480 U.S 294, 301, fn. 4 [107 S.Ct. 1134; 94 L.Ed.2nd 326, 334-335].)

The factors to consider in determining the boundaries of the curtilage include:

- The proximity of the area to the house;
- Whether the area is included within an enclosure around the house;
- The nature of the uses made of the area; and
- Steps taken to protect the area from observation by people passing by.

(United States v. Dunn, supra; United States v. Davis (9th Cir. 2008) 530 F.3rd 1069, 1077-1080; People v. Lieng (2010) 190 Cal.App.4th 1213; United States v. Perea-Rey (9th Cir. 2012) 680 F.3rd 1179, 1183-1185; United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2001) 256 F.3rd 895, 900-904; People v. Williams (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 111, 120; United States v. Alexander (2nd Cir. 2018) 888 F.3rd 628.)

Specific Examples:

In a drug-trafficking case, where officers did a warrantless drug detection dog-sniff of defendant's vehicle parked in an apartment complex covered parking space near the entrance to defendant's apartment, the court recognized, "it is well-settled that the warrantless search of a home's curtilage with a drug-sniffing dog violate[s] the Fourth Amendment." To determine if an area falls within the curtilage of a home, the court was required to examine four factors; (1) the proximity of the area to the home, (2) whether the area is within an enclosure around the home, (3) how that area is used, and (4) what the owner has done to protect the area from observation from passersby. In this case, the court found that the proximity of the carport to defendant's apartment and the fact that the carport was not located within an enclosure that surrounded his apartment weighed against defendant's argument that the space was within the protected curtilage of his apartment. Second, although defendant regularly parked his car in the carport, he did not have any legal right to exclude others from it. Finally, because officers could see into the carport from a camera set onto a nearby pole, it was apparent that defendant did not take significant steps to protect the area from observation. Based on these facts, the court held that the carport was not within the curtilage of defendant's apartment. Therefore, the drug dog sniff did not constitute a search under the Fourth Amendment. (United States v. May-Shaw (6th Cir. 2020) 955 F.3rd 563.)

"Land or structures immediately adjacent to and intimately associated with one's home, referred to as "curtilage," are ordinarily considered part of the home itself for Fourth Amendment purposes." (People v. Williams (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 111, 120.)

The curtilage will commonly include a driveway leading up to the residence. (See Collins v. Virginia (2018) 584 U.S. 586 [138 S.Ct. 1663; 201 L.Ed.2nd 9].)

One's porch, at the front door, is part of the curtilage of a home, and is in fact the "classic exemplar of an area 'to which the activity of home life extends.'" (Florida v. Jardines (2013) 569 U.S. 1, 7 [133 S.Ct. 1409, 1415; 185 L.Ed.2nd 495]; United States v. Lundin (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 1151, 1158.)

> Use of a drug-sniffing dog at the front door of a suspect's home, which is within the curtilage, is a search and illegal absent a search warrant. (Florida v. Jardines, supra.)

See also United States v. Burston (8th Cir. 2015) 806 F.3rd 1123; applying the rule of Jardines to a drug-dog's sniff in the area immediately outside defendant's apartment, within six to ten inches of a window.

A person's fenced off backyard is within the curtilage of his home. (United States v. Struckman (9th Cir 2010) 603 F.3rd 731, 739.)

A carport attached to the side of defendant's house was within the curtilage of the home. (United States v. Perea-Rey (9th Cir. 2012) 680 F.3rd 1179, 1183-1189.)

The portion of the driveway in front of defendant's shed formed part of the curtilage. (United States v. Alexander (2nd Cir. 2018) 888 F.3rd 628.)

The hallway in front of defendant's apartment, when the hallway is open to anyone who might come into that area, is not part of the curtilage of defendant's residence. Placing a motion detecting camera in the hallway, showing the entrance to defendant's apartment, was held not to be a violation of the Fourth Amendment in that it did not violate any reasonable expectation of privacy defendant might have had in that area outside his apartment. (United States v. Trice (6th Cir. 2020) 966 F.3rd 506.)

A closed shed in defendant's backyard was within the curtilage of his home, and thus accorded the same Fourth Amendment protections as the home itself. (People v. Nunes (2021) 64 Cal.App.5th 1; finding illegal a warrantless search by a fire department captain of a metal cabinet inside the shed.

Warrantless Entry into the Curtilage:

Officers who enter the curtilage (i.e., the front porch) of the defendant's home at 4:00 a.m. with the intent to make a warrantless arrest do so unlawfully absent exigent circumstances, and therefore cannot rely upon any resulting exigency (i.e., defendant attempting to escape from the back of the house) to justify an arrest in the backyard. (United States v. Lundin (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 1151, 1158, reiterating the rule that "exigent circumstances cannot justify a warrantless search when the police 'create the exigency by engaging . . . in conduct that violates the Fourth Amendment.'" (Quoting Kentucky v. King (2011) 563 U.S. 452, 462 [131 S.Ct. 1849; 179 L.Ed.2nd 865].)

Note: The continuing validity of this case is questionable, given the U.S. Supreme Court's rejection of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal's so-called "Provocation Rule," in County of Los Angeles v. Mendez (2017) 581 U.S. 420, 422-423, 425-432 [137 S.Ct. 1539; 198 L.Ed.2nd 52].) See "Provocation Rule," under "Use of Force" (Chapter 6), above.

In Sims v. Stanton (9th Cir. 2013) 706 F.3rd 954 (certiorari granted), the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that entering the curtilage of a home in pursuit of a suspect with the intent to detain him when the subject is ignoring the officer's demands to stop, at worst a misdemeanor violation of P.C. § 148, is illegal. The warrantless fresh or hot pursuit of a fleeing suspect into a residence (or the curtilage of a residence) is limited to felony suspects only. The United States Supreme Court, however, reversed this decision in Stanton v. Sims (2013) 571 U.S. 3 [134 S.Ct. 3; 187 L.Ed.2nd 341].

The Ninth Circuit's decision was based upon the Court's interpretation of the United States Supreme Court decision in Welsh v. Wisconsin (1984) 466 U.S. 740 [104 S.Ct. 2091; 80 L.Ed.2nd 732], and conflicts with the California Supreme Court's reasoning in People v. Thompson (2006) 38 Cal.4th 811 (see "Warrantless entry to arrest a DUI (i.e.,

"Driving while Under the Influence") suspect," under "Detentions" (Chapter 4), above).

However, the United States Supreme Court, in interpreting its own decision on Welsh, noted that they only held there that a warrantless entry into a residence for a minor offense not involving hot pursuit was an exception to the normal rule that a warrant is "usually" going to be required. Per the Court, there is no rule that residential entries involving hot pursuit are limited to felony cases. In this case, there was a "hot pursuit." (Stanton v. Sims, supra, citing Welsh, at p. 750.)

It is an open, undecided issue, with authority going both ways, as to whether it is lawful for an officer to conduct a "knock and talk" at other than the front door. The U.S. Supreme Court declined to resolve the issue. (See Carroll v. Carman (2014) 574 U.S. 13 [135 S.Ct. 348; 190 L.Ed.2nd 311]; determining that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity in that the issue is the subject of conflicting authority.)

However, while declining to decide the correctness of the generally held opinion that a police officer, in making contact with a resident, is constitutionally bound to do no more than restrict his "movements to walkways, driveways, porches and places where visitors could be expected to go," the Court cited a number of lower federal and state appellate court decisions which have so held: E.g., United States v. Titemore (2nd Cir. 2006) 437 F.3rd 251; United States v. James (7th Cir 1994) 40 F.3rd 850, vacated on other grounds at 516 U.S. 1022; United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 1993) 997 F.2nd 1273, 1279-1280; and State v. Domicz (2006) 188 N.J. 285, 302. (Carroll v. Carman, supra, at pp. 19-20.)

Officers who made repeated warrantless entries into the curtilage of plaintiff's home attempting to conduct a "knock and talk," following repeated complaints by plaintiff's girlfriend that he was harassing her, where three prior attempts to get plaintiff to respond and come out to talk were unsuccessful, were not entitled to qualified immunity when later sued by plaintiff. In discussing the "implicit social license" allowing persons to enter the curtilage of one's home, the Court held that the officers exceeded the scope of that implicit social license that authorized their presence on plaintiff's property where repeated prior attempts to get plaintiff to respond to knocks were unsuccessful. Under these circumstances,

Jardines clearly established the officer's entries into the curtilage of plaintiff's home as a Fourth Amendment violation. As a result, the Court held that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. (French v. Merrill (1st Cir. 2021) 15 F.4th 116.)

Exceptions:

Even though within the curtilage of a suspect's home, a hole in the ground which is in a "common area" of an apartment complex does not carry with it the same privacy expectations. Therefore, it was not unlawful for police, observing defendant from a vantage point outside the cartilage while he was engaged in apparent narcotic transactions, to come onto the property and lift a board covering the hole where defendant keep contraband, despite the lack of a warrant. (People v. Shaw (2002) 97 Cal.App.4th 833.)

Also, the protections afforded the "curtilage" of one's home do not apply when the alleged home was nothing more than "an empty structure used occasionally as sleeping quarters." (United States v. Barajas-Avalos (9th Cir. 2004) 377 F.3rd 1040, 1054-1058; a twelve-foot travel trailer on the property without any hookups or other indications that it "harbor(ed) those intimate activities associated with domestic life and the privacies of the home.")

Observations made into the curtilage of the home from the defendants' driveway, when the driveway was an area accessible to the neighbors, were properly used to obtain a search warrant. The use of night vision goggles was irrelevant. (People v. Lieng (2010) 190 Cal.App.4th 1213.)

"The protection afforded one's home by the Fourth Amendment 'has never been extended to require law enforcement officers to shield their eyes when passing by a home on public thoroughfares. Nor does the mere fact that an individual has taken measures to restrict some views of his activities preclude an officer's observations from a public vantage point where he has a right to be and which renders the activities clearly visible. [Citation.] "What a person knowingly exposes to the public, even in his own home. . . , is not a subject of Fourth Amendment protection.'" (People v. Williams (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 111, 120-121; quoting People v. Camacho (2000) 23 Cal.4th 824, 831.)

Entering the defendant's driveway, through an open or unlocked gate to a low, chain-link fence, to contact and talk with (consensual encounter) a subject observed working in the driveway, even if that area is considered to be part of the curtilage of the residence, is not illegal. (People v. Lujano (2014) 229 Cal.App.4th 175, 182-185; "(T)he officers exercised no more than the same license to intrude as a reasonably respectful citizen—any door-to-door salesman would reasonably have taken the same approach the house.")

> The "constitutionality of police incursion into curtilage depends on 'whether the officer's actions are consistent with an attempt to initiate consensual contact with the occupants of the home'" (Id., at p. 184; citing United States v. Perea-Rey (9th Cir. 2012) 680 F.3rd 1179, 1188.)

When the police have "legitimate business" in approaching a person's front door, they may enter areas of the curtilage which are impliedly open to the general public. "A sidewalk, pathway, common entrance or similar passageway offers an implied permission to the public to enter which necessarily negates any reasonable expectancy of privacy in regard to observations made there. The officer who walks upon such property so used by the public does not wear a blindfold; the property owner must reasonably expect him to observe all that is visible. In substance the owner has invited the public and the officer to look and to see." (People v. Williams (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 111, 121; quoting People v. Chavez (2008) 161 Cal.App.4th 1493, 1500.)

Officers using a drug-sniffing dog outside a storage unit rented by defendant, after which a search warrant was obtained for the storage unit itself, was held to be lawful, it being a place that was open to the public and where defendant did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy. (United States v. McKenzie (2nd Cir. NY 2021) 13 F.4th 223.)

Temporary or Impermanent Residences:

General Rule:

The same rules may apply to temporary or impermanent residences, such as a tent in a public campground (United States v. Gooch (9th Cir. 1993) 6 F.3rd 673, 678; see below.) or migrant farm housing on private property. (LaDuke v. Nelson (9th Cir. 1985) 762 F.2nd 1318, 1331-1332.)

"(T)here is no Fourth Amendment rule that provides for protection only for traditionally constructed houses." (United States v. Barajas-Avalos (9th Cir. 2004) 377 F.3rd 1040, 1055-1056; a trailer and a Quonset hut.)

Tents:

A defendant's tent, located on Bureau of Land Management property, exhibited a reasonable expectation of privacy under the circumstances (purposely hidden), and that it was therefore illegal to search it without a search warrant. (United States v. Sandoval (9th Cir. 2000) 200 F.3rd 659.)

The Fourth Amendment was held to protect the defendant's privacy interests in his tent, which was located on a public campground. The Court found that defendant had both a subjective and an objectively reasonable expectation of privacy in the tent. There were no exigent circumstances that justified the warrantless arrest of defendant in his tent. The Court found that the tent was more like a house than a car for the purpose of Fourth Amendment. The court held that defendant's tent was a "non-public" place for the purpose of the Fourth Amendment analysis, even though the tent was pitched on public property. The Court further found that defendant had no less of a reasonable expectation of privacy at a public campground than he would have at a private campground. (United States v. Gooch (9th Cir. 1993) 6 F.3rd 673.)

The Ninth Circuit held, however, that the area immediately around a tent, at a campsite, which is open to the public and exposed to public view, did not have an expectation of privacy. (United States v. Basher (9th Cir. 2011) 629 F.3rd 1161, 1169.)

However, in a Washington States case, a tent set up on public property was found not to be protected by the Fourth Amendment. (State v. Cleator (1993) 857 P.2nd 306, 308-309.)

The area around defendant's tent which he had set up illegally (having been cited there before for illegal camping) in a public preserve where camping required a permit, which defendant did not have, was also not protected by the Fourth Amendment. (People v. Nishi (2012) 207 Cal.App.4th 954, 957-963; no legitimate expectation of privacy in the area under a tarp next to his tent.)

Defendant was found to have "a reasonable expectation of privacy" for Fourth Amendment purposes in an aluminum frame covered with tarps that was erected within a designated site on land specifically set aside for camping during a music festival. The court declared: "One should be free to depart the campsite for the day's adventure without fear of this expectation of privacy being

A cardboard box, located on a public sidewalk, in which defendant lived, did not have the same reasonable expectation of privacy, and therefore could be searched without a search warrant. (People v. Thomas (1995) 38 Cal.App.4th 1331, 1333-1335.)

A cave on federal property where defendant did not have a legal right to be. (United States v. Ruckman (10th Cir. 1986) 806 F.2nd 1471, 1474; the court noting that the lack of a "legal right to occupy the land and build structures on it," were factors "highly relevant" to the issue of the defendant's expectation of privacy.)

A "squatter's community" on public property is not protected by the Fourth Amendment. (Amezquita v. Hernandez-Colon (1st Cir. 1975) 518 F.2nd 8, 11-12.)

Neither is under a bridge abutment. (State v. Mooney (1991) 588 A.2nd 145, 152, 154.)

The Homeless Issue: See "Homeless," under "The Bill of Rights Protections" (Chapter 7), above.

Businesses:

Rule: A warrantless arrest in a private area of a business, when the area entered is not exposed or visible to the public and not the subject of any lawful business regulation by law enforcement, and without an exigency excusing the lack of a warrant, violates the occupant's expectation of privacy. (People v. Lee (1986) 186 Cal.App.3rd 743; citing G.M. Leasing Corp. v. United States (1977) 429 U.S. 338 [97 S.Ct. 619; 50 L.Ed.2nd 530]; see also United States v. Driver (9th Cir. 1985) 776 F.2nd 807, 809-810.)

Case Law:

There is a "plainly . . . reasonable, legitimate, and objective expectation of privacy within the interior of . . . covered buildings, and it is equally clear that expectation is one society is prepared to observe. (Dow Chemical Co. v. United States (1986) 476 U.S. 227, 236 [106 S.Ct. 1819; 90 L.Ed.2nd 226, 236].)

This extension of Ramey does not include areas of a business which are "freely accessible to the public." People v. Lee (1986) 186 Cal.App.3rd 743, 746-747.)

Referring to People v. Ramey (1976) 16 Cal.3rd 263, involving warrantless arrests within one's own residence. See "Ramey; Within One's Own Residence," under "Case Law Limitations," under "Arrests" (Chapter 5), above.

Lee does not affect the applicability of a regulatory scheme authorizing warrantless inspections of the private areas of some regulated businesses, unless the search is being conducted for the purpose of seeking contraband or evidence of crime under the guise of an administrative warrant. (People v. Lee, supra, at p. 749; Donovan v. Dewey (1981) 452 U.S. 594, 598, fn. 6 [101 S.Ct. 2534; 69 L.Ed.2nd 262, 268].)

Use of an administrative, or "inspection" warrant, issued by a court for the purpose of regulating building, fire, safety, plumbing, electrical, health, labor or zoning codes, does not justify an entry by police to make an arrest given the lesser proof standards needed to obtain an administrative warrant. If an entry is effected for the purpose of arresting the occupant, an arrest warrant will have to be obtained. (Alexander v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 1994) 29 F.3rd 1355.)

Where law enforcement officers were asked to assist in the execution of an administrative warrant authorizing the inspection of a private residence for city code violations, they violated the Fourth Amendment because their primary purpose in executing the warrant was to gather evidence in support of a criminal investigation, and, accordingly, defendant was entitled to suppression of evidence obtained during the search. Although law enforcement had initiated a criminal investigation of defendant before the administrative search, it had concluded that it did not have probable cause to arrest defendant or obtain a search warrant for his home, but it knew that a city was going to obtain an inspection warrant for defendant's home and to request assistance at the inspection, and while accompanying the city on its inspection, law enforcement officers photographed incriminating evidence. (United States v. Grey (9th Cir. 2020) 959 F.3rd 1166.)

There is no reasonable expectation of privacy in the guest register of a hotel or motel, at least as far as the tenant is concerned. Police officers, therefore, are not precluded from viewing such a register for the purpose of checking the residents for warrants. (United States v. Cormier (9th Cir. 2000) 220 F.3rd 1103, 1107-1108.)

However, if the hotel or motel management objects, in which case law enforcement must use some form of administrative subpoena or warrant, or other court order, that affords the hotel/management an opportunity to seek a pre-inspection determination by a neutral decision-maker as to the legitimacy of the request for inspection of the records. (City of Los Angeles v. Patel (2015) 576 U.S. 409 [135 S.Ct. 2443; 192 L.Ed.2nd 435].)

However, where officers unsuccessfully rang a "call bell" on the counter in the public area of a business, knocked and announced their presence before entering the work area of the business, entry was held to lawful, at least after no one responded. Contacting defendant in an office off of the work area was upheld holding that there was no reasonable expectation of privacy in the work area in that a reasonable employee would expect someone to enter the work area under these circumstances. (United States v. Lewis (8th Cir. 2017) 864 F.3rd 937.)

Workplace Searches of Government Employees:

Rule: "Searches and seizures by government employers or supervisors of the private property of their employees . . . are subject to the restraints of the Fourth Amendment." However, "(p)ublic employees' expectations of privacy in their offices, desks, and file cabinets, like similar expectations of employees in the private sector, may be reduced by virtue of actual office practices and procedures, or by legitimate regulation." (O'Connor v. Ortega (1987) 480 U.S. 709, 715, 717 [107 S.Ct. 1492; 94 L.Ed.2nd 714, 721, 723].)

"The workplace includes those areas and items that are related to work and are generally within the employer's control . . . even if the employee has placed personal items in them, . . ." (Id., at pp. 715-716 [94 L.Ed.2nd at p. 722].)

Reasonableness: "(R)easonableness rather than probable cause (is) the standard, balancing the 'employees' legitimate expectation of privacy against the government's need for supervision, control, and the efficient operation of the workplace." (United States v. Gonzalez (9th Cir. 2002) 300 F.3rd 1048, 1049-1050; citing O'Connor v. Ortega, supra, at pp. 719-720 [107 S.Ct. 1492; 94 L.Ed.2nd at p. 724].)

In Gonzalez, a warrantless, suspicionless search of a government employee's backpack was conducted as a part of a program to combat employee theft. Upholding the lawfulness of such a search, the Court noted that the fact that the defendant had signed a form upon initial employment acknowledging that such random searches would be conducted (lessening the defendant's expectation of privacy) added to the reasonableness of the search.

See also United States v. Taketa (9th Cir. 1991) 923 F.2nd 665, 673-674, where a search of a D.E.A. agent's office by his supervisors was tested by the O'Connor standard of "reasonableness" and not probable cause because the search was a part of an internal, employee misconduct investigation, the search was upheld.

In United States v. Shelton (7th Cir. 2021) 997 F.3rd 749, the Court analyzed a number of factors in determining that an undercover agent for an FBI agent violated the defendant's reasonable expectation of privacy in her office when he collected certain private documents that were later used in defendant's prosecution for wire fraud and other offenses. The factors considered by the Court included that: 1) Defendant was the sole occupant of her private, fully enclosed office for more than seven years; 2) although business invitees visited it for limited purposes, including in her absence, defendant did not share her office or her desk with anyone else; 3) defendant's office had a door, and she used it to exercise her right to exclude co-workers and visitors from her office; 4) one of the documents that the informant delivered to the FBI agent during his evidence collection efforts was an email from defendant "to all staff of (her government employer) . . . , advising that her door will be closed during work hours for more privacy;" 5) on one occasion when the informant was visiting defendant in her office, another employee came to visit, and defendant turned papers face-down on her desk so that the visitor could not see them; 6) when the informant visited defendant's office, he normally knocked before entering; 7) there was a separate waiting area outside defendant's office for visitors; and, 8) defendant kept personal, non-work related items in her office. In rejecting other factors used by the trial court to deny defendant's motion to suppress, the Seventh Circuit reversed.

Public Restrooms, Adult Bookstore Booths and Dressing Rooms:

Rule: It is considered to be a "general exploratory search," and thus, a Fourth Amendment violation, to spy on persons using public toilets, but perhaps not in other areas where there is a lesser expectation of privacy. (See below)

Examples:

Pay toilets in an amusement park, where officers watched from an observation pipe leading from the roof to the individual booths; observations suppressed. (Bielicki v. Superior Court (1962) 57 Cal.2nd 602.)

Men's restroom in a department store, where the police officers positioned themselves in the crawl space between the ceiling and the next floor, watching through a legitimately installed vent; observations suppressed. (Britt v. Superior Court (1962) 58 Cal.2nd 469.)

Note: There is no reason to believe the same rule wouldn't apply to the women's restroom.

"The bathroom, including a public bathroom stall, is perhaps the epitome of a private place. . . . (F)or over 50 years California case law has ensured that persons in a public toilet may reasonably expect they are not being secretly watched." (In re M.H. (2016) 1 Cal.App.5th 699, 706-707; finding that videotaping a person in a doorless high school bathroom stall violated that person's right to privacy and constituted a violation of Pen. Code § 647(j)(1); disorderly conduct.)

Doorless stalls in a public restroom with the police officer in the ceiling, looking down into the stall. Although the officer could have lawfully observed the illegal activity by simply walking into the bathroom, observing that same activity from inside the ceiling above the stall violated the Fourth Amendment. (People v. Triggs (1973) 8 Cal.3rd 884; disapproved on other grounds.)

However, looking into a curtained booth where sexually explicit films were shown in an "adult bookstore" was upheld. The curtains were found to be there to exclude light; not to provide the occupant with any reasonable expectation of privacy. Looking into the individual booths, therefore, was lawful. (People v. Freeman (1977) 66 Cal.App.3rd 424, 432-433; see also Tily B., Inc. v. City of Newport Beach (1998) 69 Cal.App.4th 1; involving an adult entertainment business, where a city ordinance required an attendant to be stationed in the restroom "to prevent specified activities" was upheld.)

It was also held to be lawful to look over and under a department store fitting room door where there was a two-foot gap under the three-foot high door, and another two-foot gap between the top of the door and the ceiling. While the door was intended to provide a minimal protection to modesty, it did not reasonably provide the occupant with an expectation of privacy. (In re Deborah C. (1981) 30 Cal.3rd 125, 137-139.)

Spying Into Bathrooms, Etc.; Statutes:

Pen. Code § 647(k)(1) makes it a misdemeanor to look through a hole or opening, or otherwise view, by means of any instrumentality including, but not limited to, a periscope, telescope, binoculars, camera, motion picture camera, or camcorder, into the interior of a bathroom, changing room, fitting room, dressing room, or tanning booth, or into the interior of any other area in which the occupant has a reasonable expectation of privacy.

Pen. Code § 647(k)(3) makes it a misdemeanor to "use a concealed camcorder, motion picture camera, or photographic camera of any time to secretly videotape, film, photograph, or record by electronic means," someone "in a state of full or partial undress, for the purpose of viewing the body of, or the undergarments worn by, that other person," without the victim's knowledge or consent, while "in the interior of a bedroom, bathroom, changing room, fitting room, dressing room, or tanning booth, or the interior of any other area in which that other person has a reasonable expectation of privacy, with the intent to invade the privacy of that other person."

Pen. Code § 653n; Two-Way Mirrors: It a misdemeanor to install or maintain a "two-way mirror" permitting the observation of any restroom, toilet, bathroom, washroom, shower, locker room, fitting room, motel room, or hotel room. The section specifically excludes state or local public penal, correctional, custodial, or medical institutions.

> Pen. Code § 653n, prohibiting the installation or maintenance of such disguised surfaces as two-way mirrors in certain specified places, enunciates a public policy against clandestine observation of public restrooms and renders it reasonable for users thereof to expect that their privacy will not be surreptitiously violated. (People v. Metcalf (1971), 22 Cal.App.3rd 20.)
> While Pen. Code § 653n, concerning video surveillance in locker rooms and enunciating a public policy against clandestine observation of public restrooms, rendering it reasonable for users thereof to expect that their privacy will not be surreptitiously violated, was enacted after the relevant conduct in a case involving covert video surveillance of a police department's locker room and represents society's understanding that a locker room is a private place requiring special protection. (Trujillo v. City of Ontario (2006), 428 F. Supp.2nd 1094.)

Problem: When Officers Trespass: The fact that an officer might be "trespassing" upon the defendant's property (within the curtilage, without entering the premises), at least until recently (i.e., see "Curtilage of the Home," above) has historically been relatively insignificant when determining whether the Fourth Amendment has been violated. The issue is one of "reasonableness" under the circumstances. The fact that a trespass may be involved is but one factor to consider when determining reasonableness. (People v. Manderscheid (2002) 99 Cal.App.4th 355, where walking around to the back of the defendant's house to knock, while looking for an armed parolee-at-large, held to be lawful, differentiating the rule of People v. Camacho (2000) 23 Cal.4th 824 [see below], on the facts and the relative seriousness of the crime involved.)

See also People v. Chavez (2008) 161 Cal.App.4th 1493, where walking to the side of the house and climbing over a six foot fence, past a locked gate, was lawful when the officer observed, in plain sight, a cocked revolver on the ground at the side of the house. The necessity to retrieve the weapon, for safety purposes, allowed for the entry of the side yard.

It is an open, undecided issue, with authority going both ways, as to whether it is lawful for an officer to conduct a "knock and talk" at other than the front door. The U.S. Supreme Court declined to resolve the issue. (Carroll v. Carman (2014) 574 U.S. 13 [135 S.Ct. 348; 190 L.Ed.2nd 311]; determining that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity in that the issue is the subject of some conflicting authority.)

> However, while declining to decide the correctness of the generally held opinion that a police officer, in making contact with a resident, is constitutionally bound to do no more than restrict his "movements to walkways, driveways, porches and places where visitors could be expected to go," the Court cited a number of lower federal and state appellate court decisions which have so held: E.g., United States v. Titemore (2nd Cir. 2006) 437 F.3rd 251; United States v. James (7th Cir 1994) 40 F.3rd 850, vacated on other grounds at 516 U.S. 1022; United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 1993) 997 F.2nd 1273, 1279-1280; and State v. Domicz (2006) 188 N.J. 285, 302. (Carroll v. Carman, supra, at pp. 19-20.)

See "Curtilage of the Home," above. See also "Open Fields" (Chapter 15), below.

Securing the Premises Pending the Obtaining of a Search Warrant:

Fourth Amendment: The securing of a residence by police, pending the obtaining of a warrant, is subject to Fourth Amendment protections. (United States v. Lindsey (9th Cir. 1989) 877 F.2nd 777, 780.)

> Such a "securing" of a house is in fact a Fourth Amendment seizure. (United States v. Shrum (10th Cir. KS 2018) 908 F.3rd 1219.)

General Rule: Where police officers are already at a residence without a warrant when evidence is lawfully discovered (e.g., by a plain sight observation), the discovery of which provides probable cause to search the rest of the residence, but when any other evidence in the house is likely to disappear or be destroyed while a search warrant is obtained (i.e., an "exigency;" see People v. Superior Court* [Irwin] (1973) 33 Cal.App.3rd 475.), the officers have three options:

- Seize only that which is in plain sight, and ignore what might be found in the rest of the house.

- Seek consent to search the entire residence from the residents. (See "Consent Searches," below)

- Secure the residence (i.e., detain its occupants and guard the house) pending the obtaining of a search warrant. (See below)

Exigency of the Officers' Own Making: The old rule was that although a police officer may, with exigent circumstances, enter and secure a residence (or other protected place) pending the obtaining of a warrant or consent to search, the law did not allow a warrantless entry and securing of the premises if the exigency was of the officers' own making.

With Probable Cause: Officers, with probable cause which would have justified the obtaining of a search warrant, but hoping to obtain an oral consent to search instead, knock on the front door only to be told by the occupants that admission is being denied. The fact that evidence may now be destroyed, etc., while a warrant is obtained is not an excuse to make a warrantless entry to secure the house. (People v. Shuey (1973) 13 Cal.App.3rd 835; see also United States v. Driver (9th Cir. 1985) 776 F.2nd 807.)

The continuing validity of Shuey and Driver has been somewhat restricted in light of the United States Supreme Court decision in Kentucky v. King (2011) 563 U.S. 452, 459-472 [131 S.Ct. 1849; 179 L.Ed.2nd 865], below.

"(S)ome lower court cases suggest that law enforcement officers may be found to have created or manufactured an exigency if the court concludes that the course of their investigation was 'contrary to standard or good law enforcement practices (or to the policies or practices of their jurisdictions).' (United States v.) Gould ((5th Cir. 2004)) 364 F.3rd (578) at 591. This approach fails to provide clear guidance for law enforcement officers and authorizes courts to make judgments on matters that are the province of those who are responsible for federal and state law enforcement agencies." (Kentucky v. King, supra, at pp. 467-468.)

See also United States v. Iwai (9th Cir. 2019) 930 F.3rd 1141, 1146-1147, fn. 4, citing Kentucky v. King, at pp. 469-470, noting that, "(w)hen law enforcement officers who are not armed with a warrant knock on a door, they do no more than any private citizen might do."

Note: The rule of Kentucky v. King can be analyzed as follows: Where officer without a warrant merely knock (even though loudly) and announce their presence, seeking no more than a "knock and talk," the Fourth Amendment is not violated in that anyone can lawfully do that. Any attempt by the occupants at that point to destroy evidence provides the necessary exigent circumstance allowing for a forced entry. "Occupants who choose not to stand on their constitutional rights (under such circumstances) but instead elect to attempt to destroy evidence (thus creating an exigent circumstance) have only themselves to blame for the warrantless exigent-circumstances search that may ensue." (Kentucky v. King, supra, at p. 470. Italics added.) Should the officers, however, threaten to break in (i.e., by "demanding entry") or otherwise violate the Fourth Amendment (e.g., to make an unlawful entry, search, and/or arrest), then the attempted destruction of evidence is the product of that threatened constitutional violation, and cannot be used by the Government as an excuse to force entry. Any destruction of evidence by the occupants under such circumstances is the direct product of the officers' illegal actions, and such evidence will be suppressed. (See United States v. Iwai, supra. (dissenting opinion), at pp. 1159-1161.)

However, assuming the continuing validity of Shuey and Driver, when a residence is illegally entered and secured by law enforcement under these circumstances, and a warrant is thereafter obtained using only that information developed prior to, and independent of the illegal entry as the probable cause, a subsequent search of the premises under authority of the warrant will be upheld. (Segura v. United States (1984) 468 U.S. 796 [104 S.Ct. 3380; 82 L.Ed.2nd 599]; People v. Angulo (1988) 199 Cal.App.3rd 370; People v. Lamas (1991) 229 Cal.App.3rd 560, 571.)

Even when observations made during an illegal entry are used in the warrant affidavit, the courts have held that that part may be excised from the affidavit and the remainder then retested for the existence of probable cause. If it is there, the search will be upheld. (People v. Gesner (1988) 202 Cal.App.3rd 581; see also People v. Williams (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 111, 124-125.)

> If it is not, the evidence must be suppressed. (People v. Machupa (1994) 7 Cal.4th 614.)
> If the retested warrant is held to be valid, those items illegally observed during the initial illegal entry may still be admissible under the "inevitable discovery rule." (People v. Gesner, supra, at pp. 591-592.)

See United States v. Lundin (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 1151, 1158, reiterating the rule that "exigent circumstances cannot justify a warrantless search when the police 'create the exigency by engaging . . . in conduct that violates the Fourth Amendment.'" (Quoting Kentucky v. King (2011) 563 U.S. 452, 462 [131 S.Ct. 1849; 179 L.Ed.2nd 865].)

In Lundin, the Ninth Circuit held that officers who enter the curtilage (i.e., the front porch) of the defendant's home at 4:00 a.m. with the intent to make a warrantless arrest do so unlawfully, and therefore cannot rely upon any resulting exigency (i.e., defendant attempting to escape from the back of the house) to justify an arrest in the backyard.

Note: The continuing validity of this case is questionable, given the U.S. Supreme Court's rejection of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal's so-called "Provocation Rule," in County of Los Angeles v. Mendez (2017) 581 U.S. 420, 422-423, 425-432 [137 S.Ct. 1539; 198 L.Ed.2nd 52].) See "Provocation Rule," under "Use of Force" (Chapter 6), above.

When exigency is not of the officers' own making:

If, however, there was legitimately no opportunity to get a warrant before the exigency develops (i.e., the exigency was not of the officers' own making), the premises may be entered and secured and the status quo maintained while a warrant is obtained. (People v. Superior Court* [Irwin] (1973) 33 Cal.App.3rd 475.)

Questioning defendant outside his home about his contacts with Pilipino sex traffickers, where he was paying them thousands of dollars, the Eighth Circuit held that federal agents did not create the exigency by "engaging or threatening to engage in conduct that violates the Fourth Amendment." By the time the agents mentioned their concern that defendant might destroy evidence, he had already made a number of suspicious comments, including offering multiple excuses for his refusal to cooperate. Consequently, the court held that officers could not have manufactured or created an exigency that already existed. (United States v. Meyer (8th Cir. IA Dec. 2, 2021) 19 F.4th 1028; agents made a warrantless entry to seize defendant's computers, etc., before getting a warrant authorizing the search of the devices.)

New Rule? The United States Supreme Court has provided considerable clarification on this issue, appearing to establish a new rule. If so, the new rule is that so long as the officers' actions in knocking on the door and identifying themselves, and presumably seeking a consensual entry, does not itself constitute a violation or threatened violation of the United States Constitution (i.e., the Fourth Amendment), there is no penalty for doing so. Should the occupants then attempt to destroy or secret evidence, that's their choice. (Kentucky v. King (2011) 563 U.S. 452, 459-472 [131 S.Ct. 1849; 179 L.Ed.2nd 865].)

Note: The King case, however, specifically does not decide what is, and what is not, an exigent circumstance allowing for an immediate warrantless entry. In King, the officers were in pursuit of a fleeing felon when they heard noises from inside consistent with evidence being destroyed. The issue whether being denied a consensual entry is itself an exigent circumstance was not discussed.

When the Exigency is Over:

"(T)he justification for searching based on exigent circumstances 'ends when the emergency passes.'" (People v. Nunes (2021) 64 Cal.App.5th 1, 6; quoting People v. Duncan (1986) 42 Cal.3rd 91, 99.)

Securing Cases:

Securing a residence as a crime scene is a "seizure" subject to Fourth Amendment protection. (United States v. Alaimalo (9th Cir. 2002) 313 F.3rd 1188, 1192, fn. 1.)

Such a "securing" of a house is in fact a Fourth Amendment seizure. (United States v. Shrum (10th Cir. KS 2018) 908 F.3rd 1219.)

But, with "probable cause" to believe a residence may contain evidence of a crime, the residence may constitutionally be seized as a "crime scene." (Dixon v. Wallowa County (9th Cir. 2003) 336 F.3rd 1013.)

With probable cause to believe that contraband is contained in a particular residence, and a reasonable belief that if the house is not immediately secured the evidence will be destroyed, officers may enter to secure the house pending the obtaining of a search warrant or a consent to do a complete search. (United States v. Alaimalo, supra.)

A five-hour seizure of the defendant's residence, pending the obtaining of a search warrant, was justified when the officers had probable cause to believe weapons from a drive-by shooting, which had occurred shortly before, might be in the house. (In re Elizabeth G. (2001) 88 Cal.App.4th 496.)

Where it appears that confederates of a person arrested for selling narcotics will learn of the arrest and destroy or secret contraband still in the house, it is lawful to secure the house pending the obtaining of a search warrant. (Ferdin v. Superior Court (1974) 36 Cal.App.3rd 774, 781; People v. Freeny (1974) 37 Cal.App.3rd 20.)

A three-minute sweep of a house to check for persons reasonably believed to be in the house who might destroy evidence, was held to be lawful. (People v. Seaton (2001) 26 Cal.4th 598.)

Entering and securing a residence pending the obtaining of a search warrant was supported by exigent circumstances when officers received information that the occupant was about to destroy or remove contraband from the residence. (United States v. Fowlkes (9th Cir. 2015) 804 F.3rd 954, 969-971.)

> The fact that it took about an hour to coordinate the officers necessary to make the warrantless entry and securing of defendant's apartment was irrelevant; the exigency still existed. (Id., at p. 971.)

See also United States v. Dent (1st Cir. ME. 2017) 867 F.3rd 37, where the court held that pending the obtaining of a search warrant, the securing of the residence, including doing a protective sweep during which illegal contraband was observed, did not affect the legality of the search warrant where there was no evidence that either the warrant or the decision to seek the warrant was based on anything the officers discovered during their warrantless entry. The court found that the process of applying for the search warrant had already been initiated based on other independent sources of information and that drugs observed under an air mattress were not included in the search warrant affidavit.

See "Detention of a Residence," immediately below.

Miscellaneous Issues*:

Detention of a Residence: It is proper for the police to temporarily "detain" a residence, guarding it from the outside and preventing people from entering, when there is a reasonable suspicion that contraband or evidence of a crime is inside, at least until the officers can determine through their investigation whether or not to seek a search warrant. (Illinois v. McArthur (2001) 531 U.S. 326 [121 S.Ct. 946; 148 L.Ed.2nd 838]; People v. Bennett (1998) 17 Cal.4th 373.)

In determining what is reasonable, a court must balance the privacy-related concerns of the resident with the law enforcement-related concerns, considering four factors: (1) Whether the police had probable cause to believe that the defendant's residence contained evidence of a crime or contraband; (2) whether the police had good cause to fear that, unless restrained, the defendant would destroy the evidence or contraband before the police could return with a warrant; (3) whether the police made reasonable efforts to reconcile their law enforcement needs with the demands of personal privacy; and (4) whether the police imposed the restraint for a limited period of time; i.e., whether the time period was no longer than reasonably necessary for the police, acting with diligence, to obtain the warrant. (United States v. Cha (9th Cir. 2010) 587 F.3rd 995, 1000; citing Illinois v. McArthur, supra., at p. 331-332.)

In United States v. Cha, supra, detaining the defendant's residence for 26½ hours while a search warrant was obtained was held to be unreasonable, requiring the suppression of the resulting evidence.

In Segura v. United States (1984) 468 U.S. 796 [104 S.Ct. 3380; 82 L.Ed.2nd 599], 19 hours (during which the house was detained from inside) was held to be reasonable in that the officers did not exploit the delay, only eight of the 19 hours was when a judge was available, and the defendants were both in custody anyway.

Note: It is difficult to see how this might differ from "securing a residence," as discussed above.

A thirteen hour seizure of a hotel room held to be reasonable in that the seizure occurred at midnight with the warrant obtained by the following afternoon, at 1:00 p.m., and the defendants were in custody during this time period. (United States v. Holzman (9th Cir. 1989) 871 F.2nd 1496, 1507-1508.)

Detention of the Residents Outside: Also, with probable cause justifying the obtaining of a search warrant, the residents may be lawfully detained outside pending the arrival of the search warrant. (Illinois v. McArthur (2001) 531 U.S. 326 [121 S.Ct. 946; 148 L.Ed.2nd 838].)

But see United States v. Bailey (2nd Cir. 2011) 652 F.3rd 197, reversing the Second Circuit Court of Appeal, where the defendant wasn't detained until after driving at least a mile from his home, and resolving a split of authority among other circuits, the United States Supreme Court held that Michigan v. Summers (1981) 452 U.S. 692 [101 S.Ct. 2587; 69 L.Ed.2nd 340, 349-350], does not permit the detention of occupants beyond the immediate vicinity of the premises which is the subject of a search warrant, at least when the sole reason for the detention is that the person's home was about to be searched. If police officers elect to detain an individual after he leaves the immediate vicinity of the premises being searched, that detention must be justified by some other rationale.

See "Detentions Away from the Place being Searched," under "Detentions" (Chapter 4), above.

Knock and Talk:

Rule: Where the officer does not have probable cause prior to the contact (thus, he is not able to obtain a search warrant), there is generally no constitutional impediment to conducting what is known as a "knock and talk;" making contact with the occupants of a residence for the purpose of asking for a consent to enter. (United States v. Cormier (9th Cir. 2000) 220 F.3rd 1103, 1108-1109.)

Test: The key to conducting a lawful "knock and talk," when there is no articulable suspicion that can be used to justify an "investigative detention," is whether "a reasonable person would feel free 'to disregard the police and go about his business.'" [Citation] If so, no articulable suspicion is required to merely knock on the defendant's door and inquire of him who he is and/or to ask for consent to search. (People v. Jenkins (2004) 119 Cal.App.4th 368.)

Legal Knock and Talks:

> "Absent express orders from the person in possession against any possible trespass, there is no rule of private or public conduct which makes it illegal per se, or a condemned invasion of the person's right of privacy, for anyone openly and peaceably, at high noon, to walk up the steps and knock on the front door of any man's 'castle' with the honest intent of asking questions of the occupant thereof—whether the questioner be a pollster, a salesman, or an officer of the law." (Davis v. United States (9th Cir. 1964) 327 F.3rd 301. 303.)

Knocking at the defendant's motel room door and asking (as opposed to demanding) the occupants to open the door to speak with them, when the defendant comes outside, is no more than a lawful consensual encounter when nothing is said or done which would have indicated to defendant that he was not free to leave or return to his room. (United States v. Crapser (9th Cir. 2007) 472 F.3rd 1141, 1145-1147.)

State authority similarly upholds the practice. (See People v. Colt (2004) 118, Cal.App.4th 1404, 1410-1411.)

See also People v. Michael (1955) 45 Cal.2nd 751, at page 754, where the California Supreme Court noted that: "It is not unreasonable for officers to seek interviews with suspects or witnesses or to call upon them at their homes for such purposes. Such inquiries, although courteously made and not accompanied with any assertion of a right to enter or search or secure answers, would permit the criminal to defeat his prosecution by voluntarily revealing all of the evidence against him and then contending that he acted only in response to an implied assertion of unlawful authority."

The information motivating an officer to conduct a knock and talk may be from an anonymous tipster. There is no requirement that officers corroborate anonymous information before conducting a knock and talk. (People v. Rivera (2007) 41 Cal.4th 304.)

The trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion to suppress evidence from a warrantless motel-room entry and search which began as a knock and talk, because there was an exigency to justify the warrantless search; i.e., an officer could hear running throughout the room and toilet-flushing sounds, suggesting that the room's occupants might have been attempting to destroy evidence. The court further held that the agents did not create the exigency that justified their entry and search of the motel room despite knocking for some two minutes. Although the agents knocked "vigorously," the knocking was relatively brief, and the agents did not attempt to force entry until after they heard the toilet flush. (United States v. Daniels (5th Cir. 2019) 930 F.3rd 393].)

Illegal Knock and Talks:

See Orhorhaghe v. INS (9th Cir. 1994) 38 F.3rd 488, where officers positioned themselves so as to be certain the defendant could not escape or leave, they deliberately revealed their previously concealed firearms, the contact occurred in a non-public place, the officers acted in an aggressive manner suggesting that compliance was not optional, and the officers outnumbered defendant four-to-one. The contact was held to be an unlawful detention.

And see United States v. Jerez (7th Cir. 1997) 108 F.3rd 684, where a similar situation was held to constitute an "investigative detention," thus requiring an "articulable reasonable suspicion" to be lawful, because the officers knocked on the motel room door in the middle of the night continually for a full three minutes, while commanding the occupants to open the door.

An otherwise lawful "knock and talk" was converted into an "extended" detention where officers continued to press the defendant for permission to enter his apartment after his denial of any illegal activity, causing the Court to conclude that a later consent-to-search was the product of the illegal detention, and thus invalid. (United States v. Washington (9th Cir. 2004) 387 F.3rd 1060.)

An anonymous 911-hangup call, traceable to a particular motel, but without sufficient information to determine which room the call may have come from, did not allow for the non-consensual entry into the defendant's room merely because of the suspicious attempts by the person who answered the door to keep the officers from looking inside, and her apparent lies concerning no one else being there. (United States v. Deemer (9th Cir. 2004) 354 F.3rd 1130.)

In greatly restricting the "knock and talk" theory for contacting a resident at his front door, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that to be lawful, the attempt to contact the resident of a home within its curtilage must do so during "normal waking hours" and without the subjective intent to conduct a warrantless arrest (absent exigent circumstances). (United States v. Lundin (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 1151, 1158-1159.)

> "First, unexpected visitors are customarily expected to knock on the front door of a home only during normal waking hours." . . . (⁋) "Second, the scope of a license is often limited to a specific purpose, (Citation), and the customary license to approach a home and knock is generally limited to the "purpose of asking questions of the occupants,' (Citation). Officers who knock on the door of a home for other purposes generally exceed the scope of the customary license and therefore do not qualify for the 'knock and talk' exception." (Id., at p. 1159; citing Florida v. Jardines (2013) 569 U.S. 1, at p. 7 [133 S.Ct. 1409; 185

Despite the decision in Lundin, above, it is an open, undecided issue, with authority going both ways, as to whether it is lawful for an officer to conduct a "knock and talk" at other than the front door. The U.S. Supreme Court declined to resolve the issue. (Carroll v. Carman (2014) 574 U.S. 13 [135 S.Ct. 348; 190 L.Ed.2nd 311]; determining that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity in that the issue is the subject of some conflicting authority.)

> For example, although police officers are generally allowed to approach a home to contact individuals inside and conduct a "knock and talk," in this case, the evidence did not support the Border Patrol Agents' argument that they entered defendant's property to initiate a consensual encounter with him. The court concluded that it was not objectively reasonable, as part of a knock-and-talk, for the agent to bypass the front door, which he had seen defendant open in response to a knock by a suspected illegal alien moments earlier, and intrude into an area of the curtilage where an uninvited visitor would not be expected to appear (i.e., carport attached to the side of the house). By trespassing onto the curtilage and detaining defendant, the agent violated defendant's Fourth Amendment rights. (United States v. Perea-Rey (9th Cir. 2012) 680 F.3rd 1179, 1183-1189.)
> However, while declining to decide the correctness of the generally held opinion that a police officer, in making contact with a resident, is constitutionally bound to do no more than restrict his "movements to walkways, driveways, porches and places where visitors could be expected to go," the Court cited a number of lower federal and state appellate court decisions which have so held. (E.g., United States v. Titemore (2nd Cir. 2006) 437 F.3rd 251; United States v. James (7th Cir 1994) 40 F.3rd 850, vacated on other grounds at 516 U.S. 1022; United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 1993) 997 F.2nd 1273, 1279-1280; and State v. Domicz (2006) 188 N.J. 285, 302. (Carroll v. Carman, supra, at pp. 19-20.)
>
> Opening the front door, even without entering, is a "search," and illegal absent consent, a warrant, or exigent circumstances. (See United States v. Holiday (9th Cir. 2021) 998 F.3rd 888, 892-894.)

See "Knock and Talk," under "Detentions" (Chapter 4), above.

The Doctrine of "Consent Once Removed:"

In the situation where an undercover police officer, or even a paid informant, has already been invited into a criminal suspect's home where, through observations while there, probable cause is established resulting in the undercover officer or informant signaling other officers, the backup officers may then lawfully make a warrantless entry. (United States v Bramble (9th Cir. 1966) 103 F.3rd 1475, 1478-1479; United States v. Yoon (6th Cir. 2005) 398 F.3rd 802.)

> "Once consent has been obtained from one with authority to give it, any expectation of privacy has been lost. We seriously doubt that the entry of additional officers would further diminish the consenter's expectation of privacy, and, in the instant case, any remaining expectation of privacy was outweighed by the legitimate concern for the safety of [the officers inside]. (Citations omitted.)" (United States v Bramble, supra, at p. 1478.)

Observing Contraband from Outside a Residence:

Rule: When a law enforcement officer observes contraband in plain sight from outside the house, such as through an open window or door, the officer cannot make a warrantless entry to seize that evidence absent an exigent circumstance. (Horton v. California (1990) 496 US. 128, 137, fn. 7 (and cases cited therein) [110 S.Ct. 2301; 110 L.Ed.2nd 112, 123]; see also Soldal v. Cook County (1992) 506 U.S. 56, 63-64 [113 S.Ct. 538; 121 L.Ed.2nd 450].)

Exception; Exigent Circumstances: Exigent circumstances might be present when occupants of the house observe the police officer observing the contraband, thus creating the circumstance where it is reasonable to believe the evidence will be destroyed before a warrant can be obtained. In such a case, it might be appropriate to make an immediate entry for purposes of "securing" the residence pending the obtaining of a search warrant. (See "Securing the Premises," above.)

> "One exception is when an exigent circumstance makes the needs of law enforcement so compelling that a warrantless search becomes objectively reasonable." (People v. Nunes (2021) 64 Cal.App.5th 1, 6; citing Kentucky v. King (2011) 563 U.S. 452, 460 [179 L.Ed.2nd 865; 131 S.Ct. 1849].)

Exigent circumstances allowing an immediate entry were found where the suspect was observed through the open door near the contraband under circumstances where it appeared he might have been the victim of an overdose. (People v. Zabelle (1996) 50 Cal.App.4th 1282.)

Observing what appeared to be a cocked revolver at the side of a house (i.e., in the cartilage) behind a six foot fence with a locked gate, allowed for the officer to scale the fence to recover the weapons for officer safety purposes, and because it was believed that a child might be present in the house. (People v. Chavez (2008) 161 Cal.App.4th 1493.)

Exigent circumstances was held to justify the immediate warrantless entry of defendant's trailer to secure two rifles (which were in fact seized and removed from the trailer) known to be inside when a female victim reported to police that she had just been raped inside the trailer, defendant's whereabouts was unknown, and the rape victim's two children and husband were missing. (People v. Suarez (2020) 10 Cal.5th 116, 151-152.)

However, the officer must have been operating under the reasonable belief that there was no opportunity to obtain a warrant. In United States v. Banks (7th Cir. 2023) 60 F.4th 386, defendant posted a Snapchat video of himself barbequing on his porch with a gun on the grill's shelf. Springfield police officer Redding saw the post and knew defendant to be a convicted felon. Within minutes, Officer Redding and other officers headed to defendant's home and saw defendant on his porch, next to the grill. Attempting to pat him down for weapons, the officers struggled with defendant, eventually arresting him inside the house. A pat down revealed a loaded semi-automatic pistol in his pocket. The officers also saw a box of ammunition. They did not have a warrant to enter defendant's porch or to search his home. At a suppression hearing, Officer Redding stated that he did not believe he needed a warrant to enter the porch because the police had reasonable suspicion that defendant, as a convicted felon, was committing a crime by possessing a gun nor did he believe he had enough time to obtain a warrant. The district court denied defendant's motion to suppress. The court further held that the patdown for weapons was lawful. Defendant entered a conditional guilty plea. The Seventh Circuit reversed. Because defendant was a convicted felon, the officers needed nothing more than the video to request a warrant to arrest him. A front porch—part of a home's "curtilage"—receives the same protection as the home itself, so the officers' entry was illegal without a warrant. No exception to the warrant requirement applied.

Lawfulness of the Initial Observation; The "Lawful Access" Requirement:

Before exigent circumstances, or a resulting search warrant, can be used as a basis for entering a residence, it must be first determined whether the police officer's initial observations were in fact lawful; i.e., made from a position or location the officer had a legal right to be. (United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 1993) 997 F.2nd 1273, 1279; People v. Ortiz (1994) 32 Cal.App.4th 286, 291; see also People v. Camacho (2000) 23 Cal.4th 824; where observations from the side of defendant's house held to be illegal.)

Investigators following up on a robbery case, seized defendant's clothing from a hospital's trauma room floor without a warrant, defendant having been shot during the robbery and later showed up at the hospital for treatment. Defendant had been airlifted to another hospital before the seizure of his clothing. The Court held that the investigators had lawful access to defendant's clothes. The "lawful access" requirement ensures that police officers do not conduct warrantless entries and trespass onto private property just because they see incriminating evidence located there. In this case, the court found that no trespass occurred in the hospital room in that defendant had been airlifted to another hospital by the time the crime scene investigators seized his clothing from the trauma room. The Court added that even if defendant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in his hospital room while the being treated, this expectation of privacy did not continue after he left the hospital and hospital staff began preparing the room for new patients. (United States v. Clancy (6th Cir. 2020) 979 F.3rd 1135.)

Using a Ruse to Cause a Suspect to Open his Door or Gain Entry:

Split of Authority: While "knock and talks" are generally held to be legal (see above), whether or not an officer, without probable cause, may use a ruse or subterfuge to make warrantless observations or entry inside a residence depends upon the circumstances. The difference, apparently, is whether the officer making entry is working undercover (legal), and does not misrepresent who he is, but instead misrepresents the purpose of the entry (illegal).

Held to be Illegal:

Causing a suspect to open his door for the purpose of allowing the officer the opportunity to make a "plain sight observation" of contraband within the residence is illegal. (People v. Reeves (1964) 61 Cal.2nd 268.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, in holding observations made were illegal, ruled that in order to lawfully gain an intentional visual access to the inside of a residence, one or more of three circumstances must be present:

- The occupant voluntarily and knowingly opens the door in response to a request, but not a threat or command, such as in a "knock and talk" (see above);
- The officers have a search warrant; or
- The offices have probable cause and exigent circumstances justifying the lack of a warrant.

(United States v. Washington (9th Cir. 2004) 387 F.3rd 1060, 1070-1071; officers refused to allow defendant to shut the door during an otherwise lawful "knock and talk," making the inside of defendant's apartment clearly visible.)

Using a ruse to trick people outside during a narcotics investigation at an apartment complex, for the purpose of confronting as many people as they could lure outside, resulted in the defendant's illegal detention when he was surrounded by a team of officers all dressed in raid gear. "A deception used to gain entry into a home and a ruse that lures a suspect out of a residence is a distinction without much difference. . . ." (People v. Reyes (2000) 83 Cal.App.4th 7, 12-13.)

Use of an administrative, or "inspection" warrant, issued by a court for the purpose of regulating building, fire, safety, plumbing, electrical, health, labor or zoning codes, does not justify a concurrent entry (i.e., entering with the inspectors) by police to make an arrest when the police attempt to use the lower standard of proof needed to obtain an administrative warrant as their justification for entering. If an entry is effected for the purpose of arresting the occupant, an arrest warrant will have to be obtained. (Alexander v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 1994) 29 F.3rd 1355.)

In a case out of Washington State, a state patrol officer identified himself as a law enforcement officer and requested a social security benefit applicant's assistance in a fictitious investigation, gaining entry into her home using a ruse. Because he lied to the resident about his real purpose of his entry into her residence—to conduct a civil investigation of her possible social security fraud—her consent to the officer's entry into her home was vitiated by his deception. By observing and videotaping the resident inside her home without her consent, the officer conducted a "search" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. However, even though the warrantless ruse-entry into the resident's home was an unreasonable search, it was not clearly established that the officer's conduct, in the context of a civil or administrative investigation related to a determination of benefits eligibility, was a search or was unreasonable. The officer, therefore, was entitled to qualified immunity. (Whalen v. McMullen (9th Cir. 2018) 907 F.3rd 1139.)

> See United States v. Esqueda (9th Cir. Dec. 12, 2023) 88 F.4th 818, 826, at fn. 4, where the court explains the difference between entering under false pretenses, while not misrepresenting who the officer is but lying to the occupant about the purpose of the entry (illegal), and gaining consent to enter while the officers are undercover (legal). "In contrast to a ruse entry, an undercover entry does not violate the Fourth Amendment "as long as the undercover agent does not exceed the scope of his invitation while inside the home."

Where law enforcement officers were asked to assist in the execution of an administrative warrant authorizing the inspection of a private residence for city code violations, they violated the Fourth Amendment because their primary purpose in executing the warrant was to gather evidence in support of a criminal investigation, and, accordingly, defendant was entitled to suppression of evidence obtained during the search. Although law enforcement had initiated a criminal investigation of defendant before the administrative search, it had concluded that it did not have probable cause to arrest defendant or obtain a search warrant for his home, but it knew that a city was going to obtain an inspection warrant for defendant's home and to request assistance at the inspection, and while accompanying the city on its inspection, law enforcement officers photographed incriminating evidence. (United States v. Grey (9th Cir. 2020) 959 F.3rd 1166.)

Posing as a potential buyer of a residence, thus gaining entry for the purpose of making observations of illegal activity, was held to be an illegal ruse. (People v. De Caro (1981) 123 Cal.App.3rd 454.)

> But see People v. Lucatero (2008) 166 Cal.App.4th 1110, below.

A real estate agent who, upon showing a house to potential buyers, observed an abnormal amount of electronic equipment and suspected that the items were stolen. She called police who made a warrantless entry with the agent and, after an extensive search, seized stolen property. Although criticizing the reasoning of De Caro to some extent, the Court still held the warrantless entry to be illegal. The Court held that the agent, while authorized to show prospective buyers the house, was not authorized to allow the police in for the purpose of conducting a criminal investigation. The authority of a real estate agent, "is limited, as is all consensual authority, by the terms of the consent and the purpose for which it was given. [Citations] A real estate agent is authorized to consent to the entry of persons the agent believes in good faith to be potential purchasers of the property." (People v. Jaquez (1985) 163 Cal.App.3rd 918.)

Held to be Legal:

Defendant was free on bail pending trial when a wired informer, who was an old acquaintance of defendant, entered defendant's store and engaged him in conversation. Unbeknownst to defendant, the acquaintance was wired for sound with a small microphone in his inside overcoat pocket and a small antenna running along his arm. An agent of the Narcotics Bureau had stationed himself outside with a receiving set properly tuned to pick up any sounds the microphone transmitted. At trial, the agent testified to defendant's incriminating admissions that he heard via a receiving set that picked up the conversation. His conviction was affirmed on appeal. On certiorari, the Supreme Court held that: (1) the conduct of the informer and the agent did not violate the Fourth Amendment because the informer entered a place of business with defendant's consent, the tort doctrine of trespass ab initio did not apply, and eavesdropping on a conversation with the connivance of one of the parties was not an unreasonable search or seizure. Exclusion of the agent's testimony was not justified because there was no good policy reason to exclude otherwise relevant evidence to penalize the government for the low morals of its informer in breaching defendant's confidence. (On Lee v. United States (1952) 343 U.S. 747, 752-753 [72 S.Ct. 967; 96 L.Ed. 1270].)

It has since been held that the rule of On Lee continues to apply (United States v. Esqueda (9th Cir. 2023) 88 F.4th 818, 828; and cites the case numerous times with approval.

An internal revenue agent wearing a secret recording device met with the defendant in the defendant's private office and pretended to be receptive to a bribe. The defendant made incriminating statements which led to his later indictment for attempted bribery. The recording was introduced into evidence. The defendant argued on appeal from his conviction that the secret recording violated the Fourth Amendment because the agent had gained access to the "office by misrepresentation and all evidence obtained in the office i.e., his conversation with petitioner, was illegally 'seized.'" The Supreme Court held that no Fourth Amendment violation had occurred. The agent's secret use of recording equipment did not render the consensual encounter a Fourth Amendment search, because "the electronic device [was] not . . . planted by an unlawful physical invasion of a constitutionally protected area." Instead, the device "was carried in and out by an agent who was there with petitioner's assent, and it neither saw nor heard more than the agent himself." As the Court put it, the recording "device was used only to obtain the most reliable evidence possible of a conversation in which the Government's own agent was a participant and which that agent was fully entitled to disclose." The Court's reasoning was unequivocal: Stripped to its essentials, defendant's argument amounted to saying that he has a constitutional right to rely on possible flaws in the agent's memory, or to challenge the agent's credibility without being beset by corroborating evidence that is not susceptible of impeachment. For no other argument can justify excluding an accurate version of a conversation that the agent could testify to from memory. The Court held that defendant took a risk in offering a bribe to the IRS agent that fairly included the risk that the offer would be accurately reproduced in court, "whether by faultless memory or mechanical recording." (Lopez v. United States (1963) 373 U.S. 427, 438-439 [83 S.Ct. 1381; 10 L.Ed.2nd 462].)

Merely knocking on the defendant's door and then stepping to the side for purposes of insuring the safety of the officers (a common police practice) is not an illegal ruse merely because the defendant (who was under the influence of methamphetamine at the time) came out about 20 feet looking for the source of the knocking and got himself arrested. (People v. Colt (2004) 118, Cal.App.4th 1404; United States v. Crapser (9th Cir. 2007) 472 F.3rd 1141, 1145-1147.)

When police officers who knock at the door are invited in by the occupants who did not know it was the police at the door when they made the invitation, there is no subterfuge requiring the suppression of any observations made by the officers as they enter. (Mann v. Superior Court (1970) 3 Cal.3rd 1.)

Making an anonymous phone call to the occupant of a residence, warning him that "the police are coming; get rid of the stuff," causing defendant to leave the house with his contraband in hand, is not illegal. (People v. Rand (1972) 23 Cal.App.3rd 579; "Where the ruse does no more than to cause a defendant, activated by his own decision, to do an incriminating act—whether that act be a sale to an undercover agent or a jettisoning of incriminating material—no illegality exists." (Id., at p. 583; see also People v. Martino (1985) 166 Cal.App.3rd 777, 789; phone call to cocaine dealer.)

A police officer who, with information from an untested informant that drugs were in a house that was for sale, posed as a potential buyer and was shown the house by the real estate agent, during which entry the officer made corroborating observations with which he later obtained a search warrant. The entry was held to be lawful where the officer did no more than could any prospective buyer. (People v. Lucatero (2008) 166 Cal.App.4th 1110.)

> The Lucatero Court differentiated its facts from People v. De Caro, supra, noting that the prior ruling's conclusion that the entry was illegal was "dicta" only (i.e., not necessary to its decision) and incorrectly decided.

The Lucatero Court also differentiated its facts from those of People v. Jaquez, supra, where the officers entered with the real estate agent's permission for the known purpose of conducting a warrantless police investigation. In Jaquez, the real estate agent was not authorized to allow police into the house to conduct a criminal investigation. In Lucatero, where the officer posed as a potential buyer, the real estate agent was authorized to allow in potential buyers.

Lastly, the Lucatero Court differentiated this case from others were ruses were held to be illegal, the Court noting that "(t)his is not a ruse in which the officer is invited in under the ruse that he is a meter reader and then does not > read the meter, or that he is a friend of the repairman, but then engages in investigatory behavior inconsistent with a friend's visit." (Citing State v. Nedergard (Wash. Ct.App. 1988) 753 P.2nd 526.)

> > The Two Tests: "The Supreme Court has held that a Fourth Amendment search can occur in one of two ways. First, under the Katz test, a search occurs when the 'government violates a subjective expectation of privacy that society recognizes as reasonable.' Kyllo v. 'unlicensed physical intrusion' test, a search occurs when the government 'physically occupie[s] private property for the purpose of obtaining information,' Jones, 565 U.S. at 404, 'to engage in conduct not explicitly or implicitly permitted' by the property owner, Jardines, 569 U.S. at 6. (fn. omitted; see below.) Each test is independently sufficient to determine whether government conduct amounts to a Fourth Amendment search: a search occurs if police conduct satisfies either the Katz test or the unlicensed physical intrusion test, even if that conduct does not amount to a search under the other test. See Jones, 565 U.S. at 406 ('Fourth Amendment rights do not rise or fall with the Katz formulation.')." >
> The Court in Esqueda ultimately upheld the undercover entry into defendant's motel room, video and audio-taping the purchase of a firearm from defendant. In so ruling, the Court (at pp. 825-826) indicated that the result would be different if:
> > The officers physically attached recording devices to defendant's property. (See Silverman v. United States (1961) 365 U.S. 505, 509-512 [81 S.Ct. 679; 5 L.Ed.2nd 734].)
> > Surreptitiously entered any part of the motel room without consent. (See Gouled v. United States (1921) 255 U.S. 298, 306 [41 S.Ct. 261; 65 L.Ed. 647].)
> >
> > Leave the recording devices inside the room after they departed. (United States v.

Nerber (9th Cir. 2000) 222 F.3rd 597, 604-605).

Note that the Court also held that it is irrelevant whether the area entered is one's residence or his business. (Id., at pp. 829-830.)

Also note the following limitation: "Our holding today is a limited one. We express no view as to whether an undercover agent's use of other, more advanced technologies during a consensual encounter—such as those that might allow the government to detect more than the agent's natural senses could detect—might constitute a Fourth Amendment search." (Id., at p. 830.)

See also United States v. Thompson (7th Cir. 2016) 811 F.3rd 944, 948-949: "That the informant recorded his observations on video did not transform the consensual encounter into a search for purposes of the Fourth Amendment.")

Possible Resolution; Kentucky v. King: The issue has possibly been resolved by the Supreme Court in the decision of Kentucky v. King (2011) 563 U.S. 452, 459-472 [131 S.Ct. 1849; 179 L.Ed.2nd 865]:

So long as the officers' actions in knocking on the door and identifying themselves, and presumably seeking a consensual entry, does not itself constitute a violation or threatened violation of the United States Constitution (i.e., the Fourth Amendment), there is no penalty for doing so. Arguably, therefore, any observations made in the process of doing so should be lawful.

Searches Incident to Arrest: Whenever a person is arrested, officers may (with some limitations) search the person and the area within that person's immediate reach. (Chimel v. California (1969) 395 U.S. 752 [89 S.Ct. 2034; 23 L.Ed.2nd 685].)

Legal Justification: "(W)hen an officer begins an encounter with another person, and probable cause to arrest exists, danger to the police officer "flows from the fact of the arrest, and its attendant proximity, stress, and uncertainty, and not from the grounds for arrest." (United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 793, 800, indicating that the officer's mistaken belief in what the proper grounds for the arrest are to be is irrelevant; citing United States v. Robinson (1973) 414 U.S. 218, 234, fn. 5 [94 S.Ct. 467; 38 L.Ed.2nd 427].)

In a Residence: This includes within a house, and may involve, as a part of a "protective sweep" (see below), looking "in closets and other spaces immediately adjoining the place of arrest from which an attack could be immediately launched." (Maryland v. Buie (1990) 494 U.S. 325, 334 [110 S.Ct. 1093; 108 L.Ed.2nd 276].)

However, looking any further than the adjoining rooms require "articulable facts which, taken together with the rational inferences from those facts, would warrant a reasonably prudent officer in believing that the area to be swept harbors an individual posing a danger to those on the arrest scene." (Maryland v. Buie, supra, at pp. 327, 334 [108 L.Ed.2nd at pp. 282, 286]; United States v. Lemus (9th Cir. 2009) 582 F.3rd 958, 962.)

See "Protective Sweeps," below.

Arresting a subject in his home justifies a search of the Chimel "lunging area" incident to arrest, at least where there are still unsecured people and possibly unaccounted for third parties in the residence. (People v. Summers (1999) 73 Cal.App.4th 288.)

However, the U.S. Supreme Court recently restricted searches incident to arrest when searching a vehicle in Arizona v. Gant (2009) 556 U.S. 332 [129 S.Ct. 1710; 173 L.Ed.2nd 485]. In Gant, it was held that a warrantless search of a vehicle incident to arrest is lawful only when the arrestee is unsecured and within reaching distance of the passenger compartment at the time of the search. This same rule is likely to apply to searches incident to arrest in a residence, or anywhere else.

Although the United States Supreme Court has indicated that Gant is limited to "circumstances unique to the vehicle context" (See Riley v. California ((2014) 573 U.S. 373, 398-399 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430], citing Gant at p. 343), at least one California court has applied it to the residential situation. (See People v. Leal (2009) 178 Cal.App.4th 1051; arrest in a residence.)

The Leal court, citing Summers and Gant, noted that there are limitations to this rule: "A different rule of reasonableness applies when the police have a degree of control over the suspect but do not have control of the entire situation. In such circumstances—e.g., in which third parties known to be nearby are unaccounted for, or in which a suspect has not yet been fully secured and retains a degree of ability to overpower police or destroy evidence—the Fourth Amendment does not bar the police from searching the immediate area of the suspect's arrest as a search incident to an arrest." (Id., at p. 1060.)

The Leal Court also held that the rule of Gant was retroactive (see pp. 1065-1066); a questionable decision in light of the decision in Davis v. United States (2011) 564 U.S. 229, 236-239 [131 S.Ct. 2419; 180 L.Ed.2nd 285], where it was held that decisions such as Gant are not retroactive. (See "Is Gant Retroactive?" under "Searches of Vehicles," above.)

Citing United States v. Fleming (7th Cir. 1982) 667 F.2nd 602, 605-608, the Leal Court noted that handcuffing alone is probably not enough to fully secure the suspect. (Id., at p. 1062.)

"Protective Sweeps:"

Rule: A quick, limited premises search incident to a lawful arrest in a residence has been upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court if the arresting officers have a "reasonable belief" that there is another person on the premises who poses a danger to those on the arrest scene. (Maryland v. Buie (1990) 494 U.S. 325 [110 S.Ct. 1093; 108 L.Ed.2nd 276, 282, 286]; People v. Dyke (1990) 224 Cal.App.3rd 648, 661; People v. Block (1971) 6 Cal.3rd 239.)

"A 'protective sweep' is a quick and limited search of premises, incident to an arrest and conducted to protect the safety of police officers or others." (People v. Ormonde (2006) 143 Cal.App.4th 282, 292.)

First, after a suspect is arrested inside a residence, officers may "as a precautionary matter and without probable cause or reasonable suspicion, look in closets and other spaces immediately adjoining the place of arrest from which an attack could be immediately launched." Second, officers may "sweep" other areas in the home if there are "articulable facts which, taken together with the rational inferences from those facts, would warrant a reasonably prudent officer in believing that the area to be swept harbors an individual posing a danger to those on the arrest scene." (Italics added; United States v. Garges (8th Cir. 2022) 46 F.4th 682; the Court finding that all the rooms in a hotel room were adjoining the main room, making them all subject to a protective sweep with or without any reason to believe others might be in the hotel room.)

The protective sweep doctrine allows officers to make a "quick and limited search of the premises, incident to an arrest and conducted to protect the safety of police officers or others." Officers are allowed to look in areas immediately adjoining the place of arrest "in closets and other spaces" from which "an attack could be launched." In addition, officers may sweep beyond these adjoining areas if they have a reasonable belief "that the area searched harbors a person posing a danger to the officer or others." The court added that justification for a protective sweep does not automatically end when the suspect is arrested. (United States v. Ford (8th Cir. IA 2018) 888 F.3rd 922.)

Case Law:

A protective sweep of a trailer upheld when a suspect in a narcotics trafficking case, upon seeing the officers' approach, ducked back out of sight, attempted to close the door, and closed the blinds. (United States v. Arellano-Ochoa (9th Cir. 2006) 461 F.3rd 1142; protective sweep made after an immediate warrantless entry was made, defendant was arrested, and a gun was observed on the floor near the front door.)

A protective sweep (although not referred to it as such) during the execution of a search warrant, where the officers had knowledge that a suspect had a firearm registered to him, is also reasonable at least when that suspect had not yet been found. (See Los Angeles County v. Rettele (2007) 550 U.S. 609 [127 S.Ct. 1989; 167 L.Ed.2nd 974].)

"(T)he type of criminal conduct underlying the arrest or search is significant in determining if a protective sweep is justified." (People v. Ledesma (2003) 106 Cal.App.4th 857; 865; see People v. Werner (2012) 207 Cal.App.4th 1195, 1208; an earlier incident of domestic violence does not indicate that someone inside with weapons might be present.

Having detained outside all the members of a family at a birthday party, such detentions having been held to be illegal, and with no reason to believe anyone else was in the plaintiffs' apartment, the warrantless search of the apartment could not be upheld as a protective sweep. (Sialoi v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2016) 823 F.3rd 1223, 1237-1238.)

A protective sweep of a residence, where the resident is a parolee, is lawful with or without a suspicion that others might be present in that the whole house was subject to search anyway under the parolee's Fourth waiver conditions. (United States v. Lopez (9th Cir. 2007) 474 F.3rd 1208.)

A cursory check of the immediately adjoining living room was upheld where defendant was arrested at the threshold. The plain sight observation of a firearm under the couch cushion upheld. (United States v. Lemus (9th Cir. 2009) 582 F.3rd 958.)

> See dissenting opinion to the Court's denial of an en banc rehearing, at (9th Cir. 2010) 596 F.3rd 512, by Kozinski, C.J.

Upon responding to a 911 call reporting a burglary at defendant's house, officers heard a home security siren blaring and saw broken windows on the main and storm doors, and blood on the porch floor and on a window shade stuck through the broken glass. The officers also saw footprints on the front door, which was ajar. Suspecting that a burglary was in progress, or that someone inside was in need of assistance, the officers conducted a protective sweep. As they did so, they observed in plain sight drugs, firearms, and drug paraphernalia on the floor in a hallway near a bedroom. In the basement, officers saw a bag containing a white powdery substance hanging out of a hole in the wall. Finding no one to be home, the officers seized the items observed. Defendant was later charged in federal court with various drug and firearms-related offenses. Upon defendant's motion to suppress, the trial court, and as upheld by the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeal, found that exigent circumstances justified the conducting of the protective sweep, and that the evidence, observed in plain sight during a lawful protective sweep for suspects and/or victims, was lawfully seized. (United States v. Williams (8th Cir. MO. 2020) 951 F.3rd 892.)

Based upon defendant's emergency 911 call, telling the dispatcher that he had been shot, and witness information upon arrival at the scene, the officers' entry into defendant's residence in response to the call for medical aid for a shooting victim did not violate the Fourth Amendment. Given the fact of the shooting and the other information known to the officers at the time, the court concluded that exigent circumstances made it reasonable to enter the residence and, as a "protective sweep," look into the rooms to ensure the absence of a shooter or additional victims. Plain sight observation of at least one firearm while in the residence was lawful. Then, an officer's entry into the kitchen, and remaining there, did not unreasonably extend the duration of the protective sweep in that area. The court found that the officer in the kitchen remained there out of a concern that a witness and acquaintance of the defendant's was attempting to retrieve suspected narcotics observed in plain view on the table. Finally, the Court held that no information obtained by officers who might have "lingered" in the house during the initial entry, nor after their re-entry after the ambulance departed, aided in securing the search warrant. Instead, the Court found that in obtaining a search warrant, the officers relied on information obtained permissibly and almost immediately upon entry into defendant's residence as the basis for the search warrant. The court added that to the extent that any officer might have exceeded the permissible scope of a security sweep, any such transgression led, at most, to the discovery of evidence that inevitably would have been discovered upon execution of the valid search warrant. (United States v. Crutchfield (8th Cir 2020) 979 F.3rd 614.)

In a case where officers had already arrested a hotel room's occupant (i.e., defendant) on an outstanding attempted kidnapping warrant, and where the room was dark, the officers saw movement, and they could not tell how many people were there, combined with the defendant's extensive criminal history, the court found that these facts gave the officers a reasonable belief that there might be others in the room who posed a danger to them. It was also noted that the search was "quick and limited," as it lasted approximately two minutes and was limited to looking only in places in which a person might be hiding. The court added that the officers did not exceed the scope of a protective sweep by checking under the mattress (which an illegal firearm was observed), given that one of the officers testified that, in his experience, fugitives sometimes hide there. (United States v. Whitehead (8th Cir. 2021) 995 F.3rd 624.)

> Note: The gun was later recovered following a consent search given by a co-occupant of the room, making the earlier observation of the gun of the gun a moot issue.

Following defendant's arrest in another's home, a 10-minute protective sweep of the house, including into the attic, was upheld where defendant was suspected of stealing several guns from a pawn shop in a burglary, committing a robbery, and possessing a handgun during a gunfight. Based on these facts, the Court reasoned that (1) defendant could have left guns in the house for another person to use against officers. (2) After announcing their presence, officers were forced to wait for eight minutes while the blinds on either side of the door moved and they heard movement, and possible preparation for an attack inside. (3) The officers thought that the defendant's girlfriend might be in the house. (4) After the homeowner, who had answered the door, was asked whether anyone else was still in the house, he was silent at first and then gave the odd, ambiguous answer that there was "nobody else" in the home "that he knew of." (5) Defendant was covered in dust and cobwebs, suggesting that he had just been in a dusty place like an attic or basement. The court held that these facts support the officers' reasonable belief that "someone else could be inside posing a danger to [officers] during or following the arrest." Finally, the court held that extending the sweep to the closet, and then to the attic after seeing the scuff mark on the wall of the closet was reasonable. The Court noted that sweeping a space that requires a boost or ladder to access, like an attic, is at the outer boundary of the protective sweep doctrine, but held that officers' conduct in this case was reasonable. (United States v. Thompson (8th Cir. MO, 2021) 6 F.4th 789.)

Under circumstances almost identical to Maryland v. Buie, supra, upon officers responding to a domestic violence call, defendant was found at the bottom of the stairs in the basement. Ordered to the top of the stairs with his hands in front of him, he was taken into custody at that point, and handcuffed. Officers then went into the basement to conduct a protective sweep. In a room immediately adjacent to the basement, officers found illegally possessed firearms and drugs. The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeal held that defendant had been arrested at the bottom of the basement stairs, even though not handcuffed until he came up the stairs. Thus, under the rule of Buie, the room adjacent to the basement was subject to a protective sweep without any cause having to be shown. (United States v. Ackerman (8th Cir. 2023) 87 F.4th 925.)

Limitation: Protective sweeps of the areas of the home beyond the immediate area (i.e., beyond any immediately adjoining rooms) of the arrest will not be upheld absent an articulable reason for believing someone in the home is present who constitutes a potential danger to the officers. (United States v. Furrow (9th Cir. 2000) 229 F.3rd 805; see also People v. Sanders (2003) 31 Cal.4th 318; United States v. Lemus (9th Cir. 2009) 582 F.3rd 958, 962; United States v. Lundin (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 1151, 1161; People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034, 1043.)

Areas immediately adjacent to the location of the arrest, such as closets and other spaces immediately adjoining the place of arrest from which an attack could be launched, may be searched without any cause to believe there may be people there. (See Maryland v. Buie, supra, at p. 334 [110 S.Ct. 1093; 108 L.Ed.2nd 276, 286]; and see "Searches Incident to Arrest," above.)

To search beyond the areas immediately adjacent to the location of an arrest, the courts have been lenient on the reasons, so long as it can be argued that the officer was reasonably in fear for his safety. (E.g.; See People v. Ledesma (2003) 106 Cal.App.4th 857; A Fourth Waiver search of a probationer's room, on probation for narcotics related offenses, when a resident appeared to be under the influence of drugs and others were known to be in the house during a prior contact.)

But the courts will not uphold a protective sweep where there are no specific articulable facts indicating the presence of someone who might be a danger to the officers. (E.g., see United States v. Chaves (11th Cir. 1999) 169 F.3rd 687, 692; United States v. Colbert (6th Cir. 1996) 76 F.3rd 773, 777-778; United States v. Delgado-Pérez (1st Cir. P.R. 2017) 867 F.3rd 244.)

> A "lack of knowledge cannot constitute the specific, articulable facts required by Buie." (United States v. Bagley (10th Cir. KS 2017) 877 F.3rd 1151.)

An exception to the probable cause requirement for entering and searching a residence is when an officer has a "reasonable belief" (or "reasonable suspicion") to believe that other people might be inside who constitute a danger to the officers or others at the scene. In such a case, the law allows a limited "protective sweep" to insure that no one might be there who constitutes such a danger. (People v. Ormonde (2006) 143 Cal.App.4th 282; entry into a residence following a domestic violence-related arrest out front held to be illegal when the officer only wanted to check to see if anyone might be there, with no reason to believe that there was.)

See also People v. Werner (2012) 207 Cal.App.4th 1195, 1205-1210, where it was held that an earlier incident of domestic violence does not indicate by itself that someone inside with weapons might be present. After defendant's arrest on the front porch, a warrantless entry under the theory of a protective sweep, with no articulable facts indicating the presence of anyone inside who might be a danger, held to be illegal.

> An officer's general experience that domestic violence incidents often involve danger to responding officers held to be insufficient to justify a protective sweep. (Id., at pp. 1208-1209.)

In Werner, the protective sweep argument was used by the Attorney General on appeal to justify an officer following a friend of the arrestee back into the house to retrieve personal items for the arrestee, during which excursion contraband was observed in plain sight. While such an entry was held to be an illegal protective sweep, given the lack of any articulable reason to believe there might be someone inside who constituted a danger, it was noted that the same is not true where it is the arrestee himself who is asking permission to go back into the residence. In such a circumstance, entering with the arrestee even without permission would be lawful. (Id. at p. 1210, fn. 9; citing Washington v. Chrisman (1982) 455 U.S. 1 [102 S.Ct. 812; 70 L.Ed.2nd 788].)

Also citing Washington v. Chrisman, supra, the federal Sixth Circuit Court of Appeal upheld an officer's plain sight observations of drugs and an illegal firearm (defendant admitting to being a convicted felon) when the officer followed (without permission) defendant to the back of his store, to his living quarters, where defendant went to retrieve his identification. The Court held that it did not matter whether defendant had impliedly consented to the officer's entry into the back room or not. The Court found that, by this point, the officer had a reasonable basis to conclude that the man was the person listed in an arrest warrant (defendant having admitted as much). It was therefore reasonable for the officer to monitor his movements inside the residence. (United States v. Baker (6th Cir. 2020) 976 F.3rd 636.)

Further, protective sweeps "may extend only to a cursory inspection of those spaces where a person may be found. The sweep lasts no longer than is necessary to dispel the reasonable suspicion of danger and in any event no longer than it takes to complete [the police action] and depart the premises. [fn. omitted]" (Maryland v. Buie, supra., at pp. 335-336 [110 S.Ct. 1093; 108 L.Ed.2nd at p. 287].)

A protective sweep is not justified by the fact that the defendant is arrested at the door holding a weapon absent evidence to believe that there is someone else inside who might constitute a threat to the officers. (United States v. Murphy (9th Cir. 2008) 516 F.3rd 1117, 1120-1121; protective sweep upheld, however, because there was a second outstanding suspect who might have been inside.)

The detention of two individuals found opening the garage of a residence where officers were present for reasons not explained in the record, where one of them (i.e., defendant) appeared to be nervous and wore baggie clothing apparently containing a number of unknown items, did not justify the detention of the individuals nor the patdown of defendant for weapons under the theory of a protective sweep. (United States v. Job (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 852, 860-862.)

Neither exigent circumstances nor the alleged need to conduct a protective sweep of defendant's residence was justified under the facts of this case where defendant had pointed a shotgun at his neighbors and was already under arrest when the officer entered the house to seize the shotgun. In order to show exigent circumstances based on a "risk of danger to police officers or others on the scene," a warrantless entry into a home "must be supported by probable cause to believe that a dangerous person will be found inside." The prosecution did not argue that defendant's wife—the only occupant—was a dangerous person. Also, the officer had no "articulable facts which, taken together with the rational inferences from those facts, warranted a reasonably prudent officer in believing that the area to be swept harbors an individual posing a danger to those on the arrest scene" (Citing Maryland v. Buie (1990) 494 U.S. 325, 334 [108 L. Ed.2nd 276, 110 S.Ct. 1093]). "As the officer testified at the suppression hearing, she saw no signs that defendant's wife posed a danger and had no information indicating to her that anyone else was in the home. The mere fact she could not exclude the possibility of a dangerous person in the home, without more, failed to justify a protective sweep. (See, e.g., People v. Celis (2004) 33 Cal.4th 667, at pp. 679–680 [protective sweep unjustified where officers had no information "'as to whether anyone was inside the house'" and no indication that anyone was armed]; People v. Werner (2012) 207 Cal.App.4th 1195, 1207 . . . [protective sweep unjustified where "there was no evidence that deputies were aware of any ongoing criminal activity in the home, or that there were others even present inside, let alone that it 'harbor[ed] a dangerous person'].)" (People v. Chen (2020) 50 Cal.App.5th 952, 955-958; the error in admitting the shotgun into evidence, however, found to be harmless under the circumstances.)

Defendant was charged with six drug distribution and firearms offenses in an eight-count indictment, arising from his involvement in extended criminal activity relating to drugs and firearms in Cumberland County, North Carolina. He moved to suppress evidence collected during his arrest as being in violation of the requirements of the "Protective Sweep" exception to Fourth Amendment's general search warrant mandate. The protective sweep in this case occurred after defendant was seized outside his residence, based on an arrest warrant, and the sweep constituted a three and-a-half-minute walkthrough of the residence. During the sweep, the officers observed, THC gummies and firearms. They used these observations to secure the residence while a search warrant was obtained. Armed with the search warrant, they conducted a thorough search of the residence and seized marijuana, tramadol, THC wax, eight loaded firearms, at least $65,000 in cash, and drug packaging materials. Defendant challenged the protective sweep as unconstitutional. In denying the motion to suppress, the district court rested its ruling on the proposition that the protective sweep of the residence was justified. Such a sweep can be justified when law officers have an interest "in taking steps to assure themselves that the house in which a suspect is being, or has just been, arrested is not harboring other persons who are dangerous and who could unexpectedly launch an attack." Recognizing that a protective sweep is on an adversary's turf, this exception to the warrant mandate requires "articulable facts which, taken together with the rational inferences from those facts, would warrant a reasonably prudent officer in believing that the area to be swept harbors an individual posing a danger to those on the arrest scene." The protective sweep exception requires more than a generalized worry of danger. That is, "a lack of information cannot provide an articulable basis upon which to justify a protective sweep." (See United States v. Jones (4th Cir. 2012) 667 F.3rd 477, 484.0 Here, the Government asserted that the facts available to the officers were sufficient to justify a reasonably prudent officer to believe that the residence had a dangerous person present. Those facts, as found by the district court include, that (1) the officers knew that defendant was involved in a large-scale drug-trafficking operation with multiple confederates who likely were armed. (2) The officers had found a firearm at the defendant's former residence, and thus had good reason to believe that this residence might contain firearms. (3) The officers saw that surveillance cameras covered the exterior of the residence, which reasonably suggested that those inside could be watching the officers. And (4), when the officers entered the residence, they were surprised by the presence of an unexpected person, which supported the proposition that other unknown persons could be there. In this situation, the officers knew that defendant was involved in an extended multi-party and multi-drug enterprise. The officers had been "climbing the ladder" and were up to the defendant. When defendant's compatriots were arrested, firearms were either found on their person or seized nearby. The Court also noted that it is "general knowledge that guns are common in drug transactions," and that "entrance into a situs of drug trafficking activity carries all too real dangers to law enforcement officers." In the case at hand, the protective sweep lasted for only three-and-a-half minutes. The officers engaged in a cursory inspection, looking only in locations where a human being might be hiding. (United States v. Everett (4th Cir. 2024) 91 F.4th 698.)

Arrests Outside of the House: Arresting a person immediately outside of the house, with cause to believe that there may be others inside who could constitute a danger to the officers, warrants a protective sweep of the house. (People v. Maier (1991) 226 Cal.App.3rd 1670, 1675; People v. Ledesma (2003) 106 Cal.App.4th 857, 864, fn. 3; United States v. Hoyos (9th Cir. 1989) 892 F.2nd 1387 [reversed on other grounds]; United States v. Wilson (5th Cir. 2001) 306 F.3rd 231, 238-239; United States v. Watson (5th Cir. 2001) 273 F.3rd 599, 603; Sharrar v. Felsing (3rd Cir. 1997) 128 F.3rd 823; United States v. Colbert (6th Cir. 1996) 76 F.3rd 773; United States v. Henry (D.C. Cir. 1995) 48 F.3rd 1282, 1284; United States v. Paopao (9th Cir. 2006) 469 F.2rd 760, 765; see also United States v. Pile (8th Cir. 2016) 820 F.3rd 314; United States v. Alatorre (8th Cir. 2017) 863 F.3rd 810.)

However, merely knowing that the defendant's wife and son live with him, but having no reason to believe they were dangerous or that they were even home at the time, is insufficient cause to do a protective sweep of the home after detaining the defendant immediately outside. (People v. Celis (2004) 33 Cal.4th 667, 676-680.)

Celis also raises, but does not answer the question, whether to make entry into the house to conduct the protective sweep after an arrest that occurs outside requires only a "reasonable suspicion" that persons are inside who constitute a threat to the officers, or whether full-blown "probable cause" is needed. (Id., at p. 678.)

But with defendant already arrested and secured (handcuffed and put into a patrol car), and with no reason to believe anyone else was in the house, a protective sweep was held not to be justified. (United States v. Lundin (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 1151, 1161.)

An exception to the probable cause requirement for entering and searching a residence is when an officer has a "reasonable belief" (or "reasonable suspicion") to believe that other people might be inside who constitute a danger to the officers or others at the scene.

In such a case, the law allows a limited "protective sweep" to insure that no one might be there who constitutes such a danger. (People v. Ormonde (2006) 143 Cal.App.4th 282.)

However, entry into a residence in this case, following a domestic violence-related arrest out front, was held to be illegal when the officer only wanted to check to see if anyone might be there, with no reason to believe that there was.

Detentions Outside of the House: The California Supreme Court left open the question of whether merely "detaining" someone outside the home will allow for a "protective sweep" of the home for dangerous suspects, absent "probable cause" to believe someone is in fact inside who constitutes a danger to the officers. (People v. Celis (2004) 33 Cal.4th 667, 680.)

The legality of making a protective sweep of a house where officers are lawfully in the house for some purpose other than to make an arrest was specifically left unanswered by the California Supreme Court. (People v. Celis, supra, at pp. 678-679.)

At least one other state has upheld such a protective sweep upon detaining a suspect outside on the front porch. (State v. Revenaugh (1999) 173 Idaho 774, 776-777.)

Commercial Establishments: A protective sweep of a commercial establishment (i.e., a gambling house) when an arrest is made outside has also been upheld where the officers had a "reasonable suspicion" that a second robbery suspect might be inside. (United States v. Paopao (9th Cir. 2006) 469 F.3rd 760, 765-767.)

Other Situations: Protective sweeps have also been upheld in situations other than with an arrest. For instance:

In conducting a Fourth Waiver search where the suspect was on probation for narcotics-related offenses, a resident appeared to be under the influence of drugs, and others were known to be in the house during a prior contact. (People v. Ledesma (2003) 106 Cal.App.4th 857.)

Officers lawfully inside the house with consent. (United States v. Gould (5th Cir. 2004) 364 F.3rd 578.)

A protective sweep by an officer left behind to secure a residence while a search warrant was being obtained is lawful. (United States v. Taylor (6th Cir. 2001) 248 F.3rd 506, 513.)

While executing a search warrant. (Drohan v. Vaughn (1st Cir. 1999) 176 F.3rd 17, 22.)

Protective sweep of a bedroom after the lessee had given consent to search other parts of an apartment. (United States v. Patrick (D.C. Cir. 1992) 959 F.2nd 991, 996-997.)

Some cases, however, have indicated that to be lawful, a protective sweep must follow a lawful arrest within the home. (See United States v. Davis (10th Cir. 2002) 290 F.3rd 1239, 1242, fn. 4; United States v. Reid (9th Cir. 2000) 226 F.3rd 1020, 1027.)

A protective sweep of a residence, where the resident is a parolee, is lawful with or without a suspicion that others might be present in that the whole house was subject to search anyway under the parolee's Fourth waiver conditions. (United States v. Lopez (9th Cir. 2007) 474 F.3rd 1208.)

The officers' protective sweep, which included an entry into the basement and an adjacent locked room, was held to be reasonable where the court noted that defendant had been in the basement just prior to his arrest and the locked room was connected to the area in which the officers arrested him. In addition, the officers knew that other people lived in the house, one firearm had already been found, and officers needed to investigate the large amount of drugs discovered on the basement floor and nearby loveseat. Based on these facts, the court concluded that the officers had a reasonable belief that the basement and locked room could harbor a person posing a danger to the officers in the house. (United States v. Coleman (8th Cir. AR 2018) 909 F.3rd 925.)

Plain Sight Observations:

Rule: Plain sight observations from a location the police officer has a legal right to be, are lawful and not considered to be a search. (People v. Block (1971) 6 Cal.3rd 239, 243; North v. Superior Court (1972) 8 Cal.3rd 301, 306.) Thus, evidence so observed when an officer is already lawfully inside, or otherwise may lawfully enter a residence or its curtilage, is subject to seizure.

Case Law:

Observations of contraband located within the curtilage of the defendant's home from a lawful position outside that curtilage are lawful. (People v. Channing (2000) 81 Cal.App.4th 985.)

Observation of defendant's growing marijuana plants from a neighbor's property, without the neighbor's knowledge or permission, looking into defendant's adjacent backyard, held to be lawful. Defendant did not have standing to challenge the trespass into the neighbor's yard, and did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in what was growing in his own yard, in that his marijuana plants were plainly visible. (People v. Claeys (2002) 97 Cal.App.4th 55.)

Observations of defendant retrieving contraband from a hole in the ground in the common area of an apartment complex, while the observing officers were standing on adjacent private property with the permission of the property's owner, were lawful. (People v. Shaw (2002) 97 Cal.App.4th 833.)

The observations of contraband within the "curtilage" of the defendant's home, while the officers were walking around the house in an attempt to find an occupant, was upheld. (United States v. Hammett (9th Cir. 2001) 236 F.3rd 1054.)

But see People v. Camacho (2000) 23 Cal.4th 824, where the California Supreme Court held that observations from the side of the residence, 40 feet from the sidewalk, with nothing there to indicate that the public was inferably invited to that side or to that close to the house, were unlawful, at least when the officers were checking nothing more than a complaint of loud music, it was late at night, and they failed to first try knocking at the front door.

> See also the dissent, at pp. 832 et seq., listing numerous federal circuit court decisions seemingly in disagreement with the rule of Camacho.

Observation of contraband in plain sight by police officers who made a warrantless entry into a residence, responding to an emergency call from someone in apparent distress, was lawful, and justified the obtaining of a search warrant to search the residence. (United States v. Snipe (9th Cir. 2008) 515 F.3rd 947.)

An officer standing on his tiptoes, adding about three inches to his height, in order to see over a six foot fence, was lawful.

Observation of a firearm behind the fence by so doing was a "plain sight observation." (People v. Chavez (2008) 161 Cal.App.4th 1493, 1499-1502.)

When evidence of a different crime is discovered during a lawful warrant search, even if the officers are participating in the search hoping to find evidence of a different crime for which there is not yet probable cause, such "plain sight" observations are lawful and may therefore be used to obtain a second search warrant and/or in the interrogation of the in-custody suspect. (People v. Carrington (2009) 47 Cal.4th 145, 160, 164-168, impliedly overruling People v. Albritton (1982) 138 Cal.App.3rd 79, which previously held such plain sight observations, unless totally "inadvertent," were unlawful.)

> In People v. Carrington, supra, officers from agency #2 accompanied officers from agency #1 who were executing a lawful search warrant in their own case. The officers from agency #2 were there for the purpose of making "plain sight" observations of evidence related to their agency's own investigation. Upon making such observations, this information was used to obtain a second warrant directed specifically at agency #2's investigation. This procedure was approved by the California Supreme Court.
> "Even assuming the officers (from the agency #2) . . . hoped to find evidence of other offenses, their subjective state of mind would not render their conduct unlawful. . . . The existence of an ulterior motivation does not invalidate an officer's legal justification to conduct a search." (Id., at p. 168; citing Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89], for the argument that an officer's subjective motivations for being on the search party are irrelevant so long as the search, viewed "objectively," is lawful.)

Observations made into the curtilage of the home from the defendants' driveway, when the driveway was an area accessible to the neighbors, were properly used to obtain a search warrant. The use of night vision goggles was irrelevant. (People v. Lieng (2010) 190 Cal.App.4th 1213.)

Evidence observed in plain view by officers entering a residence with the suspect's consent and with exigent circumstances, while the officers did a protective sweep and check for victims of a shooting, justified a later warrantless entry to seize and process that evidence so long as the police did not give up control of the premises. (People v. Superior Court* [Chapman] (2012) 204 Cal.App.4th 1004, 1014-1021.)

Plain sight observations of illegal guns and narcotics paraphernalia while lawfully in a person's home are lawful. (People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034, 1042, 1046-1047; which assumes the officers are in the home lawfully. If not (and they were not, in this case), such observations will be held to be illegal.)

Bloody clothing seen in plain view by officers from the hallway in a hospital that was on a hospital's trauma room floor, and it's later retrieval by investigators after defendant (with a gunshot wound he received during an attempted robbery) had been airlifted to another hospital, did not violate defendant's Fourth Amendment right to privacy. (United States v. Clancy (6th Cir. 2020) 979 F.3rd 1135.)

> As for the investigators' seizure of defendant's clothing, the Clancy Court held that the investigators had lawful access to defendant's clothes. The "lawful access" requirement ensures that police officers do not conduct warrantless entries and trespass onto private property just because they see incriminating evidence located there. In this case, the court found that no trespass occurred in the hospital room in that defendant had been airlifted to another hospital by the time the crime scene investigators seized his clothing from the trauma room. The Court added that even if defendant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in his hospital room while the being treated, this expectation of privacy did not continue after he left the hospital and hospital staff began preparing the room for new patients.

See "Plain Sight Observations," under "Warrantless Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 9), above.

Limitation: When a Search Warrant is Required:

A plain view observation of sizeable evidence from outside a residence, however, does not justify the warrantless entry into the residence to seize that evidence. Absent an exigency, a search warrant (or a free and voluntary consent) must be obtained before entering the residence. (Horton v. California (1990 496 U.S. 128, 137, fn. 7 [110 S.Ct. 2301; 110 L.Ed.2nd 112, 123]; United States v. Murphy (9th Cir. 2008) 516 F.3rd 1117, 1121; see also Soldal v.

Cook County (1992) 506 U.S. 56, 63-64 [113 S.Ct. 538; 121 L.Ed.2nd 450].)

Note: An "exigency" would likely be found in circumstances where an officer is observed by suspects making his plain sight observation. Under such a circumstance, an immediate entry, at least for the purpose of securing the scene pending the obtaining of a search warrant or consent, would likely be upheld. See "Preventing the Destruction of Evidence," below.)

The same rule holds true when a searchable item is observed from outside the curtilage of a home, and a warrantless entry into the curtilage is made for the purpose of uncovering that item (a stolen motorcycle parked in a driveway in this case) to verify that it is in fact the stolen motorcycle. (Collins v. Virginia (2018) 584 U.S. 586 [138 S.Ct. 1663; 201 L.Ed.2nd 9].)

The Court in Collins notes an exception to this rule when officers, observing a searchable vehicle on the street, follow the driver of that vehicle into the curtilage of a home. Under these unique circumstances, the "automobile exception" would allow for the warrantless search of the vehicle. (See Scher* v. *United States (1938) 305 U.S. 251 [59 S.Ct. 174; 83 L.Ed. 151].)

Contraband observed through the open door of a motel room while arresting the defendant just outside, may be seized. But a search warrant must be used, or probable cause and exigent circumstances must be found, or the suspect's consent must be obtained, in order to lawfully search of the rest of the room. (People v. LeBlanc (1998) 60 Cal.App.4th 157.)

Preserving the Peace:

Rule: The lawfulness of a warrantless entry into a residence was upheld by the United States Supreme Court, at least when there was a fight going on inside the residence and the officers had "an objectively reasonable basis for believing" that immediate action was necessary in order to prevent someone from being seriously injured. (Brigham City v. Stuart (2006) 547 U.S. 398 [126 S.Ct. 1943; 164 L.Ed.2nd 650], a case appealed from a decision of the Utah Supreme Court finding the entry to be a violation of the Fourth Amendment.)

"[L]aw enforcement officers may enter a home without a warrant to render emergency assistance to an injured occupant or to protect an occupant from imminent injury." (City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan (2015) 575 U.S. 600, 612 [135 S.Ct. 1765; 191 L.Ed.2nd 856]; quoting Brigham City v. Stuart, supra, at p. 403.)

Case Law:

A warrantless entry into a residence when necessary to "preserve the peace" in the execution of a restraining order, allowing the defendant's daughter to retrieve certain property, was held to be lawful. Reasonable force was also properly used when necessary to effectively preserve the peace. (Henderson v. City of Simi Valley (9th Cir. 2002) 305 F.3rd 1052.)

Officers responding to a call of a disturbance, finding a pickup truck in the driveway which had apparently been in an accident, blood on the truck and on clothes in the truck, broken windows in the house, and defendant, barricaded inside, screaming and throwing things. Defendant had a visible cut on his hand. One officer forced his way in and defendant pointed a rifle at him. Noting that, "(i)t requires only 'an objective reasonable basis for believing' that 'a person within [the house] is in need of immediate aid,'" and that the officer was acting reasonably when he made the warrantless entry into defendant's home, the Court found the entry to be lawful. (Citations Omitted; Michigan v. Fisher (2009) 558 U.S. 45 [130 S.Ct. 546; 175 L.Ed.2nd 410].)

> "Officers do not need ironclad proof of 'a likely serious, life-threatening' injury to invoke the emergency aid exception (to the warrant requirement." Also, the officer's subjective motivations for entering were irrelevant, the test being an objection one. (Id., at p. 49.)
> Also, the Court noted the reality of such a situation when a police officer is forced to decide what to do:
> > "It does not meet the needs of law enforcement or the demands of public safety to require officers to walk away from a situation like the one they encountered here. Only when an apparent threat has become an actual harm can officers rule out innocuous explanations for ominous circumstances. But '[t]he role of a peace officer includes preventing violence and restoring order, not simply rendering first aid to casualties.' (Citing Brigham City, supra, at p. 406.)" (Ibid.)

Note: While the Supreme Court in neither Brigham City v. Stuart nor Fisher used the label, it can be argued that these cases are consistent with the "community caretaking doctrine" theory of conducting a warrantless entry into the respective residences. (See below.)

Entry into a unlocked side door of a house after finding a car with its engine running in the driveway, and with no one responding to knocking at the front door, out of concern that someone inside may be possibly unconscious and in need of help, was held to be illegal. (People v. Smith (2020) 46 Cal.App.5th 375, 385-392.)

Preventing the Destruction of Evidence: A warrantless entry into a residence for the purpose of preventing the destruction of evidence may be lawful, depending upon what the evidence is. (Kentucky v. King (2011) 563 U.S. 452, 460 [179 L. Ed.2nd 865; 131 S.Ct. 1849]; People v. Huber (1965) 232 Cal.App.2nd 663; Ker v. California (1963) 374 U.S. 23, 40-41 [83 S.Ct. 1623; 10 L.Ed.2nd 726].)

Rule: "Probable cause" to believe that evidence will "imminent(ly)" be destroyed (or a suspect will escape) will justify a warrantless entry into a residence. (People v. Strider (2009) 177 Cal.App.4th 1393; entry into a residence while chasing a subject with a firearm in his pocket, a potential violation of P.C. § 12031(a)(1) (loaded firearm in public; now P.C. § 25850(a)), held to be illegal in that the front yard defendant was in was not a "public place" under the circumstances, as required by the statute.)

Case Law:

A three-minute sweep of a house to check for persons reasonably believed to be in the house who might destroy evidence in a homicide case was held to be lawful. (People v. Seaton (2001) 26 Cal.4th 598.)

Where it appears that confederates of a person arrested for selling narcotics will learn of the arrest and destroy or secret contraband still in the house, it is lawful to secure the house pending the obtaining of a search warrant. (Ferdin v. Superior Court (1974) 36 Cal.App.3rd 774, 781; People v. Freeny (1974) 37 Cal.App.3rd 20.)

With "probable cause" to believe that contraband is contained in a particular residence, and a "reasonable belief" that if the house is not immediately secured the evidence will be destroyed, officers may enter to secure the house pending the obtaining of a search warrant or a consent to do a complete search. (United States v.

Alaimalo (9th Cir. 2002) 313 F.3rd 1188; see also Sandoval v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't. (9th Cir. 2014) 756 F.3rd 1154, 1161; Sialoi v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2016) 823 F.3rd 1238.)

Differentiating Felony vs. Misdemeanor cases:

The entry by police into a residence in pursuit of a felony suspect has long since been upheld as lawful. (See United States v. Santana (1976) 427 U. S. 38 [96 S.Ct. 2406; 49 L.Ed.2nd 300].)

A warrantless entry into a residence in pursuit of a fleeing misdemeanant, however, can be an issue.

The U.S. Supreme Court has specifically noted that; "(i)n misdemeanor cases, flight does not always supply the exigency that this Court has demanded for a warrantless home entry," given the many other possible reasons—not necessarily involving an exigency—why a misdemeanor suspect has fled into his home. (Lange v. California (June 23, 2021) __ U.S.__, __ [141 S.Ct. 2011; 219 L.Ed.2nd 486].)

On remand, California's First District Court of Appeal (Div. 5) held that under the good faith exception to the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule, it was not necessary to suppress evidence from an officer's warrantless entry into defendant's garage after the officer observed defendant blaring loud music and honking unnecessarily and defendant, rather than pulling over, drove up his driveway and into his attached garage. When the police conduct a search in objectively reasonable reliance on binding appellate precedent, the exclusionary rule does not apply. (People v. Lange (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 1114.)

Entering a house without consent to take a suspected DUI driver into custody and to remove him from the house for identification and arrest by a private citizen who saw defendant's driving, and to preserve evidence of his blood/alcohol level, has been held to be legal by the California Supreme Court. (People v. Thompson (2006) 38 Cal.4th 811.)

Note: The Court differentiated on its facts Welsh v. Wisconsin (1984) 466 U.S. 740 [104 S.Ct. 2091; 80

L.Ed.2nd 732], where it was held that a first time DUI, being no more than a civil offense with a $200 fine under Wisconsin law, was not aggravated enough to allow for a warrantless entry into a residence to arrest the perpetrator. The cut off between a minor and a serious offense seems to be whether or not the offense is one for which incarceration is a potential punishment. (People v. Thompson, supra, at pp. 821-824, citing Illinois v. McArthur (2001) 531 U.S. 326, 336, 337 [121 S.Ct. 946; 148 L.Ed.2nd 838].)

See also People v. Hampton (1985) 164 Cal.App.3rd 27, 34: A warrantless entry was upheld to prevent the destruction of evidence (the blood/alcohol level) and there was reason to believe defendant intended to resume driving. Welsh can be distinguished by the simple fact that California treats DUI cases as serious misdemeanors as well as the defendant, in Welsh, no longer had his car available to him.

But the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, arguing against the continuing validity of Welsh, has held that California's interpretation under Thompson is wrong, and that a warrantless entry into a home to arrest a misdemeanor driving–while-under-the-influence suspect is a Fourth Amendment violation. (Hopkins v. Bonvicino (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 752, 768-769; finding that the commission of a misdemeanor "will seldom, if ever, justify a warrantless entry into the home.")

In Sims v. Stanton (9th Cir. 2013) 706 F.3rd 954 (certiorari granted), the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that entering the curtilage of a home in pursuit of a suspect with the intent to detain him when the subject is ignoring the officer's demands to stop—at worst a misdemeanor violation of P.C. § 148—is illegal. The warrantless fresh or hot pursuit of a fleeing suspect into a residence (or the curtilage of a residence) is limited to felony suspects only. The United States Supreme Court, however, reversed this decision in Stanton v. Sims (2013) 571 U.S. 3 [134 S.Ct. 3; 187 L.Ed.2nd 341].

The Ninth Circuit's decision was, again, based upon the Court's interpretation of the United States Supreme Court decision in Welsh v. Wisconsin (1984) 466 U.S. 740 [104 S.Ct. 2091; 80 L.Ed.2nd 732], and conflicts with the California Supreme Court's reasoning in People v.

> Thompson (2006) 38 Cal.4th 811 (see "Warrantless entry to arrest a DUI (i.e., "Driving while Under the Influence") suspect," above).
> However, the United States Supreme Court, in discussing its own decision on Welsh, noted that they only held there that a warrantless entry into a residence for a minor offense not involving hot pursuit was an exception to the normal rule that a warrant is "usually" going to be required. Per the Court, there is no rule that residential entries involving hot pursuit are limited to felony cases. In this case, there was a "hot pursuit." (Stanton v. Sims, supra, citing Welsh, at p. 750.)

See also United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2001) 256 F.3rd 895, 908, fn. 6; "In situations where an officer is truly in hot pursuit and the underlying offense is a felony, the Fourth Amendment usually yields. (Citation) However, in situations where the underlying offense is only a misdemeanor, law enforcement must yield to the Fourth Amendment in all but the 'rarest' cases." (Citing Welsh v. Wisconsin (1984) 466 U.S. 740, 753 [104 S.Ct. 2091; 80 L.Ed.2nd 732], and failing to discuss what those "rarest (of) cases" might be.)."

Officers entering a home on a loud music complaint was upheld despite the Supreme Court's holding in Welsh, ruling that the situation was more akin to a "community caretaking" issue than the one where it was necessary to find an exigent circumstance. (United States v. Rohrig (6th Cir. 1996) 98 F.3rd 1506.)

In the case of a non-bookable infraction, however, California tends to agree with the Ninth Circuit's reasoning:

> Entering a residence with probable cause to believe only that the non-bookable offense of possession of less than an ounce of marijuana is occurring (H&S § 11357(b)), is closer to the Welsh situation, and a violation of the Fourth Amendment when entry is made without consent or a warrant. (People v. Hua (2008) 158 Cal.App.4th 1027; People v. Torres et al. (2012) 205 Cal.App.4th 989, 993-998.)
>
> > The Torres Court also rejected as "speculation" the People's argument that there being four people in the defendants' hotel room indicted that a "marijuana-smoking party" was occurring, which probably involved a bookable amount of marijuana. (People v. Torres et al., supra, at p. 996.)

Community Caretaking:

Does Community Caretaking Apply to Residences?

Up until recently, there has been some debate whether the "community caretaking" theory applies to anything other than vehicles. (See Ray v. Township of Warren (3rd Cir. 2010) 626 F.3rd 170, 175-177.) However, California and the Ninth Circuit, at least up until now (see below), have both used the community caretaking argument to justify warrantless entries of residences on various occasions. (See People v. Ray (1999) 21 Cal.4th 464; United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2000) 219 F.3rd 882, 888-890; Martin v. City of Oceanside (9th Cir. 2004) 360 F.3rd 1078, 1081-1083; United States v. Russell (9th Cir. 2006) 436 F.3rd 1086; United States v Snipe (9th Cir. 2008) 515 F.3rd 947, 951-952.)

History:

The California Supreme Court:

The California Supreme Court has recognized that the U.S. Supreme Court has never used the term "community caretaking" in its residential search cases. "(T)he United States Supreme Court has never applied the concept of a community caretaking search outside the context of an automobile inventory." (People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034, 1049.)

The Ovieda Court cites Cady v. Dombrowski (1973) 413 U.S. 433 [37 L.Ed.2nd 706; 93 S.Ct. 2523], at pp. 1049-1051, as an example of the United States Supreme Court's belief that community caretaking does not apply to residences, noting the use of the community caretaking theory in the case of a vehicle, stressing the differences between the privacy aspects of a vehicle searches and residential searches:

> "Because of the extensive regulation of motor vehicles and traffic, and also because of the frequency with which a vehicle can become disabled or involved in an accident on public highways, the extent of police-citizen contact involving automobiles will be substantially greater than police-citizen contact in a home or office. … Local police officers, unlike federal officers, frequently investigate vehicle accidents in which there is no claim of criminal liability and engage in what, for want of a better term, may be described as community caretaking functions, totally divorced from the detection, investigation, or acquisition of evidence relating to the violation of a criminal statute." (Pg. 1050.)

The United States Supreme Court:

Although the U.S. Supreme Court never used the phrase "community caretaking, it has upheld warrantless entries into residences where there is "an objectively reasonable basis for believing" that immediate action was necessary in order to prevent someone from being seriously injured. (See Brigham City v. Stuart, supra; Michigan v. Fisher (2009) 558 U.S. 45 [130 S.Ct. 546; 175 L.Ed.2nd 410]; and Caniglia v. Strom (May 17, 2021) __ U.S. __, __ (concurring opinion) [141 S.Ct. 1596; 209 L.Ed.2nd 604]; United States v. Sanders (8th Cir. IA 2021) 4 F.4th 672; and see below.)

See "United States Supreme Court," below.

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has used "Community Caretaking" to justify residential warrantless entries:

> Under the "emergency exception," an officer may enter a home without a warrant to investigate an emergency that threatens life or limb so long as there is "objectively reasonable grounds to believe that an emergency exists and that his immediate response is needed." The Court noted that this exception derives from a police officer's "community caretaking function." The other possible exception to the warrant requirement is known as the "exigency exception," which stems from the officer's investigatory function. Under this theory, an officer may enter a residence without a warrant if he has "probable cause to believe that a crime has been or is being committed and a reasonable belief that his entry is needed to stop the destruction of evidence or a suspect's escape or to carry out other crime prevention or law enforcement efforts." Both exceptions require that the officer have an objectively reasonable belief that the circumstances justify an immediate entry. (Espinosa v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2010) 598 F.3rd 528, 534-536; see also Sandoval v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't. (9th Cir. 2014) 756 F.3rd 1154, 1161; Sialoi v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2016) 823 F.3rd 1238, Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 878-879.)
> The Ninth Circuit has also applied the community caretaking theory, along with the conclusion that exigent circumstances applied, to the warrantless seizure of firearms from the home of a person taken into custody pursuant to Welf. & Insti. Code § 5150. "A seizure of a firearm in the possession or control of a person who has been detained because of an acute mental health episode likewise responds to an immediate threat to community safety. We believe the same factors at issue in the context of emergency exception home entries and vehicle impoundments—(1) the public safety interest; (2) the urgency of that public interest; and (3) the individual property, liberty, and privacy interests—must be balanced, based on all of the facts available to an objectively reasonable officer, when asking whether such a seizure of a firearm falls within an exception to the warrant requirement." In balancing these factors, the Court held that the warrantless seizure of the mental patient's firearms (plus one owned separately by his wife) was lawful. (Rodriguez v. City of San Jose (9th Cir. 2019) 930 F.3rd 1123, 1136-1141; limiting its conclusions to the specific facts of this case, and noting that the appellant had failed to establish that the telephonic search warrant procedure would have sufficed to insure that a warrant could be obtained before her mentally [Welf. & Inst. Code § 5150] committed husband might return.)

See also United States v Snipe (9th Cir. 2008) 515 F.3rd 947, 951-952. While the Ninth Circuit here doesn't use the term "community caretaking," it does take the rules as announced in United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2017) 859 F.3rd 1175, and modifies the elements of the doctrine based upon the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Brigham City v. Stuart (2006) 547 U.S. 398 [126 S.Ct. 1943; 164 L.Ed.2nd 650].

Other Federal Circuits have gone both ways on this issue:

The First Circuit Court of Appeals:

See Caniglia v. Strom (1st Cir. 2020) 953 F.3rd 112 (Certiorari granted), where the federal First Circuit Court of Appeal held that (1) the "community caretaking" theory did in fact apply to residences, and (2) that entering the plaintiff's residence to seize his firearms and ammunition while he was being evaluated for mental issues at a local mental facility was lawful as a function of the officers' community caretaking responsibilities where plaintiff was reported to have talked about suicide, he had guns in the house, it was believed that he could be released from the hospital at any time, and the officers searched only where they were told by plaintiff's wife that the guns were located.

> This decision was reversed in Caniglia v. Strom (May 17, 2021) __ U.S. __, __ (concurring opinion) [141 S.Ct. 1596; 209 L.Ed.2nd 604]. See "United States Supreme Court," below.

The federal First Circuit again upheld a warrantless entry into a residence, done for the purpose of locating the owners of that residence in which a loud party was in progress, in order to have the owners quiet the party, as well as to check on the welfare of under aged drinkers. The court concluded that any expectation of privacy in the home was greatly diminished given the open front door, the evident lack of supervision by the homeowner(s) of guests trafficking in and out of the home, and the owner's failure to respond to the officers. As a result, the court held that it under the Community Caretaking doctrine, it was reasonable for the officers to enter the apartment through the open front door and attempt to locate the homeowner to address these issues. (Castagna v. Jean (1st Cir. 2020) 955 F.3rd 211.)

The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals:

The "community caretaking" theory was held to justify officers entering a home on a loud music complaint. In balancing (1) whether immediate government action was required, (2) whether the governmental interest was sufficiently compelling to justify a warrantless intrusion, and (3) whether the defendant's expectation of privacy was diminished in some way by his actions of generating the loud music, the Court ruled that a warrantless entry to address the problem of the loud music was reasonable. (United States v. Rohrig (6th Cir. 1996) 98 F.3rd 1506.)

> In so ruling, the Sixth Circuit cites the California Supreme Court case of People v. Lanthier (1971) 5 Cal.3rd 751, where the warrantless search of a college student's locker was upheld when it was noted that a "noxious odor" was emanating from it, much to the discomfort of the other students. The "ongoing nuisance" justified a warrantless intrusion into the student's locker.

Subsequently, however, the Sixth Circuit seems to have had second thoughts whether "community caretaking" applies to residences. (See United States v. Williams (6th Cir. 2003) 354 F.3rd 497, 508; "(D)espite references to the doctrine in Rohrig, we doubt that community caretaking will generally justify warrantless entries into private homes.")

The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals:

Under the "Community Caretaking Function," a police officer may enter a residence without a warrant, as a community caretaker, where the officer has a reasonable belief that an emergency exists that requires his attention. In addition, the "reasonable belief" standard "is a less exacting standard than probable cause." Finally, a search or seizure under the community caretaking function is reasonable if the governmental interest in law enforcement's exercise of that function, based on specific and articulable facts, outweighs the individual's interest in freedom from government intrusion. (United States v. Smith (8th Cir. 2016) 820 F.3rd 356; upholding the warrantless entry into a residence for the purpose of checking for a person the officers reasonably believed was being held by defendant against her will.)

The Eighth Circuit also held that the warrantless entry into a house was reasonable under the Community Caretaking exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement, noting that this Circuit has applied community caretaking to residences since 2006, allowing a police officer to "enter a residence without a warrant as a community caretaker where the officer has a reasonable belief that an emergency exists requiring his or her attention." In this case, officers responded to a 911 call from the grandmother of an 11-year-old child who had called her grandmother, complaining that her mother and the mother's boyfriend were fighting. Upon arrival, and in contacting the mother, despite her telling the officers that everything was okay, the officers noted that she was visibly upset and had red marks on her face and neck. Upon hearing someone inside crying, the officers make entry into the residence to check the welfare of those inside. Once inside, information from the 11-year-old daughter led the officers to believe that defendant might be in possession of a firearm; a fact verified by the mother. Limiting the search to those areas where the daughter and the mother said the gun might be, the gun was found in the cushions of the couch. Defendant, charged with being in illegal possession of a firearm, moved to suppress. The Court held that based on the facts known to the officers, it was reasonable for the officers to believe that an emergency situation existed that required their immediate attention by entering the residence to ensure that no one inside was injured or in danger. The "Community Caretaking" theory allowed for such an entry. Then, with probable cause to believe defendant was in illegal possession of a firearm, the warrantless search for the firearm, limited to those areas where it was suspected to be, was lawful. (United States v. Sanders (8th Cir. 2020) 956 F.3rd 534.)

California's lower courts have not applied Community Caretaking to residences:

The "community caretaking function" has been held to be inapplicable to the situation where police officers make a warrantless entry into a mental patient's home after his detention for a mental evaluation per W&I § 5150, despite the fact that W&I § 8102(a) commands a peace officer to confiscate firearms and other deadly weapons in such a situation. (People v. Sweig (2008) 167 Cal.App.4th 1145; petition granted.)

The Sweig Court also found, however, that a search warrant is not permitted under P.C. § 1524 (see "Statutory Grounds for Issuance (P.C. § 1524(a))," under "Searches with a Search Warrant" (Chapter 10, above) when the defendant is detained pursuant to H&S § 5150 only. The Court suggested that the Legislature should fix the problem with a legislative amendment to Section 1524.

The California Supreme Court granted a petition in Sweig, making it unavailable for citation pending the Court's decision.

As a result of Sweig, however, the California Legislature amended P.C. § 1524, effective January 1, 2010, adding a number of additional grounds for obtaining a search warrant, including to recover firearms and other deadly weapons where a person has been committed for observation pursuant to H&S § 5150.

The "community caretaking" theory was also found to be inapplicable when officers entered the defendant's locked-off property based upon little more than a neighbor's unsubstantiated belief that the defendants might have been the victims of a "drug rip-off" the night before. Finding a small amount of marijuana debris at the edge of the defendants' property and a small depression leading under the fence was not legally sufficient. Also, the officers appeared more concerned with investigating allegations that the defendants were cultivating marijuana. The community caretaking theory is inapplicable when the police act to solve crime as opposed to coming to the aid of persons. (People v. Morton (2003) 114 Cal.App.4th 1039.)

The Fourth District Court of Appeal, in People v. Smith (2020) 46 Cal.App.5th 375, at p. 385, rejected the applicability of the community caretaking theory for justifying an officer's warrantless entry into a residence after finding an unoccupied car with its engine running in the driveway and with no one responding to the officers' knocking at that front door. (Citing People v. Ovieda (2018) 19 Cal.App.5th 614, below.)

> Also note that the Fourth District Court of appeal, in People v. Smith (at pp. 390-392) declined to apply the "good faith" exception to a warrantless entry into a residence based upon no more than the fact that a vehicle was left out front with the engine running, and no one answered the door upon the officers knocking. Rejecting the People's argument that the officer was using the rational of People v. Ray, applying the "community caretaking" theory to warrantless residential entries, the Court here noted that because Ray was only a "plurality" opinion, it was not binding precedent. Reliance on the rule in Ray, therefore, does not trigger the "good faith" exception. (Citing People v. Karis (1988) 46 Cal.3d 612, 632.)

Final Resolution: The California Supreme Court finally resolved the issue, so far as California courts are concerned:

> In People v. Ray (1999) 21 Cal.4th 464, a "plurality" (short of a "majority") of the California Supreme Court ruled that under the so-called "emergency aid doctrine," which is a subcategory of a law enforcement officer's "community caretaking" duties, a warrantless entry into a residence may be allowed whenever police officers "reasonably believe" someone inside is in need of assistance or action must be taken to preserve the occupant's property.

> "The appropriate standard under the community caretaking exception is one of reasonableness: Given the known facts, would a prudent and reasonable officer have perceived a need to act in the proper discharge of his or her community caretaking functions?" (Id. at pp. 476-477.)
> Three justices in Ray found the "emergency aid doctrine" to be a subcategory of the "community caretaking" rationale, and not a form of "exigent circumstance." (People v. Ray, supra, at p. 471.) Three concurring justices found such a situation to come within the standard "exigent circumstance" rationale. (Id., at p. 480.)

People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034: The California Supreme Court finally ruled that the "community caretaking" doctrine does not apply at all to residences, overruling a contrary split decision out of the Second District Court of Appeal (see People v. Ovieda (2018) 19 Cal.App.5th 614, 619-623; petition granted.), as well as its own contrary plurality ruling in People v. Ray, supra. (People v. Ovieda at pp. 1044-1053; concluding that "no such exception exists (as it relates to searches of residences) and that the Ray lead opinion was wrong to create one," noting that the community caretaking theory applies only to vehicles.)

> "(T)o the extent the lead opinion in Ray authorized warrantless entry into a private home for community caretaking in circumstances short of an emergency, Ovieda disapproved it." (People v. Rubio (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 342, 351.)

The United States Supreme Court:

The United States Supreme Court finally resolved this issue once and for all in Caniglia v. Strom (May 17, 2021) __ U.S. __ [141 S.Ct. 1596; 209 L.Ed.2nd 604], where it specifically held that the federal First Circuit Court of Appeal in Caniglia v. Strom (1st Cir. 2020) 953 F.3rd 112

(see above), inappropriately expanded its community caretaking theory—first established by the Supreme Court for purposes of justifying a warrantless search of an impounded vehicle for an unsecured firearm, in Cady v. Dombrowski (1973) 413 U.S. 433 [37 L.Ed.2nd 706; 93 S.Ct. 2523]—to residences. The Court clearly and unequivocally rejected the argument that, "Cady*'s acknowledgment of these 'caretaking' duties creates a standalone doctrine that justifies warrantless searches and seizures in the home." (Id., at p. __.)

Conclusion:

Based upon the decisions of People v. Ovieda and Caniglia v. Strom, supra, it can definitively be said that the Community Caretaking exception to the Fourth Amendment requirement applies only to vehicles. (Coalition on Homelessness v. City and County of San Francisco (2023) 93 Cal.App.5th 928, 941: "Based on those recent and authoritative pronouncements, it would be inaccurate to state there is a recognized 'community caretaking' exception to the warrant requirement. Instead, there is only a recognized vehicular community caretaking exception.") (Italics in original.)

Emergency Aid Exception:

General Rule:

"The emergency aid exception to the warrant requirement allows police to 'enter a home without a warrant when they have an objectively reasonable basis for believing that an occupant is seriously injured or imminently threatened with such injury.'" (People v. Rubio (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 342, 349, quoting Brigham City v. Stuart (2006) 547 U.S. 398, 400 [164 L.Ed.2nd 650; 126 S. Ct. 1943], and citing People v. Troyer (2011) 51 Cal.4th 599, 606.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal:

In earlier cases, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal applied a three-point standard in order to employ what the Court referred to as the "emergency aid" exception to the Fourth Amendment as a function of law enforcement's "community caretaking function," and required a finding of three circumstances to be applicable:

- The police must have "reasonable grounds" to believe that there is an emergency at hand and an immediate need for their assistance for the protection of life or property; and

- The search must not be primarily motivated by an intent to arrest and seize evidence; and

- There must be some reasonable basis, "approximating probable cause," to associate the emergency with the area or place to be searched.

  (United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2000) 219 F.3rd 882, 888-890; Martin v. City of Oceanside (9th Cir. 2004) 360 F.3rd 1078, 1081-1083; United States v. Martinez (9th Cir. 2005) 406 F.3rd 1160; United States v. Russell (9th Cir. 2006) 436 F.3rd 1086.)

However, in United States v Snipe (9th Cir. 2008) 515 F.3rd 947, 951-952, the Ninth Circuit modified these rules in light of Brigham City v. Stuart (2006) 547 U.S. 398 [126 S.Ct. 1943; 164 L.Ed.2nd 650] (see below) and Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89], deleting altogether the officers' subjective motivations as being irrelevant, and finding only as necessary a "objectively reasonable basis for concluding that an emergency is unfolding in the place to be entered." (See below.)

Now, the Ninth Circuit finds the following factors to be necessary: Whether (1) considering the totality of the circumstances, law enforcement had an objectively reasonable basis for concluding that there was an immediate need to protect others or themselves from serious harm, and (2) the search's scope and manner were reasonable to meet the need. (United States v Snipe, supra., at p. 952; see also Hopkins v. Bonvicino (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 752, 763, fn. 5.)

"[T]he exigency doctrine is inapplicable because the officer did not believe that evidence of a crime would be found inside the house. When the domestic violence victim is still in the home, circumstances may justify an entry pursuant to the exigency doctrine. In Brooks, we applied the exigency doctrine to allow entry when loud fighting had been heard, the officers saw the room in disarray, and the victim was still on the premises but not visible to the officers. As we noted in that case, the officers had probable cause to suspect evidence of crime and had an exigent need to enter the premises to make sure that the victim was safe. Here, in contrast, the victim had left the premises and the officer did not have probable cause to believe there was contraband or evidence of a crime in the house." (United States v. Martinez (9th Cir. 2005) 406 F.3rd 1160, 1164; referencing United States v. Brooks (9th Cir. 2004) 367 F.3rd 1128.)

A police officer's entry into a residence, motivated out of a concern for the welfare of a nine-year-old child who the officers suspected had been left home alone at night, was lawful under the so-called "emergency doctrine," which is derived from the officers' "community caretaking function." The "emergency doctrine" is an exception to the Fourth Amendment's restrictions on warrantless residential entries, and "may be justified by the need to protect life or avoid serious injury." (United States v. Bradley (9th Cir. 2003) 321 F.3rd 1212.)

The "Emergency Aid" exception to the search warrant requirement has been understood to permit law enforcement officers to enter a home without a warrant to render emergency assistance to an injured occupant or to protect an occupant or other officers from imminent injury. There has to be a "reasonable basis" for concluding that there is an imminent threat of violence to the occupants to justify this exception to the search warrant requirement. The government bears the burden of showing specific and articulable facts to justify invoking this exception. (Sandoval v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't. (9th Cir. 2014) 756 F.3rd 1154, 1163-1165; finding the officers' warrantless entry into the residence under the circumstances of this case, where there was no probable cause to believe a burglary was occurring, and where the observed occupants were attempting to comply with the officers' commands, to be illegal.)

Making a warrantless entry into defendant's residence and bedroom where the officer believed that defendant may be concealing a victim inside was held to be reasonable. Although defense counsel was legally ineffective for not having made a motion to suppress the weapons and ammunition found therein ("There was at least a chance that such a motion would have succeeded."), the state habeas courts were not unreasonable in denying the writ in that although the officer inarticulately referred to the entry as a "protective sweep," the "emergency aid doctrine" arguably allowed for the warrantless entry. (Mahrt v. Beard (9th Cir. 2017) 849 F.3rd 1164, 1171-1172.)

Where the victim of alleged domestic violence is no longer in the house, and the defendant is left alone inside and in no apparent need of assistance, the emergency aid doctrine is not applicable. There was at least a triable issue of fact for a civil jury as to whether entry into the house by police was lawful. (Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 876-878.)

"Pursuant to the emergency exception, police need not obtain a search warrant to enter a dwelling if '(1) considering the totality of the circumstances, law enforcement had an objectively reasonable basis for concluding that there was an immediate need to protect others or themselves from serious harm; and (2) the search's scope and manner were reasonable to meet the need.'" (United States v. Holiday (9th Cir. 2021) 998 F.3rd 888, 892-894; quoting United States v. Snipe (9th Cir. 2008) 515 F.3rd 947, 952; and finding that although the police had information suggesting that a child was in need of assistance and was in a blue Jaguar registered to defendant's address, they had no reason to believe that the child was in defendant's home.

The California Courts' Analysis:

Police responded to a report that two gunshots had been fired within a residence. When they approached and knocked on the door, an officer "heard from within the residence what sounded to be like a shotgun being chambered." The Court upheld the warrantless entry in that the police had evidence that shots had just been fired inside the home and that somebody inside was again preparing to use a firearm even as the police stood by outside. (People v. Stamper (1980) 106 Cal.App.3rd 301, 304.)

Where the police responded to a report of a robbery at an address where a victim "was believed to be injured and bleeding." Officers responding to the scene observed blood outside the defendant's apartment building and outside his apartment door. Also, a witness "confirmed that an injured person was inside the apartment." The Court held that these facts gave officers sufficient reason to enter in search of injured persons. (Tamborino v. Superior Court (1986) 41 Cal.3rd 919.)

Responding to a radio call concerning a male being shot several times, and finding a wounded female and an injured male on the front porch, with blood on the front entrance indicating someone with injuries either entered or exited the residence, without any other way to determine whether the reported male with a gunshot wound might be in the house requiring aid, forcing entry into the residence (conceded by the parties) and then into a locked upstairs bedroom (the issue in the case) was lawful under the "emergency aid doctrine." Also, for the protection of the police, not knowing where the shooter(s) might be, forcing entry into the bedroom to make sure the suspects weren't there was also reasonable for the officers' protection as they conducted an investigation. (People v. Troyer (2011) 51 Cal.4th 599.)

> The Court further rejected defendant's argument that the officers needed "probable cause" to believe someone inside needed aid. The test, citing Brigham City v. Stuart, supra, at p. 400, is merely having an "objectively reasonable basis for believing that an occupant is seriously injured or imminently threatened with injury." (Id. at pp. 606-607.)
> The Court rejected the dissenting justices' conclusion that there were other reasonable, innocent explanations for what the police first found. It is not the officers' responsibility to eliminate the possibility of other reasonable explanations, but rather to act on the reasonable belief that additional victims who need immediate assistance may be somewhere in that house. (Id. at p. 613.)

However, the need to render emergency aid was rejected as grounds to make a warrantless entry into defendant's home where police officers responded to a 9-1-1 call to check the residence and found the front door to be open and the inside appeared to have been ransacked. To lawfully enter under the "emergency aid" doctrine," California's Supreme Court ruled that officers must (1) have probable cause for a search or seizure; and (2) show that, because of the circumstances, there is no time to obtain a warrant. The circumstances of this case failed to meet this standard. (People v. Ray (1999) 21 Cal.4th 464, 473; overruled on other grounds (i.e., applicability of "community caretaking") in People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034, 1049.)

> A three-justice concurrence in Ray ruled that rather than community caretaking, an "exigency" (i.e., to render aid) analysis justified the warrantless entry into defendant's home. (People v. Ray, supra, at p. 482.)
> "(T)o the extent the lead opinion in Ray authorized warrantless entry into a private home for community caretaking in circumstances short of an emergency, Ovieda disapproved it." (People v. Rubio (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 342, 351.)

Quoting Brigham City v. Stuart (2006) 547 U.S. 398, 401 [126 S.Ct. 1943; 164 L.Ed.2nd 650], and Michigan v. Fisher (2009) 558 U.S. 45 [130 S.Ct. 546; 175 L.Ed.2nd 410] (below), California's Second District Court of Appeal, citing the "emergency aid doctrine," noted that; "police may enter a home without a warrant when they have an objectively reasonable basis for believing that an occupant is seriously injured or imminently threatened with such injury." Where officers are told by the radio dispatch operator that someone had reported hearing a screaming woman and distressed moaning at the location, and upon arrival, consistent with the radio dispatch call information, the officers hear from the outside loud voices—both male and female—engaged in an argument inside the house, plus one officer also sees through the window that two males in the house are gesturing as if arguing, the Court held that it was objectively reasonable for an officer to believe that immediate entry was necessary in order to render emergency assistance to a screaming female victim inside or to prevent a perpetrator from inflicting additional immediate harm to that victim or others inside the house. Finding two females inside who told the officers that they were okay did not make unreasonable a check of the rest of the house for another female who was reported to be in distress. The plain sight observation of illegal drugs in a closet, where a victim or a suspect could have been hiding, was upheld. (People v. Pou (2017) 11 Cal.App.5th 143, 151-153.)

> Later discovering that the original call actually concerned a different residence across the street did not make the search of defendant's home unreasonable. "We do not with a 'hindsight determination' upend the officers' objectively reasonable conclusion that an exigency existed at the location simply because we subsequently learn of contrary facts unknown to the officers at the time they made their decision" (citing People v. Troyer (2011) 51 Cal.4th 599, 613.) (Id., at pp. 152-153.)

Breaking down defendant's door and entering his home when he had refused to invite police in to investigate was not justified under the Fourth Amendment, even though someone had discharged a firearm outside the home in a high crime neighborhood, overruling the Court's own prior decision in People v Rubio (2019) 37 Cal.App.4th 622, and in light of the California Supreme Court decision of People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034, 1049.). The emergency aid exception does not apply because the police had no reasonable basis to conclude there was anyone inside the apartment who was in danger or distress, and the exigent circumstances exception does not apply because police had no reason to believe a shooter was hiding in the apartment or that evidence of criminal conduct would be destroyed before they had a chance to obtain a warrant. (People v. Rubio (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 342, 348-355.)

However, entry into a unlocked side door of a house after finding a car with its engine running in the driveway, and with no one responding to knocking at the front door, out of concern that someone inside may be possibly unconscious and in need of help, or that criminal activity was "afoot," was held to be illegal. (People v. Smith (2020) 46 Cal.App.5th 375, 385-392.)

> In so ruling, the Fourth District Court of Appeal (Div. 1), at p. 386, cites the following legal standards: "'The well-recognized emergency aid exception "require[s] that articulable facts support a reasonable belief that an emergency exists." (People

v.*) *Ovieda, . . . 7 Cal.5th (1034) at p. 1048.) It is not enough that officers seek to rule out "the possibility that someone … might require aid." (Id. at p. 1047.) "Officers do not need ironclad proof of 'a likely serious, life-threatening' injury to invoke the emergency aid exception." (Michigan v. Fisher (2009) 558 U.S. 45, 49 [175 L.Ed.2nd 410; 130 S.Ct. 546] . . . .) "[T]he test . . . [is] whether there was 'an objectively reasonable basis for believing' that medical assistance was needed, or persons were in danger . . , ." (Ibid.)'"

And in so ruling, the Court (at p. 386.) cites the case of People v. Smith (1972) 7 Cal.3rd 282 (different Smith) where entry was made into an apartment where drugs were seen in plain sight, the entry being made for the purpose of checking on the welfare of a 7-year-old child who was left outside alone. The California Supreme Court found the entry to be unlawful.

The United States Supreme Court's Rule:

In Brigham City v. Stuart (2006) 547 U.S. 398 [126 S.Ct. 1943; 164 L.Ed.2nd 650]: The Supreme Court ignored efforts by the lower courts to categorize the entry into a house upon viewing an altercation through the window as coming within the "emergency aid doctrine," "community caretaking," or any other label, and merely noted the exigency of protecting the occupants from being hurt. In so doing, the Court held that a warrantless entry into a residence is lawful when police have "an objectively reasonable basis for believing" that an occupant is seriously injured or imminently threatened with such injury, and then the manner of the officers' entry was also reasonable.

Expanding upon the discussion in Brigham City, but still not using the phrase "community caretaking," the Supreme Court further held that officers responding to a call of a disturbance, finding a pickup truck in the driveway which had apparently been in an accident, blood on the truck and on clothes in the truck, broken windows in the house, and defendant, barricaded inside, screaming and throwing things. Defendant had a visible cut on his hand. One officer forced his way in only to have defendant point a rifle at him. Noting that "(i)t requires only 'an objective reasonable basis for believing' that 'a person within [the house] is in need of immediate aid,' and that the officer was acting reasonably when he made the warrantless entry into defendant's home, the Court found the entry to be lawful. (Cites Omitted; Michigan v. Fisher (2009) 558 U.S. 45 [130 S.Ct. 546; 175 L.Ed.2nd 410].)

> "Officers do not need ironclad proof of 'a likely serious, life-threatening' injury to invoke the emergency aid exception (to the warrant requirement. Also, the officer's subjective motivations for entering were irrelevant, the test being an objection one. (Id., at p. 49.)
> Also, the Court noted the reality of such a situation when a police officer is forced to decide what to do: "It does not meet the needs of law enforcement or the demands of public safety to require officers to walk away from a situation like the one they encountered here. Only when an apparent threat has become an actual harm can officers rule out innocuous explanations for ominous circumstances. But '[t]he role of a peace officer includes preventing violence and restoring order, not simply rendering first aid to casualties.' (citing Brigham City, supra, at p. 406.)" (Ibid.)

Where officers entered a mentally ill woman's room at a group home, were threatened with a knife, retreated to the hallway, called for backup, but then forced their way back into the room without waiting for the backup to arrive, and shot her, the officers were held to have been justified as a matter of law in making the first entry under the emergency aid exception under the Fourth Amendment. (City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan (2015) 575 U.S. 600, 612-613 [135 S.Ct. 1765; 191 L.Ed.2nd 856].)

> The Supreme Court declined to decide whether making the second entry of plaintiff's room, having initially backed out when confronted by the knife-wielding plaintiff, was constitutional under the circumstances, it not having been briefed on appeal, but rather (in overruling the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal) found that the officers had qualified immunity from civil liability in that the officers' choice to reenter the room without waiting for backup or otherwise planning a strategy did not violate clearly established law. (Id., 135 S.Ct. at pp. 1174-1178.)

Police officers may make a warrantless entry into a residence whenever they have "an objectively reasonable basis for believing" that an occupant or the officers are imminently threatened with serious injury. (Ryburn v. Huff (2012) 565 U.S. 469 [132 S.Ct. 987; 181 L.Ed.2nd 966]; reversing the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal's earlier decision that had held that unverified rumors that the plaintiffs' son had threated to "shoot up" a high school, along with the son's mother, who was generally uncooperative, running back into the house when asked about firearms in the house, was insufficient to justify an immediate entry.

Other Cases:

Two warrantless entries to look for a missing eight-year-old girl based upon probable cause to believe that she, or her body, might be in the apartment. (People v. Panah (2005) 35 Cal.4th 395, 464-469.)

Information that "suspicious activity" was taking place at a home, finding a rear sliding door slightly ajar, with the lights and a television on inside, but with no one responding to the officers' attempts to get the attention of the occupants, was sufficient "probable cause" to believe that a resident in the house might have been in danger or injured. (Murdock v. Stout (9th Cir. 1995) 54 F.3rd 1437.)

Sheriff's Deputies responding to a shooting call, not knowing whether the defendant had shot himself or whether there was a second victim or a possible shooter in the house, were justified in making a warrantless entry to look for more victims and/or a possible shooter. (United States v. Russell (9th Cir. 2006) 436 F.3rd 1086.)

The warrantless entry of the defendant's trailer, based upon "probable cause" to believe a kidnap victims were inside, was justified. (People v. Coddington (2000) 23 Cal.4th 529, 580.)

> Whether or not the FBI agents in Coddington actually needed full-blown "probable cause" to believe the victims were inside and in immediate need of rescue was not discussed. Arguably, a simple "reasonable suspicion" would have been sufficient.

An emergency 911 call reporting an accidental stabbing justified a warrantless entry of a hotel room for the limited purpose of ensuring the safety of those inside. (People v. Snead (1991) 1 Cal.App.4th 380, 386.)

Responding to a domestic violence call, officers contacted a woman who, although denying there was a problem, appeared to be frightened and apparently had been struck. The warrantless entry was upheld based upon what the Court determined to be sufficient "probable cause." (People v. Higgins (1994) 26 Cal.App.4th 247, 252-255.)

Responding to a call concerning a "shooting," a bullet hole was found in a patio door and blood on the patio floor. Entry was justified for the purpose of checking for possible shooting victims. (People v. Soldoff (1980) 112 Cal.App.3rd 1.)

And see United States v. Martinez (9th Cir. 2005) 406 F.3rd 1160, a questionable legal analysis attempting to differentiate the differences between "exigent circumstance" and the "emergency doctrine" as it relates to a domestic violence situation. The Court found that checking a residence for a potential domestic violence victim fell under the later.

Entry into a residence to check for the possible presence of a domestic violence victim who had telephoned police minutes earlier to ask for assistance in returning to the apartment to retrieve her belongings, but who couldn't be found upon the officers' arrival, was held to be lawful under the circumstances. (United States v. Black (9th Cir. 2007) 482 F.3rd 1035.)

> While the Black case was analyzed as a "welfare check" and "exigent circumstances," the Court noted in a footnote (fn. 1) that the same result would be applicable if analyzed under the "emergency aid doctrine."

See dissenting opinion to the Court's denial of an en banc rehearing, at (9th Cir. 2007) 482 F.3rd 1044, by Kozinski, C.J.

Entry into a motel room to check the welfare of the occupant whose four-year old son and an employee of the motel told officers that the occupant was unconscious and could not be woken up, held to be sufficient of an "exigent circumstance," supported by "probable cause," to justify a warrantless entry. (People v. Seminoff (2008) 159 Cal.App.4th 518, 528-530.)

Observation of contraband in plain sight by police officers who made a warrantless entry into a residence, responding to an emergency call from someone in apparent distress ("Get the cops here now," followed by the caller being disconnected), was lawful, and justified the obtaining of a search warrant to search the residence. (United States v. Snipe (9th Cir. 2008) 515 F.3rd 947.)

The Third District Court of Appeal (Shasta County) found that although, under the "emergency aid" doctrine, an officer must have "an objectively reasonable basis" to believe someone inside is seriously injured or imminently threatened with such injury in order to justify a warrantless entry (citing Brigham City v. Stuart, supra.), the officer may look through the defendant's side window (which the Court found to be at a location, at the side of the house, that implicated the Fourth Amendment), an admittedly lesser intrusion than making entry, with no more than a "reasonable suspicion" to believe that someone inside might need their assistance. (People v. Gemmill (2008) 162 Cal.App.4th 958.)

Also see Calabretta v. Floyd (9th Cir. 1999) 189 F.3rd 808, where it was held that an entry of a residence for the purpose of investigating a possible child abuse, where there were no exigent circumstances requiring an immediate entry, requires full "probable cause" and a search warrant.

And see United States v. Deemer (9th Cir. 2004) 354 F.3rd 1130; where it was held that an anonymous 911-hangup call, traceable to a particular motel, but without sufficient information to determine which room the call may have come from, did not allow for the non-consensual entry into the defendant's room to see is anyone needed help merely because of the suspicious attempts by the person who answered the door to keep the officers from looking inside, and her apparent lies concerning no one else being there.

With a citizen's report that plaintiff had been in a minor traffic accident and had the odor of alcohol on his breath, officers forced entry into his home under the supposition that a layperson might misinterpret the fruity smell of a person's breath who is on the brink of a diabetic coma as being under the influence of alcohol. Absent any other evidence that plaintiff was in fact about to suffer a diabetic coma, the Court rejected this argument as "both simple and audacious." The Court also rejected the officers' claim that they felt plaintiff might have been injured given the fact that the traffic accident was so minor that there was no damage to either car. (Hopkins v. Bonvicino (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 752, 759, 763-766.)

With a missing victim, and sufficient suspicious circumstances causing an officer to reasonably believe that the victim may die if immediate action is not taken, a warrantless entry into a private area may be lawful. No warrant is required "when an emergency situation requires swift action to prevent imminent danger to life." "(I)f the facts available to the officer at the moment of the entry would cause a person of reasonable caution to believe that the action taken was appropriate," the officer may lawfully make a warrantless entry into a residence or other private area. (People v. Rogers (2009) 46 Cal.4th 1136, 1144-1145, 1153-1161; with prior information that defendant may have secreted a missing victim in a storage room, and the defendant's nervousness and lack of cooperation, the immediate, warrantless entry into the storage area was held to be lawful.)

Following the reasoning in Rogers, the Court held that officers were justified in making entry into a darkened apartment when no one would answer their knocking to check the welfare of a woman and her child who hadn't been heard from all day following a violent "domestic violence" incident with her live-in boyfriend the night before, when no one could locate her and it was known that it was uncharacteristic of her not to answer her home or cellphone for the whole day. (People v. Hockstraser (2009) 178 Cal.App.4th 883, 895-901.)

Plain sight observations made while lawfully inside the apartment provided probable cause to search the defendant's vehicle parked outside the apartment, where the victim's dismembered body was then found. (Id., at pp. 901-905.)

The warrantless entry and search of a residence is lawful so long as there is an objectively reasonable basis for believing that someone inside or the officer is in serious danger, the manner of entry is reasonable, and the scope of the subsequent search is reasonable. (United States v. Reyes-Bosque (9th Cir. 2010) 596 F.3rd 1017, 1029-1030.)

Check-the-Welfare Cases:

Although some of the existing "exigent circumstance" cases talk about the need to make a warrantless entry into a residence to "check the welfare" of someone believed to be in distress inside, the U.S. Supreme Court has noted that whether an entry under such a circumstance complies with the Fourth Amendment's requirements has never been considered by the High Court. (Caniglia v. Strom (May 17, 2021) __ U.S. __, __ (concurring opinion) [141 S.Ct. 1596; 209 L.Ed.2nd 604]; suggesting that states should consider instigating a search warrant procedure for such cases.

But see the concurring opinion at pg. __, where Justice Kavanaugh notes that the Court's decision "does not prevent police officers from taking reasonable steps to assist those who are inside a home and in need of aid," and that the test is what is "reasonable," under the circumstances. "The Fourth Amendment allows officers to enter a home if they have 'an objectively reasonable basis for believing' that such help is needed, and if the officers' actions inside the home are reasonable under the circumstances. (Id., at p. __, citing Brigham City v. Stuart (2006) 547 U.S. 398, at p. 406 [126 S.Ct. 1943; 164 L.Ed.2nd 650], using as an example a typical "check the welfare" situation; i.e., where a concerned relative reports to police that an elderly person is uncharacteristically absent and does not respond to telephone calls.

Miscellaneous Exigent Circumstances: "The exigency exception (to the search warrant requirement) permits warrantless entry where officers 'have both probable cause to believe that a crime has been or is being committed and a reasonable belief that their entry is necessary to prevent . . . the destruction of relevant evidence, the escape of the suspect, or some other consequence improperly frustrating legitimate law enforcement efforts.'" (Sandoval v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't. (9th Cir. 2014) 756 F.3rd 1154, 1161; Sialoi v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2016) 823 F.3rd 1238; Lange v. California (June 23, 2021) __ U.S.__, __ [141 S.Ct. 2011; 219 L.Ed.2nd 486].)

> The government bears the burden of establishing exigent circumstances. (People v. Rubio (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 342, 353-354; citing People v. Troyer (2011) 51 Cal.4th 599, 606.)
> "A warrantless search of a home is 'presumptively unreasonable' because 'the physical entry of the home is the chief evil against which the wording of the Fourth Amendment is directed.' Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 585-86, 100 S.Ct. 1371, 63 L.Ed.2nd 639 (1980) (quotations and citation omitted). This presumption is overcome only 'when "the exigencies of the situation" make the needs of law enforcement so compelling that [a] warrantless search is objectively reasonable under the Fourth Amendment.' Kentucky v. King, 563 U.S. 452, 460, 131 S.Ct. 1849, 179 L.Ed.2nd 865 (2011) (quoting Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 394, 98 S.Ct. 2408, 57 L.Ed.2nd 290 (1978)). Preventing the imminent destruction of evidence is one such exigency, and exists when 'officers, acting on probable cause and in good faith, reasonably believe from the totality of the circumstances that [] evidence or contraband will imminently be destroyed . . . .' United States v. Ojeda, 276 F.3rd 486, 488 (9th Cir. 2002) (per curiam) (quoting United States v. Kunkler, 679 F.2nd 187, 191-192 (9th Cir. 1982)). Probable cause exists where, under the totality of the circumstances, there is 'a fair probability or substantial chance of criminal activity.' United States v. Alaimalo, 313 F.3rd 1188, 1193 (9th Cir. 2002). 'The government bears the burden of showing specific and articulable facts to justify the finding of exigent circumstances.' Ojeda, 276 F.3rd at 488." (United States v. > A possible trafficker in narcotics, ducking back into his residence upon the approach of peace officers, while attempting to shut the door and close the blinds, is an exigent circumstance justifying an immediate, warrantless entry. United States v. >
> With probable cause to believe a burglary is in progress, a warrantless forced entry into a residence would be appropriate. However, under circumstances where the officers should have known that the occupant of a house was not a burglar (e.g., the ex-wife of the person believed to be the resident, with the ex-wife having been given the residence in the divorce, and under circumstances where it was not reasonable to believe that she was burglarizing the house), a forced entry and confronting the occupant at gunpoint is a Fourth Amendment violation subjecting the

Responding to a 911 call concerning a person climbing over a fence into a residential backyard, and finding defendant who matched the description, where defendant did not resist or attempt to flee and without any indication of the presence of burglar tools or that the house was being broken into, was held to be insufficient cause to enter the curtilage of defendant's home (i.e., his fenced-off backyard) nor probable cause to arrest him for attempted burglary or even trespass. A gun found on him in a search incident to arrest should have been suppressed. (United States v. Struckman (9th Cir 2010) 603 F.3rd 731, 739-747; suggesting that the officers should asked him more questions and check his claims that he was in his own backyard before arresting him.)

Following a suspected illegal alien to defendant's home, and observing the illegal alien to walk to a carport at the side of the house, held not to justify an warrantless entry of the carport by Border Patrol agents, where defendant and the alien were arrested. (United States v. Perea-Rey (9th Cir. 2012) 680 F.3rd 1179, 1183-1189.)

Where officers respond to a call concerning two while males, ages 18 to 20, going over a backyard fence and looking in windows, but find instead three Hispanic male juveniles sitting in a bedroom of the house, ages 14 to 18, listening to music, watching TV, and playing video games, it was held that there was insufficient probable cause to make entry into the residence or to take the males into custody. (Sandoval v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't. (9th Cir. 2014) 756 F.3rd 1154, 1161-1163.)

With only a reasonable suspicion to believe that the occupant of a house might be involved in criminal activity, ordering him out of the house and to back up as he did so, and holding onto him (albeit without handcuffs) with his hands behind his back while asking for his consent to search his person, was illegal. Full probable cause was necessary. The subsequent consent to search his person and his house was the product of that illegal detention. (People v. Lujano (2014) 229 Cal.App.4th 175, 185-189.)

Upon hearing a conversation during a lawful wiretap that defendant was about to destroy or remove drugs from his apartment, officers were reasonable in making an immediate entry to secure the apartment pending the obtaining of a search warrant. The fact that it took an hour from the time of the overheard phone call until entry could be made did not detract from the exigency. (United States v. Fowlkes (9th Cir. 2015) 804 F.3rd 954, 968-969.)

Having detained outside all the members of a family at a birthday party, such detentions being illegal, and it already having been determined that none of the family members were not even close to the description given of some suspects seen carrying firearms, and without any reason to believe that any of the family members were in possession of any firearms, officers were not justified in making a warrantless entry into the family's apartment for the purpose of looking for a second weapon. (Sialoi v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2016) 823 F.3rd 1223, 1238.)

> A warrantless search of a residence based upon an exigency is unlawful absent both probable cause to believe that a crime has been or is being committed and a reasonable belief that entry is necessary to prevent the destruction of evidence, the escape of the suspect, or some other consequence improperly frustrating legitimate law enforcement efforts. (Id., at p. 1238, citing Sandoval v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't. (9th Cir. 2014) 756 F.3rd 1154, 1161.)

Entering a residence to search for an arrest warrant subject, where the subject's documentation all said that he lived there, and despite his mother's verbal claim that he did not, was reasonable. (Sharp v. County of Orange (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 901, 917-919.)

Under the exigent circumstances exception, "a warrantless entry into a dwelling may be lawful when there a pressing need for the police to enter but no time for them to secure a warrant." Defendant here challenged the warrantless entry into his locked bedroom where, when searched, explosive materials were recovered. Under the facts of this case, explosive materials, including pipe bombs, had been found in defendant's car hours earlier. Second, state and federal explosives experts testified that pipe bombs are very volatile and dangerous, especially "homemade" pipe bombs. Third, defendant had admitted that more explosives could be at his residence and then falsely told the officers that he lived at his parents' house, but a consensual search of that house uncovered no explosives. Fourth, defendant's actual residence was determined to be at an apartment which was surrounded by residential neighbors and businesses. Finally, because of the significant concern for public safety and at the hour at which the officers were urgently proceeding (i.e., 4:00 a.m.), there was no time to obtain a warrant. Based on these facts, the court held that the warrantless search of defendant's bedroom fell within the exigent circumstances exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement. (United States v. Haldorson (7th Cir. 2019) 941 F.3rd 284.)

Merely knowing that defendant has a gun in his residence does not by itself constitute an exigent circumstance allowing for the warrantless entry into his home. A warrantless entry into defendant's home to secure a firearm they knew to be inside (he was a Puerto Rico police officer) was held to be unlawful under circumstances where the officers encountered defendant outside, he was unarmed, he had not threatened violence, he had no history of violence, and the presence of a firearm was not connected to the domestic violence complaint. In addition, the officers did not handcuff Rodriguez during the encounter because he "was very cooperative and his family looked like really decent people." (United States v. Rodríguez-Pacheco (1st Cir. 2020) 948 F.3rd 1.)

However, entry into a unlocked side door of a house after finding a car with its engine running in the driveway, and with no one responding to knocking at the front door, out of concern that someone inside may be possibly unconscious and in need of help, or that criminal activity was "afoot," was held to be illegal; insufficient "reasonable belief" that a burglary was in progress. (People v. Smith (2020) 46 Cal.App.5th 375, 384-390.)

The Eighth Circuit also held that the warrantless entry into a house was reasonable under the Community Caretaking exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement, noting that this Circuit has applied community caretaking to residences since 2006, allowing a police officer to "enter a residence without a warrant as a community caretaker where the officer has a reasonable belief that an emergency exists requiring his or her attention." In this case, officers responded to a 911 call from the grandmother of an 11-year-old child who had called her grandmother, complaining that her mother and the mother's boyfriend were fighting. Upon arrival, and in contacting the mother, despite her telling the officers that everything was okay, the officers noted that she was visibly upset and had red marks on her face and neck. Upon hearing someone inside crying, the officers make entry into the residence to check the welfare of those inside. Once inside, information from the 11-year-old daughter led the officers to believe that defendant might be in possession of a firearm; a fact verified by the mother. Limiting the search to those areas where the daughter and the mother said the gun might be, the gun was found in the cushions of the couch. Defendant, charged with being in illegal possession of a firearm, moved to suppress. The Court held that based on the facts known to the officers, it was reasonable for the officers to believe that an emergency situation existed that required their immediate attention by entering the residence to ensure that no one inside was injured or in danger. The "Community Caretaking" theory allowed for such an entry. Then, with probable cause to believe defendant was in illegal possession of a firearm, the warrantless search for the firearm, limited to those areas where it was suspected to be, was lawful. (United States v. Sanders (8th Cir. 2020) 956 F.3rd 534.)

Breaking down defendant's door and entering his home when he had refused to invite police in to investigate was not justified under the Fourth Amendment, even though someone had discharged a firearm outside the home in a high crime neighborhood, overruling the Court's own prior decision in People v Rubio (2019) 37 Cal.App.4th 622, and in light of the California Supreme Court decision of People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034, 1049.). The emergency aid exception does not apply because the police had no reasonable basis to conclude there was anyone inside the apartment who was in danger or distress, and the exigent circumstances exception does not apply because police had no reason to believe a shooter was hiding in the apartment or that evidence of criminal conduct would be destroyed before they had a chance to obtain a warrant. (People v. Rubio (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 342, 348-355.)

> But see the dissent (pgs. 255-357) finding sufficient facts to justify an "exigent circumstance" finding, criticizing the majority's second guessing the officers' decisions made at the scene: "(J)udges should be cautious about second-guessing a police officer's assessment, made on the scene, of the danger presented by a particular situation. With the benefit of hindsight and calm deliberation, the panel majority concluded that it was unreasonable for petitioners (i.e., the officers at the scene) to fear that violence was imminent. But we have instructed that reasonableness 'must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight' and that '[t]he calculus of reasonableness must embody allowance for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain and rapidly evolving.'" (Quoting Ryburn v. Huff (2012) 565 U.S. 469, 477 [181 L.Ed.2nd 966; 132 S. Ct. 987].)

Neither exigent circumstances nor the alleged need to conduct a protective sweep of defendant's residence was justified under the facts of this case where defendant had pointed a shotgun at his neighbors and was already under arrest when the officer entered the house to seize the shotgun. In order to show exigent circumstances based on a "risk of danger to police officers or others on the scene," a warrantless entry into a home "must be supported by probable cause to believe that a dangerous person will be found inside." The prosecution did not argue that defendant's wife—the only occupant—was a dangerous person. (People v. Chen (2020) 50 Cal.App.5th 952, 955-956; the error in admitted the shotgun into evidence held to be harmless.)

Based upon defendant's emergency 911 call, telling the dispatcher that he had been shot, and witness information upon arrival at the scene, the officers' entry into defendant's residence in response to the call for medical aid for a shooting victim did not violate the Fourth Amendment. Given the fact of the shooting and the other information known to the officers at the time, the court concluded that exigent circumstances made it reasonable to enter the residence and, as a "protective sweep," look into the rooms to ensure the absence of a shooter or additional victims. Plain sight observation of at least one firearm while in the residence was lawful. Then, an officer's entry into the kitchen, and remaining there, did not unreasonably extend the duration of the protective sweep in that area. The court found that the officer in the kitchen remained there out of a concern that a witness and acquaintance of the defendant's was attempting to retrieve suspected narcotics observed in plain view on the table. Finally, the Court held that no information obtained by officers who might have "lingered" in the house during the initial entry, nor after their re-entry after the ambulance departed, aided in securing the search warrant. Instead, the Court found that in obtaining a search warrant, the officers relied on information obtained permissibly and almost immediately upon entry into defendant's residence as the basis for the search warrant. The court added that to the extent that any officer might have exceeded the permissible scope of a security sweep, any such transgression led, at most, to the discovery of evidence that inevitably would have been discovered upon execution of the valid search warrant. (United States v. Crutchfield (8th Cir 2020) 979 F.3rd 614.)

The issue of the legality of an officer following defendant into his garage, after defendant failed to yield to the officer's use of his emergency lights while attempting to stop defendant after observing him honking his horn excessively (a violation of Veh. Code § 27007), was discussed in Lange v. California (June 23, 2021) __ U.S.__ [141 S.Ct. 2011; 219 L.Ed.2nd 486]. In Lange, the Supreme Court held that whether or not an officer can make a warrantless entry into a fleeing misdemeanant's home depends upon the circumstances, rejecting the argument that an officer may do so as a "categorical" rule. The People must first show that an exigent circumstance allowed for such an entry. Per the Court: "A great many misdemeanor pursuits involve exigencies allowing warrantless entry. But whether a given one does so turns on the particular facts of the case." (Id., at p. __.)

Under the exigent circumstances exception, an officer may enter a home without a warrant if he has an objectively reasonable basis to believe that entry is necessary "to render emergency assistance to an injured occupant or to protect an occupant from imminent injury." In a case where officers responded to a reported domestic dispute, the Court held that the facts known to the officers when they decided to enter the house was reasonable, based upon the following: (1) The information from the 911 call, that the occupants were involved in a serious domestic dispute. (2) The officers' observations when they arrived, including marks on the female's face and neck. (3) The information provided by the daughter and the female. Based on these facts, the Court concluded that it was reasonable for the officers to believe that an emergency situation existed that required their immediate attention by entering the house to either provide emergency assistance to the child who was heard crying or to prevent an imminent assault on the daughter who had reported the incident. The Court further held that exigent circumstances justified the officer's warrantless search to locate and secure the gun because: (1) "domestic disturbances are highly volatile and involve large risks;" (2) the officer had an objectively reasonable belief that a gun was inside the house based upon what the daughter had told him; and (3) the officer limited his search to areas where the gun might have been placed. (United States v. Sanders (8th Cir. IA, 2021) 4 F.4th 672.)

In a case where federal agents made a warrantless entry into defendant's home to seize his computers and similar devices pending the obtaining of a warrant to search those devices, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals held that exigent circumstances existed that permitted the agents to enter defendant's house without a warrant and seize his electronic devices. First, by the time the agents decided to enter defendant's house, after discussing with him outside his home his possible involvement in communicating child pornography, they had probable cause to believe that he was involved in criminal activity. Specifically, the agents knew that defendant: (1) had ties to the individuals who were livestreaming sexual abuse of children; (2) had stayed with these individuals when he visited the Philippines; (3) had paid thousands of dollars to them and one of the minor victims; and (4) did not tell his wife about some of the money he sent, despite claiming that the payments were tied to his humanitarian work. Second, the court held that the agents had probable cause to believe that there would be incriminating evidence on defendant's devices, as he had admitted to the agents that he used a computer and cellphone to communicate with the abusers and had stayed in regular contact with them. The agents also knew that his Skype username was "prettyvirginfilipino" and that the profile he used was a variant of the first name of one of the minor victims. After defendant admitted that these devices were in his home, the court concluded that there was a fair probability that the agents would find "evidence of a crime" inside his home. Third, the court held that it was reasonable for the agents to believe that defendant would destroy the evidence on his devices after he went back inside his home. Defendant told the agents they could examine his devices after he "checked his email and stuff." When the agents suggested that they accompany defendant inside and look at the devices together, defendant shifted his attention to the tidiness of his house and told the agents he would need "a few minutes to clean up first." The court concluded that defendant's insistence that he have an opportunity to be alone with his devices gave the agents reason to believe that he was hiding something. Knowing that data can be deleted "at the touch of a button," the court found that it was reasonable for the agents to enter defendant's home without a warrant and seize his devices. (United States v. Meyer (8th Cir. IA 2021) 19 F.4th 1028.)

Officer Safety:

Scaling a six foot fence past a locked gate, and thus entering defendant's side yard, was lawful when necessary to retrieve a firearm observed on the ground where the officer feared for his own safety and the safety of a seven year old minor who was suspected of being in the house. (People v. Chavez (2008) 161 Cal.App.4th 1493, 1503.)

The warrantless entry and search of a residence is lawful so long as there is an objectively reasonable basis for believing that someone inside or the officer is in serious danger, the manner of entry is reasonable, and the scope of the subsequent search is reasonable. (United States v. Reyes-Bosque (9th Cir. 2010) 596 F.3rd 1017, 1029-1030.)

Police officers may make a warrantless entry into a residence whenever they have an objectively reasonable basis for believing that an occupant or the officers are imminently threatened with serious injury. (Ryburn v. Huff (2012) 565 U.S. 469 [132 S.Ct. 987; 181 L.Ed.2nd 966]; reversing the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal's decision that had held that unverified rumors that the plaintiffs' son had threated to "shoot up" a high school, along with the son's mother, who was generally uncooperative, running back into the house when asked about firearms in the house, was insufficient to justify an immediate entry.

Kicking open an upstairs locked bedroom door while checking for possibly wounded victims at a shooting scene, and for officers' safety while they conducted an investigation, when it is unknown whether the shooting suspect(s) might be in the house, was reasonable. (People v. Troyer (2011) 51 Cal.4th 599, 613.)

Animal Control Cases:

The same theory apparently applies to a warrantless entry of a business by animal control officers for the purpose of checking on the welfare of animals in a pet store. The court held that exigent circumstances (the strong odor of deceased animals' flesh) justified the officers' warrantless entry into the shop and seizure of the animals pursuant to authority under P.C. § 597.1, finding that "the statutory language authorizing immediate seizure when an animal control officer 'has reasonable grounds to believe that very prompt action is required to protect the health or safety of others' is the equivalent of the exigent circumstances exception familiar to search and seizure law. That exception allows entry without benefit of a warrant when a law enforcement officer confronts an emergency situation requiring swift action to save life, property, or evidence." (Broden v. Marin Humane Society (1999) 70 Cal.App.4th 1212, 1220-1221.)

Defendants' motion to suppress was properly denied were exigent circumstances justified two animal control officers looking into the window of the garage on defendants' property with the knowledge that a horse that was thin and being housed in an unsafe corral had escaped from the property, where the officers knew there had been prior calls to the property in response to reported concerns about the conditions of horses and pit bull dogs on the property, and that they were reasonably concerned about whether a dog that was heard whining inside the garage was in distress and living in unhealthy conditions. Through the garage window, a "slat mill" (known to be used to train fighting dogs) could be seen. Exigent circumstances, and while looking for a resident, also justified the officers walking into and inspecting defendant's fenced backyard to check the condition of the dogs they could hear barking incessantly from there. Suspecting that the property was being used for dog fighting purposes, the later warrant obtained for the residence and property, based upon the above observations, was valid. (People v. Williams (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 111, 119-125.)

Fleeing Misdemeanant or Non-Dangerous Felon:

In Sims v. Stanton (9th Cir. 2013) 706 F.3rd 954 (certiorari granted), the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that entering the curtilage of a home in pursuit of a suspect with the intent to detain him when the subject is ignoring the officer's demands to stop, at worst a misdemeanor violation of P.C. § 148), is illegal. The warrantless fresh or hot pursuit of a fleeing suspect into a residence (or the curtilage of a residence) is limited to felony suspects only. The United States Supreme Court, however, reversed this decision in Stanton v. Sims (2013) 571 U.S. 3 [134 S.Ct. 3; 187 L.Ed.2nd 341], without deciding the issue.

The Ninth Circuit's decision was based upon the Court's interpretation of the United States Supreme Court decision in Welsh v, Wisconsin (1984) 466 U.S. 740 [104 S.Ct. 3091; 80 L.Ed.2nd 732], and conflicts with the California Supreme Court's reasoning in People v. Thompson (2006) 38 Cal.4th 811 (see "Warrantless entry to arrest a DUI (i.e., "Driving while Under the Influence") suspect," above).

However, the United States Supreme Court, in interpreting its own decision on Welsh, noted that they only held there that a warrantless entry into a residence for a minor offense, not involving hot pursuit, was an exception to the normal rule, and that a warrant is "usually" going to be required. Per the Court, there is no rule that residential entries involving hot pursuit are limited to felony cases. (Stanton v. Sims, supra, citing Welsh, at p. 750.)

The issue of the legality of an officer following defendant into his garage, after defendant failed to yield to the officer's use of his emergency lights while attempting to stop defendant after observing him honking his horn excessively (a violation of Veh. Code § 27007), was discussed in Lange v. California (June 23, 2021) __ U.S.__ [141 S.Ct. 2011; 201 L.Ed.2nd 486]. In Lange, the Supreme Court held that whether or not an officer can make a warrantless entry into a fleeing misdemeanant's home depends upon the circumstances, rejecting the argument that an officer may do so as a "categorical" rule. The People must first show that an exigent circumstance allowed for such an entry. Per the Court: "A great many misdemeanor pursuits involve exigencies allowing warrantless entry. But whether a given one does so turns on the particular facts of the case." (Id., at p. __.)

On remand from Lange v. California (June 23, 2021) __ U.S.__, __ [141 S.Ct. 2011; 219 L.Ed.2nd 486], which held that; "(i)n misdemeanor cases, flight does not always supply the exigency that this Court has demanded for a warrantless home entry," given the many other possible reasons—not necessarily involving an exigency—why a misdemeanor suspect has fled into his home, California's First District Court of Appeal (Div. 5) held that under the good faith exception to the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule, it was not necessary to suppress evidence from an officer's warrantless entry into defendant's garage after the officer observed defendant blaring loud music and honking unnecessarily and defendant, rather than pulling over, drove up his driveway and into his attached garage. When the police conduct a search in objectively reasonable reliance on binding appellate precedent, the exclusionary rule does not apply. (People v. Lange (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 1114.)

Emergency Exception and the Odor of Ether:

In cases where the odor of ether is apparent, coming from a particular location indicating the presence of an illicit drug lab and creating a hazardous, potentially explosive, situation, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that although the odor by itself is not probable cause, it is a dangerous situation needing immediate action. Therefore, so long as (1) the police have reasonable grounds to believe that there is an emergency at hand and an immediate need for their assistance for the protection of life or property, (2) their assistance is not primarily motivated by the intent to arrest a person or seize evidence, and (3) there is some reasonable basis, "approximating probable cause," to associate the emergency with the area or place to be entered, then the "emergency doctrine" will allow for a warrantless entry to neutralize the emergency. (United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2000) 219 F.3rd 882.)

> And then, any plain sight observations made while lawfully in the house neutralizing the danger can provide the necessary probable cause to secure the house, arrest the occupants, and obtain a search warrant for the rest of the house. (People v. Hill (1974) 12 Cal.3rd 731.)

State authority is in apparent agreement: The odor of ether is an exigent circumstance, given the potential volatility of ether, to justify an immediate warrantless entry to "neutralize" the dangerous situation. (People v. Messina (1985) 165 Cal.App.3rd 931; People v. Osuna (1987) 187 Cal.App.3rd 845.)

See People v. Baird (1985) 168 Cal.App.3rd 237, where police officers noticed a "strong overpowering smell of ether" coming from a house and asked the fire department to investigate. (Id. at p. 240.) The responding fire marshal was told the police suspected a drug lab operating on the premises and confirmed the smell of ether, which he knew to be "highly flammable and explosive," so he entered the house to determine its source. (Id. at p. 241.) That entry was found to be unjustified under the exigent circumstances exception because the evidence did "not support a determination that any of the officials involved believed they were confronted with an 'emergency situation requiring swift action.'" (Id. at p. 245.)

> Note: Once neutralized, however, the exigency is over. Any followup searches need to be conducted under the authority of a warrant. See People v. Duncan, infra, below.

The odor of ether plus other circumstances which corroborate the suspected presence of an illicit substance will normally establish probable cause. (People v. Stegman (1985) 164 Cal.App.3rd 936; People v. Patterson (1979) 94 Cal.App.3rd 456; People v. Torres (1981) 121 Cal.App.3rd Supp. 9.)

The California Supreme Court upheld a warrantless search of a residence where a police officer (1) had been specifically informed that an illicit drug laboratory was operating on the premises; (2) upon arrival smelled a chemical (i.e., ether) he knew to be associated with illicit drug manufacture; (3) knew that the volatile nature of the chemicals involved in the production of drugs posed a high danger of explosion; and (4) identified the chemical odor as coming from inside the residence. (People v. Duncan (1986) 42 Cal.3rd 91, 104-105.)

> Once the house was secured and the exigency neutralized, officers held back pending the obtaining of a search warrant.

See "Odor of Ether in a Residence," under "Warrantless Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 9), above.

Upon Executing an Arrest Warrant:

An arrest warrant constitutes legal authority to enter the suspect's residence and search for him. (People v. LeBlanc (1997) 60 Cal.App.4th 157, 164.)

An arrest warrant based on probable cause implicitly carries with it the limited authority to enter a dwelling to execute the warrant if the officer: (1) has a reasonable belief that the location to be searched is the suspect's dwelling; and (2) that the suspect is inside the dwelling at the time of entry. (United States v. Mastin (11th Cir. AL. 2020) 972 F.3rd 1230.)

Similarly, police are authorized to enter a house without a warrant where the suspect is a parolee who had no legitimate expectation of privacy against warrantless arrests. (People v. Lewis (1999) 74 Cal.App.4th 662, 671; In re Frank S. (2006) 142 Cal.App.4th 145, 151.)

Surrounding a barricaded suspect in his home is in effect a warrantless arrest, justified by the exigent circumstances. The passage of time during the ensuing standoff does not dissipate that exigency to where officers are expected to seek the authorization of a judge to take the suspect into physical custody. (Fisher v. City of San Jose (9th Cir. 2009) 558 F.3rd 1069; overruling its prior holding (at 509 F.3rd 952) where it was ruled that failure to obtain an arrest warrant during a 12 hour standoff resulted in an illegal arrest of the barricaded suspect.)

Entry of a residence to execute a bench warrant, issued by a neutral magistrate upon a defendant's failure to appear in court, is lawful despite the fact that the bench warrant was issued without a finding of probable cause. (United States v. Gooch (9th Cir. 2007) 506 F.3rd 1156.)

> But, before a police officer may enter a home, absent consent to enter, the officer must have a reasonable belief, falling short of probable cause to believe, the suspect lives there and is present at the time. (People v. Downey (2011) 198 Cal.App.4th 652, 657-662.)

But see prior decisions from the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal finding that "probable cause" to believe the person who is the subject of the arrest warrant is actually inside at the time is the correct standard. (United States v. Gorman (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 1105; People v. Phillips (9th Cir. 1974) 497 F.2nd 1131; United States v. Diaz (9th Cir. 2007) 491 F.3rd 1074; United States v. Gooch, supra, at p. 1159, fn. 2; Cuevas v. De Roco (9th Cir. 2008) 531 F.3rd 726; United States v. Mayer (9th Cir. 2008) 530 F.3rd 1099, 1103-1104.)

See "Sufficiency of Evidence to Believe the Suspect is Inside," below.

"Because an arrest warrant authorizes the police to deprive a person of his liberty, it necessarily also authorizes a limited invasion of that person's privacy interest when it is necessary to arrest him in his home." (Steagald v. United States (1981) 451 U.S. 204, 214-215, fn. 7 [101 S.Ct. 1642; 68 L.Ed.2nd 38, 46].)

"Thus, for Fourth Amendment purposes, an arrest warrant founded on probable cause implicitly carries with it the limited authority to enter a dwelling in which the suspect lives when there is reason to believe the suspect is within." (Italics added; Payton v. New York (1980) 445 U.S. 573, 603 [100 S.Ct. 1371; 63 L.Ed.2nd 639, 661].)

"It is not disputed that until the point of Buie's arrest the police had the right, based on the authority of the arrest warrant, to search anywhere in the house that Buie might have been found, . . ." (Maryland v. Buie (1990) 494 U.S. 325, 330 [110 S.Ct. 1093; 108 L.Ed.2nd 276, 283].)

If the person is in a third party's home, absent consent to enter, a search warrant for the residence must be obtained in addition to the arrest warrant. (Steagald v. United States, supra, at pp. 211-222 [101 S.Ct. 1642; 68 L.Ed.2nd at pp. 45-52]; People v. Codinha (1982) 138 Cal.App.3rd 167; see P.C. § 1524(a)(6))

Failure, however, to obtain a search warrant will not benefit the subject with the outstanding arrest warrant, but serves only to protect the homeowner (i.e., the "third party") should evidence of criminal activity be discovered during the entry of his residence. The person with the outstanding arrest warrant will generally be without standing to contest the entry of the warrantless entry of the residence. (United States v. Bohannon (2nd Cir. 2016) 824 F.3rd 242.)

With an arrest warrant, no search warrant is needed in order to lawfully enter a house so long as it is a dwelling in which the suspect lives, and when (1) the officers have a reasonable belief that the suspect resides at the place to be entered and (2) reason to believe that the suspect is present when the officers enter. (United States v. Ford (8th Cir. IA 2018) 888 F.3rd 922.)

Sufficiency of Evidence to Believe the Suspect is Inside: The amount of evidence a law enforcement officer must have indicating that a sought-after criminal suspect is in fact presently inside his own residence in order to justify a non-consensual entry, with or without an arrest warrant, has been debated over the years:

The United States Supreme Court, in Payton v. New York (1980) 445 U.S. 573 [100 S.Ct. 1371; 63 L.Ed.2nd 639], merely states that a police officer must have a "reason to believe" the suspect is inside his residence, without defining the phrase.

An early California lower appellate court found that the officers needed only a "reasonable belief," or "strong reason to believe," the suspect was home. (People v. White (1986) 183 Cal.App.3rd 1199, 1204-1209; rejecting the defense argument that full "probable cause" to believe the subject was inside is required; see also United States v. Magluta (11th Cir. 1995) 44 F.3rd 1530, 1535, using a "reasonable belief" standard.)

Other authority indicates that a full measure of "probable cause" is required. (See Dorman v. United States (D.C. Cir. 1970) 435 F.2nd 385, 393; United States v. Vasquez-Algarin (3rd Cir. 2016) [821 F.3rd 467; and United States v. Brinkley (4th Cir. 2020) 980 F.3rd 377.)

The Fourth Circuit, in United States v. Brinkley, supra, held that in order for officers to make a warrantless entry (without consent) of a residence, looking for a subject with an outstanding arrest warrant, they must first have probable cause proving both of two prongs; (1) that the location is the suspect's residence, and (2) that the suspect is home when the officers enter.

See also People v. Phillips (9th Cir. 1974) 497 F.2nd 1131; a locked commercial establishment, at night; and United States v. Gorman (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 1105; defendant in his girlfriend's house with whom he was living, both imposing a "probable cause" standard.

The California Supreme Court, interpreting the language of Pen. Code § 844 (i.e., "reasonable grounds for believing him to be (inside)"), has found that any arrest, with or without an arrest warrant, requires probable cause to believe the subject is inside in order to justify a non-consensual entry into a residence. (People v. Jacobs (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 472, 478-479; but, see below.)

In order to conduct a Fourth Waiver search of a residence, an officer must have probable cause to believe that the residence to be searched is in fact the parolee's (or probationer's) residence. (Motley v. Parks (9th Cir. 2005) 432 F.3rd 1072, 1080-1082; United States v. Franklin (9th Cir. 2010) 603 F.3rd 652; United States v. Bolivar (9th Cir. 2012) 670 F.3rd 1091, 1093-1095.)

> The same rule holds true for the search of a vehicle. Before officers may conduct a warrantless search of a vehicle pursuant to a supervised release condition, they must first have probable cause to believe that the defendant owns or controls the vehicle to be searched. (United States v. Dixon (9th Cir. 2020) 984 F.3rd 814, 818-823.)

However, noting that five other federal circuits have ruled that something less than probable cause is required, and that the Ninth Circuit is a minority opinion, the Fourth District Court of Appeal (Div. 2) found instead that an officer executing an arrest warrant or conducting a probation or parole search may enter a dwelling if he or she has only a "reasonable belief," falling short of probable cause, that the suspect lives there and is present at the time. Employing that standard, the entry into defendant's apartment to conduct a probation search was lawful based on all of the information known to the officers. Accordingly, the court upheld the trial court's conclusion that the officers had objectively reasonable grounds to conclude the defendant/probationer lived at the subject apartment and was present at the time, and therefore the officers had the right to enter the apartment to conduct a warrantless probation search. (People v. Downey (2011) 198 Cal.App.4th 652, 657-662.)

> Also arguing that the California Supreme Court, in People v. Jacobs, supra (pg. 479, fn. 4), did not find that probable cause was required, contrary to popular belief. (Id., at p. 662; see above.)
> Note: The "present at the time" requirement apparently only applies to executing an arrest warrant. It has never been required that a person on a Fourth waiver be home at the time of a warrantless entry and search. (See People v Lilienthal (1978) 22 Cal.3rd 891, 900.)
>
> Without mentioning Downey, the Ninth Circuit cites Motley v. Parks, supra, with approval, continuing to hold that full probable cause to believe that the target of a Fourth Waiver search resides in the place to be searched is necessary. (United States v. Bolivar (9th Cir. 2012) 670 F.3rd 1091, 1093-1095; see also United States v. Dixon (9th Cir. Dec. 31, 2020) 984 F.3rd 814, 821.)

Officers knew defendant had lived at the suspect residence at one time but also had newer information that he had moved elsewhere, although there was still some indication that he was maybe visiting the prior residence or that the occupants knew where he could be located; insufficient to establish probable cause. (Cuevas v. De Roco (9th Cir. 2008) 531 F.3rd 726.)

Information from a neighbors and, separately, an anonymous informant, all indicating that defendant had returned to his reported address and was selling marijuana at that residence, established probable cause to believe he was living there again. (United States v. Mayer (9th Cir. 2008) 530 F.3rd 1099, 1103-1104.)

An arrest warrant based on probable cause implicitly carries with it the limited authority to enter a dwelling to execute the warrant if the officer (1) has a reasonable belief that the location to be searched is the suspect's dwelling, and (2) that the suspect is inside the dwelling at the time of entry. (United States v. Mastin (11th Cir. AL. 2020) 972 F.3rd 1230.)

Third Parties Entering with Police: It is a Fourth Amendment violation to allow third parties (e.g.; the news media) into a constitutionally protected area, such as the defendant's home, without the occupant's permission, even when the officers themselves are entering legally (e.g.; serving a search warrant). (Wilson v. Layne (1999) 526 U.S. 603 [119 S.Ct. 1692; 143 L.Ed.2nd 818]; creating federal civil liability.)

It was not error, however, to deny defendants' motions to suppress the physical evidence seized from their property where the media was present on the front yard of the defendants' compound, in that their presence did not violate the Fourth Amendment because the front yard was not curtilage, and there was no basis to find a reasonable expectation of privacy in the front yard. But the Fourth Amendment was violated by escorting certain members of the media into the backyard. Nonetheless, it was not necessary to suppress any evidence resulting from the execution of the warrant because the police conducted the search within the parameters of the warrant, and there was no suggestion that any member of the media discovered or developed any evidence seized from the property. (United States v. Duenas (9th Cir. 2012) 691 F.3rd 1070, 1079-1083.)

Knock and Notice: Any time a police officer makes entry into the residence of another to arrest (Pen. Code § 844) or to serve a search warrant (Pen. Code § 1531), the officer must first comply with the statutory "knock and notice" rules.

The same rule applies to entries for "investigative purposes" as well, although arguably not coming within the provisions of Pen. Code §§ 844 or 1531. (People v. Miller (1999) 69 Cal.App.4th 190, 201.)

Knock and notice requirements also apply to entries made for purposes of conducting a "Fourth Waiver search*." (People v. Constancio (1974) 42 Cal.App.3rd 533, 542; People v. Lilienthal (1978) 22 Cal.3rd 891, 900; People v. Mays (1998) 67 Cal.App.4th 969, 973, fn. 4; People v. Murphy (2003) 112 Cal.App.4th 546, 553.)

However, recent authority has noted that violating knock and notice rules should not result in the suppression of any resulting evidence, at least absent aggravating circumstances. (Hudson v. Michigan (2006) 547 U.S. 586 [126 S.Ct. 2159; 165 L.Ed.2nd 56].) This new rule applies whether executing a search warrant (i.e., Hudson) or to make an arrest. (In re Frank S. (2006) 142 Cal.App.4th 145.)

However, see United States v. Weaver (D.C. Cir. 2015) 808 F.3rd 26, where the D.C. Court of Appeal rejected the applicability of Hudson v. Michigan, supra, in an arrest warrant service situation, and held that federal agents violated the knock-and-announce rule by failing to announce their purpose before entering defendant's apartment. By knocking but failing to announce their purpose, the agents gave defendant no opportunity to protect the privacy of his home. The exclusionary rule was the appropriate remedy for knock-and-announce violations in the execution of arrest warrants at a person's home.

Chapter 14*:

New and Developing Law Enforcement Tools and Technology:

The Problem: The United States Supreme Court in Kyllo v. United States (2001) 533 U.S. 27 [121 S.Ct. 2038; 150 L.Ed.2nd 94], as well as the federal Congress and California's Legislature, has indicated a concern with developing surveillance technology which may be used to eavesdrop upon and decipher activities in constitutionally protected areas.

> "The challenge facing the courts is that technology is outpacing the law. In recognition of this reality, the United States Supreme Court recently instructed courts to adopt rules that 'take account of more sophisticated systems that are already in use or in development.' (Citation omitted) Courts have an obligation to safeguard constitutional rights and cannot permit those rights to be diminished merely due to the advancement of technology. (Citation omitted) Citizens do not contemplate waiving their civil rights when using new technology, and the Supreme Court has concluded that, to find otherwise, would leave individuals 'at the mercy of advancing technology.'" (In re Search of a Residence in Oakland (N.D. Cal. 2019) 354 F.Supp.3rd 1010, citing and quoting Carpenter v. United States (June 22, 2018) 585 U.S. __ [138 S.Ct. 2206, 2214, 2218-2219; 201 L.Ed.2nd 507], and noting that: "(T)he United States Supreme Court has repeatedly sought to 'assure . . . preservation of that degree of privacy against government that existed when the Fourth Amendment was adopted.'")
> See also United States v. Hill (9th Cir. 2006) 459 F.3rd 966, 979, where it was noted that: "Technology is rapidly evolving and the concept of what is reasonable for Fourth Amendment purposes will likewise have to evolve."
>
> And People v. Michael E. (2014) 230 Cal.App.4th 261, 276-279, where the Court included a whole segment criticizing the current trend of referring to computers and cellphones as "containers of information," predicting the coming of a whole new body of law dealing with electronic devices. "'Since electronic storage is likely to contain a greater quantity and variety of information than any previous storage method, . . . '[r]elying on analogies to closed containers or file cabinets may lead courts to "oversimplify a complex area of Fourth Amendment doctrines and ignore the realities of massive modern computer storage."' [Citation.]" (Citing United States v. Carey (10th Cir. 1999) 172 F.3rd 1268, 1275.) Interestingly enough, however, most of the authority the Court cites here are container-search cases.
> See "Seizures and Searches of High Tech Devices" (Chapter 17), below.)

The United States Supreme Court agrees, at least as to cellphones, ruling that given the amount of personal information contained on the modern-day "smart phone," such a device is indeed entitled to greater protection from warrantless searches. (See Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373, 384-385 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430].)

The Supreme Court has pointed out that a physical trespassory intrusion (physically entering a protected area or property) is not always required to create a Fourth Amendment search issue. Per the Court; "(s)ituations involving merely the transmission of electronic signals without trespass would remain subject to Katz analysis" (referring to Katz v. United States (1967) 389 U.S. 347, 3612 [88 S.Ct. 507; 19 L.Ed.2nd 576, 588].); i.e., whether a "reasonable expectation of privacy" was violated. (United States v. Jones (2012) 565 U.S. 400, 411 [132 S.Ct. 945, 953; 181 L.Ed.2nd 911].)

See also United States v. Cotterman (9th Cir. 2013) 709 F.3rd 952, 962-968, dealing with a search of a suspect's laptop computer, and discussing "(t)he nature of the contents of electronic devices differs from that of luggage as well. Laptop computers, iPads and the like are simultaneously offices and personal diaries. They contain the most intimate details of our lives: financial records, confidential business documents, medical records and private emails. This type of material implicates the Fourth Amendment's specific guarantee of the people's right to be secure in their 'papers.'"

The Fourth District Court of Appeal (Div. 1) has held that when interpreting a minor's conditions of probation, reference to defendant's "property," as "reasonably construed," does not include electronic data. (In re I.V. (2017) 11 Cal.App.5th 249, 259-263; citing United States v. Lara (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 605, 610-614.)

> However, see People v. Sandee (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 294, at pages 302-304, where the Court noted that because the Ninth Circuit uses a balancing test, while California uses an objective test, in analyzing whether the probationer consented to the search by accepting the specific probation search conditions at issue (see pg. 303, fn. 6), United States v. Lara, supra, is not persuasive authority and does not preclude a finding that the search of text messages contained in defendant's cellphone was lawful under defendant's Fourth waiver conditions allowing for the search of her "property" and "personal effects."
> The Court further noted at pages 304 and 305, that the events in Sandee took place before enactment of the Electronic Communications Privacy Act, which took effect on January 1, 2016. The Act provides that the government shall not "[a]ccess electronic device information by means of physical interaction or electronic communication with the electronic device" unless one of several statutory exceptions applies, including obtaining the specific consent of the authorized possessor of the device. (P.C. § 1546.1(a)(3) & (c)(4))

It is further noted, however, that the Act provides an exception to the above prohibition, effective January 1, 2017: A government entity may physically access electronic device information "[e]xcept where prohibited by state or federal law, if the device is seized from an authorized possessor of the device who is subject to an electronic device search as a clear and unambiguous condition of probation, mandatory supervision, or pretrial release." (Id.*, P.C. § 1546.1(c)(10))

See "The California Electronic Communications Privacy Act: P.C. §§ 1546-1546.4," under "Seizures and Searches of High Tech Devices" (Chapter 17), below.

Absent an exigency, in order to obtain cellphone "pinging" history, a search warrant, based upon a showing of probable cause, is required. (Carpenter v. United States (June 22, 2018) 585 U.S. __ [138 S.Ct. 2206; 201 L.Ed.2nd 507]; overruling prior cases which had held that a simple court order, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 2703(d) of the federal "Stored Communications Act," was required, and was obtainable whenever the Government could show "specific and articulable facts showing that there are reasonable grounds to believe" that the records sought "are relevant and material to an ongoing criminal investigation.")

Carpenter was held not to apply to "business records that might incidentally reveal location information," including telephone numbers and bank records. It was also held, therefore, not to apply to computer IP address information as contained in the records of an Internet service provider which, in response to a grand jury subpoena, provided defendant's home address. (United States v. Contreras (5th Cir. TX, 2018) 905 F.3rd 853.)

The California Supreme Court ruled that the Court of Appeal was correct in order the quashing of subpoenas for Facebook, Instagram and Twitter records to the extent if found the subpoenas unenforceable under the Stored Communications Act with respect to communications that are private or restricted. However, the Court of Appeal's determination was erroneous to the extent it concluded that the Act bars disclosure by providers of communications configured by the registered user to be public and were public at the time the subpoenas were issued. (Facebook, Inc. v. The Superior Court (2018) 4 Cal.5th 1245.)

Thermal Imaging Device: The use of a "thermal imaging device" (also known as a "FLIR," for "Forward Looking Infra Red.") to read the amount of heat coming from a person's home, without prior judicial authorization, is an unconstitutional invasion of one's right to privacy in the home. (Kyllo v. United States (2001) 533 U.S. 27 [121 S.Ct. 2038; 150 L.Ed.2nd 94].)

"To withdraw protection of this minimum expectation (of privacy in one's home) would be to permit police technology to erode the privacy guaranteed by the Fourth Amendment. We think that obtaining by sense-enhancing technology any information regarding the interior of the home that could not otherwise have been obtained without physical 'intrusion into a constitutionally protected area,' [Citation] constitutes a search—at least where (as here) the technology in question is not in general public use. This assures preservation of that degree of privacy against government that existed when the Fourth Amendment was adopted. On the basis of this criterion, the information obtained by the thermal imager in this case was the product of a search. [footnote omitted]" (Id., at p. 34 [150 L.Ed.2nd at p. 102].)

As a "search," a search warrant is necessary before a thermal imagining device can be used to deduce the presence and quantity of heat coming from a person's home. (Ibid.)

California's limited authority also holds that use of such a device is an unreasonable invasion of one's expectation of privacy, at least when used to measure heat from a person's private dwelling. (People v. Deutsch (1996) 44 Cal.App.4th 1224.)

But, evidence from the use of a thermal imaging device, when lawfully obtained with judicial authorization (i.e., a search warrant), may be used as a part of the probable cause for a second search warrant. (United States v. Huggins (9th Cir. 2002) 299 F.3rd 1039.)

A search warrant authorizing the use of a thermal imaging device must be supported by probable cause, or such a warrant will be held to be invalid. (People v. Gotfried (2003) 107 Cal.App.4th 254.)

However, where FBI agents used "Moocherhunter software" and a specific "media access control" (or, "MAC") address, to capture the signal strength readings to locate the MAC address, it was held that Kyllo was not violated. Specifically, a Moocherhunter program was installed on a laptop computer by FBI agents and connected to a directional antenna. The Moocherhunter program was provided the known MAC address. Approximately seventeen location readings were taken in the vicinity of Apartments 242 and 243, from where via subpoena to AT&T, it was determined that a computer was transmitting child pornography via a third-party's password-protected wireless router. The readings were significantly higher when the antennae was aimed in the direction of Apartment 243. As a result, the agents concluded that Apartment 243 was from where the child pornography was being transmitted. After identifying the target apartment, the FBI waited for the computer to long on, at which time a search warrant was executed on that apartment. After being arrested for possession of child pornography, defendant challenged the legality of locating his apartment by such electronic means. The Appellate Court upheld the trial court's denial of defendant's motion, ruling that because there was no physical intrusion into the defendant's residence to detect the signal strength of his device's media-access-control (MAC) address, district court correctly applied the Katz factors (referring to Katz v. United States (1967) 389 U.S. 347, 3612 [88 S.Ct. 507; 19 L.Ed.2nd 576, 588].) and determined that no search occurred under the Fourth Amendment. Also, defendant lacked a subjective expectation of privacy in the signal strength of his MAC address emanating from his unauthorized use of a third-party's password-protected wireless router. (United States v. Norris (9th Cir. 2019) 938 F.3rd 1114, 1119-1122.)

ShotSpotter: ShotSpotter is a surveillance system that uses microphones to record gunshots in a specific area (e.g., a specific city; People v. Rubio (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 342, 345.). After an individual listens to the audio file and confirms the sound as a gunshot, ShotSpotter sends an alert to the local police department. (See also United States v. Rickmon (7th Cir. 2020) 952 F.3rd 876.)

A "ShotSpotter" report of shots being fired in two separate bursts at the edge of driveway at a specific address does not provide the necessary exigent circumstance justifying an officer forcing his way into the residence. The emergency aid exception did not apply because the police had no reasonable basis to conclude there was anyone inside the apartment who was in danger or distress, and the exigent circumstances exception did not apply because police had no reason to believe a shooter was hiding in the apartment or that evidence of criminal conduct would be destroyed before they had a chance to obtain a warrant. (People v. Rubio, supra, at pp. 348-355.)

In Rickmon, the Court noted that a ShotSpotter report is the equivalent of an anonymous tip, not amounting, by itself, to even a reasonable suspicion. However, with corroborating circumstances, a traffic stop and detention would be justified. In Rickmon, after getting two separate ShotSpotter reports from the same area, stopping a vehicle as it was observed coming from the area of the ShotSpotter reports, and in which defendant was found (with the subsequent recovery of an illegal firearm), was upheld based upon the following; (1) the reliability of the police reports, (2) the severity of the crime, (3) the fact that the stop occurred close in time and proximity to the shots, (4) late at night in an area of light traffic, and (5) the officer's experience with gun-related calls in that area.

A trial court erred in admitting an audio recording of sounds identified by a third-party service as gunshots detected in certain areas of the city which was sent to the police department by the service because the court failed to first conduct an evidentiary hearing to assess the evidence's scientific reliability pursuant to the Kelly/Frye standard. The error was prejudicial and required reversal of defendant's conviction for assault with a semi-automatic firearm because the evidence was the only unambiguous evidence that defendant had fired seven shots and, therefore, had to have used a semi-automatic firearm rather than a revolver which could only fire up to six shots. (People v. Hardy (2021) 65 Cal.App.5th 312.)

> Note: The "Kelly/Frye" test for evidence admissibility refers to the standards for the admission into evidence of new scientific techniques, per People v. Kelly (1976) 17 Cal.3rd 24; and Frye v. United States (D.C. Cir. 1923) 293 F. 1013.)

Officers responded to the 3500 block of 13th Street Southeast in Washington D.C. based upon a spotfinder report of shots fired at that location, soon confirmed by persons calling into the Metropolitan Police Department (MPD). No injured persons were found at that location. But defendant was observed walking there, and that he was the only person on that block at the time. He was quickly detained. Found to be in the illegal possession of a firearm, defendant argued that his detention was illegal and that the gun should have been suppressed. The Court disagreed, finding that the officers had a reasonable suspicion to detain him based upon the following: (1) The ShotSpotter alert and dispatcher report from MPD indicating that shots were fired in the 3500 block of 13th Street Southeast; (2) the officers arrived at the location of the reported gunshots within a minute and a half of the MPD call; (3) officers observation of defendant being the only person on that block; (4) defendant was walking quickly away from the location of the shooting; and (5) defendant did not initially respond to an officer's repeated efforts to get his attention and continued to walk away. (United States v. Jones (D.C. Cir. 2021) 1 F.3rd 50.)

A Buster: Use of a "Buster" on a vehicle at the Mexico/U.S. border, given the lack of any proof that the defendant was exposed to any danger from the radioactivity in the device, does not require any suspicion in a border search. (United States v. Camacho (9th Cir. 2004) 368 F.3rd 1182.)

> A "Buster" is "a handheld portable density gauge. . . . It contains a tiny bead of radioactive material called barium 133 that's inside a sealed container. . . . (W)hen the actuating trigger is pushed, the container rolls to an open slot and exposes the radiation in a forward direction (providing a reading on the density of an object." A higher reading than normal indicates that something not normally there is hidden in the object being evaluated, such as in the spare tire in this case. (Id., at p. 1184.)

> Note that the Court in Camacho differentiated the Buster from x-rays of a person which, per the court, does require a "heightened level of suspicion" (i.e., a "reasonable suspicion." See United States v. Camacho, supra, p. 1186, fn. 1) to use in a border search situation given the potential personal health issues of exposing a person's body to x-rays. (See also United States v. Ik (9th Cir. 1982) 676 F.2nd 379, 382.)

Also note that using the Buster on a vehicle or other container in other than a border search situation would likely require full "probable cause" under the theory of Kyllo, supra, in that it is inspecting items contained within the vehicle or container itself and not just heat emanating from the vehicle or other container. However, there is no case law on this issue as of yet.

Spike Mike: The warrantless use of a "spike mike," which, though contact with a heating duct, was able to pick up defendant's conversations while inside his home, was held to be a Fourth Amendment violation. (Silverman v. United States (1961) 365 U.S. 505 [81 S.Ct. 679; 5 L.Ed.2nd 734].)

Aerial Surveillance: Overflights over a suspect's backyard (i.e., within the "curtilage" of the home), so long as the observers are in the legal ("navigable") airspace, when naked-eye observations of illegal activity below are made, are legal, whether the observers are on routine patrol or are responding to a specific tip and/or otherwise purposely looking into the defendant's yard. (California v. Ciraolo (1986) 476 U.S. 207 [106 S.Ct. 1809; 90 L.Ed.2nd 210].)

Note: See "Open Fields" (Chapter 15), below.

California's previous rule that observations of contraband within the curtilage of one's home (i.e., the yard) under such circumstances should be suppressed (see People v. Cook (1985) 41 Cal.3rd 373; People v. Ciraolo (1984) 161 Cal.App.3rd 1081.) was overruled in California v. Ciraolo, supra. Passage of Proposition 8 in June, 1982, dictates that California follow the federal rule.

The federal Environmental Protection Agency's use of aerial photography, flying at the legal "navigable altitude," was held to be within its statutory authority, as a regulatory and enforcement agency requires no explicit authorization to employ methods of observation available to the public. Additionally, the taking of photographs of petitioner's complex from navigable airspace was not a search prohibited by the Fourth Amendment. (Dow Chemical Co. v. United States (1986) 476 U.S. 227 [106 S.Ct. 1819; 90 L.Ed.2nd 226].)

Overflights conducted by officers of a greenhouse situated 125 yards from a two-story residence did not constitute a search requiring a warrant under the Fourth Amendment. (United States v. Broadhurst (9th Cir. 1986) 805 F.2nd 849, 849-850, 856-857.)

In April 2020, the Baltimore City Policy Department formed a contract with Persistent Surveillance Systems (PSS) for PSS to conduct an Aerial Investigation Research (AIR) pilot program in Baltimore. During the AIR pilot program, PSS plans to fly aircrafts over Baltimore for approximately twelve hours every day for six months. Once per second, the planes will collect images of approximately ninety percent of the city at a time. This surveillance system would record virtually all of the outdoor movements of all of Baltimore's 600,000 residents.

Plaintiffs filed a lawsuit in federal court under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 2201 seeking declaratory and injunctive relief, arguing that the AIR pilot program violates their constitutional rights under the First and Fourth Amendments. Specifically, they claimed that the constant surveillance infringed their reasonable expectation of privacy, resulted in indiscriminate searches, and the data analysis violated the Fourth Amendment. The plaintiffs also claimed that their First Amendment right to freedom of association was violated. The trial court held for the defendant police department (456 F. Supp. 3d 699) and plaintiff's appealed. The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeal, in a 2-to-1 decision, ruled that Baltimore's aerial surveillance plane program is in fact constitutional, finding that the plane does in fact help police combat crime without violating resident's right to privacy. Per the Court: "In addition to not infringing a reasonable expectation of privacy, the AIR program seeks to meet a serious law enforcement need without unduly burdening constitutional rights." (Leaders of a Beautiful Struggle v. Baltimore Police Department (4th Cir. 2020) 979 F.3rd 219.)

Note: See "Drones," immediately below.

Drones*:

Limited Authority: As of yet, there are very limited California criminal statutes (and no reported cases) specifically dealing with the use of "drones," or unmanned aerial surveillance tools.

Federal Law:

14 Code of Federal Regulations, Part I & Part 21: Anyone who owns a small unmanned aircraft of a certain weight (between .55 and 55 pounds) must register with the Federal Aviation Administration's Unmanned Aircraft System (UAS) registry before they fly outdoors. People who previously operated their UAS must register by February 19, 2016. People who do not register could face civil and criminal penalties.

See https://registermyuas.faa.gov/.

Unmanned Aircraft weighing more than 55 pounds (25 kg) cannot use this registration process and must register using the Aircraft Registry process.

See 14 Code of Federal Regulations Part 107 of the Federal Aviation Regulations, effective August 29, 2016, for regulations relevant to the "non-hobbyist" drone users.

Code of Federal Regulations ("C.F.R."): It is unlawful for a person to operate a drone . . . :

> 14 C.F.R § 107.23: . . . "in a careless or reckless manner" . . . or to "allow an object to be dropped from a small unmanned aircraft in a manner that creates an undue hazard to persons or property."
>
> 14 C.F.R § 107.39: . . . above people who have not consented to the operation.
> 14 C.F.R § 107.51: . . . at an altitude higher than 400 feet above ground level.
>
> Punishment: Violation of the above subjects the drone operator to civil and criminal penalties pursuant to 14 C.F.R. Part 13.

Case Law:

> The US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upheld the Federal Aviation Administration's (FAA) rule on drone identification. Plaintiff Tyler Brennan, a drone user, and the drone equipment retailer owned by Brennan, RaceDayQuads LLC, challenged the FAA over its Remote Identification Rule of April 2021. The rule requires drone manufacturers to begin producing drones with remote ID. The FAA rule requires "drones in flight to emit publically readable radio signals reflecting certain identifying information, including their serial number, location, and performance information." The FAA has compared remote ID to a "digital license plate." The Court rejected the plaintiffs' argument that the Remote ID rule amounted to "constant, warrantless governmental surveillance in violation of the Fourth Amendment." (Brennan v. Dickson (Dist. of Columbia Cir. (2022) 45 F.4th 48.)

California Law:

> Civ. Code § 1708.8 provides for the potential civil liability of a person for a physical invasion of privacy which includes when that person knowingly enters the airspace above the land of another person without permission or while committing a trespass in order to capture a visual image, sound recording, or physical impression of the plaintiff engaging in a private, personal, or familial activity, and the invasion occurs in a manner that is offensive to a reasonable person.

Gov't. Code §§ 853, 853.1; Civil. Code § 43.101: Destruction of Drones by Government Entities; Immunity From Liability:

> A local public entity and/or a public employee of a local public entity is immune from any damage they cause to an unmanned aircraft (e.g., a drone) that is interfering with the operation or support of emergency medical services, firefighting services, or search and rescue services provided by the local public entity.

Gov't. Code § 853.5: Drones; Definitions: The following definitions shall apply to this chapter:

> Subd. (a): "Unmanned aircraft" means an aircraft that is operated without the possibility of direct human intervention from within or on the aircraft.
>
> Subd. (b): "Unmanned aircraft system" means an unmanned aircraft and associated elements, including, but not limited to, communication links and the components that control the unmanned aircraft that are required for the pilot in command to operate safely and efficiently in the national airspace system.

Pen. Code § 402: Sightseeing at the Scene of an Emergency; Drones:

> Subd. (a)(2): The misdemeanor crime of sightseeing at the scene of an emergency is expanded as of January 1, 2017, to include a person, regardless of his or her location, who operates or uses an unmanned aerial vehicle, remote piloted aircraft, or drone at the scene of an emergency.
>
> Punishment: Misdemeanor; 6 months in county jail and/or a fine of up to $1,000. (P.C. § 19)

Pen. Code § 647(j)(1): Privacy Invasion:

> As amended effective January 1, 2020, adding electronic devices and unmanned aircraft systems (e.g., drones) to the list of instrumentalities (camera, camcorders, binoculars, mobile phones, etc.) that may not be used to invade the privacy of a person in a bedroom, bathroom, changing room, or any other place where the person has a reasonable expectation of privacy.

Pen. Code § 4577: Drone Use Over the Grounds of a State Prison, a Jail, or a Juvenile Hall, Camp, or Ranch:

> Subd. (a): A person who knowingly and intentionally operates an unmanned aircraft system on or above the grounds of a state prison, a jail, or a juvenile hall, camp, or ranch is guilty of an infraction, punishable by a fine of five hundred dollars ($500).
>
> Subd. (b): This section does not apply to a person employed by the prison who operates the unmanned aircraft system within the scope of his or her employment, or a person who receives prior permission from the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation to operate the unmanned aircraft system over the prison.
>
> Subd. (c): This section does not apply to a person employed by the jail who operates the unmanned aircraft system within the scope of his or her employment, or a person who receives prior permission from the county sheriff to operate the unmanned aircraft system over the jail.
>
> Subd. (d): This section does not apply to a person employed by the county department that operates the juvenile hall, camp, or ranch who operates the unmanned aircraft system within the scope of his or her employment, or a person who receives prior permission from the county department that operates the juvenile hall, camp, or ranch to operate the unmanned aircraft system over the juvenile hall, camp, or ranch.
>
> Subd. (e): Definitions:
>
> > (1) "Unmanned aircraft" means an aircraft that is operated without the possibility of direct human intervention from within or on the aircraft.
> >
> > (2) "Unmanned aircraft system" means an unmanned aircraft and associated elements, including, but not limited to, communication links and the components that control the unmanned aircraft that are required for the pilot in command to operate safely and efficiently in the national airspace system.

Facial Recognition Software and Biometric Features*:

Facial Recognition Software: The use of software that allows the matching of one's face by matching from a photograph some 16,000 recognition points to photographs already in law enforcement possession has not yet been tested in the courts. (But see Pen. Code § 832.19, below.)

Biometric Features: See the debate on the use of "biometric features" (e.g., such as pressing a finger or a thumb onto the screen of a digital devices, or using facial or iris recognition) as they related to passwords used to open and view the contents of electronic devices such as computers and cellphones:

> Cases holding that requiring a suspect to provide his biometric features to law enforcement is, as constituting a "testimonial communication," a Fifth Amendment self-incrimination violation; both federal district court decisions:

> > In re Application for a Search Warrant (N.D. Ill. 2017) 236 F. Supp. 3rd 1066.
>
> Holding that biometric features are not a Fifth Amendment issue; a state Supreme Court and state intermediate Court of Appeal decisions: See Minnesota v. Diamond (2018) 905 N.W.2nd 870; and Commonwealth of Virginia v. Baust (Va. Cir. Ct. 2014) 89 Va. Cir. 267.

Pen. Code § 832.19: Statutory Restrictions on the Use of Biometric Surveillance System Used Via an Officer Body Camera:

> (a) For the purposes of this section, the following terms have the following meanings:
>
> > (1) "Biometric data" means a physiological, biological, or behavioral characteristic that can be used, singly or in combination with each other or with other information, to establish individual identity.
> >
> > (2) "Biometric surveillance system" means any computer software or application that performs facial recognition or other biometric surveillance.
> >
> > (3) "Facial recognition or other biometric surveillance" means either of the following, alone or in combination:
> >
> > > (A) An automated or semiautomated process that captures or analyzes biometric data of an individual to identify or assist in identifying an individual.

(B) An automated or semiautomated process that generates, or assists in generating, surveillance information about an individual based on biometric data.

(4) "Facial recognition or other biometric surveillance" does not include the use of an automated or semiautomated process for the purpose of redacting a recording for release or disclosure outside the law enforcement agency to protect the privacy of a subject depicted in the recording, if the process does not generate or result in the retention of any biometric data or surveillance information.

(5) "Law enforcement agency" means any police department, sheriff's department, district attorney, county probation department, transit agency police department, school district police department, highway patrol, the police department of any campus of the University of California, the California State University, or a community college, the Department of the California Highway Patrol, and the Department of Justice.

(6) "Law enforcement officer" means an officer, deputy, employee, or agent of a law enforcement agency.

(7) "Officer camera" means a body-worn camera or similar device that records or transmits images or sound and is attached to the body or clothing of, or carried by, a law enforcement officer.

(8) "Surveillance information" means either of the following, alone or in combination:

(A) Any information about a known or unknown individual, including, but not limited to, a person's name, date of birth, gender, or criminal background.

(B) Any information derived from biometric data, including, but not limited to, assessments about an individual's sentiment, state of mind, or level of dangerousness.

(9) "Use" means either of the following, alone or in combination:

(A) The direct use of a biometric surveillance system by a law enforcement officer or law enforcement agency.

(B) A request or agreement by a law enforcement officer or law enforcement agency that another law enforcement agency or other third party use a biometric surveillance system on behalf of the requesting officer or agency.

(b) A law enforcement agency or law enforcement officer shall not install, activate, or use any biometric surveillance system in connection with an officer camera or data collected by an officer camera.

(c) In addition to any other sanctions, penalties, or remedies provided by law, a person may bring an action for equitable or declaratory relief in a court of competent jurisdiction against a law enforcement agency or law enforcement officer that violates this section.

(d) This section does not preclude a law enforcement agency or law enforcement officer from using a mobile fingerprint scanning device during a lawful detention to identify a person who does not have proof of identification if this use is lawful and does not generate or result in the retention of any biometric data or surveillance information.

(e) This section shall remain in effect only until January 1, 2023, and as of that date is repealed. (As noted here, this section has in fact been repealed.)

Stingray* (Kingfish) Device:

Pursuant to the California Electronic Communications Privacy Act (P.C. §§ 1546-1546.4), a search warrant must be obtained before law enforcement may use a "Stingray" device.

A "Stingray" (or "Kingfish") device, also known as a "cell-site simulator," is usually used to pinpoint the location of a cellphone (See United States v. Artis (9th Cir. 2019) 919 F.3rd 1123.), but can also in some cases intercept calls and text messages.

See "The California Electronic Communications Privacy Act: P.C. §§ 1546-1546.4," under "Searches and Seizures of High Tech Devices" (Chapter 17), below.

See also "The Federal Electronic Communications Privacy Act*, *18 U.S.C. §§ 2701 et seq." under "P.C. § 1524.2(b): Records of Foreign Corporations Providing Electronic Communications or Remote Computing Services," under "Searches With a Search Warrant" (Chapter 10), above.

Automated License Plate Readers* ("ALPR"):

A "license plate recognition system" (or "ALPR") is defined as "a searchable computerized database resulting from the operation of one or more mobile or fixed cameras combined with other computer algorithms to read and convert images of registration plates and the characters they contain into computer-readable data," or "automated license plate recognition (ALPR) data." Statutes in the Civil Code require ALPR operators to maintain reasonable security procedures and practices, including protecting ALPR information from unauthorized access, detection, use, modification, or disclosure. A use and privacy policy, establishing minimum standards, must be implemented. (Civ. Code §§ 1798.90.5, 1798.90.51, 1798.90.52, 1798.90.53, 1798.90.54, 1798.90.55.)

> Note: ALPRs has been described as "high-speed, computer-controlled camera systems" that are attached to vehicles, such as police cars, or can be mounted on street poles, highway overpasses, or mobile trailers. Some models can photograph up to 1,800 license plates every minute. Every week, law enforcement agencies across the country use these cameras to collect data on millions of vehicles. The plate numbers, together with location, date, and time information, are uploaded to central servers, and made instantly available to other agencies. The location data generated by ALPRs is so precise it can place a vehicle in front of a specific home or business, . . . Law enforcement agencies may maintain their own databases of ALPR data or store their data with private companies. (Electronic Frontier Foundations: "Courts Issue Rulings in Two Cases Challenging Law Enforcement Searches of License Plate Databases" [referring to United States v. Yang (9th Cir. 2020) 958 F.3rd 851, and Commonwealth v. McCarthy (2020) 484 Mass. 493.]

The use of an automated license plate recognition (ALPR) system provided the necessary reasonable suspicion for a traffic stop, as required by the Fourth Amendment, because the LPR system merely automated what could otherwise be accomplished by checking the license-plate number against a hot sheet of numbers or using other investigative tools. (United States v. Williams (8th Cir. 2015) 796 F.3rd 951.)

Where a "high risk" stop of a suspected stolen vehicle was made, such stop being precipitated by a misreading of the license plate by an "automated license plate reader" and where the stop was made without first making a visual verification that the license on the stopped vehicle was as interpreted by the plate reader, the lawfulness of such a stop was held to be a triable issue for a civil jury to decide. (Green v. City & County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2014) 751 F.3rd 1039, 1045-1046; discounting without discussion the possibility that the stop was based upon a reasonable mistake of fact.)

In a case in which two organizations petitioned for a writ of mandate to compel disclosure of requested automated license plate reader (ALPR) data pursuant to the California Public Records Act, the California Supreme Court, reversing a lower court, concluded that the ALPR scan data at issue are not subject to Govt. Code § 6254(f)'s exemption for records of investigations. The process of ALPR scanning does not produce records of investigations because the scans are not conducted as a part of a targeted inquiry into any particular crime or crimes. Regarding the application of the catchall exemption set forth in Govt. Code § 6255(a), the Supreme Court noted the trial court appeared to have placed significant weight on speculative concerns about possible disclosure of mobile ALPR patrol patterns, without record evidence to support its conclusions. The Court held this to be error. (American Civil Liberties Union Foundation v. Superior Court (2017) 3 Cal.5th 1032.)

See Commonwealth v. McCarthy (2020) 484 Mass. 493; where the Massachusetts Supreme Court held that the limited use of automatic license plate readers did not constitute a search within the meaning of either Mass. Const. Decl. Rights art. 14 or the Fourth Amendment because defendant's expectation of privacy was not invaded by four cameras at fixed locations on the ends of two bridges.

Upon defendant being charged with stealing mail out of collection boxes, his motion to suppress evidence seized as a result of his rental car's license plate being located through Automatic License Plate Recognition (ALPR) technology was properly denied. Defendant had no reasonable expectation of privacy in the historical location data of the car because he had kept it six days past the return date during which he disabled its GPS locator feature. There was no evidence that the rental agency had a policy or practice of allowing lessees to keep cars beyond the rental period, and the agency had made affirmative attempts to repossess the vehicle by activating the GPS unit to locate and disable the vehicle. Further, the rental contract provided that vehicles not returned by the due date would be reported stolen. (United States v. Yang (9th Cir. 2020) 958 F.3rd 851, 858-862; declining to determine whether a defendant had standing to object to a "search" of a rental vehicle's historical location information that was captured and uploaded to a database prior to the expiration of the rental agreement.)

Electronic Tracking Devices* (Transmitters):

Rule: Electronic Tracking Devices are lawful to use in tracking, so long as the route used is otherwise open to view and so long as the installation of the tracking device itself was not accomplished in violation of the Fourth Amendment. (United States v. Knotts (1983) 460 U.S. 276 [103 S.Ct. 1081; 75 L.Ed.2nd 55]; but see United States v. Jones. infra.)

But see "Pen. Code § 637.7: Statutory Restrictions," below

Restrictions:

However, the act of putting a tracking device (e.g., a "Global Positioning System," or "GPS" device) onto a vehicle, even the exterior or undercarriage, is a Fourth Amendment search. (United States v. Jones (2012) 565 U.S. 400 [132 S.Ct. 945; 181 L.Ed.2nd 911]; overruling prior cases to the contrary.)

The Court in Jones did not indicate, however, whether a search warrant would be necessary, declining to rule on whether such a search, even if warrantless, was "reasonable" under the circumstances because that argument had been "forfeited" when not raised at the trial court level. (United States v. Jones, supra, at p. 413.)

> Note: The inference is that a lawful exception to the search warrant requirement might apply, depending upon the circumstances, but that otherwise, a warrant is probably required.

In Knotts, supra, the tracking device (i.e., a "beeper") was already contained in a five-gallon drum when given to the defendant who put it in his car. There being no installation of the device onto or into defendant's car by law enforcement, there was no "search" involved.

> See Carpenter v. United States (June 22, 2018) 585 U.S. __, __ [138 S.Ct. 2206; 201 L.Ed.2nd 507].

United States v. Jones, supra, specifically did not rule whether the act of tracking a vehicle through the use of a GPS was a Fourth Amendment issue that required a search warrant (supra, at p. 413) although the minority opinion argued that the use of a GPS for "an extended period of time" (e.g., a month) would require a warrant. (pg. 430.)

See also United States v. Wahchumwah (9th Cir. 2013) 710 F.3rd 862, 868, refusing to extend the theory of Jones to the use of a buttonhole audio-video device in a suspect's home by an undercover agent who was in the defendant's home by invitation.

Leaving the tracking device, located in a container, turned on after it disappears into a house (at least when done without a search warrant) is an invasion of privacy, and unlawful. (United States v. Karo (1984) 468 U.S. 705 [104 S.Ct. 3296; 82 L.Ed.2nd 530].)

When the transmitter is contained inside property which has been stolen, defendant's possession of the stolen property in his vehicle (United States v. Jones (4th Cir. 1994) 31 F.3rd 1304, in a stolen mail bag.) or in a motel room (People v. Erwin (1997) 55 Cal.App.4th 15, in a stolen bank bag.) does not make the warrantless "search" unlawful.

> Note: In Karo, the transmitter was followed while it was moved about inside a private residence, then to two different storage facilities, and into a second residence; a circumstance not present in the Fourth Circuit's Jones or in Erwin.

In following stolen stereo speakers containing tracking devices into a home, exigent circumstances of a fresh crime and the possibility that the speakers would be destroyed if officers waited for a warrant, justified an immediate entry to secure the house. (See People v. Hull (1995) 34 Cal.App.4th 1448, 1452, 1455-1457.)

In a post-Supreme Court United States v. Jones case, the Eight Circuit Court of Appeal concluded that a police detective did not commit a trespass when he located a suspect's car in a parking lot by using the suspect's key fob to trigger the car's alarm. The court reasoned that the detective had lawfully seized the key fob and the "mere transmission of electric signals alone" through the key fob was not a trespass on the car. (United States v. Cowan (8th Cir. 2012) 674 F.3rd 947, 956.)

In a case prior to the Supreme Court decision in United States v. Jones, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal initially found that the placing of an electronic transmitter onto the undercarriage of defendant's vehicle while the vehicle is in his driveway, within the curtilage of the home, and without a warrant, was lawful (See United States v. Pineda-Moreno (9th Cir. 2010) 591 F.3rd 1212, certiorari granted.).

> When reconsidered in light of Jones, the 9th Circuit reversed itself, finding it to be a Fourth Amendment violation. (United States v. Pineda-Moreno (9th Cir. 2012) 688 F.3rd 1087.) The Court, however, affirmed defendant's conviction again. While noting that under Jones, the attaching of a GPS onto defendant's vehicle while in parked within the curtilage of defendant's residence was indeed illegal, the officers, in good faith, were merely following existing precedent. As such, defendant was not entitled to the suppression of the resulting evidence per the U.S. Supreme Court's rule that the Exclusionary Rule does not apply under such circumstances. (Ibid., citing Davis v. United States (2011) 564 U.S. 229, 236-239 [131 S.Ct. 2419; 180 L.Ed.2nd 285].)

See also United States v. Sparks (1st Cir. 2013) 711 F.3rd 58; holding that the use of a GPS prior to the U.S. Supreme Court's Decision in United States v. Jones, supra, even if done in violation of the Fourth Amendment, does not require the suppression of the resulting evidence due to the officer's good faith reliance in earlier binding precedence. (Accord; United States v. Barraza-Maldonado (8th Cir. 2013) 732 F.3rd 865; noting the Ninth Circuit's original rule under United States v. Pineda-Moreno, supra, which, at the time, had held that no warrant was necessary.)

> But see United States v. Katzin (3rd Cir. 2013) 732 F.3rd 187, ruling that "good faith" didn't save the evidence discovered after using a GPS without a warrant on defendant's vehicle in violation of Jones, in that the prior cases were in conflict on this issue.
> Note: This appears to be a minority opinion.

California follows the majority rule, dictated by Davis v. United States, supra, that because California case law allowed for the warrantless placement of a GPS device by law enforcement at the time such a device was placed on the co-defendant's car in this case (i.e., 2007), the fact that the United States Supreme Court has since held that such conduct required a warrant does not dictate exclusion of the tracking device evidence. (People v. Mackey (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 32, 93-97.)

A minor, as a condition of probation when the minor is a W&I § 601 ward of the court for being an excessive truant, may lawfully be required to wear a GPS tracking device. (In re A.M. (2013) 220 Cal. App. 4th 1494, 1498-1501.)

However, requiring a recidivist sex offender to wear a satellite-based monitor (SBM) for the rest of his life, done for the purpose of tracking the individual's movements and to "obtain information," constitutes a "search," under the Fourth Amendment, and under the theory of United States v. Jones, supra. The fact that North Carolina's SBM program is civil in nature does make it any less of a Fourth Amendment search issue. (Grady v. North Carolina (2015) 575 U.S. 306 [135 S.Ct. 1368; 191 L.Ed.2nd 459]; case remanded for the purpose of determining the reasonableness of the search under the circumstances.)

The Federal Fourth Circuit Court of Appeal held that purposely and knowingly ignoring the search warrant requirement by attaching a GPS to defendant's vehicle without a warrant, being the type of "flagrant disregard for the warrant requirement" the Exclusionary Rule was intended to prevent, required the suppression of evidence despite the fact that by the time defendant's vehicle was stopped and drugs were found a warrant had been obtained (without telling the magistrate that a GPS had already been attached). (United States v. Terry (4th Cir. W. VA. 2018) 909 F.3rd 716.)

Pen. Code § 637.7: Statutory Restrictions: The California Legislature has chosen to legislatively restrict the use of electronic tracking devices:

Subd. (a): Use of Electronic Tracking Devices:

No person or entity in this state shall use an electronic tracking device to determine the location or movement of a person.

Subd. (b) and (c): Exceptions:

Subd. (b): When the registered owner, lessor, or lessee of a vehicle has consented to the use of the electronic tracking device with respect to that vehicle.

Subd. (c): An otherwise lawful use of an electronic tracking device by a law enforcement agency.

Subd. (d): "Electronic tracking device" is defined as any device attached to a vehicle or other movable thing that reveals its location or movement by the transmission of electronic signals.

Subd. (e): A violation is a misdemeanor.

Subd. (f): A violation is also grounds for revocation of a business license.

Note: In enacting this section, effective 1/1/1999, the Legislature noted the following: "The Legislature finds and declares that the right to privacy is fundamental in a free and civilized society and that the increasing use of electronic surveillance devices is eroding personal liberty. The Legislature declares that electronic tracking of a person's location without that person's knowledge violates that person's reasonable expectation of privacy. (Stats 1998, ch. 449, Section 1.)

Case Law:

Penal Code § 637.7, using an electronic tracking device to determine the location or movement of a person, is unconstitutionally vague as applied to defendant husband pending separation with his wife, who placed a magnetic tracking device on his wife's car for which both spouses were registered owners since the statute does not indicate if the consent of one owner to tracking is sufficient for exclusion under subdivision (b) as to the registered owner, lessor, or lessee of a vehicle who consents to the use of the device as to that vehicle. (People v. Agnelli (2021) 68 Cal.App.Supp. 1.)

Note also that Indiana's State Supreme Court has held that it is not a theft for a suspect to remove a GPS from his own vehicle, invalidating a search warrant based upon the theory that defendant had stolen the GPS by removing and disabling it, and ruling that it was mere speculation to believe that defendant possessed the instrument. (Heuring v. State of Indiana (2020) 140 N.E.3rd 270.)

The obtaining of tracking warrants—used to monitor defendant's travels between California and Reno, Nevada—was upheld when the probable cause for the warrants was obtained from records which themselves were obtained without a warrant during the investigation of crimes related to the dispensing of controlled substances consisting of opioids. Defendant challenged the warrantless obtaining of such records. The Court upheld defendant's conviction, noting that both Nevada law (Nev. Rev. Stat. § 453.162; establishing the "Prescription Monitoring Program") and federal law (Pub. L. No. 91-513, Tit. II, 84 Stat. 1236, 1272 (1970) (codified at 21 U.S.C. § 876(a)) upheld the warrantless obtaining of such opioid-dispensing records. "[T]he Attorney General may . . . require the production of any records . . . which the Attorney General finds relevant or material to [an] investigation [related to controlled substances]." "Both federal (and state) laws regulate controlled substances by requiring pharmacies . . . to maintain prescription drug records and keep them open for inspection by law enforcement officers without the need of a warrant." (United States v. Motley (9th Cir. 2023) 89 F.4th 777, 783-787; citing United States Department of Justice v. Ricco Jonas (1st Cir. 2022) 24 F.4th 718, at 735.)

See "Prescription Monitoring Programs," under "Warrantless Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 9), above.

"Pinging" a Cellphone*:

Old Rule:

Historically, the courts allowed for the "pinging" of a suspect's cell phone, or the use of data collected from cellphone towers that provided a history of when a suspect's cellphone was close enough to use a particular cellphone tower (i.e., "cell-site location information (CSLI)"), without a search warrant. Per 18 U.S.C. § 2703(d) of the federal "Stored Communications Act," no more than a "court order" was required, and was obtainable whenever the Government could show "specific and articulable facts showing that there are reasonable grounds to believe" that the "historical" records sought "are relevant and material to an ongoing criminal investigation." (See United States v. Davis (11th Cir. 2015) 785 F.3rd 498; United States v. Thompson (10th Cir. Kan. 2017) 866 F.3rd 1149; United States v. Stimler (3rd Cir. 2017) 864 F.3rd 253; United States

v. Dorsey (Cal. 2015) 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23693; United States v. Rosario (N.D. ILL. 2017) 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73921; and United States v. Carpenter (6th Cir. 2016) 819 F.3rd 880, cert. granted.)

Note: "Cell sites usually consist of a set of radio antennas mounted on a tower, although 'they can also be found on light posts, flagpoles, church steeples, or the sides of buildings.' Carpenter v. United States, 138 S.Ct. 2206, 2211, 201 L.Ed.2nd 507 (2018). 'Each time [a] phone connects to a cell site, it generates a time-stamped record known as cell-site location information (CSLI).' Id. This CSLI data indicates the general geographic area in which the cell phone user was located when his or her phone connected to the network. Because most smartphones tap into the wireless network 'several times a minute whenever their signal is on . . . modern cell phones generate increasingly vast amounts of increasingly precise CSLI.' Id. at 2211-12." (United States v. Elmore (9th Cir. 2019) 917 F.3rd 1068, 1072, fn. 2.)

See also United States v. Wallace (5th Cir. Tex. 2017) 857 F.3rd 685: Even if a "Ping Order," issued under the federal pen-trap statute, 18 U.S.C. § 2703(d) of the Stored Communications Act, and state law, was issued in violation of the federal pen-trap statute or state law, defendant was not entitled to suppression of the evidence as neither the pen-trap statute nor the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure provides for suppression of evidence as a remedy for a violation.

California was in apparent accord, allowing for the pinging of a victim's cellphone, using its GPS capabilities to track defendant who had just stolen it in a robbery, holding that it was not a Fourth Amendment violation to do so. (People v. Barnes (2013) 216 Cal.App.4th 1508, 1517-1519; no trespassory placing of the GPS into the defendant's property (now a violation of the rule of United States v. Jones (2012) 565 U.S. 400 [132 S.Ct. 945; 181 L.Ed.2nd 911].), and no expectation of privacy violated.

See also People v. Zichwic (2001) 94 Cal.App.4th 944, which held that putting a pinging device on defendant's vehicle was lawful, and that monitoring the device was not unlawful whether or not doing so constituted a "search," despite the lack of a search warrant.

See also Pen. Code § 1546 et seq., California's "Electronic Communications Privacy Act," which, by statute, greatly restricts law enforcement's access to electronic communication information from a service provider in California.

New Rule:

The Courts, however, started having some reservations over the old rule. Notably, United States v. Graham (4th Cir. 2015) 796 F.3rd 332, held, in a split 2-1 decision, that the warrantless, extended, accessing of two of defendants' cell-site data (221 days' worth of cell site location information [CSLI], which itself yielded an impressive 29,659 location data points for defendant and 28,410 for co-defendant Jordan, enough to provide a "reasonably detailed account of their movements" during the intervals covered by the disclosure orders), amounted to an unconstitutional search under the Fourth Amendment. Officers obtained court orders pursuant to the "Stored Communications Act" (18 U.S.C. § 2703(d)), but not search warrants. The resulting information was used against the defendants at trial. The Appellate Court refused, however, to order the suppression of the collected information because of the Fourth Amendment's "good faith" exception, and thus affirmed both the defendants' convictions of various charges associated with a series of armed robberies.

At least one California state court also discussed the expanding concerns with the development of high-tech methods impacting privacy rights, not offering a solution. (People v. Barnes (2013) 216 Cal.App.4th 1508, 519.)

Finally, the U.S. Supreme Court, in reviewing the Sixth Circuit's United States v. Carpenter (6th Cir. 2016) 819 F.3rd 880 (cert. granted), in a split 5-to-4 decision, reversed the lower court's decision (and by implication, the other circuits, above, as well) and held that absent an exigency, in order to obtain such cellphone "pinging" history, a search warrant, based upon a showing of probable cause, is required. (Carpenter v. United States (June 22, 2018) 585 U.S. __ [138 S.Ct. 2206; 201 L.Ed.2nd 507].)

> The High Court specifically held that "an individual maintains a legitimate expectation of privacy in the record of his physical movements as captured through CSLI. The location information obtained from (defendant's) wireless carriers was the product of a search," thus requiring a search warrant. (Id., at p. __.)
> The Court also specifically declined to apply the rules of Smith v. Maryland (1979) 442 U.S. 735 [99 S.Ct. 2577; 61 L.Ed.2nd 220], involving the warrantless obtaining of trap & trace information, or United States v. Miller (1976) 425 U.S. 435, 440 [96 S.Ct. 1619; 48 L.Ed.2nd 71], involving the obtaining of bank records without a search warrant, to the CSLI situation. (Carpenter v. United States, supra, at p. __.)

The necessity of a search warrant to obtain CSLI records is "generally" now the rule. (United States v. Elmore (9th Cir. 2019) 917 F.3rd 1068, 1074.)

Note: "Cell sites usually consist of a set of radio antennas mounted on a tower, although 'they can also be found on light posts, flagpoles, church steeples, or the sides of buildings.' Carpenter v. United States, 138 S.Ct. 2206, 2211, 201 L.Ed.2nd 507 (2018). 'Each time [a] phone connects to a cell site, it generates a time-stamped record known as cell-site location information (CSLI).' Id. This CSLI data indicates the general geographic area in which the cell phone user was located when his or her phone connected to the network. Because most smartphones tap into the wireless network 'several times a minute whenever their signal is on . . . modern cell phones generate increasingly vast amounts of increasingly precise CSLI.' Id. at 2211-12." (United States v. Elmore (9th Cir. 2019) 917 F.3rd 1068, 1072, fn. 2.)

> Also note that police may also request information about every device connected to a single tower during a particular interval, potentially netting historical location information from thousands of phones. This technique is colloquially known as a "cell tower dump." (See John Kelly, "Cellphone Data Spying: It's Not Just the NSA," USA Today, August 11, 2015, https://www.usatoday.com/story/news/nation/2013/12/08/cellphone-data-spying-nsa-police/3902809/. A typical dump covers multiple towers, and wireless providers, and can net information from thousands of phones.
> The Fourth Circuit applied the United States Supreme Court's reasoning in Carpenter to an aerial surveillance program operated by the city of Baltimore. The City of Baltimore collected both traditional surveillance data and aerial photographs. When combined, the police could effectively track someone's every movement throughout the city retroactively over a 45-day period. This integrated surveillance, the Fourth Circuit concluded, was an incursion into privacy directly comparable to the cell-site location information accessed in Carpenter. (Leaders of a Beautiful Struggle v. Baltimore Police Dept. (4th Cir. 2021) 2 F.4th 330.)
> Such a cell tower dump was held to be constitutional, however, by the Delaware Supreme Court in Hudson v. State (Jan. 9, 2024) __ A.2nd __ [2024 Del. LEXIS 13]. In this case, ten search warrants were obtained for the information from five separate cell towers. The Court found that the warrants were constitutional because they were both particularized and no broader than the probable cause on which they were based. The defendant claimed that the warrants lacked particularity and were thus unconstitutional general warrants. This is so, defendant argued, because they "sought information from all cell phone providers . . . for all cell towers located in the area of numerous locations." The Court disagreed. The United States Constitution specifies two matters that must be described with particularity in a search warrant: (1) the place to be searched; and (2) the "persons or things" to be seized. The particularity requirement is difficult in the electronic search warrant context, given the commingling of relevant and irrelevant information and the complexities of segregating responsive files after the fact. The warrants at issue described what investigating officers believed would be found in CSLI from a tower dump with as much specificity as possible under the circumstances. The warrants on their face made clear that their scope was limited to tower dumps from five cell sites in the areas around the incidents. Second, the CSLI sought from these tower dumps in the warrants was for time periods no greater than two hours at the particular towers was also specifically described and not targeted toward the content of any communications. Finally, the State established probable cause to believe that the offenses described in the cell tower warrants had been committed by providing in their respective affidavits detailed explanations of the incidents, including the area in which the incidents took place (including the locations of the apartment complexes and the surrounding banks), the timing and length of such incidents, as well as other pertinent details. Accordingly, the Court held that the Cell Tower Warrants were valid under the Fourth Amendment.

The following cell site location information (CSLI) cases, therefore, are still valid:

The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeal has ruled that using data emanating from a suspect's pay-as-you-go cellphone to determine its real-time location as he transported drugs along public thoroughfares was lawful. Agents located defendant at a rest stop, with a motorhome filled with marijuana, by "pinging" his phone. There was no Fourth Amendment violation since defendant did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the GPS data and location of his cellphone because authorities tracked a known number that was voluntarily used while traveling on public thoroughfares; no extreme comprehensive tracking was present in his case. (United States v. Skinner (6th Cir. 2012) 690 F.3rd 772.)

Pinging a victim's cellphone, using its GPS capabilities to track defendant who had just stolen it in a robbery, was not a Fourth Amendment violation. (People v. Barnes (2013) 216 Cal.App.4th 1508, 1517-1519; no trespassory placing of the GPS into the defendant's property, and no expectation of privacy violated.

Exceptions:

It was noted in Carpenter v. United States, supra, at p. __, however, that this decision "is a narrow one," and is not intended to apply to (1) pinging a suspect's cellphone while on the move, referred to by the court as "real-time" situations, (2) "tower dumps" (a download of information on all the devices that connected to a particular cell site during a particular interval), (3) the rules of Smith v. Maryland (1979) 442 U.S. 735 [99 S.Ct. 2577; 61 L.Ed.2nd 220], involving the warrantless obtaining of trap & trace information, or United States v. Miller (1976) 425 U.S. 435, 440 [96 S.Ct. 1619; 48 L.Ed.2nd 71], involving the obtaining of bank records without a search warrant, (4) other business records that might incidentally reveal location information, or (5) other collection techniques involving foreign affairs or national security.

Carpenter notably provided for the warrantless pinging of a cellphone under "exigent circumstances." "Such exigencies include the need to pursue a fleeing suspect, protect individuals who are threatened with imminent harm, or prevent the imminent destruction of evidence." (Carpenter v. United States, supra, at p. __.)

"Exigent circumstances" will excuse the pinging of a suspect's cellphone without a warrant or court order. (United States v. Caraballo (2nd Cir. Vt. 2016) 831 F.3rd 95; need to locate a violent homicide suspect out of fear for the safety of informants and undercover officers.)

Defendant's motion to suppress knives seized from his backpack was properly denied where the warrantless pinging of his cell phone to locate him did not violate the Fourth Amendment because it was justified by exigent circumstances. At the time the responding officer requested that defendant's mobile service provider ping his cell phone, the information available to the officer was that less than an hour earlier the victim had been repeatedly stabbed in the neck in an unprovoked attack, all occurring within 200 yards of a preschool and near a shopping center and multiple neighborhoods. Based upon the circumstances known to the officer, he believed it was imperative that the suspect be found as soon as possible to prevent another possible unprovoked attack. (People v. Bowen (2020) 52 Cal.App.5th 130, 136-139.)

The Court noted that whether or not a single ping of a suspect's cellphone is a "search" is still an undecided issue. (Id., at p. 138; declining to decide the issue because exigent circumstances already provided the justification for finding that the Fourth Amendment had not been violated.)

See "Geofence Warrants," under "Searches with a Search Warrant" (Chapter 10), above.

In a Fourth Circuit case after defendant, brandishing a semi-automatic handgun, assaulted his girlfriend in her home and threatened to return and kill her, her kids, her family, and law enforcement, officers submitted an "exigent form" to T-Mobile, defendant's cell phone provider. The detective's request sought immediate police access without a warrant to "pings" revealing defendant's cell phone location, and to call logs displaying the phone numbers that defendant contacted, which would enable the officers to locate him. With the resulting information, officers located defendant driving his vehicle six hour later and arrested him. In finding exigent circumstances and upholding his conviction, the 4th Circuit Court held that the officers reasonably concluded that defendant was armed and dangerous, that he posed an imminent threat to his girlfriend, to her family members, and law enforcement. In addition, the Court found that defendant's cell phone provider was "notoriously slow" in responding to law enforcement search warrants and could take several days to produce the necessary cell phone location information. The Court balanced these circumstances with the fact that the intrusion on defendant's privacy rights was reasonably confined to the exigency. For example, the officers did not attempt to enter defendant's home without a warrant or track his movements for an extended period. Instead, the officers arrested defendant in his vehicle within approximately one hour of receiving the "pings." Consequently, the court held that exigent circumstances required the officers to obtain defendant's cell phone location information from T-Mobile without delay by using the "exigent form." (United States v. Hobbs (4th Cir. 2022) 24 F.4th 965.)

Note: The Court also emphasized that the exigent circumstances exception was not to be used as "a tool of convenience" by law enforcement officers in the absence of immediate danger to persons, a fleeing suspect, or the need to prevent the imminent destruction of evidence.

Carpenter was held by California's Fourth District Court of Appeal not to apply to street light cameras that recorded the presence of persons traversing the streets of downtown San Diego (and other areas). (See People v. Cartwright (2024) 99 Cal.App.5th 98,102-103.)

"Recordings from cameras, such as the ones that captured Cartwright's movements in the downtown urban environment in the middle of a weekday, do not rise to the same 'unique nature of cell phone location records.' (Carpenter, at p. ___ [138 S.Ct. at p. 2217]," holding that "[a] person traveling . . . on public thoroughfares has no reasonable expectation of privacy in his movements from one place to another." (Id., at p. 103.)

The "Stored Communications Act:"

With an amendment to the "Stored Communications Act" (18 U.S.C. § 2703), adding The CLOUD Act, effective on March 23, 2018, a U.S. provider of e-mail services, when subpoenaed, must disclose to the Government electronic communications within its control even if the provider stores the communications abroad. (See United States v. Microsoft Corp (2018) 584 U.S. 236 [138 S.Ct. 1186; 200 L.Ed.2nd 610]; case dismissed as moot.)

When the government views email attachments it is a "search" for Fourth Amendment purposes under both an expectation-of-privacy and a trespass-to-chattels theory. (United States v. Wilson (9th Cir. 2021) 13 F.4th 961, 967, citing United States v. Ackerman (10th Cir. 2016) 831 F.3rd 1292, 1308.)

The Cloud Act, § 103(a)(1), provides: "A [service provider] shall comply with the obligations of this chapter to preserve, backup, or disclose the contents of a wire or electronic communication and any record or other information pertaining to a customer or subscriber within such provider's possession, custody, or control, regardless of whether such communication, record, or other information is located within or outside of the United States."

In a wife's civil action against her husband brought under the Stored Communications Act, 18 U.S.C.S. §§ 2701(a)(1), 2707(a), based on the husband's alleged unauthorized access into the wife's work-emails, the district court abused its discretion in excluding the declaration of an employee of the company that provided data protection services to the wife's employer because the declaration was based on the declarant's personal knowledge about the wife's e-mail storage, thus creating a dispute of material fact on the narrow issue that formed the basis of the summary judgment ruling. The district court erred in granting the husband's summary judgment motion because the declaration created a genuine dispute of material fact with respect to whether the e-mails the husband accessed were in electronic storage and, thus, entitled to protection under 18 U.S.C.S. § 2510(17)(B). (Clare v. Clare (9th Cir. 2020) 982 F.3rd 1199.)

Officers had probable cause to believe defendant would be transporting drugs from Texas to Louisiana based upon reliable information from a confidential informant. The officers therefore obtained a state-authorized search warrant to obtain the GPS coordinates of defendant's girlfriend's cell phone from Verizon over a sixteen-hour period, thus allowing the officers to track the girlfriend's movements, and, because the two were traveling together, those of defendant as well. After having done so, defendant's vehicle was stopped and searched, resulting in the recovery of methamphetamine. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeal held that the Stored Communications Act (SCA) authorized the government to "obtain a warrant" from a state "court of competent jurisdiction" using "state warrant procedures" upon a "showing that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the . . . information sought is relevant to an ongoing criminal investigation." The court found that the warrant in this case complied with the SCA's provision and therefore, properly issued by the state-court judge. (United States v. Beaudion (5th Cir. 2020) 979 F.3rd1092.)

Flashlights and Spotlights*:

The use of flashlights to illuminate the interior of a handbag has been held to be of no constitutional significance. (People v. Capps (1989) 215 Cal.App.3rd 1112, 1123.)

Officers standing in an open field, using a flashlight to look inside a barn, held to be lawful. (United States v. Vela (W.D. Tex. 2005) 486 F.Supp.2nd 587, 590.)

"Flashlighting" or "spotlighting" a person, by itself, is not a detention. (People v. Franklin (1987) 192 Cal.App.3rd 935; People v. Rico (1979) 97 Cal.App.3rd 124, 130.)

However, taking into account of the "totality of the circumstances," it was held that defendant was detained when the officer made a U-turn to pull in behind him and then trained the patrol car's spotlights on his car. (People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, 21-22.)

But see People v. Tacardon (2022) 14 Cal.5th 235: A deputy sheriff parked 15 to 20 feet behind a lawfully parked car, shined a spotlight into the interior, and approached it on foot. When a female suddenly got out from the back seat, he ordered her to remain at the curb. At about that point the deputy smelled marijuana and observed large marijuana bags on the floorboard. Defendant, in the driver's seat, proved to be on probation. A subsequent search produced additional contraband evidencing drug sales. The Third District Court of Appeal reversed a superior court ruling that defendant had been unlawfully detained. Disagreeing with People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, the court held that while the use of a spotlight might cause someone to feel "scrutiny, such directed scrutiny does not amount to a detention." Although the female who had gotten out of the car was detained, "there is no evidence defendant observed the deputy's interaction with [her] . . . ." By the time the deputy addressed defendant, having smelled marijuana and having seen the large bags of marijuana, defendant was appropriately and lawfully detained. Significantly, the deputy never blocked defendant's egress, he never used emergency lights, and his approach to the car was casual.

And see People v. Perez (1989) 211 Cal.App.3rd 1492, where a police officer parked his patrol car in front of Perez's vehicle, leaving "plenty of room" for Perez to drive away, and activated both spotlights on the patrol car "to get a better look at the occupants and gauge their reactions." (Id. at p. 1494.) The officer then walked over to the car, tapped on the window, and asked the driver to roll down the window. (Ibid.) The appellate court concluded: "[T]he conduct of the officer here did not manifest police authority to the degree leading a reasonable person to conclude he was not free to leave. While the use of high beams and spotlights might cause a reasonable person to feel himself [or herself] the object of official scrutiny, such directed scrutiny does not amount to a detention. [Citations.]" (Italics added; Id. at p. 1496, and cited with approval in People v. Tacardon, supra, at pp. 243-244.)

See also People v. Bailey (1985) 176 Cal.App.3rd 402, where it was held that even though a vehicle is already stopped without police action, merely activating emergency lights on a police vehicle as officers contact the occupants of the vehicle is automatically a detention, and illegal if made without a reasonable suspicion.

However, when an officer shines the spotlight of his car on defendant, while stopping his patrol car, getting out, and commanding defendant to approach, defendant was in fact detailed. (People v. Roth (1990) 219 Cal.App.3rd 211.)

The Juvenile Court's denial of a suppression motion was reversed for having erroneously determined that a police-defendant encounter was consensual and not a detention. Based upon a citizen's report that defendants, while parked in a vehicle in the citizen's neighborhood were "acting shady," four officers parked behind defendants' lawfully parked car, the first patrol car with its emergency lights on. The Court ruled that the officers' show of authority (i.e., turning on their emergency lights) amounted to an unlawful detention. Although noting that there is no

> "bright-line" rule that activating lights always constitutes a detention, the Court also noted that the California "Supreme Court has long recognized that activating sirens or flashing lights can amount to a show of authority" sufficient to constitute a detention. (In re Edgerrin J. (2020) 57 Cal.App.5th 752, 760, citing People v. Brown (2015) 61 Cal.4th 968, at p. 980.)

A person who exposes his facial features, and/or body in general, to the public, in a public place, has no reasonable expectation of privacy in his appearance. (See People v. Benedict (1969) 2 Cal.App.3rd 400, 403-404; "The latter phenomenon (defendant's physical characteristics) was in plain sight of the officer and observed by him without any semblance of a search or seizure; his use of a flashlight to observe the pupillary reaction was not improper. The utilization of the light from a flashlight directed to that which is in plain sight ordinarily does not render observation thereof a search;" citing People v. Cacioppo (1968) 264 Cal.App.2nd 392, 397.)

However, see People v. Garry (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th 1100, where it was held to be a detention when the officer spotlighted the defendant and then walked "briskly" towards him, asking him questions as he did so.

An officer walking up to defendant as defendant crouched behind a car with the officer's flashlight trained on him was held not to constitute a detention. Defendant was not detained until the officer told defendant to stand and put his hands behind his head, preparatory to putting handcuffs on him as a safety measure. (People v. Flores (2021) 60 Cal.App.5th 978, 988-990.)

> See dissenting opinion (at pp. 990-994), however, noting many facts and some on-point case law that were left out of the majority opinion. Among the fact ignored by the majority was that as defendant was in the process of moving around to the back side of his car, the officers drove up and parked their patrol car "a little askew to and behind" defendant's vehicle. The officers then shined their vehicle's spotlight on defendant as he bent over behind his car. The dissent also cites two cases totally ignored by the majority: People v. Garry (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th 1100, and People v. Roth (1990) 219 Cal.App.3rd 211. Both cases are spotlight cases which are nearly identical to Flores' situation, where spotlighting the suspect while (in Garry) the officer "briskly" approached the suspect, and (in Roth) "commanding" the suspect to approach the officer, respectively, were held to constitute detentions. Also not mentioned by the majority was the fact that while the one officer approached defendant (commanding him to stand up) from the rear of defendant's vehicle, the other officer was walking around the front of defendant's car, boxing him in between the two officers, his vehicle, and an iron spiked fence running parallel to the sidewalk, creating a situation where it is certainly arguable that defendant would have reasonably believed that with all that attention directed at him (spotlights, flashlights, being approached from both sides, with at least one officer issuing commands to stand up), and nowhere to go, he was in fact detained before ever being told to put his hands behind his head; i.e., that he could not have reasonably felt free to just walk away.

See "'Flashlighting' or 'Spotlighting' a Person," under "Consensual Encounters" (Chapter 3), above.

Binoculars*:

The use of binoculars to enhance what the officer can already see, depending upon the degree of expectation of privacy involved under the circumstances, is normally lawful. (People v. Arno (1979) 90 Cal.App.3rd 505.)

Using binoculars from 50 yards away to watch defendant load boxes into his car upheld. (United States v. Grimes (5th Cir. 426 F.2nd 706, 708.)

Using binoculars during surveillance of a chicken house from a pasture was lawful. (Hodges v. United States (5th Cir. 1957) 243 F.2nd 281, 282.)

Similarly, observation of a marijuana patch while flying at an altitude of some 1,500 to 2,000 feet, visible to the naked eye (and then enhanced through the use of binoculars), did not violate the defendant's privacy rights. (Burkholder v. Superior Court (1979) 96 Cal.App.3rd 421; see also People v. St Amour (1980) 104 Cal.App.3rd 886, observations made from 1,000 to 1,500 feet, again enhanced through the use of binoculars, held to be lawful and People v. Joubert (1981) 118 Cal.App.3rd 637.)

Night Vision Goggles:

The use of night vision goggles was held to be irrelevant when used to observe areas within the curtilage of defendants' residence. (People v. Lieng (2010) 190 Cal.App.4th 1213, 1227-1228.)

A Controlled Tire Deflation Device* ("CTDD"):

The use of a "controlled tire deflation device" by the Border Patrol to stop a vehicle suspected of being used to smuggle controlled substances over the US/Mexico border held to be a detention only (thus requiring only a reasonable suspicion) and not excessive force under the circumstances. (United States v. Guzman-Padilla (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 865.)

Note: The "controlled tire deflation device," or "CTDD," is an accordion-like tray containing small, hollow steel tubes that puncture the tires of a passing vehicle and cause a gradual release of air, bringing the vehicle to a halt within a quarter to half a mile.

Videotaping, Tape-Recording, and Photographing:

General Rule: "Video surveillance does not in itself violate a reasonable expectation of privacy. Videotaping of suspects in public places, such as banks, does not violate the Fourth Amendment; the police may record what they normally may view with the naked eye. (Citation)" (United States v. Taketa (9th Cir, 1991) 923 F.2nd 665, 667.)

> However, if in a place where a person has a reasonable expectation of privacy, to videotape him without a court's authorization (i.e., a search warrant) is illegal. (Id., at pp. 675-677.)

Street Light Cameras:

> The City of San Diego has installed what the City refers to as its "City IQ Streetlight Camera" system. The cameras are situated so they cannot peer into businesses or residences, thus capturing only the "public right of way." They are fixed position and located throughout downtown San Diego and other parts of the city. The devices capture "environmental data, like temperature, humidity, pressure, … traffic data, like car speeds, car counts, pedestrian data, bicycle data, and even video data." The video feature creates high quality wide lens footage, but the devices do not record sound and do not act as gunshot detectors because the City did not "enable the microphones." Footage is stored on each camera's hard drive for five days; if it is not retrieved within five days, the camera records over the footage. Defendant Kevin Eugene Cartwright was convicted of first-degree murder with special circumstances, and other offense. On appeal, defendant contended that the trial court erred by denying his motion to suppress video footage from the City of San Diego's "City IQ" streetlight camera program and evidence derived from that footage. The Fourth Appellate District affirmed the trial court's decision. The court held that defendant did not have an objectively reasonable expectation of privacy when he traversed a public right of way in downtown San Diego in the middle of a business day. The court found that accessing the recordings from the City's streetlight cameras did not amount to a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment and, consequently, did not require a warrant. The court distinguished the cameras in this case from the aerial surveillance images and integrated police department systems addressed in other precedents, stating that the City's camera program stands alone and does not reveal the transit patterns of people throughout the county. The court concluded that the police did not conduct a "search" when they accessed footage from the City's streetlight cameras and, accordingly, there was no violation of the Fourth Amendment. (People v. Cartwright (2024) 99 Cal.App.5th 98.)

Pole Cameras: Videotaping From Off the Property: Cases have gone both ways:

Upheld:

Placing a surveillance video camera on a utility pole about 200 yards from the front of defendant's rural residence/trailer and barn, monitoring the camera for about 10 weeks, was held not to be a Fourth Amendment violation in that nothing was viewed that anyone in public could not have seen. The Court also reasoned that the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) could have stationed an agent at that location around the clock and seen the same thing. The fact that it was easier to do this by means of a video camera did not make it a Fourth Amendment violation. (United States v. Houston (6th Cir. 2016) 813 F.3rd 282.)

As a part of a drug-trafficking investigation, officers installed a camera on a telephone pole located on the public road outside of the defendant's apartment parking lot and carport. The camera, which recorded continuously for 23 days, produced video as well as still shots. The pole-camera footage captured defendant engaging in what officers suspected were drug transactions in the parking lot. On appeal from defendant's conviction, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeal held that defendant had no reasonable expectation of privacy in the carport. Therefore, the use of the pole camera did not constitute a Fourth Amendment search. (United States v. May-Shaw (6th Cir. 2020) 955 F.3rd 563.)

Government agents (ATF) setting up a "pole camera," which for eight months monitored the front of defendant's home 24 hours a day, seven days a week, although it did not record sound, was held to be lawful, the Court denying defendant's Fourth Amendment argument that due to the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Carpenter v. United States (June 22, 2018) 585 U.S. __, __ [138 S.Ct. 2206; 201 L.Ed.2nd 507], such a monitoring violated her privacy rights. (United States v. Moore-Bush (1st Cir. 2020) 963 F.3rd 29; citing its own prior precedent of United States v. Bucci (1st Cir. 2009) 582 F.3rd 108.)

Between 2013 and 2016, several law enforcement agencies investigating a large methamphetamine distribution ring installed three cameras on public property that viewed defendant's home. Officers mounted two cameras on a pole in an alley next to defendant's residence and a third on a pole one block south of the other two cameras. The first two cameras viewed the front of defendant's home and an adjoining parking area. The third camera also viewed the outside of defendant's home but primarily captured a shed owned by another member of the ring. Together, the three cameras, operating 24 hours a day, captured almost eighteen months of footage by recording defendant's property between 2014 and 2016, accumulating over 100 instances of what officers suspected were deliveries of methamphetamine to defendant's residence, and subsequent purchases being made. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that the isolated use of pole cameras on public property, without a warrant, used to observe defendant's home, did not violate the Fourth Amendment. A person's expectation of privacy generally does not extend to what a person "knowingly exposes to the public, even in his own home." The Court further rejected defendant's argument that the prolonged and uninterrupted use of the pole cameras to conduct continuous surveillance of his house, for a period of approximately eighteen months, constituted a Fourth Amendment violation under the "mosaic theory;" i.e., that the "government can learn more from a given slice of information if it can put that information in the context of a broader pattern, a mosaic." Finally, the Court recognized that the prolonged use of pole camera surveillance has been held to be a Fourth Amendment violation in some jurisdictions, but held that at least in the 7th Circuit, it does not. (United States v. Tuggle (7th Cir. IL 2021) 4 F.4th 505.)

Not Upheld:

See United States v. Vargas (2014) 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 184672, reaching the exact opposite conclusion, where a Washington State federal trial court held that the Fourth Amendment requires law enforcement to first obtain a search warrant in order to continuously (six weeks, in this case) videotape the front of defendant's home and yard even though the camera, with zooming and panning capabilities, was set up on a public utility pole some 100 yards from defendant's home, well off his property.

Additional Case Law:

A warrantless videotape surveillance in the mailroom of a hospital, open to some 800 hospital employees but not of the defendant's private workspace, did not violate the defendant's expectation of privacy and was therefore lawful. (United States v. Gonzalez (9th Cir. 2003) 328 F.3rd 543.)

In a homicide investigation where defendant was the primary suspect, "the police surveillance and photographing of defendant entering and exiting the drop-off point is not a subject of Fourth Amendment protection since defendant knowingly exposed his whereabouts in public." People v. Maury (2003) 30 Cal.4th 342, 384-385.)

The Fourth Amendment's protections do not extend to information that a person voluntarily exposes to a government agent, including an undercover agent. A defendant generally has no privacy interest in that which he voluntarily reveals to a government agent. Therefore, a government agent may make an audio-video recording of a suspect's statements even in the suspect's own home, and those audio-video recordings, made with the consent of the government agent, do not require a warrant. (United States v. Wahchumwah (9th Cir. 2013) 710 F.3rd 862, 866-868; an investigation involving the illegal sale of eagle feathers under the Bald and Golden Eagle Protection Act (16 U.S.C § 668(a) and the Lacey Act (16 U.S.C. §§ 2271(a)(1) & 3373(d)(1)(B),)

> The Court further noted that the fact that the technology is not generally available to the public, and is more intrusive than mere audio surveillance, is irrelevant to the Fourth Amendment analysis. (Id., at p. 868.)
> However, the warrantless installation of a hidden video camera in a suspect's home, leaving it operating after the informant leaves the premises, is a Fourth Amendment violation. (United States v. Nerber (9th Cir. 2000) 222 F.3rd 597, 604, fn. 5; United States v. Wahchumwah, supra., at p. 867.)

The hallway in front of defendant's apartment, when the hallway is open to anyone who might come into that area, is not part of the curtilage of defendant's residence. Placing a motion detecting camera in the hallway, showing the entrance to defendant's apartment, was held not to be a violation of the Fourth Amendment in that it did not violate any reasonable expectation of privacy defendant might have had in that area outside his apartment. (United States v. Trice (6th Cir. 2020) 966 F.3rd 506.)

But, see People v. Rodriguez (1993) 21 Cal.App.4th 232, 239; stopping and detaining gang members for the purpose of photographing them is illegal without reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. Merely being a member of a gang, by itself, is not cause to detain.

> Membership in a street gang is not in and of itself a crime. (See P.C. § 186.22) The practice of stopping, detaining, questioning, and perhaps photographing a suspected gang member, based solely upon the person's suspected gang membership, is illegal. (People v. Green (1991) 227 Cal.App.3rd 692, 699-700.)

Note also that a police dash-cam video of an arrest is subject to release to the news media following a California Public Records Act (Gov. Code, §§ 6250 et seq.) request (and therefore likely subject to discovery by the defendant as well), in that it does not constitute a confidential "personnel record" under Penal Code §§ 832.7 or 832.8. (City of Eureka v. Superior Court (2016) 1 Cal.App.5th 755, 761-765.)

Where the issue was whether in an assault trial arising from a fight between two groups of people, any error resulted from the admission of videos that had been assembled and synchronized from various businesses' surveillance systems and bystanders' cell phone footage, the Court held that neither the videos nor the expert's testimony were subject to the Kelly-Frye test because the work was a form of computer animation analogous to charts or diagrams used in other classic forms of demonstrative evidence. The expert did not alter the underlying surveillance videos except to enhance their quality and correct pixel ratios. Also, the evidence was highly probative of the circumstances that led to the victim's paralysis. The expert assistance was critical because multiple surveillance videos depicted a moving melee, at night, with at least a dozen bodies interacting on a crowded street. (People v. Tran (2020) 50 Cal.App.5th 171.)

Note: "Kelly-Frye" refers to People v. Kelly (1976) 17 Cal.3rd 24 and Frye v. United States (D.C. Cir. 1923) 293 F. 1013, establishing the criteria for admissibility of expert testimony concerning certain scientific evidence, as commonly accepted in the scientific world.

Note that it has been held in a civil case: "The mere existence of video footage of the incident does not foreclose a genuine factual dispute as to the reasonable inferences that can be drawn from that footage." (Vos v. City of Newport Beach (9th Cir. 2018) 892 F.3rd 1024, 1028; citing Scott v. Harris (2007) 550 U.S. 372, 378, 380 [127 S.Ct. 1769; 167 L.Ed.2nd 686]; see also Tabares v. City of Huntington Beach (9th Cir. 2021) 988 F.3rd 1119, 1123, fn. 4.)

Videotaping, Tape-Recording, and Photographing by Private Citizens:

A private citizen has a First Amendment right to videotape public officials (i.e., police officers) in a public place, and the arrest of the citizen for a Massachusetts state wiretapping violation, violated the citizen's First and Fourth Amendment rights. (Glik v. Cunniffe (1st Cir. 2011) 655 F.3rd 78, 82-84.)

Police lack the authority to prohibit a citizen from recording commissioners during a town hall meeting "because [the citizen's] activities were peaceful, not performed in derogation of any law, and done in the exercise of his First Amendment rights[.]"). (Iacobucci v. Boulter (1st Cir. 1999) 193 F.3rd 14.)

A state's eavesdropping statute that attempts to prohibit the recording of another without the consent of all parties does not preclude the audiovisual-recording of police officers performing their official duties in a public place, at least when the officers are speaking at a volume audible to bystanders. Such a statute has been held, under these circumstances, to violate the First Amendment's right to free-speech and free-press. (ACLU v. Alvarez (7th Cir. 2012) 679 F.3rd 583; "The act of making an audio or audiovisual recording is necessarily included within the First Amendment's guarantee of speech and press rights as a corollary of the right to disseminate the resulting recording." Pg. 595; see also Fordyce v. City of Seattle (9th Cir. 1995) 55 F.3rd 436, 439-440.)

And it has been held that; "The First Amendment protects the right to gather information about what public officials do on public property, and specifically, a right to record matters of public interest." (Smith v. City of Cumming (11th Cir. 2000) 212 F.3rd 1332, 1333.)

The Ninth Circuit has also recognized, without discussing the issue, the First Amendment's protections for one who records bystanders who happened to be viewing public demonstrations, even without their consent. (See Fordyce v. City of Seattle, supra, at p. 439; finding the applicability of the state's eavesdropping statute to be an undecided issue.)

Citing Fordyce in an unpublished opinion, the Ninth Circuit further recognized the First Amendment right to photograph the scene of a traffic accident. (Adkins v. Limtiaco (9th Cir. 2013) 537 Fed. Appx. 721.)

See also Turner v. Driver (5th Cir. 2017) 848 F.3rd 678, where it was held that at least until the decision in this case, whether or not the First Amendment protects a person's right to record the police was an undecided issue in the Fifth Federal Circuit [Texas], providing the officers with qualified immunity when they detained him and took his video camera. However, arresting him was clearly a Fourth Amendment violation for which the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity.

However, there is some authority for the argument that an airport security check point constitutes a "uniquely sensitive setting" where "order and security are of obvious importance," and thus entitled to greater protection than out on the street. Whether or not law enforcement officers may prohibit an uncooperative (i.e., refusing to provide evidence of his identity) suspect from recording TSA agents and other law enforcement officers at an airport security checkpoint is an open question, at least providing officers with qualified immunity from civil liability when they seize the suspect's camera over his objection and delete (or attempt to do so) the contents. (Mocek v. City of Albuquerque (10th Cir. 2015) 813 F.3rd 912; while defendant was acquitted of all criminal charges after a jury trial, the officers were found to have qualified immunity in the resulting civil case.)

The federal Third Circuit Court of Appeal has held in two separate cases, where plaintiffs alleged that police officers illegally retaliated against them for exercising their First Amendment right to record public police activity, that private individuals have a First Amendment right to observe and record police officers engaged in the public discharge of their duties, although the defendant police officers were held to have qualified immunity in that the rule was, per the Court, not well-settled at the time. (Fields v. City of Philadelphia (3rd Cir. 2017) 862 F.3rd 353.)

Also, as of January 1, 2016, California's resisting arrest statutes (i.e., P.C. §§ 69 and 148) specifically state that photographing, videotaping, or audio recording, is not an interference with the officer's performance of his duties. (Subdivisions (b) and (g), respectively.)

In a trial for reckless driving, the Fourth Amendment did not require suppression of evidence obtained from defendant's dashboard camera which was seized following a collision between his vehicle and a motorcycle. The officer's belief that defendant was driving recklessly was supported by friction marks at the scene. Also, the officer's belief that defendant might seek to destroy the evidence was supported by his experience dealing with high-performance cars with dashboard cameras. The fact that defendant removed the camera and placed it in his backpack, and defendant's hesitancy to provide the camera, supported the officer's belief on that issue, justifying the immediate seizure of the camera pending the obtaining of a search warrant to search it. (People v. Tran (2019) 42 Cal.App.5th 1.)

> On the issue of the constitutionality of the immediate seizure of defendant's dash-cam, the Court noted the following: "A seizure is 'far less intrusive than a search.' (United States v. Payton (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 859, 863.) . . . . Whereas a search implicates a person's right to keep the contents of his or her belongings private, a seizure only affects their right to possess the particular item in question. (Segura v. United States (1984) 468 U.S. 796, 806, 104 S. Ct. 3380, 82 L.Ed.2nd 599) . . . . Consequently, the police generally have greater leeway in terms of conducting a warrantless > seizure than they do in carrying out a warrantless search. The United States Supreme Court has 'frequently approved warrantless seizures of property . . . for the time necessary to secure a warrant, where a warrantless search was either held to be or likely would have been impermissible.' (Ibid.)" (Id., at p. 8.)

And the Federal Fourth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that at least as a general rule, "livestreaming" the police during an encounter with officers is similarly protected by the First Amendment. However, the Court also noted that law enforcement interests can easily overcome that right in some circumstances, such as when there is a concern that recipients of the livestreaming as the contact is occurring might be motivated to intervene and interfere with the officers performing their lawful duties. In so ruling, the Court also affirmed qualified immunity for the officer who tried to snatch the plaintiff's cellphone. The plaintiff had sued that officer for personal liability in his individual capacity. The court affirmed dismissal of the claims against that officer because "it was not clearly established" at the time that passengers have a right to livestream - as opposed to record - traffic stops in which they're involved. (Sharpe v. Winterville Police Department (4th Cir. 2023) 59 F.4th 674.)

Tape-Recording Law Enforcement Contacts by Private Citizens:

The federal First Circuit Court of Appeal has ruled that a state statute purporting to make it illegal for a private citizen to secretly record police officers discharging their official duties in public spaces violated the First Amendment because the particular statute at issue (i.e., Massachusetts General Law, Chapter 272, Section 99, enacted in 1968, making it a crime for a person to, among other things, intercept any wire or oral communication made by another person) was "not narrowly tailored to further the government's important interest in preventing interference with police doing their jobs and thereby protecting the public." The Court found that that the civil defendants (i.e., the Commissioner of the Boston Police Department and the District Attorney for Suffolk County) presented little evidence to show how secret, nonconsensual audio recording of police officers doing their jobs in public interfered with their mission. Instead, the Court stated that "Section 99 broadly prohibits such recording, notwithstanding the myriad circumstances in which it may play a critical role in informing the public about how the police are conducting themselves, whether by documenting their heroism, dispelling claims of their misconduct, or facilitating the public's ability to hold them to account for their wrongdoing." As such, the statute, at least as applied to these plaintiffs, was found to violate the First Amendment. (Project Veritas Action Fund v. Rollins (1st Cir. 2020) 982 F.3rd 813.)

Pen. Code § 632: Illegal Eavesdropping on Confidential Communications:

> However, a hidden security video camera that takes pictures, but with no sound, is not a violation of section 632, but only because of the lack of a sound-recording capability. (People v. Drennan (2000) 84 Cal.App.4th 1349; specifically disagreeing with the earlier case of People v. Gibbons (1989) 215 Cal.App.3rd 1204, which held that surreptitiously video recording acts of sexual intercourse violated § 632, referring to sexual intercourse as a form of "communication.")

Metal Detectors: The use of metal detectors (or "magnetometers") constitute a search, but are lawful without a search warrant or individualized suspicion when:

> On School Campuses: Random metal detector searches of students, without any individualized suspicion, are justified by the "special needs" of keeping weapons off campuses. The Fourth Amendment is not violated by such searches where the government need is great, the intrusion on the individual is limited, and a more rigorous standard of suspicion is unworkable. (In re Latasha W. (1998) 60 Cal.App.4th 1524.)
>
> At Airports: As an "administrative search," not intended to be a part of a criminal investigation to secure evidence, but to insure that dangerous weapons will not be carried onto an airplane and to deter potential hijackers from attempting to board, pre-departure screening procedures, including the use of a magnetometer, is lawful despite the lack of any particularized suspicion or a warrant. (People v. Hyde (1974) 12 Cal.3rd 158.)
>
> > The legality of such searches depends upon the balancing of society's interest in safe air travel with the right of the individual passenger to be free from unnecessary government intrusions. Airport searches are reasonable when: (1) They are no more extensive or intensive than necessary, in light of current technology, to detect weapons or explosives; (2) they are confined in good faith to that purpose; and (3) passengers are given the opportunity to avoid the search by electing not to fly. (United States v. Marquez (9th Cir. 2005) 410 F.3rd 612; A second, more intense, yet random screening of passengers as a part of airline boarding security procedures, held to be constitutional.)

Cellphones, Disks, Computers and Other High Tech Devices*:

> The current trend of referring to computers and cellphones as "containers of information" is being more and more criticized, with the prediction of the coming of a whole new body of law dealing with electronic devices. "'Since electronic storage is likely to contain a greater quantity and variety of information than any previous storage method, . . . '[r]elying on analogies to closed containers or file cabinets may lead courts to "oversimplify a complex area of Fourth Amendment doctrines and ignore the realities of massive modern computer storage."' [Citation.]" (People v. Michael E. (2014) 230 Cal.App.4th 261, 276-279; citing United States v. Carey (10th Cir. 1999) 172 F.3rd 1268, 1275.)

See "Seizures and Searches of High Tech Devices" (Chapter 17), below.

Chapter 15*:

Open Fields:

General Rule: The constitutional protections relating to homes do not apply to open fields, at least beyond the curtilage of the home. (Oliver v. United States (1984) 466 U.S. 170 [104 S.Ct. 1735; 80 L.Ed.2nd 214].)

The Fourth Amendment, by its terms, protects only "persons, houses, papers, and effects." "Open fields" do not come within these four protected categories. (United States v. Jones (2012) 565 U.S. 400, 404-413 [132 S.Ct. 945, 949-954; 181 L.Ed.2nd 911]; Florida v. Jardines (2013) 569 U.S. 1, 6 [133 S.Ct. 1409; 185 L.Ed.2nd 495].)

Therefore, trespassing onto defendant's open land does not implicate the Constitution, and any observations made while doing so are admissible. (Ibid; see also Hester v. United States (1924) 265 U.S. 57 [44 S.Ct. 445; 68 L.Ed. 898].)

Narcotics officers entered the defendant's land, past "No Trespassing" signs and barbed wire fencing. Entry into such an area, not part of the cartilage of any home, was not contested. (United States v. Barajas-Avalos (9th Cir, 2004) 359 F.3rd 1204.)

Observations made into private areas from an "open field" beyond the curtilage of the home are lawful. (United States v. Dunn (1987) 480 U.S. 294 [107 S.Ct. 1134; 94 L.Ed.2nd 326].)

California expressly follows the federal rule. (People v. Channing (2000) 81 Cal.App.4th 985.)

Observations made from a common driveway used by other residents and the public into the curtilage of defendant's home (i.e., his garage) were lawful, and properly used in the affidavit for a search warrant. (People v. Lieng (2010) 190 Cal.App.4th 1213, 1221-1227.)

Use of night vision goggles doesn't change the result. (Id., at pp. 1227-1228.)

Overflights:

The warrantless entry onto plaintiffs' property to seize marijuana plants, originally observed by aerial surveillance, held to be lawful under the "open fields doctrine." (Littlefield v. County of Humboldt (2013) 218 Cal.App.4th 243, 250-254.)

> "'[T]he special protection accorded by the Fourth Amendment to the people in their "persons, houses, papers, and effects," is not extended to the open fields. The distinction between the latter and the house is as old as the common law.'" (Ibid., citing Oliver v. United States (1984) 466 U.S. 170, 176-179 [104 S.Ct. 1735; 80 L.Ed.2nd 214].)

A warrantless airplane search, acting on a tip, at altitudes of between 300 to 700 feet, resulting in observation of defendant's half-football-field-sized marijuana grow, was lawful. (Dean v. Superior Court (1973) 35 Cal.App.3rd 112.)

Similarly, observation of a marijuana patch from 1,500 to 2,000 feet in the air, visible to the naked eye (and then enhanced through the use of binoculars), did not violate the defendant's privacy rights. (Burkholder v. Superior Court (1979) 96 Cal.App.3rd 421; see also People v. St. Amour (1980) 104 Cal.App.3rd 886, observations made from 1,000 to 1,500 feet, again enhanced through the use of binoculars, held to be lawful; and People v. Joubert (1981) 118 Cal.App.3rd 637.)

See "Aerial Surveillance," under "New and Developing Law Enforcement Tools and Technology" (Chapter 14), above.

Chapter 16*:

Searches of Containers*:

General Rule*: As a general rule, a search warrant will be required in order to search a container of any type. "The Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution prohibits the government from engaging in unreasonable searches and seizures of a person's 'effects.'" (People v. Pereira (2007) 150 Cal.App.4th 1106, 1111; see also United States v. Monghur (9th Cir. 2009) 588 F.3rd 975.)

Also, property in the possession or under the control of a subject who is booked into custody is subject to search: "Once articles have lawfully fallen into the hands of the police they may examine them to see if they have been stolen, test them to see if they have been used in the commission of a crime, return them to the prisoner on his release, or preserve them for use as evidence at the time of trial. (People v. Robertson 240 Cal.App.2d 99 (1966) 105-106 . . . .) During their period of police custody an arrested person's personal effects, like his person itself, are subject to reasonable inspection, examination, and test. (People v. Chaigles 237 N.Y. 193 [142 N.E. 583, 32 A.L.R. 676], Cardozo, J.)" (People v. Rogers (1966) 241 Cal.App.2nd 384, 389.)

As the law stands today, a search warrant will still generally be required to search a container under most circumstances. (Smith v. Ohio (1990) 494 U.S. 541, 542 [110 S.Ct. 1288; 108 L.Ed.2nd 464, 467].)

See Robey v. Superior Court (2013) 56 Cal.4th 1218, 1236-1240, reiterating the general rule that "the Fourth Amendment's protection extends to letters and other sealed packages in shipment."

A person has an expectation of privacy in his or her private closed containers. (United States v. Welch (9th Cir. 1993) 4 F.3rd 761, 764; a woman's purse.)

Cardboard boxes belonging to a homeless person, being a place where the homeless person stores his or her most private belongings, may not be searched without a warrant or consent. (United States v. Fultz (9th Cir. 1998) 146 F.3rd 1102.)

While the odor of marijuana coming from a mailed package will justify the seizure of such package, it does not excuse the lack of a search warrant when law enforcement opens the package without exigent circumstances. (Robey v. Superior Court (2013) 56 Cal.4th 1218, 1223-1243; overruling People v. McKinnon (1972) 7 Cal.3rd 899, 909; which had held to the contrary.

Possible Future Change in the Rule*:

There is some authority for the proposition that; "(t)he rationale justifying a warrantless search of an automobile that is believed to be transporting contraband arguably applies with equal force to any movable container that is believed to be carrying an illicit substance." (United States v. Ross (1982) 456 U.S. 798, 809 [102 S.Ct. 2157; 72 L.Ed.2nd 572, 584.) However, the courts have not yet specifically extended this rationale to objects in containers other than when the container is in a vehicle or seized incident to a suspect's arrest. (See Justice Stevens' dissent in California v. Acevedo (1991) 500 U.S. 565, 598 [111 S.Ct. 1982; 114 L.Ed.2nd 619], predicting that this this may be the next step.)

Exceptions to the Warrant Requirement*: There are a number of legal theories justifying a warrantless search of containers. For instance:

Incident to Arrest: When a person is lawfully arrested, the police have a right to make a contemporaneous warrantless search (i.e., a search "incident to arrest") of the defendant's person (Weeks v. United States (1914) 232 U.S. 383 [34 S.Ct. 341; 58 L.Ed. 652].) and things under his immediate control. (Carroll v. United States (1925) 267 U.S. 132 [45 S.Ct. 280; 69 L.Ed.2nd 543].)

Transportation Required:

The "Incident to Arrest" rule, however, only applies when the defendant is to be transported somewhere. If cited and released at the scene, no search, except when there is probable cause to believe the container contains some sizable contraband or evidence, is allowed. (See "Searches Incident to Arrest," "Transportation Requirement," under "Searches of Persons" (Chapter 11), above. See also People v. Brisendine (1975) 13 Cal.3rd 528; and United States v. Robinson (1973) 414 U.S. 218 [94 S.Ct. 467; 38 L.Ed.2nd 427].)

However, if the arrestee has been secured (i.e., handcuffed and placed into a patrol car) in preparation to being transported, the U.S. Supreme Court has held the lunging area around him is no longer subject to being searched, at least when arrested out of the arrestee's vehicle. (Arizona v. Gant (2009) 556 U.S. 332 [129 S.Ct. 1710; 173 L.Ed.2nd 485]; see "Searches of Vehicles" (Chapter 12), above, and "Incident to Arrest In a Vehicle," below.)

Although the United States Supreme Court has indicated that Gant is limited to "circumstances unique to the vehicle context" (See (Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373, 400 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430], citing Gant at p. 343), at least one California court has applied it to the residential situation. (See People v. Leal (2009) 178 Cal.App.4th 1051; arrest in a residence.)

Booking Searches: Property in the possession of a subject who is booked into custody is subject to search:

> A person who is to be booked, and who has objects in his possession, may be subjected to an inventory search despite the lack of probable cause. (Illinois v. Lafayette (1983) 462 U.S. 640 [103 S.Ct. 2605; 77 L.Ed.2nd 65].)
>
> The right to conduct a warrantless booking search includes the right to search containers (e.g., purse, wallet, cellphone etc.) "immediately associated with the person of an arrestee." (Illinois v. Lafayette, supra; People v. Hamilton (1988) 46 Cal.3rd 123, 137; see also People v. Diaz (2011) 51 Cal.4th 84; searches of containers "immediately associated with the person.")
>
> > Diaz involved the warrantless search of a cellphone seized incident to arrest. The United States Supreme Court impliedly overruled Diaz on this point, holding that a cellphone seized incident to arrest may not be searched without a search warrant or exigent circumstances. (Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430].)
> >
> > The California Supreme Court concluded in a warrantless cellphone search case (reversing a lower appellate court decision) that the search of defendant's cellphone would not have been proper even under its prior decision in People v. Diaz (2011) 51 Cal.4th 84 (a search incident to arrest case), and that a reasonably well-trained officer would have known this. Defendant was not under arrest when officers searched his phone. Under Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430], which overruled Diaz, even if defendant had been properly arrested, a warrant was required to search his cellphone. The search in this case violated the Fourth Amendment; the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule did not apply. Also, the search was not the result of negligence, nor did it result from any pressure to apply a newly enacted statutory scheme that was confusing and complex. The officers' conduct, including the search, was deliberate. Exclusion of the evidence in this case serves to deter future similar behavior. (People v. Macabeo (2016) 1 Cal.5th 1206, 1212-1226.)

Cellphones are not "containers" for purposes of the vehicle exception to the search warrant requirement. (United States v. Camou (9th Cir. 2014) 773 F.3rd 932, 941-943.)

See also United States v. Lara (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 605, 610-611; declining to include defendant's cellphone under the category of a "container," in defendant's Fourth waiver search conditions.

However, in a questionable decision, the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeal found in United States v. Braxton (10th Cir. 2023) 61 F.4th 830, that a backpack in the defendant's possession at the time of his arrest was illegally searched under the circumstances of this case. Citing its own prior precedent in United States v. Knapp (10th Cir. 2019) 917 F.3rd 1161, the Court accepted the State's concession that search the backpack was not justifiable under the "incident to arrest" theory. The Court also rejected a "community caretaking" argument. The Court finally held that "inevitable discovery" did not apply in that impoundment of the backpack was not reasonable under these circumstances.

Note: This decision could perhaps be justified by the fact that defendant's girlfriend was present at the scene and sought to obtain items from the backpack. She also could have taken custody of the backpack, the court noting that "reasonable officers dealing with the backpack in a lawful manner would have inquired further about whether they should give the backpack to (the girlfriend)," thus eliminating the need to impound it.

Incident to Arrest In a Vehicle: When arresting an occupant of a motor vehicle, the officer may search the person arrested and the passenger areas of the vehicle, and any containers within the passenger area of the vehicle. (New York v. Belton (1981) 395 U.S. 752 [101 S.Ct. 2860; 69 L.Ed.2nd 775].)

This includes containers belonging to passengers other than, and in addition to, the person arrested. (People v. Mitchell (1995) 36 Cal.App.4th 672; People v. Prance (1991) 226 Cal.App.3rd 1525; see also Wyoming v. Houghton (1999) 526 U.S. 295 [119 S.Ct. 1297; 143 L.Ed.2nd 408], making containers left in a vehicle by passengers subject to search when searching a vehicle with probable cause to believe the vehicle contains contraband.)

If, however, the passenger takes the container (such as a purse) with him or her upon being ordered out of a vehicle, is that container subject to search? Probably not (see United States v. Vaughan (9th Cir. 1983) 718 F.2nd 332.), absent some reason to believe it may contain a weapon, in which case a "patdown" of the container may be appropriate.

But, remember that a search incident to an arrest must be "contemporaneous in time and place" with the arrest. (People v. Stoffle (1992) 1 Cal.App.4th 1671; People v. Boissard (1992) 5 Cal.App.4th 972.) (See "Incident to Arrest," under "Searches of Persons" (Chapter 11), above.)

Severely limiting the rule of Belton, the U.S. Supreme Court decided in Arizona v. Gant (2009) 556 U.S. 332 [129 S.Ct. 1710; 173 L.Ed.2nd 485], that a warrantless search of a vehicle incident to arrest is lawful only when the arrestee is unsecured and within reaching distance of the passenger compartment at the time of the search. As an alternate theory under Gant, likely to be applicable only to searches incident to arrest in a vehicle, the officer may search for evidence relevant to the charge of arrest whenever it is "reasonable to believe" that such evidence is present in the car.

> See "Limitation of the Chimel/Belton 'Bright Line' Test; When the Arrestee Has Been Secured," under "Searches of Vehicles" (Chapter 12), above.

People v. Diaz (2011) 51 Cal.4th 84, created an exception to Gant, finding that containers "immediately associated with the person" are still subject to a search incident to arrest, even though the suspect has been arrested and secured, and even if the container, removed from the defendant's person, is not searched until later.

> In so far as Diaz refers to cellphones, this case has been impliedly overruled by the United States Supreme Court in Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430]. (See also People v. Macabeo (2016) 1 Cal.5th 1206, 1212-1226.)

> Cellphones are not "containers" for purposes of the vehicle exception to the search warrant requirement. (United States v. Camou (9th Cir. 2014) 773 F.3rd 932, 941-943.)

> See also United States v. Lara (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 605, 610-611; declining to include defendant's cellphone under the category of a "container," in defendant's Fourth waiver search conditions.

See "Incident to Arrest," under "Searches of Vehicles" (Chapter 12), above.

With Probable Cause, In a Vehicle: When there is probable cause to search a motor vehicle encountered on the street or in public, or any specific containers in that vehicle, a warrantless search of the containers in the motor vehicle is lawful. (United States v. Ross (1982) 456 U.S. 798 [102 S.Ct. 2157; 73 L.Ed.2nd 572]; California v. Acevedo (1991) 500 U.S. 565, 580 [111 S.Ct. 1982; 114 L.Ed.2nd 619]; People v. Schunk (1991) 235 Cal.App.3rd 1334, 1340-1343.)

The old rule (see United States v. Chadwick (1977) 433 U.S. 1 [97 S.Ct. 2476; 53 L.Ed.2nd 538].), that with probable cause to search a particular container located in a vehicle, a search warrant would be required, is no longer a valid rule. (California v. Acevedo, supra.)

And see Wyoming v. Houghton (1999) 526 U.S. 295 [119 S.Ct. 1297; 143 L.Ed.2nd 408], holding that the searching of a passenger's personal property left in a vehicle, with probable cause to believe there is sizable contraband somewhere in the vehicle, is lawful.

Also note that probable cause to believe there are controlled substances somewhere in the vehicle, even if the amount suspected is only enough for one's personal use, justifies a search of the entire vehicle including the trunk and engine compartment. (People v. Hunter (2005) 133 Cal.App.4th 371; People v. Dey (2000) 84 Cal.App.4th 1318; finding the United States v. Ross, supra, has, in effect, overruled prior cases to the contrary. (E.g.; see Wimberly v. Superior Court (1976) 16 Cal. 3d 557; People v. Gregg (1974) 43 Cal.App.3rd 137.)

Cellphones are not "containers" for purposes of the vehicle exception to the search warrant requirement. (United States v. Camou (9th Cir. 2014) 773 F.3rd 932, 941-943; extending the prohibitions on warrantless cellphone searches seized incident to arrest.)

See also Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430], holding that warrantless cellphone searches seized in a vehicle are illegal.

See "With Probable Cause," under "Searches of Vehicles" (Chapter 12), above.

See also United States v. Lara (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 605, 610-611; declining to include defendant's cellphone under the category of a "container," in defendant's Fourth waiver search conditions.

See the extensive review of the law by the California Supreme court on searches of containers found in vehicles at Robey v. Superior Court (2013) 56 Cal.4th 1218, 1223-1243.

When at Least One Person in a Vehicle is Subject to a Fourth Waiver:

A search of the female defendant's purse left in the car when an officer is conducting a parole search of a male parolee, is illegal absent a reasonable suspicion to believe that the parolee had joint access, possession or control over the purse. (People v. Baker (2008) 164 Cal.App.4th 1152.)

But, a warrantless search of those areas of the passenger compartment of a vehicle where an officer reasonably expects that the parolee could have stowed personal belongings or discarded items when aware of police activity, as well as a search of personal property located in those areas if the officer reasonably believes that the parolee owns those items or has the ability to exert control over them (a chip bag and a pair of woman's shoes in this case), is lawful. People v. Schmitz (2012) 55 Cal.4th 909, 916-933.)

Also, the Court noted that defendant's (vehicle driver or owner) lack of knowledge that his passenger was subject to search and seizure conditions is irrelevant to the legality of the parole search. (Id., at pp. 922-923.)

The factors to consider in determining what areas and items in a vehicle are subject to search include the nature of that area or item, how close and accessible the area or item is to the parolee, the privacy interests at stake, and the government's interest in conducting the search. (Id., at p. 923.)

Also, because "cause" is not required to justify such a search, an officer does not have to articulate facts demonstrating that the parolee actually placed personal items or discarded contraband in the open areas of the passenger compartment. The issue in court is going to be whether, when viewed objectively, it was reasonable for the officer to assume that any particular area or item might contain the parolee's personal property or be somewhere that he might be expected to secret items he didn't want the police to find. (Id., at p. 926.)

The same rule holds true as to a probationer with a Fourth waiver. (People v. Cervantes (2017) 11 Cal.App.5th 860, 871; ruling that so long as the center console of a vehicle is not locked, secured, or otherwise closed off, a search of a center console based on a front seat passenger's probation search condition is objectively reasonable.)

See "Common Areas; Vehicles," under "Fourth Waiver Searches" (Chapter 19), below.

Note: Not all probationers (as opposed to parolees) are subject to a Fourth waiver. An officer needs to check before searching as to a probationer's Fourth waiver status.

With Defendant's Admission as to the Contents:

When a suspect makes "an unequivocal, contemporaneous, and voluntary disclosure (to a law enforcement officer) that a package or container contains contraband," it is arguable that he waives any reasonable expectation of privacy as to the contents of that container, eliminating the need to obtain a search warrant. (United States v. Monghur (9th Cir. 2009) 588 F.3rd 975, 978-981; citing United States v. Cardona Rivera (7th Cir. 1990) 904 F.2nd 1149.)

However, a jail inmate talking over a jail telephone, where he is warned that his conversations were subject to monitoring, asking a friend to retrieve what officers understood to be a gun (although defendant only referred to it as "the thing") from a container (also described in vague, generic terms) in the closet of his girlfriend's home, was held not to have waived any expectation of privacy defendant had in the container that was later retrieved by law enforcement and illegally searched without a search warrant. (United States v. Monghur, supra.)

Abandoned Property: Any containers (or any other property) abandoned by a suspect, thus relinquishing at least an objectively reasonable expectation of privacy, if not also the subject's subjective expectation of privacy, may be seized and searched without probable cause and without a search warrant. (In re Baraka H. (1992) 6 Cal.App.4th 1039.)

E.g.: A minor, who appeared to officers to be conducting narcotics transactions with passing motorists, retrieved controlled substances from a paper bag discarded on the ground some distance beyond the minor's reach. When detained, the bag was retrieved by the officers and searched and marijuana was recovered. By distancing himself from the bag, despite a lack of an intent to permanently abandon the property, the minor gave up any reasonable expectation of privacy in the bag's contents. (In re Baraka H., supra.)

Observations of defendant retrieving contraband from a hole in the ground, covered by a piece of wood, in the common area of an apartment complex, while the observing officers are standing on adjacent private property with the permission of the property's owner, were lawful, as was the warrantless retrieval of the contraband found in the hole. (People v. Shaw (2002) 97 Cal.App.4th 833.)

There is no expectation of privacy in a duffle bag left in an apartment laundry room open to anyone, even though placed out of the way on a high shelf. (United States v. Fay (9th Cir. 2005) 410 F.3rd 589.)

Trashcans: There is no reasonable expectation of privacy in the trash containers one places out on the curb for pick up. (California v. Greenwood (1988) 486 U.S. 35 [108 S.Ct. 1625; 100 L.Ed.2nd 30].)

> Note that this rule applies only to trashcans that were placed out on the curb for pick up, at which time the owner of the trashcan loses any expectation of privacy. A trashcan located within the curtilage of a suspect's home (e.g., at the side of the house) requires a search warrant (or consent) in order to be lawfully searched. (See People v. Lepere (2023) 91 Cal.App.5th 727, and footnote 1, citing Florida v. Jardines (2012) 569 U.S. 1, 6 [185 L.Ed.2nd 495; 133 S.Ct. 1409].)

Leaving a cellphone at the scene of a crime negates the suspect's expectation of privacy in the contents of that phone, and is therefore abandoned property despite the suspect's subjective wish to retrieve it, which he fails to act on. "Abandonment . . . is not meant in the strict property-right sense, but rests instead on whether the person so relinquished his interest in the property that he no longer retained a reasonable expectation of privacy in it at the time of the search." (People v. Daggs (2005) 133 Cal.App.4th 361.)

> Similarly, abandoning one's cellphone (apparently for the purpose of avoiding the possibility that officers might "ping" it and determined his location) during a high speed (and foot) chase negated any need for officers to obtain a search warrant before opening the cellphone and using it to call defendant's wife. (United States v. Small (4th Cir. 2019) 944 F.3rd 490.)

However, the abandonment must be voluntary. Property abandoned as a result (i.e., the "direct product") of an unlawful detention (or unlawful arrest) may not be lawfully searched. (United States v. Stephens (9th Cir. 2000) 206 F.3rd 914.)

Shipping a package while using a fictitious name and return address does not necessarily mean that the defendant has abandoned the property shipped. Abandonment is a question of fact, and depends upon the totality of the circumstances. The test is whether defendant's words or actions would cause a reasonable person in the searching officer's position to believe that the property was abandoned. Where defendant asked for a routing number and made a number of telephone inquiries concerning the status of the package he had shipped, he was properly found to have not abandoned the package despite the use of a phony name and return address. (People v. Pereira (2007) 150 Cal.App.4th 1106; "The appropriate test is whether defendant's words or actions would cause a reasonable person in the searching officer's position to believe that the property was abandoned." Id., at p. 113.)

There is no privacy right in the mouthpiece of the PAS device, which was provided by the police and where defendant abandoned any expectation of privacy in the saliva he deposited on the device when he failed to wipe it off. Whether defendant subjectively expected that the genetic material contained in his saliva would become known to the police was irrelevant because he deposited it on a police device and thus made it accessible to the police. The officer who administered the PAS (Preliminary Alcohol Screening) test testified that used mouthpieces were normally discarded in the trash. Thus, any subjective expectation defendant may have had that his right to privacy would be preserved was unreasonable. (People v. Thomas (2011) 200 Cal.App.4th 338.)

Shipping a package containing contraband, using a false name, does not indicate that the defendant intended to abandon the package, at least when he makes efforts at a later time to insure that the package has been delivered. (People v. Pereira (2007) 150 Cal.App.4th 1106, 1113-1114; see also Robey v. Superior Court (2013) 56 Cal.4th 1218, 1224, where the Court held that the People had waived this argument, but cited Pereira with approval.)

The co-occupant of a vehicle, when she gets out of the car leaving her purse in the car, has not "abandoned" her purse. "Simply getting out of the car and leaving the purse on the floorboard does not constitute abandonment" (People v. Baker (2008) 164 Cal.App.4th 1152, 1161.)

By throwing his backpack onto the roof of a house upon the approach of police officers, defendant abandoned any expectation of privacy in that backpack that he might have previously had. (United States v. Juszczyk (10th Cir. Kan. 2017) 844 F.3rd 1213.)

Leaving one's backpack in a residence in which defendant had been trespassing (i.e., an unoccupied rental), precluded defendant from later claiming any expectation of privacy in that backpack. (United States v. Sawyer (7th Cir. IL. 2019) 929 F.3rd 497.)

However, in United States v. Davis (4th Cir. 2021) 997 F.3rd 191, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeal applied the theory of Gant (above) to an arrestee's backpack that he dropped on the ground upon being arrested following a foot pursuit, and which was searched after he was arrested and handcuffed, finding the search to be illegal.

A warrantless search of abandoned property is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. In the Tenth Circuit, abandonment occurs if either: (1) the owner subjectively intended to relinquish ownership of the property; or (2) the owner lacks an objectively reasonable expectation of privacy in the property. In this case, defendant disassociating himself from a large duffle bag in the overhead compartment of a Greyhound Bus by sitting away from it, on the opposite side of the bus, and telling a DEA agent that he had no luggage, left defendant without standing to contest the warrantless opening of the bag and discovery of drugs. As such, a reasonable person in the DEA agent's position would have understood that defendant had abandoned the duffle bag. (United States v. Fernandez (10th Cir. 2021) 20 F.4th 1298.)

Having left a black case in a former girlfriend's apartment for an extended period of time, defendant did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in that case. The girlfriend, therefore, lawfully provided the police with the right to open the case in which parts to an AR-15 rifle were found. The fact that defendant was arrested in the apartment was irrelevant to this issue in that defendant was a trespasser, not having legally resided there for some time. The subsequent warrantless search of defendant's vehicle, in which the rest of the firearm was found, was also upheld. (United States v. John (1st Cir, 2023) 59 F.4th 44.)

During a traffic stop, the officer's observation of defendant getting out of his truck and throwing a jacket over a chain link fence onto his mother's property, did not provide the officer with cause to retrieve the jacket and search it (in which an illegal firearm was found). The Court, in so ruling, held that defendant had not abandoned the jacket in that he did not thereby manifest an intent to discard it. Per the Court: "(W)e do not think it can fairly be said that Ramirez manifested an intent to disclaim ownership in his jacket simply by placing it on the private side of his mother's fenced-in property line." (United States v. Ramirez (5th Cir. Feb. 23, 2024) __ F.4th __ [2024 U.S.App. LEXIS 4347].)

With a Reasonable Suspicion to Believe a Container on Defendant's Person Might Contain a Weapon:

Upon a deputy sheriff responding to a call regarding a disturbance of the peace, defendant was stopped and questioned. During questioning and inquiries regarding his fanny pack he wore around his waist, the deputy became uneasy by defendant's responses and the contents of the fanny pack. The deputy could see what appeared to be the outline of a small gun. Defendant's refusal to take the fanny pack off and put it on the patrol car heightened the deputy's concern. The deputy therefore placed defendant in the patrol car for his safety, and inspected the fanny pack. A gun was found and defendant was prosecuted and convicted of being a felon in the possession of a firearm despite his argument that the search was illegal. On appeal, defendant argued that he was not under arrest, none of the exceptions to the warrant requirement applied, and a warrantless search incident to arrest was inapplicable as it was limited to a patdown of a suspect's outer clothing in searching for weapons. The court affirmed defendant's conviction, holding that the search was legal in that a protective seizure and search for weapons was not limited to a person's body. Rather, a seizure required a balancing of the intrusion against the governmental interest in neutralizing the threat of physical harm to police, and the search was an objectively reasonable preventive measure. (People v. Ritter (1997) 54 Cal.App. 274.)

During a Fourth Waiver Search of a Residence:

When officers find a container (backpack in this case) during a lawful Fourth waiver search, they only need a "reasonable suspicion" (as opposed to probable cause) to believe that the container belongs to or is controlled by the subject with the Fourth waiver in order to search it. (United States v. Bolivar (9th Cir. 2012) 670 F.3rd 1091, 1093-1095.)

The search of defendant's purse, found in a room recognized by the officers to be a room where defendant was staying with her young son, when the search was based upon a Fourth waiver made by a probationer who owned the house, was found to be illegal absent any evidence to believe that the probationer had access to that room or to the purse itself. (People v. Carreon (2016) 248 Cal.App.4th 866, 879-880.)

See "Fourth Waiver Searches" (Chapter 19), below.

During the Execution of a Search Warrant in a Residence:

The First Circuit Court of Appeals has held that; "any container situated within residential premises which are the subject of a validly-issued warrant may be searched if it is reasonable to believe that the container could conceal items [listed] in the warrant." In this case, the Court upheld the search of defendant's backpack found in his bedroom, finding that many of the items listed in the attachment to the warrant (related to drug possession and sales), which detailed items to be seized, were things that could reasonably be thought to be contained within a backpack. This included "[d]ocumentary or other items of personal property that tend to identify the person(s) in the residence, occupancy, control or ownership of the respective locations to be searched," and "records . . . and receipts relating to the transportation, ordering, purchase, sale or distribution of controlled substances, and the acquisition, secreting, transfer, concealment and/or expenditure of proceeds derived from the distribution of controlled substances." The fact that defendant himself was not identified as a co-conspirator was not relevant to the question of whether his backpack, a container located in an apartment subject to a valid search warrant, was properly searched by the agents. (United States v. Congo (1st Cir. 2021) 21 F.4th 29.)

Special Needs Searches:

Search of Luggage in a Subway Facility: Implemented in response to terrorist attacks on subways in other cities, a program was designed to deter terrorists from carrying concealed explosives onto the New York's subway. The city program established daily inspection checkpoints at selected subway facilities where officers searched bags that met size criteria for containing explosives. Subway riders wishing to avoid a search were required to leave the station. In a bench trial, the district court found that the program comported with the Fourth Amendment under the "special needs doctrine." On appeal, the Second Circuit Court of Appeal affirmed, finding that the program was reasonable and therefore constitutional. In particular, the court found that preventing a terrorist attack on the subway was a special need, which was weighty in light of recent terrorist attacks on subway systems in other cities. In addition, the court found that the disputed program was a reasonably effective deterrent. Although the searches intruded on a full privacy interest, the court further found that such intrusion was minimal, particularly as inspections involved only certain size containers and riders could decline inspection by leaving the station. (MacWade v. Kelly (2nd Cir. 2006) 460 F.3rd 260.)

See "Special Needs Searches and Seizures," under "Warrantless Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 9), above.

Other "Expectation of Privacy" Issues:

In a Jail: A jail inmate talking over a jail telephone, where he is warned that his conversations were subject to monitoring, asking a friend to retrieve what officers understood to be a gun (although defendant only referred to it as "the thing") from a container (also described in vague, generic terms) in the closet of his girlfriend's home, does not waive any expectation of privacy defendant had in the container that was later retrieved by law enforcement and illegally searched without a search warrant. (United States v. Monghur (9th Cir. 2009) 588 F.3rd 975, 978-981.)

Monghur differentiated these facts from a similar circumstance where defendant told law enforcement officers, clearly and unequivocally, that a particular container contained contraband. The Court in this case found that such a concession waived any expectation of privacy defendant might have had in the container, thus allowing for a warrantless search of that container. (United States v. Cardona-Rivera (7th Cir. 1990) 904 F.2nd 1149.)

Mailed Drug Shipments: Where defendant had arranged to have delivered packages of cocaine to a friend's residence, the packages listing as the recipient the friend's deceased brother, with an address and phone number not otherwise associated with the defendant, defendant lacked the necessary expectation of privacy needed to challenge law enforcement's opening of those packages before they were delivered (in a controlled delivery) to the address listed on the packages. (United States v. Rose (4th Cir. 2021) 3 F.4th 722.)

See "Expectation of Privacy," under "Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 8), above.

With Consent of a Third Person having Common Authority:

Paper bags left by defendant in an acquaintance's garage, where the acquaintance had free access to the bags, may be lawfully searched with consent from the acquaintance. By leaving the bags with the acquaintance, knowing and not objecting to the fact that she (the acquaintance) would go into the bags, defendant "assumed the risk" that she would allow others to look into the bags. (People v. Schmeck (2005) 37 Cal.4th 240, 280-282.)

A business that owns the company's computers may consent to the search of a computer used by an employee, at least when the employee is on notice that he has no reasonable expectation of privacy in the contents of the computer he is using. (United States v. Ziegler (9th Cir. 2006) 474 F.3rd 1184.)

Allowing another person unrestricted access to a mutually owned computer negates any expectation of privacy the first person might have had. A co-owner has actual authority to give consent to the police to search. And if it turns out that the person is not actually a co-owner, the doctrine of apparent authority may justify the search. (United States v. Stanley (9th Cir. 2011) 653 F.3rd 946, 950-952.)

See "Consent Searches" (Chapter 20), below.

The "Single Purpose Container" Theory:

Where "some containers . . . by their very nature cannot support any reasonable expectation of privacy because their contents can be inferred from their outward appearance," a warrant is not needed to open the container and inspect its contents. In such a case, it is as if the item in the container was in "plain sight." (Arkansas v. Sanders (1979) 442 U.S. 753, 764, fn. 13 [99 S.Ct. 2586; 61 L.Ed.2nd 235]; overruled on other grounds in California v. Acevedo (1991) 500 U.S. 565 [111 S.Ct. 1982; 114 L.Ed.2nd 619].)

""(I)f the distinctive configuration of a container proclaims its contents, the contents cannot fairly be said to have been removed from the searching officer's view," just as "if the container were transparent." (Robbins v. California (1981) 453 U.S. 420, 427 [101 S.Ct. 2841; 69 L.Ed.2nd 744]; overruled on other grounds in United States v. Ross (1982) 456 U.S. 798 [102 S.Ct. 2157; 72 L.Ed.2nd 572].)

Plastic wrapped green blocks found not to be within this exception, in Robbins.

Per the plurality, for this rule to apply; "(A) container must so clearly announce its contents, whether by its distinctive configuration, its transparency, or otherwise, that its contents are obvious to an observer." (Robbins v. California, supra, at p. 428.)

It's a question of whether a defendant has a "reasonable expectation of privacy" in the contents of a container. There is none if the contents are within a container that meets the requirements of this rule. (United States v. Gust (9th Cir. 2005) 405 F.3rd 797; a gun case that just as easily could have contained a musical instrument.

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal in Gust limited the applicability of this rule by holding that the nature of the container must be evaluated in light of "the objective viewpoint of a layperson, rather than the subjective viewpoint of a trained law enforcement officer, and without sole reliance on the specific circumstances in which the containers were discovered." In other words, the officers' expertise, and the circumstances under which the container is found, must be ignored. (Citing United States v. Miller (9th Cir. 1985) 769 F.2nd 554.)

The California Supreme Court discussed the theory that a distinctive odor (of marijuana) might fit within this category of warrantless searches, but declined to decide the issue because the record was not sufficiently developed at the trial court level. (Robey v. Superior Court (2013) 56 Cal.4th 1218, 1241-1243, and concurring opinion at 1247-1254.)

The "Private Search (or 'Third Party') Doctrine:"

Rule: Containers First Searched by Non-Law Enforcement: Contraband found by a civilian in a container, such as when a United Parcel Service ("UPS") or Federal Express employee opens and inspects the contents of a package being shipped through their respective businesses, is not subject to suppression. When law enforcement is subsequently notified after such an inspection, the contents of the package may be field tested by a law enforcement officer, seized, and submitted to a law enforcement lab for further testing; all without a warrant. (People v. Warren (1990) 219 Cal.App.3rd 619; see also United States v. Jacobsen (1984) 466 U.S. 109 [80 L.Ed.2nd 85; 104 S. Ct. 1652]; United States v. Young (9th Cir. 1998) 153 F.3rd 1079.)

"The private search doctrine concerns circumstances in which a private party's intrusions would have constituted a search had the government conducted it and the material discovered by the private party then comes into the government's possession. Invoking the precept that when private parties provide evidence to the government 'on [their] own accord[,] ... it [i]s not incumbent on the police to . . . avert their eyes, . . .'" (United States v. Wilson (9th Cir. 2021) 13 F.4th 961, 967-968, citing Coolidge v. New Hampshire (1971) 403 U.S. 443, 489 [91 S.Ct. 2022; 29 L.Ed.2nd 564]; Walter v. United States (1980) 447 U.S. 649 [100 S.Ct. 2395; 65 L.Ed.2nd 410], which produced no majority decision, and United States v. Jacobsen (1984) 466 U.S. 109 [104 S.Ct. 1652; 80 L.Ed.2nd 85], which did.)

Why? Once a private party (i.e., non-law enforcement) has made a search and revealed his findings to the police, the defendant's expectation of privacy has been intruded upon to the extent of the private search. Thus, where employees of a private freight carrier found apparent narcotics during the search of a package, then returned the substance to the package and informed narcotics agents, the agents' removal of the substance from the package did not constitute a search, because it did not exceed the scope of the earlier private search. (United States v. Jacobsen, supra, at p. 116, 119 [80 L.Ed.2nd at p. 96, 98] see also People v. Yackee (1984) 161 Cal.App.3rd 843; cocaine first found by airline agent.)

Further a "chemical test that merely discloses whether or not a particular substance (already viewed by a private person) is cocaine does not compromise any legitimate interest in privacy," and therefore does not constitute a search. (Jacobsen, supra, at p. 123.)

As noted by the Supreme Court: "The Fourth Amendment's protection 'is wholly inapplicable "to a search or seizure, even an unreasonable one, effected by a private individual not acting as an agent of the [g]overnment or with the participation or knowledge of any governmental official."'" (People v. Wilson (2020) 56 Cal.App.5th 128, 144-145; quoting United States v. Jacobsen, supra, at pp. 113-114.)

The Government has the burden of proof on the issue of whether the Private Person Doctrine applies. (United States v. Wilson (9th Cir. 2021) 13 F.4th 961, 971; citing Coolidge v. New Hampshire (1971) 403 U.S. 443, 454-455 [91 S.Ct. 2022; 29 L.Ed.2nd 564].)

General Case Law:

Searches Approved:

See United States v. Jacobsen (1984) 466 U.S. 109 [104 S.Ct. 1652; 80 L.Ed.2nd 85], above.

The Fourth Amendment was not implicated by a police officer's view of property found in defendant's vehicle and inventoried by a private repossessor. (People v. Shegog (1986) 184 Cal.App.3rd 899, 902.)

A government agent may test suspicious substances discovered during a search by a private person without having to obtain a search warrant. (People v. Warren (1990) 219 Cal.App.3rd 619, 623.)

A private citizen viewing discs taken by the citizen from the defendant's bedroom, and then showing the same discs to a police officer, is not an illegal search. Also, the fact that the officer may view images on those discs not previously seen by the citizen is irrelevant "if the police knew with substantial certainty" that the same type of images would be found. But looking at other unmarked discs not previously viewed by the private citizen, not knowing for sure what might be on them, requires a search warrant. (People v. Wilkinson (2008) 163 Cal.App.4th 1554, 1569-1574.)

Note: The argument that a container, not already opened and viewed by the private citizen, can be opened by the police officer "if the police knew with substantial certainty" that it contains more of the same, comes from United States v. Runyan (5th Cir. 2001) 275 F.3rd 449, 463.)

> Another possible exception to the general rule: "(T)he police do not exceed the scope of a prior private search when they examine the same materials that were examined by the private searchers, but they examine these materials more thoroughly than did the private parties. [Citation.]" (Id., at p. 464.)

See also United States v. Bowman (8th Cir. 1990) 907 F.2nd 63, where law enforcement viewing the contents of one bundle wrapped in plastic and duct tape already opened by an airport employee allowed for the opening of four identical bundles because the opened bundle "spoke volumes as to [the] contents [of the remaining bundles]—particularly to the trained eye of the officer." (pg. 65.)

Where a store employee found child pornography on defendant's computer that had been given to him by defendant to work on, and then detectives viewed the same images, suppression was not warranted under the Fourth Amendment. Defendant had voluntarily turned over his computer to the store with the understanding that that its employees would inspect the system in furtherance of its repair. The employee's prior viewing of the images had extinguished defendant's expectation of privacy in his computer's contents. The defectives did not exceed the scope of the employee's prior search. (United States v. Tosti (9th Cir. 2013) 733 F.3rd 816, 821-823.)
In a case out of the federal Fifth Circuit, employing the "private search doctrine," the Fourth Amendment was held not to apply when the government did not conduct the search itself, but only received and utilized information discovered by a search conducted by a private party. The Supreme Court has reasoned that once a person's expectation of privacy is defeated by a private party, the government may use "the now-nonprivate information." In this case, Microsoft, a private company determined through their own software that the hash values of files uploaded by defendant corresponded to the hash values of known child pornography. Microsoft then passed this information onto law enforcement. The court concluded that Microsoft conducted a "private search" for Fourth Amendment purposes. Consequently, a police detective's subsequent review of the images did not constitute an intrusion on defendant's privacy that he did not already experience as a result of the private search conducted by Microsoft. (United States v. Reddick (5th Cir. TX 2018) 900 F.3rd 636.)

> See also People v. Wilson (2020) 56 Cal.App.5th 128, below, for further explanation about how the "hash value" system works.

The observation of child pornography on defendant's cellphone by a friend who had borrowed the phone, and then who showed it to a police officer, was not unlawful. The responding officer was entitled to view the same images and videos that the friend had viewed on his own initiative. The search of defendant's residence, and a later forensic search of defendant's cellphone, both under the authority of a search warrant, was upheld. (United States v. Suellentrop (8th Cir. 2020) 953 F.3rd 1047.)

Defendant's wife, scrolling through his cellphone and discovering videos of him molesting their daughter, was private person search, done because of her own curiosity and not as an agent of law enforcement. Subsequently, her showing the same videos to law enforcement (on three separate occasions) was not a Fourth Amendment violation so long as what the officers viewed under these circumstances did not exceed the scope of what defendant's wife had already found as a private person. The Court further ruled that cellphones were not "categorically exempt" from the "private search doctrine." (United States v. Rivera-Morales (1st Cir. P.R. 2020) 961 F.3rd 1.)

In a case where two packages mailed via the U.S. Postal Service by defendant were found to contain 2,222 grams of methamphetamine, the eventual searches of the packages were upheld. In this case, a postal employee observed several drug package profile characteristics, including: (1) the information on the shipping labels was handwritten; (2) the postage fees were paid in cash, allowing the sender to remain anonymous or avoid detection by law enforcement; (3) the Southern District of California is known as a source region for controlled substances; and (4) at least one of the men mailing the packages appeared to be anxious or nervous. Finally, although the handwriting on the shipping labels for the two packages appeared identical, as though the same person filled out both shipping labels, the purported senders' names on the labels were different. Based on these factors, the court concluded the postal employee had reasonable suspicion to detain the packages. The Court also held that the delay between the detention of the packages and their search (i.e., 16 days) was reasonable. Relevant factors in determining reasonableness included investigatory diligence, the length of detention, and whether there are circumstances beyond the investigator's control. In this case, the Court noted that the reasons for the delay included having to work other cases, an intervening weekend, and the illness of the investigator. (United States v. Martinez (5th Cir. 2022) 25 F.4th 303.)

Searches Disapproved:

The "Private Search Doctrine" was held not to apply, however, where a private party mistakenly received a shipment containing several individual boxes of films with labels on the outside indicating the films contained obscene content. One side of the examined boxes contained suggestive drawings while on the other side were explicit descriptions of the contents. After one of the employees unsuccessfully attempted to view the films' contents, the private party contacted the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) to retrieve the shipment. The FBI agents viewed the films with a projector without obtaining a warrant. In a plurality opinion, the court held that the government's search violated the Fourth Amendment, explaining that "[t]he projection of the films was a significant expansion of the search that had been conducted previously by a private party." (Walter v. United States (1980) 447 U.S. 649, 657-658 [100 S.Ct. 2395; 65 L.Ed.2nd 410].)

See United States v. Lichtenberger (6th Cir. 2015) 786 F.3rd 478: Laptop evidence and evidence obtained pursuant to a search warrant issued on the basis of its contents had to be suppressed because the police officer could not testify with a "virtual certainty" that she didn't view more than the defendant's girlfriend had seen in the previous private search. The search, and the resulting search warrant, therefore violated defendant's Fourth Amendment rights.

Downloading video files with sexually suggestive titles after viewing none-pornographic files that had been found by the owner of a computer store on defendant's computer, and then viewing the downloaded videos without a warrant, held to be beyond the scope of the private search and illegal. (People v. Michael E. (2014) 230 Cal.App.4th 261, 268-279.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal declined to extend this rule to a hotel room and to a backpack in the hotel room, both of which had been looked into previously by non-law enforcement hotel employees. While the package in United States v. Jacobsen (1984) 466 U.S. 109 [104 S.Ct.1652; 80 L.Ed.2nd 85], contained nothing but contraband (i.e., cocaine), defendant's hotel room and his backpack in this case contained other items that were not illegal and to which the defendant maintained a reasonable expectation of privacy. (United States v. Young (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 711, 720-721.)

in United States v. Sparks (11th Cir. 2015) 806 F.3rd 1323, a store employee and her fiancé discovered child pornography on a lost cell phone and showed the phone to the police. The police officer ultimately viewed two videos on the cell phone, one of which the private parties "had not watched." Because the government search exposed new information, not seen by the private party, the Eleventh Circuit concluded that the government search exceeded the scope of the private search

Extension of the Rule to "Third Party Doctrine:"

When defendant rented an e-scooter, he plainly understood that the e-scooter company had to collect location data for the scooter through its smartphone applications. Having "voluntarily conveyed" his location to the operator in the ordinary course of business, the defendant could not assert a reasonable expectation of privacy. The Mobile Data Specification (i.e., MDS) location data indicated a diminished expectation of privacy, and the collection of that data by the Los Angeles Department of Transportation was not a search, and therefore not in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Also, Penal Code § 1546.4(c) did not authorize the defendant to bring an independent action to enforce its provisions. Because defendant had no reasonable expectation of privacy over the MDS location data, no additional facts could have cured the deficiency with his constitutional claims. (Sanchez v. Los Angeles Department of Transportation (9th Cir. 2022) 39 F.4th 548.)

When the Civilian is Acting as a Government Agent:

If the civilian is acting according to a governmental directive (e.g.; FAA guidelines for searching packages at an airport), the civilian may be held to the same standard as a law enforcement officer. (United States v Ross (9th Cir. 1994) 32 F.3rd 1141; United States v. Young (9th Cir. 1998) 153 F.3rd 1079.)

However, a mere "tacit agreement" between a law enforcement officer and a civilian that the civilian will conduct a particular search which the officer could not lawfully perform himself, as ruled to be illegal in People v. North (1981) 29 Cal.3rd 509, is no longer enough to invalidate the search since passage of Proposition 8. (People v. Wilkinson (2008) 163 Cal. App. 4th 1554, 1565; noting that the rule North to be invalid at least "to the extent North requires nothing more than the officer's knowledge and failure to protect the defendant's rights to attribute a private search to the government."

An airline employee who had in the past been a paid informant for the Drug Enforcement Administration ("DEA"), who opened a package after being encouraged by the DEA to do so on a routine basis, expecting a probable reward from DEA because of having received rewards for opening similar packages before, was held to be a government agent even though he had not been directed to open this particular package. (United States v. Walther (9th Cir. 1981) 652 F.2nd 788.)

Note, however, it is doubtful whether merely having been informed by law enforcement of the power to open and inspect packages automatically turns a civilian into a police agent. (See People v. Wachter (1976) 58 Cal.App.3rd 311, 920-923, finding that even a police officer, when off duty and acting out of mere curiosity, may not be acting as a law enforcement officer in conducting a search.)

See also People v. Peterson (1972) 23 Cal.App.3rd 883, 893; off-duty police trainee searching a container in his apartment house garage out of concern for his own safety; not a government search.

Searches of Computers Based Upon Prior Internet Service Provider Search:

A Nebraska detective making a warrantless inspection of defendant's computerized files containing child pornography, provided to the detective by Google which had originally found them in its own inspection of those files, scanning its users' emails voluntarily out of its own private business interest to eradicate child pornography from its platform, was held to be lawful. After an individual (i.e., Google, in this case) conducts a valid private search, law enforcement officers may, in turn, perform the same search as the private party without violating the Fourth Amendment as long as the search does not exceed the scope of the private search. (United States v. Ringland (8th Cir. 2020) 966 F.3rd 731.)

After an electronic service provider flagged certain e-mail attachments as apparent child pornography, the attachments were forwarded to a local law enforcement agency, whose officers viewed the images for the first time without a warrant. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeal held the private search exception justified the government's warrantless search because the government agent's "visual review of the suspect images . . . was akin to the government agents' decision to conduct chemical tests on the white powder in Jacobsen," insofar as "opening the file merely confirmed that the flagged file was indeed child pornography, as suspected." (United States v. Reddick (5th Cir. 2018) 900 F.3rd 636, 639.)

> United States v. Miller (6th Cir. 2020) 982 F.3rd 412, 427, for a similar result under similar circumstances, accepting the district court's ruling that the hash mark system used by Google was "highly reliable."

Child pornography images that defendant sent with his g-mail account triggered an automated flag at Google (by use of a "hash" table). Without reviewing the images, Google reported them to a federal "tip line," which reported them to San Diego law enforcement authorities, resulting in an investigator opening and viewing a number of defendant's child pornography-related photos. The tip and the investigator's viewing of the photos resulted in a search warrant for defendant's g-mail account, which revealed defendant's multiple child molestation crimes. On appeal from his life sentence, defendant challenged the SDPD's warrantless inspection of the images which it used to justify the search warrant. The Court of Appeal rejected the challenge. "[I]f a government search is preceded by a private search, the government search does not implicate the Fourth Amendment as long as it does not exceed the scope of the initial private search." (Citing United States v. Jacobsen (1984) 466 U.S. 109 [104 S.Ct. 1652; 80 L.Ed.2nd 85].) "The government did not further infringe on Wilson's privacy, but rather guarded against the risk that Google's report was wrong." (People v. Wilson (2020) 56 Cal.App.5th 128, 141-152.)

> Note: This opinion explains what a "hash" is, how Google builds and maintains a hash table of offending images, and how Google goes about reporting violations.

In a case where AOL automatically identified one of the defendant's four email attachments as apparent child pornography, based on a hash value match, AOL then sent the text of the defendant's email and all four attachments to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC) where an analyst "opened the email, viewed each of the attached images, and confirmed that all four [images] (not just the one AOL's automated filed identified) appeared to be child pornography" The Court emphasized that "AOL never opened the email itself. Only NCMEC did that." The Court, after holding that NCMEC is either a governmental entity or a government agent, concluded that "in at least this way [the government] exceeded rather than repeated AOL's private search," (United States v. Ackerman (10th Cir. 2016) 831 F.3rd 1292, 1294, 1305-1306.)

Overruling the federal district court denial of defendant's motion to suppress (see United States v. Wilson (2017) 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98432.), the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that a law enforcement officer's warrantless viewing of defendant's Gmail e-mail attachments, found to contain child pornography, violated the Fourth Amendment as an illegal search. In so holding, the Court rejected the theory that the "private search doctrine" applied. In this case, Google used its hash mark monitoring system to identify child pornography in four files defendant had uploaded into his computer. Google, however, never actually viewed the files, but rather identified defendant's e-mails as containing child pornography merely through its hash identification system. Passing this information onto the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (which also did not view the files), which in turn passed it onto the San Diego Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, where the investigator, for the first time, actually viewed defendant's pornography, the Court held that this was as illegal search. (United States v. Wilson (9th Cir. 2021) 13 F.4th 961.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that federal law did not have the effect of transforming electronic communication service providers' (ESPs) private searches into governmental action because the Stored Communications Act and the Protect Our Children Act of 2008 did not have the clear indices of the Government's encouragement, endorsement, and participation sufficient to implicate the Fourth Amendment. There was insufficient governmental involvement in the ESPs' private searches of defendant's accounts to trigger Fourth Amendment protection because there was no evidence law enforcement was involved in or participated in the investigations, and the ESPs investigated the accounts to further their own legitimate, independent motivations. Also, defendant did not have a legitimate expectation of privacy in the limited digital data sought in the government's subpoenas. They did not request any communication content from his accounts. (United States v. Rosenow (9th Cir. 2022) 33 F.4th 529.)

Exterior of a Container:

There is no expectation of privacy in the outside of a piece of mail sent to the defendant. "(B)ecause the information is foreseeably visible to countless people in the course of a letter reaching its destination, 'an addressee or addressor generally has no expectation of privacy as to the outside of mail.'" (People v. Reyes (2009) 178 Cal.App.4th 1183, 1189-1192; quoting United States v. Osunegbu (1987 5th Cir.) 822 F.2nd 472, 380, fn. 3; see also United States v. Jefferson (9th Cir. 2009) 566 F.3rd 928, 933.)

In Reyes, an employee of a private postbox company spontaneously handed officers defendant's mail when the officers inquired as to whether defendant had rented a box at that facility even though the employees didn't "normally" hand over a clients' mail absent a court order. Defendant was never told that his mail would be kept private.

Customs Inspections: Similarly, the United States Supreme Court has held that evidence lawfully observed by a customs inspector, during a warrantless border search and resealed in its container, may later be seized from that container without a warrant by law enforcement officers after a controlled delivery to the defendant. "(O)nce a container has been found to a certainty to contain illicit drugs, the contraband becomes like objects physically within the plain view of the police, and the claim to privacy is lost. Consequently, the subsequent reopening of the container is not a 'search' within the intendment of the Fourth Amendment." (Illinois v. Andreas (1983) 463 U.S. 765 [103 S.Ct. 3319; 77 L.Ed.2nd 1003].)

> The Court did note, however, that at some point after an interruption of control or surveillance of a container, such as when the defendant changes the contents of the container, the defendant may regain a legitimate privacy right. (Id., at p. 772 [77 L.Ed.2nd at p. 1011].)
> See "Border Searches" (Chapter 18), below.

"Manipulating," "Squeezing," or "Poofing" Containers: Whether or not a container can be "manipulated," "squeezed," or "poofed" without implicating the Fourth Amendment is subject to a difference of opinion, and depends upon the circumstances. For instance:

> At an Airport: At least where there is some need for heightened security, such as when dealing with airline luggage, squeezing a package and noting the odor of the expended air has been held to be lawful. (People v. Santana (1998) 63 Cal.App.4th 543; United States v. Lovell (5th Cir. 1988) 849 F.2nd 910. See also United States v. Goldstein (5th Cir.) 635 F.2d 356.)
> > However, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal disagrees. Squeezing a bag checked with an airline to facilitate smelling its contents is an unconstitutional search. (Hernandez v. United States (9th Cir. 1965) 353 F.2nd 624.)
>
> At a Bus Station: Although a federal appellate court has held that squeezing one's luggage in a bus is such a minor intrusion that it could not reasonably be considered a search for purposes of the Fourth Amendment (United States v. Viera (5th Cir. 1981) 644 F.2nd 509.), the United States Supreme Court apparently disagrees, and has held that the squeezing of a soft-sided suitcase on a bus, thus noting the feel of a "brick" of contraband, is a search and illegal if done without probable cause. (Bond v. United States (2000) 529 U.S. 334 [120 S.Ct. 1462; 146 L.Ed.2nd 365].)
> During a Detention and Patdown: If a police officer feels what might be a controlled substance in the pocket of a suspect during a patdown for weapons, and "manipulates" (Minnesota v. Dickerson (1993) 508 U.S. 366, 378 [113 S.Ct. 2130; 124 L.Ed.2nd 334, 345]; People v. Dickey (1994) 21 Cal.App.4th 952, 957.) or "shakes" it (United States v. Miles (9th Cir. 2001) 224 F.3rd 1009.) in an attempt to confirm or verify his suspicions, the manipulation or shaking of the object is a search for contraband, done without probable cause, and illegal.

But, feeling a bulge that is believed to be a weapon, and manipulating it in an attempt to verify that it is a weapon, which requires no more than a reasonable suspicion, is lawful. (United States v. Mattarolo (9th Cir. 1999) 209 F.3rd 1153.)

See "Frisks," under "Searches of Persons" (Chapter 11), above.

Detention of a Container:

Rule: A container, with a "reasonable and articulable suspicion" that it may have contraband or other evidence of illegal activity inside, may be detained for a reasonable period of time to allow for an investigation concerning its possible contents. (United States v. Hernandez (9th Cir. 2002) 313 F.3rd 1206; package mailed to the defendant detained by postal inspectors.)

"(W)e conclude that when an officer's observations lead him reasonably to believe that a traveler is carrying luggage that contains narcotics, the principles of Terry and its progeny would permit the officer to detain the luggage briefly to investigate the circumstances that aroused his suspicion, provided that the investigative detention is properly limited in scope." (United States v. Place (1983) 462 U.S. 696, 706 [103 S.Ct. 2637; 77 L.Ed.2nd 110].)

See United States v. Beale (9th Cir 1984) 736 F.2nd 1289, 1291-1292: "Here, we are not confronted with a case in which the detection dog conducted a sniff of a person rather than an inanimate object, or a sniff of luggage that a person was carrying at the time. The investigative technique applied to Beale's luggage caused 'virtually no annoyance and rarely even contact with the owner of the bags, unless [the test result] is positive.'"

Although the sender of a package through the U.S. mails retains little if any interest after the package is sent (United States v. Place, supra, at p. 718, fn. 5 [77 L.Ed.2nd at p. 128].), the intended recipient retains possessory and privacy rights in the package's contents. (Walter v. United States (1980) 447 U.S. 649, 654 [100 S.Ct. 2395; 65 L.Ed.2nd 410. 416]; United States v. Gill (9th Cir. 2002) 280 F.3rd 923, 929.) However, the recipient of a mailed package has only a reasonable expectation that delivery will not be delayed. So long as the package is delivered on time, the Fourth Amendment is not implicated merely by a temporary diversion of that package. (United States v. Demoss (8th Cir. 2002) 279 F.3rd 632, 639; United States v. England (9th Cir. 1992) 971 F.2nd 419, 420-421.)

An addressee has both a possessory and a privacy interest in a mailed package. (United States v. Hernandez, supra, at p. 1209; United States v. Hoang (9th Cir. 2007) 486 F.3rd 1156, 1159; United States v. Jefferson (9th Cir. 2009) 566 F.3rd 928, 933-935.)

The "possessory interest" in a mailed package, however, is "solely in the package's timely delivery. (United States v. Hoang, supra, at p. 1160, citing United States v. England, supra, at pp. 420-421; United States v. Jefferson, supra.)

Case Law:

A postal inspector in Alaska had sufficient reasonable suspicion to detain defendant's package when he was told that defendant was behaving suspiciously by asking about Postal Service drug detection practices, and the package listed a fictitious sender and addressee and an incomplete California return address, was shipped with delivery confirmation service, had a handwritten label, and was heavily taped. Marijuana and excessive money had also been found in defendant's home some months earlier. The court was satisfied that the length of detention between initial seizure and the development of probable cause, 22 hours, was not unreasonable, particularly given the difficulty of travel in Alaska with a drug-sniffing dog. (United States v. Lozano (9th Cir. 2010) 623 F.3rd 1055.)

Seizing defendant's luggage from a common area on an Amtrak train during a drug-interdiction investigation, without any suspicion to believe that it contained contraband other than the fact that it was without tags, and then wheeling it down the aisle while asking who it belonged to and inspecting the contents after no one claimed ownership, was an illegal seizure and search, and a Fourth Amendment violation. (United States v. Hill (10th Cir. 2015) 805 F.3rd 935.)

How long a container may be detained (i.e., a "reasonable time") depends upon the circumstances. (United States v. Van Leeuwen (1970) 397 U.S. 249, 252 [90 S.Ct. 1029; 25 L.Ed.2nd 282, 285]; 29 hours okay.)

United States v. Hernandez (9th Cir. 2002) 313 F.3rd 1206; twenty-two hours held to be justifiable.

United States v. Dass (9th Cir. 1988) 849 F.2nd 414; packages held from seven to twenty-three days found to be excessive.

United States v. Mitchell (11th Cir. 2009) 565 F.3rd 1347; holding onto the hard drive from defendant's computer for 21 days before a warrant was obtained was an unreasonable retention of the defendant's property, violating the Fourth Amendment.

United States v. Aldaz (9th Cir. 1990) 921 F.2nd 227; three to five day detention found to be reasonable under the circumstances.

United States v. Gill (9th Cir. 2002) 280 F.3rd 923, 926-929; six-day delay, over a weekend, okay.

United States v. Lozano (9th Cir. 2010) 623 F.3rd 1055; 22 hours, particularly given the difficulty of travel in Alaska with a drug-sniffing dog, was held to be lawful.

United States v. Mayomi (7th Cir. 1989) 873 F.2nd 1049, 1053-1054: A two-day detention of two letters was acceptable because it was supported by probable cause.

United States v. Sullivan (9th Cir. 2015) 797 F.3rd 623, 633; 21 days between the seizure of the defendant's laptop computer and the obtaining of a search warrant held to be reasonable in that defendant was in custody for that time period and would not have been able to use his laptop anyway. Also, defendant was a parolee subject to search and seizure conditions, and then, 17 days into the detention of his laptop, he gave his consent to search it, all of which lessened his privacy interests.

See also United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2017) 875 F.3rd 1265, 1276; finding a 3-day delay to be reasonable, as well as a one-year delay in obtaining a search warrant for a more thorough forensic search of defendant's cellphone.

People v. Tran (2019) 42 Cal.App.5th 1, 13-14; Three days upheld as reasonable, comparing it with the 90-minutes defendant's luggage was detained at an airport as described in United States v. Place (1983) 462 U.S. 696 [103 S.Ct. 2637; 77 L.Ed.2nd 110], noting "(t)hat seizure did not disrupt Tran's travel plans because a dashboard camera clearly is not as integral to the necessities of travel as luggage containing clothes, toiletries, and other travel essentials."

A ten-minute delay does not significantly interfere with the timely delivery of a package in the normal course of business, and therefore does not even need a reasonable suspicion to justify. The package would have been delivered at the same time even without this delay. (United States v. Hoang (9th Cir. 2007) 486 F.3rd 1156.)

But see United States v. Place (1983) 462 U.S. 696 [103 S.Ct. 2637; 77 L.Ed.2nd 110]: The detention of a suspect's luggage at an airport for exposure to a trained narcotics dog was held to exceed the bounds of a permissible investigative detention and was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The evidence obtained from the subsequent search of the luggage was held to be inadmissible where the luggage was detained for 90 minutes and where the officers failed to accurately inform the suspect of the place to which they were transporting his luggage, the length of time he might be dispossessed, and what arrangements would be made for the return of the luggage if the investigation dispelled the suspicion.

> A key factor in Place was that the containers (the defendant's suitcases) were seized from his person as opposed to the mail.

Detention of a package mailed via the United States postal service during that time period up to when delivery has been guaranteed is reasonable and therefore lawful despite the lack of any suspicion to believe it contains contraband. (United States v. Jefferson (9th Cir. 2009) 566 F.3rd 928, 933-935; during which time a narcotics-sniffing dog was used to alert on the package and a search warrant was obtained.)

> Holding onto the package beyond this time period, to be lawful, requires an "articulable (reasonable) suspicion that the package contains contraband or evidence of illegal activity." (Id., at p. 935.)

A narcotics investigator with the United States Postal Service, rerouting a package suspected of containing a controlled substance back from Louisiana (to where it had been mailed) to Texas (where it had been mailed from) so that a drug-sniffing dog could be used and (upon a positive hit by the dog) a warrant obtained, was found not to cause an unreasonable delay despite the fact that it took five days for the package to get back to Texas. In determining whether the detention of a package was unconstitutionally long, the relevant factors to consider include: 1) investigatory diligence; 2) the length of the detention; and 3) whether there were circumstances beyond the investigator's control. Under the circumstances of this case, where conducting the investigation in Louisiana would have been more complicated and would have taken about the same amount of time and the investigator acted diligently in retrieving the package from Texas and obtaining a search warrant, the Court held that the extended detention of the package (about seven days in total) was not unreasonable. (United States v. Beard (5th Cir. 2021) 16 F.4th 1115.)

Detaining two packages mailed by defendant for sixteen days was upheld where the delay was attributable to the inspector's workload, an intervening weekend, and the illness of the inspector. (United States v. Martinez (5th Cir. 2022) 25 F.4th 303.)

Chapter 17*:

Seizures and Searches of High Tech Devices*:

Issue: The legality of seizing and searching, thus retrieving information from cellphones, computer disks, thumb drives, computers, and other such high tech "containers" of information, seized from suspects or found during the search of a residence, etc., when done without a search warrant, is an issue.

Originally, it was assumed that the general law on "containers" would be applicable, and that, as a general rule, a search warrant would be required. (See Smith v. Ohio (1990) 494 U.S. 541, 542 [110 S.Ct. 1288; 108 L.Ed.2nd 464].)

Recent Trend:

See People v. Michael E. (2014) 230 Cal.App.4th 261, 276-279, where the Court included a whole segment criticizing the current trend of referring to computers and cellphones as "containers of information," predicting the coming of a whole new body of law dealing with electronic devices. "'Since electronic storage is likely to contain a greater quantity and variety of information than any previous storage method, . . . '[r]elying on analogies to closed containers or file cabinets may lead courts to "oversimplify a complex area of Fourth Amendment doctrines and ignore the realities of massive modern computer storage."' [Citation.]" (Id., at pp. 276-279; citing United States v. Carey (10th Cir. 1999) 172 F.3rd 1268, 1275.)

Note: Interestingly enough, however, most of the authority the Michael Court cites here are container-search cases.

Current Rules:

The U.S. Supreme Court finally recognized that cellphones are entitled to enhanced Fourth Amendment protections from other "containers," and found that the search of a cellphone found on a person upon his arrest is unlawful absent the obtaining of a search warrant. (Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430].)

See Id., pages 393 to 397, for a detailed description of the capabilities of the modern-day "smart phone," adding to the privacy interests in such devices that outweigh the governmental interest in conducting warrantless searches upon the owner.

See United States v. Cano (9th Cir. 2019) 934 F.3rd 1002, 1011-1012, for a review of the Supreme Court's thinking behind the Riley decision.

Other courts are now following suit: (See United States v. Camou (9th Cir. 2014) 773 F.3rd 932, 941-943; holding that cellphones are not containers for purposes of the vehicle exception to the search warrant requirement.

See also United States v. Lara (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 605, 610-611; declining to include defendant's cellphone under the category of a "container," in defendant's Fourth waiver search conditions.

However, a search of a cellphone "incident to arrest" (as opposed to a Fourth waiver search, as occurred in Lara, supra.) was clearly lawful prior to Riley, and therefore, the officer's "good faith" reliance upon that pre-Riley binding precedent will save a warrantless search of defendant's cellphones found on his person when he was arrested. (United States v. Lustig (9th Cir. 2016) 830 F.3rd 1075, 1977-1085.)

> The Lustig Court also upheld the more thorough search of the same cellphones four days later in that they were in continuous police custody during that time. (Id., at p. 1085; see United States v. Burnette (9th Cir. 1983) 698 F.2nd 1038, 1049; upholding a later search when the object searched has remained in continuous police custody after being lawfully searched once.)

Defendant's cellphone, dropped by the fleeing defendant at the scene of his attempted arrest, "definitely required a warrant" in order to do a forensic search of the cellphone. (United States v. Artis (9th Cir. 2019) 919 F.3rd 1123, 1128.)

On appeal from the denial of defendant's motion to suppress evidence found during a search of his cellphone, seized from his rental car after a high-speed chase, the court did not need to address whether defendant had standing to challenge the search because Fourth Amendment standing is not jurisdictional and hence need not be addressed before addressing other aspects of the merits of a Fourth Amendment claim. Defendant's cellphone was lawfully seized as part of a valid inventory search because there was no showing that the search was merely used to rummage for evidence. The failure to list the phone on an inventory sheet did not invalidate the search. Probable cause thereafter supported the warrants issued to search the phone because the affiants are allowed to state conclusions based on training and experience without having to detail that experience. There was a sufficient factual basis for both magistrate judges to independently conclude that evidence might be found on the phone. (United States v. Garay (9th Cir. 2019) 938 F.3rd 1108.)

However, while a search of one's cellphone is likely to require a search warrant, seizure of that cellphone found in plain sight (e.g.., on the center console of defendant's vehicle, left at the scene of a shooting, and where there was probable cause to believe the vehicle was associated with that shooting) was held to be lawful. (People v. Tousant (2021) 64 Cal.App.5th 804, 815-817.)

Opening the cellphone before obtaining a search warrant, looking through the settings folder and viewing a few photos, obtaining the telephone number and viewing a photograph of his driver's license, was held to be unlawful (requiring that this information be excised from the warrant affidavit, noting that the U.S. Supreme Court in Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373, at p. 399 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430], held that "officers may not engage in a warrantless search of 'those areas of the phone where an officer reasonably believes that information relevant to . . . the arrestee's identity' may be discovered." However, after deleting that information, the remaining warrant affidavit still provided sufficient probable cause to support the warrant's issuance. (Id., at p. 818.)

Arguable Continued Exceptions to the Search Warrant Requirement: Arguably, exceptions to the search warrant requirement for high tech devices may still be found when the device is:

- Property seized from the suspect's person incident to his arrest (Carroll v. United States (1925) 267 U.S. 132 [45 S.Ct. 280; 69 L.Ed. 543].)

  This exception, however, has been held specifically not to apply to cellphones in that cellphones do not pose a danger to officers and once seized, it is unlikely any evidence contained in the phone is going to be destroyed. When balanced with the large amount of personal information likely to be found in cellphones, a warrantless intrusion into the phone is not justified under the Fourth Amendment absent exigent circumstances. (Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430]; People v. Macabeo (2016) 1 Cal.5th 1206, 1212-1226.)

- In a vehicle for which there is already probable cause to search. (California v. Acevedo (1991) 500 U.S. 565, 580 [111 S.Ct. 1982; 114 L.Ed.2nd 619].)

- In the person's possession when that person is booked into jail. (People v. Rogers (1966) 241 Cal.App.2nd 384, 389.)

  But see United States v. Camou (9th Cir. 2014) 773 F.3rd 932, 941-943; extending the prohibitions on warrantless cellphone searches when the cellphone is seized incident to arrest, under Riley v. California, supra, to those seized in a vehicle with probable cause.

  There may be circumstances, however, where a person loses any expectation of privacy to the contents of his cellphone, such as when he is a resident of a correctional program's residential reentry facility and he has been warned both that cellphones are prohibited and that any such cellphones found at the facility are subject to search. (See United States v. Jackson (8th Cir. Iowa 2017) 866 F.3rd 982.)

- When the container is seized under authorization of a search warrant and to inspect its contents, using "technological aids," requires further expert assistance. E.g., seizing an undeveloped roll of film, as authorized by a warrant, does not require a second warrant to develop that film. (See People v. Superior Court* [Nasmeh] (2007) 151 Cal.App.4th 85, 98, fn. 4; citing out-of-state authority for this theory; State v. Petrone (Wis. 1991) 161 Wis.2nd 530.)

  See also People v. Rangel (2012) 206 Cal.App.4th 1310, 1317; where it was held that a cellphone having been lawfully seized pursuant to the warrant, a second warrant authoring the detective to search the cellphone is unnecessary. "(A) second warrant to search a properly seized computer (or cellphone, in this case) is not necessary where the evidence obtained in the search did not exceed the probable cause articulated in the original warrant."

  Property in the possession or under the control of a subject who is booked into custody is subject to search: "Once articles have lawfully fallen into the hands of the police they may examine them to see if they have been stolen, test them to see if they have been used in the commission of a crime, return them to the prisoner on his release, or preserve them for use as evidence at the time of trial. (People v. Robertson 240 Cal.App.2nd 99, 105-106 . . . .) During their period of police custody an arrested person's personal effects, like his person itself, are subject to reasonable inspection, examination, and test. (People v. Chaigles (1923) 237 N.Y. 193 [142 N.E. 583, 32 A.L.R. 676], Cardozo, J.)" (People v. Rogers (1966) 241 Cal.App.2nd 384, 389.)

  See also United States v. Giberson (9th Cir. 2008) 527 F.3rd 882, where it was held that some circumstances might lead searching officers to a reasonable conclusion that documentary evidence they are seeking would be contained in computers found at the location, authorizing the search of those containers despite the failure of the warrant to list computers as things that may be searched.

    Note: It was recommended, however, that the computer merely be seized and a second warrant be obtained authorizing its search, eliminating the issue.

  But see United States v. Payton (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 859, 861-864, where it was held that failure to include the magistrate's authorization to search defendant's computer, even though in the statement of probable cause the affiant indicated a desire to search any possible computers found in defendant's house, was a fatal omission. Searching defendant's computer, therefore, went beyond the scope of the warrant's authorization.

- With Exigent Circumstances:

  The search of the defendant/minor's cellphone was reasonable at its inception for purposes of the Fourth Amendment because a loaded firearm and its magazine cartridge had been seized from a trashcan earlier, the defendant had lingered outside the principal's office where the student (a known friend of defendant's) suspected of possessing the firearm was being detained, and where the defendant was questioned after trying to get away. While being questioned, the defendant physically resisted while fingering his cellphone in his pocket. A warrant was not necessary before school officials searched the data on the phone because school officials needed only a reasonable suspicion to conduct a warrantless search, and were confronted by a situation in which a loaded firearm had been discovered on school property and they were reasonably concerned that the defendant might be using his phone to communicate with other students who might possess another firearm or weapon that the officials did not yet know about. (In re Rafael* C. (2016) 245 Cal.App.4th 1288.)

- The Person is Without Standing:

  A suspect's "standing" should also be considered; i.e., is it a device in which the suspect has a reasonable expectation of privacy? (United States v. Caymen (9th Cir. 2005) 404 F.3rd 1196; People v. Daggs (2005) 133 Cal.App.4th 361; cellphone abandoned at the scene of the crime deprives the defendant of standing to contest its search.)

- The Person is Subject to a Fourth Waiver Search & Seizure Condition:

  The warrantless search of a parolee's cellphone is lawful. (United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2017) 875 F.3rd 1265, 1273-1276; United States v. Wood (7th Cir. IL 2021) 16 F.4th 529.)

  Whether or not a Fourth waiver probationer's cellphone is subject to warrantless search is the subject of some debate:

  > United States v. Lara (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 605, 609-612: "No," at least where defendant's conditions of probation allow for a warrantless search of the probationer's "containers" or "property," only, without specifically mentioning cellphones.
  >
  > People v. Sandee (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 294, 302-304: "Yes."

  See "Fourth Waiver Searches*" (Chapter 19), below.

- Border Searches:

  Border agents seized defendant's laptop at the U.S.-Mexico border in response to a Treasury Enforcement Communication System (TECS) alert that was based in part on defendant's previous conviction for child molestation. The initial search at the border turned up no incriminating material. Only after defendant's laptop was shipped almost 170 miles away and subjected to a comprehensive forensic examination were images of child pornography discovered. The court held that the forensic examination of defendant's laptop required a showing of reasonable suspicion under the Fourth Amendment. The court ruled that defendant's TECS alert, prior child-related conviction, frequent travels, crossing from a country known for sex tourism, and collection of electronic equipment, plus the parameters of the Operation Angel Watch program, taken collectively, gave rise to reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. When combined with the other circumstances, the fact that an agent encountered at least one password protected file on the laptop contributed to the basis for a reasonable suspicion to conduct a forensic examination. An alert regarding possession of child pornography justified obtaining additional resources to properly determine whether illegal files were present. (United States v. Cotterman (9th Cir. 2013) 709 F.3rd 952, 962-970.)

  When the person's cellphone is searched at the border after drugs are found in her suitcase: In discussing the applicability of Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430], when a cellphone is searched as a part of a border search, the court declined to adopt a general rule concerning how the government's border search authority applies to modern technology, such as cellphones or other electronic devices. Second, the officers lawfully scanned and searched defendant's suitcase, in which the methamphetamine was discovered, during a lawful border search. Third, the agents reasonably relied in good faith on this broad border-search authority to search the apps on defendant's cellphone. Fourth, while the Supreme Court in Riley v. California held that the traditional search-incident-to-arrest rationale did not apply to cellphones generally, the Court left open the possibility that "other case-specific exceptions may still justify a warrantless search of a particular phone." Consequently, in this case, the court found that "it was reasonable for the agents to continue to rely on the robust body of pre-Riley case law that allowed warrantless searches of computers and cellphones." Fifth, the court recognized that no post-Riley decision issued before or after the search in this case has required a warrant for a border search of an electronic device. Finally, only two of the many federal cases addressing border searches of electronic devices have ever required any level of suspicion. In those cases, the court noted that they both required only reasonable suspicion and that was for more intrusive forensic searches. (United States v. Molina-Isidoro (5th Cir. TX 2018) 884 F.3rd 287.)

See also United States v. Vergara (11th Cir. 2018) 884 F.3rd 1309; where it was held that the warrantless forensic searches of defendant's cellphones as a part of a border search required neither a warrant nor probable cause and the Riley decision did not change this rule. At most, a "reasonable suspicion" is all that is needed.

A forensic warrantless search of defendant's cellphone by United States Customs and Border Protection (CBP) officers after defendant's detention at the Washington Dulles International Airport as he attempted to board a flight to Turkey, was categorized by the Court as a "non-routine" search, and was upheld as a part of a border search. First, the border search exception applied even though the forensic search of defendant's phone occurred at an off-site location over an extended period of time. Second, the court added that defendant's arrest did not transform the examination of his phone under the border search exception into a search incident to arrest, which would have required a warrant under Riley v. California. Finally, the court held that the forensic search of defendant's phone was justified because the officers had reason to believe he was attempting to export firearms illegally. The court recognized that this type of transnational offense goes to the heart of the border search exception, which is justified, in part, by the government's interest in "protecting and monitoring exports from the country." Lastly, the Court rejected defendant's argument that the privacy interest in smartphone data is so great that even under the border exception, a forensic examination of a phone is a non-routine search that requires a warrant based on probable cause. (United States v. Kolsuz (4th Cir. VA 2018) 890 F.3rd 133.)

> The Court declined to find whether only a reasonable suspicion was required, ruling only that "it was reasonable for the officers who conducted the forensic search of (defendant's) phone to rely on the established and uniform body of precedent allowing warrantless border searches of digital devices that are based on at least reasonable suspicion." (Ibid.)
> The fact that the officers transported defendant's cellphone four miles from the location of the detention to where it was forensically examined was held to be irrelevant. (Ibid.)

When the government establishes reasonable suspicion that an individual is involved in criminal activity, the Fourth Amendment permits a warrantless border search of that individual's personal electronic devices, such as a laptop computer and a cellphone. (United States v. Williams

(10th Cir. 2019) 942 F.3rd 1187; the Court declining to rule whether even a reasonable suspicion was necessary.)

The Ninth Circuit held that a forensic search of defendant's cellphone at the Mexico/U.S. border was invalid under the border search exception to Fourth Amendment because forensic cellphone searches require a reasonable suspicion, meaning that officials must reasonably suspect that the cellphone contained digital contraband. While "manual cell phone searches may be conducted by border officials without reasonable suspicion . . . forensic cell phone searches require reasonable suspicion." Per the Court, border searches of a cellphone are limited to looking for such "digital contraband," at least absent a reasonable suspicion to believe the phone contains evidence of the offense for which defendant was arrested. Without such a suspicion, when the subject has been arrested for smuggling drugs, the border search exception does not justify an agent's recording of the phone numbers and text messages for further processing, nor a subsequent forensic search, because doing so has no connection to ensuring that the phone lacked "digital contraband" (i.e., child pornography.) Here, there was no evidence supporting a reasonable suspicion to believe that defendant's phone contained evidence related to other types of illegal activity, such as smuggling cocaine. (United States v. Cano (9th Cir. 2019) 934 F.3rd 1002, 1010-1021: "(W)e hold that manual searches of cell phones at the border are reasonable without individualized suspicion, whereas the (more intrusive) forensic examination of a cell phone requires a showing of reasonable suspicion." Id., at p. 1016.)

> Note: Subsequently, the Ninth Circuit has denied a petition for rehearing en banc (Sept. 2, 2020) 973 F.3rd 966) where a six-judge dissent argued that the original Cano decision is just dead wrong. In the Cano decision, it was held that a "forensic border search" of a cellphone is limited to those instances where there is a reasonable suspicion to believe that the suspect's phone contained "digital contraband." The term "forensic" is never defined, but is defined in the dictionary as "relating to or denoting the application of scientific methods and techniques to the investigation of crime." "Digital contraband," in turn, is defined by the Cano Court as being limited to stuff like child pornography. Searching for evidence of defendant's offense (i.e., smuggling cocaine) requires probable cause and a search warrant, says the Cano Court, despite piles of contrary case law to the effect that non-forensic border searches do not require any level of suspicion, and certainly not a search warrant. (E.g., see United States v. Montoya de Hernandez (1985) 473 U.S. 531; and United States v. Flores-Montano (2004) 541 U.S. 149.) As pointed out in the en banc denial dissent, the more intrusive forensic search of one's electronic equipment (e.g., computers [see United States v. Cotterman (9th Cir. 2013) 709 F.3rd at 970.] and cellphones) do in fact require a reasonable suspicion, but a warrant has never been held to be necessary, let alone probable cause. And neither suspicionless nor warrantless forensic border searches have ever been held to be limited to child pornography. The dissent here also points out that at least two other Circuits disagree with Cano: United States v. Kolsuz (4th Cir. 2018) 890 F.3rd 133, and United States v. Williams (10th Cir. 2019) 942 F.3rd 1187. This makes the Cano decision ripe for review by the U.S. Supreme Court.

See "Cellphone Searches," under "Border Searches" (Chapter 18), below.

Additional Case Law:

Proof that defendant had been receiving child pornography on his computer from two traffickers in such material, despite the lack of any evidence that the defendant himself solicited such material, was held to be sufficient probable cause to justify a finding that defendant knowingly, and illegally, possessed such material, justifying the issuance of a search warrant for defendant's residence and his computer. (United States v. Kelley (9th Cir. 2007) 482 F.3rd 1047.)

The same rule is applicable a "mirror port," which is similar to a pen register, but which allows the government to collect the "to" and "from" addresses of a person's e-mail messages, the IP addresses of the websites the person visits, and notes the total volume of information sent to or from the person's account. (United States v. Forrester (9th Cir. 2008) 512 F.3rd 500.)

A search warrant authorizing the search for specific documents, during which a computer was found under circumstances where it was reasonable to believe that the computer was a container of those documents, allowed for the seizure of (and probably search of) the computer, even though the computer was not specifically listed in the warrant. Also, a computer is not entitled to a heightened level of proof. (United States v. Giberson (9th Cir. 2008) 527 F.3rd 886-889.)

Downloading and installing onto one's computer "LimeWire," a file-sharing program which allows users to search for and share with one another various types of files, compromises a participant's expectation of privacy in the contents of the affected files, thus allowing for a warrantless search of those files via LimeWire by law enforcement. (United States v. Ganoe (9th Cir. 2008) 538 F.3rd 1117.)

It is irrelevant that the defendant attempted unsuccessfully to install a program included with LimeWire that if installed properly, prevents others from accessing his files. It is also irrelevant that the investigator discovered defendant's child pornography through the use of a program unavailable to the general public.

Neither circumstance means that defendant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in his files when he used a file-sharing program such as LimeWire. (United States v. Borowy (9th Cir. 2010) 595 F.3rd 1045, 1048.)

> The Court in Borowy further held that the investigator had probable cause to open up his files based upon discovering files with names that were explicitly suggestive of child pornography and that they were discovered using a search term known to be associated with child pornography, resulting with two such files being "red-flagged" by the program, indicating that they contained child pornography. (Id., at p. 1049.)

A properly qualified expert officer's opinion, connecting common characteristics of a child molester with known facts related to a child molest and the molester's act of hiding his computer, establishes probable cause supporting a search warrant for that computer. (People v. Nicholls (2008) 159 Cal.App.4th 703.)

Customs Officers at an international border, or the "functional equivalent" of a border (e.g., an international airport) may search a person's computer without any reasonable suspicion. (United States v. Arnold (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1003.)

> The Court further held that a high-tech container, such as a computer, does not require a higher standard of probable cause for a warrant application, even when "expressive (i.e., First Amendment) material" is involved. (Id., at p. 1010.)
>
> California is in accord with Arnold, holding that, "(a) computer is entitled to no more protection than any other container." (People v. Endacott (2008) 164 Cal.App.4th 1346; suspicionless search of defendant's laptop computers upon his arrival at Los Angeles International Airport from Thailand upheld.)
>
> Note: Arnold and Endacott are questionable authority on this issue in light of subsequent cases talking about all the personal information that is available on one's computer. (E.g., see People v. Michael E. (2014) 230 Cal.App.4th 261, 276-279, above.)
> > Endacott further held that the fact that the computer is further searched at some time after the initial border crossing is irrelevant. The right to do a warrantless, suspicionless search continues indefinitely. (Id., at p. 1350.)

The seizure of defendant's computer and all computer related items (e.g., compact disks, floppy disks, hard drives, memory cards, DVDs, videotapes, and other portable digital devices), based upon no more than the discovery of one printed-out photo of child pornography, was lawful in that it was reasonable to conclude that the picture had come from his computer and that similar pictures were likely to be stored in it. (United States v. Brobst (9th Cir. 2009) 558 F.3rd 982, 994.)

Failure to include the magistrate's authorization to search defendant's computer, even though in the statement of probable cause the affiant indicated a desire to search any possible computers found in defendant's house, was a fatal omission. Searching defendant's computer, therefore, went beyond the scope of the warrant's authorization. (United States v. Payton (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 859, 861-864.)

> The fact that the issuing magistrate testified to an intent to allow for the search of defendant's computers, and that the warrant included authorization to search for certain listed records which might be found in a computer, was held to be irrelevant. (Id. at pp. 862-863.)
> But see United States v. Giberson (9th Cir. 2008) 527 F.3rd 882, where it was held that some circumstances might lead searching officers to a reasonable conclusion that documentary evidence they are seeking would be contained in computers found at the location, authorizing the search of those containers despite the failure of the warrant to list computers as things that may be searched. It was recommended, however, that the computer be seized and a second warrant be obtained.

A city did not violate an employee's (a police officer) Fourth Amendment rights and right to privacy under the Federal Stored Communications Act (18 U.S.C. §§ 2701 et seq.) by obtaining and reviewing transcripts of the employee's text messages sent via a city pager where there were reasonable grounds for suspecting that the search was necessary for a non-investigatory work-related purpose because the search was done in order to determine whether the character limit on the city's contract was sufficient to meet the city's needs. Also, the city and a police department had a legitimate interest in ensuring that employees were not being forced to pay out of their own pockets for work-related expenses, or on the other hand, that the city was not paying for extensive personal communications. The search was permissible in its scope because reviewing the transcripts was reasonable because it was an efficient and expedient way to determine whether the employee's overages were the result of work-related messaging or personal use. (Ontario v. Quan (2010) 560 U.S.746 [130 S.Ct. 2619; 177 L.Ed.2nd 216].)

> Declining to rule on the application of an employee's privacy rights in the workplace, as they relate to the use of high-tech devices, the Court assumed for the sake of argument, without deciding, that the plaintiff/respondent had a right to privacy in the contents of text messages made via an employer-issued pager. However, the "special needs" of the workplace allow for this intrusion into plaintiff/respondent's privacy rights when conducted for a "noninvestigatory, work-related purpose." (Id., 130

S.Ct. at pp. 2629-2630]; i.e., to determine whether the allotted number of messages was insufficient, requiring employees to pay for office-related messages, or whether employees were using the pagers for non-work related purposes.)

See also "The Federal Electronic Communications Privacy Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 2701 et seq." under "P.C. § 1524.2(b): Records of Foreign Corporations Providing Electronic Communications or Remote Computing Services," under "Searches With a Search Warrant" (Chapter 10), above.

A single photograph of a nude minor (female child who is between 8 and 10 years old), by itself, is insufficient to establish probably cause for a search warrant. But a second such photo, under the "totality of the circumstances," is enough. (United States v. Battershell (9th Cir. 2006) 457 F.3rd 1048.)

However, a single photograph of a nude minor (female of about 15 to 17 years of age), when combined with other suspicious circumstances (e.g., 15 computers in house found in complete disarray, with two minors not belonging to the defendant, where the defendant a civilian, is staying in military housing), may be enough to justify the issuance of a search warrant. (United States v. Krupa (9th Cir. 2011) 658 F.3rd 1174, 1177-1179; but see dissent, pp. 1180-1185.)

The fact that the defendant may not have owned the computers that the affiant was asking to search at the time of the crime (a homicide) did not preclude the possibility that she had transferred information or records—particularly photographs—to computers owned at the time of the search. (People v. Lazarus (2015) 238 Cal.App.4th 734, 767; noting that personal computers often hold "diaries, calendars, files, and correspondence.")

Allowing another person unrestricted access to a mutually owned computer negates any expectation of privacy the first person might have had. A co-owner has actual authority to give consent to the police to search. And if it turns out that the person is not actually a co-owner, the doctrine of apparent authority may justify the search. (United States v. Stanley (9th Cir. 2011) 653 F.3rd 946, 950-952.)

The standard to be applied when evaluating the legality of the length of time a suspect is deprived of his property pending a search is one of "reasonableness," taking into account the "totality of the circumstances," and not necessarily requiring that the Government pursue the least intrusive course of action. Determining reasonableness requires a "balancing test," balancing "the nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against the importance of the governmental interests alleged to justify the intrusion." (Citations omitted; United States v. Sullivan (9th Cir. 2015) 797 F.3rd 623, 633; finding 21 days to be reasonable during which time the defendant's laptop was in law enforcement custody, in that defendant was in custody at the time so he couldn't use it anyway, was subject to a Fourth waiver, gave consent, and where the computer had to be transferred to a different agency to conduct the necessary forensic search.)

> See also United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2017) 875 F.3rd 1265, 1276; finding a 3-day delay to be reasonable, as well as a one-year delay in obtaining a search warrant for a more thorough forensic search of defendant's cellphone.
> Fifteen-day delay between the seizure of defendant's cellphone and the eventual obtaining of a search warrant to search it was not unreasonable. (People v. Tousant (2021) 64 Cal.App.5th 804, 816-817.)

A search warrant, supported by probable cause, authorized the police to search defendant's house and seize gang indicia of any sort. Such indicia could logically be found in defendant's cellphone, which had the capacity to store people's names, telephone numbers and other contact information, as well as music, photographs, artwork, and communications in the form of emails and messages. Defendant's phone was the likely container of many items that were the functional equivalent of those specifically listed in the warrant. The text messages seized during the search of defendant's phone were related to a gang-related assault that he was suspected of committing, and their suppression was thus not required under the exclusionary rule. (People v. Rangel (2012) 206 Cal.App.4th 1310, 1315-1317.)

The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeal has found that tracking a user's cellphone location without a warrant using GPS technology (by "pinging" it from various cell towers) is different than putting a GPS tracking device on a motorist's vehicle without a warrant. The Court upheld the drug conviction of a man found with his son near a Texas rest stop with over 1,000 pounds of marijuana in their motor home. Because he had no reasonable expectation of privacy concerning the location of his cellphone, the court ruled, there was no Fourth Amendment violation. (United States v. Skinner (6th Cir. 2012) 690 F.3rd 772, 777-781.)

Sending a message to defendant's seized, yet open, cellphone (done for the purpose of showing the arrested defendant that the officers had evidence that he had been communicating with a person he believed to be underage) was held not to be a search, and therefore not prohibited by Riley. (United States v. Brixen (7th Cir. WI 2018) 908 F.3rd 276.)

Federal agents opened an investigation into the transmission of child pornography via the smartphone messaging application "Kik." Upon determining that someone with the e-mail address of "Rustyhood" was accepting and passing child pornography, a federal agent issued an Emergency Disclosure Request (EDR) pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 2702 (the Stored Communications Act) to Kik requesting subscriber information and recent internet protocol (IP) addresses associated with the "rustyhood" account. The information received in response led to defendant. Defendant argued that the IP address data that the government acquired from Kik without a search warrant was not materially different from the cell site location information (CSLI) that was at issue in Carpenter v. United States (June 22, 2018) 585 U.S. __ [138 S.Ct. 2206; 201 L.Ed.2nd 507]. The federal First Circuit Court of Appeal disagreed. First, the court noted that an Internet user generates the IP address data that the government acquired from Kik in this case only by making the affirmative decision to access a website or application. By contrast, the CSLI acquired by the government in Carpenter in many instances was generated even when the cell phone remained untouched in the suspect's pocket, as it still continued to monitor that person's movements throughout the day. Second, the court recognized that the IP address data that the government acquired from Kik did not convey any location information, a key distinction from the CSLI at issue in Carpenter. Consequently, the court concluded that defendant did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the information the government acquired from Kik without a warrant. (United States v. Hood (1st Cir. ME 2019) 920 F.3rd 87.)

In a case where a Minneapolis police officer used a program called "RoundUp eMule" to search for users on a peer-to-peer network who were sharing child pornography, the officer downloaded part of a file—a video that played for twenty to thirty seconds—from an IP address in or around St. Paul, Minnesota. Using the file's hash value, the officer was able to obtain the complete file and determined that it contained child pornography. After subpoenaing the relevant internet service provider, the officer learned that defendant, a sex registrant, was the person associated with the IP address. Further, a search of the Child Protection System database, which is a database that "compiles hash values of previously identified child pornography and documents hits that have occurred for certain IP addresses," revealed that defendant had advertised 92 known or suspected child pornography files near the time the officer here was investigating him. These 92 files were uncovered by programs similar to RoundUp eMule known as "G2Scanner and Nordic Mule." Based on this information, a Minnesota state court issued a search warrant for defendant's home where officers found additional digital files containing child pornography. Charged with possession of child pornography, defendant filed a motion to suppress the evidence seized during the search. The district court denied defendant's motion and upon conviction he appealed. The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeal affirmed, noting that it has been "held numerous times that a defendant has no objectively reasonable expectation of privacy in files he shares over a public peer-to-peer network, including those shared anonymously with law enforcement officers." The Court also rejected defendant's concerns about the government's "dragnet surveillance" through programs like RoundUp eMule and vast databases of known hash values that connect known or suspected child pornography to IP addresses where those files were offered for sharing. The Court noted that these programs and databases contain only information that users of peer-to-peer networks have deliberately chosen not to keep private. Finally, the Court held that the evidence in the record established the programs used by the officer operated reliably and did not access private areas of defendant's computer. (United States v. Shipton (8th Cir. MN 2021) 5 F.4th 933.)

Search of Unauthorized Cellphone Recovered at CDCR:

Pen. Code § 4576: CDCR (California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation) shall not access data or communications that have been captured using available technology from the unauthorized use of a wireless communication device except after obtaining a search warrant.

The California Electronic Communications Privacy Act (or CalECPA): Pen. Code §§ 1546-1546.4: Statutory restrictions on warrantless searches of cellphones and other electronic devices was enacted by the California Legislature, effective on January 1, 2016.

Pen. Code § 1546.1, Compelling Production of Electronic Communication Information, provides:

Subd. (a) Except as provided in this section, a government entity shall not do any of the following:

(1) Compel the production of or access to electronic communication information from a service provider.

(2) Compel the production of or access to electronic device information from any person or entity other than the authorized possessor of the device.

(3) Access electronic device information by means of physical interaction or electronic communication with the electronic device. This section does not prohibit the intended recipient of an electronic communication from voluntarily disclosing electronic communication information concerning that communication to a government entity.

Under this exception, it has been held that a suspect who posts information on social media does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the contents of what is posted, even when the defendant limits access to the posting to his "friends," and where one such "friend" who monitors the defendant's account is an undercover police officer, and thus a "false friend." Defendant risks the possibility that one such "friend" may relay such information to law enforcement or be an undercover police officer. (People v. Pride (2019) 31 Cal.App.5th 133, 141; noting also that subd. (c)(4), below, states that a government entity may access electronic device information by communicating with the device with "the specific consent of the authorized possessor of the device.")

Subd. (b) A government entity may compel the production of or access to electronic communication information from a service provider, or compel the production of or access to electronic device information from any person or entity other than the authorized possessor of the device only under the following circumstances:

(1) Pursuant to a warrant issued pursuant to Pen. Code §§ 1523 et seq., and subject to subd. (d) (see below).

(2) Pursuant to a wiretap order issued pursuant to Pen. Code §§ 629.50 et seq.

(3) Pursuant to an order for electronic reader records issued pursuant to Civil Code § 1798.90.

(4) Pursuant to a subpoena issued pursuant to existing state law, provided that the information is not sought for the purpose of investigating or prosecuting a criminal offense, and compelling the production of or access to the information via the subpoena is not otherwise prohibited by state or federal law. Nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to expand any authority under state law to compel the production of or access to electronic information.

(5) Pursuant to an order for a pen register or trap and trace device, or both, issued pursuant to Pen. Code §§ 630 et seq.

Subd. (c) A government entity may access electronic device information by means of physical interaction or electronic communication with the device only as follows:

(1) Pursuant to a warrant issued pursuant to P.C. §§ 1523 et seq., and subject to subd. (d) (see below).

(2) Pursuant to a wiretap order issued pursuant to Pen. Code §§ 629.50 et seq.

(3) Pursuant to a tracking device search warrant issued pursuant to Pen. Code §§ 1523(a)(12) and 1534(b).

(4) With the specific consent of the authorized possessor of the device.

See People v. Pride, supra, under subd. (a)(3), above.

(5) With the specific consent of the owner of the device, only when the device has been reported as lost or stolen.

(6) If the government entity, in good faith, believes that an emergency involving danger of death or serious physical injury to any person requires access to the electronic device information.

(7) If the government entity, in good faith, believes the device to be lost, stolen, or abandoned, provided that the entity shall only access electronic device information in order to attempt to identify, verify, or contact the owner or authorized possessor of the device.

(8) Except where prohibited by state or federal law, if the device is seized from an inmate's possession or found in an area of a correctional facility under the jurisdiction of the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation where inmates have access and the device is not in the possession of an individual and the device is not known or believed to be the possession of an authorized visitor. Nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to supersede or override Pen. Code § 4576.

Pen. Code § 4576: Search of Unauthorized Cellphones Recovered at CDCR; see above.

(9) Except where prohibited by state or federal law, if the device is seized from an authorized possessor of the device who is serving a term of parole under the supervision of the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation or a term of postrelease community supervision under the supervision of county probation.

(10) Except where prohibited by state or federal law, if the device is seized from an authorized possessor of the device who is subject to an electronic device search as a clear and unambiguous condition of probation, mandatory supervision, or pretrial release.

(11) If the government entity accesses information concerning the location or the telephone number of the electronic device in order to respond to an emergency 911 call from that device.

(12) Pursuant to an order for a pen register or trap and trace device, or both, issued pursuant to Pen. Code §§ 630 et seq.

Subd. (d) Any warrant for electronic information shall comply with the following:

(1) The warrant shall describe with particularity the information to be seized by specifying the time periods covered and, as appropriate and reasonable, the target individuals or accounts, the applications or services covered, and the types of information sought, provided, however, that in the case of a warrant described in subdivision (c)(1), the court may determine that it is not appropriate to specify time periods because of the specific circumstances of the investigation, including, but not limited to, the nature of the device to be searched.

(2) The warrant shall require that any information obtained through the execution of the warrant that is unrelated to the objective of the warrant shall be sealed and shall not be subject to further review, use, or disclosure except pursuant to a court order or to comply with discovery as required by Pen. Code §§ 1054.1 and 1054.7. A court shall issue such an order upon a finding that there is probable cause to believe that the information is relevant to an active investigation, or review, use, or disclosure is required by state or federal law.

(3) The warrant shall comply with all other provisions of California and federal law, including any provisions prohibiting, limiting, or imposing additional requirements on the use of search warrants. If directed to a service provider, the warrant shall be accompanied by an order requiring the service provider to verify the authenticity of electronic information that it produces by providing an affidavit that complies with the requirements set forth in Evid. Code § 1561. Admission of that information into evidence shall be subject to Evid. Code § 1562.

Subd. (e) When issuing any warrant or order for electronic information, or upon the petition from the target or recipient of the warrant or order, a court may, at its discretion, do either or both of the following:

(1) Appoint a special master, as described in Pen. Code § 1524(d), charged with ensuring that only information necessary to achieve the objective of the warrant or order is produced or accessed.

(2) Require that any information obtained through the execution of the warrant or order that is unrelated to the objective of the warrant be destroyed as soon as feasible after the termination of the current investigation and any related investigations or proceedings.

Subd. (f) A service provider may voluntarily disclose electronic communication information or subscriber information when that disclosure is not otherwise prohibited by state or federal law.

Subd. (g) If a government entity receives electronic communication information voluntarily provided pursuant to subdivision (f), it shall destroy that information within 90 days unless one or more of the following circumstances apply:

(1) The entity has or obtains the specific consent of the sender or recipient of the electronic communications about which information was disclosed.

(2) The entity obtains a court order authorizing the retention of the information. A court shall issue a retention order upon a finding that the conditions justifying the initial voluntary disclosure persist, in which case the court shall authorize the retention of the information only for so long as those conditions persist, or there is probable cause to believe that the information constitutes evidence that a crime has been committed.

(3) The entity reasonably believes that the information relates to child pornography and the information is retained as part of a multiagency database used in the investigation of child pornography and related crimes.

(4) The service provider or subscriber is, or discloses the information to, a federal, state, or local prison, jail, or juvenile detention facility, and all participants to the electronic communication were informed, prior to the communication, that the service provider may disclose the information to the government entity.

Subd. (h) If a government entity obtains electronic information pursuant to an emergency involving danger of death or serious physical injury to a person, that requires access to the electronic information without delay, the government entity shall, within three court days after obtaining the electronic information, file with the appropriate court an application for a warrant or order authorizing obtaining the electronic information or a motion seeking approval of the emergency disclosures that shall set forth the facts giving rise to the emergency, and if applicable, a request supported by a sworn affidavit for an order delaying notification under Pen. Code § 1546.2(b)(1). The court shall promptly rule on the application or motion and shall order the immediate destruction of all information obtained, and immediate notification pursuant to Pen. Code § 1546.2(a)(1) if that notice has not already been given, upon a finding that the facts did not give rise to an emergency or upon rejecting the warrant or order application on any other ground. This subdivision does not apply if the government entity obtains information concerning the location or the telephone number of the electronic device in order to respond to an emergency 911 call from that device.

> Subd. (a)(2) of § 1546.2 specifically provides that "(n)otwithstanding paragraph (1), notice is not required if the government entity accesses information concerning the location or the telephone number of an electronic device in order to respond to an emergency 911 call from that device."
> > Defendant's motion to suppress knives seized from his backpack was properly denied where the warrantless pinging of his cell phone to locate him did not violate the Fourth Amendment because it was justified by exigent circumstances. At the time the responding officer requested that defendant's mobile service provider ping his cell phone, the information available to the officer was that less than an hour earlier the victim had been repeatedly stabbed in the neck in an unprovoked attack, all occurring within 200 yards of a preschool and near a shopping center and multiple neighborhoods. Based upon the circumstances known to the officer, he believed it was imperative that the suspect be found as soon as possible to prevent another possible unprovoked attack. (People v. Bowen (2020) 52 Cal.App.5th 130, 136-139.)
> > > The Court noted that whether or not a single ping of a suspect's cellphone is a "search" is still an undecided issue. (Id., at p. 138; declining to decide the issue because exigent circumstances already provided the justification for finding that the Fourth Amendment had not been violated.)

Subd. (i) This section does not limit the authority of a government entity to use an administrative, grand jury, trial, or civil discovery subpoena to do any of the following:

(1) Require an originator, addressee, or intended recipient of an electronic communication to disclose any electronic communication information associated with that communication.

(2) Require an entity that provides electronic communications services to its officers, directors, employees, or agents for the purpose of carrying out their duties, to disclose electronic communication information associated with an electronic communication to or from an officer, director, employee, or agent of the entity.

(3) Require a service provider to provide subscriber information.

Subd. (j) This section does not limit the authority of the Public Utilities Commission or the State Energy Resources Conservation and Development Commission to obtain energy or water supply and consumption information pursuant to the powers granted to them under the Public Utilities Code or the Public Resources Code and other applicable state laws.

Note: In other words, a search warrant is not necessary for the collection of data related to "smart meters."

Subd. (k) This chapter shall not be construed to alter the authority of a government entity that owns an electronic device to compel an employee who is authorized to possess the device to return the device to the government entity's possession.

Pen. Code § 1546 provides the relevant definitions.

Subd. (a) An "adverse result" means any of the following:

(1) Danger to the life or physical safety of an individual.
(2) Flight from prosecution.
(3) Destruction of or tampering with evidence.
(4) Intimidation of potential witnesses.
(5) Serious jeopardy to an investigation or undue delay of a trial.

Subd. (b) "Authorized possessor" means the possessor of an electronic device when that person is the owner of the device or has been authorized to possess the device by the owner of the device.

Subd. (c) "Electronic communication" means the transfer of signs, signals, writings, images, sounds, data, or intelligence of any nature in whole or in part by a wire, radio, electromagnetic, photoelectric, or photo-optical system.

Subd. (d) "Electronic communication information" means any information about an electronic communication or the use of an electronic communication service, including, but not limited to, the contents, sender, recipients, format, or location of the sender or recipients at any point during the communication, the time or date the communication was created, sent, or received, or any information pertaining to any individual or device participating in the communication, including, but not limited to, an IP address. Electronic communication information does not include subscriber information as defined in this chapter.

Subd. (e) "Electronic communication service" means a service that provides to its subscribers or users the ability to send or receive electronic communications, including any service that acts as an intermediary in the transmission of electronic communications, or stores electronic communication information.

Subd. (f) "Electronic device" means a device that stores, generates, or transmits information in electronic form. An electronic device does not include the magnetic strip on a driver's license or an identification card

Subd. (g) "Electronic device information" means any information stored on or generated through the operation of an electronic device, including the current and prior locations of the device.

Subd. (h) "Electronic information" means electronic communication information or electronic device information.

Subd. (i) "Government entity" means a department or agency of the state or a political subdivision thereof, or an individual acting for or on behalf of the state or a political subdivision thereof.

Subd. (j) "Service provider" means a person or entity offering an electronic communication service.

Subd. (k) "Specific consent" means consent provided directly to the government entity seeking information, including, but not limited to, when the government entity is the addressee or intended recipient or a member of the intended audience of an electronic communication. Specific consent does not require that the originator of the communication have actual knowledge that an addressee, intended recipient, or member of the specific audience is a government entity.

> Query: How does this requirement affect a person's pre-search waiver of his Fourth Amendment rights as a condition of probation or parole?

> Subd. (l) "Subscriber information" means the name, street address, telephone number, email address, or similar contact information provided by the subscriber to the provider to establish or maintain an account or communication channel, a subscriber or account number or identifier, the length of service, and the types of services used by a user of or subscriber to a service provider.

Pen. Code § 1546.2 deals with the procedures for obtaining a warrant as a followup to an emergency situation, and is a part of the California Electronic Communications Privacy Act (CalECPA). Pursuant to CalECPA's provisions, within 10 days after use of a tracking device has ended, the officer must notify the person about the nature of the government investigation and provide a copy of the warrant. In addition, the provisions of Pen. Code 1546.2(b) now apply to permit a delay in notification of the target if the court determines that there is reason to believe that notification may have an adverse result.

> Pen. Code § 1546.2(a)(2) provides that "(n)otwithstanding paragraph (1), notice is not required if the government entity accesses information concerning the location or the telephone number of an electronic device in order to respond to an emergency 911 call from that device."

Pen. Code § 1546.4 describes the suppression provisions and other remedies when information is obtained illegally.

> Subd. (a): "Any person in a trial, hearing, or proceeding may move to suppress any electronic information obtained or retained in violation of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution or of this chapter. The motion shall be made, determined, and be subject to review in accordance with the procedures set forth in subdivisions (b) to (q), inclusive, of Section 1538.5." (Italics added)
> Subd. (c): "An individual whose information is targeted by a warrant, order, or other legal process that is inconsistent with this chapter, or the California Constitution or the United States Constitution, or a service provider or any other recipient of the warrant, order, or other legal process may petition the issuing court to void or modify the warrant, order, or process, or to order the destruction of any information obtained in violation of this chapter, or the California Constitution, or the United States Constitution." (Italics added)

> Query: Does this give a defendant vicarious standing to challenge a search or seizure despite not otherwise having his own expectation of privacy violated? E.g., a car thief?

Geofence Warrants: The Courts have uniformly rejected the argument that the CalECPA provisions make illegal geofence warrants:

> People v. Meza (2023) 90 Cal.App.5th 520, 545-546: The Court rejected defendants' arguments to the effect that a geofence warrant violates the CalECPA. Specifically, the Court held that (1) it is not necessary under CalECPA to specifically target specific individuals or accounts. Rather, CalECPA requires only that a warrant must describe with particularity the information to be seized as is "appropriate and reasonable" to the case at issue. (P.C. § 1546.1(d)(1)) The warrant in this case described the target individuals and accounts with the greatest degree of particularity available to investigators; i.e., individuals whose devices were located within the search boundaries at certain times. There is no requirement in the statute that a suspect's name or other identifying information be included in the warrant to ensure its validity. (2) The Court further held that the warrant was not defective merely because it failed to specify the "applications and services covered" by the warrant. (See Pen. Code § 1524.3(b)) In a geofence warrant, the government is not seeking data or content related to a particular application or service. Rather, what is sought is the service provider's (i.e., Google's) record of all electronic contacts with that device, regardless of which applications or services originated the contact. Accordingly, the failure to name a particular application or service in this instance did not result in a violation of CalECPA. (3) Lastly, the Court rejected the defendants' argument to the effect that any constitutional infirmities in the warrant create an independent violation of CalECPA. In so ruling, the Court noted simply that, "(t)here is nothing in the cited language that, without more, converts a Fourth Amendment violation into a statutory violation." (pgs. 545-546.)
> See Price v. Superior Court (2023) 93 Cal.App.5th 13, 51-55:

Additional Case Law:

> No violation of the Fourth Amendment resulted when a gang police detective portrayed himself as a friend to gain access to defendant's social media account and viewed and saved a copy of a video that defendant posted and that was later admitted into evidence, in which defendant wore and discussed a chain resembling one taken in a robbery. Although defendant chose a social media platform where posts disappeared after a period of time, he assumed the risk that the account for one of his "friends" could be an undercover profile for a police detective or that any other "friend" could save and share the information with government officials. California's Electronic Communications Privacy Act (CalECPA) had no application because defendant voluntarily granted access to his social media account to a "friend" and voluntarily then posted a video of himself with incriminating evidence. (People v. Pride (2019) 31 Cal.App.5th 133, 137-141.)

Because California's Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA) was not in effect at the time of the search of defendant's cellphone, a reasonable, objective person at the time of the search would not have understood the ECPA to restrict the scope of the search permitted by defendant's probation orders. Moreover, because the proper inquiry focused on a reasonable person's understanding at the time of the search, not at the time of the hearing on a motion to suppress, it was not relevant that the ECPA was in effect at the time of defendant's suppression hearing. While it is reasonable after California's Electronic Communications Privacy Act to interpret a general search condition in a probation order to exclude a search of the probationer's electronic data unless the search condition specifically states otherwise, a reasonable, objective person would not reach such a conclusion prior to the Act. (People v. Sandee (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 294.)

In a case in which defendant pleaded guilty to a felony sex offense pursuant to a negotiated disposition, the trial court had jurisdiction to modify a probation condition to explicitly authorize warrantless searches of defendant's electronic devices. The enactment of the California Electronic Communications Privacy Act necessitated a modification to clarify that defendant's warrantless search condition included searches of his electronic storage devices. (People v. Guzman (2018) 23 Cal.App.5th 53.)

The California Electronic Communications Privacy Act was not violated by an electronic search condition of probation because, in accepting probation, defendant expressly consented to subject the electronic storage devices under his control to search by any law enforcement or probation officer. It did not matter that the terms of his probation do not identify any agency to which he was giving consent. (People v. Wright (2019) 37 Cal.App.5th 120.)

Particularity requirements were met in a warrant to search defendant's computers, despite the phrase "including, but not limited to" in describing the items to be seized, because the warrant conveyed the limited objective to recover material depicting or relating to child pornography, identify victims of sexual abuse or exploitation, and access files and other material referring to or relating to planned or actual sexual encounters with minors. Given the nature of the evidence sought, the time periods covered were not important. Sixty-day time limit of Pen. Code § 1510 (time limits for motion to dismiss or suppress) applies to motions brought under Pen. Code § 1546.4. Information from third parties supported the warrant to search defendant's computers, even though one report related to files seen as much as three years before issuance of the warrant, because the trial court also relied on observations as recent as two months before the warrant issued, relating to files on defendant's computer containing images of young girls performing sex acts with adults.(Klugman v. Superior Court (2019) 39 Cal.App.5th 1080; Ordered not published.)

A geofence warrant application is not in violation of The California Electronic Communications Privacy Act in that the CalECPA does not require that a suspect's name or other identifying information be included in the warrant to ensure its validity. Also, "(t)here is nothing in the cited language that, without more, converts a Fourth Amendment violation into a statutory violation. (People v. Meza (2023) 90 Cal.App.5th 520, 545-546.)

Although the government did not properly notify defendant of its acquisition of electronic information evidence pursuant to the California Electronic Communications Privacy Act (CalECPA), suppression of the electronic information evidence at defendant's murder trial was unwarranted. When the government has properly obtained relevant evidence, and its only failure is timely notification under CalECPA, the consequence should not be categorical exclusion unless the legislature is exceedingly clear on the point. (People v. Campos (2024) 98 Cal.App.5th1281, 1284, 1296-1297.)

Gov't. Code § 53166, Cellular Communications Interception Technology, also effective January 1, 2016, provides that:

Subd. (a).

(1) "Cellular communications interception technology" means any device that intercepts mobile telephony calling information or content, including an international mobile subscriber identity catcher or other virtual base transceiver station that masquerades as a cellular station and logs mobile telephony calling information.

(2) "Local agency" means any city, county, city and county, special district, authority, or other political subdivision of the state, and includes every county sheriff and city police department.

Subd. (b): Every local agency that operates cellular communications interception technology shall do both of the following:

(1) Maintain reasonable security procedures and practices, including operational, administrative, technical, and physical safeguards, to protect information gathered through the use of cellular communications interception technology from unauthorized access, destruction, use, modification, or disclosure.

(2) Implement a usage and privacy policy to ensure that the collection, use, maintenance, sharing, and dissemination of information gathered through the use of cellular communications interception technology complies with all applicable law and is consistent with respect for an individual's privacy and civil liberties. This usage and privacy policy shall be available in writing to the public, and, if the local agency has an Internet Web site, the usage and privacy policy shall be posted conspicuously on that Internet Web site. The usage and privacy policy shall, at a minimum, include all of the following:

(A) The authorized purposes for using cellular communications interception technology and for collecting information using that technology.

(B) A description of the job title or other designation of the employees who are authorized to use, or access information collected through the use of, cellular communications interception technology. The policy shall identify the training requirements necessary for those authorized employees.

(C) A description of how the local agency will monitor its own use of cellular communications interception technology to ensure the accuracy of the information collected and compliance with all applicable laws, including laws providing for process and time period system audits.

(D) The existence of a memorandum of understanding or other agreement with another local agency or any other party for the shared use of cellular communications interception technology or the sharing of information collected through its use, including the identity of signatory parties.

(E) The purpose of, process for, and restrictions on, the sharing of information gathered through the use of cellular communications interception technology with other local agencies and persons.

(F) The length of time information gathered through the use of cellular communications interception technology will be retained, and the process the local agency will utilize to determine if and when to destroy retained information.

Subd. (c):

(1) Except as provided in para. (2), a local agency shall not acquire cellular communications interception technology unless approved by its legislative body by adoption, at a regularly scheduled public meeting held pursuant to the Ralph M. Brown Act (Gov't. Code §§ 54950 et seq.), of a resolution or ordinance authorizing that acquisition and the usage and privacy policy required by this section.

(2) Notwithstanding para. (1), the county sheriff shall not acquire cellular communications interception technology unless the sheriff provides public notice of the acquisition, which shall be posted conspicuously on his or her department's Internet Web site, and his or her department has a usage and privacy policy required by this section.

Subd. (d) Describes civil remedies for violating this section.

Chapter 18:

Border Searches*:

General Rule: The United States has a governmental interest in keeping drugs and undocumented aliens, etc., out of the country. Therefore, the search and seizure standards are relaxed a bit at the International Borders. (Carroll v. United States (1925) 267 U.S. 132, 154 [45 S.Ct. 280; 69 L.Ed. 543, 551-552].)

Case Law*:

"'[B]order searches constitute a "historically recognized exception to the Fourth Amendment's general principle that a warrant be obtained."'" (United States v. Cano (9th Cir. 2019) 934 F.3rd 1002, 1012; quoting United States v. Cotterman (9th Cir. 2013) 709 F.3rd 952, 957.)

Two principal purposes to allowing warrantless border searches:

First, to identify "[t]ravelers . . . entitled to come in," and,

Second, to verify their "belongings as effects which may be lawfully brought in."

(United States v. Cano, supra, at p. 1013; quoting Carroll v. United States (1925) 267 U.S. 132, 154 [45 S.Ct. 280; 69 L.Ed. 543].)

Border searches are not limited to physical contraband, but may include contraband contained in one's cellphone (e.g., child pornography). (United States v. Cano, supra, at p. 1014.)

"(B)order searches ...[are] considered to be 'reasonable' by the single fact that the person or item in question has entered into our country from outside." (United States v. Ramsey (1977) 431 U.S. 606, 619 [97 S.Ct. 1972; 52 L.Ed.2nd 617, 628].)

"(A)t least with respect to the Fourth Amendment's suspicion requirements, a routine border search 'is by its very nature reasonable.'" (United States v. Guzman-Padilla (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 865, 877; quoting United States v. Dobson (9th Cir. 1986) 781 F.2nd 1374, 1376.)

"'The task of guarding our country's border is one laden with immense responsibility.' United States v. Bravo, 295 F.3rd 1002, 1005 (9th Cir. 2002). Border agents serve as our first line of defense in preventing people intent on violating our laws from coming into our country." (United States v. Hernandez (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 430, 433-434.)

However, while Border Patrol agents may conduct routine searches "without any articulable level of suspicion," they still need "probable cause" to make a warrantless arrest. (Id., at p. 434.)

"The Government's interest in preventing the entry of unwanted persons and effects is at its zenith at the international border." (United States v. Flores-Montano (2004) 541 U.S. 149, 152 [124 S.Ct. 1582; 158 L.Ed.2nd 311]; see also United States v. Cotterman (9th Cir. 2013) 709 F.3rd 952, 960.)

"The government has more latitude to detain people in a border-crossing context [Citation], but such detentions are acceptable only during the time of extended border searches [Citations]." (United States v. Juvenile* [RRA-A] (9th Cir. 2000) 229 F.3rd 737, 743.)

The authority to conduct warrant border searches may include subjects who, mistakenly at the border, are turned around without ever having entered a foreign country (Canada, in this case). Routine searches at the border do not require a warrant or any level of suspicion, regardless of whether the motorist intends to cross the border or has mistakenly arrived at the border. Second, that defendant subjectively did not intend to cross the border is irrelevant as well. There is no reliable way for the Customs and Border Protection officers to tell the difference between a motorist who has just crossed the border and a "turnaround" motorist who is at the border area by mistake. (D.E. v. Doe (6th Cir. Mich. 2016) 834 F.3rd 723.)

Search Statutory Authority*:

8 U.S.C. § 1357(a): The statutory arrest and search authority for officers and employees of the Immigration and Nationalization Service (i.e., Border Patrol) is contained in 8 U.S.C. § 1357(a): "Powers Without a Warrant.

Rule: Any officer or employee of the Service authorized under regulations prescribed by the Attorney General shall have power without a warrant:"

- To interrogate any alien or person believed to be an alien as to his right to be or to remain in the United States. (Subd. (1))

- To arrest aliens entering, or who have already entered, the United States illegally. (Subd. (2))

- To conduct warrantless searches of private lands within 25 miles of the border. (Subd. (3).)

  However, private dwellings within this 25-mile area are excluded under the terms of this statute from those areas subject to a warrantless search. Although not specifically stated in the statute, the curtilage of a home (which would typically include the back and side yards of a residence), by case law, is included within this exclusion. (United States v. Romero-Bustamente (9th Cir. 2003) 337 F.3rd 1104.)

- To arrest for felony violations of the immigration laws. (Subd. (4))

- To arrest for (A) any offense against the United States, committed in the officer's or employee's presence; or (B) any federal felony. (Subd. (5))

8 U.S.C. § 1357(c) provides for the power to search the person and personal effects in the possession of any person seeking admission to the United States, with "reasonable cause" to suspect that grounds for denial of admission would be disclosed by such search.

The authorizing statute limits the persons who may legally conduct a "border search" to "persons authorized to board or search vessels. (United States v. Soto-Soto (9th Cir. 1979) 598 F.2nd 545, 549; citing 19 U.S.C. § 482). This includes customs and immigration officials, but not general law enforcement officers such as FBI agents. (United States v. Cano (9th Cir. 2019) 934 F.3rd 1002, 1012.)

See United States v. Diamond (9th Cir. 1973) 471 F.2nd 771, 773; noting that "customs agents are not general guardians of the public peace."

Also, a border search must be conducted "in enforcement of customs laws." A border search must be conducted to "enforce importation laws," and not for "general law enforcement purposes." (United States v. Soto-Soto, supra.)

19 U.S.C. § 1581(a): Boats & Vehicles: Because the United States has many miles of shoreline, the Government must also have authority to stop and search boats off the coast in order to effectively guard our borders:

19 U.S.C. § 1581(a): *Vehicle Searches: The statutory authority for Customs Agents to conduct boat and vehicle searches is contained in 19 U.S.C. § 1581(a): "Any officer of the customs may at any time go on board of any vessel or vehicle at any place in the United States . . . or at any other authorized place, without as well as within his district, and examine the manifest and other documents and papers, and examine, inspect, and search the vessel or vehicle and every part thereof and any person, trunk, package, or cargo on board, and to this end may hail and stop such vessel or vehicle, and use all necessary force to compel compliance."

> It has been stated that this statute "reflects the 'impressive historical pedigree' of the Government's power and interest, [citation]. It is axiomatic that the United States, as sovereign, has the inherent authority to protect, and a paramount interest in protecting, its territorial integrity." (United States v. Flores-Montano (2004) 541 U.S. 149, 153 [124 S.Ct. 1582; 158 L.Ed.2nd 311, 317].)

14 U.S.C. § 89(a): Vessel Searches: The statutory authority for the Coast Guard to search vessels is contained in 14 U.S.C. § 89(a): "The Coast Guard may make inquiries, examinations, inspections, searches, seizures, and arrests upon the high seas and waters over which the United States has jurisdiction, for the prevention, detection, and suppression of violations of laws of the United States. For such purposes, commissioned, warrant, and petty officers may at any time go on board of any vessel subject to the jurisdiction, or to the operation of any law, of the United States, address inquiries to those on board, examine the ship's documents and papers, and examine, inspect, and search the vessel and use all necessary force to compel compliance. When from such inquiries, examination, inspection, or search it appears that a breach of the laws of the United States rendering a person liable to arrest is being, or has been committed, by any person, such person shall be arrested or, if escaping to shore, shall be immediately pursued and arrested on shore, or other lawful and appropriate action shall be taken; or, if it shall appear that a breach of the laws of the United States has been committed so as to render such vessel, or the merchandise, or any part thereof, on board of, or brought into the United States by, such vessel, liable to forfeiture, or so as to render such vessel liable to a fine or penalty and if necessary to secure such fine or penalty, such vessel or such merchandise, or both, shall be seized."

> See also 19 U.S.C. § 482(a): "Any of the officers or persons authorized to board or search vessels may stop, search, and examine . . . any vehicle, beast, or person, on which or whom he or they shall suspect there is merchandise which is subject to duty, or shall have been introduced into the United States in any manner contrary to law . . . . [and may] seize and secure the same for trial."
> Note: See Har. & Nav. Code § 523 for the authority for local law enforcement (as defined in Har. & Nav. Code § 663) to impound vessels from "public waterways."

31 U.S.C. § 5317: Interdiction Authority*: Customs officials have the lawful authority to conduct interdiction inspections:

Subd. (b): "(A) customs officer may stop and search, at the border and without a search warrant, any vehicle, vessel, aircraft, or other conveyance, any envelope or other container, and any person entering or departing from the United States." (See United States v. Seljan (9th Cir 2008) 547 F.3rd 993, 1001; a currency interdiction inspection, resulting in the recovery of evidence that defendant was traveling to the Philippines to have sex with underage minors; no suspicion required.)

Case Law:

> "(S)earches made at the border, pursuant to the longstanding right of the sovereign to protect itself by stopping and examining persons and property crossing into this country, are reasonable simply by virtue of the fact that they occur at the border." (United States v. Flores-Montano (2004) 541 U.S. 149, 152-153 [124 S.Ct. 1582; 158 L.Ed.2nd 311].)
>
> Customs Officers at an international border, or the "functional equivalent" of a border (e.g., an international airport), may search a person's computer without any reasonable suspicion. (United States v. Arnold (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1003.)
>
> > The Court further held that a high-tech container, such as a computer, does not require a higher standard of probable cause for a warrant application, even when "expressive (i.e., First Amendment) material" is involved. (Id., at p. 1010.)
>
> California is in accord with Arnold. (People v. Endacott (2008) 164 Cal.App.4th 1346.)
> > Endacott also held that the fact that the computer is further searched at some time after the initial border crossing is irrelevant. The right to do a warrantless, suspicionless search continues indefinitely. (Id., at p. 1350.)
> >
> > Endacott also agrees with United States v. Arnold, supra, in holding that, "(a) computer is entitled to no more protection than any other container." (Ibid.)
>
> But see Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430], where the U.S. Supreme Court, recognized that cellphones are entitled to enhanced Fourth Amendment protections from other "containers," ruling that the search of a cellphone found on a person upon his arrest is unlawful absent the obtaining of a search warrant. The same reasoning likely applies to computers.
> > See People v. Michael E. (2014) 230 Cal.App.4th 261, 276-279, where the Court included a whole segment criticizing the current trend of referring to computers and cellphones as "containers of information," predicting the coming of a whole new body of law dealing with electronic devices. "'Since electronic storage is likely to contain a greater quantity and variety of information than any previous storage method, . . . '[r]elying on analogies to closed containers or file cabinets may lead courts to "oversimplify a complex area of Fourth Amendment doctrines and ignore the realities of massive modern computer storage."' [Citation.]" (Citing United States v. Carey (10th Cir. 1999) 172 F.3rd 1268, 1275.)

However, note United States v. Molina-Isidoro (5th Cir. TX 2018) 884 F.3rd 287. Where the person's cellphone was searched at the border after drugs were found in her suitcase. In discussing the applicability of Riley when the cellphone is searched as a part of a border, search, the Court declined to adopt a general rule concerning how the government's border search authority applies to modern technology, such as cellphones or other electronic devices. Second, the officers lawfully scanned and searched defendant's suitcase, in which the methamphetamine was discovered, during a lawful border search. Third, the agents reasonably relied in good faith on this broad border-search authority to search the apps on defendant's cellphone. Fourth, while the Supreme Court in Riley v. California held that the traditional search-incident-to-arrest rationale did not apply to cellphones generally, the Court left open the possibility that "other case-specific exceptions may still justify a warrantless search of a particular phone." Consequently, in this case, the court found that "it was reasonable for the agents to continue to rely on the robust body of pre-Riley case law that allowed warrantless searches of computers and cellphones." Fifth, the court recognized that no post-Riley decision issued before or after the search in this case has required a warrant for a border search of an electronic device. Finally, only two of the many federal cases addressing border searches of electronic devices have ever required any level of suspicion. In those cases, the court noted that they both required only reasonable suspicion and that was for more intrusive forensic searches.

See also United States v. Vergara (11th Cir. 2018) 884 F.3rd 1309; where it was held that the warrantless forensic searches of defendant's cellphones as a part of a border search required neither a warrant nor probable cause and the Riley decision did not change this rule.

See also United States v. Touset (11th Cir. 2018) 890 F.3rd 1227, 1234, continuing to rule that no suspicion is required at the border to search a cellphone.

The Ninth Circuit held that a forensic search of defendant's cellphone at the Mexico/U.S. border was invalid under the border search exception to Fourth Amendment because forensic cellphone searches require a reasonable suspicion, meaning that officials must reasonably suspect that the cellphone contained digital contraband. While "manual cell phone searches may be conducted by border officials without reasonable suspicion . . . forensic cell phone searches require reasonable suspicion." Per the Court, border searches of a cellphone are limited to looking for such "digital contraband," at least absent a reasonable suspicion to believe the phone contains evidence of the offense for which defendant was arrested. Without such a suspicion, when the subject has been arrested for smuggling drugs, the border search exception does not justify an agent's recording of the phone numbers and text messages for further processing, nor a subsequent forensic search, because doing so has no connection to ensuring that the phone lacked "digital contraband" (i.e., child pornography.) Here, there was no evidence supporting a reasonable suspicion to believe that defendant's phone contained evidence related to other types of illegal activity, such as smuggling cocaine. (United States v. Cano (9th Cir. 2019) 934 F.3rd 1002, 1010-1021: "(W)e hold that manual searches of cell phones at the border are reasonable without individualized suspicion, whereas the (more intrusive) forensic examination of a cell phone requires a showing of reasonable suspicion." Id., at p. 1016.)

> Note: Subsequently, the Ninth Circuit has denied a petition for rehearing en banc (Sept. 2, 2020) 973 F.3rd 966) where a six-judge dissent argued that the original Cano decision is just dead wrong. In the Cano decision, it was held that a "forensic border search" of a cellphone is limited to those instances where there is a reasonable suspicion to believe that the suspect's phone contained "digital contraband." The term "forensic" is never defined, but is defined in the dictionary as "relating to or denoting the application of scientific methods and techniques to the investigation of crime." "Digital contraband," in turn, is defined by the Cano Court as being limited to stuff like child pornography. Searching for evidence of defendant's offense (i.e., smuggling cocaine) requires probable cause and a search warrant, says the Cano Court, despite piles of contrary case law to the effect that non-forensic border searches do not require any level of suspicion, and certainly not a search warrant. (E.g., see United States v. Montoya de Hernandez (1985) 473 U.S. 531; and United States v. Flores-Montano (2004) 541 U.S. 149.) As pointed out in the en banc denial dissent, the more intrusive forensic search of one's electronic equipment (e.g., computers [see United States v. Cotterman (9th Cir. 2013) 709 F.3rd at 970.] and cellphones) do in fact require a reasonable suspicion, but a warrant has never been held to be necessary, let alone probable cause. And neither suspicionless nor warrantless forensic border searches have ever been held to be limited to child pornography. The dissent here also points out that at least two other Circuits disagree with Cano: United States v. Kolsuz (4th Cir. 2018) 890 F.3rd 133, and United States v. Williams (10th Cir. 2019) 942 F.3rd 1187. This makes the Cano decision ripe for review by the U.S. Supreme Court.

See "Cellphone Searches," below.

Authority to conduct warrantless, suspicionless searches of containers crossing the international border extends to packages both entering, and leaving, the mainland by crossing the custom's border. (United States v. Baxter (3rd Cir. 2020) 951 F.3rd 128; upholding the search of defendant's packaged mailed from the United States to the Virgin Islands.)

The Seventh Circuit has held that Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430], requiring probable cause and a search warrant, does not apply to border searches nor to computers or thumb drives, both of which only require a reasonable suspicion to do a warrantless search. (United States v. Skaggs (7th Cir. 2022) 25 F.4th 494; defendant suspected of engaging in the importation of child pornography.)

Routine vs. Non-Routine Searches: In determining what level of suspicion of criminal activity is required to justify any particular search, courts, at one time, would break down the searches into "routine" and "non-routine," which in turn would be determined by the "level of intrusiveness" involved. (United States v. Flores-Montano (2004) 541 U.S. 149 [124 S.Ct. 1582; 158 L.Ed.2nd 311].)

Routine Searches may be performed with no specific particularized suspicion, under authority of 19 U.S.C. § 1581(a), as described above. Such searches have been held to include searches of handbags, luggage, shoes, pockets and the passenger compartments of cars. (United States v. Montoya De Hernandez (1985) 473 U.S. 531 [105 S.Ct. 3304; 87 L.Ed.2nd 381]; United States v. Ramos-Saenz (9th Cir. 1994) 36 F.3rd 59; United States v. Sandoval Vargas (9th Cir.

1988) 854 F.2nd 1132; United States v. Palmer (9th Cir. 1978) 575 F.2nd 721; United States v. Cano (9th Cir. 2019) 934 F.3rd 1002, 1012.)

See also United States v. Flores-Montano (9th Cir. 2005) 424 F.3rd 1044, applying section 1581(a), rejecting the defendant's argument that 19 U.S.C. § 482 (which does talk in terms of a necessary reasonable suspicion) applied to the border searches of vehicles.

In-coming international mail, including packages, are included within this category. "Border searches of international mail are per se 'reasonable' under the Fourth Amendment, without any need to show probable cause." (People v. Blardony (1998) 66 Cal.App.4th 791, 794-795; citing United States v. Ramsey (1977) 431 U.S 606, 619-622 [97 S.Ct. 1972; 52 L.Ed.2nd 617, 628-630]; and United States v. Ani (9th Cir. 1998) 138 F.3rd 390, 392.)

> The requirement under 19 U.S.C. § 1582 that there be a "reasonable suspicion" justifying the search of in-coming mail is not constitutionally required, and a violation of this requirement will not result in suppression of any evidence. (People v. Blardony, supra, at p. 794; United States v. Ani, supra.)

X-ray examination of luggage, bags, and other containers at a border is routine and requires neither a warrant nor individualized suspicion. (United States v. Okafor (9th Cir. 2002) 285 F.3rd 842.)

Taking a gas tank out of a vehicle to inspect its contents, given the minimal intrusiveness of such an act, is considered by the United States Supreme Court to be a "routine" search, not requiring any articulable suspicion to justify. (United States v. Flores-Montano (2004) 541 U.S. 149 [124 S.Ct. 1582; 158 L.Ed.2nd 311]; overruling the Ninth Circuit's conclusion to the contrary in United States v. Molina-Tarazon (2002) 279 F.3rd 709.)

Use of a "Buster" on a vehicle, given the lack of any proof that the defendant was exposed to any danger from the radioactivity in the device, does not require any suspicion in a search at the border. (United States v. Camacho (9th Cir. 2004) 368 F.3rd 1182.)

> A "Buster" is "a handheld portable density gauge. . . . It contains a tiny bead of radioactive material called barium 133 that's inside a sealed container. . . . (W)hen the actuating trigger is pushed, the container rolls to an open slot and exposes the radiation in a forward direction (providing a reading on the density of an object)." A higher reading than normal indicates that something not normally there is hidden in the object being evaluated, such as the spare tire in this case. (Ibid.)

The search of a passenger's cabin on a cruise ship, upon returning from a foreign port, is a "routine border search" and does not require any suspicion. (People v. Laborde (2008) 163 Cal.App.4th 870.)

Non-Routine Searches require a "reasonable suspicion" the person or thing to be searched contains something illegal, and have been held to include body cavity searches, strip searches, patdowns and involuntary x-ray searches. (United States v. Montoya De Hernandez (1985) 473 U.S. 531 [87 L.Ed.2nd 381]; United States v. Vance (9th Cir. 1995) 62 F.3rd 1152.)

Reasonable Suspicion: The United States Supreme Court in United States v. Montoya De Hernandez, supra, at pp. 540-541, criticized the use of the phrase "heightened level of suspicion," preferring to use the standard "reasonable suspicion" requirement.

In United States v. Montoya De Hernandez, defendant was subject to a rectal examination and held for four days at a hospital where she passed 88 balloons containing cocaine, the Court holding that a more intrusive, nonroutine search must be supported by "reasonable suspicion." (Ibid.)

Factors: The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, in United States v. Molina-Tarazon, supra, found three factors which, when present, warrant the finding that a particular search is non-routine; i.e., (1) the use of force, (2) danger, and (3) fear. The Court, perhaps stretching its credibility a bit, found evidence of each in the removal of a vehicle's gas tank.

The United States Supreme Court overruled Molina-Tarazon, so far as it related to the intrusiveness of taking a gas tank out of a vehicle, finding instead that to do so does not require any articulable suspicion. (United States v. Flores-Montano (2004) 541 U.S. 149 [124 S.Ct. 1582; 158 L.Ed.2nd 311].)

See also United States v. Cedano-Arellano (9th Cir. 2003) 332 F.3rd 568; a certified detection dog's alert on defendant's gas tank, plus defendant's nervousness, evasiveness and suspicious responses, sufficient "reasonable suspicion" to justify the removal of his gas tank.

X-Rays of the Person: An x-ray search requires a "heightened level" of suspicion because it is potentially harmful to the health of the suspect. (United States v. Ek (9th Cir. 1982) 672 F.2nd 379, 382.)

The United States Supreme Court in United States v. Montoya De Hernandez, supra, at pp. 540-541, criticized the use of the phrase "heightened level of suspicion," preferring to use the standard "reasonable suspicion" requirement.

> In United States v. Montoya De Hernandez, defendant was subject to a rectal examination and held for four days at a hospital where she passed 88 balloons containing cocaine, the Court holding that a more intrusive, nonroutine search must be supported by "reasonable suspicion." (Ibid.)

Use of a "Buster," however, on a vehicle, given the lack of any proof that the defendant was exposed to any danger from the radioactivity in the device, does not require any suspicion in a search at the border. (United States v. Camacho (9th Cir. 2004) 368 F.3rd 1182.)

Extended Detentions at the border, and all stops or detentions away from the border, are also non-routine. (United States v. Montoya De Hernandez, supra, and People v. Superior Court (1973) 33 Cal.App.3rd 523.)

Cutting Open Luggage, if permanent damage is caused, is likely to be held to be a non-routine search, depending upon the extent of the damage. (United States v. Okafor (9th Cir. 2002) 285 F.3rd 842.)

Cellphone and Other Electronic Device Searches:

> When the person's cellphone is searched at the border after drugs are found in her suitcase: In discussing the applicability of Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430], when a cellphone is searched as a part of a border search, the court declined to adopt a general rule concerning how the government's border search authority applies to modern technology, such as cellphones or other electronic devices. Second, the officers lawfully scanned and searched defendant's suitcase, in which the methamphetamine was discovered, during a lawful border search. Third, the agents reasonably relied in good faith on this broad border-search authority to search the apps on defendant's cellphone. Fourth, while the Supreme Court in Riley v. California held that the traditional search-incident-to-arrest rationale did not apply to cellphones generally, the Court left open the possibility that "other case-specific exceptions may still justify a warrantless search of a particular phone." Consequently, in this case, the court found that "it was reasonable for the agents to continue to rely on the robust body of pre-Riley case law that allowed warrantless searches of computers and cellphones." Fifth, the court recognized that no post-Riley decision issued before or after the search in this case has required a warrant for a border search of an electronic device. Finally, only two of the many federal cases addressing border searches of electronic devices have ever required any level of suspicion. In those cases, the court noted that they both required only reasonable suspicion and that was for more intrusive forensic searches. (United States v. Molina-Isidoro (5th Cir. TX 2018) 884 F.3rd 287.)

A forensic warrantless search of defendant's cellphone by United States Customs and Border Protection (CBP) officers after defendant's detention at the Washington Dulles International Airport as he attempted to board a flight to Turkey, was categorized by the Court as a "non-routine" search, and was upheld as a part of a border search. First, the border search exception applied even though the forensic search of defendant's phone occurred at an off-site location over an extended period of time. Second, the court added that defendant's arrest did not transform the examination of his phone under the border search exception into a search incident to arrest, which would have required a warrant under Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430]. Finally, the court held that the forensic search of defendant's phone was justified because the officers had reason to believe he was attempting to export firearms illegally. The court recognized that this type of transnational offense goes to the heart of the border search exception, which is justified, in part, by the government's interest in "protecting and monitoring exports from the country." Lastly, the Court rejected defendant's argument that the privacy interest in smartphone data is so great that even under the border exception, a forensic examination of a phone is a non-routine search that requires a warrant based on probable cause. (United States v. Kolsuz (4th Cir. VA 2018) 890 F.3rd 133.)

> The Court declined to find whether only a reasonable suspicion was required, ruling only that "it was reasonable for the officers who conducted the forensic search of (defendant's) phone to rely on the established and uniform body of precedent allowing warrantless border searches of digital devices that are based on at least reasonable suspicion." (Ibid.)
> The fact that the officers transported defendant's cellphone four miles from the location of the detention to where it was forensically examined was held to be irrelevant. (Ibid.)

See also United States v. Vergara (11th Cir. 2018) 884 F.3rd 1309; where it was held that the warrantless forensic searches of defendant's cellphones as a part of a border search (returning from a cruise) where defendant was suspected of having child pornography on his cellphones, required neither a warrant nor probable cause and the Riley decision did not change this rule. The Court further noted that at most, border searches require reasonable suspicion, but defendant did not argue that the agents lacked reasonable suspicion to conduct a forensic search of his phones.

When the government establishes reasonable suspicion that an individual is involved in criminal activity, the Fourth Amendment permits a warrantless border search of that individual's personal electronic devices, such as a laptop computer and a cellphone. (United States v. Williams (10th Cir. 2019) 942 F.3rd 1187; the Court declining to rule whether even a reasonable suspicion was necessary.)

The Ninth Circuit held that a forensic search of defendant's cellphone at the Mexico/U.S. border was invalid under the border search exception to Fourth Amendment because forensic cellphone searches require a reasonable suspicion, meaning that officials must reasonably suspect that the cellphone contained digital contraband. While "manual cell phone searches may be conducted by border officials without reasonable suspicion . . . forensic cell phone searches require reasonable suspicion." Per the Court, border searches of a cellphone are limited to looking for such "digital contraband," at least absent a reasonable suspicion to believe the phone contains evidence of the offense for which defendant was arrested. Without such a suspicion, when the subject has been arrested for smuggling drugs, the border search exception does not justify an agent's recording of the phone numbers and text messages for further processing, nor a subsequent forensic search, because doing so has no connection to ensuring that the phone lacked "digital contraband" (i.e., child pornography.) Here, there was no evidence supporting a reasonable suspicion to believe that defendant's phone contained evidence related to other types of illegal activity, such as smuggling cocaine. (United States v. Cano (9th Cir. 2019) 934 F.3rd 1002, 1010-1021: "(W)e hold that manual searches of cell phones at the border are reasonable without individualized suspicion, whereas the (more intrusive) forensic examination of a cell phone requires a showing of reasonable suspicion." Id., at p. 1016.)

Note: Subsequently, the Ninth Circuit has denied a petition for rehearing en banc (Sept. 2, 2020) 973 F.3rd 966) where a six-judge dissent argued that the original Cano decision is just dead wrong. In the Cano decision, it was held that a "forensic border search" of a cellphone is limited to those instances where there is a reasonable suspicion to believe that the suspect's phone contained "digital contraband." The term "forensic" is never defined, but is defined in the dictionary as "relating to or denoting the application of scientific methods and techniques to the investigation of crime." "Digital contraband," in turn, is defined by the Cano Court as being limited to stuff like child pornography. Searching for evidence of defendant's offense (i.e., smuggling cocaine) requires probable cause and a search warrant, says the Cano Court, despite piles of contrary case law to the effect that non-forensic border searches do not require any level of suspicion, and certainly not a search warrant. (E.g., see United States v. Montoya de Hernandez (1985) 473 U.S. 531; and United States v. Flores-Montano (2004) 541 U.S. 149.) As pointed out in the en banc denial dissent, the more intrusive forensic search of one's electronic equipment (e.g., computers [see United States v. Cotterman (9th Cir. 2013) 709 F.3rd at 970.] and cellphones) do in fact require a reasonable suspicion, but a warrant has never been held to be necessary, let alone probable cause. And neither suspicionless nor warrantless forensic border searches have ever been held to be limited to child pornography. The dissent here also points out that at least two other Circuits disagree with Cano: i.e.; United States v. Kolsuz (4th Cir. 2018) 890 F.3rd 133, and United States v. Williams (10th Cir. 2019) 942 F.3rd 1187. This makes the Cano decision ripe for review by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Defendant, a citizen of the People's Republic of China and a long-time resident of the United States, conditionally pled guilty to conspiracy to commit economic espionage. He appealed the conviction and sentence. The principal issue is whether the district court erred in denying defendant's motion to suppress evidence obtained by a warrantless seizure and forensic search of his digital devices as he was leaving Chicago's O'Hare International Airport, with Shanghai, China, his final destination. The Eighth Circuit affirmed. The court explained that it agreed with the district court's conclusion that U.S. Customs and Border Protection ("CBP") officers had reasonable suspicion to conduct non-routine forensic searches of defendant's electronic devices and acted reasonably in doing so. The court explained that no Circuit has held that the government must obtain a warrant to conduct a routine border search of electronic devices. Further, the court held that the officers and agents had background information, much of it corroborated, that provided a basis for assessing defendant's actions in May and June 2017. Their experience and training in international economic espionage and theft of trade secrets gave them reasonable suspicion for an extended border search that included a forensic search of electronic devices. Ultimately, the court held that the search was not constitutionally unreasonable. (United States v. Haitao Xiang (8th Cir. 2023) 67 F.4th 895.)

Destructiveness of the Search:

In Cortez-Rocha (9th Cir. 2005) 394 F.3rd 1115, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, in a split, two-to-one decision, held that cutting open a spare tire of a vehicle is not so destructive as to require a finding of a reasonable suspicion in order to justify.

Removal of a gas tank is not so destructive as to require a reasonable suspicion to justify. (United States v. Flores-Montano (2004) 541 U.S. 149 [124 S.Ct. 1582; 158 L.Ed.2nd 311], overruling the Ninth Circuit Court's opinion to the contrary.

Drilling a 5/16-inch hole into the bed of a pickup truck, the damage being minimal and not affecting the security and safety of its passengers, does not require a reasonable suspicion to justify. (United States v. Chaudhry (9th Cir. 2005) 424 F.2nd 1051.)

Unscrewing and pulling apart the inside door panels to a vehicle, where the panels could be reinstalled without any damage to the vehicle, does not require a reasonable suspicion. (United States v. Hernandez (9th Cir. 2005) 424 F.3rd 1056.)

Reasonableness of the Search:

Even a border search which may be conducted with no suspicion must be reasonable in its manner and scope. (United States v. Seljan (9th Cir. 2007) 497 F.3rd 1037, 1042-1045; a currency interdiction search, as authorized by 31 U.S.C. § 5317(b), of an out-bound envelope resulting in discovery of evidence that defendant traveled to the Philippines for illicit purposes, where letters were initially merely scanned and not read.)

Border agents seized defendant's laptop at the U.S.-Mexico border in response to a Treasury Enforcement Communication System (TECS) alert that was based in part on defendant's previous conviction for child molestation. The initial search at the border turned up no incriminating material. Only after defendant's laptop was shipped almost 170 miles away and subjected to a comprehensive forensic examination were images of child pornography discovered. The court held that although the initial warrantless search of defendant's computer at the border was lawful, with or without any articulable suspicion, the later forensic examination of defendant's laptop required a showing of reasonable suspicion under the Fourth Amendment. The court ruled that defendant's TECS alert, prior child-related conviction, frequent travels, crossing from a country known for sex tourism, and collection of electronic equipment, plus the parameters of the Operation Angel Watch program, taken collectively, gave rise to reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. When combined with the other circumstances, the fact that an agent encountered at least one password protected file on the laptop contributed to the basis for a reasonable suspicion to conduct a forensic examination. An alert regarding possession of child pornography justified obtaining additional resources to properly determine whether illegal files were present. (United States v. Cotterman (9th Cir. 2013) 709 F.3rd 952, 962-970.)

"Reasonable suspicion" necessary for such an intrusive search is defined as; "a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person stopped of criminal activity." (Id., at p. 968.)

Scope of the Search:

Even a border search which may be conducted with no suspicion must be reasonable in its manner and scope. (United States v. Seljan (9th Cir. 2007) 497 F.3rd 1037, 1042-1045; a currency interdiction search, as authorized by 31 U.S.C. § 5317(b), of an out-bound envelope resulting in discovery of evidence that defendant traveled to the Philippines for illicit purposes, where letters were initially merely scanned and not read.)

The Ninth Circuit is of the opinion (not agreed to by all courts; e.g., see United States v. Kolsuz (4th Cir. VA 2018) 890 F.3rd 133, 139-143.) that while warrantless/suspicionless searches at an international border for the purpose of discovering contraband being smuggled at that time, it is "beyond the scope" of a border search to be looking for evidence of past or future criminal violations; i.e., looking for "evidence that would aid in prosecuting past and preventing future border-related crimes." (United States v. Cano (9th Cir. 2019) 934 F.3rd 1002, 1016-1018.)

The "Functional Equivalent of a Border:" "Border searches need not occur at an actual border, but may take place at the 'functional equivalent' of a border, or at an 'extended border (see below).'" (United States v. Guzman-Padilla (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 865, 877; citing United States v. Cardona (9th Cir. 1985) 769 F.2nd 625, 628.)

An International Airport, receiving flights from a foreign country, is the "functional equivalent of a border." Opening luggage therefore requires no suspicion, while cutting open the luggage, damaging it, requires a reasonable suspicion, to be lawful. (United States v. Okafor (9th Cir. 2002) 285 F.3rd 842.)

The first port where a vessel docks on arrival from a foreign country is the functional equivalent of an international border. (People v. Laborde (2008) 163 Cal.App.4th 870, 874.)

Similarly, a regional sorting hub for express consignment services, like those offered by UPS, is the "functional equivalent of a border" and not an "extended border." (See below). The test for determining the difference is whether the facility (at Louisville, Kentucky, in this case) is where packages are searched "at the last practicable opportunity before its passage over the international border." (United States v. Abbouchi (9th Cir. 2007) 502 F.3rd 850.)

> See also United States v. Seljan (9th Cir. 2008) 547 F.3rd 993, where the Court held the same for a FedEx regional sorting facility in Oakland, California, where defendant's mail, bound for the Philippines, was lawfully subjected to warrantless inspections by U.S. Customs Service inspectors.

The "Extended Border Search Doctrine:"

The "Reasonable Cause to Suspect" Rule: While a search at the International border or the "functional equivalent of a border" (see above), done under authority of 19 U.S.C. § 1582, does not require any suspicion to justify, a search under the "extended border search doctrine," done upon containers that have already been imported and are searched "wherever found," are authorized by 19 U.S.C. § 482, and require the presence of a "reasonable cause to suspect" (i.e., a "reasonable suspicion"), to be lawful. (United States v. Ramsey (1977) 431 U.S. 606, 612-613 [97 S.Ct. 1972; 52 L.Ed.2nd 617]; United States v. Taghizadeh (9th Cir. 1994) 41 F.3rd 1263, 1265; United States v. Cardona (9th Cir. 1985) 769 F.2nd 625, 627; United States v. Sahanaja (9th Cir. 2005) 430 F.3rd 1049.)

> Extended border searches based upon less than probable cause are lawful so long as:
> (1) The totality of the circumstances, including the time and distance elapsed as well as the manner and extent of surveillance, convince the fact finder with reasonable certainty that any contraband in or on the vehicle at the time of search was aboard the vehicle at the time of entry into the United States; and

(2) The government agents conducing the search have a reasonable suspicion that the search may uncover contraband or evidence of criminal activity.

(United States v. Villasenor (9th Cir. 2010) 608 F.3rd 467, 471-472.)

Case Law:

This rule applies to packages that are being sent from the United States to a foreign country, even though it has not yet left the country, at least where it has been put into the hands of the mail service and is "all but certain" that it will be leaving the country. (Alexander v. United States (9th Cir. 1966) 362 F.2nd 379, 382.)

An extended border search, which occurs after the actual entry into the United States has been made, tend to intrude more on an individual's normal expectation of privacy. It must therefore be justified by a "reasonable suspicion" that the subject of the search was involved in criminal activity. (United States v. Guzman-Padilla (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 865, 877.")

> An extended border search requires that law enforcement possess a "reasonable certainty" that a border has been crossed, either by the vehicle in question or by contraband suspected to be within the vehicle. (Id., at p. 878, 879-881.)

A Border Patrol Agent observed defendant's pickup truck some 70 miles north of the U.S.–Mexico border on Interstate 70, with Baja California license plates, traveling at 90 miles-per-hour while the other vehicles were driving between 70 and 80 mph. Also, defendant was weaving in and out of traffic and did not make eye contact with the agent after he pulled his marked vehicle alongside the passenger side of his truck. The agent affected a traffic stop. Defendant consented to a search of his truck resulting in eight kilograms of cocaine being recovered. The stop was held by an en banc panel of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal to have been supported by a reasonable suspicion based upon the fact that the location was the last checkpoint on that interstate, the truck had Mexican plates, and the erratic driving that the agent recognized as common among smugglers. (United States v. Valdes-Vega (9th Cir. 2013) 738 F.3rd 1074, 1076-1081.)

Use of a "Controlled Tire Deflation Device" (or "CTDD") by Border Patrol agents to stop a vehicle for which there was a reasonable suspicion that it was involved in smuggling people or contraband across the border was held to be lawful and, under the circumstances, not an excessive use of force. (United States v. Guzman-Padilla (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 865.)

> See "A Controlled Tire Deflation Device ("CTDD")," under "New and Developing Law Enforcement Tools and Technology" (Chapter 14), above.

Following defendant after seeing his car on the United States side but near the border, after which a municipal police officer was told to stop defendant, and where a drug sniffing dog alerted on defendant's vehicle, was a valid extended border search supported by a reasonable suspicion, based upon informant information and defendant's unusual behavior after crossing the border. (United States v. Villasenor (9th Cir. 2010) 608 F.3rd 467.)

> The search was upheld in Villasenor despite a 45 minute detention while awaiting the arrival of a drug-sniffing dog, after a 20 minute surveillance, and where defendant was not seen crossing the border but where it was apparent that he'd just come from Mexico.

A forensic search of the defendant's laptop computer, conducted some 170 miles away from the border and over five days after the laptop was seized at the border, held not to come within the "extended border search" doctrine. Defendant's computer never cleared customs, so it cannot be said that it ever entered the United States. (United States v. Cotterman (9th Cir. 2013) 709 F.3rd 952. 961-962; "A border search of a computer is not transformed into an extended border search simply because the device is transported and examined beyond the border.")

Immigration Checkpoints Away from the Border:

Established checkpoints located away from the border, such as at San Clemente, on Interstate 5, and Fallbrook, on Interstate 15, were, at one time, considered to be the "functional equivalent" of a border, and therefore subject to the same rules, even though these two points are miles from the U.S./Mexican border. (See United States v. Martinez-Fuerte (1976) 428 U.S. 543 [96 S.Ct. 3074; 49 L.Ed.2nd 1116].)

> At the time, a checkpoint was thought to be the "functional equivalent of the border" only when the government has proven to a "reasonable certainty that the traffic passing through the checkpoint is international in character. [Citation] In practical terms, this test means that border equivalent checkpoints intercept no more than a negligible number of domestic travelers." (United States v. Jackson (5th Cir. 1987) 825 F.2nd 853, 860.)

Actual "border checkpoints" implicate the broader powers of the federal government to conduct searches and seizures of persons for immigration, drug interdiction, or other purposes at the border or its functional equivalent. (See United States v. Montoya de Hernandez (1985) 473 U.S. 531, 541-542 [105 S.Ct. 3304; 87 L.Ed.2nd 381, 391-392]; United States v. Ramsey (1977) 431 U.S. 606, 616 [97 S.Ct. 1972; 52 L.Ed.2nd 617, 626].)

More recent authority, however, recognizes that such checkpoints are merely "immigration checkpoints," and not the equivalent of an international border. (United States v. Franzenberg (S.D.Cal. 1990) 937 F.Supp. 1414; United States v. Machuca-Barrera (5th Cir. 2001) 261 F.3rd 425, 432, fn. 15.)

Therefore, it has been held that stops at such points for immigration purposes is lawful despite the lack of "reasonable suspicion," requiring only that such stops be "selective." (United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, supra.)

But the search of a vehicle at an immigration checkpoint, away from the border, may require "probable cause" to justify. (United States v. Ortiz (1975) 422 U.S. 891 [95 S.Ct. 2585; 45 L.Ed.2nd 623].)

Although argued that such checkpoints are for the purpose of enforcing immigration rules, their use in also preventing drug trafficking has recently been challenged in United States v. Soto-Zuniga (9th Cir. 2016), 837 F.3rd 992, where the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal remanded the case back to the trial court to allow defense discovery into the records of the San Clemente checkpoint in order to properly litigate the legitimacy of such a use.

Roving Patrols: Border Patrol vehicle stops, away from the border, are held to the same Fourth Amendment standards as any other domestic law enforcement agency. (Almeida-Sanchez v. United States (1973) 413 U.S. 266 [93 S.Ct. 2535; 37 L.Ed.2nd 596]; United States v. Brignoni-Ponce (1975) 422 U.S. 873 [95 S.Ct. 2574; 45 L.Ed.2nd 607]; Delaware v. Prouse (1979) 440 U.S. 648 [99 S.Ct. 1391; 59 L.Ed.2nd 660].)

An investigatory stop of a vehicle may be based upon a reasonable suspicion that criminal activity is afoot, based upon an evaluation of the "totality of the circumstances." The fact that the circumstances, taken individually and in isolation, may all have some reasonable, non-criminal explanation, does not mean that a border patrol agent does not have legal cause to stop and investigate a possible drug smuggler. (United States v. Arvizu (2002) 534 U.S 266 [122 S.Ct. 744; 151 L.Ed.2nd 740].)

"(T)here was a 'crucial distinction' between the sort of 'roving-patrol stop' or 'spot check' at issue in Prouse and the fixed checkpoint in Martinez-Fuerte." (Demarest v. City of Vallejo (9th Cir. 2022) 44 F.4th 1209, 1217, citing Delaware v. Prouse, supra, at pp. 656-657.)

> "(U)nlike the checkpoint in Martinez-Fuerte, the sort of roving-patrol stop in Prouse involved an exercise of 'standardless and unconstrained discretion.'" (Id., at 1217, quoting Delaware v. Prouse, supra, at p 661.)

The non-exclusive list of factors a court may use in determining whether a stop and detention is lawful include:

- The characteristics of the area in which a vehicle is encountered.
- Proximity to the border.
- Recent illegal border crossings in the area.
- Erratic or evasive driving behavior.
- Aspects of the vehicle.
- The behavior or appearance of the driver.

(United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, supra, at pp. 884-885 [45 L.Ed.2nd at pp. 618-619]; see also United States v. Nelson (5th Cir. 2021) 990 F.3rd 947.)

See also United States v. Berber-Tinoco (9th Cir. 2007) 510 F.3rd 1083, adding:

- Usual patterns of smuggling in the area;
- Previous alien or drug smuggling in the area;
- Behavior of the driver, including "obvious attempts to evade officers;"
- Appearance or behavior of passengers;
- Model and appearance of the vehicle; and
- Officer experience.

See United States v. Diaz-Juarez (9th Cir. 2002) 299 F.3rd 1138; Driving late at night in a high crime area, near the International Border, apparently looking for something, in a vehicle from another area and with a modified suspension, held in this case sufficient to justify a stop and detention.

Also, state (including local) law enforcement officers have limited statutory authority to detain and question individuals regarding their immigration status if:

- The person is illegally present in the United States;

- The person has previously been convicted of a felony in the United States and since left the country or was deported;

- The state or local law enforcement official obtains "appropriate confirmation" from the INS of the immigration status of the individual;

- The state or local law enforcement official only detains the individual for as long as is reasonably required for the INS to assume federal custody of the individual for the purposes of deportation or removal.

(8 U.S.C. § 1252c(a); United States v. Vasquez-Alvarez (10th Cir. 1999) 176 F.3rd 1294, 1296.)

Note the Ninth Circuit's unsupported conclusion that absent "a particularized reasonable suspicion that an individual is not a citizen," it is a Fourth Amendment violation to ask him or her about the subject's citizenship (see Mena v. City of Semi Valley (9th Cir. 2003) 332 F.3rd 1255, 1264-1265.) was reversed by the United States Supreme Court (Certiorari granted, 2004)

> The U.S. Supreme Court rejected this reasoning in the Mena case, reversing Mena while holding that it is not an unconstitutional expansion of the original reasons for the detention merely to make inquiry as to a person's citizenship status. Muehler v. Mena (2005) 544 U.S. 93 [125 S.Ct. 1465; 161 L.Ed.2nd 299]; specifically reversing the Ninth Circuit on this issue.)

A roving Border Patrol agent may stop a vehicle if he has reasonable suspicion to believe the vehicle is involved in illegal activity. Here, the agent was an experienced officer who had been patrolling Highway 77 near Raymondville, Texas, for almost one year, forty-five miles north of the border, well south of the Sarita checkpoint. The agent saw defendant and his passengers acting as if they were very nervous when they saw him. Finally, defendant was driving a type of vehicle known to be popular among smugglers, on a highway and on a day of the week popular among them. Based on these factors, the court held that the agent had reasonable suspicion to stop defendant. (United States v. Ramirez (5th Cir. 2016) 839 F.3rd 437.)

A Border Patrol agent's knowledge of the area and his observations of suspicious circumstances constituted sufficient reasonable suspicion to stop a vehicle observed in the area of frequent drug and illegal alien trafficking (United States v. Robles-Avalos (5th Cir. TX 2018) 895 F.3rd 405.)

The district court was held to have properly denied defendant's motion to suppress narcotics that Border Patrol agents found in defendant's vehicle because the agents, who had a particularized and objective basis for suspecting defendant was engaged in criminal activity, had sufficient reasonable suspicion to stop defendant's vehicle. (United States v. Raygoza-Garcia (9th Cir. 2018) 902 F.3rd 994, 999-1001.)

Note: Evidence of "unproductive stops" by Border Patrol agents in the same area, or stops from which no federal prosecutions arose, did not constitute facts that were "not subject to reasonable dispute," and thus (under Fed. R. Evid. 201(b)) were not the proper subject for a trial court to take "judicial notice." (Id., at pp. 1001-1002.)

But see concurring opinion, at pp. 1002-1004, criticizing what the justices consider to be putting too much emphasis on otherwise innocent behavior in establishing a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity.

"Border Patrol Agents on roving border patrols may conduct 'brief investigatory stops' without violating the Fourth Amendment if the stop is supported by reasonable suspicion to believe that criminal activity may be afoot. (Citing United States v. Valdes-Vega (9th Cir. 2013) 738 F.3rd 1074, 1078.). 'Reasonable suspicion is defined as a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person stopped of criminal activity.' Id. (internal quotations and citation omitted). The standard 'is not a particularly high threshold to reach,' and '[a]lthough . . . a mere hunch is insufficient to justify a stop, the likelihood of criminal activity need not rise to the level required for probable cause, and it falls considerably short of satisfying a preponderance of the evidence standard.' (Id.)" (United States v. Raygoza-Garcia (9th Cir. 2018) 902 F.3rd 994, 999-1000.)

A Court must look at the "totality of the circumstances:" "When evaluating law enforcement stops of vehicles near the border, 'the totality of the circumstances may include characteristics of the area, proximity to the border, usual patterns of traffic and time of day, previous alien or drug smuggling in the area, behavior of the driver, appearance or behavior of passengers, and the model and appearance of the vehicle.' (Citing United States v. Valdes-Vega, supra, at 1079; and United States v. Brignoni-Ponce (1975) 422 U.S. 873, 884-885 [95 S. Ct. 2574; 45 L.Ed. 2nd 607].). The facts in a given case must be seen through the lens of the agents' training and experience." (United States v. Raygoza-Garcia, supra, at pp. 1000-1001; taking into consideration the vehicle's recent crossing history, the change in drivers on the same day, the distracted driving, and the proximity of the vehicle to the border.)

But see concurring opinion, at pp. 1002-1004, criticizing what the justices consider to be putting too much emphasis on otherwise innocent behavior in establishing a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity.

The Fourth Amendment was held to require suppression of drug evidence where a U.S. Customs and Border Protection agent did not have sufficient reasonable suspicion for a traffic stop based on the facts that defendant was driving in a known drug trafficking corridor in a vehicle that had crossed the U.S.-Mexico border a week earlier and that she slowed and moved over behind the agent after he pulled alongside her vehicle in an unmarked car. "(W)hen the agent pulled alongside defendant, it was his conduct that looked suspicious, not hers." It was also noted that the Customs and Border Protection agent's instinct, even though based on training in "behavior analysis" and experience, was not enough to justify stopping a vehicle and searching it. (People v. Mendoza (2020) 44 Cal.App.5th 1044.)

In a license suspension case under Veh. Code, § 13353, based on defendant's refusal to submit to a blood or breath test, the underlying investigative stop was held to be valid because an experienced border patrol officer reasonably suspected that defendant's minivan was involved with illegal smuggling after it fled the officer from a restricted area near the border at a high rate of speed. (Elmore v. Gordon (2021) 73 Cal.App.5th 520, 521-522.)

Search of a Residence*:

Search of a residence, away from the border, after following a suspected illegal alien to the residence, requires full probable cause and a search warrant, absent an exigency or consent. Although police officers are allowed to approach a home to contact individuals inside and conduct a "knock and talk," in this case, the evidence did not support the Border Patrol Agents' argument that they entered defendant's property to initiate a consensual encounter with him. The court concluded that it was not objectively reasonable, as part of a knock-and-talk, for the agent to bypass the front door, which the agent had seen defendant open in response to a knock by a suspected illegal alien moments earlier, and intrude into an area of the curtilage where an uninvited visitor would not be expected to appear (i.e., carport attached to the side of the house). By trespassing onto the curtilage and detaining defendant, the agent violated defendant's Fourth Amendment rights. (United States v. Perea-Rey (9th Cir. 2012) 680 F.3rd 1179, 1183-1189.)

The San Ysidro Port of Entry, in San Diego, is state land and not federal, although the attached facilities belong to the federal government. A federal Immigration and Naturalization Agent at that location may therefore lawfully make a citizen's arrest for a state criminal violation (e.g., driving while under the influence) and turn him over to state and local law enforcement officers. (People v. Crusilla (1999) 77 Cal.App.4th 141.)

Chapter 19*:

Fourth Waiver Searches:

"Prior Consents:" Search & Seizure ("Fourth Waiver") Conditions:

General Rule: All parolees, and some probationers, and in some cases, pre-trial defendants, are subject to what is commonly referred to as a "Fourth Waiver*;" i.e., where the subject has agreed, prior to the fact, to waive any objections to being subjected to searches and seizures without the necessity of the law enforcement officer (or a parole or probation officer) having to meet the standard Fourth Amendment requirements of probable cause and a search warrant. (See Vandenberg v. Superior Court (1970) 8 Cal.App.3rd 1048, 1053; People v. Bravo (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 600, 610; In re York (1995) 9 Cal.4th 1133, 1150.)

Probation: "In California, a person may validly consent in advance to warrantless searches and seizures in exchange for the opportunity to avoid serving a state prison term. [Citations.] Warrantless searches are justified in the probation context because they aid in deterring further offenses by the probationer and in monitoring compliance with the terms of probation. [Citations.] By allowing close supervision of probationers, probation search conditions serve to promote rehabilitation and reduce recidivism while helping to protect the community from potential harm by probationers. [Citation.]" (People v. Cruz (2019) 34 Cal.App.5th 764, 770; DUI probationary search condition to submit to a blood or breath test, quoting People v. Robles (2000) 23 Cal.4th 789, 795 . . . .)

E.g.: A vehicle search based on a passenger's probation status may extend beyond the probationer's person and the seat he or she occupies, but is confined to those areas of the passenger compartment where the officer reasonably expects that the probationer could have stowed personal belongings or discarded items when aware of police activity. (People v. Cervantes (2017) 11 Cal.App.5th 860, 866-872.)

Parole: Searches of a parolee and his property are reasonable, so long as the parolee's status is known to the officer and the search is not arbitrary, capricious, or harassing. (People v. Schmitz (2012) 55 Cal.4th 909, 916-933; discussing the search of a non-parolee's vehicle and its contents when the parolee is a passenger in the car.)

A warrantless search of those areas of the passenger compartment of a vehicle where an officer reasonably expects that the parolee could have stowed personal belongings or discarded items when aware of police activity, as well as a search of personal property located in those areas if the officer reasonably believes that the parolee owns those items or has the ability to exert control over them, is lawful. (Ibid.)

However, defendant's locked glovebox (defendant being the driver and owner of the car) was held not to be searchable merely because a parolee (subject to search and seizure conditions) was in the back seat, absent evidence tending to show that the parolee was capable of accessing the glovebox and in the absence of any observations by the police suggesting that the occupants of the car were maneuvering to get the gun from the back seat passenger into the glove box and lock it. (Claypool v. Superior Court (2022) 85 Cal.App.5th 1092.)

Post-Release Community Supervision Act of 2011 ("PRCS"):

The same rules apply to what are referred to as "probation searches" under the "Post-Release Community Supervision Act of 2011," i.e., Pen. Code §§ 3450 et seq. (People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 863-873.)

The search of an individual's hotel room, when the individual was subject to the "mandatory supervision" provisions of PRCS, was held not to be an "arbitrary, capricious, or harassing" search when the officer had not had any prior contact with the defendant, there was no indication that the search had been conducted for an improper purpose, and it appeared to have been conducted solely for legitimate law-enforcement purposes. Also, the search was not conducted at an unreasonable time or in an unreasonable manner. (United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2017) 859 F.3rd 1175.)

See "Post-Release Community Supervision Act of 2011," below.

Parole v. Probation: Prior Consent:

Although imposed as a condition of the subject's parole or probation, such a waiver, albeit coerced at least to some extent (in so far it is imposed in lieu of incarceration where the subject is to be placed on probation), is often considered by some courts to be a form of "prior consent." (In re Tyrell J. (1994) 8 Cal.4th 68, 79-80, overruled on other grounds.)

Note: In re Tyrell J., supra, has been specifically overruled by the California Supreme Court in In re Jaime P. (2006) 40 Cal.4th 128, on the issue of whether an officer had to know of the probation condition prior to the search. Tyrell J. is cited in this outline for its other still-valid legal points.

See "Searching While In Ignorance of a Search Condition," below.

The California Supreme Court has noted that while probationers consent to the imposition of search and seizure conditions, typically to avoid further incarceration, similar search and seizure conditions are imposed on parolees upon their release on parole without their consent since the parole statutes (e.g., P.C. § 3067) were amended to eliminate the a need for parolee's actual consent (Stats. 2012, ch. 43, § 49). A parolee's lack of consent is therefore irrelevant. (People v. Schmitz (2012) 55 Cal.4th 909, 919-921, and fn. 9.)

The amendment to P.C. § 3067, eliminating the requirement that the inmate agree in writing to search and seizure conditions, was effective as of 6/27/2012.

Parole: A condition of all paroles, after the parolee has been released from prison, is that the parolee submit to searches by his or her parole officer, or "other peace officer at any time of the day or night, with or without a search warrant and with or without cause." (Cal. Code of Regs, Title 15, § 2511; P.C. § 3067(a); People v. Hernandez (1964) 229 Cal.App.2nd 143; People v. Perkins (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 454, 472; People v. Cervantes (2017) 11 Cal.App.5th 860, 869, fn. 9; Sharp v. County of Orange (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 901, 905-906.)

Statutory Authorization: P.C. § 3000(a)(1) provides that; "The Legislature finds and declares that the period immediately following incarceration is critical to successful reintegration of the offender into society and to positive citizenship. It is in the interest surveillance of parolees . . ."

"A search of a parolee that complies with the terms of a valid search condition will usually be deemed reasonable under the Fourth Amendment." (United States v. Korte (9th Cir. 2019) 918 F.3rd 750, 754; quoting United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2017) 859 F.3rd 1175, 1183.)

Constitutionality: California's statutory warrantless, suspicionless, search condition for parolees (i.e., P.C. § 3067(b)(3)) has been held to be constitutional by the United State Supreme Court. (Samson v. California (2006) 547 U.S. 843 [126 S.Ct. 2193; 165 L.Ed.2nd 250].)

"The State of California imposes expansive search conditions on its parolees. Pursuant to Cal. Penal Code § 3067(b)(3), every parolee under the state's supervision 'is subject to search or seizure . . . at any time of the day or night, with or without a search warrant or with or without cause.' In Samson v. California, the Supreme Court held that this broad provision satisfies the mandates of the Fourth Amendment, as the state's interests in public safety and reintegration outweigh the privacy interests of its parolees. 547 U.S. 843, 857, . . ." (United States v. Estrella (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 958, 964.)

Areas Subject to Search: Property is subject to a parolee's search conditions when the parolee "exhibit(s) a sufficiently strong connection to (the property in question) to demonstrate 'control' over it." (United States v. Korte (9th Cir. 2019) 918 F.3rd 750, 754; quoting United States v. Grandberry (9th Cir. 2013) 730 F.3rd 968, 980.)

The California Supreme Court has noted that a parolee controls property based on "the nexus between the parolee and the area or items searched," which includes a consideration of the "nature of that area or item" and "how close and accessible the area or item is to the parolee." (United States v. Korte, supra, at pp. 754-755; citing People v. Schmitz (2012) 55 Cal. 4th 909.)

In Korte, the trunk of defendant's rented car was held to be subject to his parolee search and seizure conditions.

There was no Fourth Amendment violation from a warrantless parole search of defendant's cellphone, as permitted by Pen. Code § 3067, because any expectation of privacy that defendant may have had in the contents of his cellphone did not outweigh the government's interest. The officers knew that defendant was on parole and had specific reasons for suspecting that defendant was involved in a residential burglary because of video surveillance evidence they had showing that a burglary involved defendant's truck and two individuals, one of whom bore a very close resemblance to defendant. (People v. DelRio (2020) 54 Cal.App.5th 47.)

Pen. Code § 3067(c) vs. Cal. Code of Regs, Title 15, § 2511:

Pen. Code § 3067 applies, by its terms (subd. (c)), to any parolee whose offense for which he or she is paroled occurred on or after January 1, 1997, as well as prison inmates released on what is known as "postrelease community supervision." Otherwise, the language of Cal. Code of Regs, Title 15, § 2511 controls.

For parolees whose offense for which he or she is on parole occurred before 1/1/1997: "You and your residence and any property under your control may be searched without a warrant at any time by any agent of the Department of Corrections or any law enforcement officer." (Cal. Code of Regs, Title 15 § 2511)

> The language in this parole condition that allows for a search of property "under (the parolee's) control," when the place to be searched is a residence, does not allow for the search of a third-party's residence even though the parolee is a frequent visitor and even though there is evidence that he is dealing drugs out of that third-party's residence. (United States v. Grandberry (9th Cir. 2013) 730 F.3rd 968, 980-982,)
> However, the trunk of a suspect's rented car is property under his control, and is subject to a warrantless search under the terms of the defendant's parole conditions. (United States v. Korte (9th Cir. 2019) 918 F.3rd 750, 754-755; noting that where the search of a vehicle is allowed, this includes the trunk to that vehicle.)

For parolees whose offense for which he or she is on parole occurred on or after 1/1/1997 and prison inmates released on "postrelease community supervision." Any inmate released on parole or postrelease community supervision must agree in writing "to be subject to search or seizure by a parole officer or other peace officer at any time of the day or night, with or without a search warrant and with or without cause." (Pen. Code § 3067(a))

Note: "Parole," pursuant to Pen. Code § 3067, is to be differentiated from what is colloquially known as "Sheriff's Parole," which, pursuant to Pen. Code § 3081(b), permits county boards of parole commissioners to release on parole prisoners sentenced within their counties "upon those conditions and under those rules and regulations as may seem fit and proper for his or her rehabilitation." (See People v. Taggart (2019) 31 Cal.App.5th 607; holding that leaving the jurisdiction in violation of her conditions as imposed by the county board of parole while on "sheriff's parole" was not an escape, pursuant to Pen. Code § 4532(b)(1).) Such a parole may not include search and seizure conditions. And no known case discusses the enforceability of such conditions if they are in fact imposed by a county board of parole.

Officer's Prior Knowledge: Note United States v. Caseres (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1064, at pp. 1075-1076, which erroneously held that an officer conducting a parole search must have been aware prior to the search that Pen. Code § 3067(a) was applicable to the defendant, i.e., that the prior conviction leading to his parole status occurred on or after January 1, 1997.

Note: While an officer's prior knowledge that a suspect is subject to some search and seizure condition is necessary (See "Searching While In Ignorance of a Search Condition," below), there's no basis in that law for the argument that the officer know that it was a parole, verses a probation, search condition, or that Pen. Code § 3067(a) was applicable as opposed to some other legal authority for the search.

California case law appears to disagree with the Ninth Circuit's United States v. Caseres decision. (See People v. Solorzano (2007) 153 Cal.App.4th 1026, 1030-1032; citing People v. Middleton (2005) 131 Cal.App.4th 732; it is not necessary that the searching officer was aware of the existence of a signed parole search agreement, as required by Pen. Code § 3067, so long as he knew that the subject was on parole. See also People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 868-869.)

Note: In that the language of Pen. Code § 3067(a) is substantially similar to that of Cal. Code of Regs, Title 15 § 2511, the arresting officers' knowledge of the date of the prior conviction should be irrelevant on the issue of the legality of a parolee's Fourth waiver search.

The warrantless searches of defendant's person and truck were not justified under the Fourth Amendment, as probation searches, even though the officers had been told by dispatch that defendant was on probation but did not convey any information indicating that defendant was subject to search terms as a condition of his probation. Application of the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule was not supported by either an officer's subjective belief that all probationers were subject to search terms or by the trial court's factually unsupported assertion that 99.9 percent of probationers were subject to search terms. (People v. Rosas (2020) 50 Cal.App.5th 17.)

However, see "Searching While In Ignorance of a Search Condition," below.

Use of a Global Positioning System; GPS:

The warrantless placing of a GPS device on defendant's vehicle, when defendant was on parole pursuant to the terms of Pen. Code § 3067(a), where he was "subject to search or seizure by a parole officer or other peace officer any time of the day or night, with or without a search warrant or with or without cause, (of) (y)ou, your residence, and any property under your control," was held to be lawful. United States v. Korte (9th Cir. 2019) 918 F.3rd 750, 755-757; citing People v. Zichwic (2001) 94 Cal.App.4th 944, a "pinging" case, as in accord.)

Note: The legality of obtaining of defendant's resulting "CSLI" (cell site location information) via a court order, pursuant to the "Stored Communications Act" (18 U.S.C. § 2703(d)), instead of a search warrant (now required pursuant to Carpenter v. United States (June 22, 2018) 585 U.S. __, __ [138 S.Ct. 2206; 201 L.Ed.2nd 507], was not decided, upholding the use of the court order instead of a search warrant under the good faith exception, relying on prior authority for using a federal court order only. Post-Release Community Supervision Act of 2011*:

Supervision by County Probation: Felons released from custody who were sentenced under the "Post-Release Community Supervision Act of 2011," are subject to "post-release community supervision" ("PRCS") instead of state parole. They will be supervised by a county agency designated by the board of supervisors. In most, if not all, counties, this will be the county's probation department. (See the "Post-Release Community Supervision Act of 2011," Pen. Code §§ 3450 et seq.)

The federal Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has held that "the State's interest in supervising offenders placed on (PRCS) mandatory supervision is comparable to its interest in supervising parolees." (United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2017) 859 F.3rd 1175; United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2017) 875 F.3rd 1265, 1273, fn. 4.)

See Pen. Code § 3067: Inmates released from prison on "postrelease community supervision" are added to those inmates (i.e., those released on parole) who are subject to search and seizure by a parole officer or other peace officer at any time of the day or night, with or without a search warrant, and with or without cause.

"The Realignment Act" provides that a defendant sentenced to state prison is "subject to a mandatory period of supervision following release, either parole supervision by the state (§ 3000 et seq.), or postrelease community supervision by a county probation department. (§ 3450 et seq.)" (People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 863-873.)

"During the period of mandatory supervision, the defendant shall be supervised by the county probation officer in accordance with the terms, conditions, and procedures generally applicable to persons placed on probation, for the remaining unserved portion of the sentence imposed by the court." (Pen. Code § 1170(h)(5)(B))

Pen. Code § 3453: A Postrelease Community Supervision Agreement includes the following among its conditions:

(f): The person, and his or her residence and possessions, shall be subject to search at any time of the day or night, with or without a warrant, by an agent of the supervising county agency or by a peace officer.

This also allows for the warrantless withdrawal of a blood sample from a person subject to postrelease community supervision, in a DUI case, despite the lack of consent or exigent circumstances. (People v. Jones (2014) 231 Cal.App.4th 1257, 1265-1269.)

"A PRCS search condition, like a parole search condition, is imposed on all individuals subject to PRCS. (§ 3465.)" (People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 864; see also People v. Young (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 972, 979.)

"If a police officer knows an individual is on PRCS, he may lawfully detain that person for the purpose of searching him or her, so long as the detention and search are not arbitrary, capricious or harassing." (People v. Douglas, supra, at p. 863.)

"(A)n officer's knowledge that the individual is on PRCS is equivalent to knowledge that he or she is subject to a search condition." (Id., at p. 865.)

Also, "An officer 'knows' a subject is on PRCS if his belief is objectively reasonable." (Id., at p. 865.)

Lastly: "(W)e conclude that an individual who has been released from custody under PRCS is subject to search (and detention incident thereto) so long as the officer knows the individual is on PRCS."

An order revoking defendant's postrelease community supervision (PRCS) did not violate his due process rights because a "Morrissey-complaint" (Morrissey v. Brewer (1972) 408 U.S. 471 [92 S.Ct. 2593; 33 L.Ed.2nd 484].) informal hearing before the supervising agency had been held. The record did not suggest that the probation officer who conducted the probable cause hearing was involved in defendant's arrest. The order also did not violate defendant's equal protection rights on the ground that the procedure used to revoke his PRCS differed from that applied to a parole revocation, under Morrissey, because he had not shown that he was similarly situated to a state prison parolee. (People v. Gutierrez (2016) 245 Cal.App.4th 393, 399-404.)

Given the similarities between California's mandatory supervision and parole, and the State's comparably weighty interest in supervising offenders placed on both forms of supervision, the Fourth Amendment analysis in defendant's case was held to be governed by the line of precedent applicable to parolees. Because defendant was subject to mandatory supervision per Pen. Code § 1170(h)(5), enacted as part of California's Criminal Justice Realignment Act of 2011, the suspicionless search condition to which he was subject rendered the warrantless, suspicionless search of his hotel room reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The hotel room could be deemed a "premises" under defendant's control (differentiating it from a "residence"). Also, the district court, in sentencing defendant on the parole violation, did not abuse its discretion by imposing a supervised release condition requiring defendant to be subject to suspicionless searches. (United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2017) 859 F.3rd 1175.)

Probation: A condition of some (but not all) probationary terms is that the probationer submit to searches by a probation officer or any law enforcement officer without probable cause or a warrant. (People v. Mason (1971) 5 Cal.3rd 759, 763-764.)

Knights ((2001) 534 U.S. 112) at 119 ([122 S.Ct. 587; 151 L.Ed.2nd 497, 505],) 'Probation is not a right, but a privilege.' (People v. Bravo 43 Cal.3rd (600) at p. 608.) '[A] probationer who has been granted the privilege of probation on condition that he submit at any time to a warrantless search may have no reasonable expectation of traditional Fourth

Government Interests: Probationary searches advance at least two related government interests;

- Combating recidivism; and
- Helping probationers integrate back into the community.

General Principles: There are four general principles that relate to probationary Fourth waiver searches:

(1) Whether a search is reasonable must be determined based upon the circumstances known to the officer when the search is conducted.

(2) The rationale for warrantless probation searches is consent based.

(3) Because probation searches are undertaken to deter further offenses by the probationer and to ascertain whether he is complying with the terms of his probation, the scope of permitted search must be reasonably related to the purposes of probation.

(4) Whether the purpose of the search is to monitor the probationer or to serve some other law enforcement purpose, or both, the search in any case remains limited in scope to the terms articulated in the search clause.

(People v. Romeo (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 931, 449-450.)

Degree of Suspicion Required:

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has indicated that for a probationer, there must be at least a reasonable suspicion of renewed criminal activity in order for a warrantless probation search to be lawful. (Smith v. City of Santa Clara (9th Cir. 2017) 876 F.3rd 987, at page 993.) But in a footnote, the Court acknowledges that no suspicion at all may be okay, at least in a case where the probationer's original offense is for a serious or violent felony. (Fn. 6.)

California does not agree with the reasonable suspicion requirement, finding suspicionless searches to be lawful. (People v. Bravo (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 600; People v. Brown (1987) 191 Cal.App.3rd 761; see also People v. Reyes (1998) 19 Cal.4th 743, 748-749, commenting on Bravo.)

The Second Circuit Court of Appeal has held that a federal parolee's home was subject to a warrantless search despite the lack of a reasonable suspicion, and despite a local written policy directive specifically requiring a reasonable suspicion before conducting such a search. In this case, the federal probation (i.e., parole) officers received an anonymous tip that defendant illegally possessed firearms. Anonymous information is not enough, by itself, to constitute a reasonable suspicion. However, searching defendant's residence based upon an anonymous tip constituted "a search of a parolee . . . (that) is reasonably related to the parole officer's duties," which is all that is required. (United States v. Braggs (2nd Cir. 2021) 5 F.4th 183.)

See "Standard of Proof Required," below.

Statutory Authorization: Pen. Code § 1203.1(j): A court may impose any "reasonable conditions, as it may determine are fitting and proper to the end that justice may be done, . . . (and) for the reformation and rehabilitation of the probationer."

"(A) court when granting probation may impose 'reasonable conditions as it may determine are fitting and proper to the end that justice may be done, that amends may be made to society for breach of the law, for any injury done to any person resulting from that breach, and generally and specifically for the reformation and rehabilitation of the probationer.'" (People v. Leon (2010) 181 Cal.App.4th 943, 948-949; see also People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 863-873.)

"(A)dult probationers, in preference to incarceration, validly may consent to limitations upon their constitutional rights." (People v. Olguin (2008) 45 Cal.4th 375, 384.)

However; "(a) probation condition that imposes limitations on a person's constitutional rights must closely tailor those limitations to the purpose of the condition to avoid being invalidated as unconstitutionally overbroad." (In re Sheena K. (2007) 40 Cal.4th 875, 890.)

Although defendant had met a false imprisonment victim through social media several months before the crime, a probation condition upon conviction that allows law enforcement unrestricted computer searches for material prohibited by law was overbroad under the Fourth Amendment. Such a condition allows for searches of vast amounts of personal information unrelated to defendant's criminal conduct or his potential future criminality. A narrower means might include either requiring defendant o provide his social media account and passwords to his probation officer for monitoring, or restricting his use of, or access to, social media websites and applications without the prior approval of his probation officer. A condition requiring defendant not to delete his browser history was held to be valid, assuming a properly narrowed condition monitoring his use of social media can be fashioned. (People v. Appleton (2016) 245 Cal.App.4th 717, 721-728.)

Validity of a Fourth Waiver Condition: A Fourth Waiver condition of probation will be upheld unless:

- The waiver has no relationship to the crime for which the offender was convicted; and
- The waiver relates to conduct that is not in itself criminal; and
- The waiver is not reasonably related to preventing future criminality.

(See People v. Shimek (1988) 205 Cal.App.3rd 340, 342; People v. Lent (1975) 15 Cal.3rd 481, 486; In re Frank V. (1991) 233 Cal.App.3rd 12232, 1242; People v. Moret (2009) 180 Cal.App.4th 839, 845; People v. Olguin (2008) 45 Cal.4th 375, 379-380.)

> Note: The Supreme Court, in People v. Mason (1971) 5 Cal.3rd 759, erroneously listed these criteria in the disjunctive, when in fact they are to be considered in the conjunctive. (People v. Lent, supra, at p. 486, fn. 1.)

Federally, at least in the Ninth Circuit, it is required that "[w]here a condition of supervised release is not on the list of mandatory or discretionary conditions in the sentencing guidelines, notice is required before it is imposed." (United States v. Wise (9th Cir. 2004) 391 F.3rd 1027.)

> Under this theory, defendant's case was remanded for resentencing following a plea of guilty for unlawful importation of methamphetamine and heroin. The Ninth Circuit held that the district court erred by failing to give notice that it was contemplating imposing its broad search condition, requiring defendant to submit to suspicionless searches by any law enforcement officer, prior to imposing that condition in its oral pronouncement of sentence. (United States v. Reyes (9th Cir. 2021) 18 F.4th 1130.)

When the probationer is a juvenile, because the purpose of juvenile law is to rehabilitate (See W&I § 202(b)), the third of the above factors is perhaps the most important. (In re Tyrell J. (1994) 8 Cal.4th 68, 87, overruled on other grounds; see also In re Bonnie P. (1992) 10 Cal.App.4th 1079, 1089.)

> See "Juveniles," below.

A probation condition that requires the defendant to obtain the probation officer's approval of his residence has been held to be unconstitutionally overbroad. The condition was evidently intended to prevent the defendant from residing with his overprotective parents. Per the court: "The condition is all the more disturbing because it impinges on constitutional entitlements—the right to travel and freedom of association. Rather than being narrowly tailored to interfere as little as possible with these important rights, the restriction is extremely broad. The condition gives the probation officer the discretionary power . . . to banish [the defendant]. It has frequently been held that a sentencing court does not have this power. [Citations.]" (People v. Bauer (1989) 211 Cal.App.3rd 937.)

Unconstitutionally vague probation conditions may be cured by amending the conditions so that the probationer will know a particular association, place, or item is within a prohibited category. (People v. Gaines (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 1035].) "Even if a condition of probation has no relationship to the crime of which a defendant was convicted and involves conduct that is not itself criminal, the condition is valid as long as the condition is reasonably related to preventing future criminality." (People v. Olguin (2008) 45 Cal.4th 375, 379-380; upholding a probation condition requiring defendant, convicted of DUI-related charges, to notify the probation officer of the presence of any pets in his home.)

Probation conditions may require a gang member to provide his passwords to electronic devices and social media websites to allow warrantless searches. (People v. Ebertowski (2014) 228 Cal.App.4th 1170, 1174-1177.)

But it violates the Fifth Amendment self-incrimination privilege to require a probationer to waive his self-incrimination rights even if related to a sex-offender management program as mandated by P.C. § 1203.067. However, when a mandatory waiver of the defendant's psychotherapist-patient privilege is construed as requiring waiver only insofar as necessary to enable communication between the probation officer and the psychotherapist, such a condition was held to not be overbroad or in violation of defendant's constitutional right to privacy. (People v. Rebulloza (2015) 234 Cal.App.4th 1065.)

> Note: Review was granted, depublishing this case, on June 10, 2015, and is therefore not citable pending a decision by the California Supreme Court. (188 Cal. Rptr.3rd 372.) On May 10, 2017, the case was transferred to the Court of Appeal for the Sixth Appellate District for reconsideration in light of the decision in People v. Garcia (2017) 2 Cal.5th 792, below.

In People v. Garcia (2017) 2 Cal.5th 792, at pp. 800-814, a probation condition under Pen. Code §1203.067(b)(3), requiring waiver of the privilege against self-incrimination and participation in polygraph examinations, was held by the California Supreme Court not to violate the Fifth Amendment and is not overbroad, as interpreted to require that probationers answer all questions fully and truthfully, knowing that compelled responses cannot be used against them in a subsequent criminal proceeding. A probationer must be advised, before treatment begins, that no compelled statement (or the fruits thereof), elicited in the course of the mandatory sex offender management program, may be used against the probationer in a criminal prosecution. Also, mandating that sex offenders waive any psychotherapist-patient privilege does not violate the right to privacy as construed to intrude on the privilege only to the limited extent specified in the condition itself.

So long as a federal district court makes a factual finding establishing some nexus between defendant's computer use and one of the statutory goals articulated in the federal probation condition statutes (i.e., 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a)(2)(B), (C) or (D)), it is not an abuse of discretion to impose a condition of supervised release permitting the search of defendant's personal computers. The nexus was held to be sufficient in this case. (United States v. Bare (9th Cir. 2015) 806 F.3rd 1011, 1017-1019.)

Although defendant had met a false imprisonment victim through social media several months before the crime, a probation condition upon conviction that allows law enforcement unrestricted computer searches for material prohibited by law was overbroad under the Fourth Amendment. Such a condition allows for searches of vast amounts of personal information unrelated to defendant's criminal conduct or his potential future criminality. A narrower means might include either requiring defendant o provide his social media account and passwords to his probation officer for monitoring, or restricting his use of, or access to, social media websites and applications without the prior approval of his probation officer. A condition requiring defendant not to delete his browser history was held to be valid, assuming a properly narrowed condition monitoring his use of social media can be fashioned. (People v. Appleton (2016) 245 Cal.App.4th 717, 721-728.)

A search condition for a person on probation for burglary such as: "You are not to possess tools used for the express purpose of facilitating a burglary or theft such as pry bars, screw drivers, pick lock devices, universal keys or implements or other such devices without the express permission of your supervising probation officer," is too vague to be lawful. However, it will be upheld if rewritten to contain either an "express knowledge" element (e.g.: "(D)o not possess a tool that you know or reasonably should know is used to facilitate a burglary or theft."), or an express intent element (e.g.: "(D)o not possess a specified tool with the intent to commit a burglary or theft" or "do not possess a specified tool with the purpose of committing a burglary or theft.") (People v. Carreon (2016) 248 Cal.App.4th 866, 881-883.)

Upon conviction for attempted robbery and assault by means of force likely to cause great bodily injury, the trial court did not abuse its discretion under Pen. Code § 1203.1(j) in concluding that an electronics-search probation condition was reasonable under Lent because, given defendant's unique family and personal history (e.g., suicides, drug use, gang affiliation, economic stress), it would allow the probation department to effectively supervise defendant. The probation condition satisfied constitutional standards because infringement on defendant's privacy rights was outweighed by the State's strong need to closely monitor his conduct and protect public safety. Also, there were no facts showing defendant's electronics contained the type of private information meriting heightened protection or that a search of those devices would be more intrusive than a warrantless search of his home, to which defendant had not objected. The record did not support the argument that the probation condition was unnecessarily broad or would result in an unjustified invasion of defendant's privacy rights. (People v. Trujillo (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 574, 582-589.)

Following his conviction for domestic abuse, defendant was placed on probation with a condition authorizing the search of "electronic storage devices" such as cellular phones and computers, under his control. Defendant appealed and challenged the validity of the condition on the grounds that (1) the condition was unreasonable under People v. Lent (1975) 15 Cal.3rd 481, because it bore no relationship to his current offense or potential future criminality; (2) the condition was unconstitutional under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments because his privacy and privilege against self-incrimination far outweigh the State's interests, and also infringes on the privacy interests of third parties; and (3) the condition was unconstitutionally overbroad because its potential impact on his Fourth Amendment rights exceeds what is reasonably necessary to serve the government's legitimate interest in ensuring that he complies with the terms of his probation. The Court rejected defendant's first two claims but agreed that the condition was nonetheless unconstitutionally overbroad. Per the Court, even though the electronic storage device search condition was reasonable under Lent because it served to help ensure that defendant obeys all laws, the condition was not sufficiently narrowly tailored to pass constitutional muster. The condition's broad language "permitted unprecedented intrusion into his private affairs—and it does so on a record that demonstrates little likelihood, or even possibility, that evidence of illegal activity will be found in the devices the condition subjects to a warrantless search." There was no evidence in the record that electronic devices played any role in defendant's crime. "Under these circumstances, there appear[ed] to be no substantial reason for believing that evidence of future criminal activity by defendant is likely to be found on electronic storage devices under his control." Thus, the Court concluded that on the record in this case the electronic storage device search condition was unconstitutionally overbroad because its potential impact on defendant's Fourth Amendment rights exceeds what is reasonably necessary to serve the government's legitimate interest in ensuring that he complied with the terms of his probation. (People v. Valdivia (2017) 16 Cal.App.5th 1130.)

After pleading guilty to felony vandalism with gang enhancements, defendant was placed on probation with a number of conditions including that he "[s]ubmit person, vehicle, residence, property, personal effects, computers and recordable media . . . to search at any time with or without a warrant, and with or without reasonable cause, when required by P.O. [i.e., a probation officer] or law enforcement officer." Defendant challenged the electronics condition (in italics, above). The court upheld the validity of this condition in that it "related to preventing future criminality." (People v. Acosta (2018) 20 Cal.App.5th 225, 228-237.)

A warrantless seizure of a blood sample against defendant's wishes did not violate U.S. Const., 4th Amendment, because as a condition of probation in a prior driving under the influence case, defendant had expressly agreed that if he were arrested for drunk driving, he would not refuse to submit to a chemical test of his blood. When he did refuse, the officer was legally justified in having blood drawn anyway, so long as the procedure was performed in a reasonable manner. (People v. Cruz (2019) 34 Cal.App.5th 764; noting (at p. 772) that the right to take a blood sample was based upon more than merely California's implied consent law or a general Fourth Amendment waiver of his search and seizure rights to his "person, vehicle, place of residence, and belongings.")

> The Court cites the California Supreme Court decision of People v. Simon (2016) 1 Cal.5th 98, at p. 120, where it was noted that it has yet to be determined whether a general probationary search and seizure condition of defendant's "person," by itself, was sufficient to allow for a warrantless blood draw.

However, see People v. Jones (2014) 231 Cal.App.4th 1257, at p. 1266, where it was held that the defendant, being subject to general search and seizure conditions under his "post-release community supervision" (PRCS) terms, eliminated the need for a search warrant to extract a blood sample in a DUI case. With probable cause to believe that he was driving while under the influence of alcohol when he had a traffic accident, his mandatory PRCS search and seizure conditions, authorizing the blood draw without the necessity of a search warrant, was not in violation of the Fourth Amendment.

After pleading guilty to a charge of identity theft (Pen. Code § 530.5(c)(3)), defendant appealed from the imposition of a probation condition allowing warrantless searches of his electronic devices and accounts. The Court affirmed, despite the instant crime not involving the use of electronics or digital accounts. The court noted that a probation search condition is valid if it helps deter further offenses or helps ascertain probation compliance. "While nothing in the record indicates that defendant used an electronic device to (commit identity theft), the trial court's finding that electronic devices can facilitate the commission of identity theft crimes is not outside the bounds of reason." The Court also rejected claims that the conditions violated the defendant's expectations of privacy, his privilege against self-incrimination, and California Electronic Communications Privacy Act (Pen. Code §§ 1546 et seq.) (People v. Wright (2019) 37 Cal.App.5th 120: It is also noted that the People submitted a declaration by a financial crimes detective, who averred a synergy between identity theft and digital technology.)

Defendant committed a string of burglaries, later claiming that he was under the influence of marijuana and not "think[ing] clearly." His probation included drug terms and an electronics search term limited to whether or not he was "boasting" online about marijuana. Applying People v. Lent, supra, the California Supreme Court found the electronics search term improper because it was not "reasonably related to future criminality." The court noted that the minor did not use electronics to commit crimes, nor had he boasted online about drugs. "[T]he burden it imposes on Ricardo's privacy is substantially disproportionate to the condition's goal of monitoring and deterring drug use." "In virtually every case, one could hypothesize that monitoring a probationer's electronic devices and social media might deter or prevent future criminal conduct." A dissenting opinion took issue with an "unduly exacting proportionality assessment," which will tend to undermine the juvenile court's quasi-parental oversight responsibilities. (In re Ricardo P. (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1113.)

> See "Juveniles and Electronic Device and/or Social Media Probation Conditions," below.

Where defendant pled guilty to grand theft of personal property under Pen. Code § 487(a), after stealing cellphones and other electronic devices, the Appellate Court held that an electronics search condition was reasonable because there is a relationship between the theft of electronic devices and the imposition of an electronic device search condition. Also, defendant forfeited an unconstitutional overbreadth challenge because he failed to raise it below and it was an as-applied challenge. (People v. Patton (2019) 41 Cal.App.5th 934.)

Under the Lent test, a condition of mandatory supervision imposed under Pen. Code § 1170, requiring defendant—who was convicted of possessing a firearm—to submit to searches of his text messages, emails, and photographs on any cellular phone or other electronic device in his possession or residence, was invalid because it imposed a significant burden on his privacy interest and there was no information connecting it with preventing future criminality. There was no evidence that defendant used any electronic device to promote gang activity or to suggest that his phone must be monitored for drug sales. (People v. Bryant (2019) 42 Cal.App.5th 839.)

Conditions of defendant's supervised release requiring that he support his dependents and meet other family responsibilities, that he work regularly at a lawful occupation, and that he notify third parties of risks that may be occasioned by his criminal record or personal history or characteristics were unconstitutionally vague. (United States v. Ped (9th Cir. 2019) 943 F.3rd 427, 432-434.)

A probation condition compelling defendant to submit electronic devices for search at any time was overly burdensome. Mere convenience in monitoring a parolee's conduct, coupled with generic descriptions of how some people use cellphones, were held to not be sufficient to render this burden on defendant's privacy interests reasonable. (People v. Cota (2020) 45 Cal.App.5th 786, 789-791.)

Upon being convicted of making harassing electronic communications (Pen. Code § 653m(b)), the trial court placed defendant on three years' probation with conditions (1) prohibiting him from using or accessing social media Web sites and (2) allowing warrantless searches of his communication devices. The condition of probation prohibiting access to social media Web sites and applications was held to be sufficiently tailored to the state's legitimate interest in reformation and rehabilitation of defendant who was convicted for making harassing electronic communications, because defendant used social media to perpetrate the crime. He gathered information on the victim and had inappropriate contacts with the victim's friends through social media, and continued to use social media to discuss the case even after conviction. However, the electronic search condition was held to be illegal in that it impinged on defendant's Fourth Amendment rights because it could potentially expose a large volume of data that had nothing to do with illegal activity. The state's interests in preventing communication with the victim and fostering rehabilitation could be served through narrower means. (People v. Prowell (2020) 48 Cal.App.5th 1094.)

It was conceded on appeal that a condition of probation to "[c]onsult with the Probation Officer without hesitation when you are in need of advice" is unconstitutionally vague and unenforceable. (In re Anthony L. (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 438, 455-456.)

Defendant, convicted of illegally distributing drugs, contested a probation condition requiring him to provide access to his cell phones or electronic devices and all passwords to any social media accounts and applications. On appeal, the search condition was not to be overbroad or vague because the relationship between drug distribution under Health & Safety Code § 11352, and the use of cell phones was more than abstract or hypothetical, given that police found three cell phones in the car and defendant admitted that two were his. The condition did not require defendant to open applications for the probation officer, and it limited searches to cell phones and electronic devices. The conditions were held to be sufficiently precise for defendant to know what is required of him and for the court to determine whether he had violated the condition. (People v. Castellanos (2020) 51 Cal.App.5th 267.)
In a capital case, defendant contended that the trial court erred by denying his motion to suppress evidence seized during a warrantless Fourth waiver probation search of his home, arguing that his wavier was invalid because it was not furnished to him in writing and there was no direct evidence presented at the suppression hearing—whether through the sentencing transcript or witness testimony—that he knowingly, freely, and voluntarily consented to warrantless searches when agreed to be placed on probation. The Court rejected defendant's argument, finding substantial evidence (via the clerk's minutes) supporting the trial court's determination that when defendant was placed on probation, he freely, voluntarily, and knowingly waived his Fourth Amendment rights as a condition of probation. Per the Court: "In addition to the clerk's minutes indicating the court advised defendant of the consequences of his plea, defendant told officers he was subject to a probation search condition when they entered his home. His acknowledgment of the condition to officers suggested he understood the advisals applied. The clerk's minutes and defendant's acknowledgment belie his assertion that he was not furnished with or did not sign the disposition/minute order. Defendant was also invited to present evidence that ordinary advisements were not provided, and he declined to do so." Based upon this evidence, defendant's motion to suppress was properly denied. (People v. Vargas (2020) 9 Cal.5th 793, 813-816.)

The defendant's casual use of marijuana, having no substantiated relationship to the theft of a car, under People v. Lent (1975) 15 Cal.3rd 481, the Appellate Court invalidated the trial court imposed marijuana-related conditions of probation. "What is missing is some indication that [defendant] is predisposed or more likely to commit crimes when under the influence of marijuana." (People v. Cruz (2020) 54 Cal.App.5th 707.)

Conditions of mandatory supervision imposed following a jail sentence as part of a post-realignment split sentence (Pen. Code § 1170(h)(5)) are evaluated under the Lent test for reasonableness applicable to probation conditions, rather than tests applicable to parole conditions, in that the mandatory supervision scheme is similar to a probation scheme when it comes to conditions as both involve individualized discretion as to each particular case. Here, after being convicted of concealing a firearm in a vehicle, and over defendant's objection, the trial court imposed the following electronic-related condition: "Defendant is to submit to search of any electronic device either in his possession[,] including cell phone[,] and/or any device in his place of residence. Any search by probation is limited to defendant[']s text messages, emails, and photos on such devices." The Court of Appeal's rejection of this electronics-related search condition was affirmed. However, the California Supreme Court emphasized that "this case-specific outcome should not be read to 'categorically invalidate electronics search conditions. In certain cases, the [defendant's] offense or personal history may provide the . . . court with a sufficient factual basis from which it can determine that an electronics search condition is a proportional means of deterring the [defendant] from future criminality.' [Citation.]" The Chief Justice concurred, noting: (1) This case didn't overrule prior cases holding that some conditions are reasonable under Lent based solely on the offense of conviction with no further case-specific balancing of benefits and burdens; (2) a condition that fails as a probation condition under Lent may not necessarily fail as a condition of mandatory supervision given the differences in the schemes; and (3) the burdensome nature of a sweeping electronics search condition, like the one here, may be addressed by tailoring conditions to specific data or devices. (People v. Bryant (2021) 11 Cal.5th 976.)

The language of the specific Fourth Waiver condition must be considered. There being no statutorily-required standard language, a court is free to limit the search and seizure conditions as it deems to be appropriate under the circumstances. A judge who wishes to impose some unusual restrictions on law enforcement officers' powers to conduct Fourth Waiver searches has the legal authority to do so. (People v. Bravo (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 600, 607, fn. 6.)

> "Where a probation search is challenged, an officer's knowledge that the defendant was on probation and subject to search alone may be insufficient to determine the search was reasonable because 'probation search clauses are not worded uniformly' and 'judges may limit the scope of the defendant's consent to searches for particular contraband, such as drugs or stolen property, or place spatial limits on where searches may take place.'" (People v. Thomas (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1107, 1114; quoting People v. Romeo (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 931, 951.)
> Any limitations in the conditions are binding on the searching officers. For instance, a search and seizure condition specifically limited to narcotics cannot be used to justify a search for stolen property. (People v. Howard (1984) 162 Cal.App.3rd 8.)
>
> However, so long as the area being searched could contain items allowed to be searched for under the terms of the Fourth Waiver, the officer's subjective intent (e.g., searching for stolen property where only a search for narcotics was authorized) is irrelevant, and the search will be upheld. (People v. Gomez (2005) 130 Cal.App.4th 1008.)
>
> Some Fourth Waivers include language authorizing a warrantless search only "upon request," "as requested," or "whenever requested." Even though ordinarily the defendant need not be present during the search (People v Lilienthal (1978) 22 Cal.3rd 891, 900.), courts have interpreted the above language to mean that the probationer must either be present, or at least be notified beforehand about an impending search. If he is not, the resulting evidence will be suppressed. (See People v. Mason (1971) 5 Cal.3rd 759, 763; People v. Superior Court* [Stevens] (1974) 12 Cal.3rd 858, 861.)

See People v. Romeo (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 931, 946-949, where the prosecution's failure to offer evidence of the scope of two residents' probation conditions resulted in an incomplete record as to what could be searched, resulting in suppression of all evidence found in the residence.

Fourth waiver probation conditions, such as; to "submit [his] person and property, including any residence, premises, container or vehicle under [his] control to search and seizure," held not to reasonably include defendant's cellphone. (United States v. Lara (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 605, 609-612: "Just as it makes no sense to call a cell phone a 'container' for purposes of a search incident to arrest (Riley [v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373, 393-394 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430].]) or search of an automobile (Camou [(9th Cir. 2014) 773 F.3rd 932.]), it makes no sense to call a cell phone a 'container' for purposes of a probation search." [Italics added])

> A cellphone also held not to come within the category of "property." (United States v. Lara, supra, at p. 609.)

The Fourth District Court of Appeal (Div. 1) has held that when interpreting a minor's conditions of probation, reference to defendant's "property," as "reasonably construed, does not include "electronic data." (In re I.V. (2017) 11 Cal.App.5th 249, 259-263; citing United States v. Lara, supra.)

However, see People v. Sandee (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 294, at pages 302-304, where the Court noted that because the Ninth Circuit uses a balancing test, while California uses an objective test, in analyzing whether the probationer consented to the search by accepting the specific probation search conditions at issue (see pg. 303, fn. 6), United States v. Lara, supra, is not persuasive authority and does not preclude a finding that the search of text messages contained in defendant's cellphone was lawful under defendant's Fourth waiver conditions allowing for the search of her "property" and "personal effects."

> The Court further noted at pages 304 and 305, that the events in Sandee took place before enactment of the Electronic Communications Privacy Act, which took effect on January 1, 2016. The Act provides that the > government shall not "[a]ccess electronic device information by means of physical interaction or electronic communication with the electronic device" unless one of several statutory exceptions applies, including obtaining the specific consent of the authorized possessor of the device. (Pen. Code § 1546.1(a)(3) & (c)(4))

> It is further noted, however, that the Act provides an exception to the above prohibition, effective January 1, 2017: A government entity may physically access electronic device information "[e]xcept where prohibited by state or federal law, if the device is seized from an authorized possessor of the device who is subject to an electronic device search as a clear and unambiguous condition of probation, mandatory supervision, or pretrial release." (Id., Pen. Code § 1546.1(c)(10))

Recognizing that "the government's interest in supervising parolees is 'substantial,'" more so than with probationers, the Ninth Circuit differentiated its decision in Lara (as well as Riley) and held that a parolee's cellphone was subject to a warrantless search. The fact that the warrantless search of defendant's phone was delayed by three days after his arrest was held not to be unreasonable. (United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2017) 875 F.3rd 1265, 1273-1276.)

> The Court also noted that while the severity of the crimes for which an arrestee is on parole should probably be a consideration, it is not practical for officers to be held to a requirement that they check a parolee's criminal history before conducting a warrantless search of his cellphone. Therefore, defendant's status as a parolee by itself was held to be sufficient to justify a warrantless search of his cellphone. (Id., at p. 1275.)
> The Court further noted that this defendant's search and seizure conditions, imposed by statute under P.C. § 3067 where he was subject to search "at any time of the day or night, with or without a search warrant or with or without cause, . . . sweeps more broadly than the probation search condition at issue in Lara, . . ." (referring to United States v. Lara (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 605, where "containers" and "property" where held not to include cellphones.)

There was no Fourth Amendment violation from a warrantless parole search of defendant's cellphone, as permitted by Pen. Code § 3067, because any expectation of privacy that defendant may have had in the contents of his cellphone did not outweigh the government's interest. The officers knew that defendant was on parole and had specific reasons for suspecting that defendant was involved in a residential burglary because of video surveillance evidence they had showing that a burglary involved defendant's truck and two individuals, one of whom bore a very close resemblance to defendant. (People v. DelRio (2020) 54 Cal.App.5th 47: It was not argued that "to any property under your control" did not include defendant's cellphone.

See also United States v. Wood (7th Cir. IL 2021) 16 F.4th 529, following the weight of authority, holding that a parolee's cellphone was subject to a warrantless search, at least where (under Illinois statutes) there was a reasonable suspicion that the parolee was violating the law and subject to revocation.

In a case in which defendant challenged the trial court imposition of probation conditions, the appellate court concluded the imposition of a condition requiring defendant's consent to searches of his electronic devices was not an abuse of discretion, as the condition was tailored with sufficient specificity to avoid unconstitutionally intruding on defendant's Fourth Amendment rights. A probation condition prohibiting defendant from entering or posting to social media sites also was not an abuse of discretion. However, a portion of the conditions restricting defendant's use of the Internet was unconstitutionally overbroad in violation of defendant's First Amendment rights. The general restriction against Internet access swept far more broadly than necessary to serve the purposes of the condition; i.e., preventing or deterring contact with minors for sexual purposes. (People v. Salvador (2022) 83 Cal.App.5th 57.)

Juvenile Probationers: Juvenile probationers may also be subjected to a Fourth Waiver requirement. (In re Tyrell J. (1994) 8 Cal.4th 68, 87, overruled on other grounds.)

General Rules:

> "'The state, when it asserts jurisdiction over a minor, stands in the shoes of the parents' [citation], thereby occupying a 'unique role . . . in caring for the minor's well-being.' [Citation.] . . . [¶]The permissible scope of discretion in formulating terms of juvenile probation is even greater than that allowed for adults. '[E]ven where there is an invasion of protected freedoms "the power of the state to control the conduct of children reaches beyond the scope of its authority over adults . . . ."' [Citation.] This is because juveniles are deemed to be 'more in need of guidance and supervision than adults, and because a minor's constitutional rights are more circumscribed.' [Citation.] Thus, '"'a condition of probation that would be unconstitutional or otherwise improper for an adult probationer may be permissible for a minor under the supervision of the juvenile court.'"' [Citations.]" (In re Erica R. (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 907, 911-912; quoting In re Victor L. (2010) 182 Cal.App.4th 902, 909-910.) The "special needs" of the juvenile probation system, with its "goal of rehabilitating youngsters who have transgressed the law, a goal that is arguably stronger than in the adult context," allows for stricter controls. (In re Tyrell J., supra, overruled on other grounds.)

So long as the conditions imposed are tailored specifically to meet the needs of the juvenile concerned, taking into account not only the circumstances of the crime but the juvenile's entire social history, probationary conditions, even which otherwise infringe upon the constitutional rights of the juvenile, will be upheld. (In re Binh L. (1992) 5 Cal.App.4th 194, 203-205.)

But the Juvenile Court's discretion is not unlimited. A probation condition is invalid if it (1) has no relationship to the crime of which the offender was convicted, (2) relates to conduct which is not in itself criminal, and (3) requires or forbids conduct which is not reasonably related to future criminality. (In re Malik J. (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 896, 901; quoting People v. Lent (1975) 15 Cal.3rd 481, 486.)

Statutory Authority:

Wel. & Insti. Code § 727 provides that "[i]f a minor is adjudged a ward of the court on the ground that he or she is a person described by Section 601 or 602, the court may make any reasonable orders for the care, supervision, custody, conduct, maintenance, and support of the minor, including medical treatment, subject to further order of the court." (Subd. (a)(1)) Subd. (a)(2) authorizes the court, in its discretion, to place a ward on probation without the supervision of the probation officer, and to impose "reasonable conditions of behavior as may be appropriate under this disposition." In all other cases, however, "the court shall order the care, custody, and control of the minor to be under the supervision of the probation officer . . . ." (Subd. (a)(3))

Wel. & Insti. Code § 730(b): "The court may impose and require any and all reasonable conditions that it may determine are fitting and proper to the end that justice may be done and the reformation and rehabilitation of the ward enhanced." (See In re Malik J. (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 896, 900.)

Wel. & Insti. Code §§ 790 et seq., which provides for a post-plea diversion program, mandates a Fourth Amendment waiver as a condition in every grant of deferred entry of judgment (W&I § 794).

Diversion in a pre-plea situation pursuant to W&I §§ 654 and 654.2, however, placing a juvenile on informal probation, does not provide for the imposition of a Fourth waiver. Absent statutory authority to do so, a court, therefore, is prohibited from imposing a Fourth waiver on a juvenile under such circumstances. (Derick B. v. Superior Court* [People] (2009) 180 Cal.App.4th 295.)

Juveniles and Electronic Device and/or Social Media Probation Conditions:

First District: The First District Court of Appeal's various divisions have issued a series of published decisions in rapid succession discussing the legality of imposing conditions of probation that include the warrantless searches of a minor's electronic devices and the requirement that the minor provide a probation officer with the minor's passwords to those devices.

In re Erica R. (First Dist. Div. 2, 2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 907: Defendant juvenile admitted to the misdemeanor possession of ecstasy after a school counselor found a baggie of pills in her purse, the trial court imposed as a condition of probation that she be required to submit to a search of her electronic devices and to provide her passwords to her probation officer. Defendant challenged these conditions as unreasonable under People v. Lent (1975) 15 Cal.3rd 481, 486. The court concluded that because there was no evidence connecting her electronic device or social media usage to her offense or to a risk of future criminal conduct, the conditions were unreasonable. (In re Erica R., at pp. 911-915.)

> Under Lent, which applies to both juvenile and adult probationers, a condition is invalid if it; (1) has no relationship to the crime of which the offender was convicted, (2) relates to conduct which is not in itself criminal, and (3) requires or forbids conduct which is not reasonably related to future criminality. (Id, at p. 912.)

In re Malik J. (First Dist. Div. 3, 2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 896: The Court upheld probation conditions to the extent that they required defendant to permit searches of electronic devices in his possession, but found those conditions requiring family members to comply, and also the portion requiring defendant to provide passwords to social media accounts, to be overbroad. With respect to the passwords to social media sites, the court noted that officers do not have the unfettered right to retrieve any information accessible from electronic devices in a probationer's possession, information stored in a remote location cannot be considered in the probationer's possession nor entirely within his or her control, and access to remotely stored information may also implicate privacy interests of third persons. In examining such devices, officers must first disable the device from any Internet or cellular connection in order to limit the search to information stored on the device, in the probationer's possession, and subject to his or her control. (Id, at pp. 900-906.)

> Note People v. Sandee (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th 294, 299, fn. 3, where the court's approval of a detective using a Fourth waiver condition as the grounds for viewing defendant's text messages was limited to just the text messages. Foreshadowing the possible suppression of more obscure information from a cellphone, the Court warned: "(T)his case does not present the issue of whether a probation search condition permits law enforcement to use a cell phone to access other type of data that may raise third party privacy concerns, such as using the cell phone connection to access a shared databases or social networking site with restricted access."

In re Patrick F. (First Dist. Div. 5, 2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 104: Where the juvenile was determined to be a ward of the court for having committed a second degree burglary, but told his probation officer that he used marijuana frequently and had committed the burglary to get money to buy his marijuana, the conditions of his probation reasonably included a search term requiring the juvenile to submit any electronic devices and passwords under his control to search by a probation officer or a peace officer with or without a search warrant as such a condition was reasonably related to monitoring his future criminality. However, the condition was overbroad as drafted in that it did not limit the types of data (whether on the phone or accessible through the phone) that could be searched. While the juvenile's privacy interest in the information contained in his electronic devices was trumped by the State's interest in effectively monitoring his probation, that interest was trumped only to the extent the information was reasonably likely to yield evidence of drug use and other criminal activity or noncompliance with his probation conditions. The Court further held that the juvenile lacked standing to raise the privacy interest of third parties who might be affected by his search conditions.

In re J.B. (First Dist. Div. 3, 2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 749, 753-759: Where defendant admitted to the crime of petty theft, the juvenile court imposed a condition of probation that required him to permit searches of, and disclose all passwords to, his electronic devices and social media sites. The Court of Appeal found such a condition, under the circumstances, and according to the criteria set out in People v. Lent (1975) 15 Cal.3rd 481, to be unreasonable. In this case, the challenged electronic search condition had no relationship to the crime of petty theft or to the specific offense that minor admitted committing. There was no evidence in the record that the minor used e-mail, texting or social networking websites to facilitate his offense. The court's suggestion that the minor may have used "the Internet to arrange to meet in a certain place with the idea of stealing items" was pure speculation. (Id., at p. 754.)

In re Alejandro R. (First Dist. Div. 1, 2015) 243 Cal.App.4th 556, 561-570: An electronics search condition imposed under W&I Code § 730(b) against defendant juvenile who admitted to being an accessory to illegal drug sales was valid under Lent, supra, in that it was imposed with the goal of preventing defendant from selling and consuming illegal drugs. However, the condition was overbroad as imposed in that it permitted officers to review all sorts of private information that was highly unlikely to shed any light on whether defendant was complying with the other conditions of his probation, drug-related or otherwise. To satisfy the juvenile court's concern that defendant might use a cellphone and social media to communicate about drug use and sales, the scope of the condition must be limited to programs used for interpersonal communication (e.g., such as text messages, voicemail messages, photographs, e-mail accounts, and social media accounts.). The Court also upheld a condition that defendant must attend school, finding it to be neither vague nor overbroad.

In re Mark C. (First Dist. Div. 2, 2016) 244 Cal.App.4th 520, 526-535: A probation condition requiring a juvenile to submit to warrantless searches of his electronics, including passwords, was held to be invalid under Lent in that there was no relationship between the condition and the underlying offense of possessing a prohibited knife on school grounds. Using electronic devices is not in itself criminal. Nor is using password-protected services such as social media criminal, nor is it reasonably related to any future criminality by the juvenile.

In re A.S. (First Dist. Div. 5, 2016) 245 Cal.App.4th 758: As part of probation, defendant juvenile was ordered to submit her electronics, including passwords, to warrantless searches by law enforcement. The Court of Appeal noted this condition imposed by the same judge had been reversed or modified in a number of other cases. But, under the circumstances of this case, the condition was reasonable. "[T]he electronic search condition is reasonably related to deterring future criminality because it facilitates the type and level of supervision of (defendant) which is absolutely necessary for her to succeed on probation."

In re P.O. (First Dist. Div. 1, 2016) 246 Cal.App.4th 288: Defendant was granted probation with a condition that he provide his electronic passwords to his probation officer. Defendant appealed arguing that the condition was unreasonable and unconstitutionally overbroad. Noting the various cases with inconsistent holdings and referencing various cases on this issue pending in the Supreme Court, the Court here held the condition in this case was not unreasonable because it was reasonably related to future criminality. However, it was still overbroad because it was not narrowly tailored to further defendant's rehabilitation. The court modified that condition and also struck conditions requiring "good behavior" and "good citizenship" as unconstitutionally vague.

In re Juan R. (First Dist. Div. 5, 2018) 22 Cal.App.5th 1083: Defendant/minor was declared a ward of the juvenile court and placed on supervised probation with specified terms and conditions. One of those conditions was as follows: "Submit to search of electronic devices at any time of the day or night by any law enforcement officer, probation officer, or mandatory supervision officer with or without a warrant, probable cause or reasonable suspicion including cell phones over which the minor has control over or access to for electronic communication content information likely to reveal evidence that the minor is continuing his criminal activities and is continuing his association via text or social media with co-companions. This search should be confined to areas of the electronic devices including social media accounts, applications, websites where such evidence of criminality [or] probation violation may be found. . . . The minor must provide access/passwords to those electronic devices, accounts, applications, websites to any law enforcement officer, probation officer or mandatory supervision officer." Minor attacked the constitutionality of this condition as being overbroad. The Court of Appeal rejected this claim and upheld the condition.

In re L.O. (First Dist. Div. 4, 2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 706: A probation condition prohibiting the minor from gaining access to, or using any social networking site was modified because while there doubtless were circumstances in which it was appropriate to restrict a probationer's access to social media, an absolute prohibition that admitted to no exception was held to be unconstitutionally overbroad on its face.

In re Amber K. (First Dist. Div. 2, 2020) 45 Cal.App.5th 559: The record did not show a relationship between defendant minor's use of electronic devices and the offending conduct sufficient to justify an electronic search condition. An assault that defendant had committed was filmed by fellow students and distributed on social media. However, there was no evidence that defendant arranged for the filming or distribution. Also, although there was evidence that the victim used electronic devices and social media to communicate about defendant, the only information in the record concerning defendant's use of social media was the district attorney's statement that defendant posted about the fight after it took place. The electronic search condition burdened defendant's privacy in a manner substantially disproportionate to the legitimate interest in monitoring her compliance with a no-contact order.

In re David C. (First Dist. Div. 3, 2020) 47 Cal.App.5th 657, 661-665: In an indecent exposure case under Pen. Code, § 314, an electronics search condition should not have been included in a probation condition requiring that the minor participate in sex offender counseling if recommended by a treatment provider because it was not reasonably related to future criminality, given that the charge did not involve electronics. The condition was not meaningfully narrowed by confining it to areas of devices where evidence likely to reveal probation violations might be found. However, a polygraph condition was proper because it was adequately limited. The scope of any examination directed by minor's treatment provider would be for purposes of psychological assessment as part of minor's treatment and counseling.

In re Cesar G. (First Dist. Div. 2, Feb. 10, 2022) 74 Cal.App.5th 1039: The juvenile court did not abuse its discretion under Welf. & Inst. Code § 730, subd. (b), by imposing a search condition on a minor who pleaded no contest to alcohol-related reckless driving and was adjudged a ward of the court and placed on probation because the burdens imposed on the minor were not unreasonable or disproportionate in light of legitimate interests in the minor's rehabilitation preventing future criminal behavior. Also, although nothing prevented the minor's parents from requiring the minor to reimburse them for costs they incurred, which they did, and the Juvenile Court could support such efforts by the parents, the Juvenile Court erred in not ordering the probation department to pay the fees for the minor to attend sobriety programs because there was no authority under Welf. & Inst. Code § 903, or any other statute, to order the minor to pay.

Second District:

In a delinquency proceeding arising from the minor's use of a racial slur against a teacher who tried to stop a fight, it was reasonable under W&I Code § 730 to require, as a condition of probation, that the minor's electronic devices be subject to search because that condition would allow law enforcement to monitor the minor's compliance with the other conditions, specifically, that he refrain from using drugs, threatening others with violence, and visiting school grounds without prior approval. The condition was not overbroad because it was limited to digital communication in the form of text messages, voice mail messages, social media accounts, call logs, photographs, e-mail accounts and internet browsing history. That limitation reduced the likelihood that law enforcement would access medical records, financial information or other data unrelated to criminal activity. (In re J.G. (2nd Dist. Div. 6, 2019) 33 Cal.App.5th 1084.)

Note: On October 23, 2019, this case was transferred back to the Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division Six, with directions to vacate its decision and reconsider the cause in light of In re Ricardo P. (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1113, below: See "Validity of a Fourth Waiver Condition," above.

Fourth District:

Conditions of probation restricting defendant minor's use of electronics or requiring the submission of those electronics to search were held to be reasonably related to his supervision, under valid under Lent, and were constitutional. The contested conditions reasonably related to the probation department's supervision of defendant in that compliance with these conditions provided the probation department with the practical information necessary to enforce the uncontested conditions. The sentencing court could reasonably infer an increased risk that defendant, who demonstrated a sexual attraction to children, would seek to possess child pornography or contact potential victims via the Internet as the result of the attraction he demonstrated. The conditions the Juvenile Court imposed on defendant would deter him from reoffending. (In re George F. (Fourth Dist., Div. 1, 2016) 248 Cal.App.4th 734.)

A condition of probation allowing searches of a minor's electronic devices was not a facially overbroad restriction of constitutional rights because certain probationers might require more intensive supervision and monitoring based on the specific facts of the case. A condition limiting the minor's use of computers, the Internet, and social networking Web sites was also not facially overbroad because, in certain circumstances, a complete prohibition on the use of a probationer's access to social networking Web sites during the term of probation could be a close fit. (In re J.S. (Fourth Dist., Div. 1, 2019) 37 Cal.App.5th 402.)

> Note: On October 23, 2019, this case was transferred back to the Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, Division One, with directions to vacate its decision and reconsider the cause in light of In re Ricardo P. (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1113, below: See "Validity of a Fourth Waiver Condition," above.

A minor's failure to object in the trial court to a probation condition under Welf. & Inst. Code, § 730, was held to have forfeited a challenge on appeal on the basis that it was vague to require him to submit searches of his property, in that the phrase "any property" might encompass electronic devices. Under the facts of the case, including that one of the offenses was striking an elderly man to steal his cell phone, the question should have been asked of the juvenile court. It was not unconstitutionally vague to require that, when traveling with other minors, the minor be accompanied by "a parent or legal guardian, a responsible adult." It was sufficiently clear that a "responsible adult" was an adult with a supervisory role, given that the minor had committed a violent robbery when accompanied by a juvenile friend. (In re R.S. (Fourth District, Div. 1, 2017) 11 Cal.App.5th 239.)

Sixth District:

> After admitting to felony possession of child pornography, Pen. Code, § 311.11, subd. (a), and extortion, Pen. Code, §§ 518, 520, a minor was properly required, as a condition of probation, to submit to electronic searches and to provide passwords because there was a direct relationship between his use of an electronic device his offenses, which arose from recording photographs and video on his cellular phone of sexual activity between himself and another minor and later extorting money from the other minor by threatening to disclose the recordings to other students at their high school. (In re Q.R. (Sixth District, 2020) 44 Cal.App.5th 696.)

The California Supreme Court finally resolved some of the issues raised in the above cases:

> Defendant committed a string of burglaries, later claiming that he was under the influence of marijuana and not "think[ing] clearly." His probation included drug terms and an electronics search term limited to whether or not he was "boasting" online about marijuana. Applying People v. Lent, supra, the California Supreme Court found the electronics search term improper because it was not "reasonably related to future criminality." The court noted that the minor did not use electronics to commit crimes, nor had he boasted online about drugs. "[T]he burden it imposes on Ricardo's privacy is substantially disproportionate to the condition's goal of monitoring and deterring drug use." "In virtually every case, one could hypothesize that monitoring a probationer's electronic devices and social media might deter or prevent future criminal conduct." A dissenting opinion took issue with an "unduly exacting proportionality assessment," which will tend to undermine the juvenile court's quasi-parental oversight responsibilities. (In re Ricardo P. (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1113.)

First Amendment Issues:

> A court may restrict a minor's use of social media, such as by prohibiting him from using it to talk about his offense, in a narrowly tailored probation condition affecting this First Amendment freedom of expression rights. (In re A.A. (Second Dist., Div. 6, 2018) 30 Cal.App.5th 596.)
>
> > In A.A., The Court held that no First Amendment violation arose from prohibiting a minor, as a condition of probation, from discussing on social media his adjudication for battery with serious bodily injury. The restriction, which allowed the minor to use other speech forums, was precise, narrow, and reasonably tailored to address posting conduct and rehabilitation. Also, it was not rendered overbroad by prohibiting use of social media to express remorse, to praise the juvenile justice system, or to inform friends and family about the progress of the case.

Differences Between Parole and Probation: Although there is some authority for the argument that the rules are the same, whether discussing the issue of a parole search or a probation search, when a Fourth Waiver is the issue (see People v. Hoeninghaus (2004) 120 Cal.App.4th 1180, 1192-1198.), the United States Supreme Court has indicated that parolees have a lesser expectation of privacy than probationers, hinting that they (i.e., parolees) therefore may be subjected to stricter controls. (Samson v. California (2006) 547 U.S. 843, 850 [126 S.Ct. 2193; 165 L.Ed.2nd 250].)

> The state "has an overwhelming interest in supervising parolees because parolees . . . are more likely to commit future criminal offenses." (Id., at p. 853. See also United States v. Sullivan (9th Cir. 2015) 797 F.3rd 623, 634; and People v. Perkins (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 454, 473, citing Pennsylvania Board of Probation and Parole v. States v. Job (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 852, 859-860; and United States v. Korte (9th Cir. 2019) 918 F.3rd 750, 754.)

Given the similarities between California's mandatory supervision and parole, and the State's comparably weighty interest in supervising offenders placed on both forms of supervision, the Fourth Amendment analysis in defendant's case was held to be governed by the line of precedent applicable to parolees. Because defendant was subject to mandatory supervision per Pen. Code § 1170(h)(5), enacted as part of California's Criminal Justice Realignment Act of 2011, the suspicionless search condition to which he was subject rendered the warrantless, suspicionless search of his hotel room reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The hotel room could be deemed a "premises" under defendant's control. Also, the district court, in sentencing defendant on the parole violation, did not abuse its discretion by imposing a supervised release condition requiring defendant to be subject to suspicionless searches. (United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2017) 859 F.3rd 1175.)

California courts are in accord, holding that a split sentence under Pen. Code § 1170(h)(5) is "akin to a state prison commitment," and that mandatory supervision is therefore "more similar to parole than probation." (See People v. Martinez (2014) 226 Cal.App.4th 759, 763; quoting People v. Fandinola (2013) 221 Cal.App.4th 1415, 1422-1423.)

"Parolees, 'have severely diminished expectations of privacy by virtue of their status,' Samson v. California, 547 U.S. 843, 852, 126 S.Ct. 2193, 165 L. Ed. 2d 250 (2006), and they may be subject to warrantless searches of their homes without a warrant or suspicion of wrongdoing." (United States v. Ped (9th Cir. 2019) 943 F.3rd 427, 430.)

A "Special Needs" Search: In either case (i.e., parole or probation), such a condition of parole or probation, commonly referred to as a "Fourth Waiver," is an important variance from the normal search and seizure rules.

"(T)he government may dispense with the warrant requirement in situations when '"special needs, beyond the normal need for law enforcement, make the warrant and probable cause requirement impracticable."'" (In re Tyrell J. (1994) 8 Cal.4th 68, 77, overruled on other grounds, citing Griffin v. Wisconsin (1987) 483 U.S. 868, 873 [107 S.Ct. 3164; 97 L.Ed.2nd 709, 717].)

A "Fourth Waiver," at least when applied to an adult probationer, is in effect a prior consent given by the probationer to submit his or her person, home, vehicle and other possessions to search or seizure by any probation officer or other law enforcement officer, any time, day or night, without requiring the searching probation officer or police officer to obtain a search warrant, or to demonstrate the existence of probable cause. It is a waiver of the subject's Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures. (See In re Tyrell J., supra, at pp. 79-80, overruled on other grounds; Vandenberg v. Superior Court (1970) 8 Cal.App.3rd 1048, 1053; People v. Bravo (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 600, 608-610; In re York (1995) 9 Cal.4th 1133, 1149; People v. Hernandez (1964) 229 Cal.App.2nd 143.)

As a result, considering the important governmental interest in operating probation or parole systems, as well as the need to protect the public, when balanced with the diminished expectation of privacy enjoyed by probationers and parolees, Fourth Waiver* searches are now commonly classified as "Special Needs" searches which may be reasonable despite the lack, in some instances, of any particularized suspicion justifying the search. (Griffin v. Wisconsin (1987) 483 U.S. 868, 875 [107 S.Ct. 3164; 97 L.Ed.2nd 709, 718]; In re Tyrell J., supra, at pp. 76-77, overruled on other grounds; People v. Reyes, supra, at pp. 748, 751-752.)

> Note: While a probationer is given a choice whether to accept the probation conditions (the alternative being incarceration), parolees and juveniles typically are not. The "prior consent" theory, therefore may be hard to justify with parolees and juveniles. Therefore, in such cases, the theory that one who has validly waived his or her Fourth Amendment rights has a diminished expectation of privacy as a result, as a "special needs" search, is perhaps a stronger justification. (In re Tyrell J., supra, at p. 86, overruled on other grounds; People v. Reyes (1998) 19 Cal.4th 743, 749-750.)

The United States Supreme Court, in Griffin v. Wisconsin, supra, at p. 876 [97 L.Ed.2nd at p. 719], found three reasons supporting the conclusion that the operation of a probation system presented such "special needs:"

- A warrant requirement would interfere to an appreciable degree with the probation system, setting up a magistrate rather than the probation officer as the judge of how close the supervision the probationer requires.

- The delay inherent in obtaining a warrant would make it more difficult for probation officials to respond quickly to evidence of misconduct.

- A warrant and probable cause requirement would reduce the deterrent effect that the possibility of expeditious searches would otherwise create.

See also the concurring opinion in United States v. Crawford (9th Cir. 2004) 372 F.3rd 1048, at pages 1066-1072, describing a parole Fourth Waiver search as a "special needs" search.

However, the United States Supreme Court, in Samson v. California (2006) 547 U.S. 843, 852, fn. 3 [126 S.Ct. 2193; 165 L.Ed.2nd 250], declined to decide whether a parole Fourth Waiver involved a "special need."

Diversion in a pre-plea situation pursuant to W&I §§ 654 and 654.2, however, placing a juvenile on informal probation, does not provide for the imposition of a Fourth waiver. Absent statutory authority to do so, a court, therefore, is prohibited from imposing a Fourth waiver on a juvenile under such circumstances. (Derick B. v. Superior Court* [People] (2009) 180 Cal.App.4th 295.)

See Smith v. City of Santa Clara (9th Cir. 2017) 876 F.3rd 987, at pages 991-994; differentiating pure "consent" searches (e.g., Georgia v. Randolph (2006) 547 U.S. 103 [126 S.Ct. 1515; 164 L.Ed.2nd 208].) from Fourth waiver "special needs" searches.

The warrantless search of a parolee may be classified under both a "special needs" search and a search based upon the parolee's lessened expectation of privacy. (See United States v. Sweeney (6th Cir. OH 2018) 891 F.3rd 232.)

Veh. Code § 23154: Person on Probation for a Prior Driving Under the Influence (DUI) Conviction:

(a) It is unlawful for a person who is on probation for a violation of Section 23152 or 23153 to operate a motor vehicle at any time with a blood-alcohol concentration of 0.01 percent or greater, as measured by a preliminary alcohol screening test or other chemical test.

(b) A person may be found to be in violation of subdivision (a) if the person was, at the time of driving, on probation for a violation of Section 23152 or 23153, and the trier of fact finds that the person had consumed an alcoholic beverage and was driving a vehicle with a blood-alcohol concentration of 0.01 percent or greater, as measured by a preliminary alcohol screening test or other chemical test.

(c)

(1) A person who is on probation for a violation of Section 23152 or 23153 who drives a motor vehicle is deemed to have given his or her consent to a preliminary alcohol screening (i.e., a "PAS") test or other chemical test for the purpose of determining the presence of alcohol in the person, if lawfully detained for an alleged violation of subdivision (a).

(2) The testing shall be incidental to a lawful detention and administered at the direction of a peace officer having reasonable cause to believe the person is driving a motor vehicle in violation of subdivision (a).

(3) The person shall be told that his or her failure to submit to, or the failure to complete, a preliminary alcohol screening test or other chemical test as requested will result in the suspension or revocation of the person's privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a period of one year to three years, as provided in Section 13353.1.

Pre-Trial Fourth Waiver:

Similar Fourth Waivers may also be imposed as a condition of an "O.R." (i.e., "Own Recognizance") release pending trial, and have been held to be lawful if reasonably related under the circumstances of a particular case to the prevention and detection of further crime and to the safety of the public. (In re York (1995) 9 Cal.4th 1133.)

The Ninth Circuit disagrees, holding that a Fourth Waiver cannot be imposed on a pretrial defendant as a condition of release. (United States v. Scott (9th Cir. 2005) 450 F.3rd 863.)

However, a trial court lacks inherent authority to impose conditions of bail once a defendant posts the scheduled bail amount. The court distinguished such a situation from releasing a defendant on his or her own recognizance (OR), because OR release does permit a court to impose reasonable conditions of bail. In this case, the court struck the Fourth waiver as a condition of bail. A concurring justice believed that trial courts do have inherent authority to impose conditions of bail, even when the scheduled amount is posted. (In re Webb (2018) 20 Cal.App.5th 44, 51-56.)

Warrantless Blood-Draws of a DUI Probationer/Parolee Suspect:

> Where defendant's blood was taken over his objection and without a warrant and without exigent circumstances, Missouri v. McNeely (2013) 569 U.S. 141 [133 S.Ct. 1552; 185 L.Ed.2nd 696], held that a blood draw is illegal. However, where defendant is subject to search and seizure conditions under his "post-release community supervision" (PRCS) terms, there is no need for a search warrant. With probable cause to believe that he was driving while under the influence of alcohol when he had a traffic accident, his mandatory PRCS search and seizure conditions, authorizing the blood draw without the necessity of a search warrant, is not in violation of the Fourth Amendment. (People v. Jones (2014) 231 Cal.App.4th 1257, 1262-1269.)

Taking a DNA Sample:

> Where defendant, who was on searchable parole, is arrested on rape charges, and officers extracted a DNA sample without a search warrant, defendant's later motion to suppress the results of the DNA test was properly denied by the trial court. The undisputed evidence showed that that search was "not arbitrary, capricious, or harassing." The prosecution bore the burden of establishing the search was reasonable, and it met that burden in this case beyond a reasonable doubt. (People v. Perkins (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 454, 471-474.)

Constitutionality: The advanced waiver of Fourth Amendment rights, imposed as a condition of accepting probation or parole, has been held to be constitutional. (Zap v. United States (1946) 328 U.S. 624 [66 S.Ct. 1277; 90 L.Ed. 1477]; People v. Mason (1971) 5 Cal.3rd 759, 764-765.)

Expectation of Privacy:

> While a number of legal theories, including "prior consent" and "special needs" (see above), have justified the upholding the legality of Fourth Waiver searches over the years, another theory espoused by some courts is that persons subject to a Fourth Waiver have a reduced expectation of privacy, depriving them of any "standing" to object to the search. (People v. Valasquez (1993) 21 Cal.App.4th 555, 558; People v. Viers (1991) 1 Cal.App.4th 990, 993; People v. Biddinger (1996) 41 Cal.App.4th 1219; People v. Ramos (2004) 34 Cal.4th 494, 504-506; Samson v. California (2006) 547 U.S. 843 [126 S.Ct. 2193; 165 L.Ed.2nd 260]; People v. Smith (2009) 172 Cal.App.4th 1354, 1360-1361.)
>
> However, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has taken it a step further and specifically held that a probationer (which has a higher expectation of privacy than does a parolee) who's probationary offense was for anything other than a violent felony, cannot be searched based upon a Fourth waiver alone. (United States v. Job (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 852, 859-865.)

Note: This conclusion is not supported by any other case law. While there is no California state case to the contrary, there are many cases where a Fourth waiver suspect was on probation for a non-violent offense—even misdemeanors—where the lawfulness of a suspicionless search was upheld without debate. (See "Standard of Proof Required," immediately below.)

Standard of Proof Required:

Probation: A probation search with no warrant, probable cause, or even a reasonable suspicion, so long as it does not exceed the scope of the consent given, and is not done for purposes of harassment or some arbitrary or capricious reason, meets, in the opinion of the California Supreme Court, both federal (Fourth Amendment) and state (Art. 1, § 13) constitutional requirements. (People v. Bravo (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 600; People v. Brown (1987) 191 Cal.App.3rd 761; see also People v. Reyes (1998) 19 Cal.4th 743, 748-749, commenting on Bravo.)

This includes juvenile probation. (In re Tyrell J. (1994) 8 Cal.4th 68, overruled on other grounds.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has, as a rule, assumed that, at the very least, a "reasonable suspicion" of renewed criminal activity is required for both parole and probation Fourth Waivers. (See United States v. Stokes (9th Cir. 2002) 292 F.3rd 964; "reasonable suspicion" found, so the issue not discussed.)

However, most recently, the Ninth Circuit has conceded that the issue of whether a Fourth waiver search may be conducted where there is less than a reasonable suspicion is really not yet settled, at least sufficiently to hold an officer civilly liable. (Motley v. Parks (9th Cir. 2005) 432 F.3rd 1072, 1083-1088; officers entitled to qualified immunity on this issue. See below.)

The U.S. Supreme Court has specifically left open the question whether or not a probationer on a Fourth Waiver may be searched on less than a reasonable suspicion. (United States v. Knights (2001) 534 U.S. 112, 120, fn. 6. [122 S.Ct. 587; 151 L.Ed.2nd 497]; see also United States v. King (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 805, 808; and Smith v. City of Santa Clara (9th Cir. 2017) 876 F.3rd 987, 993, fn. 6.)

Until the U.S. Supreme Court does rule on this issue, it is acknowledged that the California rule is that no suspicion is needed to conduct a Fourth waiver search on a probationer. (People v. Medina (2007) 158 Cal.App.4th 1571; probationers having "consented" to warrantless, suspicionless searches.)

But in Samson v. California (2006) 547 U.S. 843 [126 S.Ct. 2193; 165 L.Ed.2nd 260], the Supreme Court hinted strongly that although a suspicionless search of a parolee is constitutional, probationers probably have more rights than parolees and may require a higher (i.e., a "reasonable suspicion") standard.

> See also United States v. Lara (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 605, 610; "(A) probationer's privacy interest is greater than a parolee's," citing Samson, supra, at p. 850.)

Where a probation order clearly expressed a suspicionless search condition, defendant was unambiguously informed of it, and he accepted it, a suspicionless search of his residence was held to be lawful. Defendant's acceptance of the search condition significantly diminished his reasonable expectation of privacy. The search conducted in the present case intruded on defendant's legitimate expectation of privacy only slightly and the governmental interests at stake were substantial. (United States v. King (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 805, 808-810.)

> The King court ruled that because California courts have interpreted the following as not requiring any suspicion, citing People v. Bravo (1987) 43 Cal. 3rd 600, and People v. Woods (1999) 21 Cal. 4th 668, and because suspicionless searches are constitutional, that when a probationer agrees to such a condition as a part of his probation, a suspicionless search of his person, property, premises and vehicle is therefore lawful: "Defendant is subject to a warrantless search condition, as to defendant's person, property, premises and vehicle, any time of the day or night, with or without probable cause, by any peace, parole or probation officer." (Ibid.)
> The term "suspicionless search" refers to a search for which the police have less than reasonable suspicion. The term covers both a search as to which there is some (but not enough) suspicion and a search that is, for example, conducted randomly with no individualized suspicion. (Id., at p. 806, fn. 1)
>
> However, the Ninth Circuit also is of the opinion that a probationer convicted of a non-violent offense, such as simple drug possession, has a "reasonable expectation of privacy (that) is greater than that of probationers such as King because he (defendant in the drug case) was not convicted of a particularly 'serious and intimate' offense." (United States v. Lara (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 605, 609-612.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has taken it a step further and specifically held that a probationer (which has a higher expectation of privacy than does a parolee) who's probationary offense was for anything other than a violent felony, cannot be searched based upon a Fourth waiver alone. (United States v. Job (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 852, 860.)

Parole: Older California case authority to the effect that a police officer needs a "reasonable suspicion" of renewed criminal activity before conducting a parole Fourth Waiver search (See People v. Burgener (1986) 41 Cal.3rd 505, 534-535.) was overruled in People v. Reyes (1998) 19 Cal.4th 743.

In Reyes, the California Supreme Court adopted the reasoning of In re Tyrell J. (1994) 8 Cal.4th 68 (overruled on other grounds), and, overruling Burgener, determined that as with juvenile probationers, parolees do not retain a reasonable expectation of privacy, and may therefore be searched even without even a "reasonable suspicion" of renewed criminal activity or other parole violation. (People v. Reyes, supra, at p. 754, citing New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985) 469 U.S. 325, 338 [105 S.Ct. 733; 83 L.Ed.2nd 720].)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal avoided deciding the issue in a number of recent cases. (See United States v. Crawford (2004) 372 F.3rd 1048; Moreno v. Baca (9th Cir. 2005) 431 F.3rd 633; and Motley v. Parks (9th Cir. 2005) 432 F.3rd 1072, 1083-1088.)

The United States Supreme Court has now unequivocally settled the rule, agreeing with California's analysis of this issue, at least as it relates to parolees. (Samson v. California (2006) 547 U.S. 843 [126 S.Ct. 2193; 165 L.Ed.2nd 260]; search of a parolee's person.)

See also United States v. Lopez (9th Cir. 2007) 474 F.3rd 1208, 1212-1214, where the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal followed Samson in finding that a suspicionless parole Fourth Waiver search of a parolee's residence was valid.

The Second Circuit Court of Appeal has held that a federal parolee's home was subject to a warrantless search despite the lack of a reasonable suspicion, and despite a local written policy directive specifically requiring a reasonable suspicion before conducting such a search. In this case, the federal probation (i.e., parole) officers received an anonymous tip that defendant illegally possessed firearms. Anonymous information is not enough, by itself, to constitute a reasonable suspicion. However, searching defendant's residence based upon an anonymous tip constituted "a search of a parolee . . . (that) is reasonably related to the parole officer's duties," which is all that is required. (United States v. Braggs (2nd Cir. 2021) 5 F.4th 183.)

"(L)aw enforcement officers do not possess unfettered discretion to detain and search suspected parolees. Two principles constrain an officer's authority to conduct a suspicionless parole search or seizure pursuant to Cal. Penal Code § 3067(b)(3). See United States v. Korte, 918 F.3rd 750, 754 n.1 (9th Cir. 2019); United States v. Grandberry, 730 F.3rd 968, 975 (9th Cir. 2013). First, law enforcement must know that the subject is on active parole before initiating a search or seizure pursuant to a parole condition. Moreno* (v. Baca (9th Cir. 2005)) 431 F.3rd (633) at 641. Second, the encounter must not violate California's statutory prohibition on 'arbitrary, capricious or harassing' searches. Korte, 918 F.3rd at 754 n.1; see Cal. Penal Code § 3067(d) ('It is not the intent of the Legislature to authorize law enforcement officers to conduct searches for the sole purpose of harassment.')." (United States v. Estrella (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 958, 965.)

Limitation*: *Searches Conducted for Purposes of Harassment:

Rule: A probationer (or parolee) subject to a search condition retains the right to be free from a search that is arbitrary, capricious or harassing. A search is arbitrary "when the motivation for the search is unrelated to rehabilitative, reformative or legitimate law enforcement purposes, or when the search is motivated by personal animosity toward the parolee." A search is a form of harassment when its motivation is a mere "whim or caprice." (People v. Reyes (1998) 19 Cal.4th 743, 754; People v. Medina (2007) 158 Cal.App.4th 1571, 1577.)

"Under California law, a search constitutes harassment if it is 'unrelated to rehabilitative, reformative or legitimate law enforcement purposes, or when the search is motivated by personal animosity toward the parolee.'" (United States v. Estrella (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 958, 972; quoting People v. Reyes (1998) 19 Cal.4th 743, 754; quoting in turn In re Anthony S. (1992) 4 Cal.App.4th 1000, 1004.)

Statutory Law, Referencing Parolees: Pen. Code § 3067(d): "It is not the intent of the Legislature to authorize law enforcement officers to conduct searches for the sole purpose of harassment."

Case Law:

"It is only when the motivation for the search is wholly arbitrary, when it is based merely on a whim or caprice or when there is no reasonable claim of a legitimate law enforcement purpose, e.g., an officer decides on a whim to stop the next red car he or she sees, that a search based on a probation search condition is unlawful." (People v. Cervantes (2002) 103 Cal.App.4th 1404, 1408.)

"Nor do we condone searches that are conducted for illegitimate reasons, such as harassment." (United States v. King (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 805, 810.)

The search of an individual's hotel room, when the individual was subject to the "mandatory supervision" provisions of "Post-Release Community Supervision Act of 2011," was held not to be an "arbitrary, capricious, or harassing" search when the officer had not had any prior contact with the defendant, there was no indication that the search had been conducted for an improper purpose, and it appeared to have been conducted solely for legitimate law-enforcement purposes. Also, the search was not conducted at an unreasonable time or in an unreasonable manner. (United States v. Cervantes (9th Cir. 2017) 859 F.3rd 1175.)

"(L)aw enforcement officers do not possess unfettered discretion to detain and search suspected parolees. Two principles constrain an officer's authority to conduct a suspicionless parole search or seizure pursuant to Cal. Penal Code § 3067(b)(3). See United States v. Korte, 918 F.3d 750, 754 n.1 (9th Cir. 2019); United States v. Grandberry, 730 F.3d 968, 975 (9th Cir. 2013). First, law enforcement must know that the subject is on active parole before initiating a search or seizure pursuant to a parole condition. Moreno (v. Baca (9th Cir. 2005) 431 F.3d (633) at 641. Second, the encounter must not violate California's statutory prohibition on 'arbitrary, capricious or harassing' searches. (United States v.) Korte ((9th Cir. 2019) 918 F.3d (750) at 754 n.1; see Cal. Penal Code § 3067(d) ('It is not the intent of the Legislature to authorize law enforcement officers to conduct searches for the sole purpose of harassment.')." (United States v. Estrella (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 958, 965.)

The United States Supreme Court found California's restrictions on arbitrary, capricious or harassing searches as an important ingredient in upholding the constitutionality of a suspicionless Fourth Waiver search of a parolee. (Samson v. California (2006) 547 U.S. 843 [126 S.Ct. 2193; 165 L.Ed.2nd 260].)

> The fact that a particular officer searched defendant twice within a 24-hour period, did not establish by itself that he was harassing him. The legitimate law enforcement purpose of the second search (after having found nothing illegal on defendant or in his car, less than 24 hours earlier) was substantiated by the fact that the officer knew defendant was on parole for a narcotics violation, that he associated with drug users, and because he was observed at the time of the second search in a high-narcotics area some 3½ to 4 miles from his home without any real reason for being there. (People v. Sardinas (2009) 170 Cal.App.4th 488.)

"This prohibition is decidedly narrow: 'It is only when the motivation for the search is wholly arbitrary, when it is based merely on a whim or caprice or when there is no reasonable claim of a legitimate law enforcement purpose . . . that a search based on a probation search condition is unlawful.'" (United States v. Estrella (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 958, 972; quoting People v. Cervantes (2002) 103 Cal.App.4th 1404, 1408.)

Examples of "Unreasonable" Searches:

Fourth Waiver searches have been held to be unreasonable if conducted too often, at an unreasonable time, when it is unreasonably prolonged, or for any other reasons establishing arbitrary or oppressive conduct by the searching officers. A search is arbitrary or oppressive when the motivation for the search is unrelated to a rehabilitative, reformative or legitimate law enforcement purpose, or when the search is motivated by personal animosity toward the parolee or probationer. (People v. Reyes, supra, at pp. 753-754; see also People v. Clower (1993) 16 Cal.App.4th 1737, 1741; United States v. Follette (S.D.N.Y. 1968) 282 F.Supp. 10, 13; and In re Anthony S. (1992) 4 Cal.App.4th 1000, 1004.)

A public strip search of a probationer or parolee may in fact be unreasonable, and grounds for suppression of the resulting evidence. However, where the parolee is moved to a location where he cannot be seen by members of the general public (behind the patrol car, with police officers blocking anyone's view), his pants lowered and the band on his underwear pulled back only to the extent necessary to see into his crotch area, such is not a strip search conducted in public. Under the circumstances, such a search was considered to be reasonable. (People v. Smith (2009) 172 Cal.App.4th 1354.)

Who May Conduct a Fourth Waiver Search*:

California Rule: California law is clear, as indicated by the terms of the standard Fourth Waiver conditions, probation and parole searches are not limited to probation and parole officers. Any law enforcement officer is typically authorized to conduct such searches. (People v. Mason (1971) 5 Cal.3rd 759, 766 [probation]; People v. Reyes (1998) 19 Cal.4th 743 [parole].)

A state probation officer confronted with an uncooperative, irate individual who was present in the house of a juvenile probationer during a

Fourth waiver search, when the detained visitor appeared to be a gang member and who was overly dressed for the weather, and who attempted to turn away and cover his stomach when ordered not to do so, lawfully patted down the suspect for weapons. (People v. Rios (2011) 193 Cal.App.4th 584, 598-600.)

The Court further determined that a probation officer has the legal authority to detain and patdown a non-probationer pursuant to P.C. § 830.5(a)(4) (i.e.; enforcing "violations of any penal provisions of law which are discovered while performing the usual or authorized duties of his or her employment.") (Id., at p. 600.)

Federal Rule: The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal's theory that Fourth Waiver searches are a rehabilitative tool for use by probation officers only, with local law enforcement's attempt to use a Fourth Waiver to justify a warrantless search as being no more than a "ruse" for conducting a new criminal investigation and a violation of the Fourth Amendment (e.g., see United States v. Ooley (9th Cir. 1997) 116 F.3rd 370; see also United States v. Stokes (9th Cir. 2002) 292 F.3rd 964; and United States v. Jarrad (9th Cir. 1985) 754 F.2nd 1451.), was overruled by the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Knights (2001) 534 U.S 112 [122 S.Ct. 587; 151 L.Ed.2nd 497], where the High Court approved California's broader rule of People v. Woods (1999) 21 Cal.4th 668, at p. 681; "whether the purpose of the search is to monitor the probationer or to serve some other law enforcement purpose."

Knights further approved probation searches by "by any probation officer or law enforcement officer." (Ibid.)

Need to Seek Permission from the Probation or Parole Officer:

Probation: It has long been the rule, at least in probation searches, that a local law enforcement officer need not seek the permission of a probation officer before conducting a probation Fourth Waiver search. (See People v. Mason (1971) 5 Cal.3rd 759.)

Note federal law is to the contrary, based on the terms of the Federal Probation Act, which is not applicable to state cases. (See United States v. Consuelo-Gonzalez (9th Cir. 1975) 521 F.2nd 259.)

Parole: Prior California authority to the effect that in a parole situation a local law enforcement officer must first receive authorization from the parole officer. (E.g., see People v. Coffman (1969) 2 Cal.App.3rd 681, 688-689; People v. Natale (1978) 77 Cal.App.3rd 568, 574.) This rule has arguably been overruled by People v. Reyes (1998) 19 Cal.4th 743, which finds the standards for probation and parole searches to be the same.

Even prior to Reyes, supra, there was some California authority that at least where seeking the prior approval of the parole officer would be a "meaningless formality," such as when "any parole officer who refused to authorize a search given an articulable reasonable suspicion of criminal activity 'would have been derelict in his duties,'" calling the parole officer is unnecessary. (People v. Brown (1989) Cal.App.3rd 187, 192.)

> Note: Despite the lack, under California law, of any legal requirement to contact the appropriate parole officer or office before undertaking a parole search, the California Department of Correction requests and recommends, in instances involving the search of a parolee's residence or business, that you do so anyway, for operational reasons as well for reasons of safety and cooperation.

The "Stalking Horse" Theory:

At least from the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, and at least as of 1985, still holds onto the theory that parole is a tool for parole authorities for controlling parolees, and not something that local law enforcement is entitled to use. (See United States v. Jarrad (9th Cir. 1985) 754 F.2nd 1451, 1453-1454; referring to a parole officer who authorizes a search at the request of the police as the police officers' agent, or "stalking horse;" see also Latta v. Fitzharris (9th Cir. 1975) 521 F.2nd 246, 247, and United States v. Hallman (3rd Cir. 1966) 365 F.2nd 289.)

> The U.S. Supreme Court's holding in United States v. Knights (2001) 534 U.S 112 [122 S.Ct. 587; 151 L.Ed.2nd 497], while not specifically addressing the issue, seems to disagree, approving a probation search by any law enforcement officer.

"Because a state's operation of its probation system presents 'special needs' beyond normal law enforcement which render impracticable the Fourth Amendment's usual warrant and probable cause requirements, probation searches conducted pursuant to state law satisfy the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness requirement. Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868, 872-80, 97 L. Ed. 2nd 709, 107 S. Ct. 3164 (1987). However, a probation search may not be used as a subterfuge for a criminal investigation. See Latta v. Fitzharris, 521 F.2nd 246, 249 (9th Cir.). . . . (Defendant) Watts argues that the district court should have suppressed the fruits of the probation search because Demmel (his probation officer) was acting as a 'stalking horse' for police when he authorized the search. We review for clear error the district court's factual determination that Demmel was not acting as a stalking horse. See United States v. Butcher, 926 F.2nd 811, 815 (9th Cir.). . . ; United States v. Jarrad, 754 F.2nd 1451, 1454 (9th Cir.). . . . (¶) A probation officer acts as a stalking horse if he conducts a probation search on prior request of and in concert with law enforcement officers. United States v. Richardson, 949 F.2nd 439, 441 (9th Cir.). . . . However, collaboration between a probation officer and police does not in itself render a probation search unlawful. See United States v. Harper, 928 F.2d 894, 897 (9th Cir. 1991) (parole officer was not a stalking horse simply because police helped him locate parolee); Jarrad, 754 F.2nd at 1454 (fact that police investigation preceded parole search does not render the search a subterfuge); United States v. Gordon, 540 F.2nd 452, 453 (9th Cir. 1976) (finding a lawful probation search even though Narcotics Task Force agents accompanied the probation officer to expedite the search). The appropriate inquiry is whether the probation officer used the probation search to help police evade the Fourth Amendment's usual warrant and probable cause requirements or whether the probation officer enlisted the police to assist his own legitimate objectives. Harper, 928 F.2nd at 897. A probation officer does not act as a stalking horse if he initiates the search in the performance of his duties as a probation officer. Butcher, 926 F.2nd at 815; Jarrad, 754 F.2d at 1454." (United States v. Watts (9th Cir. 1995) 67 F.3rd 790, 793-795.)

The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeal rejected the continuing validity of the "stalking horse" theory in United States v. Price (7th Cir. 2022) 28 F.4th 739, at least in this case and as a general rule. In Price, where defendant, as a convicted felon and while on parole, was attempting to buy ammunition and a magazine for a pistol he illegally possessed, the Court held:

> Evidence seized during the warrantless searches of defendant's vehicle and home were lawful, rejecting defendant's argument that it should have been suppressed under the "stalking horse" theory. As noted by the Court, a search under the stalking horse theory occurs when a parole or probationary search is conducted as "a subterfuge for a criminal investigation," evading the Fourth Amendment's warrant and probable cause requirements, In this case, defendant claimed that Special Agent Clancy, of the Indiana Department of Correction, violated the Fourth Amendment by using parole officers as pawns to conduct a search by calling them to the scene of the arrest and prompting them to conduct a warrantless search under the parole agreement that SA Clancy was not himself authorized to conduct. In Griffin v. Wisconsin (1987) 483 U.S. 868 [107 S.Ct. 3164; 97 L.Ed.2nd 709], decided in 1987, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the warrantless search of a probationer's residence after probation officers established reasonable grounds to believe the probationer was unlawfully in possession of firearms. The Court held that supervision of probationers is a "special need" of the State. Therefore, it was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment for the State to "depart from the usual warrant and probable cause requirements." Under Griffin, warrantless searches of probationers seemingly needed to be justified by the "special needs" of the state's probation system as opposed to police officers using a parole officer as a "stalking horse" to assist in an unrelated investigation. However, in United States v. Knights (2001) 534 U.S. 112 [122 S.Ct. 587; 151 L.Ed.2nd 497], decided in 2001, and Samson v. California (2006) 547 U.S. 843 [126 S.Ct. 2193; 165 L.Ed.2nd 250], decided in 2006, the Supreme Court held that warrantless probation and parole searches need not be based on "special needs," but can also be evaluated under the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness inquiry by considering the totality of the circumstances. Significantly, the Court noted that defendant Price did not point to a single federal appellate decision in which a search was invalidated under the stalking horse theory since the Court's rulings in Knights and Samson. In addition, the Court found that every other circuit court that has examined the stalking horse theory since Knights has either rejected it or limited its applicability to circumstances where the government relies solely on the "special needs" of a state's probationary or parole system as the basis for a search. In this case, because the government did not rely on the "special needs" of Indiana's parole system to justify the searches of defendant's property and residence, it was irrelevant whether parole officers initiated their searches of defendant's vehicle and residence of their own volition or at SA Clancy's request.

Searching While In Ignorance of a Search Condition: Whether a police officer must personally know of a probation or parole search and seizure condition (i.e., a "Fourth Waiver") before conducting a search in order for the search to be later declared "lawful" has been the subject of some debate.

Issue: When a police officer conducts a warrantless search of a person or that person's property or residence, which, as it turns out, is not supported by probable cause and/or exigent circumstances, and then belatedly discovers that the person being searched is subject to a probation or parole-imposed Fourth Waiver, may the search still be upheld?

Earlier Case Law tended to lean towards finding such searches to be lawful, at least if based upon a probation Fourth Waiver. (In re Tyrell J. (1994) 8 Cal.4th 68, 85; People v. Valasquez (1993) 21 Cal.App.4th 555.)

When dealing with a "parole search and seizure condition," the courts were not so prone to excusing the officer's failure to know of the existence of a Fourth Waiver. (See In re Martinez (1970) 1 Cal.3rd 641.)

Also, there was authority that an illegal arrest of someone subject to probationary search and seizure conditions does not result in suppression of any evidence recovered incident to the arrest, in that the subject has waived any right to seek suppression of the evidence seized. (People v. Valasquez, supra, at p. 559.)

Juvenile probationers have been held to the same standards as are adults (In re Marcellus L. (1991) 229 Cal.App.3rd 134 144-146; In re Tyrell J., supra, overruled on other grounds.), although, perhaps, for different reasons.

See People v. Lewis (1999) 74 Cal.App.4th 662, at pages 668-669, using In re Tyrell J. to uphold the warrantless entry into a residence and arrest of a parolee-at-large/robbery suspect in his home, holding that the arresting officer's lack of knowledge of the arrestee's probation Fourth Waiver was irrelevant.

Present State of the Rule:

The California Supreme Court ruled as recently as 1994 that a juvenile probationer, on the street, may be lawfully searched even though the officer does not discover until after the fact that he was on probation and subject to search and seizure conditions. (In re Tyrell J. (1994) 8 Cal.4th 68.)

However, the California Supreme Court refused to extend the rule of In re Tyrell J. to the search of a residence when it was belatedly discovered that the suspect's brother (and co-occupant) was subject to a Fourth Waiver, attaching more value to the privacy rights of a co-tenant who is not subject to search conditions. (People v. Robles (2000) 23 Cal.4th 789.)

Finally, recognizing that they might have gone too far in In re Tyrell J., supra, a majority of the Supreme Court invalidated the search of a residence as to both the co-tenant (who was not on a Fourth Waiver), and the suspect who was discovered, after the fact, to be on parole, and thus subject to search and seizure conditions. (People v. Sanders (2003) 31 Cal.4th 318.)

> While refusing to specifically overrule In re Tyrell J., the Court noted the "chilly reception" the decision has received, and, at the very least, limited it to its facts; i.e., the search of a juvenile's person, as opposed to the search of a residence in an adult case.

The First District Court of Appeal, in People v. Bowers (2004) 117 Cal.App.4th 1261, read Sanders as limiting the rule of In re Tyrell J. to juvenile cases, given the unique "special needs" of the juvenile court probation system. In an adult prosecution, whether of a parolee or a probationer, and irrespective of whether it is the subject's home or person (or, presumably, his vehicle or other personal possessions) that is being searched, not knowing of a Fourth Amendment search and seizure condition will preclude the use of such a waiver to save an otherwise illegal search. (People v. Bowers, supra, at pp. 1268-1269.)

> Myers v. Superior Court (2004) 124 Cal.App.4th 1247, is in accord, noting the Tyrell J. is limited to probation searches of a juvenile.

But the Fifth District Court of Appeal finally went all the way and took it upon itself, in effect (without specifically stating so), to overrule Tyrell J. and hold that a juvenile probationer, searched illegally, is protected by the rule of Sanders: An officer cannot rely upon a Fourth Waiver that he didn't know about at the time of the search whether the target of the search is an adult or a juvenile. (In re Joshua J. (2005) 129 Cal.App.4th 359.)

Since Sanders, courts have consistently ruled against the legality of searches done when the prosecution attempts to validate the search under the theory that the officer belatedly discovered that the defendant was subject to either probation or parole search and seizure conditions; i.e.:

> Searching law enforcement officers must be aware of a juvenile's waiver of his or her probationary search and seizure rights when searched after being stopped in a motor vehicle. (People v. Hester (2004) 119 Cal.App.4th 376, 392-405.)
>
> An otherwise illegal search of a residence is not saved by a belatedly discovered probation Fourth Waiver search and seizure condition. (People v. Bowers (2004) 117 Cal.App.4th 1261; see also People v. Lazalde (2004) 120 Cal.App.4th 858; a decision out of the Sixth Appellate District, involving an adult probationer and a motel room.)
>
> The illegal search of an adult on the street, where it was belatedly discovered that he was on a probation Fourth waiver, is not made retroactively valid. (People v. Hoeninghaus (2004) 120 Cal.App.4th 1180.)
>
> > It is irrelevant whether the Fourth Waiver is based upon a probationary, or a parole, search and seizure condition. The rule is the same. (Id., at pp. 1192-1198.)
> >
> > See also People v. Thomas (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1107, 1114-1115; "(T)he exception is inapplicable if police are > unaware of the probation search condition at the time of a warrantless search."

The same rule has been held to apply to the person of a parolee who is found in public. (People v. Jordan (2004) 121 Cal.App.4th 544, 552-553; see also People v. Bowers, supra.)

Where the issue of the officer's knowledge, or lack thereof, of a search and seizure condition was not resolved in the trial court (Sanders being decided after the hearing), a remand to the lower court for further evidence on this issue, and not reversal of the judgment, is the proper remedy for an appellate court. (People v. Moore (2006) 39 Cal.4th 168.)

If, however, the trial court record shows the officer's lack of prior information about the defendant's Fourth Waiver status, there is no need for a remand to the trial court for further hearings. (People v. Miller (2007) 146 Cal.App.4th 545.)

However, the taint of an illegal traffic stop may be attenuated by the existence of an outstanding arrest warrant (People v. Brendlin (2008) 45 Cal.4th 262; People v. Carter (2010) 182 Cal.App.4th 522, 529-530.) or a Fourth waiver (People v. Bates (2013) 222 Cal.App.4th 60, 65-71.), depending upon the circumstances.

> The Court in Brendlin held that in assessing whether an outstanding arrest warrant, discovered after the fact, was sufficient to attenuate the taint of an illegal traffic stop, the Court must look at what it referred to as the "Brown factors;" i.e., "the temporal proximity of the Fourth Amendment violation to the procurement of the challenged evidence, the presence of intervening circumstances, and the flagrancy of the official misconduct." (Id, at p. 269, citing Brown v. Illinois (1975) 422 U.S. 590, 604 [95 S.Ct. 2254; 45 L.Ed.2nd 41].)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal is in accord, noting that Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89], upholding "pretext stops," cannot be used to justify a detention or search based upon a belatedly discovered search condition. Per the Ninth Circuit, the theory of Whren is limited to those circumstances where a police officer is aware of facts that would support an arrest. "(A)lthough Whren stands for the proposition that a pretextual seizure based on the illegitimate subjective intentions of an officer may be permissible, it does not alter the fact that the pretext itself must be a constitutionally sufficient basis for the seizure and the facts supporting it must be known at the time it is conducted." (Moreno v. Baca (9th Cir. 2005) 431 F.3rd 633, 640.)

> "Police officers must know about a probationer's Fourth Amendment search waiver before they conduct a search in order for the waiver to serve as a justification for the search." (United States v. Job (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 852, 859-860.)
>
> See also United States v. Estrella (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 958, at p. 961: "As a threshold requirement, we have held that 'an officer must know of a detainee's parole status before that person can be detained and searched pursuant to a parole condition.'" (Quoting Moreno v. Baca, supra, at p. 641.)
>
> > The issue in Estrella was how precise that prior knowledge must be. See "The Prior Knowledge Requirement," below.

Finally, recognizing that the case law and legal commentary was uniformly in opposition to the rule of In re Tyrell J., the California Supreme Court reversed itself and held that a detention and search of a minor on probation with search and seizure conditions could not be justified by the belatedly discovered Fourth waiver. (In re Jaime P. (2006) 40 Cal.4th 128.)

A detective's "vague recollection" of having seen defendant's name on a postrelease community supervision (PRCS) list within the last two months, while remembering that he had arrested defendant on a weapons-related offense in 2011, was held to be sufficient prior knowledge of defendant's status as being subject to a Fourth waiver. The warrantless, suspicionless search of defendant, during which an illegal firearm was discovered, was therefore held to be a lawful Fourth waiver search based upon the officer's "objectively reasonable belief" defendant was still on PRCS in that that belief proved to be accurate. (People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 868-869.)

> See also United States v. Torres (U.S Dist. 2021) 2021 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96229; noting that there is no authority that an officer must verify the existence of a warrant in the moments before effectuating a traffic stop pursuant to that warrant where the officer testifies that he knew defendant was subject to search conditions from his prior contacts with him. Nor has the degree of certainty necessary as to the continuing existence of a defendant's Fourth waiver conditions been established by prior case law.

The prosecution was properly permitted to rely on hearsay evidence, specifically, an officer's testimony about information obtained from a computer database, corroborated by his prior knowledge of the two owners of the searched residence, to prove the state-of-mind exception under Evid. Code § 1250(a)(1) that the officer had advance knowledge of the probationary status of the owners of the home. (People v. Romeo (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 931, 946-949.)

The warrantless searches of defendant's person and truck were not justified under the Fourth Amendment, as probation searches, even though the officers had been told by dispatch that defendant was on probation but did not convey any information indicating that defendant was subject to search terms as a condition of his probation. Application of the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule was not supported by either an officer's subjective (mistaken) belief that all probationers were subject to search terms or by the trial court's factually unsupported assertion that 99.9 percent of probationers were subject to search terms. (People v. Rosas (2020) 50 Cal.App.5th 17.)

> Note: As it turned out, defendant was not on probation, the information from dispatch having been wrong. The interesting issue, not decided here, is what the Court's ruling would have been had he actually been on probation and subject to search and seizure conditions (i.e., a "Fourth waiver), but with the officers unaware whether or not he was subject to a Fourth waiver; an issue that must await a later decision.

The Prior Knowledge Requirement:

It is not necessary that the searching officer was aware of the existence of a signed parole search agreement, as required by P.C. § 3067, so long as he knew that the subject was on parole. (People v. Solorzano (2007) 153 Cal.App.4th 1026, 1030-1032; citing People v. Middleton (2005) 131 Cal.App.4th 732; see also People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 868-869.)

> But note United States v. Caseres (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1064, at pp. 1075-1076, which (arguably) erroneously held that an officer conducting a parole search must have been aware prior to the search that P.C. § 3067(a) was applicable to the defendant, i.e., that the prior conviction leading to his parole status occurred on or after January 1, 1997.

Determining that a person is on parole is enough information to justify a police officer's assumption that he or she is subject to a Fourth waiver in that all parolees are subject to a Fourth waiver. (People v. Middleton (2005) 131 Cal.App.4th 732.)

Where an officer is erroneously told that the defendant is on parole, only to find out later that he was subject to a probationary Fourth waiver instead, the search will still be upheld. It is not relevant what type of Fourth waiver applies to the defendant. (People v. Hill (2004) 118 Cal.App.4th 1344.)

A suspect subject to search and seizure conditions is estopped from complaining about being searched by an officer who was unaware of the search conditions when the officer's failure to know of the conditions was because defendant misidentified himself. (People v. Watkins (2009) 170 Cal.App.4th 1403, warrantless search of a vehicle; People v. Mathews (2018) 21 Cal.App.5th 130, warrantless search of defendant's cellphone.)

> Failure to raise the issue of "equitable estoppel" at the trial court level (i.e., that defendant, by denying he was on searchable probation, cannot later claim that the officers could not use his probation status as legal justification for a search of his person) waived the issue. (People v. Thomas (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1107, 1113-1114.)

A detective's "vague recollection" of having seen defendant's name on a postrelease community supervision (PRCS) list within the last two months, while remembering that he had arrested defendant on a weapons-related offense in 2011, was held to be sufficient prior knowledge of defendant's status as being subject to a Fourth waiver. The warrantless, suspicionless search of defendant, during which an illegal firearm was discovered, was therefore held to be a lawful Fourth waiver search based upon the officer's "objectively reasonable belief" defendant was still on PRCS in that that belief proved to be accurate. (People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 868-869.)

The prosecution was properly permitted to rely on hearsay evidence, specifically, an officer's testimony about information obtained from a computer database, corroborated by his prior knowledge of the two owners of the searched residence, to prove the state-of-mind exception under E.C. § 1250(a)(1) that the officer had advance knowledge of the probationary status of the owners of the home. (People v. Romeo (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 931, 946-949.)

While prior knowledge of a search condition is necessary in order to justify a warrantless, suspicionless parole search, the Ninth Circuit Court in United States v. Estrella, infra, noted that no case had yet decided "how precise that knowledge must be." Resolving this issue, the Estrella Court determined that a law enforcement officer must only have probable cause to believe that a person is then on active parole before that person may be detained and searched pursuant to a parole search condition. (United States v. Estrella (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 958, 961, 964-972.)

> In Estrella, the officer (who was his department's "gang specialist") had spoken with defendant (a known gang member) several times, had spoken with his parole officer, knew roughly (but not precisely) when defendant's parole had begun, and was familiar with the terms and conditions of defendant's parole. Although he did not know the precise start and end dates of defendant's parole term, he knew that California parole ordinarily lasts three to four years. He also had good reason to believe that defendant's term was not over in that he had only been released from prison about one year prior, and had violated a parole condition in April 2019, only four months prior. So although the officer was not aware of the precise date defendant's parole would lapse, the Fourth Amendment requires only that there be a "reasonable certainty" as to the defendant's patrol status. "(T)he Fourth Amendment, which calls for reasonable determinations, and does not demand certainty." (Id., pgs. 968, 972.)
> "'Determining the reasonableness of a particular search involves balancing the degree to which the search intrudes upon an individual's privacy against the degree to which the search is needed to further legitimate governmental interests.'" (Id., pg. 970; quoting Ioane v. Hodges (9th Cir. 2018) 939 F.3rd 945, 953); accord Bell v. Wolfish (1979) 441 U.S. 520, 559 [99 S.Ct. 1861; 60 L.Ed.2nd 447].)

Detaining an individual (even though the officers unsuccessfully attempted to conduct a "consensual encounter") before discovering the fact that the subject was on parole, and thus subject to a warrantless/suspicionless search, without sufficient cause to otherwise detain him, poisons the subsequent parole search. (People v. Paul (2024) 99 Cal.App.5th 832, 837-841.)

Arresting and Searching While in Ignorance of an Existing Warrant of Arrest:

The same theory may be used to find unlawful a search based upon a de facto arrest on less than probable cause when trying to justify the arrest (or a detention) by a belatedly-discovered existing arrest warrant. (Moreno v. Baca (9th Cir. 2005) 431 F.3rd 633.)

> However, it has been held in California that the taint of an illegal traffic stop may be attenuated by the existence of an outstanding arrest warrant (People v. Brendlin (2008) 45 Cal.4th 262; People v. Carter (2010) 182 Cal.App.4th 522, 529-530.) or a Fourth waiver (People v. Bates (2013) 222 Cal.App.4th 60, 65-71.), depending upon the circumstances.

The Court in Brendlin held that in assessing whether an outstanding arrest warrant, discovered after the fact, was sufficient to attenuate the taint of an illegal traffic stop, the Court must look at what it referred to as the "Brown factors;" i.e., "the temporal proximity of the Fourth Amendment violation to the procurement of the challenged evidence, the presence of intervening circumstances, and the flagrancy of the official misconduct." (Id, at p. 269, citing Brown v. Illinois (1975) 422 U.S. 590, 604 [95 S.Ct. 2254; 45 L.Ed.2nd 41].)

Discovery of a Search Condition as the Product of an Illegal Detention:

It has been held that a suspect's Fourth waiver (subjecting him to warrantless search and seizures) attenuated the taint of an illegal traffic stop. (People v. Durant (2012) 205 Cal.App.4th 57.)

But see People v. Bates (2013) 222 Cal.App.4th 60, 69-71, and People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, 23, both ruling to the contrary.

The Bates Court both declined to adopt the Durant Court's reasoning, and differentiated the cases on their respective facts. (Ibid.)

Parole and Probation Revocation Hearings:

Parole Hearings: Evidence recovered in an illegal parole search is admissible in a parole revocation proceeding. (Pennsylvania Board of Probation and Parole v. Scott (1998) 524 U.S. 357 [118 S.Ct. 2014; 141 L.Ed.2nd 344].)

The need to use illegally seized evidence, from both Fourth and Fifth Amendment violations, in parole revocation hearings, outweighs the policy considerations underlying the Exclusionary Rule (i.e., deterring illegal police conduct.), and therefore is admissible in such circumstances. (In re Martinez (1970) 1 Cal.3rd 641, 648-650.)

Probation Hearings: The same theory used in Martinez has been used to allow the admission of illegally seized evidence in probation revocation hearings. (People v. Hayko (1970) 7 Cal.App.3rd 604.)

Entering a Residence; Probable Cause or Reasonable Suspicion**?

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has consistently ruled that in order to conduct a Fourth Waiver search of a residence, an officer must have "probable cause" to believe that the residence to be searched is in fact the parolee's (or probationer's) residence. (Motley v. Parks (9th Cir. 2005) 432 F.3rd 1072, 1080-1082; United States v. Howard (9th Cir. 2006) 447 F.3rd 1257, 1262-1268; United States v. Franklin (9th Cir. 2010) 603 F.3rd 652; United States v. Bolivar (9th Cir. 2012) 670 F.3rd 1091, 1093-1095; United States v. Grandberry (9th Cir. 2013) 730 F.3rd 968, 973; Smith v. City of Santa Clara (9th Cir. 2017) 876 F.3rd 987, 994, fn. 7, 995; United States v. Ped (9th Cir. 2019) 943 F.3rd 427, 430-431; United States v Dixon (9th Cir. 2020) 984 F.3rd 814, 821-822.)

> This hasn't always been the case. Earlier Ninth Circuit case law has been ambivalent on this issue. In United States v. Watts (9th Cir. 1995) 67 F.3rd 790, at pg. 795, for instance, the Ninth Circuit, without deciding the issue, at least discussed it: "There is some tension among our cases regarding whether a probation search must be supported by probable cause to believe that the probationer resides on the premises or whether a 'reasonable' belief will suffice. In Harper (United States v. Harper (9th Cir 1991) 928 F.2nd 894.), we characterized the requisite level of suspicion as probable cause. Our principal holding in that case was that, under the Supreme Court's decision in Griffin (Griffin v. Wisconsin (1987) 483 U.S. 868, 873 [107 S.Ct. 3164; 97 L.Ed.2nd 709, 717].), police could search a parolee's home to execute an arrest warrant issued by a parole board. Harper, 928 F.2d at 896. We also held that police could conduct such a search only if they had 'probable cause' to believe that the arrestee actually lived at the place to be searched. Id. (⁋) However, before Harper we held in Dally (United States v. Dally (9th Cir. 1979) 606 F.2nd 861.), that a parole search was lawful because the parole officer had a 'reasonable basis' and 'reasonable belief' that the parolee had moved to the searched residence. Dally, 606 F.2nd at 863. Moreover, despite our mention in Harper of a probable cause requirement, we cited with approval in that case the 'reasonable belief' standard employed in Dally. See Harper, 928 F.2nd at 986 (citing Dally, 606 F.2nd 861). Our decision in United States v. Davis, 932 F.2nd 752 (9th Cir. 1991), is also relevant. In Davis, decided shortly after Harper, we held that an item such as a closed container falls within the scope of a probation search as long as there is 'reasonable suspicion' to believe that the item is within the ownership, possession, or control of the probationer. Davis, 932 F.2nd at 758-60. In doing so, we stated broadly that 'the permissible bounds of a probation search are governed by a reasonable suspicion standard.' Id. at 758."

Noting that five other federal circuits have ruled that something less than probable cause is required, and that the Ninth Circuit is a minority opinion (see United States v. Gorman (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 1105.), California's Fourth District Court of Appeal (Div. 2) has found that an officer executing an arrest warrant or conducting a probation or parole search may enter a dwelling if he or she has only "a reasonable belief," falling short of probable cause to believe, the suspect lives there and is present at the time. Employing that standard, the entry into defendant's apartment to conduct a probation search was lawful based on all of the information known to the officers. Accordingly, the court upheld the trial court's conclusion that the officers had objectively reasonable grounds to conclude the defendant/probationer lived at the subject apartment and was present at the time, and therefore the officers had the right to enter the apartment to conduct a warrantless probation search. (People v. Downey (2011) 198 Cal.App.4th 652, 657-662.)

> The Downey Court also noted that the California Supreme Court, in People v. Jacobs (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 472, 479, fn. 4, did not find that probable cause was required, but rather only a "reasonable belief" that defendant was home, despite the comments in footnote 4 to the effect that the officers, to lawfully enter the residence may have needed some "extra increment of probable cause when executing the arrest warrant, namely, grounds to believe that the suspect is within the dwelling." (People v. Downey, supra, at p. 662, Italics in original.)
> Note: The "present at the time" requirement apparently only applies to executing an arrest warrant, despite language in the Downey decision saying that it applies to both Fourth Waiver searches and executing arrest warrants. It has never been required that a person on a Fourth waiver be home at the time of a warrantless entry and search. (See People v Lilienthal (1978) 22 Cal.3rd 891, 900.)
>
> Without mentioning Downey, the Ninth Circuit has since cited Motley v. Parks, supra, with approval, for the proposition that full probable cause to believe that the target of a Fourth Waiver search resides in the place to be searched is necessary. (United States v. Bolivar (9th Cir. 2012) 670 F.3rd 1091, 1093-1095.)

Searching without a warrant a residence defendant was observed entering and exiting, but with insufficient information to believe that the parolee/defendant lived at that residence (i.e., all available information indicated that his home address was elsewhere), held to be illegal. (United States v. Grandberry (9th Cir. 2013) 730 F.3rd 968, 975-980.)

> The fact that the apartment that was searched might have been "under defendant's control" was held to be irrelevant. The issue is whether there is probable cause to believe defendant actually lived there. (Id., at pp. 980-982: "(W)e conclude that the 'property under your control' provision cannot refer to a place where someone else, but not the parolee, lives.")
> However, the trunk of a suspect's rented car is property under his control, and is subject to a warrantless search under the terms of the defendant's parole conditions. (United States v. Korte (9th Cir. 2019) 918 F.3rd 750, 754-755.)

Defendant's motion to suppress firearms found in a search of his home was properly denied because officers had "probable cause" to believe that defendant's brother, a parolee, lived at his house (although he had since moved out, unbeknownst to the officers), given a list the probation officer provided to the police which stated that the parolee had reported living at defendant's address plus two prior contacts at that residence. The evidence did not come close to satisfying defendant's burden of showing that the officers conducted the search for an improper purpose, such as a desire to harass him or out of personal animosity toward him. (United States v. Ped (9th Cir. 2019) 943 F.3rd 427, 430-432; using language indicating that the officers must be "reasonably sure" that they have the right house (citing Motley v. Parks (9th Cir. 2005) 432 F.3rd 1072, at p. 1079.), but then noting that "probable cause" is the correct legal standard, without a discussion of the issue. Pg. 430-431.)

Also note, by the way, while the Court held here that three-month-old information to the effect that the parolee subject to search and seizure conditions still lived at the residence to be searched is still considered reliable: "We do not question that at a certain point, a reported address would become so old that it would no longer be reasonable for officers to rely on it." (Pg. 431.) The Court gives no hint when that line might be crossed.

Searching a Container*; Probable Cause or Reasonable Suspicion?

When officers find a container (backpack in this case) during a lawful Fourth waiver search, they only need a "reasonable suspicion," as opposed to probable cause, to believe that the container belongs to, or is controlled by, the subject with the Fourth waiver in order to search it. (United States v. Bolivar (9th Cir. 2012) 670 F.3rd 1091, 1093-1095.)

See "Searches of Containers" (Chapter 16), above.

Duration of a Fourth Waiver*:

Parole:

A parole Fourth Waiver continues until he has had his formal parole hearing where he has the opportunity to contest the proposed revocation and parole is formally revoked. Being arrested and incarcerated on a parole hold pending a revocation hearing does not, in itself, negate a Fourth Waiver. (People v. Hunter (2006) 140 Cal.App.4th 1147.)

A parolee's arrest seven years after her parole suspension was held to be reasonable for Fourth Amendment purposes where she had taken no action after being evicted from her residence to ensure that the parole officer could maintain contact with her, her parole was lawfully suspended, a retake warrant was properly issued, and the arresting officer had arrested her pursuant to that warrant. The arrest did not violate due process where the parolee failed to fulfill her parole obligation to provide the parole office with correct and up-to-date contact information, and thus, she was largely responsible for the delay. An intentional infliction of emotional distress claim failed because the seven-year delay was not outrageous. (Cornel v. State of Hawaii (9th Cir. 2022) 37 F.4th 527.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal affirmed the district court's judgment on the third revocation of defendant's supervised release. Applying the rationale of United States v. Castro-Verdugo (9th Cir. 2014) 750 F.3rd 1065, which involved the same issue in the context of probation revocation, the panel held that because defendant was serving a term of supervised release when he committed the instant violation, the district court had jurisdiction to revoke his supervised release and impose an additional term of imprisonment, regardless of any error in the sentence imposed on the second revocation. The Court declined to reach defendant's argument that the term of supervised release imposed on his second revocation exceeded the statutory maximum. Consistent with Castro-Verdugo and earlier precedent, the Court held that an appeal challenging a supervised release revocation is not the proper avenue through which to attack the validity of the underlying sentence. (United States v. Estrada (9th Cir. 2023) 81 F.4th 859.)

> In Castro-Verdugo, the district court imposed a sentence on an illegal reentry conviction that included both probation and a stayed custodial sentence. (At pg. 1067.) This exceeded the court's statutory authority under 18 U.S.C. § 3561(a)(3) (stating that a defendant may not be sentenced to probation in conjunction with a term of imprisonment), but the defendant did not move to correct this sentence. On appeal from a subsequent probation revocation, the defendant argued that the district court lacked jurisdiction to revoke his probation because he was not serving a valid probation term at the time of his revocation. (At p. 1068.) Explaining that the "the only criteria necessary to create jurisdiction over probation revocation proceedings are: (1) that the defendant still be serving a term of probation and (2) that the defendant violate its conditions," the Court concluded that the district court had jurisdiction because, regardless of the error in the underlying sentence, the defendant was serving a term of probation at the time of his violation. (At p. 1069.)
> The Court also reaffirmed its prior precedent holding that a defendant cannot challenge the validity of an underlying sentence in a subsequent probation revocation proceeding. "[A]n underlying sentence may not always be valid, but . . . a court tasked with conducting or reviewing probation revocation proceedings may not investigate the validity of the original sentence." (See also United States v. Gerace (9th Cir. 1992) 997 F.2nd 1293, 1295: "An appeal challenging a probation revocation proceeding is not the proper avenue through which to attack the validity of the original sentence." United States v. Simmons (9th Cir. 1987) 812 F.2nd 561, 563: "[A]n appeal from a probation revocation is not the proper avenue for a collateral attack on the underlying conviction."). This type of collateral attack should be brought in a 28 U.S.C. § 2255 motion, because to hold otherwise "would circumvent the statutorily defined procedure" provided in § 2255. (Castro-Verdugo, at 1069-1071.)

Probation:

A probationer on a Fourth Waiver is also subject to warrantless searches and seizures until he has been accorded the right to a probation revocation hearing, even if in custody while awaiting that hearing, and even though, pending his hearing, a court has "summarily revoked" his probation. (People v. Barkins (1978) 81 Cal.App.3rd 30.)

However, where a defendant's probation has been formally revoked, but not reinstated, he is no longer subject to the terms and conditions of his probation. A trial court does not have jurisdiction, therefore, to find defendant violated probation based on him exposing himself to a jail nurse where his probation had been formally revoked and not reinstated, terminating probation. Defendant was no longer on probation once the trial court formally revoked his probation and ordered that probation not be reinstated. Because defendant was not on probation when he committed the felony conduct alleged to have been a probation violation under the third petition to revoke probation, the trial court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to the third petition to revoke probation. The trial court did not have discretion, therefore, to impose a six-year prison term because defendant had agreed to a three-year term when he admitted the probation violation associated with the second petition to revoke probation. (People v. Belche (2020) 53 Cal.App.5th 956.)

"It is now well established that summary revocation of probation is appropriate and preserves a court's jurisdiction over a probationer, 'even if the evidentiary hearing, formal revocation and sentencing all occur after the period of probation would otherwise have been completed.'" (Kuhnel v. Superior Court (People) (2022) 75 Cal.App.5th 726, 734); quoting People v. Journey (1976) 58 Cal.App.3rd 24, 27; accord, People v. Medeiros (1994) 25 Cal.App.4th 1260, 1267; and see P.C. § 1203.2(a).)

See also People v. Zuniga (2022) 79 Cal.App.5th 870, where it was held that In a felony hit and run case that the trial court had jurisdiction to set the amount of victim restitution after defendant's probation expired as a result of Assembly Bill No. 1950, amending Pen. Code § 1203.1, shortening probation to two years, because the original probation order contemplated restitution and the victim's economic losses could not be determined at the time of sentencing. The Legislature did not intend to interfere with a crime victim's right to restitution under preexisting law when it shortened the maximum term of felony probation to two years.

Enactment of AB 1950 (2019-2020 Reg. Sess.) shortened felony probation from three to two years in most cases, pursuant Pen. Code § 1203.1(a). This provision applied retroactively to reduce the maximum term of probation to two years in cases not yet final when the legislation became effective on January 1, 2021. Defendant in this case had served significantly more than two years of probation on the date when the trial court attempted to find him in violation of his terms of probation. However, defendant's probation terminated as a matter of law and the trial court thereafter lacked jurisdiction to order summary revocation in defendant's human trafficking. However, the trial court retained jurisdiction to adjudicate a violation of probation in defendant's robbery case because robbery was a violent felony listed in Pen. Code § 667.5(c), and, as such, was an offense excepted from the two-year probation limitation pursuant to § 1203.1(m). (People v. Arreguin (2022) 79 Cal.App.5th 787.)

Postrelease Supervision:

Pen. Code § 3456 provides for the termination of postrelease supervision as follows:

> (a) The county agency responsible for postrelease supervision . . . shall maintain postrelease supervision over a person . . . until one of the following events occurs:
>
> > (1) The person has been subject to postrelease supervision pursuant to this title for three years at which time the offender shall be immediately discharged from postrelease supervision.
> > (2) Any person on postrelease supervision for six consecutive months with no violations of his or her conditions of postrelease supervision that result in a custodial sanction may be considered for immediate discharge by the supervising county.

(3) The person who has been on postrelease supervision continuously for one year with no violations of his or her conditions of postrelease supervision that result in a custodial sanction shall be discharged from supervision within 30 days.

Case Law:

Defendant was released from prison and placed on postrelease supervision for one year. The terms of supervision included a Fourth waiver. One year and one day after defendant's release, his probation officer conducted a search of defendant's home and discovered child pornography. Defendant filed a motion to suppress arguing that his postrelease supervision was complete at the time of the search. The trial court disagreed and denied the motion. The Court of Appeal upheld the denial, holding that Pen. Code § 3456, which states that a person shall be discharged within 30 days of completing postrelease supervision, means there is a 30-day window of continuing supervision following completion. (People v. Young (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 972.)

See also People v. Leiva (2013) 56 Cal.4th 498, where it was held that a possible probation violation occurring after the expiration of a defendant's probationary period is not punishable despite an earlier summary revocation of probation which is imposed by a court prior to the expiration of the probationary period. Pen. Code § 1203.2(a)'s "tolling" provisions only allow for a court to retain jurisdiction beyond the probationary period in order to punish for probation violations that are alleged to have occurred prior to the expiration of that probationary period.

Pen. Code § 1203.2(a) vests a court with the authority to preside over revocation hearings when a supervised person violates a term or condition of his or her supervision. The statute does not explicitly define "supervision" but uses the word throughout the statute to refer to the different types of supervision—such as probation or parole—available to individuals released from custody. Section 1203.2, subd. (a), which provides that a supervised person may be rearrested for violations of any term or condition of the person's supervision, lists the following types of supervision covered by the statute: (1) probation; (2) mandatory supervision; (3) postrelease community supervision (PCRS; see P.C. §§ 3450 et seq.); and (4) parole. The trial court erred in terminating defendant's parole supervision and in ordering that he not be supervised for the remainder of his parole term where it appeared to have interpreted the term "terminate supervision" in Pen. Code § 1203.2(b)(1) to mean that "supervision" was a condition of parole that could be struck. The Court held that that interpretation was not supported by the statutory language, and it thus had no authority to terminate defendant's parole supervision. (People v. Johnson (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 363.)

Good Faith Belief in the Existence of Probable Cause to Arrest: The United States Supreme Court recently ruled (in a 5-to-4 decision) that an officer's good faith reliance on erroneous information will not invalidate an arrest even when that information comes from a law enforcement source, so long as the error was based upon non-reoccurring negligence only. However, deliberate illegal acts, or a reckless disregard for constitutional requirements, or reoccurring or systematic negligence, will not excuse the resulting unlawful arrest. (Herring v. United States (2009) 555 U.S. 135 [129 S.Ct. 695; 172 L.Ed.2nd 496].)

Note: Under this theory, it is arguable that an officer's good faith belief that a Fourth waiver exists, and then conducting a search based upon that belief, would preclude the suppression of any resulting evidence. No case, however, has yet so held.

Search and Seizure Conditions Discovered After the Fact: It is quite clear now that when the search and seizure conditions of one co-tenant are belatedly discovered (i.e., after an otherwise illegal, warrantless search), given the importance of the non-waiver subject's privacy rights in a residence, any evidence found as a result will not be admissible against that person. (People v. Robles (2000) 23 Cal.4th 789; People v. Sanders (2003) 31 Cal.4th 318; In re Jaime P. (2006) 40 Cal.4th 128.)

Miscellaneous*:

Burden of Proof:

The prosecution has the burden of proving that defendant was subject to searchable probation or parole conditions. (People v. Williams (1999) 20 Cal.4th 119, 130; see also People v. Pearl (2009) 172 Cal.App.4th 1280.)

Once the prosecution has offered a justification for a warrantless search or seizure, the defendant must then present any arguments as to why that justification is inadequate. This specificity requirement does not place the burden of proof on defendants; "the burden of raising an issue is distinct from the burden of proof." (People v. Perkins (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 454, 474, quoting People v. Williams, supra.)

Failure to raise the issue of "equitable estoppel" at the trial court level (i.e., that defendant, by denying he was on searchable probation, cannot later claim that the officers could not use his probation status as legal justification for a search of his person) waived the issue. (People v. Thomas (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1107, 1113-1114.)

Rights of Third Persons not subject to the Fourth Waiver, but who happen to live with a person who is subject to search and seizure conditions:

Rule: A warrantless search of a residence based upon a probationer's (or parolee's) search and seizure conditions, when the probationer is a co-occupant of the residence, is lawful as a matter of law, even over the objection of another co-tenant (the probationer's mother who also lived there, in this case). The principles behind Georgia v. Randolph (2006) 547 U.S. 103 [126 S.Ct. 1515; 164 L.Ed.2nd 208], Randolph being a consensual search issue unrelated to a Fourth waiver search, are inapplicable. (Smith v. City of Santa Clara (9th Cir. 2017) 876 F.3rd 987, 991-995; rejecting defendant's argument that Randolph created an exception to the probationary search rule.)

California, 547 U.S. 843, 852, 126 S.Ct. 2193, 165 L.Ed.2nd 250 (2006), and they may be subject to warrantless searches of their homes without a warrant or suspicion of wrongdoing. Cuevas v. De Roco, 531 F.3rd 726, 732 (9th Cir. 2008) (per curiam). That is true even if other people also live there. (Italics added) United States v. See "Co-Occupants (Roommates, Husband and Wife, or Parent and Child)," under "Consent Searches" (Chapter 18), below, discussing the principles of Georgia v. Randolph.

Common Areas; Residences:

Even over the objection of the person who is not subject to a Fourth Waiver, the police may search the Fourth Waiver subject's private areas and all common areas. Only the non-Fourth Waiver subject's private areas are protected from being searched. (Russi v. Superior Court (1973) 33 Cal.App.3rd 160, 168-171.)

In extending the rule of Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89] (i.e., that the officer's subjective intent is irrelevant) to the Fourth Waiver situation, the California Supreme Court upheld the search of the common areas of a residence, looking for evidence against Suspect A, while using Suspect B's Fourth Waiver as the legal justification, eventually resulting in recovery of evidence tending to incriminate Suspect C (i.e., defendant Woods). (People v. Woods (1999) 21 Cal.4th 668.)

> "It long has been settled that a consent-based search is valid when consent is given by one person with common or superior authority over the area to be searched; the consent of other interested parties is unnecessary. (People v. Boyer (1989) 48 Cal.3rd 247, 276 . . . ; People v. Haskett (1982) 30 Cal.3rd 841, 856 . . . People v. Viega (1989) 214 Cal.App.3rd 817, 828 . . . see People v. Clark (1993) 5 Cal.4th 950, 979 . . . [search of a car].) Warrantless consent searches of residences have been upheld even where the unmistakable purpose of the search was to obtain evidence against a non-consenting cohabitant. (E.g., United States v. Matlock (1974) 415 U.S. 164 [170 94 S.Ct. 988; 39 L.Ed.2nd 242] [roommate's consent, obtained after defendant was arrested and removed from the scene, sufficient]; People v Haskett , supra, 30 Cal.3rd at pp. 856-857.)" (People v. Woods, supra, at pp. 675-676.)
> It was noted in Woods, however, that there are limitations. A probation search, for instance, cannot "exceed the scope of the particular clause relied upon," cannot "be undertaken in a harassing or unreasonable manner," and cannot extend beyond "those portions of the residence they reasonably believe the probationer has complete or joint control over." (Id., at p. 682; see also People v. Maxwell (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 546, 554.)

But, see the limitations put on such searches when the attempted use of another's search and seizure conditions was not discovered until after the search for evidence against a co-habitant who was not on a Fourth Waiver. (People v. Robles (2000) 23 Cal.4th 789; People v. Sanders (2003) 31 Cal.4th 318; In re Jaime P. (2006) 40 Cal.4th 128; see above.)

"(A) warrantless search, justified by a probation search condition, may extend to common areas, shared by non-probationers, over which the probationer has 'common authority.' (United States v. Matlock (1974) 415 U.S. 164, 171 [94 S.Ct. 988; 39 L.Ed.2nd 242, 250].) The 'common authority' theory of consent rests 'on mutual use of the property by persons generally having joint access or control for most purposes, so that it is reasonable to recognize that any of the co-inhabitants has the right to permit the inspection in his own right and that the others have assumed the risk that one of their number might permit the common area to be searched.' (Id., at p. 171, fn. 7 [39 L.Ed.2nd, at p. 250)" (People v. Smith (2002) 95 Cal.App.4th 912, 916.)

The fact that a parolee or probationer lives with a third person who is not subject to search and seizure conditions cannot be used to immunize the one who is subject to a Fourth Waiver from government scrutiny. (People v. Kanos (1971) 14 Cal.App.3rd 642, 650-651; Russi v. Superior Court (1973) 33 Cal.App.3rd 160,166-167.)

However, per the Ninth Circuit, the language in this parole condition that allows for a search of property "under (the parolee's) control," when the place to be searched is a residence, does not allow for the search of a third-party's residence even though the parolee is a frequent visitor and even though there is evidence that he is dealing drugs out of that third-party's residence. (United States v. Grandberry (9th Cir. 2013) 730 F.3rd 968, 980-982.)

But, there must be at least "probable cause" to believe that the person subject to the Fourth Waiver does in fact live there, as opposed to merely staying with the resident on an occasional basis. (United States v. Howard (9th Cir. 2006) 447 F.3rd 1257; see also Motley v. Parks (9th Cir. 2005) 432 F.3rd 1072, 1080-1082; United States v. Bolivar (9th Cir. 2012) 670 F.3rd 1091, 1093-1095; United States v. Grandberry, supra, at p. 973-980; Smith v. City of Santa Clara (9th Cir. 2017) 876 F.3rd 987, 995-996.)

> But see People v. Downey (2011) 198 Cal.App.4th 652, 657-662, above, where it was held that only a "reason to believe," (interpreted to mean a "reasonable suspicion") being a standard less than probable cause, that the subject lives there is necessary.

Any evidence lawfully seized during a parole or probation search may be used in court against whomever the circumstances tend to connect it to. That may turn out to be the cotenant who was not on probation or parole. (Russi v. Superior Court (1973) 33 Cal.App.3rd 160, 167-168; People v. Woods (1999) 21 Cal.4th 668.)

> This rule is not conditioned upon the third person's knowledge of the existence of the Fourth Waiver to which his or her cotenant was subject. (Russi v. Superior Court, supra, at p. 170.)

Also, it matters not whether the cotenant is the parolee or probationer's wife, live-in "significant other," or just some "drinking buddy." (People v. Triche (1957) 148 Cal.App.2nd 198, 203.)

Common Areas; Vehicles:

The California Supreme Court has differentiated Fourth waiver searches of residences from those of vehicles. Given the higher expectation of privacy involved in a residence, it has been held that officers generally may only search those portions of the residence over which they reasonably believe the Fourth waiver suspect has complete or joint control. Those areas that are exclusively possessed or controlled by others are off limits. Common areas are subject to being searched. In the case of a vehicle, with its lower expectation of privacy, a warrantless search of those areas of the passenger compartment where an officer reasonably expects that the parolee could have stowed personal belongings or discarded items when aware of police activity, as well as a search of personal property located in those areas if the officer reasonably believes that the parolee owns those items or has the ability to exert control over them, is lawful. (People v. Schmitz (2012) 55 Cal.4th 909, 916-933.)

The same rule holds true for a probationer who is subject to a Fourth waiver. (People v. Cervantes (2017) 11 Cal.App.5th 860, 866-872; ruling that so long as the center console of a vehicle is not locked, secured, or otherwise closed off, a search of a center console based on a front seat passenger's probation search condition is objectively reasonable. See also People v. Maxwell (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 546, 553-557, infra.)

The trunk of a suspect's rented car is property under his control, and is subject to a warrantless search under the terms of the defendant's parole conditions. (United States v. Korte (9th Cir. 2019) 918 F.3rd 750, 754-755.)

Agreeing with the ruling in People v. Cervantes (2017) 11 Cal.App.5th 860 (see above), the Third District Court of Appeal held that the rule of Schmitz (search of defendant's vehicle using a parolee-passenger's Fourth wavier as the legal reason; see above) allowed for the search of defendant's car (or at least, "those areas of the passenger compartment where the officer reasonably expects that the [probationer] could have stowed personal belongings or discarded items when aware of police activity." Quoting Schmitz, at p. 913.) when his passenger was on searchable probation. (People v. Maxwell (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 546, 553-557.)

In Maxwell, it was further noted that the fact that the probationer had left defendant's vehicle when contacted was irrelevant, at least when she was still so close to defendant's car that she still had access to it. (Id., at p. 557.)

Private Areas:

A Fourth Waiver imposed on one cotenant does not justify the search of areas or property exclusive to a third person. (People v. Veronica (1980) 107 Cal.App.3rd 906.)

"Neither reason nor authority support the proposition that police may conduct a general search of the private belongings of one who lives with a probationer." To justify searching the property exclusive to a non-probationer or non-parolee, the officers will need "some cause" to believe the person subject to search and seizure conditions has secreted contraband in the property of a third person. (Italics added; People v. Alders (1978) 87 Cal.App.3rd 313, 317-318.)

The searching officers need only entertain a "reasonable suspicion," based upon an evaluation of all the surrounding circumstances, that the item to be searched was either owned, or (at least jointly) controlled, by the person subject to the Fourth Waiver. (People v. Boyd (1990) 224 Cal.App.3rd 736, 745-346, 749-750.)

While some older cases have required that an officer have full "probable cause" to believe that a place or item to be searched is owned, controlled, or jointly possessed by the Fourth waiver suspect (e.g., see People v. Montoya (1981) 114 Cal.App.3rd 556, 562.), the more recent cases, and the weight of authority, have held that so long as the searching officers have a "reasonable suspicion," the resulting search will be upheld. (People v. Palmquist (1981) 123 Cal.App.3rd 1, 12; People v. Boyd, supra, at p. 750.)

See People v. Smith (2002) 95 Cal.App.4th 912; search of defendant, non-probationer's purse, under the theory that the person subject to the search and seizure conditions (a male) had joint authority over her purse, was upheld.

A search of the female defendant's purse left in the car when an officer is conducting a parole search of a male parolee, is illegal absent a reasonable suspicion to believe that the parolee had joint ownership, possession, or control over the purse. (People v. Baker (2008) 164 Cal.App.4th 1152.)

A warrantless search of those areas of the passenger compartment of a vehicle where an officer reasonably expects that the parolee could have stowed personal belongings or discarded items when aware of police activity, as well as a search of personal property located in those areas if the officer reasonably believes that the parolee owns those items or has the ability to exert control over them, is lawful. (People v. Schmitz (2012) 55 Cal.4th 909, 916-933.)

The Court further noted that Fourth waiver for probationers is a matter of choice, such a person agreeing to the giving up his or her Fourth Amendment search and seizure protections in exchange for avoiding a jail sentence. Parolees, on the other hand, at least since the applicable statute (i.e., Pen. Code § 3067) was amended (effective 6/27/12), aren't given a choice. Fourth waiver conditions are involuntarily imposed upon them. As a result, "parolees have fewer expectations of privacy than probationers, because parole is more akin to imprisonment than probation is to imprisonment." Therefore, the fact that defendant's passenger was a parolee, as opposed to a probationer, is a "salient circumstance" in setting out the rule of this case. But the Court never indicates that the general rule is any different between cases involving probationers and parolees. (Id., at pp. 921-922.)

Also, the Court noted that defendant's (vehicle driver or owner) lack of knowledge that his passenger was subject to search and seizure conditions is irrelevant to the legality of the parole search. (Id., at pp. 922-923.)

The factors to consider in determining what areas and items in a vehicle are subject to search include the nature of that area or item, how close and accessible the area or item is to the parolee, the privacy interests at stake, and the government's interest in conducting the search. (Id., at p. 923.)

> Also, because "cause" is not required to justify such a search, an officer does not have to articulate facts demonstrating that the parolee actually placed personal items or discarded contraband in the open areas of the passenger compartment. The issue in court is going to be whether, when viewed objectively, it was reasonable for the officer to assume that any particular area or item might contain the parolee's personal property or be somewhere that he might be expected to secret items he didn't want the police to find. (Id., at p. 926.)

The search of a non-probationer's purse, when found in the middle of a jointly occupied bedroom, was upheld. The fact that the probationer was a male and the non-probationer defendant was a female, is not dispositive. "To rule otherwise would enable a probationer to flout a probation search condition by hiding drugs in a cohabitant's purse or any other hiding place associated with the opposite gender." (People v. Ermi (2013) 216 Cal.App.4th 277, 280-282.)

A warrantless search of the garage in which defendant was living was not justified under the Fourth Amendment where there was nothing in the record to aid an objective evaluation of the scope of the home owner's advance consent. No evidence was produced as to what were the terms of the specific search and seizure conditions applicable to the residents of house and garage that was searched. Guests (the defendant here being a non-probationer who was living in the probationers' garage) are entitled to demand adherence to the proper scope of their host's search conditions, despite the usual rule prohibiting the assertion of someone else's Fourth Amendment rights in search and seizure cases. (People v. Romeo (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 931, 949-955.)

> That problem could have been resolved had the prosecution introduced into evidence (under Evid. Code § 1280) the public records exception to the hearsay rule, a copy of the residents' search and seizure conditions as ordered by the court, or the searching officer's own testimony as to what he knew those conditions to be. (Id., at p. 955.)

When it is Unknown Who Owns the Property About to be Searched:

Rule: Where the officers do not know who owns or possesses a place or item to be searched, and such information can be easily ascertained, it may, depending upon the circumstances, be incumbent upon them to attempt to determine ownership in order to protect the privacy interests of the third persons involved. (See below)

Case Law:

> "(I)n the case of probation searches, the officer must have some knowledge not just of the fact someone is on probation, but of the existence of a search clause broad enough to justify the search at issue." People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 863; citing People v. Bravo (1987) 43 Cal. 3rd 600, 605-606, 608.)
>
> "If it is objectively unreasonable for officers to believe that the residence or item falls within the scope of a search condition, any evidence seized will be deemed the product of a warrantless search absent other considerations." (Italics added; People v. Tidalgo (1981) 123 Cal.App.3rd 301, 306-307.)

Additional Rule: However, the officers may still act upon appearances, so long as they act reasonably.

Additional Case Law:

> While some courts argue that officers may have a duty to inquire as to the ownership or control of certain items (see People v. Montoya (1981) 114 Cal.App.3rd 556, 562-563.), other more reasoned court decisions recognize that "an officer could hardly expect that a parolee (or probationer) would claim ownership of an item which he knew contained contraband." (People v. Britton (1984) 156 Cal.App.3rd 689, 701.)
>
> If an officer reasonably believes he will not receive an honest answer, there appears to be no legal reason why he or she must either inquire, or accept the answer as true if inquiry is in fact made. (People v. Boyd (1990) 224 Cal.App.34d 736, 746-750; see also United States v. Davis (9th Cir. 1991) 932 F.2nd 752, 760.)
>
> Searching without a warrant a residence defendant was observed entering and exiting, but with insufficient information to believe that the parolee/defendant lived at that residence (i.e., all available information indicated that his home address was elsewhere), held to be illegal.

(United States v. Grandberry (9th Cir. 2013) 730 F.3rd 968, 975-980.)

> The fact that the apartment that was searched might have been "under defendant's control" held to be irrelevant. The issue is whether there is probable cause to believe defendant lived there. (Id., at pp. 980-982: "(W)e conclude that the 'property under your control' provision cannot refer to a place where someone else, but not the parolee, lives.")

However, the trunk of a suspect's rented car is property under his control, and is subject to a warrantless search under the terms of the defendant's parole conditions. (United States v. Korte (9th Cir. 2019) 918 F.3rd 750, 754-755.)

A female resident's probation search condition did not allow for the search of a purse and drawers found in the residences' separate living unit (i.e., the garage) where there was no evidence of the probationer's actual access to, or control over, the contents of the purse or drawers, and no evidence of a family relationship or equivalent familiarity between the probationer and the defendant. The searching officers did not have an "objectively reasonable belief" that the probationer had authority over the contents of either the drawers or the purse found in the defendant's separate living quarters. (People v. Carreon (2016) 248 Cal.App.4th 866, 877-881.)

In a Vehicle:

An existing search and seizure condition justifies a detention without a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity, including while in a vehicle, and a search of the car under the terms of the defendant's Fourth waiver. (See People v. Viers (1991) 1 Cal.App.4th 990, 992-994; defendant stopped in his vehicle.)

> Note: Viers further held that it was irrelevant that the officers were unaware of defendant's probation status when the search was conducted; a conclusion that has since been abrogated by People v. Sanders (2003) 31 Cal.4th 318. (See Myers v. Superior Court (124 Cal.App.4th 1247.)
> See "Searching While In Ignorance of a Search Condition," above.

A warrantless search of those areas of the passenger compartment of a vehicle where an officer reasonably expects that the parolee could have stowed personal belongings or discarded items when aware of police activity, as well as a search of personal property located in those areas if the officer reasonably believes that the parolee owns those items or has the ability to exert control over them, is lawful. (People v. Schmitz (2012) 55 Cal.4th 909, 916-933.)

See also People v. Maxwell (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 546, where defendant's passenger in his vehicle was on searchable probation. "We thus conclude an officer may search 'those areas of the passenger compartment where the officer reasonably expects that the parolee could have stowed personal belongings or discarded items when aware of police activity.'" (Pg. 556.)

> Defendant's motion to suppress evidence obtained from a search of his car based on the searchable probation status of his passenger was properly denied because an officer may search those areas of a car's passenger compartment where the officer reasonably expects the probationer could have stowed or discarded items after noticing police activity, and that searchable area includes those parts of the passenger compartment the probationer still had access to. (Id. at pp. 552-557.)

> The Court further held that the trial court also properly denied defendant's motion to suppress evidence obtained from searches of his person, car, and home, which were premised on a bail condition that was later found to be invalid, where the good-faith exception to the exclusionary rule applied, as the officer who conducted the search acted in good-faith reliance on defendant's then-extant bail terms, and that reliance was objectively reasonable. (Id., at pp. 558-560.)

Detention of Third Persons:

Police may lawfully detain visitors to a probationer's home while executing a "Fourth Waiver" search for purposes of identifying the visitors (as possible felons) and for the officers' safety. (People v. Matelski (2000) 82 Cal.App.4th 837; People v. Rios (2011) 193 Cal.App.4th 584, 593-595.)

Third party occupants of a home searched under the conditions of a Fourth waiver may lawfully be detained during the search. The justifications for such a detention include:

- The need to prevent flight in the event incriminating evidence is found;
- Minimizing the risk of harm to the officers, and
- Facilitating the orderly completion of the search while avoiding the use of force.
(Sanchez v. Canales (9th Cir. 2009) 574 F.3rd 1169, citing Muehler v. Mena (2005) 544 U.S. 93 [125 S.Ct. 1465; 161 L.Ed.2nd 299]; a search warrant case.)

See "Detentions, Patdowns, and Arrests," below.

Knock and Notice:

The "knock and notice" provisions of Penal Code §§ 844 and 1531 apply to searches conducted pursuant to a probation or parole condition. (See P.C. § 3061; People v. Rosales (1968) 68 Cal.2nd 299, 303-304; People v. Kanos (1971) 14 Cal.App.3rd 642, 651-652; People v. Constancio (1974) 42 Cal.App.3rd 533, 542; People v. Lilienthal (1978) 22 Cal.3rd 891, 900; People v. Mays (1998) 67 Cal.App.4th 969, 973, fn. 4; People v. Urziceanu (2005) 132 Cal.App.4th 747, 789-792; People v. Murphy (2005) 37 Cal.4th 490.)

See "Knock and Notice," under "Searches With a Search Warrant" (Chapter 7), above.

This includes the doctrine of "substantial compliance," where forced entry may be made so long as the "policies and purposes" (i.e., respecting the right to privacy within the home and avoiding violent confrontations) of the knock-notice rules have been satisfied. (People v. Montenegro (1985) 173 Cal.App.3rd 983, 988-989.)

However, a court may not impose a waiver of the knock and notice requirements as a condition of probation. (People v. Freund (1975) 48 Cal.App.3rd 49, 56-58.)

Detentions, Patdowns, and Arrests:

Detentions: A search and seizure condition justifies a detention without a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. (People v. Viers (1991) 1 Cal.App.4th 990, 992-994.)

Viers further held that it was irrelevant that the officers were unaware of defendant's probation status when the search was conducted; a conclusion that has since been abrogated by People v.

Sanders (2003) 31 Cal.4th 318. (See Myers v. Superior Court (124 Cal.App.4th 1247.)

See "Searching While In Ignorance of a Search Condition," above.

"If a police officer knows an individual is on PRCS, he may lawfully detain that person for the purpose of searching him or her, so long as the detention and search are not arbitrary, capricious or harassing." (People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 863.)

Patdowns:

Old Rule: When the rule was that a parole search required at least a "reasonable suspicion" of renewed criminal activity, a police officer could not justify a patdown (frisk) search of a detained suspect for weapons based upon the detainee's status as a parolee alone, in the absence of other suspicious circumstances furnishing grounds to believe he may be armed, unless, perhaps, it was known that his prior offense involved the use of weapons. (People v. Williams (1992) 3 Cal.App.4th 1100, 1105, 1108; People v. Montenegro (1985) 173 Cal.App.3rd 983.)

New Rule: Because under the present state of the law, a parolee or probationer may be searched without any cause (See People v. Reyes (1998) 19 Cal.4th 743.), this rule (requiring a reasonable suspicion) is probably no longer valid, at least pending review of the necessary standards by the United States Supreme Court. (See "Standard of Proof Required," above.)

Arrests: The fact that a person is a parolee-at-large, and subject to search or seizure without a warrant or probable cause, justifies a warrantless entry into the subject's house for the purpose of arresting him. (People v. Lewis (1999) 74 Cal.App.4th 662.)

There is no authority, however, allowing for a non-consensual transportation of a parolee or probationer to his house, absent probable cause to arrest the subject. In that a non-consensual transportation of a subject is generally considered to be an arrest (Dunaway v. New York (1979) 442 U.S. 200, 206-216 [99 S.Ct. 2248; 60 L.Ed.2nd 824, 832-838]; see "Detentions." above), and thus illegal absent probable cause to arrest the subject, it is likely that the use of a Fourth Waiver condition as an excuse to transport the subject from a remote location back to his house, absent probable cause to arrest him, would not be upheld.

Out-of-State Probationer or Parolee: The validity of a search of a probationer or parolee from another state, supervision for whom has been transferred to California pursuant to Penal Code §§ 11175 et seq. (Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee (and Probationer) Supervision), is to be determined by California Law. (People v. Reed (1994) 23 Cal.App.4th 135.)

AIDS & HIV; Required Notifications: A parole or probation officer seeking the assistance of law enforcement to apprehend or take into custody a parolee or probationer who has a record of assault on a peace officer, must, by statute, inform the officers of the suspect's infliction with AIDS or HIV. (Pen. Code § 7521)

Pen. Code § 290.024: Sex Offender Internet Identifier Registration Requirements:

> Requirement: Sex offenders convicted of a felony on or after January 1, 2017, are required to register Internet identifiers if a court at sentencing finds that any one of the following applies:
>
> > (1) The defendant used the Internet to collect any private information to identify the victim of the crime;
> >
> > (2) The defendant was convicted of human trafficking pursuant to Pen. Code § 236.1(b) (sex trafficking) or Pen. Code § 236.1(c) (sex trafficking involving minors) and used the Internet to traffic the victim; or
> >
> > (3) The defendant was convicted of a felony involving obscene matter (Pen. Code §§ 311 through 311.12) and used the Internet to prepare, publish, distribute, send, exchange, or download the obscene matter or matter depicting a minor engaging in sexual conduct.
>
> "Internet identifier" is defined as "any electronic mail address or user name used for instant messaging or social networking that is actually used for direct communication between users on the Internet in a manner that makes the communication not accessible to the general public." An Internet identifier does not include passwords, date of births, social security numbers, or PIN numbers.
>
> > Note that the U.S. Supreme Court has held unconstitutional a statute that made it a felony for registered sex offenders to access commercial social networking websites even though the sex offender knew the site allowed minor children to become members or to create or maintain a personal web page because it impermissibly restricted lawful speech in violation of the First Amendment's Free Speech Clause, which was applicable to North Carolina under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. (Packingham v. North Carolina (2017) 582 U.S. 98 [137 S.Ct. 1730; 198 L.Ed.2nd 273].)

However, see In re A.A. (2018) 30 Cal.App.5th 596, where it was held that a court may restrict a minor's use of social media, such as by prohibiting him from using it to talk about his offense, in a "narrowly tailored probation condition" even though it affected the minor's First Amendment freedom of expression rights.

Pen. Code § 290.45: Non-Disclosure of Internet Identifiers to the Public:

Law enforcement is prohibited from disclosing an offender's Internet identifiers to a non-law enforcement entity or person, except by court order (as an exception to the right of law enforcement to disclose information about a sex offender when necessary to ensure public safety).

A law enforcement agency may use an Internet identifier submitted with a sex offender's registration or to release it to another law enforcement agency only for the purpose of investigating a sex-related crime, a kidnapping, or human trafficking.

Chapter 20*:

Consent Searches:

Rule*: A valid consent is a lawful substitute for both a search warrant and probable cause. (United States v. Matlock (1974) 415 U.S. 164, 165-166 [94 S.Ct. 988; 39 L.Ed.2nd 242]; Vandenberg v. Superior Court (1970) 8 Cal.App.3rd 1048, 1053; United States v. Russell (9th Cir. 2012) 664 F.3rd 1279, 1281; (Fernandez v. California (2014) 571 U.S. 292, 298-307 [134 S.Ct. 1126; 1132-1137; 188 L.Ed.2nd 25]; People v. Arredondo (2016) 245 Cal.App.4th 186, 193-194.)

Note: Petition for Review was dismissed and the case remanded in light of the decision in Mitchell v. Wisconsin (June 27, 2019) __ U.S.__, __ [139 S.Ct. 2525; 204 L.Ed.2nd 1040], where the U.S. Supreme Court held that when a DUI arrestee is unconscious, this fact alone will "almost always" constitute an exigency, allowing for a warrantless blood draw.

"It is well settled that a search conducted pursuant to a valid consent is constitutionally permissible." (Citation omitted; United States v. Soriano (9th Cir 2004) 361 F.3rd 494, 501; Schneckloth v. Bustamonte (1973) 412 U.S. 218, 222 [93 S.Ct. 2041; 36 L.Ed.2nd 854, 860]; People v. Harris (2015) 234 Cal.App.4th 671, 685.)

"'Consent searches are part of the standard investigatory techniques of law enforcement agencies' and are 'a constitutionally permissible and wholly legitimate aspect of effective police activity.'" (Fernandez v. California, supra, at p. 298, quoting Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, supra, at pp. 231-232 [93 S.Ct. 2041; 36 L.Ed.2nd 854].).

"Consent, much like a warrant, changes an officer's duties. It turns an unlawful act into one that is lawful." (Mendez v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2018) 897 F.3rd 1067, 1075.)

This includes searches of one's home: "Though the Fourth Amendment generally prohibits warrantless entry into a person's home, an exception applies to consent-based searches. Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 228, 93 S. Ct. 2041, 36 L. Ed. 2d 854 (1973). The government bears the burden to demonstrate that an exception to the warrant requirement applies. United States v. Lundin, 817 F.3d 1151, 1157 (9th Cir. 2016)." (United States v. Parkins (9th Cir. Feb. 14, 2024) 92 F.4th 882, __ [2024 U.S.App. LEXIS 3427].)

Why do people consent*? Would a person who has something to hide really consent to being searched? Yes!

Some persons are more concerned with what they perceive to be the appearance of guilt, and feel they must consent to avoid such an appearance, hoping the law enforcement officer will either lose interest or fail to find whatever it is the person hopes to keep concealed. Consent under these circumstances, however, if the person reasonably should have felt like he or she had the option of refusing, is still a valid consent. (See People v. James (1977) 19 Cal.3rd 99, 114.)

Limitation*: A consent, to be lawful, must be "freely and voluntarily" given. (Bumper v. North Carolina (1969) 391 U.S. 543, 548 [88 S.Ct. 1788; 20 L.Ed.2nd 797]; People v. Smith (2010) 190 Cal.App.4th 572, 576-577; United States v. Russell (9th Cir. 2012) 664 F.3rd 1279, 1281; People v. Ling (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1, 7; see also People v. Superior Court* [Corbett] (2017) 8 Cal.App.5th 670, 680-681; a signed consent held to be involuntary in that the interrogating officers ignored defendant's prior repeated refusals to consent.)

General Rule: "'To be effective, consent must be voluntary. [Citations.]' (People v. Ledesma (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 171, 233 . . .) '[W]here the validity of a search rests on consent, the State has the burden of proving that the necessary consent was obtained and that it was freely and voluntarily given, a burden that is not satisfied by showing a mere submission to a claim of lawful authority. [Citations.]' (Florida v. Royer (1983) 460 U.S. 491, 497 [103 S.Ct. 1319; 75 L.Ed.2nd 229, 103 S.Ct. 1319].) 'The voluntariness of consent is a question of fact to be determined from the totality of circumstances. [Citations.] If the validity of a consent is challenged, the prosecution must prove it was freely and voluntarily given—i.e., "that it was [not] coerced by threats or force, or granted only in submission to a claim of lawful authority.' [Citations.]'" (People v. Boyer (2006) 38 Cal.4th 412, 445-446 . . .)" (People v. Gutierrez (2019) 33 Cal.App.5th Supp. 11, 17.)

> "'[W]hen a prosecutor seeks to rely upon consent to justify the lawfulness of a search, he has the burden of proving that the consent was, in fact, freely and voluntarily given.' [Citations.]" (Schneckloth* (*v. Bustamonte (1973) 412 U.S. 218) at p. 222 ([36 L.Ed.2nd 854]).) He or she must also prove the warrantless search was within the scope of the consent given. (People v. Cantor (2007) 149 Cal.App.4th 961, 965 . . . .) "'Whether the search remained within the boundaries of the consent is a question of fact to be determined from the totality of [the] circumstances. [Citation.].'" (People v. Cruz (2019) 34 Cal.App.5th 764, 769.)

"Submission to Authority" Issue: Mere "acquiescence to a claim of lawful authority" will likely "vitiate" any consent given. (People v. Meza (2018) 23 Cal.App.5th 604, 611, fn. 2, citing Bumper v. North Carolina (1968) 391 U.S. 543, 548-549 [20 L.Ed.2nd 797; 88 S.Ct. 1788]; People v. Ling (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1, 8; People v. Mason (2016) 8 Cal.App.5th Supp. 11, 31-33; see also People v. Vannesse (2018) 23 Cal.App.5th 440, 445.)

> "When a law enforcement officer claims authority to search a home under a warrant, he announces in effect that the occupant has no right to resist the search. The situation is instinct with coercion—albeit colorably lawful coercion. Where there is coercion there cannot be consent." (Bumper v. North Carolina, supra, at p. 549; falsely telling defendant's grandmother that the officers had a search warrant which precipitated what the prosecution argued was a consent search.)

"'Coercion is not limited to physical abuse; it may involve 'more subtle forms of psychological persuasion,'" including "'deception or communication of false information.'" (Boitez v. Superior Court of Yolo County (2023) 96 Cal.App.5th 1213, 1224-1225; quoting People v. Miranda-Guerrero (2022) 14 Cal.5th 1, 20.)

However, where four uniformed officers went to the defendant's house, asked him to step outside, arrested and handcuffed him, and then asked to search the house. the court held that, "[T]he arresting officer neither held defendant at gunpoint, nor unduly detained or interrogated him; the officer did not claim the right to search without permission, nor act as if he intended to enter regardless of defendant's answer." Defendant's consent to search his house was upheld. (People v. James (1977) 19 Cal.3rd 99, 106-113.)

Also, a police officer merely telling a DUI (drugs) arrestee that she must submit to a blood test falls short of the coerciveness necessary to vitiate her consent. To have a valid argument that the arrestee was merely submitting to the officer's authority requires "far more coercive circumstances or additional facts such as an illegal arrest or a false claim of authority to search." The arrestee's actual knowledge of her right to refuse is but one fact to consider in determining whether she validly consented to providing a blood test. (People v. Lopez (2019) 8 Cal.5th 353, 330-331.)

False Claim of Exigent Circumstances: Use of a ruse, however, implying exigent circumstances, will likely negate any consent given. For instance, telling defendant that his computer is sending out viruses and promising that they can fix his computer and/or supply him with a free one in exchange, where in reality the agents were looking for child pornography, vitiates any consent given to do a warrantless inspection of his computer. (Pagán-González v. Moreno (1st Cir. P.R. 2019) 919 F.3rd 582.)

The trial court's refusal to grant defendant's suppression motion was reversed by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal in a 2-to-1 decision where FBI agents' use of deceit to seize and search defendant and his vehicle violated the Fourth Amendment. The FBI agents, with a warrant to search defendant's home, posed as police officers and played on defendant's trust and reliance on their story that his home had been burglarized to trick him into coming home, bringing his car and his person within the ambit of the warrant when it was not otherwise within its ambit. The FBI agents' use of a ruse to seize and search the defendant was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment. Balancing the Government's justification for its actions against the intrusion into the defendant's Fourth Amendment interests, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the Government's conduct was clearly unreasonable. The Court rejected the Government's arguments that the agents never seized the defendant, holding that the seizures of the defendant's person and the electronic devices in his car were the direct result of the FBI agents' unreasonable ruse. The Court further held that the Government failed to carry its burden to show that the defendant's incriminating statements, made after an agent revealed the true purpose of the investigation and asked to speak with him, were not obtained through exploitation of an illegality rather than by means sufficiently distinguishable to be purged of the primary taint. (United States v. Ramirez (9th Cir. 2020) 976 F.3rd 946.)

Burden of Proof: The prosecution bears the burden of showing that the defendant's consent to search is voluntary and unaffected by coercion. (Schneckloth v. Bustamonte (1973) 412 U.S. 218 [93 S.Ct. 2041; 36 L.Ed.2nd 854]; Estes v. Rowland (1993) 14 Cal.App.4th 508, 527; United States v. Bautista (9th Cir. 2004) 362 F.3rd 584; United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2017) 875 F.3rd 1265, 1276; Boitez v. Superior Court of Yolo County (2023) 96 Cal.App.5th 1213, 1217, 1224.)

"This burden cannot be discharged by showing no more than acquiescence to a claim of lawful authority." (Bumper v. North Carolina (1968) 391 U.S. 543, 548-549 [20 L.Ed.2nd 797; 88 S.Ct. 1788]; People v. Ling (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1, 8.)

"Whether consent to search was voluntarily given is 'to be determined from the totality of all the circumstances.'" (Italics added; United States v. Soriano (9th Cir. 2003) 361 F.3rd 494, 501; citing Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, supra; see also Pavao v. Pagay (9th Cir. 2002) 307 F.3rd 915, 919; United States v. Crapser (9th Cir. 2007) 472 F.3rd 1141, 1149; People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 762.)

"(T)he government's burden to show voluntariness cannot be discharged by showing no more than acquiescence to a claim of lawful authority." (United States v. Perez-Lopez (9th Cir. 2003) 348 F.3rd 839, 846; see also United States v. Bautista (9th Cir. 2004) 362 F.3rd 584, 589.)

"(T)he analysis naturally involves distinguishing consent from assent. "'Consent, in law, means a voluntary agreement by a person in the possession and exercise of sufficient mentality to make an intelligent choice, to do something proposed by another … . [Assent] means mere passivity or submission, which does not include consent.""" (People v. Ling (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1, 8; quoting People v. Fields (1979) 95 Cal.App.3rd 972, 977.)

"On appeal, evidence regarding the question of consent must be viewed in the light most favorable to the fact-finder's decision." (United States v. Kaplan (9th Cir. 1990) 895 F.2nd 618, 622.)

"'The voluntariness of the consent is in every case 'a question of fact to be determined in the light of all the circumstances.' (People v. James ((1977)) 19 Cal.3rd (99) at p. 106.) As part of the calculus in determining whether a defendant's consent to search was voluntarily given, courts must consider any evidence that a police officer made a misrepresentation that prompted the defendant's acquiescence to the search." (Boitez v. Superior Court of Yolo County (2023) 96 Cal.App.5th 1213, 1217, an "offer of leniency" case; quoting United States v. Vazquez (1st Cir. 2013) 724 F.3d 15, 19.)

The Boiltiz Court further noted (at pgs. 1217-1218, and 1223) that "the question of voluntary consent cannot be based on the subjective good faith of an officer in making a representation that induced the consent to search." (Citing Beck v. Ohio (1964) 379 U.S. 89, 97 [13 L Ed.2nd 142; 85 S.Ct. 223].) "Thus, 'whether intentional or inadvertent, the state of mind of the police is irrelevant to the question of the intelligence and voluntariness of [a defendant's] election to abandon his[, her, or their] rights.'" (Quoting Moran v. Burbine (1986) 475 U.S. 412, 423 [89 L.Ed.2nd 410; 106 S.Ct. 1135].)

Factors: As described in People v. Ramirez (1997) 59 Cal.App.4th 1548, at page 1558, the following are among the factors that will be taken into consideration in determining the validity of a consent to search, although none of these factors are necessarily dispositive in and of itself:

- Whether the person consenting was in custody.
- Whether the arresting officers had their guns drawn.
- Whether Miranda warnings had been given. (But, see Miranda, below.)
- Whether the person consenting was told that he or she had a right not to consent.
- Whether the person consenting was told that a search warrant could be obtained.

Mora-Alcaraz (9th Cir. 2021) 986 F.3rd 1151, 1156, 1157.)

- Whether consent was obtained while the person was confronted by many officers;

- Whether the consenting person experienced a significant interruption of his, her, or their liberty; and

- Whether the officer(s) used deceptive practices to obtain consent.

(Boitez v. Superior Court of Yolo County (2023) 96 Cal.App.5th 1213, 1224; citing United States v. Cormier (9th Cir. 2000) 220 F.3rd 1103, 1112; People v. Ledesma (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 171, 233–234; People v. Avalos (1996) 47 Cal.App.4th 1569, 1578.)

Circumstances Affecting Voluntariness:

Under Arrest:

The fact alone that the suspect is under arrest is not enough to demonstrate coercion. (United States v. Watson (1976) 423 U.S. 411 [96 S.Ct. 820; 46 L.Ed.2nd 598]; People v. Llamas (1991) 235 Cal.App.3rd 441, 447.)

A "person's in-custody status, even when he is handcuffed, does not automatically vitiate his consent; this is '"but one of the factors, but not the only one, to be considered by the trial judge who sees and hears the witnesses and is best able to pass upon the matter."'" (People v. Byers (2016) 6 Cal.App.5th 856, 864; quoting People v. Llamas, supra.)

> Being detained outside an apartment, ordered to the ground by an officer with a drawn gun, arrested, handcuffed, placed in the back of a van, and surrounded by several officers, held to be insufficient to vitiate the suspect's consent to enter his apartment and search his room. (People v. Byers, supra, at pp. 864-865.)

But if he is unlawfully under arrest (i.e., without probable cause), then any resulting consent obtained at that time will be invalid. (People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 762-765.)

Display of Firearms: Attempting to obtain a consent from a suspect while firearms are being displayed will inevitably result in a finding that the consent was coerced. (People v. McKelvy (1972) 23 Cal.App.3rd 1027, 1034: "(N)o matter how politely the officer may have phrased his request for the object, it is apparent that defendant's compliance was in fact under compulsion of a direct command by the officer. . . . The evidence established 'no more than acquiescence to a claim of lawful authority.'")

> In McKelvy, the defendant was standing in a police spotlight, surrounded by four police officers, all of whom were armed with either a shotgun or a carbine. Handing over contraband to the officers under these circumstances was held not to be a consensual act.
> Even an implied assertion of authority by the police officer may be enough to invalidate a consent to search. (People v. Fields (1979) 95 Cal.App.3rd 972, 976; Amos v. United States (1921) 255 U.S. 313, 317 [100 S.Ct. 2570; 65 L.Ed.2nd 654, 656].)

Threatening to Obtain a Search Warrant: While telling a suspect that officers will obtain a warrant invalidates a consensual search under circumstances where the officers do not actually have the necessary probable cause to obtain a warrant, threatening to get a warrant when the officers do have the necessary probable cause is lawful and will not, by itself, invalidate a resulting consent. (People v. Robinson (1957) 149 Cal.App.2nd 282, 286; People v. Goldberg (1984) 161 Cal.App.3rd 170, 188; Bumper v. North Carolina (1968) 391 U.S. 543 [88 S.Ct. 1788; 20 L.Ed.2nd 797] United States v. Soriano (9th Cir. 2003) 361 F.3rd 494, 971; People v. Williams (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th 949, 961.)

> With officers approaching and asking defendant at the airport if they could search him, while also telling him that he had the right to refuse but that he would be detained until a search warrant could be obtained although it was uncertain whether one could be obtained, after which defendant responded, "You may as well search me now," resulted in a voluntary search. Defendant's search was not obtained as the result of threats or coercion. (United States v. Pariseau (9th Cir. 2012) 685 F.3rd 1129.)
> However, falsely claiming to have a search warrant will invalidate any subsequent consent to search. (Bumper v. North Carolina (1968) 391 U.S. 543, 548-549 [20 L.Ed.2nd 797; 88 S.Ct. 1788]; see "Submission to Authority," above.

Threatening to obtain a search warrant to search defendant's briefcase when there was no probable cause sufficient to justify the issuance of a search warrant, negated defendant consent to search the briefcase. (United States v. Ocheltree (9th Cir. 1980) 622 F.2nd 992.)

An Offer of Leniency:

A false promise of leniency by a police officer to a person consenting to a search is, however, an important piece in ascertaining the voluntariness of the consent. (See United States v. Molt (3rd Cir. 1978) 589 F.2nd 1247, 1251–1252; when a defendant's consent "stems directly from misrepresentations by government agents, however innocently made, we deem the consent even more questionable.")

During a routine traffic stop, the officer making a deal with defendant not to tow his vehicle if, in exchange, defendant would agree to allow the officer to search it, did not constitute free and voluntary consent. The false promise of leniency not to tow the car was a material and inextricable part of the agreement inducing defendant's consent to the search, and thus, under the totality of the circumstances, defendant's consent was not voluntarily given. (Boitez v. Superior Court of Yolo County (2023) 96 Cal.App.5th 1213; noting (at pg. 1217) that "the question of voluntary consent cannot be based on the subjective good faith of an officer in making a representation that induced the consent to search.")

"'The offer or promise of such benefit need not be expressed, but may be implied from equivocal language not otherwise made clear.'" (Id., at p. 1225; Quoting People v. Hill (1967) 66 Cal.2nd 536, 549.)

Threatening to Use a Drug-Sniffing Dog: Threatening to use a drug-sniffing dog, when such use does not require the suspect's consent and is otherwise lawful, will not invalidate the resulting consent to search. (United States v. Todhunter (9th Cir. 2002) 297 F.3rd 886, 891.)

Threatening the Suspension of One's Driver's License and Other Consequences for Refusing a Blood Test after a DUI Arrest:

"A motorist's submission to a chemical test, if freely and voluntarily given, is actual consent under the Fourth Amendment. That the motorist is forced to choose between submitting to the chemical test and facing serious consequences for refusing to submit, pursuant to the implied consent law, does not in itself render the motorist's submission to be coerced or otherwise invalid for purposes of the Fourth Amendment." (People v. Harris (2015) 234 Cal.App.4th 671, 689.)

> I.e.: ". . . that he did not have the right to talk to a lawyer when deciding whether to submit to a chemical test, that his driver's license would be suspended if he refused to submit to a chemical test, and that his refusal could be used against him in court." (Id., at p. 690.)

The results of defendant's warrantless blood draw was improperly suppressed by the trial court where the arresting officer told defendant that the test was required by law, that comment being an accurate statement of the implied consent law. The fact that the officer did not inform defendant of the consequences of refusing was also not enough, by itself, to require suppression of the blood test results. Although providing an admonition about the consequences of withdrawing consent is to be considered in the totality of the circumstances surrounding the consent to a warrantless blood draw, the Fourth Amendment does not require the admonition in order to find a voluntary consent. (People v. Agnew (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th Supp. 1, 4-20; a decision of appellate division of the Santa Clara County Superior Court.)

However, in another prosecution for driving under the influence of alcohol, a different panel of the same appellate division of the Santa Clara County Superior Court disagreed with Agnew and held that blood draw evidence should have been suppressed under the Fourth Amendment in that under the totality of the circumstances, the People failed to show that defendant actually—freely and voluntarily—consented to a blood draw to which she had physically submitted after an incomplete implied consent admonishment. The admonishment, which stated that defendant was required to submit to a blood test, but did not include the consequences of refusal and was misleading. Defendant had a Fourth Amendment right, notwithstanding implied (or "deemed") consent, to refuse and to bear the consequences of such a refusal. Implied consent does not constitute real or actual consent in fact, for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. Also, the People failed to offer any evidence of any advance express consent by defendant, or even that she was a licensed California driver. (People v. Mason (2016) 8 Cal.App.5th Supp. 11, 18-33.)

> Per the Court, such implied consent "is not real or actual consent in fact for purposes of the Fourth Amendment, though it may be perfectly fine for purposes of > administrative proceedings involving forfeiture of driving privileges under the implied consent law upon a refusal to submit to a duly requested chemical test." (Id., at pp. 27-28; see Hughey v. Dept. of Motor Vehicles (1991) 235 Cal.App.3rd 752, 757.)

In People v. Lopez (2020) 46 Cal.App.5th 317, at pp. 332-333, the Third District Court of Appeal rejected the reasoning of Mason in favor of the holdings in Agnew, holding that Mason improperly "converted the admonitions into a constitutional requirement whenever an officer correctly states that the implied consent law requires motorists to submit to chemical tests if lawfully arrested for driving under the influence." "Relying on [the omission of the admonitions] as the only dispositive fact to defeat consent … in effect elevates that statutory admonition into a constitutional requirement under the Fourth Amendment. … California cases have rejected elevating a similar admonition under the implied consent law to a constitutional requirement, and the United States Supreme Court has rejected imposing analogous admonitions as constitutional requirements." (Quoting People v. Agnew, supra, at p. Supp. 19.)

Where a DUI arrestee is forced, over his objection, to submit to a warrantless blood test (as opposed to a breath or urine test), the U.S. Supreme Court has held that it is a Fourth Amendment violation to threaten incarceration or other penal sanctions, resulting in the suppression of the results of that blood test. (See Birchfield v. North Dakota (2016) 579 U.S. 438 [136 S.Ct. 2160; 195 L.Ed.2nd 560].)

> However, the Fourth Amendment was held not to have prohibited a finding of implied consent to a blood draw under California's former law, even though defendant was advised that the law required a chemical test, because he was given a choice of tests. Just because the state cannot compel a warrantless blood test does not mean that it cannot offer one as an alternative to the breath test that it clearly can compel. The trial court properly found that defendant's consent to a blood draw was voluntary, even though he had been advised that a breath or blood test was required by the law. Both arresting officers testified to the circumstances under which defendant gave his consent to the blood test and there was no testimony that he only gave actual consent because of the threat of criminal prosecution. (People v. Nzolameso (2019) 39 Cal.App.5th 1181.)

Also, the Fourth Amendment does not require suppression of evidence from a warrantless blood draw because substantial evidence supported a finding that defendant consented. After the officer instructed her that the implied consent law required her to undergo a blood draw (she having been arrested for driving while under the influence of a drug), defendant did not object or refuse to undergo the test, did not resist any of the officers' directions, and voluntarily placed her arm on the table to allow the phlebotomist to draw her blood. The result was not changed by the officer's failure to relate the admonitions regarding the consequences of refusal. (People v. Lopez (2020) 46 Cal.App.5th 317; holding, at pp. 333-336: "The fact that a motorist is told he will face serious consequences if he refuses to submit to a blood test does not, in itself, mean that his submission was coerced.")

Threatening to Search the Home of a Loved One:

Even though defendant eventually consented to the search of his residence in writing, that consent was not obtained until after he had repeatedly asserted his rights, and only after the officers threatened to disrupt defendant's parents' lives by searching their residence as well. As ruled by the trial court, "by the time (defendant) put his name and signature on that page (i.e., the written consent form), that did not mean much." (People v. Superior Court* [Corbett] (2017) 8 Cal.App.5th 670, 680-681.)

Threats to Arrest or to Force Entry:

Qualified immunity denied to a police officer and a social worker who, without a warrant or exigent circumstances, threatened to force their way in plaintiff's home if not allowed in. (Calabretta v. Floyd (9th Cir. 1999) 189 F.3rd 808.)

Threatening to arrest a homeowner for harboring a criminal, made shortly before obtaining her consent to enter her residence to look for a fugitive, creates the issue of the voluntariness of her subsequent consent. (West v. City of Caldwell (9th Cir. 2019) 831 F.3rd 978, 983-894; assuming, without deciding the issue, that her consent was coerced, holding that the defendant officers were entitled to qualified immunity on the issue. The Court, however, after reviewing the circumstances and the attenuating factors between the threat and the later consent, noted that those "factors . . . suggested voluntary consent." [Pg. 894.].)

Implying Guilt: It is arguably improper to purposely put a subject in the position where he feels that by exercising his right to refuse, he would be incriminating himself or admitting participation in illegal activity. (Crofoot v. Superior Court (1981) 121 Cal.App.3rd 717, 725.)

> For example: "You don't have anything in your pockets you don't want me to see, do you?" (Negative response) "Then you wouldn't mind me looking, would you?" (See Ibid.)
> "(I)mplicit in the officer's statement is the threat that by exercising his right to refuse the search (the suspect) would be incriminating himself or admitting participation in illegal activity." (Ibid.)

Using a Ruse: A free and voluntary consent, as a general rule, may not be obtained by, or as the product of, a ruse. (People v. Reyes (2000) 83 Cal.App.4th 7, 13; People v. Reeves (1964) 61 Cal.2nd 268, 273; People v. Miller (1967) 248 Cal.App.2nd 731.)

> But, where the ruse is only partial, and does not disguise the scope of the proposed search, then the resulting search may be upheld. (People v. Avalos (1996) 47 Cal.App.4th 1568.)
> Use of a ruse, however, implying exigent circumstances, will likely negate any consent given. For instance, telling defendant that his computer is sending out viruses and promising that they can fix his computer and/or supply him with a free one in exchange, where in reality the agents were looking for child pornography, vitiates any consent given to do a warrantless inspection of his computer. (Pagán-González v. Moreno (1st Cir. P.R. 2019) 919 F.3rd 582.)

Threats to Take Away One's Children: Threatening to take away one's children, letting social services take them, if the person does not cooperate, will negate a consent to search. (United States v. Soriano (9th Cir. 2003) 346 F.3rd 963.)

> In Soriano, the consent was saved when a federal agent immediately interrupted the police officer who made the threat, and assured the female subject that she was not then a suspect, nor likely to be arrested, and therefore need not worry about having her children taken away. However, the decision was a split decision, with the dissent arguing that the woman's consent was still not free and voluntary despite the agent's attempt to save it. (See pp. 975-979.)

See also Lynum v. Illinois (1963) 372 U.S. 528, 534 [83 S.Ct. 917; 9 L.Ed.2nd 922, 926]; and United States v. Tingle (9th Cir. 1981) 658 F.2nd 1332, 1336; two confession cases where statements were rendered involuntary due to threats to take the children away if the subjects did not cooperate.

And see In re Rudy F. (2004) 117 Cal.App.4th 1124, where a consent to search was negated by the threat to "book" the person's children; the issue not even being contested on appeal.

Other Inducements:

Telling defendant that the owner of the house had already consented to the search, a truthful statement, resulting in defendant giving his own consent to the search of his room in that house, did not invalidate defendant's consent. (People v. Monterroso (2004) 34 Cal.4th 743, 758-759.)

Per Delia v. City of Rialto (9th Cir. 2010) 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 26968 (certiorari granted; eventually affirmed at Delia v. City of Rialto (9th Cir. 2012) 682 F.3rd 1213, without further discussion), threatening an employee with the loss of his job if he didn't retrieve certain items from his home was not a voluntary consent and a Fourth Amendment search violation.

However, because the U.S. Supreme Court, having granted certiorari, held that the attorney hired by the city to investigate the plaintiff and who made the threat had qualified immunity (see Filarsky v. Delia (2012) 566 U.S. 377 [132 S.Ct. 1657; 182 L.Ed.2nd 662].), the issue of the voluntariness of the plaintiff's consent was never discussed by the Supreme Court.

Combination of Inducements: Being under arrest, in handcuffs, without having received his Miranda rights and without having been told of his right to refuse a consent search, held not to be enough to prevent defendant from validly consenting to the search of his room. (People v. Monterroso (2004) 34 Cal.4th 743, 757-759.)

Note: But this combination of factors certainly made it an issue that could have gone either way.

During a Consensual Encounter:

Asking a person for consent to search his person does not, by itself, convert a consensual encounter into a detention "as long as the police do not convey a message that compliance with their requests is required." (United States v. Washington (9th Cir. 2007) 490 F.3rd 765, 770.)

After defendant, who had prior drug and firearm-related convictions, paid cash for a last-minute, one-way ticket without checking any luggage, an officer asked defendant for permission to search his bag and his person. Defendant consented twice and spread his arms and legs to facilitate the search. The officer felt something hard and unnatural in defendant's groin area and arrested him. The appellate court determined that defendant voluntarily consented to a patdown search because he was not in custody, officers told him he was free to leave, and officers did not tell him that they could obtain a search warrant if he refused to consent. The scope of the search was reasonable because it was reasonable for the officer to assume the consent included the groin area since the officer specifically advised defendant that the officer was looking for narcotics, defendant lifted his arms and spread his legs, defendant never objected or revoked consent, the search did not extend inside the clothing, and the officer methodically worked his way up defendant's legs before searching the groin. (United States v. Russell (9th Cir. 2012) 664 F.3rd 1279.)

A Suspect's Failure to Object:

The failure to object to police entry by itself, when no request for permission to enter was made, does not constitute effective consent. (United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2017) 875 F.3rd 1265, 1276-1278; citing United States v. Shaibu (9th Cir. 1990) 920 F.2nd 1423, 1428.)

Manner of Inquiry: It is not so much what the officer is asking, but rather the "manner or mode" in which it is put to the citizen which determines whether the response is voluntary or not. (People v. Franklin (1987) 192 Cal.App.3rd 938, 941.)

Reasonable Person Test: For a consent search to be valid, the suspect must reasonably believe, under the circumstances, he has a choice. (People v. James (1977) 19 Cal.3rd 99, 116.)

"People targeted for police questioning rightly might believe themselves the object of official scrutiny. Such directed scrutiny, however, is not a detention." (People v. Chamagua (2019) 33 Cal.App.5th 925, 929; citing People v. Franklin (1987) 192 Cal.App.3rd 935, 940.)

Note: Asking for consent to search in a manner implying (even if not expressly stating) that the suspect is being offered a choice, helps to prove that a positive response was voluntary. For instance: "Sir, do you mind if I look in your car?" Or, "Sir, may I look in your car?" Not; "I'm going to search your car!"

Age of the Suspect:

Obtaining a 15-year-old minor's consent to search her cellphone was upheld where the minor was read and reviewed a consent-to-search form, she was verbally told she could refuse consent, and she signed the form and provided the detective with her passcode for the phone. Although the minor was a patient in a hospital, there was nothing about her medical condition that would have prevented her from providing a free and voluntary consent. (In re M.S. (2019) 32 Cal.App.5th 1177, 1187.)

Product of a Constitutional Violation: A suspect's consent to search given immediately (i.e., without sufficient intervening factors) after each of the following will likely be held to be invalid:

Rule: If an otherwise voluntary consent is the direct product of some other illegal police act (e.g.; illegal search, seizure, arrest, detention, etc.), then the consent and the resulting direct products of the consent may also be suppressed.

Poole (1986) 182 Cal.App.3rd 1004, 1012; People v. $48,715 United States Currency (1997) 58 Cal.App.4th 1507; United States v. Washington (2004) 387 F.3rd 1060; People v. Krohn (2007) 149 Cal.App.4th 1294; People v. Werner (2012) 207 Cal.App.4th 1195, 1210-1212; In re J.G. (2014) 228 Cal.App.4th 402, 408-413.)

Illegal Search:

"The rule is clearly established that consent induced by an illegal search or arrest is not voluntary, and that if the accused consents immediately following an illegal entry or search, his assent is not voluntary because it is inseparable from the unlawful conduct of the officers." (Burrows v. Superior Court, supra; People v. Johnson (1968) 68 Cal.2nd 629, 632; People v. Haven (1963) 59 Cal.2nd 713, 719.)

But, a search done under the authority of a search warrant that is held only to be partially invalid may not require the suppression of evidence recovered from a consensual search of another property obtained during the execution of the warrant. (See United States v. SDI Future Health, Inc. (9th Cir. 2009) 568 F.3rd 684, 707-708.)

See also People v. Lawler (1973) 9 Cal.3rd 156, 163.)

Illegal Detention:

As a "seizure" of one's person, the products of an illegal detention are also subject to being suppressed under the Exclusionary Rule. (See People v. Krohn (2007) 149 Cal.App.4th 1294; detaining defendant for drinking in public, when he was not in a public place, is an illegal detention and requires the suppression of the controlled substances found on his person in a subsequent consensual search.)

"Where an illegal detention occurs, unless 'subsequent events adequately dispel the coercive taint of the initial illegality, i.e., where there is no longer causality, the subsequent consent is' ineffective." People v. Zamudio (2008) 43 Cal.4th 327, 340; citing People v. $48,715 United States Currency (1997) 58 Cal.App.4th 1507, 1514.)

But, an illegal detention (or arrest) does not serve to invalidate a previously obtained, otherwise lawful, consent. (People v. $48,715 United States Currency, supra, at pp. 1513-1515.)

"Where an illegal detention occurs, unless 'subsequent events adequately dispel the coercive taint of the initial illegality, i.e., where there is no longer causality, the subsequent consent is' ineffective. (Citations.)" (People v. Zamudio (2008) 43 Cal.4th 327, 341.)

Generally, a consent to search obtained during an unlawfully prolonged detention will require the suppression of any evidence discovered during the resulting search. (See United States v. Chavez-Valenzuela (9th Cir. 2001) 268 F.3rd 719.)

However, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that a minimally prolonged detention (e.g., a couple of minutes), at least when motivated by other newly discovered information even though that new information by itself might not constitute a reasonable suspicion, does not make the prolonging of the detention unreasonable. Under such circumstances, a minimally prolonged detention is not unlawful. A consent to search obtained during that disputed time period is lawful. (United States v. Turvin et al. (9th Cir. 2008) 517 F.3rd 1097.)

Defendant argued that when police showed up at his door with an arrest warrant for another person, and asked for consent to enter to search only where a person might be hiding, that he was in custody (i.e., detained), and that his consent to enter was the product of an unlawful detention. The Court disagreed, noting that nothing the officers said or did would have indicated to a reasonable person that he could not decline the officers' request to enter. (United States v. Jones (7th Cir. 2022) 22 F.4th 667; noting that the time between when the officers first knocked and when defendant opened the door was, at most, a minute and a half, and that the officers spoke in a conversational, non-threatening tone, making it clear to him that they were not there for him.)

But, note that the fact that a suspect is being illegally detained does not necessarily mean, by itself, that the consent is involuntary. (See People v. Llamas (1991) 235 Cal.App.3rd 441; noting, but not addressing the issue whether being illegally detained invalidated a consent under the "fruit of the poisonous tree" doctrine.)

Under the "fruit of the poisonous tree" doctrine, subsequent events may dispel the coercive taint of the initial illegality, making a subsequent consent lawful. (See United States v. Ibarra (10th Cir. 1992) 955 F.2nd 1405, 1411, fn. 8.)

See "Consent During an Illegally Prolonged Detention," below

Illegal Arrest:

Handcuffing a person suspected of possible involvement in a narcotics transaction, but where the officer testified only that he was "uncomfortable" with the fact that defendant was tall (6' 6") and that narcotics suspects sometimes carry weapons (although the officer did not pat him down for weapons), converted a detention into an arrest, making the subsequent consent to search involuntary. (People v. Stier (2008) 168 Cal.App.4th 21.)

With only a reasonable suspicion to believe that the occupant of a house might be involved in criminal activity, ordering him out of the house and to back up as he did so, and holding onto him (albeit without handcuffs) with his hands behind his back while asking for his consent to search his person, was illegal. Full probable cause was necessary. The subsequent consent to search his person and his house was the product of that illegal detention was invalid.

(People v. Lujano (2014) 229 Cal.App.4th 175, 182-185; "If consent is induced by an illegal arrest or detention, the illegality vitiates the consent and may require suppression of seized evidence unless attenuating circumstances dissipate the taint.")

Where defendant is unlawfully under arrest (i.e., without probable cause), any resulting consent obtained at that time is likely invalid, depending upon the totality of the circumstances. (People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 762-765; also finding it irrelevant that defendant was told that he was not under arrest.)

Illegal Interrogation. (People v. Superior Court* [Keithley] (1975) 13 Cal.3rd 406, 410; following the violation of the suspect's Miranda rights.)

Right to Counsel Violation: Without informing a charged defendant's lawyer in violation of the subject's Sixth Amendment rights (i.e., after his arraignment). (Tidwell v. Superior Court (1971) 17 Cal.App.3rd 780, 789.)

But see United States v. Kon YuLeung (2nd Cir. 1990) 910 F.2nd 33, 38-40 (consent valid despite having been indicted); and United States v. Hidalgo (11th Cir. 1993) 7 F.3rd 1566, 1570, both holding that obtaining a defendant's consent to search is not a critical stage of the proceedings protected by the Sixth Amendment.)

Consent During an Illegally Prolonged Detention*:

General Rule: Prolonged Detentions are Illegal: A traffic stop (or any other detention) which is reasonable in its inception may become unreasonable if prolonged beyond that point reasonably necessary for the officer to complete the purposes of the stop or detention. (People v. McGaughran (1979) 25 Cal.3rd 577.)

Under the theory of McGaughran, a consent obtained during an unconstitutionally prolonged detention may be subject to suppression as the product of that illegal detention. (See People v. Llamas (1991) 235 Cal.App.3rd 441, 447; and People v. Valenzuela (1994) 28 Cal.App.4th 817, 833.)

An otherwise lawful "knock and talk," where officers continued to press the defendant for permission to enter his apartment after his denial of any illegal activity, converted the contact into an unlawfully "extended" detention, causing the Court to conclude that a later consent-to-search was the product of the illegal detention, and thus invalid. (United States v. Washington (9th Cir. 2004) 387 F.3rd 1060.)

Lawfully Prolonged Detentions:

> The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that a minimally prolonged detention (e.g., about four minutes), at least when motivated by other newly discovered information even though that new information by itself might not constitute a reasonable suspicion, does not make the prolonging of the detention unreasonable. Under such circumstances, a minimally prolonged detention is not unlawful. (United States v. Turvin et al. (9th Cir. 2008) 517 F.3rd 1097.)
>
> > However, Turvin was subsequently abrogated to the extent that a "brief pause" in writing the defendant a ticket to inquire about defendant's possible (but without reasonable suspicion) drug trafficking was upheld as "reasonable," and was inconsistent with Rodriguez v. United States (2015) 575 U.S, 348 [135 S.Ct. 1609; 191 L.Ed.2nd 4927]. (United States v. Landeros (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 862, 866-867; see below.
> Developing new information to the effect that a vehicle's passenger might be an under-age prostitute and that the defendant driver her pimp, a continued detention for the purpose of investigating that possibility was lawful. (United States v. Rodgers (9th Cir. 2011) 656 F.3rd 1023, 1027; Extending a traffic stop for the purpose of investigating other crimes for which there is no suspicion constitutes an illegal detention. But it is also a rule that "(a) 'period of detention [may be] permissibly extended [where] new grounds for suspicion of criminal activity continue . . . to unfold.'" (Citing United States v. Mayo (9th Cir. 2005) 394 F.3rd 1271.)

After Detention Ends: If the person voluntarily consents to having his vehicle searched after he is free to leave, there is no prolonged detention. The officer is under no obligation to advise him that he is no longer being detained (or that he has a right to refuse to allow the officer to search). (Robinette v. Ohio (1996) 519 U.S. 33 [117 S.Ct. 417; 136 L.Ed.2nd 347].)

> However; the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal believes that a consent search, obtained after the purposes of the traffic stop had been satisfied, is invalid as a product of an illegally prolonged detention, the extended detention being the result of the officer's unnecessary inquiries made during the traffic stop. (United States v. Chavez-Valenzuela (9th Cir. 2001) 268 F.3rd 719, amended at 279 F.3rd 1062.) Robinette was not discussed by the Court.
>
> The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal was, at one time, of the belief that an officer must be able to "articulate suspicious factors that are particularized and objective" in order to "broaden the scope of questioning" beyond the purposes of the initial traffic stop." (United States v. Murillo (9th Cir. 2001) 255 F.3rd 1169, 1174.); a questionable rule in light of Robinette.)

> But see the dissenting opinion in the denial for a rehearing en banc in United States v. Chavez-Valenzuela, supra, pointing out the absurdity of what Justice O'Scannlain refers to as the "seven minute rule," noting this decision's conflict with Robinette and other Supreme Court authority. (281 F.3rd 897.)
>
> The Ninth Circuit's argument on this issue was similar to that made by the Ohio Supreme Court, and rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court, in Robinette: Per the Ohio Supreme Court: "When the motivation behind a police officer's continued detention of a person stopped for a traffic violation is not related to the purpose of the original, constitutional stop, and when that continued detention is not based on any articulable facts giving rise to a suspicion of some separate illegal activity justifying an extension of the detention, the continued detention constitutes an illegal seizure. (73 Ohio St.3rd at p. 650.)"

Contrary to the Ninth Circuit's published opinions on this issue, the Supreme Court has held: "Even when law enforcement officers have no basis for suspecting a particular individual, they may pose questions, ask for identification, and request consent to search luggage—provided they do not induce cooperation by coercive means." (United States v. Drayton (2002) 536 U.S. 194 [122 S.Ct. 2105; 153 L.Ed.2nd 242.); citing Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, 434-435 [111 S.Ct. 2382; 115 L.Ed.2nd 389, 398-399].)

> "Police officers act in full accord with the law when they ask citizens for consent. It reinforces the rule of law for the citizen to advise the police of his or her wishes and for the police to act in reliance on that understanding. When this exchange takes place, it dispels inferences of coercion." (United States v. Drayton, supra, at p. 207; see also People v. Lopez (2019) 8 Cal.5th 353, 371.)

Most recently, in Illinois v Caballes (2005) 543 U.S. 405 [125 S.Ct. 834; 160 L.Ed.2nd 842], the U.S. Supreme Court rejected the argument that allowing a narcotics-sniffing dog to sniff around the outside of a vehicle that was lawfully stopped for a traffic offense "unjustifiably enlarge(s) the scope of a routine traffic stop into a drug investigation." Per the Supreme Court: No expectation of privacy is violated by this procedure, and therefore does not implicate the Fourth Amendment.

Also, the U.S. Supreme Court rejected the Ninth Circuit's unsupported conclusion that, absent "a particularized reasonable suspicion that an individual is not a citizen," it is a Fourth Amendment violation to ask him or her about the subject's citizenship (see Mena v. City of Simi Valley (9th Cir. 2003) 332 F.3rd 1255, 1264-1265; reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court in Muehler v. Mena (2005) 544 U.S. 93, 100-101 [125 S.Ct. 1465; 161 L.Ed.2nd 299].)

California courts seem to be in line with these latest Supreme Court pronouncements on the issue: "Questioning during the routine traffic stop on a subject unrelated to the purpose of the stop is not itself a Fourth Amendment violation. Mere questioning is neither a search nor a seizure. [Citation.] While the traffic detainee is under no obligation to answer unrelated questions, the Constitution does not prohibit law enforcement officers from asking. [Citation.]" (People v. Brown (1998) 62 Cal.App.4th 493, 499-500; see also People v. Gallardo (2005) 130 Cal.App.4th 234, 239; asking for consent to search during the time it would have taken to write the citation that was the original cause of the stop is legal, despite the lack of any evidence to believe there was something there to search for.)

Citing Muehler v. Mena, supra, the Ninth Circuit eventually conceded that so long as questioning of a legally detained suspect does not unlawfully prolong the detention, "mere police questioning does not constitute a seizure" under the Fourth Amendment. Therefore, questioning a detainee about possible criminal activity unrelated to the cause of the detention, and without a "particularized suspicion" to support a belief that the detainee is involved in that unrelated activity, is lawful. (United States v. Mendez (9th Cir. 2007) 467 F.3rd 1077, 1079-1081.)

Although defendant, driving a semi with an attached trailer, had initially been detained when a highway patrol officer initiated a traffic stop of his tractor-trailer and he pulled to the side of a freeway, that detention had ended by the time defendant gave his consent to search the tractor-trailer. The officer had returned defendant's documents, told him he was free to leave, and allowed him to walk partway back to his vehicle when the officer asked for consent to search his vehicle. Thus, there was no prolonged detention. (People v. Arebalos-Cabrera (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 179, 183-190.)

The Scope of the Consent; i.e., what areas may be searched based upon the consent given?

Burden of Proof: The prosecution bears the burden to prove that a warrantless search was within the scope of the consent given. (People v. Cantor (2007) 149 Cal.App.4th 961, 965.)

Test: The scope of the consent is measured by a standard of objective reasonableness based upon all the surrounding circumstances: "What would the typical reasonable person have understood by the exchange between the officer and the suspect?" (Florida v. Jimeno (1991) 500 U.S. 248, 251 [111 S.Ct. 1801; 114 L.Ed.2nd 297, 303]; (People v. Tully (2012) 54 Cal.4th 952, 983-984; United States v. Lopez-Cruz (9th Cir. 2013) 730 F.3rd 803, 809-811; People v. Crenshaw (1992) 9 Cal.App.4th 1403, 1408; People v. Pickard (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th Supp. 12, 15; West v. City of Caldwell (9th Cir. 2019) 831 F.3rd 978. 989.)

> The test is: "(W)hat would the typical reasonable person have understood by the exchange between the officer and the suspect?" "(A)n officer does not exceed the scope of a suspect's consent by 'searching' when the officer asked only if he or she could 'look.'" Checking under the trunk's carpet lining in the suspect's vehicle, therefore, was no more than part of an otherwise lawful search based upon the defendant's consent to "look" for anything that they were "not supposed to have." (United States v. McWeeney (9th Cir. 2006) 454 F.3rd 1030, 1034-1035.)

Case Law:

> In Florida v. Jimeno, supra, it was held that it was "reasonable for an officer to consider a suspect's general consent to a search of his car to include consent to examine a paper bag lying on the floor of the car." (pg. 251.) The Court also noted that it would be "very likely unreasonable (italics added) to think that a suspect, by consenting to the search of his trunk, has agreed to the breaking open of a locked briefcase within the trunk." (pgs. 251-252.)
>
> In determining the reasonableness of a searching officer's conduct in a consensual search of a residence, a court must balance the extent of the intrusion into defendant's privacy rights with the governmental interest justifying it. (People v. Smith (2010) 190 Cal.App.4th 572, 577-580; upholding the opening of the door to a noisy clothes dryer so that the officers could maintain control of a potentially dangerous situation and to communicate with subjects in the house.)
>
> When defendant turned around and raised his arms in response to the officer's statement; "Hey, I'd like to shake you down real quick, if you don't mind," this was held to be a consent to a patdown only, and not to a full body search. (People v. Tufono (1997) 57 Cal.App.4th 1534, 1542-1543; recovery of a vial during a full search held to be illegal.)
>
> Consenting to being searched for weapons did not allow for the officer reaching into his pocket and retrieving marijuana. (People v. Rice (1968) 259 Cal.App.2nd 399, 403.)

And giving an officer permission to enter his home for the purpose of finding someone who had run into the house did not authorize the search for a crowbar used in a burglary and found in a bedroom closet. (People v. Superior Court* [Arketa] (1970) 10 Cal.App.3rd 122.)

"(N)either a general consent to search a particular premises nor a consent to search for specific items, includes the right to intercept telephone calls to the premises involved." (People v. Harwood (1977) 74 Cal.App.3rd 460, 468.)

A suspect's consent to "search" his phone does not include the right to answer in-coming phone calls. (United States v. Lopez-Cruz (9th Cir. 2013) 730 F.3rd 803, 809-811.)

However, the rule of Florida v. Jimeno (1991) 500 U.S. 248, 251 [111 S.Ct. 1801; 114 L.Ed.2nd 297, 303] (above) was applied to uphold a car search that involved removing a plastic vent cover on a door post which displayed striation marks indicating recent removal or tampering. (People v. Crenshaw (1992) 9 Cal.App.4th 1403, 1414.)

Stepping aside while swinging the door open to an officer who was responding to an incomplete 911 call for help, was held to be a consent to enter. (Pavao v. Pagay (9th Cir. 2002) 307 F.3rd 915.)

Voluntarily consenting to the search of his vehicle, during which only money was found, and then later that day admitting that methamphetamine was hidden in a particular place in the vehicle, was sufficient to reasonably cause the officers to believe that they had consent to go back into the vehicle to recover the meth. (United States v. Rodriguez-Preciado (9th Cir. 2005) 399 F.3rd 1118, 1131, as amended at 416 F.3rd 939.)

With defendant agreeing to the officer's request to "check (defendant's car) real quick and get you on your way," the scope of that consent was exceeded at some point before the search had continued for fifteen minutes without finding anything, and certainly when the officer later pulled a box from the trunk and removed the back panel to the box by unscrewing some screws. (People v. Cantor (2007) 149 Cal.App.4th 961.)

When asked for consent to search his person, a reasonable person would expect that an officer will then ask him to exit his vehicle for the purpose of conducting that search. (United States v. Washington (9th Cir. 2007) 490 F.3rd 765, 770-771.)

Consent to search defendant's truck found to extend to a second search absent any evidence to indicate that defendant was limiting his consent to the first search only. (People v. Valencia (2011) 201 Cal.App.4th 922.)

After defendant, who had prior drug and firearm-related convictions, paid cash for a last-minute, one-way ticket without checking any luggage, an officer asked defendant for permission to search his bag and his person. Defendant consented twice and spread his arms and legs to facilitate the search. The officer felt something hard and unnatural in defendant's groin area and arrested him. The appellate court determined that defendant voluntarily consented to a patdown search because he was not in custody, officers told him he was free to leave, and officers did not tell him that they could obtain a search warrant if he refused to consent. The scope of the search was reasonable because it was reasonable for the officer to assume the consent included the groin area since the officer specifically advised defendant that the officer was looking for narcotics, defendant lifted his arms and spread his legs, defendant never objected or revoked consent, the search did not extend inside the clothing, and the officer methodically worked his way up defendant's legs before searching the groin. (United States v. Russell (9th Cir. 2012) 664 F.3rd 1279, 1281-1284.)

> In contrast, see United States v. Sanders (8th Cir. 2005) 424 F.3rd 768, 776, where the suspect consented to a search of his person but then withdrew consent by actively shielding his groin area from the officer's search.

Consent to search the Plaintiff's vehicle held not to extend to her private documents found in the vehicle. (Winfield v. Trottier (2nd Cir. 2013) 710 F.3rd 49; officer opened and read a private letter.)

A suspect's general consent to search his car does not allow the officers to drill through the floor of the trunk. "Cutting" or "destroying" an object during a search requires either explicit consent for the destructive search or probable cause. (United States v. Zamora-Garcia (8th Cir. Ark. 2016) 831 F.3rd 979.)

Officers who used tear gas on the plaintiff's home to flush out her fugitive boyfriend, having received her consent to enter the house to look for him, were entitled to qualified immunity on a "scope-of-consent" claim because no U.S. Supreme Court or Ninth Circuit case clearly established, as of August, 2014, that the officers exceeded the scope of the consent given them by causing the tear gas canisters to enter the house in an attempt to flush the boyfriend out into the open. (West v. City of Caldwell (9th Cir. 2019) 831 F.3rd 978. 984-986.)

Note the dissent, however, which argued (at p. 989) that to infer that the plaintiff's consent to officers to enter her home for the purpose of apprehending her fugitive boyfriend included consent to lop tear gas in through the windows, doing the damage that it did, "borders on the fantastic," and "that no 'typical reasonable person [would] have understood . . . the exchange between . . . [O]fficer [Richardson] and [West]' as permitting the throwing of destructive tear gas canisters into her house from the outside, before any officers even attempted to 'get inside [the] house and apprehend [Salinas].'" Per the dissent: "Interpreting the exchange between West and Officer Richardson as permitting the SWAT attack on West's house as performed is patently unreasonable. Any reasonable officer would have known at the time that the search exceeded the scope of West's consent."

Where defendant's consent to search of his cellular telephone for matter unrelated to the purpose of the investigation led to evidence of, and his indictment for, possession of child pornography, The Fifth Circuit (in reversing the trial court) held that suppression of the evidence was not warranted under the Fourth Amendment because the broad consent given by defendant encompassed the search and seizure conducted. The written consent to search form signed by defendant authorized, among other things, "a complete search of [Gallegos's] phone" as well as the seizure of any "materials, or other property" that the government might want to examine. Applying these terms as written, the court concluded that the government did not exceed the scope of the defendant's consent by extracting the iPhone's data or later reviewing it. First, the Court held that no aspect of the search fell outside the range of conduct that a typical reasonable person would expect from a "complete" iPhone search or from the subsequent seizure of any "materials" that that government might want to examine. Second, the court concluded that a typical reasonable person would know that a cellphone contains extensive personal information and would understand that a "complete" cellphone search refers not just to a physical examination of the phone, but further contemplates an inspection of the phone's "complete" contents. Finally, the court found that a typical reasonable owner of a cellphone would also realize that permission to seize "materials" included permission to seize and examine such information. (United States v. Gallegos-Espinal (5th Cir. TX, 2020) 970 F.3rd 586.)

Multiple Searches Based Upon a Single Consent: A "single grant of consent" does not, as a matter of law, prohibit more than one search depending upon the facts and circumstances. (People v. Valencia (2011) 201 Cal.App.4th 922, 928-932.)

However, the general rule is that "a consent to search usually involves an 'understanding that the search will be conducted forthwith, and that only a single search will be made.'" (Id., at p. 937, quoting People v. Logsdon (Ill. Ct. App. 1991) 567 N.E.2nd 746, 748.)

The non-exclusive list of factors to consider when assessing the reasonableness of conducting more than one search based upon a single grant of consent include, but is not limited to, the following:

(1) Whether the defendant placed any limitations on the scope of the initial consent.
(2) The amount of time that passed between the grant of consent and the contested search.
(3) Whether police remained in control of the area being searched prior to conducting the second search.
(4) Whether the officers were searching a residence or other area that is entitled to a heightened expectation of privacy.
(5) Whether the suspect was arrested between the initial search and the subsequent search.
(6) Whether the searches were part of a continuous criminal investigation having a single objective.
(7) Whether the defendant had advance knowledge of, and an opportunity to object to, a subsequent search.

(People v. Valencia, supra, at pp. 936-937.)

In Valencia, the Court held that a second search of defendant's vehicle based upon an earlier consent was lawful given the fact that defendant's expectation of privacy with respect to his vehicle was not diminished by the second search, it was defendant's vehicle and not his residence being searched, there was no evidence that defendant was arrested, or even detained, between the two searches, the time period between searches was very minimal, and defendant did not limit his consent to a particular time or place. (Id., at pp. 938-940.)

Implied Consent to Provide Blood Sample as a Condition of the Privilege to Drive:

Veh. Code § 23612(a)(1)(D): Implied Consent: As the statute reads since being amended, effective 1/1/2019, this section provides: "The person shall be told (by the arresting officer) that his or her failure to submit to, or the failure to complete, the required breath or urine testing (eliminating any reference to a blood test) will result in a fine and mandatory imprisonment if the person is convicted of a violation of Section 23152 or 23153. The person shall also be told that his or her failure to submit to, or the failure to complete, the required breath, blood, or urine tests will result in (i) the administrative suspension by the department of the person's privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a period of one year, (ii) the administrative revocation by the department of the person's privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a period of two years if the refusal occurs within 10 years of a separate violation of Section 23103 as specified in Section 23103.5, or of Section 23140, 23152, or 23153 of this code, or of Section 191.5 or subdivision (a) of Section 192.5 of the Penal Code that resulted in a conviction, or if the person's privilege to operate a motor vehicle has been suspended or revoked pursuant to Section 13353, 13353.1, or 13353.2 for an offense that occurred on a separate occasion, or (iii) the administrative revocation by the department of the person's privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a period of three years if the refusal occurs within 10 years of two or more separate violations of Section 23103 as specified in Section 23103.5, or of Section 23140, 23152, or 23153 of this code, or of Section 191.5 or subdivision (a) of Section 192.5 of the Penal Code, or any combination thereof, that resulted in convictions, or if the person's privilege to operate a motor vehicle has been suspended or revoked two or more times pursuant to Section 13353, 13353.1, or 13353.2 for offenses that occurred on separate occasions, or if there is any combination of those convictions, administrative suspensions, or revocations."

> The above wording, eliminating prior language that threatened penal sanctions for failing to submit to a blood test, is a result of the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Birchfield v. North Dakota (2016) 579 U.S. 438, 478 [136 S.Ct. 2160; 195 L.Ed.2nd 560], where it was held that it is a Fourth Amendment violation to threaten incarceration for failure to submit to a blood test, and that to make such a threat would result in the suppression of the results of that blood test.
> Subdivision (a)(4) of Veh. Code § 23612 also provides that the officer "shall also advise the person that he or she does not have the right to have an attorney present before stating whether he or she will submit to a test or tests, before deciding which test or tests to take, or during the administration of the test or tests chosen, and that, in the event of a refusal to submit to a test or tests, the refusal may be used against him or her in a court of law."

Veh. Code 23612(a)(2)(C): Drug Cases: An officer may request an arrestee to submit to a blood test when the arrestee has already chosen to submit to a breath test and the officer has reasonable cause to believe the arrestee was driving under the influence of a drug or the combined influence of alcohol and a drug: The arrestee may also be requested to submit to a blood test if the officer has "reasonable cause to believe" (instead of "a clear indication" as the section formerly read) that a blood test will reveal evidence of the arrestee being under the influence. (See People v. Lopez (2020) 46 Cal.App.5th 317, 325-336.)

Veh. Code § 23577: Penalties: "If a person is convicted of a violation of Section 23152 or 23153 and at the time of the arrest leading to that conviction that person willfully failed refused a peace officer's request to submit to, or willfully failed to complete the breath or urine tests pursuant to Section 23612, the court shall impose the following penalties:

> (1) If the person is convicted of a first violation of Section 23152, notwithstanding any other provision of subdivision (a) of Section 23538, the terms and conditions of probation shall include the conditions in paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of Section 23538.
>
> (2) If the person is convicted of a first violation of Section 23153, the punishment shall be enhanced by an imprisonment of 48 continuous hours in the county jail, whether or not probation is granted and no part of which may be stayed, unless the person is sentenced to, and incarcerated in, the state prison and the execution of that sentence is not stayed.
>
> (3) If the person is convicted of a second violation of Section 23152, punishable under Section 23540, or a second violation of Section 23153, punishable under Section 23560, the punishment shall be enhanced by an imprisonment of 96 hours in the county jail, whether or not probation is granted and no part of which may be stayed, unless the person is sentenced to, and incarcerated in, the state prison and execution of that sentence is not stayed.
>
> (4) If the person is convicted of a third violation of Section 23152, punishable under Section 23546, the punishment shall be enhanced by an imprisonment of 10 days in the county jail, whether or not probation is granted and no part of which may be stayed.
>
> (5) If the person is convicted of a fourth or subsequent violation of Section 23152, punishable under Section 23550 or 23550.5, the punishment shall be enhanced by imprisonment of 18 days in the county jail, whether or not probation is granted and no part of which may be stayed.
>
> Note the omission of any reference to a "blood test," thus making this provision consistent with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Birchfield v. North Dakota, supra.

Veh. Code § 23578: Enhanced Penalties: "In addition to any other provision of this code, if a person is convicted of a violation of Section 23152 or 23153, the court shall consider a concentration of alcohol in the person's blood of 0.15 percent or more, by weight, or the refusal of the person to take a breath or urine test, as a special factor that may justify enhancing the penalties in sentencing, in determining whether to grant probation, and, if probation is granted, in determining additional or enhanced terms and conditions of probation."

Note the omission of any reference to a "blood test," thus making this provision consistent with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Birchfield v. North Dakota, supra.

Legal Effects of California's Implied Consent Law:

California's "implied consent law," Veh. Code § 23612, has been held to be a factor, among the "totality of the circumstances," in determining whether or not a DUI arrestee has given "actual consent" to a warrantless blood draw. (People v. Harris (2015) 234 Cal.App.4th 671, 681-692.)

"(A)ctual consent to a blood draw is not 'implied consent,' but rather a possible result of requiring the driver to choose whether to consent under the implied consent law. (Citation.) '[T]he implied consent law is explicitly designed to allow the driver, and not the police officer, to make the choice as to whether the driver will give or decline to give actual consent to a blood draw when put to the choice between consent or automatic sanctions. Framed in the terms of "implied consent," choosing the "yes" option affirms the driver's implied consent and constitutes actual consent for the blood draw. Choosing the "no" option acts to withdraw the driver's implied consent and establishes that the driver does not give actual consent.' (Citation)" (Id., at p. 686.)

Note: To put this rule into a formula: Implied consent per V.C. § 23612, + circumstances consistent with consent, = actual consent.

California's implied consent law, for drivers of a motor vehicle arrested for driving while under the influence (V.C. § 23612(a)(5)), does not apply to drivers of boats under the same circumstances per Har. & Nav. Code § 655.1. Such a person has the right to refuse to submit to a blood or breath test, and must be told this by the arresting officer. Then, any submission to a blood or breath test must be freely and voluntary consented to in order to be admissible in evidence. (People v. Gutierrez (2019) 33 Cal.App.5th Supp. 11.)

See Har. & Nav. Code § 655.1: Advisement Requirements for Persons Arrested for DUI, Water Vessels, Etc., per Har. & Nav. Code § 655(b):

Per Har. & Nav. Code § 655.1(b)(2), a person arrested for DUI while operating a mechanically propelled vessel or manipulating any water skis, aquaplane, or similar device, must be advised of the following (paraphrased):

(A) A criminal complaint may be filed against him . . . .

(B) He or she has a right to refuse chemical testing.

(C) An officer has the authority to seek a search warrant compelling the arrested person to submit a blood sample (per P.C. § 1524(a)(16).)

(D) He or she does not have the right to have an attorney present before stating whether he or she will submit to the chemical testing, before deciding which chemical test or tests to take, or during the administration of the chemical test or tests chosen.

Per subd. (c), a person arrested for DUI boat must also be told that he has a choice between a blood or breath test. This defendant was in fact so advised although as worded, it was never conveyed to him that he could refuse either without penalty.

Per subd. (d), when a person is arrested for driving a boat when under the influence of a drug, he must also be advised that a test of his urine is available to him.

Per subd. (e), an officer with "reasonable cause to believe" (i.e., "probable cause") that drugs are involved, may "request" that he submit to a urine test. But in no case may the arrestee be led to believe that he has no choice in whether to submit to any kind of testing.

Also note Veh. Code § 13384 (effective since 1999) requiring all new and renewed driver's licenses to include the applicant's express written consent to submit to a chemical test or tests of that person's blood, breath, or urine, or to submit to a preliminary alcohol screening test pursuant to V.C. § 23136 (persons under 21 years of age with a blood alcohol level of .01% or higher), when requested to do so by a peace officer, with the applicant signing a written declaration consenting to the above.

> Subd. (a): "The department shall not issue or renew a driver's license to any person unless the person consents in writing to submit to a chemical test or tests of that person's blood, breath, or urine pursuant to (Vehicle Code) Section 23612, or a preliminary alcohol screening test pursuant to (Vehicle Code) Section 23136 (persons under 21 years of age with a blood alcohol level of .01% or higher), when requested to do so by a peace officer."
> Subd. (b): "All application forms for driver's licenses or driver's license renewal notices shall include a requirement that the applicant sign the following declaration as a condition of licensure: 'I agree to submit to a chemical test of my blood, breath, or urine for the purpose of determining the alcohol or drug content of my blood when testing is requested by a peace officer acting in accordance with (Vehicle Code) Section 13388 [PAS (Preliminary Alcohol Screening) test] or 23612 [deemed consent] of the Vehicle Code.'"
>
> The legal effect of this mandated written consent has yet to be tested, although the Court in People v. Mason (2016) 8 Cal.App.5th Supp. 11, 26, below, noted that, "(p)roof of that consent by (defendant) here would have at least brought the case closer to the probation condition or advance express consent context." However, the Court still "doubt(ed)" it would "automatically" encompass the "rights and concerns" addressed under the Fourth Amendment. In Mason, no evidence of the defendant's status as a licensed driver was in the record, so the issue was not decided.
> Also, the implied consent provisions under Veh. Code § 23612(a)(5), where, by statute, blood may be drawn from an unconscious or dead DUI suspect, does not overcome the need for a search warrant without a showing of exigent circumstances. (See People v. Arredondo (2016) 245 Cal.App.4th 186, 193-205, & fn. 7.)

Note: Petition for Review was dismissed and the case remanded in light of the decision in Mitchell v. Wisconsin (June 27, 2019) __ U.S.__, __ [139 S.Ct. 2525; 204 L.Ed.2nd 1040], where the U.S. Supreme Court held that when a DUI arrestee is unconscious, this fact alone will "almost always" constitute an exigency, allowing for a warrantless blood draw.

Case Law:

The results of defendant's warrantless blood draw was improperly suppressed by the trial court where the arresting officer told defendant that the test was required by law, that comment being an accurate statement of the implied consent law. The fact that the officer did not inform defendant of the consequences of refusing was also not enough, by itself, to require suppression of the blood test results. Although providing an admonition about the consequences of withdrawing consent is to be considered in the totality of the circumstances surrounding the consent to a warrantless blood draw, the Fourth Amendment does not require the admonition in order to find a voluntary consent. (People v. Agnew (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th Supp. 1, 4-20; a decision of appellate division of the Santa Clara County Superior Court.)

However, in another prosecution for driving under the influence of alcohol, a different panel of the same appellate division of the Santa Clara County Superior Court disagreed with Agnew and held that blood draw evidence should have been suppressed under the Fourth Amendment in that under the totality of the circumstances, the People failed to show that defendant actually—freely and voluntarily—consented to a blood draw to which she had physically submitted after an incomplete implied consent admonishment. The admonishment, which stated that defendant was required to submit to a blood test, but did not include the consequences of refusal and was misleading. Defendant had a Fourth Amendment right, notwithstanding implied (or "deemed") consent, to refuse and to bear the consequences of such a refusal. Implied consent does not constitute real or actual consent in fact, for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. Also, the People failed to offer any evidence of any advance express consent by defendant, or even that she was a licensed California driver. (People v. Mason (2016) 8 Cal.App.5th Supp. 11, 18-33.)

The Supreme Court in McNeely did not intend to give a driver arrested for DUI the right to demand that officers obtain a search warrant in order to force a blood draw. Refusal to summit to a blood test, whether or not the arresting officer chooses to seek a search warrant, is a "refusal" and allows for the administrative suspension of the driver's license. (Espinoza v. Shiomoto (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 85, 103-116.)

An arresting officer's failure to advise defendant under V.C. § 23612(a)(2)(B), of his statutory right to choose either a blood or breath test did not violate the Fourth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, and thus Cal. Const., art. I, § 28, subd. (f)(2) required the admission of blood test results into evidence. (People v. Vannesse (2018) 23 Cal.App.5th 440.)

Where defendant was charged with misdemeanor DUI, the appellate court concluded that defendant freely consented to the search of his blood. Although a statement by the arresting officer was incomplete under Veh. Code § 23612(a)(1)(D), there was no evidence the officer intended to deceive defendant about his right to refuse a blood altogether. Nor was the officer's statement about the implied consent law demonstrably false. At no point before or after defendant consented to the test did he indicate any objection. Looking at the totality of the circumstances, including the officer's conduct, the existence of the implied consent law, and defendant's actions before and after he consented to the blood test, the appellate court could not say the trial court's finding that defendant voluntarily consented to the test was error. (People v. Balov (2018) 23 Cal.App.5th 696.)

> "[T]he implied consent law is explicitly designed to allow the driver, and not the police officer, to make the choice as to whether the driver will give or decline to give actual consent to a blood draw when put to the choice between consent or automatic sanctions. Framed in the terms of 'implied consent,' choosing the 'yes' option affirms the driver's implied consent and constitutes actual consent for the blood draw. Choosing the 'no' option acts to withdraw the driver's implied consent and establishes that the driver does not give actual consent." [Citation.]" (Id., at p. 702; People v. Lopez (2020) 46 Cal.App.5th 317, 326.)

It was initially an undecided issue whether California's Implied Consent statute (Veh. Code § 23612(a)(1)) applies when an arrested DUI suspect has neither expressly refused nor consented to a blood draw, which would negate the warrant requirements of Missouri v. McNeely (2013) 569 U.S. 141 [133 S.Ct. 1552; 185 L.Ed.2nd 696], where the Supreme Court held that being arrested for driving while under the influence did not allow for a non-consensual warrantless blood test absent exigent circumstances beyond the fact that the blood was metabolizing at a normal rate. Other jurisdictions have split on this issue. (See State v. Flonnory (2013) 2013 Del. Super. LEXIS 261 (yes); and State v. Butler (Ariz. 2013) 302 P.3rd 609 (no).)

Issue: Is evidence (e.g., a victim's DNA) voluntarily provided to law enforcement for one purpose later usable for another, not contemplated when the original consent is given?

An Unsettled Issue:

It's been an unsettled issue in California as to whether blood extracted from a person incident to an arrest for driving under the influence of drugs and/or alcohol allows for the use of that same blood for other purposes (e.g., DNA testing), other jurisdictions have held that the use of blood taken pursuant to such an implied consent is limited to the purpose of testing one's blood/alcohol only, there being no consent, express or implied, to use it for other purposes. (See State v. Binner (Ore. 1994) 131 Ore.App. 677, 682-683; State v. Gerace (Ga. 1993) 210 Ga.App. 874, 875-876 [437 S.E.2nd 862, 863.)

However, testing of deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA) from saliva that defendant deposited on the mouthpiece of a preliminary alcohol screening (PAS) device, connecting defendant with a series of residential burglaries where genetic material had been left, was not an illegal search. The court reasoned in part that the breath sample was used only to measure any blood alcohol in defendant's body, consistent with V.C. § 23612(h) & (i), while the saliva, in which defendant could claim no right to privacy, was a mere incident to the PAS (Preliminary Alcohol Screening) test. The subsequent testing of the saliva was thus not dependent on defendant's express or implied consent under V.C. § 23612(a)(1). (People v. Thomas (2011) 200 Cal.App.4th 338, 343-344.)

Recent Restriction:

In Jane Doe v. City and County of San Francisco (N. Dist. Cal. 2023) 2023 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125532, the plaintiff Jane Doe alleged that she had provided a DNA sample to the San Francisco Police Department to aid in the investigation of her alleged sexual assault, where she was the victim. Sometime later (the specific dates are not mentioned), Doe's DNA sample was used by San Francisco P.D. investigators to link Doe herself to a burglary where it was alleged that she was the culprit. Doe complained in a federal 42 U.S.C. § 1983 lawsuit that using her DNA to investigate her culpability in the burglary violated the scope of the consent she gave when she originally provided her DNA as a sexual assault victim. In denying the civil defendants' motion to dismiss Doe's lawsuit, the trial court judge issued an order to the effect that if the facts prove to be as alleged by Jane Doe (i.e., that SFPD investigators agreed not to use her DNA for anything other than the rape case), then she has "clearly established (a) Fourth Amendment violation."

Express vs. Implied Consent to Search, Etc.*: A person's consent to search may be "express" or "implied." (Torbet v. United Airlines, Inc. (9th Cir. 2002) 298 F.3rd 1087, 1089; People v. Panah (2005) 35 Cal.4th 395, 466-467.)

Express Consent: Answering in the affirmative when asked for consent to search is the most obvious example of an "express consent."

Also, however, an affirmative head-nod made by defendant to his son in response to an officer's request for permission for his son to retrieve a gun from defendant's tent, held to be an express consent. (United States v. Basher (9th Cir. 2011) 629 F.3rd 1161, 1168-1169.)

Implied Consent: An "implied consent" exists when, considering the "totality of the circumstances," a reasonable person would have understood that the person from whom a consent is requested is agreeing to a search. (United States v. Jenkins (4th Cir. 1993) 986 F.2nd 76, 79.)

Raising one's arms into the air after being asked by a police officer for consent to search his person was held to be the defendant's implied consent to such a search. (United States v. Vongxay (9th Cir. 2010) 594 F.3rd 1111, 1119-1120.)

"(O)nly in narrow circumstances may consent be implied by actions and in most implied consent cases it is the suspect himself (as opposed to a third party) who takes an action which implies consent." Espinosa v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2010) 598 F.3rd 528, 536.)

Examples Where Implied Consent was Found:

Upon submission to having one's luggage x-rayed (Torbet v. United Airlines, Inc., supra.) and/or by walking through a magnetometer (United States v. Aukai (9th Cir., 2007) 497 F.3rd 955.) at an airport.

See "Airport Searches," under "Searches with a Search Warrant" (Chapter 10), above.

Upon entering a military base where signs are posted warning that persons on the base are subject to being searched. (United States v. Ellis (5th Cir. 1977) 547 F.2nd 863, Naval base; United States v. Jenkins, supra, military base; Morgan v. United States (9th Cir. 2003) 323 F.3rd 776, Air Force base.)

A civilian staying in the on-base housing of a military serviceman has possibly impliedly waived his right to privacy when his property (e.g., computers) is searched. (United States v. Krupa (9th Cir. 2011) 658 F.3rd 1174, 1179-1180,)

Defendant visiting a county jail visitor center is subject to search, particularly where signs are posted warning him that he was subject to search. This includes outside lockers on the jail property where visitors could deposit items not allowed in the jail. "Implied consent" applies to administrative searches of closely regulated businesses, including a county jail. (People v. Boulter (2011) 199 Cal.App.4th 761.)

> But see Estes v. Rowland (1993) 14 Cal.App.4th 508: At least for purposes of persons attempting to visit an inmate of any of the prisons of the California Department of Corrections, while justifying the lowered search standard on the theory that keeping weapons and contraband out of a prison is an important governmental interest and that therefore searching visitors is an "administrative search," the visitor must be given the option of forgoing the visit, and leaving, rather than submitting to a strip search.

A co-owner of a laptop computer has actual authority to give consent to the police to search. And if it turns out that the person is not actually a co-owner, the doctrine of apparent authority may justify the search when it reasonably appears under the circumstances that she did have such authority. (United States v. Stanley (9th Cir. 2011) 653 F.3rd 946, 950-952.)

In response to a police officer's question; "Mind if we come in?" where the apartment owner then opened the door wider, and moved out of the way, it was held that the owner had impliedly consented to the officers' entry. (United States v. Faler (8th Cir. Iowa 2016) 832 F.3rd 849; see also United States v. Rodriguez (8th Cir. Neb. 2016) 834 F.3rd 937.)

Consent to enter defendant's apartment when the officers had a drug-sniffing dog with them, and where the dog was visible to defendant, impliedly included defendant's consent to the entry of the dog as well. When the dog alerted on illegal drugs defendant had in his compartment, the dog being in a place it had the legal right to be, the alert did not constitute an illegal search. (United States v. Iverson (2nd Cir. 2018) 897 F.3rd 450.)

Defendant's mother was found to have impliedly consented (i.e., "non-verbal" consent) to an officer following her into her home to retrieve her son's (the defendant) cellphone after defendant told the officer that he was "fine" with them to take the phone (the officers having a search warrant to seize and search the phone). Per the Court, silently accepting an officer's expressed intent to enter the house solely for the purpose of retrieving a phone is a valid consent, especially when the owner of the phone, who is a co-occupant of the house, has already verbally consented to turning it over (pursuant to a valid warrant) and has told the officers in which room it is located. Based on these facts, the court held that the officers had valid consent, obtained voluntarily from defendant and his mother to enter the house for the sole purpose of retrieving the phone. (United States v. Sanchez (11th Cir. 2022) 30 F.4th 1063.)

Totality of the Circumstances: Consent may be implied as determined by the totality of all the circumstances. For instance, in the case of a military base, one impliedly consents to the search of his or her vehicle when driving upon the base and noting:

- The barbed-wire fence;
- The security guards at the gate;
- The sign warning of the possibility of search; and
- A civilian's common-sense awareness of the nature of a military base.

(United States v. Jenkins (4th Cir. 1993) 986 F.2nd 76, 78; Morgan v. United States (9th Cir. 2003) 323 F.3rd 776, 787-788.)

Specific Issues*:

- May a suspect withdraw consent once it's given? Yes. (People v. Martinez (1968) 259 Cal.App.2nd Supp. 943, 945; United States v. McWeeney (9th Cir. 2006) 454 F.3rd 1030, 1035; see also (United States v. Krupa (9th Cir. 2011) 658 F.3rd 1174.)

  But see People v. Schomer (1971) 17 Cal.App.3rd 427, where an unlimited search for a runaway minor of the defendant's apartment was allowed for some twenty minutes until defendant realized that the officers were getting close to his marijuana, at which time he tried to withdraw the consent. The marijuana was seen in plain sight. Defendant testified that he did not object to the officers searching for a person, but objected to them looking for narcotics. The attempted withdrawal of consent was held to be ineffective under these circumstances where the defendant later testified that he had not objected to the officers searching for a person, but only to searching for contraband.

And see "Warrantless Searches," "Airport Searches," above, where by submitting one's carryon luggage and/or his person to the initial x-ray and/or magnetometer screening at an airport, a person loses his right to revoke permission when asked to submit to a secondary screening. (Torbet v. United Airlines, Inc. (9th Cir. 2002) 298 F.3rd 1087, 1089-1090.)

Where officers "created a setting in which the reasonable person would believe that he or she had no authority to limit or withdraw their consent," the resulting consent search may be invalidated. (United States v. McWeeney, supra, at pp. 1036-1037.)

Per the Court in McWeeney (at p. 1037), factors to consider in evaluating this issue include, but are not limited to:

- The language used to instruct the suspect;
- The physical surroundings of the search;
- The extent to which there were legitimate reasons for the officers to preclude the suspect from observing the search;
- The relationship between the means used to prevent observation of the search and the reasons justifying the prevention;
- The existence of any changes in circumstances between when consent is obtained and when the officers prevent the suspect from observing the search; and
- The degree of pressure applied to prevent the suspect either from observing the search or voicing his objection to its proceeding further.

Once a suspect voluntarily consents to a search, it is the suspect's burden to establish that he has withdrawn that consent. Although a suspect does not need to use a special set of words to withdraw consent, the suspect must do more than express unhappiness about the search to which he has consented. (United States v. Williams (3rd Cir. PA 2018) 898 F.3rd 323.)

- May a suspect limit the consent to certain areas? Yes. (Ibid.)

But, if he does not limit the consent to a specific area, the officer may search the whole thing reasonably believed to be included in the request. E.g.; A consent to search one's car, unless specifically limited, includes the whole car and any containers in the car. (People Clark (1993) 5 Cal.4th 950, 977-980.)

- May a drug-sniffing dog be used without obtaining any more than a general consent to search? Yes; at least when it is a vehicle (as opposed to a residence) being searched, the defendant should have been aware that a dog was available, and he failed to object when the dog was used. (People v. Bell (1996) 43 Cal.App.4th 754.)

  See also People v. $48,715 United States Currency (1997) 58 Cal.App.4th 1507, 1515-1516: "'A "sniff" by a trained drug-sniffing dog in a public place is not a "search" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment' at all. Accordingly, no consent is needed for participation of the dog. (Citation)" (See also United States v. Todhunter (9th Cir. 2002) 297 F.3rd 886, 891.)

  See "Used to Search," under "Dogs," under "New and Developing Law Enforcement Tools and Technology" (Chapter 14), above.

- May a suspect place conditions on the search? (E.g.; "Yes officer, but only if I may be present.") Arguably; Yes.

  If a person may limit the areas to be searched, it would seem that he could also impose any conditions he chooses. (E.g., see People Clark (1993) 5 Cal.4th 950, 977-980, recognizing the validity of a conditional consent even though not discussing the issue.)

- May an officer use a ruse or deception in obtaining a consent? Generally, No.

  Consent has to be given freely and voluntarily, with a knowledge of the right to refuse. If the suspect reasonably misconstrues, due to an officer's misrepresentations, the purpose of the search, it will probably be held to be involuntary. (See People v. Reeves (1964) 61 Cal.2nd 268, 273; People v. Mesaris (1970) 14 Cal.App.3rd 71.)

  But, a ruse is but one factor to consider. If, under the totality of the circumstances, a suspect is not materially misled as to the privacy rights he is giving up by consenting, the search will be held to be valid. (People v. Avalos (1996) 47 Cal.App.4th 1569.)

  > "Here, the police actually offered a dual purpose for searching defendant's truck. They said they wanted to look for stolen property, which was clearly not the case. But they also disclosed they were looking for 'other contraband,' which was entirely accurate and reasonably alerted defendant the object of the search would include narcotics. The officers were also careful to ensure defendant's consent was voluntary. Once it became clear defendant had difficulty understanding English, (the officer) summoned a Spanish-speaking officer to assist him. Defendant was also given a Spanish-language consent-to-search form, which he read and signed. He was not under arrest, physically restrained, or threatened in any manner." (Id. at p. 1578.)

A police officer, obtaining plaintiff's consent to enter her house to look for her fugitive boyfriend, was held to be entitled to qualified immunity on a voluntariness-of-consent claim in that a lack of consent was not clearly established. The facts showed that time had passed between the officer's threat to arrest the homeowner for concealing her former boyfriend's whereabouts and his subsequent request for consent to enter her house, where the evidence shows that she handed the officer her house key without being asked for it. (West v. City of Caldwell (9th Cir. 2019) 831 F.3rd 978, 982-988.)

- Can a suspect who is either detained or under arrest validly consent to being searched? Yes.

  Whether or not a detained individual has validly consented to the search of his property depends upon an evaluation of the totality of the circumstances. (United States v. Blomquist (6th Cir. 2020) 976 F.3rd 755; defendant, after being detained and Mirandized, volunteered to show officers the workings of his illegal marijuana growing operation.)

  The fact that the defendant is in custody at the time is but one factor to consider when determining whether that defendant gave a free and voluntary consent. (United States v. Crapser (9th Cir. 2007) 472 F.3rd 1141, 1149.)

  The co-occupant of a hotel room, who was arrested along with defendant, held to have voluntarily consented to the search of the room despite being under arrest at the time. (United States v. Whitehead (8th Cir. 2021) 995 F.3rd 624.)

- Does a consensual search of a residence have to be based upon some level of suspicion. No.

  Conducting a "knock and talk," and asking the homeowner for consent to conduct a search of the residence, follows the same rules as in the case of a "consensual encounter" of a person on the street, and need not be supported by even a "reasonable suspicion." (People v. Rivera (2007) 41 Cal.4th 304; contact initiated due to an uncorroborated anonymous tip.)

Other Elements of a Consent Search:

The Right to Refuse: There is no legal requirement that a suspect be told that he has a right to refuse to consent. (Ohio v. Robinette (1996) 519 U.S. 33 [117 S.Ct.

417; 136 L.Ed.2nd 347]; Schneckloth v. Bustamonte (1973) 412 U.S. 218 [93 S.Ct. 2041; 36 L.Ed.2nd 854]; United States v. Drayton (2002) 536 U.S. 194 [122 S.Ct. 2105; 153 L.Ed.2nd 242]; People v. Monterroso (2004) 34 Cal.4th 743, 757-759; People v. Williams (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th 949, 961.)

> The fact he has been asked for consent should indicate to a reasonable person that he has a right to refuse.
>
> However, should an officer tell a suspect he has the right to refuse, this fact adds to the weight of the argument that his consent was voluntary.
>
> A person's refusal to consent to a search is not admissible in court against that person to show a consciousness of guilt, even where the officers had a legal right to make a warrantless entry. To use a person's refusal "merely serves to punish the exercise of the right to insist upon a warrant." I.e.; "(A) penalty imposed by courts for exercising a constitutional right." (People v. Wood (2002) 103 Cal.App.4th 803, 808; People v Keener (1983) 148 Cal.App.3rd 73, 79.)

Miranda: There is no requirement that a suspect be advised of his Miranda rights (per Miranda v. Arizona (1966) 384 U.S. 436 [86 S.Ct. 1602; 16 L.Ed.2nd 694].) prior to giving a valid consent. (People v. Brewer (2000) 81 Cal.App.4th 442; People v. Monterroso, supra.)

> Nor is it relevant that the subject had already invoked his Miranda rights. (United States v Kon Yu Leung (2nd Cir. 1990) 910 F.2nd 33, 38; United States v. Hidalgo (11th Cir. 1993) 7 F.3rd 1566; United States v. Shlater (7th Cir. 1996) 85 F.3rd 1251, 1255-1256.)
>
> Requesting a consent to search is not an interrogation, does not implicate the Fifth Amendment, and does not require a Miranda admonishment. (People v. Ruster (1976) 16 Cal.3rd 690, 700; People v. Woolsey (1979) 90 Cal.App.3rd 994; People v. Ramirez (1997) 59 Cal.App.4th 1548, 1559; Doe v. United States (1988) 487 U.S. 201 [101 L.Ed.2nd 184]; United States v. Henley (9th Cir. 1993) 984 F.2nd 1040, 1042-1043; United States v. Hidalgo (11th Cir. 1993) 7 F.3rd 1566; United States v. Kon Yu Leung (2nd Cir. 1990) 910 F.2nd 33, 38; United States v. Shlater (7th Cir. 1996) 85 F.3rd 1251, 1255-1256; United States v. Russell (9th Cir. 2012) 664 F.3rd 1279, 1281-1282.)
> > But see United States v. Reilly (9th Cir. 2000) 224 F.3rd 986, 994, where it was erroneously held that a defendant's invocation of his right to an attorney precluded officers from asking him for his consent to search.

An advisal of one's Miranda rights before asking for consent to search is some evidence, however, that his consent is given freely and voluntarily, in that the giving of a Miranda admonishment infers that he is not without rights. (United States v. Morning (9th Cir. 1995) 64 F.3rd 531, 533.)

Note also, older authority indicating that illegally continuing an interrogation after the suspect invokes his Miranda rights, followed by a request for a consent search, will likely result in the consent being held to be invalid (People v. Superior Court* [Keithley] (1975) 13 Cal.3rd 406, 410.), which is questionable authority in light of the rule that the "fruit of the poisonous tree" doctrine does not apply to Miranda violations. (Oregon v. Elstad (1985) 470 U.S. 298 [84 L.Ed.2nd 222]; Dickerson v. United States (2000) 530 U.S. 428, 441 [147 L.Ed.2nd 405, 418]; United States v. Patane (2004) 542 U.S. 630 [159 L.Ed.2nd 667].)

And the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has recently called into question whether the giving of a Miranda admonishment is really a factor that should be considered at all when determining the validity of a consent to search. (United States v. Perez-Lopez (9th Cir. 2003) 348 F.3rd 839, 846-847, criticizing its own contrary decision in United States v. Morning, supra.)

Need for a Written Consent:

There is no legal requirement that a consent to search be obtained in writing. However, obtaining a suspect's consent in writing tends to help to convince a court of the voluntariness of the resulting consent. (United States v. Rodriguez (2006) 464 F.3rd 1072, 1078.)

Also, written consent provided after the search had already occurred does not retroactively establish valid consent. United States v. Howard (9th Cir. 1987) 828 F.2nd 552, 556. It is, however, corroborative of the officers' testimony that she had earlier consented orally to the search. (United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2017) 875 F.3rd 1265, 1278, fn. 7.)

But the refusal to sign a written waiver form does not necessarily invalidate one's consent. (United States v. Thurman (7th Cir. IL 2018) 889 F.3rd 356.)

Practice Note: Obtaining a written consent provides for strong in-court evidence that the suspect did in fact consent, freely and voluntarily.

Answering the Telephone*:

Consent to enter a residence does not include an implied consent to answer the telephone while there. (People v. Harwood (1978) 74 Cal.App.3rd 460.)

However, while lawfully in a residence, probable cause to believe that a caller might be the fugitive defendant, officers may answer the telephone and pretend to be a resident when done for the purpose of attempting to locate the defendant. (People v. Ledesma (2006) 39 Cal.4th 641, 704.)

Giving law enforcement permission to search a cellphone does not, without more, include the right to answer in-coming calls and/or pretend to be the defendant. (United States v. Lopez-Cruz (9th Cir. 2013) 730 F.3rd 803, 809-811.)

Consent by Others:

General Rule: Police may rely upon the consent of whoever they "reasonably believe," under the circumstances, possesses "common authority" over the premises. (Illinois v. Rodriguez (1990) 497 U.S. 177 [111 L.Ed.2nd 148]; People v. Reed (1967) 252 Cal.App.2nd 994, 996; People v. Superior Court* [Walker] (2006) 143 Cal.App.4th 1183, 1198-1201.) The person giving consent must have either the "actual authority," or the "apparent authority," to give consent:

> "Actual Authority:" Where the owner of property has expressly granted authority for a person to give consent, or where it is known that the person has mutual use or joint access, then he or she is said to have "actual authority" to consent to a search of that property. (United States v. Davis (9th Cir. 2003) 332 F.3rd 1163, 1169; People v. Superior Court* [Walker], supra, at pp. 1205-1208.)
>
> "Apparent Authority:" A determination made based upon the circumstances and whether the officers reasonably believe that the person giving consent had the authority to do so. (United States v. Fiorillo (9th Cir. 1999) 186 F.3rd 1136; People v. Superior Court* [Walker], supra, at pp. 1208-1214; United States v. Arreguin (9th Cir. 2013) 735 F.3rd 1168, 1174-1178; see also United States v. Casey (1st Cir. 2016) 825 F.3rd 1.)
>
> To establish "apparent authority," the prosecution must show:
>
> - The police believed an untrue fact that they used to assess the consenter's control over the area to be searched;
> - It was objectively reasonable for the officers to believe that the fact was true; and
> - If that fact were true, the consenter would have had actual authority to give that consent.
>
> (United States v. Reid (9th Cir. 2000) 226 F.3rd 1020, 1025; United States v. Enslin (9th Cir. 2003) 315 F.3rd 1205, 1215; United States v. Ruiz (9th Cir. 2005) 428 F.3rd 877; Espinosa v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2010) 598 F.3rd 528, 536-537.)

General Case Law:

Where U.S. Marshals knew that the person giving consent was a resident of the home, and had no reason to know that defendant was occupying a back bedroom, the officers could reasonably assume the consenter/resident had the authority to authorize entry into that back bedroom. (United States v. Enslin (9th Cir. 2003) 315 F.3rd 1205, 1215.)

When the estranged wife retains property within the residence, remains liable for rent, civil liability for accidents, etc., and has not established a permanent residence elsewhere, she still has the "apparent authority" to allow police into her residence where the husband still lives. (People v. Bishop (1996) 44 Cal.App.4th 220.)

> The fact that the husband had changed the locks is only indicative of the level of antagonism, and is not a limitation of the wife's authority to allow the police to enter and search. (Ibid.)

Paper bags left by defendant in an acquaintance's garage, where the acquaintance had free access to the bags, may be lawfully searched with consent from the acquaintance. By leaving the bags with the acquaintance, knowing and not objecting to the fact that she (the acquaintance) would go into the bags, defendant "assumed the risk" that she would allow others to look into the bags. (People v. Schmeck (2005) 37 Cal.4th 240, 280-282.)

Apparent authority found where the resident of a house gave consent to search a container set out in plain sight and no one objected when such consent was requested. (United States v. Ruiz (9th Cir. 2005) 428 F.3rd 877.)

However, the search of a purse based upon the consent of the purse owner's boyfriend was held to be unlawful because it was unreasonable for the officers to think that the boyfriend had the necessary authority. (See United States v. Welch (9th Cir. 1993) 4 F.3rd 761.)

"(A) guest who has the run of the house in the occupant's absence has the apparent authority to give consent to enter an area where a visitor normally would be received." (People v. Ledesma (2006) 39 Cal.4th 657, 703-704.)

> And, although receiving consent to enter a residence does not infer a consent to answer the telephone while in the residence (People v. Harwood (1977) 74 Cal.App.3rd 460, 458.), the telephone may be answered where the officers have probable cause to believe defendant will be calling and taking the time to get a warrant would compromise the officer's ability to quickly locate and apprehend him. (People v. Ledesma, supra, at p. 704.)

A business that owns the company's computers may consent to the search of a computer used by an employee, at least when the employee is on notice that he has no reasonable expectation of privacy in the contents of the computer he is using. (United States v. Ziegler (9th Cir. 2007) 474 F.3rd 1184.)

Where officers seized evidence from defendant's home office, his wife had the apparent authority to grant the police access to the materials because there were no objective indications that her access to the office was limited. (United States v. Tosti (9th Cir. 2013) 733 F.3rd 816, 723-724.)

But the mere fact that a person answers the door is insufficient by itself to allow officers to reasonably conclude that they had a valid consent to search the entire residence. Officers entering "in a state of near ignorance" based upon the consent given by the person answering the door, who was later determined to be a mere visitor, without making further inquiry of the person as to his status, was not reasonable. Search of the residence based upon that person's consent held to be unlawful. (United States v. Arreguin (9th Cir. 2013) 735 F.3rd 1168, 1174-1178.)

"In searching a probationer's residence, officers are not required either to inquire about the ownership of or access rights to each item on the premises or to believe the probationer's statements on this topic. (Citations)" (People v. Carreon (2016) 248 Cal.App.4th 866, 877-878.)

> In Carreon, officers searched the defendant's room (a converted garage) under the authority of the home-owner's Fourth waiver, believing the probationer had access to any room that was unlocked. The Court found this belief to be unreasonable, having failed to consider any other circumstances that may have indicated that the probationer did not in fact have free access to defendant's room. (Id., at pp. 877-881.)

Being in possession of the garage door opener as well as keys to the lobby door and mailbox for the unit was sufficient to cause the officers to reasonably believe that defendant had authority to give consent to search the apartment. (United States v. Correa (7th Cir. IL 2018) 908 F.3rd 208.)

Defendant's sister's authority over a rented storage unit did not, by itself, establish that she also had either actual or apparent authority to open and gain access to several black bags contained in the storage unit. The officers' belief that the sister had authority to allow officers to search her brother's property, when it was specifically pointed out to the officers that the bags belonged to defendant, was not reasonable. (United States v. Moran (1st Cir. 2019) 944 F.3rd 1.)

The 18-year old defendant's father, who owned the house, was held to have apparent authority to allow agents to enter and search the master bedroom, where defendant slept, resulting in the recovery of defendant's backpack. The court found that at the time of the search, the agents knew that that father owned the house and permitted his adult son—defendant—to live there. Although the door to defendant's bedroom had a lock on it, which to some extent undermined that father's apparent authority, the door was wide open when the agents arrived. No one in the house ever raised any objection to the search of the bedroom. In addition, at no point did anyone limit where the agents could look. Even if, as defendant claimed, the agents knew he occupied the master bedroom when the search began, they had no way of knowing that defendant's father supposedly only entered that room with defendant's permission. When the father voluntarily consented to the search of the home, no one mentioned any agreement he had with defendant about access to the master bedroom. As a result, the Court concluded that the facts known to the agents at the time of the search created an objectively reasonable perception that defendant's father had authority to consent to the search of defendant's bedroom and its contents. (United States v. Guillen (10th Cir. N.M. 2021) 995 F.3rd 1095.)

After defendant was arrested on an armed robbery warrant, officers failed to find the gun used in the robbery. Monitoring phone calls from the jail, defendant was heard telling his girlfriend to hide "the thing." Assuming that this referred to the missing gun, the investigating detective went to the girlfriend's apartment where he sought her permission to search for the gun. The girlfriend (and sole lessee of the apartment) provided written consent to search her apartment, and led the detective to her closet where "her gun" was stored. Upon finding a gender-neutral black bag (although referred to at one point by the searching officer as a "man bag") hanging from the door handle of a closet, the officer was reasonable in assuming that the female had authority to give consent to the opening and search of the bag. Drugs and a firearm found in the bag were improperly suppressed by the trial court. The gun in the bag was subsequently determined to be the one used by the defendant to commit the robbery. The Court concluded this evidence provided the detective with a reasonable basis to believe that the girlfriend had authority over the bag and therefore could consent to its search. (United States v. Williams (8th Cir. 2022) 36 F.3rd 792.)

Defendant's girlfriend, who possessed defendant's cellphone and had if not sole, at least mutual, access and control over the phone for some seven months before giving it to law enforcement, during which time she regularly used the phone for purely personal purposes, was held to have authority to grant law enforcement's access to the phone. Importantly, she had access to the contents of the entire phone. Under such circumstances, the Court concluded she had "actual" authority to consent to the search of the phone. (People v. Perry (4th Cir. 2024) 92 F.4th 500.)

Examples:

Landlord:

A landlord may not give a valid consent for police to search a renter's home, the renter having a superior right to possession at least for the duration of the agreed rental period. (Chapman v. United States (1961) 365 U.S. 610, [81 S.Ct. 776; 5 L.Ed.2nd 828]; People v. Roman (1991) 227 Cal.App.3rd 674.)

However, a landlord has a right to inspect the home for violations of the rental agreement, with notice to the renter and at a reasonable time, and under other limited circumstances. (Civil Code § 1954) Anything they observe in the process may serve as probable cause to obtain a warrant for a search by law enforcement.

Same rule applies to the manager or clerk in a hotel or motel. (Stoner v. California (1964) 376 U.S. 483 [84 S.Ct. 889; 11 L.Ed.2nd 856]; People v. Burke (1962) 208 Cal.App.2nd 149, 160-161.)

And with an apartment manager. (People v. Roberts (1956) 47 Cal.2nd 374, 377.)

"[A] landlord may not give valid third party consent to a police search of a house rented to another. [Citations.] The same principle applies to prevent a finding of third party consent where the leased property is an apartment unit [citation], a room in a boarding house [citation], a garage [citation], or a locker [citation]. Likewise, a hotel clerk may not consent to the search of an occupant's room. [Citations.]" (People v. Superior Court [Walker] (2006) 143 Cal.App.4th 1183, 1200.)

Military personnel, living off base in a motel, but with the housing paid for by the military as an alternative to living in the on-base barracks, retain the same privacy protections as anyone else in the civilian world. (People v. Rodriguez (1966) 242 Cal.App.2nd 744.)

> The same rule applies to any off-base military housing, at least when the case is a state case being investigated by state law enforcement officers for presentation in state court. (People v. Miller (1987) 196 Cal.App.3rd 307.)
>
> However, on the base, a commanding officer may authorize a warrantless search of property, including the serviceman's locker (People v. Shepard (1963) 212 Cal.App.2nd 697, 700.) and his room in the barracks. (People v. Jasmin (2008) 167 Cal.App.4th 98.)
>
> > Evidence properly seized pursuant to a service member's commanding officer's (or "competent military authority") oral or written authorization to search a person or an area, for specified property or evidence or for a specific person (see Military Rules of Evidence, Rule 315(a) & (b)), the results may be used in state court. (People v. Jasmin, supra, at p. 110.)

Parent:

A parent may give consent to search the home and even the child's room over the child's objection, except areas exclusive to the child (e.g.; a footlocker which was locked by the child). (In re Scott K. (1979) 24 Cal.3rd 395, 404-405.)

The search of an adult child's bedroom in his parents' home, made with the consent of a parent, is reasonable "absent circumstances establishing the son has been given exclusive control over the bedroom." (People v. Daniels (1971) 16 Cal.App.3rd 36; see also see also United States v. Casey (1st Cir. 2016) 825 F.3rd 1; grandparents had "apparent authority" to give consent to officers to search defendant's room where defendant lived there for free and the grandparents had open access to his unlocked bedroom.)

Parents of an 18-year-old adult son were held to have "actual" authority to give consent to search the son's room when the son did not pay rent, and there was no evidence of any agreement on the part of the parent not to enter the son's room. (United States v. Rith (10th Cir. 1999) 164 F.3rd 1323.)

Father, with the apparent authority to allow police officers to search his entire residence, including the bedroom of his adult son, under circumstances where the father and defendant son had apparent free access to each other's room, validly authorized police to enter the son's room. (People v. Oodham (2000) 81 Cal.App.4th 1.)

Query: If the adult child is paying rent and there is nothing else to suggest that the parents have free access to the child's room, would not the landlord-tenant rules (See Civil Code §§ 789.3, 1954) be applicable?

Parents have to have access to their minor child's bedroom and the power to give consent to the search of the bedroom to the police in order to properly execute their duty of supervision and control over the child. "In the absence of evidence suggesting a parent has abdicated this role toward his or her child, police officers may reasonably conclude that a parent can validly consent to the search of a minor child's bedroom." (In re D.C. (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 978.)

The Court reaffirmed the California Supreme Court's decision in In re Scott K., supra, noting that a minor may retain the right to exclude others from areas that are exclusive to the minor (a footlocker which was locked by the child). (In re D.C., supra, at pp. 987-988.)

The Court also rejected the contrary rule of United States v. Whitfield (D.C. Cir. 1991) 939 F.2nd 1071, which held that a parent does not have the authority to consent to the search of their adult son's closet despite access to the bedroom. (In re D.C. supra, at pp. 986-987.)

Child: Whether or not a child may validly allow police into the family residence depends upon a determination whether, under the circumstances, it is reasonable to believe that the child had the authority to do so.

An 11-year-old step-daughter, baby-sitting in the defendant's absence, was held not to have the authority to admit the police. (People v. Jacobs (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 472.)

"Minor children . . . do not have coequal dominion over the family home. [Citation.] Although parents may choose to grant their minor children joint access and mutual use of the home, parents normally retain control of the home as > well as the power to rescind the authority they have given. 'It does not startle us that a parent's consent to a search of the living room in the absence of his minor child is given effect; but we should not allow the police to rely on the consent of the child to bind the parent. The common sense of the matter is that the . . . parent has not surrendered his privacy of place in the living room to the discretion of the . . . child; rather, the latter [has] privacy of place there in the discretion of the former.' [Citations.]" (Id., at p. 482.)

> The Court recognized, however, that the rule is not absolute: "In some circumstances, a teenager may possess sufficient authority to allow the police to enter and look about common areas." (Id., at p. 483.)

But, where a 12-year-old abuse victim led police to her aunt's house and where, in her aunt's absence, the victim was in charge of the house, living and working there, the victim could validly give consent to search for implements used to abuse her when the aunt had initially invited police inside, and after the aunt was arrested and removed from the house. (People v. Santiago (1997) 55 Cal.App.4th 1540.)

The 16-year-old daughter of the defendant had the apparent authority to allow the officers the right to enter defendant's residence. (People v. Hoxter (1999) 75 Cal.App.4th 406.)

Co-Occupants (Roommates, Husband and Wife, Parent and Child): When two or more people have equal access to a residence (e.g.; roommates, husband and wife, etc.), the rules regarding one co-occupant giving consent vary depending upon the circumstances:

General Rules:

The adult sister sharing an apartment with her adult brothers does not have apparent authority to consent to the search of the brothers' bedroom. (Beach v. Superior Court (1970) 11 Cal.App.3rd 1032, 1034–1035.)

When adult roommates have separate rooms, exclusive control by each of the individuals over his or her own room is presumed, absent evidence to the contrary. (United States v. Almeida-Perez (8th Cir. 2008) 549 F.3rd 1162, 1172; U.S. v. Barrera-Martinez (N.D. Ill. 2003) 274 F.Supp.2nd 950, 962.)

A warrantless entry of a residence does not violate the Fourth Amendment if the police reasonably believe that the person who consented had the authority to do so. (Illinois v. Rodriguez (1990) 497 U.S. 177 [110 S.Ct. 2793; 111 L.Ed.2nd 148].)

The Rule of Georgia v. Randolph:

Rule: When two equally-situated cotenants, both present at the scene, are asked for permission to enter and/or search a residence, with one saying "yes" but the other saying "no," entry and/or search may not be made absent an exigent circumstance or a search warrant. The "no" takes precedence. (Georgia v. Randolph (2006) 547 U.S. 103 [126 S.Ct. 1515; 164 L.Ed.2nd 208].)

> "(W)hen an occupant consents to a search, but a co-occupant who 'is present at the scene … expressly refuses to consent,' the co-occupant's refusal 'prevails, rendering the warrantless search unreasonable and invalid as to' him." (People v. Byers (2016) 6 Cal.App.5th 856, 862; quoting Georgia v. Randolph, supra, at p. 106.)
>
> California's prior authority to the contrary (e.g., see People v. Wilkins (1993) 14 Cal.App.4th 761, 769-776.) is no longer valid in light of this Supreme Court opinion.
>
> A warrantless entry of a residence does not violate the Fourth Amendment if the police reasonably believe that the person who consented had the authority to do so. (Illinois v. Rodriguez (1990) 497 U.S. 177 [110 S.Ct. 2793; 111 L.Ed.2nd 148].)

Exceptions According to Randolph:

The Supreme Court in Randolph listed a number of exceptions to this rule:

- 1. Where there is a "recognized hierarchy" (e.g., parent vs. child), objections from the one with the inferior status may be ignored.

  > See also In re D.C. (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 978, 988-989, and United States v. Rith (10th Cir. 1999) 164 F.3rd 1323, below.

- 2. With a reasonable (articulable) fear for the safety of the person inviting officers inside, or anyone else inside, entry may be made to check the victim's welfare and/or to stop pending violence.

> See Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 874: "Randolph called out an important exigent circumstance related to domestic violence, explicitly acknowledging that a co-occupant's refusal is vitiated where there is a threat to the victim: 'No question has been raised, or reasonably could be, about the authority of the police to enter a dwelling to protect a resident from domestic violence.'"

- 3. An objection from an absent cotenant (even if handcuffed in a patrol car immediately out front) may be ignored in the face of a present cotenant's consent, at least so long as he is not led away from the scene for the purpose of justifying an entry into the residence.
  - But see United States v. Murphy (9th Cir. 2008) 516 F.3rd 1117, and Fernandez v. California (2014) 571 U.S. 292, 298-307 [134 S.Ct. 1126, 1132-1137; 188 L.Ed.2nd 25], below.

- 4. It is not necessary to solicit possible objections from a cotenant, even if that person is inside and/or available and even if it could be expected that that person would object.

- 5. Any other exigent circumstance (safety of the occupants, protection of possible physical evidence, etc.) may justify an immediate entry, at least until the scene is secured and/or the suspects detained pending the obtaining of a search warrant.

- 6. Entering with the victim of domestic violence, at her request, for the purpose of protecting her as she collects her belongings.

- 7. The consenting cotenant may retrieve evidence and bring it out to the police.

- 8. With probable cause, a search warrant may be obtained for the search of the residence.

The "Absent" Co-Occupant:

General Rule: Generally, consent to a search given by someone with authority cannot be revoked by an absent co-occupant's denial of consent, even if that denial is clear and contemporaneous with the search. (United States v. Matlock (1974) 415 U.S. 164, 172 [94 S.Ct. 988; 39 L.Ed.2nd 242]: The mutual use of property carries with it the risk that just one of the occupants might permit a search of the common areas.)

Defendant in Matlock was in a patrol car out front of the residence, "a distance from the home." (pg. 179.) For purposes of this rule, he was deemed to be "absent."

See also People v. Haskett (1982) 30 Cal.3rd 841, 855-857; with defendant outside in a police car, objecting, but his wife, in the residence, saying okay, the entry was held to be lawful.

Issue: When the objecting co-occupant is arrested and taken away from the scene:

The Ninth Circuit has ruled that when an objecting cotenant is taken to jail before the consenting cotenant shows up at the scene and gives his consent, the rule of Randolph still applies. It is not necessary, despite the specific language in Randolph to the contrary, that the objecting party be taken away "for the purpose of" avoiding the rule of Randolph. (United States v. Murphy (9th Cir. 2008) 516 F.3rd 1117, 1124-1125.)

The Ninth Circuit took it even a step further, setting out a new rule: "Once a co-tenant has registered his objection, his refusal to grant consent remains effective barring some objective manifestation that he has changed his position and no longer objects." (Ibid.)

> At least four other federal circuits and two state Supreme Courts disagree with Murphy on this issue. (See United States v. Hudspeth (8th Cir. 2008) 518 F.3rd 954; United States v. Henderson (7th Cir. 2008) 536 F.3rd 776; United States v. Shrader (4th Cir. Apr. 4, 2012) 675 F.3rd 300; United States v. Cooke (5th Cir. 2012) 674 F.3rd 491, 499; People v. Stimple (Colo. 2012) 267 P.3rd 1219, 1221-1226; State v. St. Martin (2011) 334 Wis.2nd 290, 306-310.)

The Supreme Court in the Randolph decision itself sets out an exception to its rule, such as when a potentially objecting cotenant is removed from the scene in order to avoid the ruling in Randolph: "So long as there is no evidence that the police have removed the potentially objecting tenant from the entrance for the sake of avoiding a possible objection, there is practical value in the simple clarity of complementary rules, one recognizing the co-tenant's permission when there is no fellow occupant on hand, the other according dispositive weight to the fellow occupant's contrary indication when he expresses it." (pgs. 121-122.)

Subsequent to Murphy, the Ninth Circuit decided United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2009) 563 F.3rd 410, which reemphasized the rule that a cotenant must have been removed "for the purpose of" avoiding a possible objection, ruling that there must be some evidence that that was the purpose of the police in taking the defendant from the scene. It was also noted that there is no duty to ask the absent cotenant for consent. (Id., pp. 414-418.)

The United States Supreme Court shot down this theory altogether, noting that so long as it is "objectively reasonable" for officers to remove the objecting party from the premises (e.g. there was probable cause to arrest him), then officers may come back later and seek the consent for a warrantless entry from the remaining co-tenant. The now absent co-tenant's previous objection is no longer valid. The officers' subjective motivations for removing the objecting co-tenant are irrelevant so long as the removal was objectively reasonable. (Fernandez v. California (2014) 571 U.S. 292, 298-307 [134 S.Ct. 1126, 1132-1137; 188 L.Ed.2nd 25].)

At the Door: In discussing what the Supreme Court in Randolph meant when it specified that an objecting co-tenant must be "at the door," the Ninth Circuit determined that this term cannot be taken too literally. In discussing this issue, the Ninth Circuit reviewed the circumstances of Bailey v. United States (2013) 568 U.S. 186, 192-202 [133 S.Ct. 1031, 1037-1043; 185 L.Ed.2nd 19] (where the issue of whether defendant was "present" during the execution of a search warrant despite being contacted a mile away after having left the premise to be searched, holding that he was not in the "immediate vicinity" of the premises when detained, making the detention unlawful.) In the instant case, defendant (upon objecting to the search of his residence) was only about 20 feet away from his apartment, and within line-of-sight; close enough for the officers in the residence to hear his objections. This, the Court ruled, being within the "immediate vicinity" of his residence, was sufficient to trigger the rule of Randolph. Per the Court: "(A) defendant need not stand at the doorway to count as being physically present—presence on the premises (including its immediate vicinity) is sufficient." (Citing Fernandez v. California (2014) 571 U.S. 292, at pg. 306 [134 S.Ct. 1126; 1132-1137; 188 L.Ed.2nd 25]; and Bailey v. United States, supra, at p. 201.) (United States v. Parkins (9th Cir. Feb. 14, 2024) 92 F.4th 882, __ [2024 U.S.App. LEXIS 3427].)

Necessity of an "Explicit Objection:"

"A defendant's objection (to a consent search of one's residence) must be express. '[I]mplicit refusals' are insufficient. (United States v. Parkins (9th Cir. Feb. 14, 2024) 92 F.4th 882, __ [2024 U.S.App. LEXIS 3427]; quoting United States v. Moore (9th Cir. 2014) 770 F.3rd 809, 813.)

Defendant's statement: "Don't let the cops in," which all the officers heard, was held to be sufficiently clear to convey his objection to allowing the police to enter his apartment. (Parkins, at p. __.)

The fact that defendant never specifically told the officers that he did not want them in his apartment was held to be irrelevant. (Id., at p. __.)

The Court noted also that "both words and actions can constitute an express refusal to grant the police entry." (Ibid.; citing Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 875.)

In Bonivert, the defendant first "locked the side door" and then "attempted to close the back door" on the officers as they tried to gain entry to his home.

See also United States v. Williams (8th Cir. 2008) 521 F.3rd 902, 907; where defendant "slammed the door and put the dead bolt on."

Other Limitations:

The Supreme Court in Randolph specifically held that an officer has no duty to seek out other cotenants to see if anyone objects. An objecting co-tenant must be at the scene to object. (Id., at p. 122.)

The rule of Randolph does not govern when a minor objects to the search of his room but is overruled by his mother. Randolph applies only to disagreements between joint adult occupants having apparently equal authority over a residence. (In re D.C. (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 978, 988-989.)

The fact that the defendant was not given the opportunity to object is irrelevant, at least "(s)o long as there is no evidence that the police have removed the potentially objecting tenant from the entrance for the sake of avoiding a possible objection. (People v. Byers (2016) 6 Cal.App.5th 856, 867.)

Knock and Notice:

"When the police obtain consent from a co-occupant who is off the premises, they must comply with the knock-and-announce rule." People v. Byers (2016) 6 Cal.App.5th 856, 862-864.)

However, "when a search is conducted pursuant to an absent co-tenant's consent, the purposes of the knock-notice requirement (Citation) do not include preventing law enforcement from seeing or seizing evidence pursuant to the consent exception," finding the failure to comply with knock and notice to be harmless error. (Id., at p. 864.)

Additional Case Law:

In a civil lawsuit, it was held that the consent exception to the warrant requirement did not justify the officers' entry into plaintiff's home because even though the officers secured his girlfriend's consent (she being outside, in front of the house), plaintiff was physically present inside and expressly refused to permit them to enter on two different occasions. The officers were not entitled to qualified immunity under the consent exception to the Fourth Amendment because a reasonable officer would have understood that "no" meant "no." (Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 874-876.)

> A refusal to allow officers to enter need not be expressed verbally. Refusing to open the door, or even talk to officers, reflects one's objection to entry just as clearly as if the occupant had verbally denied consent. (Id., at p. 875.)
>
> But see United States v. Moore (9th Cir. 2014) 770 F.3rd 809, below.

When a cotenant who is absent from the scene consents to a law enforcement entry into a residence, but another cotenant who is present at the scene objects, an entry is unlawful. (Tompkins v. Superior Court (1959) 59 Cal.2nd 65; a pre-Randolph case.)

> But note, should the present cotenant fail to object, consent from the absent cotenant allows the entry. (People v. Viega (1989) 214 Cal.App.3rd 817.)

And also note United States v. Rith (10th Cir. 1999) 164 F.3rd 1323, where the absent parents' permission to enter the house took precedence over the present 18-year-old son's objection to the officers' entry.

With roommates, the consenting co-occupant may only consent to entry of his personal room and any common areas. He may not give a valid consent to another co-tenant's private room. (People v. Boyer (1989) 48 Cal.3rd 247, 276; United States v. Davis (9th Cir. 2003) 332 F.3rd 1163.)

When the estranged wife retains property within the residence, remains liable for rent, civil liability for accidents, etc., and has not established a permanent residence elsewhere, she still has the apparent authority to allow police into her residence where the husband still lives. (People v. Bishop (1996) 44 Cal.App.4th 220.)

> The fact that the husband had changed the locks is only indicative of the level of antagonism, and is not a limitation of the wife's authority to allow the police to enter and search. (Ibid.)

Randolph was not violated when officers searched defendant's residence after obtaining his cotenant fiancée's consent to search their joint residence. Defendant, who was inside but refusing to answer the door or phone calls made to him, never expressly refused to consent to the entry and search, acquiescing in letting his fiancée deal with the police. At best, defendant "implicitly" refused to allow the police to enter and search by not answering the door or his cellphone. The Court declined to extend Randolph to include implied refusals. (United States v. Moore (9th Cir. 2014) 770 F.3rd 809, 813-814.)

> But see Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 874-876, above, noting at fn. 9 that in Moore, the defendant's refusal to talk to police was at best "implicit," as opposed to "express," and insufficient under Randolph to prevent the police from entering the residence.
> Also, it was held in Moore that there was nothing in Randolph to prevent the officers from using a battering ram to gain access when the fiancée, who was locked out, expressly consented to the use of such a method to gain entry. (United States v. Moore, supra, at p. 814.)

See United States v. Williams (8th Cir. 2008) 521 F.3rd 902, 907, where it was held that by the defendant slamming the door shut on the officers and closing the deadbolt door lock, there was sufficient "affirmative conduct" to qualify as an express refusal to consent to the officers' entry.
A warrantless entry into defendant's apartment was justified under the Fourth Amendment when officers received the voluntary consent of defendant's housemate. The consent was not coerced even though the housemate was handcuffed and in custody outside the apartment. The officer credibly testified that the housemate admitted to having drugs and a gun in his bedroom and that no threats or promises were made to obtain consent to search the bedroom to retrieve these items. The trial court abused its discretion by excluding evidence on whether the officers waited long enough to comply with the knock-notice requirement when they entered the apartment, but the error was harmless because exclusion of evidence, the only relief requested, was not the proper remedy. (People v. Byers (2016) 6 Cal.App.5th 856, 862-865.)

A warrantless search of a residence based upon a probationer's (or parolee's) search and seizure conditions, when the probationer is a co-occupant of the residence, is lawful as a matter of law, even over the objection of another co-tenant (the probationer's mother who also lived there, in this case). The principles behind Georgia v. Randolph (2006) 547 U.S. 103 [126 S.Ct. 1515; 164 L.Ed.2nd 208], Randolph being a consensual search issue unrelated to a Fourth waiver search, are inapplicable. (Smith v. City of Santa Clara (9th Cir. 2017) 876 F.3rd 987, 991-995; rejecting defendant's argument that Randolph created an exception to the probationary search rule.)

Also see United States v. McKerrell (10th Cir. 2007) 491 F.3rd 1221, where the police had outstanding warrants to arrest McKerrell. When they showed up to do so, McKerrell barricaded himself in the house, which the court concluded "related solely to his desire to avoid arrest." After McKerrell peacefully surrendered, his wife gave consent to search the house. The factual findings, warrants, peaceful surrender, and timing of the wife's consent place this case beyond the teachings of Randolph or Bonivert's situation.

Once officers are lawfully in a residence with a co-tenant's consent, the fact that the defendant belatedly objects to the officers' presence in his house does not negate the earlier lawfully obtained consent from the cotenant. (United States v. Coleman (8th Cir. AR 2018) 909 F.3rd 925.)

Evidence of a Defendant's Refusal to Consent to a Warrantless Search*:

"Presenting evidence of an individual's exercise of a right to refuse to consent to entry in order to demonstrate a consciousness of guilt merely serves to punish the exercise of the right to insist upon a warrant." (People v. Keener (1983) 148 Cal.App.3rd 73, 79.)

It is improper for a prosecutor to introduce evidence of, or comment to a jury about, a defendant's refusal to consent to a warrantless search of his property. (People v. Wood (2002) 103 Cal.App.4th 803.)

Sanctions for Violations*: If the consent is held to be involuntary, then all the direct products of that "consent" will be suppressed under the "fruit of the poisonous tree" doctrine. (See cases cited above.)

If an otherwise voluntary consent is the direct product of some other illegal police act (e.g.; illegal arrest, detention, etc.), then the consent and the resulting direct products of the consent may also be suppressed. (People v. Valenzuela (1994) 28 Cal.App.4th 817, 833.)

A consent to search that is the product of an illegal detention is also subject to suppression, as are the products of that search. (People v. Krohn (2007) 149 Cal.App.4th 1294.)

Handcuffing a person suspected of possible involvement in a narcotics transaction, but where the officer testified only that he was "uncomfortable" with the fact that defendant was tall (6' 6") and that narcotics suspects sometimes carry weapons (although the officer did not pat him down for weapons), converted a detention into an arrest, making the subsequent consent to search involuntary. (People v. Stier (2008) 168 Cal.App.4th 21.)
