Forward*: The following, throughout this Outline, are the rules developed by the courts and legislatures for the purpose of protecting society's reasonable privacy expectations and effectuating the purposes of the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution.

> The United States Constitution: In reviewing the development over the years of the U.S. Constitution, and in particular its first ten amendments (i.e., the "Bill of Rights"), including, specifically, the Fourth Amendment, as well as California's similarly constructed Constitution, it is helpful to remember where this all originated.
> > "In considering the United States Constitution, we must 'always regard it as unique.' Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. 657, 673; 9 L.Ed. 1233 (1838). The Constitution is a 'singular and solemn . . . experiment' created by one of the finest group of statesmen ever assembled. The Federalist No. 40 (James Madison). It was born of a hard-fought struggle that against all odds wrested a fledgling nation from oppression by the then-greatest empire on earth. The Bill of Rights was adopted in the same vein, championed by James Madison. When we interpret the Fourth Amendment, we ground our jurisprudence in an understanding of the text's original public meaning at ratification and 'traditional standards of reasonableness.' See Virginia v. Moore, 553 U.S. 164, 168-69, 171, 128 S.Ct. 1598, 170 L.Ed.2nd 559 (2008). Above all, Chief Justice Marshall reminds us, 'we must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding.' McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316, 407, 4 L.Ed. 579 (1819)." (Tabares v. City of Huntington Beach (9th Cir. 2021) 988 F.3rd 1119, 1122.)

The Outline*: In an attempt to provide some organization to the myriad of case law and relevant statutes to this subject, the Outline has been broken down into 20 specific (although often overlapping) chapters:

The Basics:

- The Constitutional Basis For Searches and Seizures: (Chapter 1)
- Procedural Rules: (Chapter 2)

Police-Citizen Contacts: Contacts between law enforcement officers and private individuals can be broken down into three distinct situations: (See Florida v. Royer (1983) 460 U.S. 491 [103 S.Ct. 1319; 75 L.Ed.2nd 229]; In re James D. (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 903, 911-912; In re Manuel G. (1997) 16 Cal.4th 805, 821; People v. Hughes (2002) 27 Cal.4th 287, 327-328; People v. Steele (2016) 246 Cal.App.4th 1110, 1115; People v. Arebalos-Cabrera (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 179, 186.):

- Consensual Encounters (Chapter 3)
- Detentions (Chapter 4)
- Arrests (Chapter 5)

Other Topics*: Treated separately despite common overlaps, are issues involving:

- Use of Force (Chapter 6)
- The Bill of Rights Protections (Chapter 7)
- Searches and Seizures (Chapter 8)
- Warrantless Searches and Seizures (Chapter 9)
- Searches With a Search Warrant (10)
- Searches of Persons (Chapter 11)
- Searches of Vehicles (Chapter 12)
- Searches of Residences and Other Buildings (Chapter 13)
- New and Developing Law Enforcement Tools and Technology (Chapter 14)
- Open Fields (Chapter 15)
- Searches of Containers (Chapter 16)
- Seizures and Searches of High Tech Devices (Chapter 17)
- Border Searches (Chapter 18)
- Fourth Waiver Searches* (Chapter 19)
- Consent Searches (Chapter 20)

Chapter 1*:

The Constitutional Basis For Searches and Seizures*:

Rule: "Both the federal and state Constitutions prohibit unreasonable searches and seizures." (People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034, 1041.)

The Fourth Amendment*: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized." (Italics added)

California Constitution, Art I, § 13*: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable seizures and searches may not be violated; and a warrant may not issue except on probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons and things to be seized." (Italics added)

"'California has generally adopted Fourth Amendment jurisprudence for interpreting analogous provisions of the California Constitution. [Citations.] Our courts therefore apply federal legal standards when analyzing the reasonableness of a search or seizure under California constitutional law.'" (Coalition on Homelessness v. City and County of San Francisco (2023) 93 Cal.App.5th 928, 935, fn. 1; quoting People v. Perry (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 444, 466.)

Purpose*:

"The Fourth Amendment protects '[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures.' The 'basic purpose of this Amendment,' our cases have recognized, 'is to safeguard the privacy and security of individuals against arbitrary invasions by governmental officials.' Camara v. Municipal Court of City and County of San Francisco, 387 U.S. 523, 528, 87 S.Ct. 1727, 18 L.Ed.2nd 930 (1967). The Founding generation crafted the Fourth Amendment as a 'response to the reviled "general warrants" and "writs of assistance" of the colonial era, which allowed British officers to rummage through homes in an unrestrained search for evidence of criminal activity." Riley v. California, 573 U.S. 373, 403, 134 S.Ct. 2473, 189 L.Ed.2nd 430, 452 (2014). In fact, as John Adams recalled, the patriot James Otis's 1761 speech condemning writs of assistance was 'the first act of opposition to the arbitrary claims of Great Britain' and helped spark the Revolution itself. Ibid, 134 S.Ct. 2473, 189 L.Ed.2nd 430, 452 (quoting 10 Works of John Adams 248 (C. Adams ed. 1856))." (Carpenter v. United States (June 22, 2018) 585 U.S. __, __ [138 S.Ct. 2206; 201 L.Ed.2nd 507].)

"The Amendment seeks to secure 'the privacies of life' against "arbitrary power" (citing Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 630, 6 S.Ct. 524, 29 L.Ed. 746 (1886) . . . (and) 'to place obstacles in the way of a too permeating police surveillance.'"; (Id., at p. __; citing United States v. Di Re (1948) 332 U.S. 581, 595 [68 S.Ct. 222; 92 L.Ed. 210].)

See Florida v. Jardines (2013) 569 U.S. 1, 5 [133 S.Ct. 1409; 185 L.Ed.2nd 495], noting that in addition to privacy interests, the Fourth Amendment protects citizens' interests in being free from physical intrusions.

See also Mendez *v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2018) 897 F.3rd 1067, 1074-1075; "The Fourth Amendment protects not only a person's broad interests in privacy, but also, and specifically, a person's interest in being shielded from physical governmental intrusions."

"The Fourth Amendment's 'essential purpose' is 'to impose a standard of "reasonableness" (Italics added) upon the exercise of discretion by government officials, including law enforcement agents, in order 'to safeguard the privacy and security of individuals against arbitrary invasions.'"" (United States v. Anderson (9th Cir. 2022) 56 F.4th 748, 756; quoting Delaware v. Prouse (1979) 440 U.S. 648, 653-654 [99 S.Ct. 1391; 59 L.Ed.2nd 660].)

Per the Anderson court, at p. 736: "The Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard 'is not capable of precise definition or mechanical application,' (citation), and 'each case must be decided on its own facts.'" (quoting Bell v. Wolfish (1979) 441 U.S. 520, 559 [99 S.Ct. 1861; 60 L.Ed.2nd 447].)

"The Supreme Court evaluates the reasonableness of a warrantless search 'by balancing its intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against its promotion of legitimate governmental interests.'" (United States v. Anderson, supra, quoting Delaware v. Prouse, supra, at p. 654.)

The Supremacy Clause*:

"A state legislature does not have the power to 'deem' into existence 'facts' operating to negate individual rights arising under the federal constitution." (See U.S. Const., art. VI, cl. 2 [Supremacy Clause]; Marbury v. Madison (1803) 5 U.S. 137, 177-180 [2 L.Ed. 60]; Younger v. Harris (1971) 401 U.S. 37, 52 [27 L.Ed.2nd 699; 91 S.Ct. 746] ['a statute apparently governing a dispute cannot be applied by judges, consistently with their obligations under the Supremacy Clause, when such an application of the statute would conflict with the Constitution'].) A statute attempting such a feat would be a 'nullity.' (Gibbons v. Ogden (1824) 22 U.S. 1, 210-211 [6 L.Ed. 23].)" (People v. Arredondo (2016) 245 Cal.App.4th 186, 200-201; see also People v. Mason (2016) 8 Cal.App.5th Supp. 11, 29.)

Note: Petition for Review in People v. Arredondo, supra, was dismissed and the case remanded in light of the decision in Mitchell v. Wisconsin (June 27, 2019) __ U.S.__, __ [139 S.Ct. 2525; 204 L.Ed.2nd 1040], where the U.S. Supreme Court held that when a DUI arrestee is unconscious, this fact alone will "almost always" constitute an exigency, allowing for a warrantless blood draw. (See "Legal Effects of California's Implied Consent Law," under "Consent Searches" (Chapter 20), below.

Scope*:

Due Process: Initially intended to control the actions of the federal government only (See Barron ex rel. Tiernan v. Mayor of Baltimore (1833) 7 Pet. 243.), the United States Supreme Court eventually ruled that a violation of the Fourth Amendment by state (which includes all county and municipal) authorities does in fact constitute a Fourteenth Amendment, "due process" violation, thus imposing compliance with this protection upon the states as well. (Mapp v. Ohio (1961) 367 U.S 643 [81 S.Ct. 1684; 6 L.Ed.2nd 1081]; Baker v. McCollan (1979) 443 U.S. 137, 142 [61 L.Ed.2nd 433, 440-441]; People v. Bracamonte (1975) 15 Cal.3rd 394, 400; People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 755; see also People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034, 1041; citing People v. Troyer (2011) 51 Cal.4th 599, 605; see also Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. Superior Court (2019) 8 Cal.5th 28, 39.)

The Fourteenth Amendment provides that no "state" shall deprive its citizens of "*life, liberty, or property, without due process of la*w." Violations of the Fourth Amendment constitute such a deprivation. (Mapp v. Ohio, supra.)

See also Article I, section 7, of the California Constitution.

"The Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures applies to respondents through the Fourteenth Amendment (due process clause)." (Coalition on Homelessness v. City and County of San Francisco (2023) 93 Cal.App.5th 928, 938; citing Soldal v. Cook County, Illinois (1992) 506 U.S. 56, 61 [112 S.Ct. 538; 121 L.Ed.2nd 450]; and Verdun v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2022) 51 F.4th 1033, 1036.)

"The Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures applies to states through the Fourteenth Amendment." (People v. Alvarez (2023) 98 Cal.App.5th 531, 543, citing Soldal v. Cook County, Illinois, supra.)

"The Fourth Amendment's protection extends beyond the sphere of a criminal investigation." (Grady v. North Carolina (2015) 575 U.S. 306, 309 [135 S.Ct. 1368, 1371; 191 L.Ed.2nd 459]; finding that the use of a "satellite-based monitoring" ("SBM") device, attached to a recidivist sex offender's ankle to monitor his movements, although imposed in a post-conviction, post sentence proceeding that is "civil in nature," constitutes a "search" under the Fourth Amendment."

This includes affording criminal defendants the right to a fair trial. (Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. Superior Court, supra.)

Persons, Houses, Papers, and Effects: Also, the Fourth Amendment (as well as the California Constitution) protects against trespassory searches only with regard to those items (i.e., "persons, houses, papers, and effects") that it enumerates. (United States v. Jones (2012) 565 U.S. 400, 404-413 [132 S.Ct. 945, 949-954; 181 L.Ed.2nd 911].) (See "Trespassory Searches," under "Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 8), below.)

Double Jeopardy*:

The Double Jeopardy Clause: The "Double Jeopardy Clause" of the Fifth Amendment provides in part that; ". . . nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." (The Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution.)

The Double Jeopardy Clause is applicable to the states as well as the federal government.

"The double jeopardy clauses of the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution and article I, section 15, of the California Constitution provide that no person may be tried more than once for the same offense. (People v. Anderson (2009) 47 Cal.4th 92, 103–104 . . . .) The double jeopardy clause thus 'protects against a second prosecution for the same offense following an acquittal or conviction, and also protects against multiple punishment for the same offense.' (Anderson, at pp. 103–104; accord, North Carolina v. Pearce (1969) 395 U.S. 711, 717 [23 L.Ed.2nd 656; 89 S. Ct. 2072] . . . , overruled on other grounds . . . .)" (People v. Sanchez (2020) 49 Cal.App.5th 961, 974.)

In Sanchez, after defendant was acquitted on a charge that he murdered his nine-month-old child, it was held that double jeopardy principles, did not bar his retrial for assault on a child causing death, a charge on which the jury hung, because the jury could have grounded the murder verdict on defendant's mental state, rather than necessarily deciding that he did not commit an act that causing death. Also, amending the information to add a > charge of child endangerment did not give rise to a presumption of vindictiveness; the new charge was less serious than the original murder and assault counts and did not increase his maximum potential sentence. Lastly, Pen. Code § 654 did not preclude a subsequent trial. Its bar against multiple prosecutions does not apply to the amendment of an information to add new charges after a mistrial. (Ibid.)

The trial court initially imposed an aggregate 12-year prison term for numerous convictions arising out of defendant's violent relationship with his former girlfriend. On remand following defendant's first appeal, the trial court corrected its Pen. Code § 654 errors, and resentenced defendant to a total prison term of 12 years four months. The Appellate Court held that this violated double jeopardy. Where unauthorized sentences imposed on remand were erroneously harsh or neutral rather than lenient, the Serrato exception to double jeopardy (People v. Serrato (1973) 9 Cal.3rd 753) did not apply. Consequently, while the trial court was allowed to reconsider all of the other elements of the sentence, it could not impose an aggregate sentence greater than the original sentence of 12 years. The 12 year, four month sentence the court imposed on resentencing thus violated Cal. Const., art. I, 15. (People v. Trammel (2023) 97 Cal.App.5th 415.)

> In Serrato, the two defendants had been convicted by a jury of felony possession of a firebomb. The defendants moved for a new trial and the trial court purported to modify their convictions to misdemeanor disturbing the peace. It then placed them on probation for two years on the condition that each pay a fine of $125. The California Supreme Court concluded that the trial court had exceeded its statutory authority and violated due process in the case because disturbing the peace was not a lesser included offense of possession of a firebomb. (Id. at p. 758.) In holding that the defendants were not entitled to a dismissal, the Court pointed out that a defendant who has successfully moved to have a conviction set aside "impliedly waives any objection to being retried" on the original charge. (pp. 759–760.) The court also acknowledged another well-established rule: "[W]here a trier of the facts finds the defendant guilty of a lesser degree of the offense charged, or of a lesser included offense, there is an implied acquittal of the greater offense." (p. 760.) And it confirmed that "[i]f in lieu of granting a new trial the court decides to modify the verdict to a lesser included offense, and this modified verdict ultimately ripens into a final judgment of conviction, the conviction bars further prosecution of either the offense charged or the lesser offense." (p. 761.)

charged defendant with three crimes: malice murder, felony murder, and aggravated assault. At trial, defendant asserted an insanity defense. The jury found him not guilty by reason of insanity on the malice-murder charge but guilty but mentally ill on the felony-murder and aggravated-assault charges. The Georgia state courts, however, decided that these verdicts were "repugnant" because they required contradictory conclusions about defendant's mental state at the time of the crime. They therefore nullified both the "not guilty" and "guilty" verdicts and authorized defendant's retrial. (McElrath v. Georgia (Feb. 21, 2024) __ U.S __ [144 S.Ct. 651; 217 L.Ed.2nd 419].)

The Supreme Court of the United States reversed, holding that the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment prevents the State from retrying defendant for the crime that had resulted in the "not guilty by reason of insanity" finding. The court clarified that a jury's determination that a defendant is not guilty by reason of insanity is a conclusion that "criminal culpability had not been established," just as much as any other form of acquittal. Despite the seemingly inconsistent findings, the court emphasized that, once rendered, a jury's verdict of acquittal is inviolate, and the Double Jeopardy Clause prohibits second-guessing the reason for a jury's acquittal. The Supreme Court remanded the case for further proceedings not inconsistent with its opinion. (Ibid.)

Exception: The "dual-sovereignty exception" provides that a state being a separate entity from the federal government, prosecution by one governmental entity does not prevent the other from also prosecuting a defendant for the same offense based upon the same facts. The Supreme Court has determined that prosecution in federal and state court for the same conduct does not violate the Double Jeopardy Clause because the state and federal governments are separate sovereigns. (Abbate v. United States (1959) 359 U.S. 187, 195 [79 S.Ct. 666; 3 L.Ed.2nd 729]; see also United States v. Hayes (5th Cir. 1979) 589 F.2nd 811, 817-818.)

The Supreme Court has held that the states are separate sovereigns from the federal government because the States rely on authority originally belonging to them before admission to the Union and preserved to them by the Tenth Amendment. (Puerto Rico v. Sanchez-Valle (2016) 579 U.S. 59, 69, 136 S.Ct. 1863; 195 L.Ed.2nd 179].)

"The Double Jeopardy Clause does not prevent different sovereigns (i.e., a state government and the federal government) from punishing a defendant for the same criminal conduct." (United States v. Bidwell (11th Cir. 2004) 393 F.3rd 1206, 1209.)

The continuing validity of the "dual-sovereignty exception" was recently reaffirmed by the U.S. Supreme Court in Gamble v. United States (June 17, 2019) __ U.S. __ [139 S.Ct. 1960; 204 L.Ed.2nd 322]. Defendant was convicted in Alabama for possessing a firearm as a felon. Per the U.S. Supreme Court, the Double Jeopardy Clause did not preclude his prosecution by the United States under its own felon-in-possession law because a crime under one sovereign's laws was not "the same offense" as a crime under the laws of another sovereign, and under the dual-sovereignty doctrine, a state could prosecute a defendant under state law even if the federal government had already prosecuted him for the same conduct under a federal statute. The U.S. Supreme Court declined to overrule this long-standing interpretation of the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment because, contrary to the defendant's contention, it did not depart from the founding-era understanding of the right enshrined by the Double Jeopardy Clause and defendant's historical evidence did not warrant overturning 170 years of precedent.

The state Court of Appeal unreasonably applied Ashe v. Swenson (1970) 397 U.S. 436 [90 S.Ct. 1189; 25 L.Ed.2nd 469], in concluding that collateral estoppel and the Double Jeopardy Clause did not apply to bar petitioner's perjury prosecution. In petitioner's case, the traffic court necessarily decided, in petitioner's favor, an issue that was critical to both the traffic court and perjury proceedings—that petitioner was not the driver of the speeding car. A second prosecution was impermissible when, to have convicted the defendant in the second trial, the second jury had to have reached a directly contrary conclusion to the factfinder in the first trial. The handful of state court decisions that attempted to carve out a special exception to the Constitution's protection against double jeopardy for perjury prosecutions did not represent "fairminded disagreement" on an open question of constitutional law. (Wilkinson v. Gingrich (9th Cir. 2015) 806 F.3rd 511.)

Defendant's conviction in federal district court of aggravated sexual abuse in Indian country under the Major Crimes Act (18 U.S.C. §§2241(a)(1), (a)(2), 1153(a)), which followed his guilty plea in a Court of Indian Offenses to assault and battery (6 Ute Mountain Ute Code §2 (1988)), under a tribal code arising from the same incident, was held to have not violated the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment because defendant's single act transgressed two laws defined by separate sovereigns that therefore proscribed separate offenses. However, even if the federal government arguably prosecuted both offenses, the Double Jeopardy Clause did not bar successive prosecutions by the same sovereign. Per the Court: "(T)he Clause does not ask who puts a person in jeopardy. It zeroes in on what the person is put in jeopardy for: the "offence," . . . or violation of a law. We had seen no evidence that "offence" was originally understood to encompass both the violation of the law and the identity of the prosecutor." (Denezpi v. United States (June 13, 2022) 596 U.S. __, __ [142 S.Ct. 1838; 213 L.Ed.2nd 141].)

Defendant was indicted in the Northern District of Florida for theft of trade secrets from the StrikeLines' website. Defendant moved to dismiss the indictment, citing the Constitution's Venue Clause and the Vicinage Clause. He argued that he had accessed the website from his Alabama home and that the servers storing StrikeLines' data were in Orlando, Florida. The Eleventh Circuit agreed, determining that venue was improper and vacated defendant's conviction. The Eleventh Circuit also held, however, that a trial in an improper venue did not bar re-prosecution in the proper venue. (See United States v. Smith (11th Cir. 2022) 22 F.4th 1236.) The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the Constitution permitted retrying petitioner for theft of trade secrets following a trial in an improper venue that was tried before a jury drawn from the wrong district. The Double Jeopardy Clause is not implicated by a retrial in a proper venue. The Eleventh Circuit's decision that venue in the Northern District of Florida was improper did not adjudicate petitioner's culpability and thus did not trigger the Double Jeopardy Clause. (Smith v. United States (June 15, 2023) __ U.S. __ [143 S.Ct. 1594; 216 L.Ed.2nd 238].)

See also Wilkinson v. Magrann (9th Cir. 2019) 781 F.3rd Appx 669 (unpublished), under "Doctrine of 'Issue Preclusion,'" below.

Penal Code §§ 654 & 1023*: By statute (P.C. §§ 654 and 1023), an offense already prosecuted by another entity (e.g., federally) is not also punishable under California state law. (See People v. Tideman (1962) 57 Cal.2nd 574, for a discussion on double jeopardy principles as interpreted under California law.)

The Exclusionary Rule; Overview*: The Fourth Amendment serves as the primary basis for the "Exclusionary Rule;" excluding evidence from the courtroom which would be otherwise admissible, when seized by law enforcement in violation of its terms. (Weeks v. United States (1914) 232 U.S. 383 [34 S.Ct. 341; 58 L.Ed. 652].)

Rule: "The Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution protects the 'right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures.' (fn 2, omitted) The right is primarily enforced through the exclusionary rule, 'a deterrent sanction that bars the prosecution from introducing evidence obtained by way of a Fourth Amendment violation.'" (People v. McWilliams (2023) 14 Cal.5th 429, 537, quoting Davis v. United States (2011) 564 U.S. 229, 231–232 [180 L.Ed.2nd 285; 131 S.Ct. 2419].)

The omitted footnote #2 notes that: "The California Constitution similarly protects the 'right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable seizures and searches.' (Cal. Const., art. I, § 13.) But under the so-called truth-in-evidence provision of the state Constitution, "issues relating to the suppression of evidence > derived from governmental searches and seizures are reviewed under federal constitutional standards."'" (Quoting People v. Macabeo (2016) 1 Cal.5th 1206, 1212; citing Cal. Const., art. I, § 28, subd. (f)(2), commonly referred to simply as "Proposition 8.")

Theory: "Exclusion of evidence due to a Fourth Amendment violation is not automatic. As the high court stated: 'The Fourth Amendment protects the right to be free from "unreasonable searches and seizures," but it is silent about how this right is to be enforced. To supplement the bare text, this Court created the exclusionary rule, a deterrent sanction that bars the prosecution from introducing evidence obtained by way of a Fourth Amendment violation." (Davis v. United States (2011) 564 U.S. 229 [180 L.Ed.2nd 285, 131 S.Ct. 2419].) 'The rule … operates as "a judicially created remedy designed to safeguard Fourth Amendment rights generally through its deterrent effect, rather than a personal constitutional right of the party aggrieved."' As such, the question of '[w]hether the exclusionary sanction is appropriately imposed in a particular case' is an entirely separate issue 'from the question whether the Fourth Amendment rights of the party seeking to invoke the rule were violated by police conduct.' (United States v. Elmore (9th Cir. 2019) 917 F.3rd 1068, 1076; quoting United States* v. *Leon (1984) 468 U.S. 897, 906 [104 S.Ct. 3405, 82 L.Ed.2nd 677].)

History:

> "Because officers who violated the Fourth Amendment were traditionally considered trespassers, individuals subject to unconstitutional searches or seizures historically enforced their rights through tort suits or self-help." (Utah v. Strieff (2016) 579 U.S. 232, 237 [136 S.Ct. 2056, 2060-2061; 195 L.Ed.2nd 400]; citing Davies, Recovering the Original Fourth Amendment, 98 Mich. L. Rev. 547, 625 (1999).

> "The exclusionary rule was originally adopted in Weeks v. United States (1914) 232 U.S. 383 [58 L.Ed. 652, 34 S.Ct. 341], which barred evidence obtained by federal officers in violation of the Fourth Amendment.
> The Supreme Court subsequently held that the rule was not constitutionally imposed upon the states. (Wolf v. Colorado (1949) 338 U.S. 25 [93 L.Ed. 1782; 69 S.Ct. 1359]; see Breithaupt v. Abram (1957) 352 U.S. 432, 434 [1 L.Ed.2nd 448; 77 S.Ct. 408].)

> However, the Supreme Court held in Elkins v. United States (1960) 364 U.S. 206 [4 L.Ed.2nd 1669; 80 S.Ct. 1437], that evidence (wiretap information in this case) illegally seized by state authorities cannot be used by federal authorities claiming they did not know that such evidence had been illegally seized, negating the so-called "silver platter" doctrine. The Court ruled that in determining whether there had been an unreasonable search and seizure by state officers, federal courts must make independent inquiries, irrespective of whether the state court made such an inquiry and of how any such inquiry may have turned out.
> It was not until 1961, however, when Wolf was overruled, and that the exclusionary rule was made mandatory in state prosecutions. (Mapp v. Ohio (1961) 367 U.S. 643 [6 L.Ed.2nd 1081, 81 S.Ct. 1684]; see Schmerber v. California (1966) 384 U.S. 757, 766 [86 S.Ct. 1826; 16 L.Ed.2nd 908, 917, . . .].)" (People v. Bracamonte (1975) 15 Cal.3rd 394, 400, fn. 2.)

> "The exclusionary rule has traditionally been driven by one primary policy consideration: the deterrence of unconstitutional acts by law enforcement. United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 348, 94 S.Ct. 613, 38 L.Ed.2nd 561 (1974) ('[T]he [exclusionary] rule is a judicially created remedy designed to safeguard Fourth Amendment rights generally through its deterrent effect . . . .'); see also (United States v.) Leon, 468 U.S. at 909. The rule effects this goal in different ways, depending on the case. The most common is preventing police from benefiting from evidence obtained as a result of a constitutional violation, thereby removing the incentive to violate the Constitution to obtain evidence. See, e.g., United States v. Artis, 919 F.3rd 1123, 1133-1134 (9th Cir. 2019); United States v. Camou, 773 F.3rd 932, 944-45 (9th Cir. 2014)" (United States v. Jobe (9th Cir. 2019) 933 F.3rd 1074, 1078.)

> In United States v. Jobe, supra, at pp. 1078-1079, it was held that a 20-day delay in obtaining a search warrant to search an already lawfully seized laptop computer, although unreasonable, was not grounds for suppression of the laptop's contents. "(I)n another category of cases, police misconduct effectively bears no 'fruit.' . . . Unreasonable delays fall into this latter category." (Citing United States v. Cha (9th Cir. 2010) 597 F.3rd 995, 1003, where, in an apparent contradiction, the Court suppressed the evidence seized after an "unreasonable" 26½ hour delay in obtaining a warrant for a residence, the Court, in Jobe, comparing the differences in the relevant officers' actions.

It is also the purpose of the Fourth Amendment to "safeguard the privacy and security of individuals against arbitrary invasions by government officials." (Camara v. Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco (1967) 387 U.S. 523, 528 [87 S.Ct. 1727; 18 L.Ed.2nd 930, 935].)

The Exclusionary Rule also encourages officers to learn the rules for respecting private citizens' constitutional rights and abide by them. "Responsible law-enforcement officers will take care to learn 'what is required of them' under Fourth Amendment precedent and will conform their conduct to these rules." (Davis v. United States, supra, at p. 241, quoting Hudson v. Michigan (2006) 547 U.S. 586, at 599 [126 S.Ct. 2159; 165 L.Ed.2nd 56].)

Use of the exclusionary rule is a preferable sanction over outright dismissal of a case (United States v. Struckman (9th Cir. 2010) 611 F.3rd 560, 574-578; noting that dismissal under a court's "inherent supervisory powers" might be appropriate if necessary to (1) implement a remedy for the violation of a recognized statutory or constitutional right; (2) preserve judicial integrity by ensuring that a conviction rests on appropriate considerations validly before a jury; and (3) deter future illegal conduct, but even then, only after the defendant demonstrates sufficient prejudice.)

> "Since the Fourth Amendment guarantees the right to be free from 'unreasonable searches and seizures,' U.S. Const. amend. IV, the first question—whether the officer violated a constitutional right—will typically turn on the 'reasonableness' of the officer's actions. (Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 872.)

An otherwise lawful seizure can violate the Fourth Amendment if it is executed in an unreasonable manner. (United States v. Alverez-Tejeda (9th Cir. 2007) 491 F.3rd 1013, citing United States v. Jacobsen (1984) 466 U.S. 109, 124 [104 S.Ct.1652; 80 L.Ed.2nd 85]: "(I)ncluding if it is executed by means of an unreasonable ruse." (I.d., at pp. 1016-1017; and see United States v. Ramirez (9th Cir. 2020) 976 F.3rd 946, 952.)

While a parolee is subject to search or seizure without probable cause or even a reasonable suspicion, searching him may still be illegal if done in an unreasonable manner, such as by a strip search in a public place. (See People v. Smith (2009) 172 Cal.App.4th 1354; checking defendant's crotch area for drugs, while shielded from the public, held not to be a strip search and not unreasonable.)

U.S. 54, 60-61 [135 S.Ct. 530; 190 L.Ed.2nd 475]; quoting Brinegar v. United States (1949) 338 U.S. 160, 176 [93 L.Ed. 1879].)

> In Heien, the United States Supreme Court held that an officer's misapprehension as to the law "may" be reasonable when the issue is not yet settled. (See "Mistake of Law vs. Mistake of Fact," under "Types of Detentions," and "Detentions" (Chapter 4), below.)

Based upon the above, it has been held that if a detaining officer's justification for a traffic stop is based on a reasonable mistake—"either factual or legal"—(often referred to as "a mistake of fact or a mistake of law"), then the resulting search or seizure will be held to be lawful despite the Fourth Amendment violation, at least if it can be said that the officer's mistake was "objectively" reasonable. (Heien v. North Carolina (2014) 574 U.S. 54, 57, 60–61, 67.) "To be reasonable is not to be perfect, and so the Fourth Amendment allows for some mistakes on the part of government officials, giving them 'fair leeway for enforcing the law in the community's protection.'" (Id. at pp. 60–61.) (People v. Holiman (2022) 76 Cal.App.5th 825.)

> However, this exception can be stretched only so far. As noted by the Supreme Court in Heien: "(A)n officer can gain no Fourth Amendment advantage through a sloppy study of the laws he is duty-bound to enforce." (Id., at p. 831; quoting Heien v. North Carolina, supra, at p. 67.)

Balancing Test; Totality of the Circumstances:

> "'Reasonableness … is measured in objective terms by examining the totality of the circumstances' [citation], and 'whether a particular search meets the reasonableness standard '"'is judged by balancing its intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against its promotion of legitimate governmental interests.'"' [Citations.]" (People v. Robinson (2010) 47 Cal.4th 1104, 1120 [104 Cal. Rptr. 3d 727, 224 P.3d 55]; see Bell v. Wolfish (1979), 441 U.S. 520 at p. 559 ["Courts must consider the scope of the particular intrusion, the manner in which it is conducted, the justification for initiating it, and the place in which it is conducted."]'.)" (People v. Boulter (2011) 199 Cal.App.4th 761.)

Digital evidence seized by local state authority during the execution of a state-issued search warrant from defendant's cellphone, but not necessary to the prosecution of the state case, cannot be turned over to a federal agency for use in a separate federal prosecution absent a second search warrant seeking the evidence related to the pending federal charges. Citing Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373, 403 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430, 452], the South Dakota federal District Court noted that the High Court has held that "because cell phones contain immense amounts of personal information about people's lives, they are unique, and law enforcement officers must generally secure a warrant before conducting such a search." Thus, in this case, a federal agent who sought digital evidence from defendant's cellphone collected, but not used, by in the state prosecution, "should have applied for and obtained a second warrant [that] would have authorized him to search Mr. Hulscher's cell phone data for evidence of (the federal) firearms offenses." In discussing whether use in federal court the evidence obtained via a separate state-issued search warrant was harmless error, the Court held that it was not. "Here, the cost of applying the exclusionary rule is minimized because the evidence is peripheral in nature and not directly related to the firearms offense." (United States v. Hulscher (Dist. of So. Dakota, S. Div. 2017) 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22874; at pgs. 9-10.)

The Rule of Lenity:

Courts are to resolve doubts as to the meaning of a statute in a criminal defendant's favor. (People ex rel. Lungren v. Superior Court (1996) 14 Cal.4th 294, 312; People v. Reyes (2020) 56 Cal.App.5th 972.)

"'[W]e have frequently noted, "[the rule of lenity] applies 'only if two reasonable interpretations of the statute stand in relative equipoise.' [Citation.]" [Citations.]' (People v. Soria (2010) 48 Cal.4th 58, 65 . . . ; accord, People v. Lee (2003) 31 Cal.4th 613, 627 . . . .) The rule 'has no application where, "as here, a court 'can fairly discern a contrary legislative intent."'" (Lexin v. Superior Court (2010) 47 Cal.4th 1050, 1102, fn. 30. . . ; see People v. Avery (2002) 27 Cal.4th 49, 58 . . . .) "'[A] rule of construction . . . is not a straitjacket. Where the Legislature has not set forth in so many words what it intended, the rule of construction should not be followed blindly in complete disregard of factors that may give a clue to the legislative intent." [Citation.]' (People v. Jones (1988) 46 Cal.3rd 585, 599 . . . .)" (People v. Cornett (2012) 53 Cal.4th 1261, 1271; the Rule held not to apply.)

The "rule of lenity" generally requires that "ambiguity in a criminal statute should be resolved in favor of lenity, giving the defendant the benefit of every reasonable doubt on questions of interpretation." (Citing People v. Nuckles (2013) 56 Cal.4th 601, 611.) "But '[t]he rule of lenity does not apply every time there are two or more reasonable interpretations of a penal statute.'" (Citing People v. Manzo (2012) 53 Cal.4th 880, 889.) "On the contrary, this principle applies only 'when "two reasonable interpretations of the same provision stand in relative equipoise."'" (Smith v. Loanme, Inc. (2021) 11 Cal.5th 183, 201.)

Private Persons and the Exclusionary Rule: Evidence illegally obtained by private persons, acting in a private capacity, is not subject to the Exclusionary Rule. (See Burdeau v. McDowell (1921) 256 U.S. 465 [41 S.Ct. 574; 65 L.Ed. 1048]; Coolidge v. New Hampshire (1971 403 U.S. 443, 489 [91 S.Ct. 2022; 29 L.Ed.2nd 564; *Krauss v. Superior Court (1971) 5 Cal.3rd 418, 421; Jones v. Kmart Corp. (1998) 17 Cal.4th 329, 332.)

Even a peace officer, when off-duty and acting in a private capacity, may be found to have acted as a private citizen. (See People v. Wachter (1976) 58 Cal.App.3rd 911, 920, 922.)

However, a civil rights action pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 was held to be proper against non-law enforcement employees of a private corporation that operated a federal prison under contract. (Pollard v. GEO Group, Inc. (9th Cir. 2010) 607 F.3rd 583.)

The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC) was held to qualify as a governmental entity for Fourth Amendment purposes. Even though NCMEC is privately incorporated, its two primary authorizing statutes, 18 U.S.C. § 2258A and 42 U.S.C. § 5773(b), mandate its collaboration with federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies in over a dozen different ways. For example, Internet Service Providers (AOL, in this case) are required to forward emails suspected of containing child pornography to NCMEC, and NCMEC is required to maintain a CyberTipline to receive such emails. NCMEC is then allowed to review the emails and is required to report possible child sexual exploitation violations to the government. (United States v. Ackerman (10th Cir. Kan. 2016) 831 F.3rd 1292.)

A security guard employed by a private security company (i.e., AGB Investigative Services, or AGB) stopped and searched defendant at a Chicago Housing Authority ("CHA") public housing unit. After seizing a handgun from defendant, the security guard called the Chicago Police Department. Defendant was charged in federal court with possession of a firearm by a felon. The Court rejected defendant's argument that the security guard was an agent of law enforcement and therefore subject to the Fourth Amendment's search and seizure rules. Per the Court, the Fourth Amendment does not apply "to a search or seizure, even an unreasonable one, effected by a private individual who is not acting as an agent of the government or with the participation or knowledge of any government official." The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals found that Illinois law expressly categorizes CHA's police powers as distinct from its power to employ security personnel. Next, the court noted that the CHA contract with AGB labels AGB as an independent contractor. As such, the security guard was acting as a private person, and not a law enforcement agent. (United States v. Green (7th Cir. 2020) 975 F.3rd 653.)

Defendant had conversations with a 15-year-old minor concerning their sexual exploits together via Facebook. When Facebook discovered this fact, it passed the information onto the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC) via a "cyber tip," which in turn passed it onto law enforcement in the geographical location where both defendant and the minor resided (i.e., Corpus Christi, Texas). As a result, a Corpus Christi investigator obtained a search warrant for both defendant's and the minor's Facebook accounts. This revealed additional conversations confirming defendant's sexual relationship with A.A. The investigator then obtained a second search warrant based upon this additional evidence to search defendant's electronic devices, home, and a trailer. The second search uncovered child pornography on defendant's devices resulting in defendant being charged in federal court with several child pornography-related offenses. Defendant argued that both Facebook and NCMEC acted as government agents, making their viewing of defendant's Facebook messages an illegal search. Upholding the trial court's denial of defendant's motion to suppress, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeal disagreed. The Fourth Amendment applies to the government, not private citizens. Consequently, under the private search doctrine, if a non-government entity violates a person's expectation of privacy, discovering evidence, and turns over the evidence to law enforcement, the evidence can be used to obtain warrants and/or prosecute. There are two exceptions to the private search doctrine. First, if the "private actor" who conducted the search was acting as an agent of the government when the search was conducted, the private search doctrine does not apply. Second, if the government, exceeds the scope of the private actor's original search without a warrant and discovers new evidence, the private search doctrine does not apply to the new evidence, and the new evidence may be suppressed. In this case, the Court held that Facebook was a "private actor" and not a government agent when it searched defendant's messages. Even though 18 U.S.C. § 2258A(a) requires electronic communication service providers like Facebook to send a cyber tip to NCMEC for all instances of child exploitation that they discover on their platforms, it does not compel nor coercively encourage these providers to actively search for such evidence. Instead, the Court recognized that 18 U.S.C. § 2258A(f) contains language indicating that service providers like Facebook are not required to monitor their customers or affirmatively search their accounts for evidence of child exploitation. Given this disclaimer, the Court held that Facebook conducted a private search when it searched defendant's messages. Next, the court found that NCMEC is a private, nonprofit corporation, and not a government entity. However, the court added that even if NCMEC was acting as a government agent, it did not exceed the scope of Facebook's private search when it reviewed the same content initially reviewed by a Facebook employee and forwarded to NCMEC in the cyber tip. Consequently, the Court held that defendant's motion to suppress was properly denied. (United States v. Meals (5th Cir. 2021) 21 F.4th 903.)

Limited Use of the Exclusionary Rule:

General Rule:

The Exclusionary Rule is not intended to prevent all police misconduct or as a remedy for all police errors. "The use of the exclusionary rule is an exceptional remedy typically reserved for violations of constitutional rights." (United States v. Smith (9th Cir. 1999) 196 F.3rd 1034, 1040.)

"The exclusionary rule generates substantial social costs, which sometimes include setting the guilty free and the dangerous at large. We have therefore been cautious against expanding it, and have repeatedly emphasized that the rule's costly toll upon truth-seeking and law enforcement objectives presents a high obstacle for those urging its application." (United States v. Dreyer (9th Cir. 2015) 804 F.3rd 1266, 1278.)

"To trigger the exclusionary rule, police conduct must be sufficiently deliberate that exclusion can meaningfully deter it, and sufficiently culpable that such deterrence is worth the price paid by the justice system." (Herring v. United States (2009) 555 U.S. 135, 144 [129 S.Ct. 695; 172 L.Ed.2nd 496]; see also People v. Leal (2009) 178 Cal.App.4th 1051, 1064-1065.)

The exclusionary rule should only be used when necessary to deter "deliberate, reckless, or grossly negligent conduct, or in some circumstances, recurring or systematic negligence." (Herring v. United States, supra, at p. 144.)

See United States v. Monghur (9th Cir. 2009) 588 F.3rd 975, where a case involving the illegal warrantless search of a container was remanded for a determination of whether the exclusionary rule required the suppression of the gun found in that container.

"(E)ven when there is a Fourth Amendment violation, (the) exclusionary rule does not apply when the costs of exclusion outweigh its deterrent benefits. In some cases, for example, the link between the unconstitutional conduct and the discovery of the evidence is too attenuated to justify suppression." (Utah v. Strieff (2016) 579 U.S. 232, 235 [136 S.Ct. 2056, 2059; 195 L.Ed.2nd 400]; existence of an arrest warrant "attenuated the taint" between an unlawful detention and the discovery of evidence incident to the arrest on the warrant, at least where the police misconduct was not flagrant.)

"Establishing a violation of the Fourth Amendment, though, does not automatically entitle a criminal defendant to exclusion of evidence. Far from it. '[T]he exclusionary rule is not an individual right.' Herring v. United States, 555 U. S. 135, 141, 129 S. Ct. 695, 172 L. Ed. 2d 496 (2009). It is a '"prudential' doctrine created by this Court,' Davis v. United States, 564 U. S. 229, 236, 131 S. Ct. 2419, 180 L. Ed. 2d 285 (2011) (citation omitted), and there is always a 'high obstacle for those urging application of the rule,' Pennsylvania Bd. of Probation and Parole v. Scott, 524 U. S. 357, 364-365, 118 S. Ct. 2014, 141 L. Ed. 2d 344 (1998). Relevant here, the rule 'does not apply when the costs of exclusion outweigh its deterrent benefits.' (Utah v.) Strieff, 579 U. S. (232), at 235, 136 S. Ct. 2056, 2059, 195 L. Ed. 2d 400." (See concurring opinion in Lange v. California (June 23, 2021) __ U.S.__, __ [141 S.Ct. 2011; 210 L.Ed.2nd 486.)

In Lange (at pp. __) the concurring opinion noted that to use the Exclusionary Rule in this case would violate a number of rules:

- It would encourage bad conduct (i.e., fleeing from the police).
- It would allow a criminal defendant to use the exclusionary rule as "a shield against" his own bad conduct.
- The evidence against him (i.e., DUI) would have inevitably been discovered anyway.
- A criminal defendant should "not . . . be put in a better position than [he] would have been in if no illegality had transpired."

Case Law in General:

The argument has been made that the exclusionary rule should not apply to the penalty phase of a capital murder trial when the prosecution is attempting to introduce P.C. § 190.3, "factor (b)" evidence. Specifically, the A.G. argued that the exclusionary rule has little deterrent value at the penalty phase of a capital case, the purpose of which is "to enable the jury to make an individualized determination of the appropriate penalty based on the character of the defendant and the circumstances of the crime." Because law enforcement is not likely to be deterred from conducting unreasonable searches and seizures where it is a remote possibility that the evidence could not be used during the penalty phase in an unrelated prosecution occurring potentially years later, any limited deterrent value is outweighed by the societal costs of exclusion of the evidence and the resultant incomplete picture of the defendant's criminal activities. However, because this issue was not first raised by the prosecution in front of the trial judge, and finding admission of the questioned evidence to be harmless error anyway, the Supreme Court declined to resolve this question in this case. (People v. Casares (2016) 62 Cal.4th 808, 834.)

Note: The hint here made by the California Supreme Court is that this argument should be attempted by a prosecutor at the trial level, to test this issue.

Evidence obtained in violation of someone else's (i.e., someone other than the present defendant's) Fourth Amendment (search and seizure) rights may be used as part of the probable cause in a search warrant affidavit, unless the defendant can show that he has "standing" (i.e., it was his reasonable expectation of privacy that was violated) to challenge the use of the evidence. (People v. Madrid (1992) 7 Cal.App.4th 1888, 1896.)

"To trigger the exclusionary rule, police conduct must be sufficiently deliberate that exclusion can meaningfully deter it, and sufficiently culpable that such deterrence is worth the price paid by the justice system. As laid out in [the Supreme Court's] cases, the exclusionary rule serves to deter deliberate, reckless, or grossly negligent conduct, or in some circumstances recurring or systemic negligence." (United States v. Jobe (9th Cir. 2019) 933 F.3rd 1074, 1077.)

See "Searches and Seizures," "Remedy for Violations; The 'Exclusionary Rule,'" under "Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 8), below.

Driving Under the Influence (DUI) Cases:

"'[E]vidence should be suppressed "only if it can be said that the law enforcement officer had knowledge, or may properly be charged with knowledge, that the search was unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment."'" (Herring v. United States (2009) 555 U.S. 135, 143 [172 L. Ed. 2d 496, 129 S. Ct. 695].) . . . The good-faith exception to the exclusionary rule asks whether a reasonably well-trained officer would have known the search was illegal in light of all the circumstances. (Id. at p. 145.) This is "an objective" standard that "requires officers to have a reasonable knowledge of what the law prohibits." (United States v. Leon (1984) 468 U.S. 897, 919, fn. 20 [82 L. Ed. 2d 677, 104 S. Ct. 3405].) "Police officers are presumed to know the law, particularly those laws that relate to the performance of their duties." (People v. Rosas (2020) 50 Cal.App.5th 17, 25 [264 Cal. Rptr. 3d 43].) [¶] "For the last decade, it has been settled that absent some exception, the Fourth Amendment requires a warrant for a blood draw. (McNeely, supra, 569 U.S. at p. 148.) '[A] warrantless search of the person is reasonable only if it falls within a recognized exception,' and this principle applies to the 'invasion of bodily integrity' implicated by a blood draw. (Ibid.) A warrant is required even for a blood draw incident to arrest. (Birchfield, supra, (2016) 579 U.S. at pp. 474–476.) Any reasonably well-trained officer would have known this in 2018, when the events at issue here took place." (People v. Alvarez (2023) 98 Cal.App.5th 531, 546; holding that "good faith" did not apply to the officer obtaining a warrantless blood sample from an unconscious felony DUI suspect in that the officer, with several hours in which he could have obtained a telephonic search warrant to draw the blood, failed to do so.

Searches conducted in objectively reasonable reliance (i.e., "good faith") on binding appellate precedent in effect at the time of the search, despite a later decision changing the rules, are not subject to the Exclusionary Rule. (Davis v. United States (2011) 564 U.S. 229, 236-239 [131 S.Ct. 2419; 180 L.Ed.2nd 285]; see also People v. Youn (2014) 229 Cal.App.4th 571, 576-579; People v. Rossetti (2014) 230 Cal.App.4th 1070, 1074-1077; four officers held defendant down as a warrantless forced blood draw was made in a medically approved manner; People v. Harris (2015) 234 Cal.App.4th 671, 697-704, and People v. Jimenez (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 1337, 1360-1365; applicability of Missouri v. McNeely (2013) 569 U.S. 141 [133 S.Ct. 1552; 185 L.Ed.2nd 696] to cases occurring before.)

Illegally collecting blood samples from defendant, mistakenly believing that he qualified under the newly enacted DNA and

Forensic Identification Data Base and Data Bank Act of 1998 (P.C. §§ 295 et seq.), even if it was a Fourth Amendment violation to do so, did not require the suppression of the results in that the mistake was not intentional, reckless, the results of gross negligence, nor of recurring or systematic negligence. (People v. Robinson (2010) 47 Cal.4th 1104, 1124-1129.)

Also, a forced blood draw performed in 2011, before Missouri v. McNeely (2013) 569 U.S. 141 [133 S.Ct. 1552; 185 L.Ed.2nd 696] (requiring a search warrant to force a blood draw in a DUI case absent an exigent circumstance) was decided, does not require the suppression of the blood result in that police officers are entitled to act on the law as it is understood at the time to apply. The Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule does not require suppression of evidence from a warrantless blood draw because the draw was conducted in an objectively reasonable reliance on then-binding precedent. (People v. Youn (2014) 229 Cal.App.4th 571, 576-579; People v. Jimenez (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 1337, 1360-1365; see also People v. Rossetti (2014) 230 Cal.App.4th 1070, 1074-1077; four officers held defendant down as a warrantless forced draw was made in a medically approved manner; and see People v. Jones (2014) 231 Cal.App.4th 1257, 1262-1265.)

Griffith v. Kentucky (1987) 479 U.S. 314, 328 [93 L.Ed.2nd 649], holding that in criminal prosecutions, a new constitutional rule is to be applied retroactively to all cases, state or federal, pending on direct review or not yet final, with no exception for cases in which the new rule constitutes a "clear break" with the past, does not apply when the offending violation involves the Fourth Amendment's Exclusionary Rule. (Griffith involved a jury selection issue.) (People v. Jones, supra, at pp. 1264-1265.)

Case Law: Evidence Admitted Under Herring:

Holding that a Department of Homeland Security special agent's affidavit supporting the state warrant contained sufficient information to render his reliance on the warrant reasonable, the Ninth Circuit held that the district court erred in granting defendant's motion to suppress evidence found on a laptop. The affidavit laid out facts indicative of a large-scale marijuana growing operation, including information from a tipper that was corroborated by the agent's own observations, investigation, and experience. There was no indication that the agent deliberately tarried or received insufficient training because immediately after seizing the laptop, he contacted the United States Attorney's Office about prosecuting the case federally. The fact that it took 20 days between the seizure of the laptop and its eventual search under authority of a second warrant did not require the suppression of evidence obtained from the laptop. The agent made a good-faith effort to comply with the Warrant Clause of the Fourth Amendment. (United States v. Jobe (9th Cir. 2019) 933 F.3rd 1074; citing Herring v. United States (2009) 555 U.S. 135, 140 [129 S.Ct. 695; 172 L.Ed.2nd 496].)

Case Law: Evidence Excluded Despite Herring:

Officers who took 26½ hours to obtain a search warrant for a residence while the residence was "detained" (i.e., the occupant was kept from reentering), failing to recognize that they were required to act with due diligence and to expedite the process, were not excused by the rule of Herring. The resulting evidence, therefore, was subject to exclusion. (United States v. Cha (9th Cir. 2010) 597 F.3rd 995, 1004-1006.)

Where a defendant's detention was in the absence of any reasonable suspicion of criminal wrongdoing, and was found to be deliberate in the sense that it was not accidental or negligent conduct, suppression of the resulting evidence is appropriate in that it serves the policy objectives of the exclusionary rule as articulated by the U.S. Supreme Court. (People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, 23.)

Good Faith:

Under 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(1), clearly established federal law includes only the Supreme Court's decisions issued before the relevant adjudication of the merits of a prisoner's claim, regardless of when the prisoner's conviction became final. A direct appeal was thus the relevant adjudication of the merits. (Greene v. Fisher (2011) 565 U.S. 34 [132 S.Ct. 38; 181 L.Ed.2nd 336], citing Gray v. Maryland (1998) 523 U.S. 185 [140 L.Ed.2nd 294]; see also Thompson v. Runnels (9th Cir. 2013) 705 F.3rd 1089, 1095-1097.)

Whether or not the theory of Florida v. Jardines (2013) 569 U.S. 1 [133 S.Ct. 1409; 185 L.Ed.2nd 495], involving the illegality of using drug-sniffing dogs within the curtilage of a person's home, is applicable to a drug-sniffing dog used around the outside, and leaning up against, the open bed and tool box in a suspect's truck (which would over-rule prior case law), was left open by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, holding that the pursuant to the "faith-in- case law" rule of Davis v. United States (2011) 564 U.S. 229, 236-239 [131 S.Ct. 2419; 180 L.Ed.2nd 285], it was unnecessary to decide the issue. (United States v. Thomas (9th Cir. 2013) 726 F.3rd 1086, 1092-1095.)

The Ninth Circuit has held that for "good faith" to save an otherwise unlawful search, the officers must have relied upon prior "binding appellate precedent." Prior authority that is merely "unclear" only allows an officer to escape civil liability under a "qualified immunity" argument. Whether or not an officer may search a cellphone based upon a "Fourth waiver probationary search" is not the subject of any binding appellate precedent. Therefore, "good faith" does not save such a search where current or subsequent cases (e.g., Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430].) have held such a search to be unlawful. (United States v. Lara (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 605, 612-614.)

A search of a cellphone "incident to arrest" (as opposed to a Fourth waiver search) was clearly lawful prior to Riley, and therefore, the officer's good faith reliance upon that pre-Riley binding precedent will save a warrantless search of defendant's cellphones found on his person when he was arrested. (United States v. Lustig (9th Cir. 2016) 830 F.3rd 1075, 1077-1085.)

However, the California Supreme Court concluded in a warrantless cellphone search case (reversing a lower appellate court decision) that the search of defendant's cellphone would not have been proper even under its prior decision in People v. Diaz (2011) 51 Cal.4th 84 (a search incident to arrest case), and that a reasonably well-trained officer would have known this. Defendant was not under arrest when officers searched his phone. Under Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373[134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430], which overruled Diaz, even if defendant had been properly arrested, a warrant was required to search his cellphone. The search in this case violated the Fourth Amendment; the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule did not apply. Also, the search was not the result of negligence, nor did it result from any pressure to apply a newly enacted statutory scheme that was confusing and complex. The officers' conduct, including the search, was deliberate. Exclusion of the evidence in this case serves to deter future similar behavior. (People v. Macabeo (2016) 1 Cal.5th 1206, 1212-1226.)

Officers' and FBI Agents' good faith belief, based upon statutory and case authority existing at the time that a court order, pursuant to the federal "Stored Communications Act" ("SCA;" 18 U.S.C. § 2703(d)) (as opposed to a search warrant) was all that was necessary in order to acquire defendant's historical cell site location information (i.e., "CSLI"), allowed for the admission into evidence of the defendant's CSLI. (United States v. Korte (9th Cir. 2019) 918 F.3rd 750, 757-758.)

> Note: "Cell sites usually consist of a set of radio antennas mounted on a tower, although 'they can also be found on light posts, flagpoles, church steeples, or the sides of buildings.' Carpenter v. 'Each time [a] phone connects to a cell site, it generates a time-stamped record known as cell-site location information (CSLI).' Id. This CSLI data indicates the general geographic area in which the cell phone user was located when his or her phone connected to the network. Because most smartphones tap into the wireless network 'several times a minute whenever their signal is on . . . modern cell phones generate increasingly vast amounts of increasingly precise CSLI.' Id. at 2211-12." The People bear the burden of showing that the good-faith exception applies. (United States v. Artis (9th Cir. 2019) 919 F.3rd 1123, 1134; citing United States v. Underwood (9th Cir. 2013) 725 F.3rd 1076, 1085.)

See People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, 23: "We do not suggest the officer here acted in bad faith, but we find his detention of Kidd in the absence of any reasonable suspicion of wrongdoing to be deliberate, in the sense that it was not accidental or negligent conduct."

However, the Fourth District Court of appeal, in People v. Smith (2020) 46 Cal.App.5th 375, declined to apply the "good faith" exception to a warrantless entry into a residence based upon no more than the fact that a vehicle was left out front with the engine running, and no one answered the door upon the officers knocking. Rejecting the People's argument that the officer was using the rational of People v. Ray (1999) 21 Cal.4th 464, applying the "community caretaking" theory to warrantless residential entries, the Court here noted that because Ray was only a "plurality" opinion, it was not binding precedent. Reliance on the rule in Ray, therefore, does not trigger the "good faith" exception. (Citing People v. Karis (1988) 46 Cal.3rd 612, 632.)

Border agents' warrantless forensic search of defendant's cellphone after his arrest at the border for having smuggled cocaine in his vehicle, was held not to have been justified under the "Good Faith" exception in that there was no prior binding appellate authority authorizing such a search. (United States v. Cano (9th Cir. 2019) 934 F.3rd 1002, 1021-2022; rejecting United States v. Cotterman (9th Cir. 2013) 709 F.3rd 952, a computer-search case, as authorizing such a search.)

An officer's good faith belief in the rules for searching vehicle's incident to arrest, as dictated under New York v. Belton (1981) 453 U.S. 454, 455, 460–461 [69 L. Ed. 2d 768; 101 S. Ct. 2860], as it existed in 1991 when defendant's vehicle was searched, held to apply despite the subsequent tightening of the rules under Arizona v. Gant (2009) 556 U.S. 332 [173 L.Ed.2nd 485; 129 S.Ct. 1710]. (People v. Silveria and Travis (2020) 10 Cal.5th 195, 236, 239.)

See also People v. Maxwell (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 546, where a year after the search in issue here, the appellate court struck the search condition imposed as a condition of his bail as invalid due to the lack of any "particularized need" for such a condition in defendant's case. On appeal from the warrantless search of defendant's person, his vehicle, and his residence, the Court held that the trial court properly denied defendant's motion to suppress evidence, the searches at issue which were premised on the bail condition that was later found to be invalid, in that the good-faith exception to the exclusionary rule applied. The officer who conducted the search acted in good-faith reliance on defendant's then-extant bail terms, and that reliance was objectively reasonable. (Id., at pp. 558-560.)

On remand from Lange v. California (June 23, 2021) __ U.S.__, __ [141 S.Ct. 2011; 219 L.Ed.2nd 486], which held that; "(i)n misdemeanor cases, flight does not always supply the exigency that this Court has demanded for a warrantless home entry," given the many other possible reasons—not necessarily involving an exigency—why a misdemeanor suspect has fled into his home, California's First District Court of Appeal (Div. 5) held that under the good faith exception to the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule, it was not necessary to suppress evidence from an officer's warrantless entry into defendant's garage after the officer observed defendant blaring loud music and honking unnecessarily and defendant, rather than pulling over, drove up his driveway and into his attached garage. When the police conduct a search in objectively reasonable reliance on binding appellate precedent, the exclusionary rule does not apply. (People v. Lange (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 1114.)

Even if evidence was obtained pursuant to execution of an invalid search warrant based on dog sniffs of curtilage of defendant's home, the good faith exception under United States v. Leon (1984) 468 U.S. 897 [82 L.Ed.2nd 677, 104 S.Ct. 3405], applied because it was reasonable for officers to rely on circuit precedent that dog sniffs at interior apartment door were permissible; defendant's motion to suppress was properly denied. (United States v. Hines (8th Cir. 2023) 62 F.4th 1087.)

Where a geofence warrant (see "Geofence Warrants," under "Searches With A Search Warrant" (Chapter 10, below) was sought at a time when geofence warrants were still a novel investigative tool, the good faith exception was held to apply despite the warrant being too broad. In early 2019 when this warrant was drafted and executed, there were no published cases anywhere in the country, let alone in California, analyzing the constitutionality of geofence warrants. (People v. Meza (2023) 90 Cal.App.5th 520, 543-545.)

Good faith was similarly held to apply to California's second geofence warrant case, Price v. Superior Court (2023) 93 Cal.App.5th 13, at pages 49-51, even though the warrants used were held to be constitutionally sufficient.

> Per Price (at p. 50): "There are four 'limited situations' in which reasonable, good faith reliance on the warrant cannot not (italics added) be established and suppression remains appropriate: "(i) the issuing magistrate was misled by information that the officer knew or should have known > was false; (ii) the magistrate 'wholly abandoned his judicial role'; (iii) the affidavit was '"so lacking in indicia of probable cause"' that it would be '"entirely unreasonable "' for an officer to believe such cause existed; and (iv) the warrant was so facially deficient that the executing officer could not reasonably presume it to be valid." (Quoting People v. Camarella (1991) 54 Cal.3rd 592, 596.)

Statutory Violations: By the same token, not all courts are in agreement that the exclusionary rule is reserved exclusively for constitutional violations. (See discussion in United States v. Lombera-Camorlinga (9th Cir. 2000) 206 F.3rd 882, 886-887, and in the dissenting opinion, p. 893.)

> A civil rights "action under (42 U.S.C.) section 1983 'encompasses violations of federal statutory law as well as constitutional law.' (Maine v. Thiboutot (1980) 448 U.S. 1, 4, . . . 65 L.Ed.2nd 555.) Thus, section 1983 may be used to enforce rights created by both the United States Constitution and federal statutes. (Gonzaga University v. Doe (2002) 536 U.S. 273, 279, ... 153 L.Ed.2nd 309.) But conduct by an official that violates only state law will not support a claim under section 1983. (Malek v. Haun (10th Cir. 1994) 26 F.3rd 1013, 1016; . . .)" (Ritschel v. City of Fountain Valley (2005) 137 Cal.App.4th 107, 116.)

(United States v. Dreyer (9th Cir. Nov. 4, 2015) 804 F.3rd 1266, 1278-1279; finding that suppression is an available remedy for violations of the statutory Posse Comitatus rules, although not appropriate in this case.)

Is The Exclusionary Rule's Application to the States Mandated?

U.S. Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas has made the interesting argument that the requirement that state courts must abide by the federal Exclusionary Rule is "legally dubious," and an issue that should be re-considered by the Court. (See Collins v. Virginia (2018) 584 U.S. 586, 601 [138 S.Ct. 1663; 201 L.Ed.2nd 9].)

Specifically, per Justice Thomas' argument: "(T)he Court concluded in Mapp* v. *Ohio, 367 U. S. 643, 81 S.Ct. 1684, 6 L.Ed.2nd 1081, 81 S.Ct. 1684 (1961), that the States must apply the federal exclusionary rule in their own courts. Id., at 655, 81 S.Ct. 1684, 6 L.Ed.2nd 1081, . . . Rule of Exclusion: "Evidence which is obtained as a direct result of an illegal search and seizure may not be used to establish probable cause for a subsequent search." (United States v. Factually Based Question: What constitutes an illegal search or seizure is necessarily a factually based question that must be determined on a case-by-case basis: "The constitutional validity of a warrantless search is pre-eminently the sort of question which can only be decided in the concrete factual context of the individual case." (Sibron v. New York (1968) 392 U.S. 40, 59 [20 L.Ed.2nd 917]; City of Los Angeles v. Verbal Evidence: This includes "verbal evidence," (i.e., a suspect's admissions or confession), when obtained as a direct product of an illegal detention, arrest or search. (See United States v. Crews (9th Cir. 2007) 502 F.3rd 1130, 1135.)

"All relevant evidence is admissible, except as otherwise provided by:

- The Constitution of the United States;
- Act of Congress;
- These rules; or

- Other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority."

Fruit of the Poisonous Tree and "Attenuation of the Taint:"

General Rule: The exclusionary rule encompasses both the "primary evidence obtained as a direct result of an illegal search or seizure" as well as "evidence later discovered and found to be derivative of an illegality;" i.e., the so-called "fruit of the poisonous tree." (Utah v. Strieff (2016) 579 U.S. 232, 237 [136 S.Ct. 2056, 2059; 195 L.Ed.2nd 400]; 195 L.Ed.2nd 400]; citing Segura v. United States (1984) 468 U. S. 796, 804, 104 S.Ct. 3380; 82 L. Ed. 2nd 599; United States v. Gorman (9th Cir. 2017) 859 F.3rd 706, 716.)

> "Where evidence is obtained from an unlawful search or seizure, the exclusionary rule renders inadmissible both 'primary evidence obtained as a direct result of an illegal search or seizure' and 'evidence later discovered and found to be derivative of an illegality,' known as 'fruit of the poisonous tree.'" (United States v. Baker (9th Cir. 2023) 58 F.4th 1109, 1119; quoting Utah v. Strieff (2016) 579 U.S. 232, 237 [136 S.Ct. 2056; 195 L.Ed.2nd 400].)
> > "Where it applies, the exclusionary rule forbids admission of both the 'primary evidence obtained as a direct result of an illegal search or seizure' and 'evidence later discovered and found to be derivative of an illegality'—familiarly known as the 'fruit of the poisonous tree.' (People v. McWilliams (2023) 14 Cal.5th 429, 437, quoting Utah v. Strieff, supra.)
>
> The evidence that is suppressed is extended to the "indirect" as well as the "direct products" of the constitutional violation; i.e., the "fruit of the poisonous tree." (Wong Sun v. United States (1963) 371 U.S. 471, 484 [83 S.Ct. 407; 9 L.Ed.2nd 441]; United States v. Gorman, supra.)
>
> "This rule—the exclusionary rule—encompasses evidence directly 'seized during an unlawful search' as well as '[e]vidence derivative of a Fourth Amendment violation—the so-called "fruit of the poisonous tree."'" (United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 2020) 974 F.3rd 1071, 1075; quoting United States v. Gorman, supra.)
> "The 'fruit of the poisonous tree' doctrine does not require a particularly tight causal chain between the illegal search and the discovery of the evidence sought to be suppressed." (United States v. Ngumezi (9th Cir. 2020) 980 F.3rd 1285, 1291.)

Attenuation of the Taint Exception:

"The Supreme Court has adopted several exceptions to the exclusionary rule, observing that the 'significant costs' of excluding evidence from a criminal trial 'have led us to deem it applicable only where its deterrence benefits outweigh its substantial social costs.'" (United States v. Baker (9th Cir. 2023) 58 F.4th 1109, 1119-1122; discussing the "attenuation doctrine," and quoting Utah v. Strieff (216) 579 U.S. 232, at p. 237 [136 S.Ct. 2056; 195 L Ed.2nd 400].)

"Under the attenuation doctrine, '[e]vidence is admissible when the connection between unconstitutional police conduct and the evidence is remote or has been interrupted by some intervening circumstance, so that "the interest protected by the constitutional guarantee that has been violated would not be served by suppression of the evidence obtained."'" (United States v. Baker, supra, at p. 1119, quoting Hudson v. Michigan (2006) 547 U.S. 586, at 593 [126 S.Ct. 2159; 165 L.Ed.2nd 56].)

It is the Government's burden to prove attenuation. (Brown v. Illinois (1975) 422 U.S. 590, 604 [95 S.Ct. 2254; 45 L.Ed.2nd 41]; United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 2020) 974 F.3rd 1071, 1078.)

Factors:

In determining where the line is between the direct and indirect products of an illegal search (which will likely be suppressed) and that which is not the "fruit of the poisonous tree" (which will not be suppressed), it has been held that the following factors are relevant, as first set out in Brown v. Illinois (1975) 422 U.S. 590, 603–604 [45 L.Ed.2nd 416; 95 S.Ct. 2254]:

(1) The temporal proximity of the Fourth Amendment search and seizure violation to the ultimate procurement of the challenged evidence;

(2) The presence of intervening circumstances; and

(3) The flagrancy of the official misconduct.

(See also People v. Rodriguez (2006) 143 Cal.App.4th 1137; and United States v. Baker, supra, at pp. 1119-1120; > noting that the government bears the burden of proof on this issue. See also People v. McWilliams (2023) 14 Cal.5th 429, 438, 440-450.)

Using the above factors, the fact that the defendant had an outstanding arrest warrant may, depending upon the circumstances, be sufficient of an intervening circumstance to allow for the admissibility of the evidence seized incident to arrest despite the fact that the original detention was illegal. (People v. Brendlin (2008) 45 Cal.4th 262; an illegal traffic stop.)

Defendant's incriminatory statements obtained some 36 hours after an illegal search of his residence, and recognizing that what was found during the search would be used in defendant's subsequent interrogation, were held to be inadmissible as a direct product of the illegal search. (United States v. Shetler (9th Cir. 2011) 665 F.3rd 1150, 1156-1160.)

> It was also noted that because the government bore the burden of proving that the defendant's confession was not "fruit of the poisonous tree," the government was required to produce evidence demonstrating that the defendant's answers were not induced or influenced by the illegal search. (Id., at pp. 1157-1161.)

The United States Supreme Court is in accord: "(E)ven when there is a Fourth Amendment violation, (the) exclusionary rule does not apply when the costs of exclusion outweigh its deterrent benefits. In some cases, for example, the link between the unconstitutional conduct and the discovery of the evidence is too attenuated to justify suppression." (Utah v. Strieff (2016) 579 U.S. 232, 234 [136 S.Ct. 2056, 2059; 195 L.Ed.2nd 400]; existence of an arrest warrant "attenuated the taint" between an unlawful detention and the discovery of evidence incident to the arrest on the warrant, at least where the police misconduct was not flagrant.

> In Strieff, the lower Utah Supreme Court declined to apply the attenuation doctrine because it read the U.S. Supreme Court's precedents as applying the doctrine only "to circumstances involving an independent act of a defendant's 'free will' (such as) in confessing to a crime or consenting to a search." (2015 UT 2, 357 P. 3rd 532 at p. 544.) The Strieff Court specifically disagreed with this interpretation. "The attenuation doctrine evaluates the causal link between the government's unlawful act and the discovery of evidence, which often has nothing to do with a defendant's actions. Per the Supreme Court; "the logic of (its) prior attenuation cases is not limited to independent acts by the defendant." (Id. at 136 S.Ct. p. 2061.)

Pre-existing Search & Seizure Conditions:

The "illegality in the initial traffic detention was attenuated by appellant's probation search condition." (People v. Durant (2012) 205 Cal.App.4th 57, 66; disapproved to the extent it is in conflict with the reasoning of People v. McWilliams (2023) 14 Cal.5th 429, 437, as noted in McWilliams at footnote 5, pg. 450. See below.)

But see People v. Bates (2013) 222 Cal.App.4th 60, 71, declining to adopt Durant's reasoning and reaching the opposite conclusion on the facts.

"The exclusionary rule does not, however, apply in every case involving a Fourth Amendment violation. Balancing the benefits of the exclusionary remedy against its costs, the United States Supreme Court has fashioned various exceptions to the exclusionary rule, including the so-called attenuation doctrine." (People v. McWilliams (2023) 14 Cal.5th 429, 437, citing Utah v. Strieff (2016) 579 U.S. 232, 237-238 [136 S.Ct. 2056, 2059; 195 L.Ed.2nd 400].)

The attenuation doctrine, however, was held not to apply in McWilliams (at pp. 440-450) (overruling the appellate court on this issue, where defendant, who was illegally detained, was found to be on parole with search and seizure conditions after the detention was initiated. Applying the "Brown factors" (see Brown v. Illinois (1975) 422 U.S. 590, 603-604 [95 S.Ct. 2254; 45 L.Ed.2nd 41], above), The Court ruled that:

The temporal proximity between the unlawful detention and the search: To find that this factor favors attenuation, "substantial time" must have elapsed between an unlawful act (the illegal detention in this case) and when the evidence is obtained. In McWilliams, it was only a matter of a minute or two between the defendant's illegal detention and the officer discovering that defendant was subject to search and seizure conditions, and the search was initiated. (p. 440.)

Intervening circumstances: Contrary to the situation where an officer is made aware of an outstanding arrest warrant, which mandates that the officer take the suspect into custody, leaving "the officer with no effective choice but to carry out an arrest," discovery of a search condition does not require that the officer conduct such a search. "(A) parole search condition merely authorizes a suspicionless search of the parolee for purposes of monitoring the parolee's rehabilitation and compliance with the terms of parole. It is not a judicial mandate, nor does it compel further action of any sort. It suffices to conclude that in this case—where the same officer who conducted the illegal detention also decided, minutes later, to conduct a parole search that yielded incriminating evidence—the discovery of the parole search condition did relatively little to break the causal connection between the two events." (pgs. 440-446.)

The flagrancy of the official misconduct: In McWilliams, while there was no evidence to support the argument that the officer acted in "bad faith," (or because defendant was Black), the Court "conclude(d) that the officer's decision to detain McWilliams merely because he was in the broad vicinity of reported suspicious activity was purposeful and further supports applying the exclusionary rule to deter this type of unconstitutional conduct. (pgs. 447-449.)

However, note Justice Goodwin Liu's concurring opinion (at pgs. 449-452) where he notes that "an officer's decision making may be vulnerable to implicit (racial) biases that result in a heightened risk of exploitation of the unlawful detention," suggesting that this factor should be given more weight.

Additional Case Law:

But, per the Ninth Circuit, even though the "fruit of the poisonous tree" doctrine does not apply to the lawful search of a residence after the house was "detained" for an unreasonable time while a search warrant was obtained, the resulting evidence recovered from the residence when the home was searched with the warrant will be suppressed anyway in that the officers were not acting reasonably in taking 26½ hours to get the warrant, and some punishment must follow such an unreasonable delay. (United States v. Cha (9th Cir. 2010) 597 F.3rd 995, 1003-1004.)

The government did not dispute that omissions and distortions in a sheriff office's affidavits for a search warrant were reckless and material, and that the warrant was therefore invalid and that the sheriff's raids that resulted from those reckless and material inaccuracies constituted a Fourth Amendment violation. The results of this illegal search, including records suggesting that the business was employing undocumented immigrants, was passed along to Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). ICE subsequently issued a subpoena requiring the business to produce employer verification forms and other records. Based on information turned over in response to the subpoena, ICE charged the business with violations of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Noting that the Fourth Amendment violations were egregious, the Court held that it was plain that the evidence ICE obtained was the product of the sheriff's illegal activity. ICE's evidence subsequently obtained was the fruit of the sheriff's unlawful search. The sheriff's conduct easily met the flagrancy standard. The exclusionary rule would serve to deter the sheriff from Fourth Amendment violations by the probability that illegally obtained evidence will not be useful to ICE, even in a civil proceeding. (Frimmel Management, LLC v. United States (9th Cir. 2018) 897 F.3rd 1045.)

However, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that a mere passage of time, even a significant amount, does not necessarily attenuate the taint of an earlier illegal detention. For instance, after someone at the defendant's address pointed a laser at a police aircraft in flight, officers went to the defendant's home, illegally detained him, interrogated him without Miranda warnings, and after the defendant confessed, seized the laser. Eight months later, an FBI agent approached the defendant outside his home and stated he was there to ask "follow-up" questions about the incident. The defendant repeated his earlier confession. Charged with aiming a laser at an aircraft in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 39A, defendant moved to suppress the inculpatory statements he made to the FBI agent, arguing that the illegality of the first encounter tainted the second. The government did not dispute that the initial encounter violated at least the Fourth Amendment. Agreeing with the defendant, the Ninth Circuit explained that when a confession results from certain types of Fourth Amendment violations, the government must go beyond proving that the later confession was voluntary. It must also show a sufficient break in events to undermine the inference that the confession was caused by the Fourth Amendment violation. After considering together the relevant factors as set forth in Brown v. Illinois (1975) 422 U.S. 590 [95 S.Ct. 2254; 45 L.Ed.2nd 416 (1975), the panel was persuaded that the second encounter, introduced as a "follow up" to the first, was directly linked to the original illegalities. Per the Court, although significant time had passed, and the record does not show that the officers' conduct was purposeful or flagrant, the eight-month time period was collapsed by the agent opening the conversation by stating that he was following up on the original investigation. Without other intervening circumstances that act to separate the incidents, the Court concluded that the government failed to carry its burden of proving that the defendant's statements were sufficiently attenuated from the illegal detention and seizure eight months prior. (United States v. Bocharnikov (9th Cir. 2020) 966 F.3rd 1000.)

After chasing a wanted suspect to defendant's home, and arresting him when he tried to escape via a back window, officers entered defendant's home without a warrant and without consent for the stated purposes of checking the welfare of anyone inside (i.e., the "emergency aid exception") and/or as a "protective sweep" for other suspects. While inside, officers contacted defendant, held him at gunpoint, handcuffed him, and took him outside. Once outside, it was discovered that defendant was subject to probationary Fourth waiver, and subject to warrantless searches. Officers then reentered his home and conducted a full search, discovering methamphetamine and other incriminating evidence. In a previous appeal, both reasons for entering defendant's home were held to have been in violation of the Fourth Amendment, as was defendant's arrest, in an unpublished decision. (See United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 2018) 749 F. App'x. 516.) Upon returning the case to the trial court for a determination of whether the "attenuation doctrine" applied; i.e., whether the discovery of the suspicionless search condition was an intervening circumstance that broke the causal chain between the initial unlawful entry and the discovery of the evidence supporting defendant's conviction, the trial court held that it did. In a second appeal, the Ninth Circuit disagreed and ruled that the evidence should have been suppressed after finding that all three of the factors as discussed in Utah v. Strieff*, supra,* favored suppression. (United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 2020) 974 F.3rd 1071.)

"The attenuation doctrine is an exception to the usual rule of exclusion or suppression of the evidence. It applies when 'the connection between the illegality and the challenged evidence' has become so attenuated 'as to dissipate the taint caused by the illegality.'" (Id, at p. 1076; quoting United States v. Gorman (9th Cir. 2017) 859 F.3rd 706, 718.)

> "The temporal proximity factor weigh(ed) in favor of suppression because only a few minutes passed between the officers' unconstitutional entry into (defendant's) home and those very same officers' reentry into his home to conduct the investigatory search." (pg. 1077.)
> The presence of intervening circumstances (e.g., the Fourth waiver), also weighed in favor of suppression, noting that "a suspicionless search condition differs from an arrest warrant [as occurred in Strieff] in a significant respect," finding the former to be an optional "exercise of discretionary authority," while the latter is acting on a mandatory court order. (pgs. 1077-1080.)
> "The purpose and the flagrancy of the official misconduct" factor was also held to favor suppression in that it was the warrantless entry into a residence and handcuffing defendant before removing him from his own apartment, even if the officers acted in good faith, that was at issue. (pgs. 1080-1082.)

"(A)lthough the flagrancy of the government's conduct is relevant to the attenuation doctrine (Citation), lack of flagrancy is not a freestanding basis for avoiding the application of the exclusionary rule—at least not where, as here, it falls short of establishing that the officer had an 'objectively "reasonable good-faith belief"' in the lawfulness of his conduct, ..." (United States v. Ngumezi (9th Cir. 2020) 980 F.3rd 1285, 1291, quoting United States v. Lustig (9th Cir. 2016) 830 F.3rd 1075, 1080.)

Where an officer illegally seized a car key from the detained defendant's belt, and used the electronic button on the key to locate defendant's nearby vehicle in which was observed a firearm used in a robbery, the Court held that defendant's subsequent flight did not qualify as an intervening factor sufficient to attenuate the taint of the illegal seizure of defendant's car key, the flight having occurred after the discovery of the gun. (United States v. Baker (9th Cir. 2023) 58 F.4th 1109, 1116-1122.)

Demise of the Independent State Grounds Theory; "Proposition 8:" Cal. Const., Art I, § 28(d) (subsequently redesignated as section 28(f)(2)), the "Truth in Evidence" provisions of Proposition 8 (passed in June, 1982), abrogated California's "independent state grounds" theory of exclusion of evidence, leaving the United States Constitution and its amendments as the sole basis for imposing an "Exclusionary Rule" on the admissibility of evidence. (In re Lance W. (1985) 37 Cal.3rd 873; People v. Gutierrez (1984) 163 Cal.App.3rd 332, 334; People v. Macabeo (2016) 1 Cal.5th 1206, 1212.)

California Constitution art. I, section 28(f)(2) ("Right to "Truth-in-Evidence," a part of 1982's Proposition 8) provides that relevant evidence shall not be excluded in any criminal proceeding or in any trial or hearing of a juvenile for a criminal offense, except where two-thirds of the members of both houses of the Legislature enact a statute to provide for exclusion.

While a state may impose stricter standards on law enforcement in interpreting its own state constitution (i.e., "independent state grounds"), suppressing evidence for having violated a state exclusionary rule under a state constitution, a prosecution in federal court is guided by the federal interpretation of the Fourth Amendment and is not required to use the state's stricter standards. (United States v. Brobst (9th Cir. 2009) 558 F.3rd 982, 989-991, 997.)

Until passage of Proposition 8, California Courts were obligated to follows California's rules that in some circumstances may (and lawfully were allowed to) have been stricter than the federal standards. (See American Academy of Pediatrics v. Lungren (1997) 16 Cal.4th 307, 327-328; Raven v. Deukmejian (1990) 52 Cal.3rd 336. 353.)

Since passage of Proposition 8, California state courts now determine the reasonableness of a search or seizure by federal constitutional standards. (People v. Tran (2019) 42 Cal.App.5th 1, 7.)

> "The question whether relevant evidence obtained by assertedly unlawful means—that is, in violation of the Fourth Amendment—must be excluded is determined by deciding whether its suppression is mandated by the federal Constitution. (Cal. Const., art. I, § 24 (Citations omitted))" (People v. Johnson (2018) 21 Cal.App.5th 1026, 1032.)

"'Under the current provisions of the California Constitution, evidence sought to be introduced at a criminal trial is subject to suppression as the fruit of an unconstitutional search and seizure "only if exclusion is . . . mandated by the federal exclusionary rule applicable to evidence seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment [of the United States Constitution].'" (People v. Maikhio (2011) 51 Cal.4th 1074, 1089 . . . , quoting In re Lance W. (1985) 37 Cal.3rd 873, 896, . . . ; see Cal. Const. art. I, § 28, subd. (f)(2).)" (People v. Harris (2015) 234 Cal.App.4th 671, 681-682.)

Per at least one court, however, it is "doubtful" whether Proposition 8's "truth-in-evidence provision applies where the requested remedy is not suppression of evidence, but dismissal of all charges based on the state's violation of a defendant's (Sixth Amendment, speedy trial, delay in filing charges) due process rights." (People v. Lazarus (2015) 238 Cal.App.4th 734, 756.)

In a child sexual abuse case, the California Supreme Court held that the state constitutional right to truth in evidence under Cal. Const., art. I, § 28, subd. (f)(2), abrogated the prohibition in Pen. Code, § 632(d), against the admission into evidence of secretly recorded conversations in criminal proceedings. The statute did not fit within any express exception and the right to privacy under Cal. Const., art. I, § 1, was not affected. The exclusionary remedy was not revived just because of reenactments and amendments to § 632(d). Such changes did not address the exclusionary remedy. Also, Gov't. Code § 9605 (Effect of Amendment on Time of Enactment; Presumption that Statute Enacted Last Prevails) provides that reenactment under Cal. Const., art. IV, § 9, has no effect on the unchanged portions of an amended statute. Because the exclusionary provision remained abrogated in criminal proceedings, a surreptitious recording was properly admitted into evidence in defendant's trial for committing a lewd and lascivious act upon a child. (People v. Guzman (2019) 8 Cal.5th 673.)

> Proposition 8 has served to abrogate statutory, as well as judicially created exclusionary rules. (Id., at pp. 681-682; noting examples.)

As a result of the passage of Proposition 8, "(i)n matters of federal law, the United States Supreme Court has the final word; we (the California Supreme Court) operate as an intermediate court and not as a court of last resort." (People v. Lopez (2019) 8 Cal.5th 353, 366.)

Defendant and His Identity: It is a rule of law that neither a defendant's body nor his or her identity is subject to suppression, "even if it is conceded that an unlawful arrest, search, or interrogation occurred." (Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Lopez-Mendoza (1984) 468 U.S. 1032, 1039-1040 [104 S.Ct. 3479; 82 L.Ed.2nd 778].)

For purposes of this rule, it makes no difference that the illegal arrest, search or interrogation was "egregious" in nature. (E.g., the result of "racial profiling.") (United States v. Gudino (9th Cir. 2004) 376 F.3rd 997: See also United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 2020) 974 F.3rd 1071, 1079, fn. 4.)

It is illegal to resist any arrest or detention by a peace officer, even if it is determined to be an illegal arrest or detention. (Evans v. City of Bakersfield (1994) 22 Cal.App.4th 321; King v. State of California (2015) 242

Cal.App.4th 265, 294-295.) However, the person illegally arrested or detained may have a civil remedy against the offending officer(s). (See 42 U.S.C. § 1983; and Civil Code § 52.1; the "Bane Act:")

See "California Civil Code § 52.1; the 'Bane Act,'" under "Procedural Rules" (Chapter 2), below.

Identity of a Witness: "Where the testimony of live witnesses is at issue, the test focuses primarily on the effect of the illegality on the witness's willingness to testify, and less on whether illegal conduct led to discovery of the witness's identity." (People v. Boyer (2006) 38 Cal.4th 412, 448-449, citing United States v. Ceccolini (1978) 435 U.S. 268, 276-279 [55 L.Ed.2nd 268].)

"The greater the willingness of the witness to freely testify, the greater the likelihood that he or she will be discovered by legal means and, concomitantly, the smaller the incentive to conduct an illegal search to discover the witness." (United States v. Ceccolini, supra, at p. 276.)

In People v. McCurdy (2014) 59 Cal.4th 1063, at pp. 1092-1093, the Court ruled that nothing in the record suggested that any assumed illegality concerning defendant's arrest, which resulted in defendant's picture in the news media, influenced a witness's willingness to identify defendant as the man he saw with an 8-year-old abduction and murder victim outside a grocery store on the day she disappeared. Law enforcement did not generate the publicity over this case. And the witness came forward on his own, testifying voluntarily. As such, this testimony was too attenuated from any perceived illegality in defendant's arrest and was not subject to suppression.

Search Warrant Executed by Someone Other than a Peace Officer:

In order to lawfully execute a state-issued search warrant, the person executing it, by statute, must be a "peace officer," as this term is defined in P.C. §§ 830 et seq. Also by statute, federal officers are not peace officers. (P.C. § 830.8(a)) However, violation of this statutory restriction is not also a Fourth Amendment constitutional violation. Evidence is suppressed only when the Fourth Amendment is violated, and not merely state statutory law. Upon execution of state warrants, the resulting evidence will not be suppressed absent a "heightened intrusion upon privacy interests." There is no such "heightened intrusion" merely because a law enforcement officer who is not a California peace officer executed a state-issued search warrant. Specifically, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that the identity of the executing officers—federal agents versus peace officers—does not implicate any interest protected by the Fourth Amendment. (United States v. Artis (9th Cir. 2019) 919 F.3rd 1123, 1130.)

The Product of a Miranda Violation:

"(A) Miranda violation does not alone warrant suppression of the physical fruits of the defendant's inculpatory statements." (United States v. Mora-Alcaraz (9th Cir. 2021) 986 F.3rd 1151, 1153, citing United States v. Patane (2004) 542 U.S. 630, 635 [124 S.Ct. 2620; 159 L.Ed.2nd 667; remanding the case to the trial court for a determining whether his consent to search the trunk of this car, where a firearm was recovered, was voluntary.)

"We find that the (non-applicability of the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine) reasoning of Elstad and Tucker applies to physical evidence obtained as a result of a Miranda violation" absent evidence of coercion or any 'due process' violation." (United States v. Gonzalez-Sandoval (9th Cir. 1990) 894 F.2nd 1043, 1048; accord, United States v. Sangineto-Miranda (6th Cir. 1988) 859 F.2nd 1501, 1518.)

Referencing Oregon v. Elstad (1985) 470 U.S. 298, 309 [84 L.Ed.2nd 222; 105 S.Ct. 1285], and Michigan v. Tucker (1974) 417 U.S. 433, 439 [94 S.Ct. 2357; 41 L.Ed.2nd 182].

Weapons and other physical evidence, and the identity of a witness, all discovered as a result of unadmonished, but non-coercive questioning, were not subject to the fruit of the poisonous tree suppression doctrine. (United States v. Elie (4th Cir. 1997) 111 F.3rd 1135.)

Immigration Issues:

The exclusionary rule generally does not apply in federal removal proceedings unless the alien can show "egregious violations of the Fourth Amendment." Defendant alien, a native and citizen of Guatemala, who was removable due to the fact that he stayed in the U.S. beyond his visa's expiration, was not entitled to relief from removal because he failed to present a prima facie case showing that the search and seizure leading to his arrest amounted to an egregious violation of the Fourth Amendment. (Corado-Arriaza v. Lynch (1st Cir. 2016) 844 F.3rd 74.)

Searches by Foreign Entities:

The Fourth Amendment's exclusionary rule does not apply to foreign searches and seizures unless the conduct of the foreign police shocks the judicial conscience or the American law enforcement officers participated in the foreign search or the foreign officers acted as agents for the American officers. (United States v. Valdivia (1st Cir. 2012) 680 F.3rd 33, 51-52.)

Formalized collaboration between an American law enforcement agency and its foreign counterpart does not, by itself, give rise to an "agency" relationship between the two entities sufficient to implicate the Fourth Amendment abroad. The Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule does not impose a duty upon American law enforcement officials to review the legality, under foreign law, of applications for surveillance authority considered by foreign courts. Defendant was not, therefore, entitled to discovery of the wiretap application materials, submitted by Jamaican law enforcement to courts in that nation, underlying the electronic surveillance abroad. (United States v. Lee (2nd Cir. 2013) 723 F.3rd 134.)

An ongoing collaboration between an American law enforcement agency and its foreign counterpart I the course of parallel investigations does not, without American control, direction, or an intent to evade the Constitution, give rise to a relationship between the two entities sufficient to apply the exclusionary rule to evidence obtained abroad by foreign law enforcement. In this case, also the warrantless searches and surveillance performed by the foreign entity did not shock the judicial conscience. (United States v. Getto (2nd Cir. 2013) 729 F.3rd 221, 227-234.)

Impeachment Evidence: Also, evidence illegally seized may be introduced for the purpose of impeaching the defendant's testimony given in both direct examination (Walder v. United States (1954) 347 U.S 62 [74 S.Ct. 354; 98 L.Ed. 503].) and cross-examination, so long as the cross-examination questions are otherwise proper. (United States v. Havens (1980) 446 U.S. 620 [64 L.Ed.2nd 559].)

> California authority prior to passage of Proposition 8 (The "Truth in Evidence Initiative"), to the effect that evidence suppressed pursuant to a motion brought under authority of P.C. § 1538.5 is suppressed for all purposes (i.e., People v. Belleci (1979) 24 Cal.3rd 879, 887-888.), was abrogated by Proposition 8. Now, it is clear that suppressed evidence may be used for purposes of impeachment should the defendant testify and lie. (People v. Moore (1988) 201 Cal.App.3rd 877, 883-886.)
> Also, suppressed evidence pursuant to P.C. § 1538.5(d) is admissible at the defendant's probation revocation hearing unless the officer's actions were egregious. "(T)he exclusionary rule does not apply in probation revocation hearings, unless the police conduct at issue shocks the conscience." (Citations omitted; People v. Lazlo (2012) 206 Cal.App.4th 1063, 1068-1072.)
> However, inculpatory statements made by the defendant but suppressed as a product of the defendant's illegal arrest may not be used to impeach other defense witnesses. (James v. Illinois (1990) 493 U.S. 307, 314-316 [107 L.Ed.2nd 676].)

New Crimes Committed in Response to an Illegal Detention or Arrest:

> Whether or not a detention or an arrest is lawful, a suspect is not immunized from prosecution for any new crimes he might commit against the officer in response. A defendant's violent response to an unlawful detention, such as assaulting a police officer, may still be the source of criminal charges. A suspect has a duty to cooperate with law enforcement whether or not an attempt to detain or arrest him is later held to be in violation of the Fourth Amendment. (In re Richard G. (2009) 173 Cal.App.4th 1252, 1260-1263.)
> Even when the detention is illegal, every person has a legal duty to submit (Evans v. City of Bakersfield (1994) 22 Cal.App.4th 321.), although declining to do so is not a violation of P.C. § 148 in that a peace officer is not acting in the "performance of his (or her) duties" by unlawfully detaining someone.

> However, an excessive use of force used by the officer after the arrest does not itself negate the "in the performance of his (or her) duties" element of P.C. §§ 148(a) (or 69). (People v. Williams (2018) 26 Cal.App.5th 71.)

Pen. Code § 1538.5 does not require the trial court to hold an evidentiary hearing when the defendant's stated issue to be decided is not relevant to the motion to suppress. Section 1538.5(c)(1) requires the trial court to receive evidence on any issue of fact necessary to determine the motion. The lawfulness of the initial contact was not an issue of fact necessary for a determination of the motion in this case. The trial court properly rejected defendant's argument that he was entitled to an evidentiary hearing on any issue. The language of § 1538.5 limits the scope of such a hearing. In this case (a violation of P.C. § 148(a)(1)), "the lawfulness of the initial [police] contact is irrelevant to the suppression of evidence" because defendant's new criminal behavior broke any causal link to an underlying illegality. (People v. Chavez (2020) 54 Cal.App.5th 477.)

Searches Based Upon Existing Precedent; the "Faith-In-Case Law" Exception: Searches conducted in objectively reasonable reliance on binding appellate precedent in effect at the time of the search, despite a later decision changing the rules, are not subject to the Exclusionary Rule. (*Davis v. United States (2011) 564 U.S. 229, 236-239 [131 S.Ct. 2419; 180 L.Ed.2nd 285].)

> See United States v. Sparks (1st Cir. 2013) 711 F.3rd 58; holding that the use of a GPS prior to the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Jones (2012) 565 U.S. 400 [132 S.Ct. 945; 181 L.Ed.2nd 911].), even if done in violation of the Fourth Amendment, does not require the suppression of the resulting evidence due to the officer's good faith reliance in earlier binding precedence. (See also People v. Mackey (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 32, 93-97; reaching the same conclusion.)
> Also, whether or not the theory of Florida v. Jardines (2013) 569 U.S. 1 [133 S.Ct. 1409; 185 L.Ed.2nd 495], involving the illegality of using drug-sniffing dogs within the curtilage of a person's home, is applicable to a drug-sniffing dog used around the outside, and leaning up against, the open bed and tool box in a suspect's truck (which would over-rule prior case law), was left open by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, holding that the pursuant to the "faith-in-case law" rule of Davis v. United States (2011) 564 U.S. 229, 236-239 [131 S.Ct. 2419; 180 L.Ed.2nd 285], it was unnecessary to decide the issue. (United States v. Thomas (9th Cir. 2013) 726 F.3rd 1086, 1092-1095.)

A search of a cellphone "incident to arrest" (as opposed to a Fourth waiver search) was clearly lawful prior to the United States Supreme Court case of Riley v. California (2014) 573 U.S. 373 [134 S.Ct. 2473; 189 L.Ed.2nd 430], where it was held that a warrant must be obtained, and therefore, the officer's good faith reliance upon that pre-Riley binding precedent will save a warrantless search of defendant's cellphones found on his person when he was arrested. (United States v. Lustig (9th Cir. 2016) 830 F.3rd 1075, 1077-1085.)

Even if evidence was obtained pursuant to execution of an invalid search warrant based on dog sniffs of curtilage of defendant's home, the good faith exception under United States v. Leon (1984) 468 U.S. 897 [82 L.Ed.2nd 677, 104 S.Ct. 3405], applied because it was reasonable for officers to rely on circuit precedent that dog sniffs at interior apartment door were permissible; defendant's motion to suppress was properly denied. (United States v. Hines (8th Cir. 2023) 62 F.4th 1087.)

See also "Good Faith," under "Limited Use of the Exclusionary Rule," above.

The "Minimal Intrusion Doctrine:" California's First District Court of Appeal (Div. 5) has found this theory to be a whole separate exception to the search warrant requirement, calling it the "Minimal Intrusion Exception." (People v. Robinson (2012) 208 Cal.App.4th 232, 246-255; the insertion and turning of a key in a door lock; citing Illinois v. McArthur (2001) 531 U.S. 326, 330 [121 S.Ct. 946; 148 L.Ed.2nd 838].)

"The minimal intrusion exception to the warrant requirement rests on the conclusion that in a very narrow class of 'searches' the privacy interests implicated are 'so small that the officers do not need probable cause; for the search to be reasonable." (People v. Robinson, supra, at p. 247.)

See "The Minimal Intrusion Exception," under "Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 8), below.

In a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 Civil Suit:

The exclusionary rule is inapplicable in a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 civil suit; a cause of action for the deprivation of constitutional rights by persons acting under color of state law. The need for deterrence is minimal in such a context. Application of the exclusionary rule in such a context would not prevent the State from using illegally obtained evidence against someone, but instead would prevent state actors (i.e., civil defendants) merely from being able to defend themselves against a claim for monetary damages. Exclusion of evidence in this context would not remove any preexisting incentive that the government might have to seize evidence unlawfully. It would simply increase state actors' financial exposure in tort actions that happen to involve illegally seized evidence. In effect, § 1983 plaintiffs would receive a windfall allowing them to prevail on torn claims that might otherwise have been defeated if critical evidence had not been suppressed. Even if such application of the rule might in some way deter illegal police conduct, that deterrence would impose an extreme cost to law enforcement officers that is not generally countenanced by the doctrine. The cost of applying the exclusionary rule in the § 1983 context is significant, and the deterrence benefits are miniscule. The availability of the exclusionary rule in § 1983 cases would vastly over-deter police officers and would result in a wealth transfer that is at least peculiar, if not perverse. (Lingo v. City of Salem (9th Cir. 2016) 832 F.3rd 953, 957-960.)

In an Administrative Proceeding:

In General:

In discussing California's "implied consent" statute (i.e., Veh. Code § 23612), noting that such consent cannot overcome the Fourth Amendment's provisions for refusing to consent to a warrantless search (i.e., a blood draw), it has been noted that such a "deemed" consent, while not effective (by itself) in the criminal context, does not prevent a DUI arrestee's refusal to submit to a blood or breath test of the alcohol content of his blood from being used against him in an administrative license-revocation proceedings before the Department of Motor Vehicles. (People v. Mason (2016) 8 Cal.App.5th Supp. 11, 18-33.)

> "While this statutory 'deemed' consent may be sufficient where the issue is whether the administrative consequences of refusal to consent are properly imposed Hughey (v. Dept. of Motor Vehicles (1991)) 235 Cal.App.3rd (752) at p. 754; [DMV properly revoked driver's license for express refusal to consent; court did not consider constitutional issues]), a state legislature does not have the power to 'deem' into existence 'facts' operating to negate individual rights arising under the U.S. Constitution. (People v. Mason, supra, at p. 29.)

Federal Supervised Release: Defendant was found to be in possession of marijuana, an illegal firearm, and drug paraphernalia while he was serving a term of federal supervised release. In noting that the Fourth Amendment contains no provision that expressly precludes the use of evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals pointed out that nonetheless, the Supreme Court has held that the exclusionary rule "forbids the use of improperly obtained evidence during a criminal trial." However, the Supreme Court has not extended the exclusionary rule to judicial proceedings outside the criminal trial context. Specifically, the Supreme Court has held that the exclusionary rule does not apply to the following: State parole revocation proceedings. Deportation proceedings. Civil proceedings. Grand jury proceedings. Every circuit that has faced the issue, to include the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th Circuits, has found that the exclusionary rule does not apply in supervised release proceedings. Because the Supreme Court has held in similar situations, including most notably, state parole revocation proceedings, that the exclusionary rule does not apply, the court affirmed the district court's denial of defendant's motion to suppress in this case. (United States v. Hill (11th Cir. 2020) 946 F.3rd 1239; citing United States v. Hebert (9th Cir. 2000) 201 F.3rd 1103, 1104, from the Ninth Circuit.)

Expectation of Privacy: Whether a search or seizure is "unreasonable" under the Fourth Amendment, and therefore requires the exclusion of evidence obtained thereby, turns on "whether a person has a constitutionally protected reasonable expectation of privacy, that is, whether he or she has manifested a subjective expectation of privacy in the object of the challenged search (or seizure) that society is willing to recognize as reasonable." (Emphasis added; People v. Robles (2000) 23 Cal.4th 789, 794.)

Rule: The United States Supreme Court has held: "Our Fourth Amendment analysis embraces two questions. First, we ask whether the individual, by his conduct, has exhibited an actual expectation of privacy; that is, whether he has shown that 'he [sought] to preserve [something] as private.' [Citation.] . . . Second, we inquire whether the individual's expectation of privacy is 'one that society is prepared to recognize as reasonable.' [Citation, fn. omitted.]" (Bond v. United States (2000) 529 U.S. 334, 338 [120 S. Ct. 1462, 1465, 146 L. Ed.2nd 365, 370]; see also People v. Maury (2003) 30 Cal.4th 342, 384; United States v. Wahchumwah (9th Cir. 2013) 710 F.3rd 862, 867; Carpenter v. United States (June 22, 2018) 585 U.S. __, __ [138 S.Ct. 2206, 2213; 201 L.Ed.2nd 507]; People v. Pride (2019) 31 Cal.App.5th 133, 139.)

Examples:

A hotline for citizens to call in tips on criminal activity, advertised as guaranteeing the caller's anonymity, does not create a constitutionally protected reasonable expectation of privacy in either the caller's identity or the information provided. It was expected that the information would be passed onto law enforcement. The caller in this case became the suspect in the alleged crimes, thus negating any reasonable expectation to believe that the police would not determine and use his identity in the investigation. (People v. Maury, supra, at pp. 381-403.)

A defendant has the burden of proving that he had standing to contest a warrantless search. In other words, he must first prove that he had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the areas searched. A person seeking to invoke the protection of the Fourth Amendment must demonstrate both that he harbored a subjective (i.e., in his own mind) expectation of privacy and that the expectation was objectively reasonable. An objectively reasonable expectation of privacy is one that society is willing to recognize as reasonable. Among the factors considered in making this determination are whether a defendant has a possessory interest in the thing seized or place searched; whether he has the right to exclude others from that place; whether he has exhibited a subjective expectation that it would remain free from governmental invasion; whether he took normal precautions to maintain his privacy; and whether he was legitimately on the premises. (People v. Nishi (2012) 207 Cal.App.4th 954, 959-963; defendant held to not have an expectation of privacy in his tent on public land without a permit, nor the area around his tent.)

No violation of the Fourth Amendment resulted when a gang police detective portrayed himself as a friend to gain access to defendant's social media account and viewed and saved a copy of a video that defendant posted and that was later admitted into evidence. In the posted video, defendant wore and discussed a chain resembling one taken in a strong-arm robbery. Although defendant chose a social media platform where posts disappeared after a period of time, he assumed the risk that the account for one of his "friends" could be an undercover profile for a police detective or that any other "friend" could save and share the information with government officials. No expectation of privacy. The California Electronic Communications Privacy Act ("CalECPA") had no application because defendant voluntarily granted access to his social media account to a "friend" and voluntarily then posted a video of himself with incriminating evidence. (People v. Pride (2019) 31 Cal.App.5th 133, 137-141.)

Victim's Rights*:

Penal Code §679.02: Victims' Rights:

(a) The following rights are hereby established as the statutory rights of victims and witnesses of crimes:

(1) To be notified as soon as feasible that a court proceeding to which the victim or witness has been subpoenaed as a witness will not proceed as scheduled, provided the prosecuting attorney determines that the witness' attendance is not required.

(2) Upon request of the victim or a witness, to be informed by the prosecuting attorney of the final disposition of the case, as provided by Section 11116.10.

(3) For the victim, the victim's parents or guardian if the victim is a minor, or the next of kin of the victim if the victim has died, to be notified of all sentencing proceedings, and of the right to appear, to reasonably express their views, have those views preserved by audio or video means as provided in Section 1191.16, and to have the court consider their statements, as provided by Sections 1191.1 and 1191.15.

(4) For the victim, the victim's parents or guardian if the victim is a minor, or the next of kin of the victim if the victim has died, to be notified of all juvenile disposition hearings in which the alleged act would have been a felony if committed by an adult, and of the right to attend and to express their views, as provided by Section 656.2 of the Welfare and Institutions Code.

(5) Upon request by the victim or the next of kin of the victim if the victim has died, to be notified of any parole eligibility hearing and of the right to appear, either personally as provided by Section 3043, or by other means as provided by Sections 3043.2 and 3043.25, to reasonably express their views, and to have their statements considered, as provided by Section 3043 of this code and by Section 1767 Welfare and Institutions Code.

(6) Upon request by the victim or the next of kin of the victim if the crime was a homicide, to be notified of an inmate's placement in a reentry or work furlough program, or notified of the inmate's escape as provided by Section 11155.

(7) To be notified that a witness may be entitled to witness fees and mileage, as provided by Section 1329.1.

(8) For the victim, to be provided with information concerning the victim's right to civil recovery and the opportunity to be compensated from the Restitution Fund pursuant to Chapter 5 (commencing with Section 13959) of Part 4 of Division 3 of Title 2 of the Government Code and Section 1191.2 of this code.

(9) To the expeditious return of property that has allegedly been stolen or embezzled, when it is no longer needed as evidence, as provided by Chapter 12 (commencing with Section 1407) and Chapter 13 (commencing with Section 1417) of Title 10 of Part 2.

(10) To an expeditious disposition of the criminal action.

(11) To be notified, if applicable, in accordance with Sections 679.03 and 3058.8 if the defendant is to be placed on parole.

(12) For the victim, upon request, to be notified of any pretrial disposition of the case, to the extent required by Section 28 of Article I of the California Constitution.

(A) A victim may request to be notified of a pretrial disposition.

(B) The victim may be notified by any reasonable means available.

(C) This paragraph is not intended to affect the right of the people and the defendant to an expeditious disposition as provided in Section 1050.

(13) For the victim, to be notified by the district attorney's office of the right to request, upon a form provided by the district attorney's office, and receive a notice pursuant to paragraph (14), if the defendant is convicted of any of the following offenses:

(A) Assault with intent to commit rape, sodomy, oral copulation, or any violation of Section 264.1, 288, or 289, in violation of Section 220.

(B) A violation of Section 207 or 209 committed with the intent to commit a violation of Section 261, 286, 287, 288, or 289, or former Section 262 or 288a.

(C) Rape, in violation of Section 261.

(D) Oral copulation, in violation of Section 287 or former Section 288a.

(E) Sodomy, in violation of Section 286.

(F) A violation of Section 288.

(G) A violation of Section 289.

(14) When a victim has requested notification pursuant to paragraph (13), the sheriff shall inform the victim that the person who was convicted of the offense has been ordered to be placed on probation, and give the victim notice of the proposed date upon which the person will be released from the custody of the sheriff.

(b) The rights set forth in subdivision (a) shall be set forth in the information and educational materials prepared pursuant to Section 13897.1. The information and educational materials shall be distributed to local law enforcement agencies and local victims' programs by the Victims' Legal Resource Center established pursuant to Chapter 11 (commencing with Section 13897) of Title 6 of Part 4.

(c) Local law enforcement agencies shall make available copies of the materials described in subdivision (b) to victims and witnesses.

(d) This section is not intended to affect the rights and services provided to victims and witnesses by the local assistance centers for victims and witnesses.

(e) The court shall not release statements, made pursuant to paragraph (3) or (4) of subdivision (a), to the public prior to the statement being heard in court.

California Constitution Article I*, Section 28:

(a) The People of the State of California find and declare all of the following:

(1) Criminal activity has a serious impact on the citizens of California. The rights of victims of crime and their families in criminal prosecutions are a subject of grave statewide concern.

(2) Victims of crime are entitled to have the criminal justice system view criminal acts as serious threats to the safety and welfare of the people of California. The enactment of comprehensive provisions and laws ensuring a bill of rights for victims of crime, including safeguards in the criminal justice system fully protecting those rights and ensuring that crime victims are treated with respect and dignity, is a matter of high public importance. California's victims of crime are largely dependent upon the proper functioning of government, upon the criminal justice system and upon the expeditious enforcement of the rights of victims of crime described herein, in order to protect the public safety and to secure justice when the public safety has been compromised by criminal activity.

(3) The rights of victims pervade the criminal justice system. These rights include personally held and enforceable rights described in paragraphs (1) through (17) of subdivision (b).

(4) The rights of victims also include broader shared collective rights that are held in common with all of the People of the State of California and that are enforceable through the enactment of laws and through good-faith efforts and actions of California's elected, appointed, and publicly employed officials. These rights encompass the expectation shared with all of the people of California that persons who commit felonious acts causing injury to innocent victims will be appropriately and thoroughly investigated, appropriately detained in custody, brought before the courts of California even if arrested outside the State, tried by the courts in a timely manner, sentenced, and sufficiently punished so that the public safety is protected and encouraged as a goal of highest importance.

(5) Victims of crime have a collectively shared right to expect that persons convicted of committing criminal acts are sufficiently punished in both the manner and the length of the sentences imposed by the courts of the State of California. This right includes the right to expect that the punitive and deterrent effect of custodial sentences imposed by the courts will not be undercut or diminished by the granting of rights and privileges to prisoners that are not required by any provision of the United States Constitution or by the laws of this State to be granted to any person incarcerated in a penal or other custodial facility in this State as a punishment or correction for the commission of a crime.

(6) Victims of crime are entitled to finality in their criminal cases. Lengthy appeals and other post-judgment proceedings that challenge criminal convictions, frequent and difficult parole hearings that threaten to release criminal offenders, and the ongoing threat that the sentences of criminal wrongdoers will be reduced, prolong the suffering of crime victims for many years after the crimes themselves have been perpetrated. This prolonged suffering of crime victims and their families must come to an end.

(7) Finally, the People find and declare that the right to public safety extends to public and private primary, elementary, junior high, and senior high school, and community college, California State University, University of California, and private college and university campuses, where students and staff have the right to be safe and secure in their persons.

(8) To accomplish the goals it is necessary that the laws of California relating to the criminal justice process be amended in order to protect the legitimate rights of victims of crime.

(b) In order to preserve and protect a victim's rights to justice and due process, a victim shall be entitled to the following rights:

(1) To be treated with fairness and respect for his or her privacy and dignity, and to be free from intimidation, harassment, and abuse, throughout the criminal or juvenile justice process.

(2) To be reasonably protected from the defendant and persons acting on behalf of the defendant.

(3) To have the safety of the victim and the victim's family considered in fixing the amount of bail and release conditions for the defendant.

(4) To prevent the disclosure of confidential information or records to the defendant, the defendant's attorney, or any other person acting on behalf of the defendant, which could be used to locate or harass the victim or the victim's family or which disclose confidential communications made in the course of medical or counseling treatment, or which are otherwise privileged or confidential by law.

(5) To refuse an interview, deposition, or discovery request by the defendant, the defendant's attorney, or any other person acting on behalf of the defendant, and to set reasonable conditions on the conduct of any such interview to which the victim consents.

(6) To reasonable notice of and to reasonably confer with the prosecuting agency, upon request, regarding, the arrest of the defendant if known by the prosecutor, the charges filed, the determination whether to extradite the defendant, and, upon request, to be notified of and informed before any pretrial disposition of the case.

(7) To reasonable notice of all public proceedings, including delinquency proceedings, upon request, at which the defendant and the prosecutor are entitled to be present and of all parole or other post-conviction release proceedings, and to be present at all such proceedings.

(8) To be heard, upon request, at any proceeding, including any delinquency proceeding, involving a post-arrest release decision, plea, sentencing, post-conviction release decision, or any proceeding in which a right of the victim is at issue.

(9) To a speedy trial and a prompt and final conclusion of the case and any related post-judgment proceedings.

(10) To provide information to a probation department official conducting a pre-sentence investigation concerning the impact of the offense on the victim and the victim's family and any sentencing recommendations before the sentencing of the defendant.

(11) To receive, upon request, the pre-sentence report when available to the defendant, except for those portions made confidential by law.

(12) To be informed, upon request, of the conviction, sentence, place and time of incarceration, or other disposition of the defendant, the scheduled release date of the defendant, and the release of or the escape by the defendant from custody.

(13) To restitution.

(A) It is the unequivocal intention of the People of the State of California that all persons who suffer losses as a result of criminal activity shall have the right to seek and secure restitution from the persons convicted of the crimes causing the losses they suffer.

(B) Restitution shall be ordered from the convicted wrongdoer in every case, regardless of the sentence or disposition imposed, in which a crime victim suffers a loss.

(C) All monetary payments, monies, and property collected from any person who has been ordered to make restitution shall be first applied to pay the amounts ordered as restitution to the victim.

(14) To the prompt return of property when no longer needed as evidence.

(15) To be informed of all parole procedures, to participate in the parole process, to provide information to the parole authority to be considered before the parole of the offender, and to be notified, upon request, of the parole or other release of the offender.

(16) To have the safety of the victim, the victim's family, and the general public considered before any parole or other post-judgment release decision is made.

(17) To be informed of the rights enumerated in paragraphs (1) through (16).

(1) A victim, the retained attorney of a victim, a lawful representative of the victim, or the prosecuting attorney upon request of the victim, may enforce the rights enumerated in subdivision (b) in any trial or appellate court with jurisdiction over the case as a matter of right. The court shall act promptly on such a request.

(2) This section does not create any cause of action for compensation or damages against the State, any political subdivision of the State, any officer, employee, or agent of the State or of any of its political subdivisions, or any officer or employee of the court.

(d) The granting of these rights to victims shall not be construed to deny or disparage other rights possessed by victims. The court in its discretion may extend the right to be heard at sentencing to any person harmed by the defendant. The parole authority shall extend the right to be heard at a parole hearing to any person harmed by the offender.

(e) As used in this section, a "victim" is a person who suffers direct or threatened physical, psychological, or financial harm as a result of the commission or attempted commission of a crime or delinquent act. The term "victim" also includes the person's spouse, parents, children, siblings, or guardian, and includes a lawful representative of a crime victim who is deceased, a minor, or physically or psychologically incapacitated. The term "victim" does not include a person in custody for an offense, the accused, or a person whom the court finds would not act in the best interests of a minor victim.

(f) In addition to the enumerated rights provided in subdivision (b) that are personally enforceable by victims as provided in subdivision (c), victims of crime have additional rights that are shared with all of the People of the State of California. These collectively held rights include, but are not limited to, the following:

(1) Right to Safe Schools. All students and staff of public primary, elementary, junior high, and senior high schools, and community colleges, colleges, and universities have the inalienable right to attend campuses which are safe, secure and peaceful.

(2) Right to Truth-in-Evidence. Except as provided by statute hereafter enacted by a two-thirds vote of the membership in each house of the Legislature, relevant evidence shall not be excluded in any criminal proceeding, including pretrial and post conviction motions and hearings, or in any trial or hearing of a juvenile for a criminal offense, whether heard in juvenile or adult court. Nothing in this section shall affect any existing statutory rule of evidence relating to privilege or hearsay, or Evidence Code Sections 352, 782 or 1103. Nothing in this section shall affect any existing statutory or constitutional right of the press.

(3) Public Safety Bail. A person may be released on bail by sufficient sureties, except for capital crimes when the facts are evident or the presumption great. Excessive bail may not be required. In setting, reducing or denying bail, the judge or magistrate shall take into consideration the protection of the public, the safety of the victim, the seriousness of the offense charged, the previous criminal record of the defendant, and the probability of his or her appearing at the trial or hearing of the case. Public safety and the safety of the victim shall be the primary considerations.

A person may be released on his or her own recognizance in the court's discretion, subject to the same factors considered in setting bail.

Before any person arrested for a serious felony may be released on bail, a hearing may be held before the magistrate or judge, and the prosecuting attorney and the victim shall be given notice and reasonable opportunity to be heard on the matter.

When a judge or magistrate grants or denies bail or release on a person's own recognizance, the reasons for that decision shall be stated in the record and included in the court's minutes.

(4) Use of Prior Convictions. Any prior felony conviction of any person in any criminal proceeding, whether adult or juvenile, shall subsequently be used without limitation for purposes of impeachment or enhancement of sentence in any criminal proceeding. When a prior felony conviction is an element of any felony offense, it shall be proven to the trier of fact in open court.

(5) Truth in Sentencing. Sentences that are individually imposed upon convicted criminal wrongdoers based upon the facts and circumstances surrounding their cases shall be carried out in compliance with the courts' sentencing orders, and shall not be substantially diminished by early release policies intended to alleviate overcrowding in custodial facilities. The legislative branch shall ensure sufficient funding to adequately house inmates for the full terms of their sentences, except for statutorily authorized credits which reduce those sentences.

(6) Reform of the parole process. The current process for parole hearings is excessive, especially in cases in which the defendant has been convicted of murder. The parole hearing process must be reformed for the benefit of crime victims.

(g) As used in this article, the term "serious felony" is any crime defined in subdivision (c) of Section 1192.7 of the Penal Code, or any successor statute.

Chapter 2*:

Procedural Rules*:

Standard of Review On Appeal:

Appeals in General:

> An appellate court is bound by prior precedential opinions, even when outside of its own court, until they are overruled by a higher authority. (United States v. Langley (9th Cir. 2021) 17 F.4th 1273, at p. 1273; citing Miller v. Gammie (9th Cir. 2003) 335 F.3rd 889, 900.)
> "As the Supreme Court has explained, moreover, '[i]f a precedent of this Court has direct application in a case' . . . a lower court 'should follow the case which directly controls, leaving to this Court the prerogative of overruling its own decisions.' Mallory v. Norfolk S. Ry. Co., 600 U.S. 122, 136, 143 S. Ct. 2028, 216 L. Ed. 2d 815 (2023) (quoting Rodriguez de Quijas v. Shearson/Am. Exp., Inc., 490 U.S. 477, 484, 109 S. Ct. 1917, 104 L. Ed. 2d 526 (1989)). 'This is true even if the lower court thinks the precedent is in tension with "some other line of decisions."' Id. (quoting Rodriguez de Quijas, 490 U.S. at 484)." (United States v. Esqueda (9th Cir. 2023) 88 F.4th 818, 828.)

Review of Evidentiary Rulings in General:

> "A trial court has broad discretion to admit or exclude evidence. We (the appellate court) will not disturb its ruling unless there is a showing the court abused this discretion by acting in an arbitrary, capricious, or patently absurd manner resulting in a miscarriage of justice. (People v. Vieira ((2005)) 35 Cal.4th (264) at p. 292.) Unless a defendant elaborates or provides a separate argument for related constitutional claims, we have declined to address any boilerplate contentions. (People v. Mills (2010) 48 Cal.4th 158, 194 . . . ["The 'routine application of state evidentiary law does not implicate [a] defendant's constitutional rights"']." (People v. Fayed (2020) 9 Cal.5th 147, 189-190.)

Motion to Suppress:

> Denial of a motion to suppress evidence is reviewed by an appellate court "de novo." (United States v. Bautista (9th Cir. 2004) 362 F.3rd 584, 588-589; see also United States v. Crawford (9th Cir. 2004) 372 F.3rd 1048, 1053.)
> "A determination whether there was reasonable suspicion to support an investigatory 'stop and frisk' is a mixed question of law and fact, also reviewed de novo." (United States v. Williams (9th Cir. 2017) 846 F.3rd 303, 306; citing United States v. Burkett (9th Cir. 2010) 612 F.3rd 1103, 1106.)

> The district court's factual findings are reviewed for clear error. (United States v. Williams, supra, citing United States v. Crawford, supra, and United States v. Hammett (9th Cir. 2001) 236 F.3rd 1054, 1057-1058.)

An appellate court then "review(s) the trial court's resolution of the first inquiry (above), which involves questions of fact, under the deferential substantial-evidence standard, but subject(s) the second and third inquires to independent review." (People v. Parson (2008) 44 Cal.4th 332, 345; citing People v. Ayala (2000) 24 Cal.4th 243, 279, and People v. Weaver (2001) 26 Cal.4th 76, 924.)

> In reviewing a trial court's denial a defendant's motion to suppress, the appellate court defers to the trial court's factual findings where they are supported by substantial evidence, but, but then exercises its own independent judgment in determining the legality of a search on the facts so found. (People v. Meza (2018) 23 Cal.App.5th 604, 609; citing People v. Tully (2012) 54 Cal.4th 952, 979.)

Should a defendant fail to object to evidence as presented at trial, he generally waives any right to challenge that evidence on appeal. However, an appellate court may still consider the admissibility of that evidence if (1) there was error; (2) it was plain; (3) it affected the defendant's substantial rights; and (4) viewed in the context of the entire trial, the impropriety seriously affected the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of judicial proceedings. (United States and Garcia-Morales (9th Cir. 2019) 942 F.3rd 474. 475, quoting United States v. Alcantara-Castillo (9th Cir. 2015) 788 F.3rd 1186, 1191.)

"Where a motion to suppress is submitted after the filing of an information, 'the appellate court disregards the findings of the superior court and reviews the determination of the magistrate who ruled on the motion to suppress, drawing all presumptions in favor of the factual determinations of the magistrate, . . . and measuring the facts as found by the trier against the constitutional standard of reasonableness.' (People v. Thompson (1990) 221 Cal.App.3rd 923, 940 . . .) In so doing, we defer to the magistrate's factual findings and, exercising our independent judgment, determine whether, 'on the facts so found, the search or seizure was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment.' (People v. Glaser (1995) 11 Cal.4th 354, 362 . . . .)" (People v. McGee (2020) 53 Cal.App.5th 796, 801.)

Reconsidering a decision not to continue the hearing on a suppression motion was within the trial court's discretion based on its conclusion that the People would be unable to proceed to trial if the challenged evidence were suppressed. Defendant was out of custody, the continuance was within the speedy trial timeframe, there was no indication that defendant suffered any prejudice by the hearing's delay, and the trial court expressly found that the prosecutor had not sought the continuance in bad faith. When the People are unable to proceed with the hearing on a motion to suppress, it is an abuse of discretion to deny a trial continuance under Pen. Code § 1050, solely because good cause is lacking, when doing so will result in dismissal of the charges and the continuance can be granted without violating the defendant's speedy trial rights. (People v. Brown (2023) 14 Cal.5th 530.)

Federal Rules of Crim. Proc., Rule 12 (2003)'s "good-cause" standard applies when a defendant raises new theories on appeal in support of a required pre-trial motion to suppress. (United States v. Guerrero (9th Cir. 2019) 921 F.3rd 895.)

See "Procedural Remedy: Motion to Suppress, per P.C. § 1538.5," under "Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 8), below.

P.C. § 995 Motion to Dismiss Rulings:

Pursuant to P.C. § 995(a)(2)(B), a court properly sets aside all or part of an information upon finding that the defendant "had been committed without reasonable or probable cause." (People v. Garcia (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 864, 870.)

"'[I]n proceedings under section 995 it is the (preliminary hearing) magistrate who is the finder of fact; the superior court has none of the foregoing powers, and sits merely as a reviewing court; it must draw every legitimate inference in favor of the information, and cannot substitute its judgment as to the credibility or weight of the evidence for that of the magistrate. [Citation.] On review by appeal or writ, moreover, the appellate court in effect disregards the ruling of the superior court and directly reviews the determination of the magistrate … .' (People v. Laiwa (1983) 34 Cal.3rd 711, 718 . . . ; see People v. Konow (2004) 32 Cal.4th 995, 1025 . . . .) 'Insofar as the Penal Code section 995 motion rests on issues of statutory interpretation, our review is de novo.' (Lexin v. Superior Court (2010) 47 Cal.4th 1050, 1072 . . . .) """'As in any case involving statutory interpretation, our fundamental task here is to determine the Legislature's intent so as to effectuate the law's purpose. [Citation.] We begin by examining the statute's words, giving them a plain and commonsense meaning.'"" (People v. Scott (2014) 58 Cal.4th 1415, 1421 . . . .) "'[W]e consider the language of the entire scheme and related statutes, harmonizing the terms when possible.' (Riverside County Sheriff's Dept. v. Stiglitz (2014) 60 Cal.4th 624, 632 . . . ; see People v. Gonzalez (2014) 60 Cal.4th 533, 537 . . . .)" (People v. Gonzalez (2017) 2 Cal.5th 1138, 1141; see also People v. Reyes (2020) 56 Cal.App.5th 972, 981-982.)

"The showing required at this stage 'is exceedingly low' (Salazar v. Superior Court (2000) 83 Cal.App.4th 840, 846 . . .), and an information 'should be set aside only when there is a total absence of evidence to support a necessary element of the offense charged' (Id. at p. 842, quoting People v. Superior Court (Jurado) (1992) 4 Cal.App.4th 1217, 1226 . . .)" People v. Garcia (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 864, 870-871.)

"'In a proceeding under section 995, the superior court's role is similar to that of an appellate court reviewing the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a judgment.'" (People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, 16; quoting People v. Magee (2011) 194 Cal.App.4th 178, 182.)

> "Thus, the superior court 'merely reviews the evidence; it does not substitute its judgment on the weight of the evidence nor does it resolve factual conflicts.'" The Appellate Court, thereafter, "review(s) the magistrate's decision directly, deferring to the magistrate's factual findings." (People v. Kidd, supra, at pp. 16-17.)

The Superior Court, however, in reviewing a magistrate's motion to suppress as a part of a P.C. § 995 motion, is not to be making any new findings of fact, being bound by the magistrate's findings of fact so long as supported by substantial evidence. (People v. Tacardon (2020) 53 Cal.App.5th 89, 96; petition granted.)

"'"[I]n proceedings under [Penal Code] section 995 it is the magistrate who is the finder of fact; the superior court . . . sits merely as a reviewing court; it . . . cannot substitute its judgment as to the credibility or weight of the evidence for that of the magistrate. [Citation.] On review by appeal or writ, moreover, the appellate court in effect disregards the ruling of the superior court and directly reviews the determination of the magistrate.'"' (People v. Hall (2020) 57 Cal.App.5th 946, 951; quoting People v. Gonzalez (2017) 2 Cal.5th 1138, 1141; "Thus, . . . disregard(ing) the lower court's rationale for denying the motion to set aside the information and directly review(ing) the court's ruling at the preliminary hearing denying (defendant)'s motion to suppress."

Court's Ruling Reducing a Felony to a Misdemeanor:

The People have no statutory authority to appeal the magistrate's determination that charged wobbler offenses were misdemeanors. The court held that while the People may appeal "an order entered at sentencing reducing a felony conviction for a wobbler offense to a misdemeanor," the People may not appeal "a pretrial order declaring a wobbler offense charged as a felony to be a misdemeanor." This is true even though, as is the case here, reducing the charges to misdemeanors had the effect of dismissing the prior strikes and a prior prison term. (People v. Williams (2005) 35 Cal.4th 817, 820.)

In a case in which the People charged defendant in a felony complaint with attempting to dissuade a witness, the appellate court held that the People had no authority to appeal a trial court's pretrial order reducing the charge to a misdemeanor. The inability to appeal a trial court's pretrial reduction to a misdemeanor is consistent with the inability to appeal a magistrate's reduction to a misdemeanor (People v. Williams, supra.), even when the order is in excess of the magistrate's jurisdiction. Because the order did not modify a verdict, it could not be appealed pursuant to Pen. Code, § 1238(a)(6). Because the People's appeal was not authorized by law, it had to be dismissed. (People v. Bartholomew (2022) 85 Cal.App.5th 775.)

Federal Court Use of a Magistrate:

"Under the Federal Magistrates Act, a district court may designate a magistrate judge to conduct an evidentiary hearing and submit proposed findings of fact and recommendations for the disposition of a motion to suppress. 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(B). Within fourteen days, any party may file written objections to the report. Id.* § 636(b)(1)(C). If an objection is made, the district court 'shall make a de novo determination of those portions of the report or specified proposed findings or recommendations to which objection is made.' Id.; see also Fed. R. Civ. P. 72(b)(3); United States v. Reyna-Tapia, 328 F.3rd 1114, 1121 (9th Cir. 2003) ('[T]he district judge must review the magistrate judge's findings and recommendations de novo if objection is made, but not otherwise.'). After conducting de novo review, the district court "may accept, reject, or modify, in whole or in part, the findings or recommendations made by the magistrate judge.' 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(C). 'In providing for a de novo determination . . . Congress intended to permit whatever reliance a district judge, in the exercise of sound judicial discretion, chose to place on a magistrate's proposed findings and recommendations.' United States v. Raddatz, 447 U.S. 667, 676, 100 S. Ct. 2406, 65 L. Ed. 2d 424 (1980) (internal quotation marks omitted)." (United States v. Ramos (9th Cir. 2023) 65 F.4th 427, 433.)

Constitutionality of a Statute:

"Where an issue presented involves the constitutionality of a statute, (an appellate court will) review the lower court's determination de novo. (Vergara v. State of California (2016) 246 Cal.App.4th 619, 642 . . . .) In conducting (the court's) review, (it will) adhere to the settled principles that ""'[statutes] are to be so construed, if their language permits, as to render them valid and constitutional rather than invalid and unconstitutional" [citation] and that California courts must adopt an interpretation of a statutory provision which, 'consistent with the statutory language and purpose, eliminates doubt as to the provision's constitutionality.'""" (People v. Morera-Munoz (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 838, 846; quoting People v. Armor (1974) 12 Cal.3rd 20, 30; and citing People v. Harrison (2013) 57 Cal.4th 1211, 1228.)

Statutory Construction:

When the applicability of a statute is in issue, and the issue is one of "statutory construction," the rules are simple. A reviewing court is to "exercise de novo review when . . . engag(ing) in statutory construction. (People v. Brewer (2011) 192 Cal.App.4th 457, 461, . . .) 'Statutory construction begins with the plain, commonsense meaning of the words in the statute, "because it is generally the most reliable indicator of legislative intent and purpose." [Citation.] "When the language of a statute is clear, we need go no further." (People v. Manzo (2012) 53 Cal.4th 880, 885 . . . .) Where the language of the statute is potentially ambiguous, "[i]t is appropriate to consider evidence of the intent of the enacting body in addition to the words of the measure, and to examine the history and background of the provision, in an attempt to ascertain the most reasonable interpretation." [Citation.] We may also consider extrinsic aids such as the ostensible objects to be achieved, the evils to be remedied, and public policy. [Citation.] When construing a statute, "our goal is 'to ascertain the intent of the enacting legislative body so that we may adopt the construction that best effectuates the purpose of the law.'" (Id. at p. 886.) 'It is a settled principle of statutory interpretation that if a statute contains a provision regarding one subject, that provision's omission in the same or another statute regarding a related subject is evidence of a different legislative intent.' (People v. Arriaga (2014) 58 Cal.4th 950, 960 . . . .)" (People v. Mackreth (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 317, 330.)

"We generally presume that when the Legislature uses common law terms in its enactments, it intends to incorporate their settled common law meanings." (Leon v. County of Riverside (2023) 14 Cal.5th 910, 921; citing People v. Lopez (2003) 31 Cal.4th 1051, 1060; and People v. Tufunga (1999) 21 Cal.4th 935, 946; and noting the differences between the investigatory stage and the prosecutorial stage, in interpreting whether a law enforcement officer is immune from civil liability under Gov't. Code § 621.6.)

Sufficiency of the Evidence:

All persons are presumed innocent in the absence of sufficient evidence to the contrary, proving his or her guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. (See Morrisette v. United States (1952 342 U.S. 246 [72 S.Ct. 240; 96 L.Ed.2nd 288]; Herrera v. Collins (1993) 506 U.S. 390, 398-399 [113 S.Ct. 853; 122 L.Ed.2nd 203.)

An inmate convicted of first degree murder was entitled to 28 U.S.C. § 2254 federal habeas corpus relief because, in overruling defense counsel's objection to the prosecutor's statements in closing argument that the presumption of innocence no longer applied, the state court violated defendant's due process rights under Darden. The state appellate court was objectively unreasonable in holding that any error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt in light of the fact that the weight of the evidence against the inmate was not great, but rather circumstantial, incomplete, and in conflict in a very close case. (Ford v. Peery (9th Cir. 2020) 976 F.3rd 1032.)

Pursuant to Darden v. Wainwright (1986) 477 U.S. 168 [106 S.Ct. 2464, 91 L.Ed.2nd 144], in evaluating whether a prosecutor violated due process in closing arguments, the so-called Darden factors are as follows; the weight of the evidence, the prominence of the comment in the context of the entire trial, whether the prosecution misstated the evidence, whether the judge instructed the jury to disregard the comment, whether the comment was invited by defense counsel in its summation and whether defense counsel had an adequate opportunity to rebut the comment. Courts are to place improper argument in the context of the entire trial to evaluate whether its damaging effect was mitigated or aggravated.

In a "sufficiency of the evidence case," an appellate court will "consider the evidence in a light most favorable to the judgment and presume the existence of every fact the trier could reasonably deduce from the evidence in support of the judgment. The test is whether substantial evidence supports the decision, not whether the evidence proves guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. [Citations.]" People v. White (2015) 241 Cal.App.4th 881, 884, citing People v. Mincy (1992) 2 Cal.4th 408, 432. See also King v. State of California (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 265, 278-279; People v. Jimenez (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 1337, 1353.)

In a criminal case, the issue is "whether a rational fact finder could have concluded defendant was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. (People v. Rowland (1992) 4 Cal.4th 238, 269 . . . .) 'Reversal on this ground is unwarranted unless it appears "that upon no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support [the conviction]." [Citation.]' (People v. Bolin (1998) 18 Cal.4th 297, 331 . . . .) Evidence is substantial when it is reasonable in nature, credible, and of solid value. (People v. Ramsey (1988) 203 Cal.App.3rd 671, 682 . . . .) We consider the evidence, including the reasonable inferences drawn from the evidence, in the light most favorable to the judgment. (People v. Valdez (2004) 32 Cal.4th 73, 104 . . . .)" (People v. Nicolas (2017) 8 Cal. App. 5th 1165, 1171.)

"'Substantial evidence' is evidence of ponderable legal significance, evidence that is reasonable, credible and of solid value." (Citation) 'The focus is on the quality, rather than the quantity, of the evidence.' (Citation) 'Inferences may constitute substantial evidence, but they must be the product of logic and reason. Speculation or conjecture alone is not substantial evidence.' (Citation) 'The ultimate test is whether it is reasonable for a trier of fact to make the ruling in question in light of the whole record. (Citation) The testimony of a single witness may be sufficient.' (Citation)" (Internal quotations and citations omitted; King v. State of California (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 265, 278-279.)

The same standards apply when the evidence being evaluated constitutes circumstantial evidence. (People v. Snow (2003) 30 Cal.4th 43, 66; People v. Jimenez (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 1337, 1354; People v. Lopez (2017) 8 Cal.App.5th 1230, 1234.)

The same standards also apply when the defendant is a minor, and the issue is whether or not there was "substantial evidence" supporting a true finding that she'd violated a particular criminal offense (P.C. § 148(a), in this case). (In re Amanda A. (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 537, 545-546.)

But, "a jury may not rely upon unreasonable inferences, and … '[a]n inference is not reasonable if it is based only on speculation.'" (Citation) "Before the judgment of the trial court can be set aside for the insufficiency of the evidence, it must clearly appear that on no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the verdict of the [finder of fact]. (Citation)" (People v. Goode (2015) 243 Cal.App.4th 484, 488.)

"The federal standard of review is to the same effect: Under principles of federal due process, review for sufficiency of evidence entails not the determination whether the reviewing court itself believes the evidence at trial establishes guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, but, instead, whether, after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. [Citation.] The standard of review is the same in cases in which the prosecution relies mainly on circumstantial evidence. [Citation.] ‘“‘Although it is the duty of the jury to acquit a defendant if it finds that circumstantial evidence is susceptible of two interpretations, one of which suggests guilt and the other innocence [citations], it is the jury, not the appellate court[,] which must be convinced of the defendant’s guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. ‘“‘If the circumstances reasonably justify the trier of fact's findings, the opinion of the reviewing court that the circumstances might also reasonably be reconciled with a contrary finding does not warrant a reversal of the judgment.”’”’”’ (People v. Dealba (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 1142, 1148-1149, quoting People v. Rodriguez (1999) 20 Cal.4th 1, 11.)

‘“‘“An appellate court must accept logical inferences that the [finder of fact] might have drawn from the circumstantial evidence.” [Citation.] “Before the judgment of the trial court can be set aside for the insufficiency of the evidence, it must clearly appear that on no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the verdict of the [finder of fact].’ [Citation.]” (People v. Sanghera (2006) 139 Cal.App.4th 1567, 1573.) As our Supreme Court said in People v. Rodriguez, supra, 20 Cal.4th 1, while reversing an insufficient evidence finding because the reviewing court had rejected contrary, but equally logical, inferences the jury might have drawn: ‘The [Court of Appeal] majority’s reasoning . . . amounted to nothing more than a different weighing of the evidence, one the jury might well have considered and rejected. The Attorney General’s inferences from the evidence were no more inherently speculative than the majority’s; consequently, the majority erred in substituting its own assessment of the evidence for that of the jury.’ (Id., at p. 12, italics added.)” (People v. Dealba, supra, at p. 1149.)

“On appeal of a conviction under (Penal Code) section 288(a), “[t]he proper test for determining a claim of insufficiency of evidence . . . is whether, on the entire record, a rational trier of fact could find the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. [Citations.] On appeal, we must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the People and must presume in support of the judgment the existence of every fact the trier could reasonably deduce from the evidence.’” (People v. Villagran (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 880, 889-890; quoting People v. Jones (1990) 51 Cal.3rd 294, 314.)

“‘Substantial evidence includes circumstantial evidence and any reasonable inferences drawn from that evidence.’ (People v. Brook*s* (2017) 3 Cal.5th 1, 57 . . . .) We presume the existence of every fact the trier of fact could reasonably deduce from the evidence in support of the judgment. (People v. Clark (2011) 52 Cal.4th 856, 943 . . . .)" (People v. Korwin (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 682, 687.)

On the Issue of a Reasonable Suspicion to Detain or Probable Cause to Arrest:

"'California cases hold that although the (trial) court, not the jury, usually decides whether police action was supported by legal cause, disputed facts bearing on the issue of legal cause must be submitted to the jury considering an engaged-in-duty element, since the lawfulness of the victim's conduct forms part of the corpus delicti of the offense.'" (People v. Gonzalez (1990) 51 Cal.3rd 1179, 1217 . . . , italics added.) 'Disputed facts relating to the question whether the officer was acting lawfully are for the jury to determine when such an offense (as when P.C. § 148(a)(1)) is charged.' (People v. Jenkins (2000) 22 Cal.4th 900, 1020. . . .)" (People v. Mackreth (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 317, 338.)

"Probable cause 'is a more demanding standard than mere reasonable suspicion. [Citation.] It exists "where the known facts and circumstances are sufficient to warrant a man of reasonable prudence in the belief that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found … ." [Citation.] In determining whether a reasonable officer would have probable cause to search, we consider the totality of the circumstances.'" (People v. Sims (2021) 59 Cal.App.5th 943, 951, quoting People v. Lee (2019) 40 Cal.App.5th 853, at p. 862.)

Habeas Corpus:

In ruling on a denial or granting of a federal petition for writ of habeas corpus, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal will consider the issue "de novo." But then, it can only reverse the district court's denial or granting of the petition, and overturn or uphold the state decision, respectively, if the state court decision "was contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States," or "resulted in a decision that was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the State court proceeding." (Jones v. Harrington (9th Cir. 2016) 829 F.3rd 1128, 1135-1136; 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(1)-(2); see also Bradford v. Davis (9th Cir. 2019) 923 F.3rd 599, 609; Balbuena v. Sullivan (9th Cir. 2020) 970 F.3rd 1176, 1184.)

"A defendant's right to seek habeas corpus relief is enshrined in California's Constitution. (See Cal. Const., art. I, § 11; People v. Duvall (1995) 9 Cal.4th 464, 474 . . .) A habeas corpus remedy may be available when relief by direct appeal is inadequate. (In re Sanders (1999) 21 Cal.4th 697, 703–704 . . .). Habeas corpus relief may be warranted when the invalidity of a judgment is not apparent from the record on appeal. (In re Robbins (1998) 18 Cal.4th 770, 777 . . .; see also In re Reno (2012) 55 Cal.4th 428, 450 . . .) 'Because a petition for a writ of habeas corpus seeks to collaterally attack a presumptively final criminal judgment, the petitioner bears a heavy burden initially to plead sufficient grounds for relief, and then later to prove them.' (Duvall, supra, 9 Cal.4th at p. 474.) This court evaluates a petition 'by asking whether, assuming the petition's factual allegations are true, the petitioner would be entitled to relief. [Citations.] If no prima facie case for relief is stated, the court will summarily deny the petition. If, however, the court finds the factual allegations, taken as true, establish a prima facie case for relief, the court will issue an [order to show cause.' (Id. at pp. 474–475.)" (In re Figueroa (2018) 4 Cal.5th 576, 586-587; litigating the applicability of a Habeas Corpus writ to the challenge of "false evidence," e.g., expert opinion evidence which has since been repudiated by the expert.)

"(A federal) habeas petition (in a state case) is governed by the provisions of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 ('AEDPA'), Pub. L. No. 104-132, 110 Stat. 1214 (1996). AEDPA 'restricts the circumstances under which a federal habeas court may grant relief to a state prisoner whose claim has already been 'adjudicated on the merits in State court.' Johnson v. Williams, 568 U.S. 289, 292, 133 S.Ct. 1088, 185 L.Ed.2nd 105 (2013) (quoting 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)). Under AEDPA, this court may only grant habeas relief if a state court's decision was (1) 'contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States,' or (2) 'based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the State court proceeding.' 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)." (Martinez v. Cate (9th Cir. 2018) 903 F.3rd 982, 991.)

In response to an inquiry by the Ninth Circuit, the California Supreme Court explained how California treats "gap delays" in successive non-capital habeas corpus petitions (i.e., "the time gap between the denial of a petition . . . in a lower California court and the filing of a new petition in a higher California court raising the same claims"). "California's habeas corpus timeliness standards refer to overall delay in presenting a habeas corpus claim and not specifically gap delay. We consider whether, under all of the circumstances, the petitioner presented the claim without substantial delay after it was, or reasonably should have been, known to the petitioner." (In re Robbins (1998) 18 Cal.4th 770.) The Court went on to establish a "safe harbor" of 120 days. "Providing a safe harbor simply means that delay beyond the specified time would be subject to the normal Robbins analysis (whether there was substantial delay, and if so, the existence of good cause or an exception)." (Robinson v. Lewis (2020) 9 Cal.5th 883.)

After a state court has ruled on the merits of a state prisoner's claim, a federal court may not grant relief without first applying both the Brecht test, pursuant to Brecht* v. *Abrahamson (1993) 507 U. S. 619 [113 S.Ct. 1710; 123 L.Ed.2nd 353, and the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA). The federal court failing to ask whether petitioner had satisfied AEDPA disregarded Congress' instruction that habeas relief was not to be granted unless AEDPA's terms were satisfied. Secondly, proof of prejudice under the Brecht test did not equate to a successful showing under AEDPA as those tests posed different questions and required different legal materials to answer them. Prior case law does not answer whether a petitioner who satisfied the Brecht test also satisfied the AEDPA test. Lastly, even if the Brecht test was met, petitioner in this case had not met the AEDPA test given the state court's finding that shackling him was harmless due to the overwhelming evidence and the jurors' testimony that it did not affect their verdict. (Brown v. Davenport (Apr. 21, 2022) __ U.S.__ [142 S.Ct. 1510; 212 L.Ed.2nd 1463].)

The Brecht test, pursuant to Brecht v. Abrahamson, supra, refers to the standard of proof in a federal habeas corpus case, noting that that the Chapman harmless error standard (pursuant to Chapman* v. *California (1967) 386 U.S. 18 [17 L.Ed.2nd 705; 87 S.Ct. 824]), "harmless beyond a reasonable doubt," does not apply, but rather that whether a violation had a substantial and injurious effect in determining the jury's verdict.

Demurrer:

Definition: A demurrer is a legal objection to the sufficiency of a pleading, attacking what appears on the face of the document and seeking dismissal of a case against the defendant. The demurrer must be made in open court before a plea is entered unless the court allows it to be made at a later time.

Case Law:

"""'In reviewing an order sustaining a demurrer, we examine the operative complaint de novo to determine whether it alleges facts sufficient to state a cause of action under any legal theory.'" (Mathews v. Becerra (2019) 8 Cal.5th 756, 768. . . ; accord, T.H. v. Novartis Pharmaceuticals Corp. (2017) 4 Cal.5th 145, 162. . . .) "A judgment of dismissal after a demurrer has been sustained without leave to amend will be affirmed if proper on any grounds stated in the demurrer, whether or not the court acted on that ground."

[⁋] A trial court abuses its discretion by sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend where "'there is a reasonable possibility that the defect can be cured by amendment.'" (Loeffler v. Target Corp. (2014) 58 Cal.4th 1081, 1100. . . ; accord, City of Dinuba v. County of Tulare (2007) 41 Cal.4th 859, 865. . . ; Ko, supra, 58 Cal.App.5th at p. 1150.) "'The plaintiff has the burden of proving that [an] amendment would cure the legal defect, and may [even] meet this burden [for the first time] on appeal.'" (Sierra Palms Homeowners Assn. v. Metro Gold Line Foothill Extension Construction Authority (2018) 19 Cal.App.5th 1127, 1132 . . ; accord, Ko, at p. 1150; see Aubry v. (Silva v. Langford (2022) 79 Cal.App.5th 710, 715-716.)

Dismissal of a Case Due to Outrageous Government Conduct:

California Courts of Appeal occasionally have concluded that outrageous government conduct merited dismissal of criminal charges.

People v. Velasco-Palacios (2015) 235 Cal.App.4th 439; affirming dismissal of criminal charges as sanction for outrageous government misconduct where prosecutor deliberately altered an interrogation transcript to include a confession and that misconduct prejudiced defendant's constitutional right to counsel.

Morrow v. Superior Court (1994) 30 Cal.App.4th 1252, 1261; "the court's conscience is shocked and dismissal is the appropriate remedy" where "the prosecutor orchestrates an eavesdropping upon a privileged attorney-client communication in the courtroom and acquires confidential information."

Dismissal of a case, however, is not always the appropriate remedy.

A trial court's approach should be "to identify and then neutralize the taint by tailoring relief appropriate in the circumstances to assure the defendant the effective assistance of counsel and a fair trial. . . . . [T]here is no basis for imposing a remedy [of dismissal] in [a] proceeding, which can go forward with full recognition of the defendant's right to counsel and to a fair trial". (United States v. Morrison (1981) 449 U.S. 361, 365 [66 L.Ed.2nd 564; 101 S. Ct. 665].)

Where defendant's right to counsel is not implicated, dismissal for outrageous government conduct is warranted only where the conduct impairs a defendant's constitutional right to a fair retrial. (People v. Guillen (2014) 227 Cal.App.4th 934, 1007.)

The prosecutor's false testimony at a hearing on motions to disqualify the district attorney and to dismiss did not constitute outrageous governmental conduct in violation of due process where there was no showing that the misconduct prevented defendant from receiving a fair trial. (People v. Uribe (2011) 199 Cal.App.4th 836, 841, 884–885.)

See People v. Fultz (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 395, where dismissal of the case was held not to be an appropriate remedy due to prosecutorial misconduct because the prosecution's interference with the two co-defendant's testimony (when they were offered plea bargains in return for their truthful testimony) was held to be "not of constitutional magnitude" as the trial court had believed. Thus, the credibility of the co-defendant's testimony was not tainted beyond redemption but is reasonably left to the jury to determine. (pgs. 431-433.)

Penal Code § 1382: Statutory Speedy Trial Rights:

(a) The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, shall order the action to be dismissed in the following cases:

(1) When a person has been held to answer for a public offense and an information is not filed against that person within 15 days.

(2) In a felony case, when a defendant is not brought to trial within 60 days of the defendant's arraignment on an indictment or information, or reinstatement of criminal proceedings pursuant to Chapter 6 (commencing with Section 1367) of Title 10 of Part 2, or, in case the cause is to be tried again following a mistrial, an order granting a new trial from which an appeal is not taken, or an appeal from the superior court, within 60 days after the mistrial has been declared, after entry of the order granting the new trial, or after the filing of the remittitur in the trial court, or after the issuance of a writ or order which, in effect, grants a new trial, within 60 days after notice of the writ or order is filed in the trial court and served upon the prosecuting attorney, or within 90 days after notice of the writ or order is filed in the trial court and served upon the prosecuting attorney in any case where the district attorney chooses to resubmit the case for a preliminary examination after an appeal or the issuance of a writ reversing a judgment of conviction upon a plea of guilty prior to a preliminary hearing. However, an action shall not be dismissed under this paragraph if either of the following circumstances exists:

(A) The defendant enters a general waiver of the 60-day trial requirement. A general waiver of the 60-day trial requirement entitles the superior court to set or continue a trial date without the sanction of dismissal should the case fail to proceed on the date set for trial. If the defendant, after proper notice to all parties, later withdraws, in open court, his or her waiver in the superior court, the defendant shall be brought to trial within 60 days of the date of that withdrawal. Upon the withdrawal of a general time waiver in open court, a trial date shall be set and all parties shall be properly notified of that date. If a general time waiver is not expressly entered, subparagraph (B) shall apply.

(B) The defendant requests or consents to the setting of a trial date beyond the 60-day period. In the absence of an express general time waiver from the defendant, or upon the withdrawal of a general time waiver, the court shall set a trial date. Whenever a case is set for trial beyond the 60-day period by request or consent, expressed or implied, of the defendant without a general waiver, the defendant shall be brought to trial on the date set for trial or within 10 days thereafter.

Whenever a case is set for trial after a defendant enters either a general waiver as to the 60-day trial requirement or requests or consents, expressed or implied, to the setting of a trial date beyond the 60-day period pursuant to this paragraph, the court may not grant a motion of the defendant to vacate the date set for trial and to set an earlier trial date unless all parties are properly noticed and the court finds good cause for granting that motion.

(3) Regardless of when the complaint is filed, when a defendant in a misdemeanor or infraction case is not brought to trial within 30 days after he or she is arraigned or enters his or her plea, whichever occurs later, if the defendant is in custody at the time of arraignment or plea, whichever occurs later, or in all other cases, within 45 days after the defendant's arraignment or entry of the plea, whichever occurs later, or in case the cause is to be tried again following a mistrial, an order granting a new trial from which no appeal is taken, or an appeal from a judgment in a misdemeanor or infraction case, within 30 days after the mistrial has been declared, after entry of the order granting the new trial, or after the remittitur is filed in the trial court, or within 30 days after the date of the reinstatement of criminal proceedings pursuant to Chapter 6 (commencing with Section 1367). However, an action shall not be dismissed under this subdivision if any of the following circumstances exists:

(A) The defendant enters a general waiver of the 30-day or 45-day trial requirement. A general waiver of the 30-day or 45-day trial requirement entitles the court to set or continue a trial date without the sanction of dismissal should the case fail to proceed on the date set for trial. If the defendant, after proper notice to all parties, later withdraws, in open court, his or her waiver in the superior court, the defendant shall be brought to trial within 30 days of the date of that withdrawal. Upon the withdrawal of a general time waiver in open court, a trial date shall be set and all parties shall be properly notified of that date. If a general time waiver is not expressly entered, subparagraph (B) shall apply.

(B) The defendant requests or consents to the setting of a trial date beyond the 30-day or 45-day period. In the absence of an express general time waiver from the defendant, or upon the withdrawal of a general time waiver the court shall set a trial date. Whenever a case is set for trial beyond the 30-day or 45-day period by request or consent, expressed or implied, of the defendant without a general waiver, the defendant shall be brought to trial on the date set for trial or within 10 days thereafter.

(C) The defendant in a misdemeanor case has been ordered to appear on a case set for hearing prior to trial, but the defendant fails to appear on that date and a bench warrant is issued, or the case is not tried on the date set for trial because of the defendant's neglect or failure to appear, in which case the defendant shall be deemed to have been arraigned within the meaning of this subdivision on the date of his or her subsequent arraignment on a bench warrant or his or her submission to the court.

(b) Whenever a defendant has been ordered to appear in superior court on a felony case set for trial or set for a hearing prior to trial after being held to answer, if the defendant fails to appear on that date and a bench warrant is issued, the defendant shall be brought to trial within 60 days after the defendant next appears in the superior court unless a trial date previously had been set which is beyond that 60-day period.

(c) If the defendant is not represented by counsel, the defendant shall not be deemed under this section to have consented to the date for the defendant's trial unless the court has explained to the defendant his or her rights under this section and the effect of his or her consent.

Case Law:

After a previous appeal resulted in the reversal of defendant's conviction and a remand for a new trial, defendant was not brought to trial within 60 days of the filing of the remittitur under Pen. Code § 1382(a)(2), and therefore was entitled to dismissal by reason of a speedy trial violation because the filing was effective under Cal. Rules of Court, rule 1.20, when a superior court clerk received the signed remittitur. The clerk's failure to promptly deliver the remittitur to the sentencing judge's department under informal local procedures did not alter the effective filing date because the requirements for filing with the sentencing judge's department were not properly promulgated local rules and were not known to the public, and thus the superior court lacked authority to require filing of the remittitur with the sentencing judge's department. (Waldsworth v. Superior Court (2023) 98 Cal.App.5th 1.)

Use of Prejudicial Evidence:

Evid. Code § 352: Discretion of the Court to Exclude Evidence:

The court in its discretion may exclude evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the probability that its admission will (a) necessitate undue consumption of time or (b) create substantial danger of undue prejudice, of confusing the issues, or of misleading the jury.

Evid. Code § 352.2: Admission of Creative Expressions:

(a) In any criminal proceeding where a party seeks to admit as evidence a form of creative expression, the court, while balancing the probative value of that evidence against the substantial danger of undue prejudice under Section 352, shall consider, in addition to the factors listed in Section 352, that: (1) the probative value of such expression for its literal truth or as a truthful narrative is minimal unless that expression is created near in time to the charged crime or crimes, bears a sufficient level of similarity to the charged crime or crimes, or includes factual detail not otherwise publicly available; and (2) undue prejudice includes, but is not limited to, the possibility that the trier of fact will, in violation of Section 1101, treat the expression as evidence of the defendant's propensity for violence or general criminal disposition as well as the possibility that the evidence will explicitly or implicitly inject racial bias into the proceedings.

(b) If proffered and relevant to the issues in the case, the court shall consider the following as well as any additional relevant evidence offered by either party:

(1) Credible testimony on the genre of creative expression as to the social or cultural context, rules, conventions, and artistic techniques of the expression.

(2) Experimental or social science research demonstrating that the introduction of a particular type of expression explicitly or implicitly introduces racial bias into the proceedings.

(3) Evidence to rebut such research or testimony.

(c) For purposes of this section, "creative expression" means the expression or application of creativity or imagination in the production or arrangement of forms, sounds, words, movements, or symbols, including, but not limited to, music, dance, performance art, visual art, poetry, literature, film, and other such objects or media.

(d) The question of the admissibility of a form of creative expression shall be heard in limine and determined by the court, outside the presence and hearing of the jury, pursuant to Section 402. The court shall state on the record its ruling and its reasons therefor.

Case Law:

In a murder trial relating to a shooting from a car, Evid. Code § 352.2, which was enacted while appeal was pending and required consideration of specific factors before admitting evidence of a form of creative expression, applied retroactively to the admission of a rap video. The admission of the video without the new safeguards was prejudicial because there was substantial doubt whether the trial judge would have admitted the video evidence and the prosecution used the video to tie defendant, the alleged driver, to the specific crime. (People v. Venable (2023) 88 Cal.App.5th 445.)

Petition for review was granted by the California Supreme Court on May 17, 2023, at 2023 Cal. LEXIS 6202, and the matter was deferred pending consideration and disposition of related issues in People v. Bankston, S044739 and People v. Hin, S141519.

Pen. Code § 745*: *The Racial Justice Act: Sentencing on the Basis of Race, Ethnicity, or National Origin:

"The express purpose of the Racial Justice Act is 'to eliminate racial bias from California's criminal justice system because racism in any form or amount, at any stage of a criminal trial, is intolerable [and] inimical to a fair criminal justice system . . . .' (Stats. 2020, ch. 317, § 2, subd. (i) [uncodified].) The trial court in this case expressed concern that in enacting the Racial Justice Act, 'the Legislature . . . has not thought through some of these issues sufficiently to provide proper guidance to attorneys and judges.' That may or may not be true. Surely the implementation of legislative policy often involves a back-and-forth process of enactment, interpretation, and amendment to clarify and fine-tune a statutory scheme. Whatever may be uncertain about the Racial Justice Act, there are a few things that are abundantly clear. Perhaps most obvious is that the Racial Justice Act was enacted to address much more than purposeful discrimination based on race. Indeed, the primary motivation for the legislation was the failure of the judicial system to afford meaningful relief to victims of unintentional but implicit bias. In an uncodified section of Assembly Bill No. 2542, the Legislature explained, 'Implicit bias, although often unintentional and unconscious, may inject racism and unfairness into proceedings similar to intentional bias. The intent of the Legislature is not to punish this type of bias, but rather to remedy the harm to the defendant's case and to the integrity of the judicial system.' (Stats. 2020, ch. 317, § 2, subd. (i) [uncodified], italics added.) According to the author of the bill, the Racial Justice Act 'is a countermeasure to a widely condemned 1987 legal precedent established in the [United States Supreme Court] case of McCleskey v. Kemp[, which] established an unreasonably high standard for victims of racism in the criminal legal system that is almost impossible to meet without direct proof that the racially discriminatory behavior was conscious, deliberate and targeted.' (Sen. Com. on Public Safety, Analysis of Assem. Bill No. 2542 (2019–2020 Reg. Sess.) as amended Aug. 1, 2020, p. 7, italics added.) This overriding purpose is emphasized in subdivision (c)(2) of section 745, which defines the defendant's burden of proof on a motion to demonstrate a violation of the Racial Justice Act. It expressly provides that '[t]he defendant does not need to prove intentional discrimination.' (Ibid., italics added.)" (Italics in original: Bonds v. Superior Court (Feb. 14, 2024) __ Cal.App.5th __, __-__ [2024 Cal.App. LEXIS 92].)

(a) The state shall not seek or obtain a criminal conviction or seek, obtain, or impose a sentence on the basis of race, ethnicity, or national origin. A violation is established if the defendant proves, by a preponderance of the evidence, any of the following:

> (1) The judge, an attorney in the case, a law enforcement officer involved in the case, an expert witness, or juror exhibited bias or animus towards the defendant because of the defendant's race, ethnicity, or national origin.
> (2) During the defendant's trial, in court and during the proceedings, the judge, an attorney in the case, a law enforcement officer involved in the case, an expert witness, or juror, used racially discriminatory language about the defendant's race, ethnicity, or national origin, or otherwise exhibited bias or animus towards the defendant because of the defendant's race, ethnicity, or national origin, whether or not purposeful. This paragraph does not apply if the person speaking is relating language used by another that is relevant to the case or if the person speaking is giving a racially neutral and unbiased physical description of the suspect.

(3) The defendant was charged or convicted of a more serious offense than defendants of other races, ethnicities, or national origins who have engaged in similar conduct and are similarly situated, and the evidence establishes that the prosecution more frequently sought or obtained convictions for more serious offenses against people who share the defendant's race, ethnicity, or national origin in the county where the convictions were sought or obtained.

(A) A longer or more severe sentence was imposed on the defendant than was imposed on other similarly situated individuals convicted of the same offense, and longer or more severe sentences were more frequently imposed for that offense on people that share the defendant's race, ethnicity, or national origin than on defendants of other races, ethnicities, or national origins in the county where the sentence was imposed.

(B) A longer or more severe sentence was imposed on the defendant than was imposed on other similarly situated individuals convicted of the same offense, and longer or more severe sentences were more frequently imposed for the same offense on defendants in cases with victims of one race, ethnicity, or national origin than in cases with victims of other races, ethnicities, or national origins, in the county where the sentence was imposed.

(b) A defendant may file a motion in the trial court or, if judgment has been imposed, may file a petition for writ of habeas corpus or a motion under Section 1473.7 in a court of competent jurisdiction, alleging a violation of subdivision (a). If the motion is based in whole or in part on conduct or statements by the judge, the judge shall disqualify themselves from any further proceedings under this section.

(c) If a motion is filed in the trial court and the defendant makes a prima facie showing of a violation of subdivision (a), the trial court shall hold a hearing. A motion made at trial shall be made as soon as practicable upon the defendant learning of the alleged violation. A motion that is not timely may be deemed waived, in the discretion of the court.

(1) At the hearing, evidence may be presented by either party, including, but not limited to, statistical evidence, aggregate data, expert testimony, and the sworn testimony of witnesses. The court may also appoint an independent expert. For the purpose of a motion and hearing under this section, out-of-court statements that the court finds trustworthy and reliable, statistical evidence, and aggregated data are admissible for the limited purpose of determining whether a violation of subdivision (a) has occurred.

(2) The defendant shall have the burden of proving a violation of subdivision (a) by a preponderance of the evidence. The defendant does not need to prove intentional discrimination.

(3) At the conclusion of the hearing, the court shall make findings on the record.

(d) A defendant may file a motion requesting disclosure to the defense of all evidence relevant to a potential violation of subdivision (a) in the possession or control of the state. A motion filed under this section shall describe the type of records or information the defendant seeks. Upon a showing of good cause, the court shall order the records to be released. Upon a showing of good cause, and in order to protect a privacy right or privilege, the court may permit the prosecution to redact information prior to disclosure or may subject disclosure to a protective order. If a statutory privilege or constitutional privacy right cannot be adequately protected by redaction or a protective order, the court shall not order the release of the records.

(e) Notwithstanding any other law, except as provided in subdivision(k), or for an initiative approved by the voters, if the court finds, by a preponderance of evidence, a violation of subdivision (a), the court shall impose a remedy specific to the violation found from the following list:

(1) Before a judgment has been entered, the court may impose any of the following remedies:

(A) Declare a mistrial, if requested by the defendant.

(B) Discharge the jury panel and empanel a new jury.

(C) If the court determines that it would be in the interest of justice, dismiss enhancements, special circumstances, or special allegations, or reduce one or more charges.

(A) After a judgment has been entered, if the court finds that a conviction was sought or obtained in violation of subdivision (a), the court shall vacate the conviction and sentence, find that it is legally invalid, and order new proceedings consistent with subdivision (a). If the court finds that the only violation of subdivision (a) that occurred is based on paragraph (3) of subdivision (a), the court may modify the judgment to a lesser included or lesser related offense. On resentencing, the court shall not impose a new sentence greater than that previously imposed.

(B) After a judgment has been entered, if the court finds that only the sentence was sought, obtained, or imposed in violation of subdivision (a), the court shall vacate the sentence, find that it is legally invalid, and impose a new sentence. On resentencing, the court shall not impose a new sentence greater than that previously imposed.

(3) When the court finds there has been a violation of subdivision (a), the defendant shall not be eligible for the death penalty.

(4) The remedies available under this section do not foreclose any other remedies available under the United States Constitution, the California Constitution, or any other law.

(f) This section also applies to adjudications and dispositions in the juvenile delinquency system and adjudications to transfer a juvenile case to adult court.

(g) This section shall not prevent the prosecution of hate crimes pursuant to Sections 422.6 to 422.865, inclusive.

(h) As used in this section, the following definitions apply:

(1) "More frequently sought or obtained" or "more frequently imposed" means that the totality of the evidence demonstrates a significant difference in seeking or obtaining convictions or in imposing sentences comparing individuals who have engaged in similar conduct and are similarly situated, and the prosecution cannot establish race-neutral reasons for the disparity. The evidence may include statistical evidence, aggregate data, or nonstatistical evidence. Statistical significance is a factor the court may consider, but is not necessary to establish a significant difference. In evaluating the totality of the evidence, the court shall consider whether systemic and institutional racial bias, racial profiling, and historical patterns of racially biased policing and prosecution may have contributed to, or caused differences observed in, the data or impacted the availability of data overall. Race-neutral reasons shall be relevant factors to charges, convictions, and sentences that are not influenced by implicit, systemic, or institutional bias based on race, ethnicity, or national origin.

(2) "Prima facie showing" means that the defendant produces facts that, if true, establish that there is a substantial likelihood that a violation of subdivision (a) occurred. For purposes of this section, a "substantial likelihood" requires more than a mere possibility, but less than a standard of more likely than not.

(3) "Relevant factors," as that phrase applies to sentencing, means the factors in the California Rules of Court that pertain to sentencing decisions and any additional factors required to or permitted to be considered in sentencing under state law and under the state and federal constitutions.

(4) "Racially discriminatory language" means language that, to an objective observer, explicitly or implicitly appeals to racial bias, including, but not limited to, racially charged or racially coded language, language that compares the defendant to an animal, or language that references the defendant's physical appearance, culture, ethnicity, or national origin. Evidence that particular words or images are used exclusively or disproportionately in cases where the defendant is of a specific race, ethnicity, or national origin is relevant to determining whether language is discriminatory.

(5) "State" includes the Attorney General, a district attorney, or a city prosecutor.

(6) "Similarly situated" means that factors that are relevant in charging and sentencing are similar and do not require that all individuals in the comparison group are identical. A defendant's conviction history may be a relevant factor to the severity of the charges, convictions, or sentences. If it is a relevant factor and the defense produces evidence that the conviction history may have been impacted by racial profiling or historical patterns of racially biased policing, the court shall consider the evidence.

(i) A defendant may share a race, ethnicity, or national origin with more than one group. A defendant may aggregate data among groups to demonstrate a violation of subdivision (a).

(j) This section applies as follows:

(1) To all cases in which judgment is not final.

(2) Commencing January 1, 2023, to all cases in which, at the time of the filing of a petition pursuant to subdivision (f) of Section 1473 raising a claim under this section, the petitioner is sentenced to death or to cases in which the motion is filed pursuant to Section 1473.7 because of actual or potential immigration consequences related to the conviction or sentence, regardless of when the judgment or disposition became final.

(3) Commencing January 1, 2024, to all cases in which, at the time of the filing of a petition pursuant to subdivision (f) of Section 1473 raising a claim under this section, the petitioner is currently serving a sentence in the state prison or in a county jail pursuant to subdivision (h) of Section 1170, or committed to the Division of Juvenile Justice for a juvenile disposition, regardless of when the judgment or disposition became final.

(4) Commencing January 1, 2025, to all cases filed pursuant to Section 1473.7 or subdivision (f) of Section 1473 in which judgment became final for a felony conviction or juvenile disposition that resulted in a commitment to the Division of Juvenile Justice on or after January 1, 2015.

(5) Commencing January 1, 2026, to all cases filed pursuant to Section 1473.7 or subdivision (f) of Section 1473 in which judgment was for a felony conviction or juvenile disposition that resulted in a commitment to the Division of Juvenile Justice, regardless of when the judgment or disposition became final.

(k) For petitions that are filed in cases for which judgment was entered before January 1, 2021, and only in those cases, if the petition is based on a violation of paragraph (1) or (2) of subdivision (a), the petitioner shall be entitled to relief as provided in subdivision (e), unless the state proves beyond a reasonable doubt that the violation did not contribute to the judgment.

Case Law:

In denying petitioner's motion under the California Racial Justice Act of 2020, the trial court did not apply the correct legal standard at the prima facie stage. The trial court's review of petitioner's motion went beyond the confines of determining whether it stated a prima facie case. The trial court's statements during the hearing on petitioner's motion demonstrated that it weighed all the evidence presented during the earlier preliminary hearing—both favorable and unfavorable to petitioner's motion—rather than focusing on and accepting as true the evidence that supported petitioner. The focus at the prima facie stage of the Racial Justice Act proceedings should have been on the allegations and supporting evidence proffered by petitioner, not evidence supporting the People's argument. (Finley v. Superior Court (2023) 95 Cal.App.5th 12.)

A jury found defendant guilty of attempted murder and fleeing a pursuing peace officer's motor vehicle while driving recklessly and further found that he personally used a handgun in committing the attempted murder. The Court of Appeal reversed the judgment and remanded for further proceedings. The court held that the Legislature acted within its law-making authority when it declared in the Racial Justice Act (Pen. Code § 745) that the use of racially discriminatory language in a criminal trial constitutes a miscarriage of justice. In the current case, the prosecutor violated the statute when she referred to defendant's complexion and ambiguous ethnic presentation as reasons to doubt his credibility, and defense counsel was ineffective for failing to bring that statutory violation to the attention of the trial court at the earliest possible opportunity. Because the trial court had not yet had the opportunity to exercise its discretion to select which of the enumerated remedies it would impose, the matter was remanded for the trial court to exercise its discretion in that regard. (People v. Simmons (2023) 96 Cal.App.5th 323.)

Defendant forfeited review on direct appeal of a claim under the California Racial Justice Act, Pen. Code § 745, (as amended by AB 1118 (2023-2024 Reg. Sess.), because defendant failed to make a motion before entry of judgment. The legislative history of amendments indicates that the appellate courts retain discretionary authority to apply the general forfeiture rule to a claim that could have been, but was not, presented in the trial court. Defendant's arguments regarding constitutional issues and the futility of objection did not excuse forfeiture because the claim did not present a pure question of law and the record did not demonstrate either that defendant could not object or that doing so would have been futile. There was no basis to stay and remand the case because defendant did not identify what factual development might be needed in the trial court. (People v. Lashon (2024) 98 Cal.App.5th 804.)

In a capital murder case, defendant—a black man—file a "Motion for a Hearing & Relief Pursuant to the Racial Justice Act" claiming the District Attorney's decision to seek the death penalty violated the California Racial Justice Act of 2020. Defendant argued that pursuant to the Act, he could not be charged with a more serious offense than defendants of other races who have engaged in similar conduct and were similarly situated. The trial court denied the motion determining that defendant failed to satisfy the first prong of the following two-prong test: (1) that defendant personally was being charged more harshly than similarly situated defendants of other races or ethnicities; and (2) statistical evidence shows a historic pattern of racial inequality in Riverside County's capital charging practice. The Third District Court of Appeal reversed, ruling that based on the evidence presented in this case, which included (1) factual examples of nonminority defendants who committed murder but were not charged with the death penalty in cases involving similar conduct and who were similarly situated, e.g. had prior records or committed multiple murders, and (2) statistical evidence that there was a history of racial disparity in charging the death penalty by the District Attorney, and that defendant had met his burden of establishing a prima facie case under P.C. § 745(a)(3). The trial court should have ordered an evidentiary hearing at which the District Attorney could produce evidence of the relevant factors that were used to determine the charges against the nonminority defendants who were involved in similar conduct, and who were similarly situated to defendant, and to provide any race-neutral reasons that it considered in deciding to charge defendant with the death penalty in this case. (Mosby vs. Superior Court (2024) 99 Cal.App.5th 106.)

The defendant Tommy Bonds was the subject of a traffic stop by an officer of the San Diego Police Department (SDPD). The stop led to defendant's arrest on a misdemeanor concealed firearm violation. From the outset, defendant believed he had been stopped because he was Black. During a later hearing to address defendant's Racial Justice Act claim, the officer testified that race played no role in his decision to stop defendant's vehicle because he could not "see what race was in that vehicle." Accepting the officer's statement as credible, the court ruled it could not find that the officer exhibited any bias because of defendant's race. The Court first noted that scope of its decision is narrow. In denying defendant's motion, the trial court employed reasoning that ignores a central premise of the Racial Justice Act—that bias can be unconscious and implied as well as conscious and express. By relying on its conclusion that the officer was not lying when he said he could not discern the race of the occupants in defendant's vehicle, the court ignored the possibility that the officer's actions were a product of an implicit bias that associated things the officer did know—the location of the stop and the clothing defendant was wearing—with race. Accordingly, the Court issued a writ directing the court to conduct a new hearing at which it considers whether the officer's actions in initiating and conducting the traffic stop exhibited implied bias on the basis of race. (4) If a warning or citation was issued, the warning provided or violation cited.

(5) If an arrest was made, the offense charged.

(6) The perceived race or ethnicity, gender, and approximate age of the person stopped, provided that the identification of these characteristics shall be based on the observation and perception of the peace officer making the stop, and the information shall not be requested from the person stopped. For motor vehicle stops, this paragraph only applies to the driver, unless any actions specified under paragraph (7) apply in relation to a passenger, in which case the characteristics specified in this paragraph shall also be reported for him or her.

(7) Actions taken by the peace officer during the stop, including, but not limited to, the following:

(B) Whether the peace officer searched the person or any property, and, if so, the basis for the search and the type of contraband or evidence discovered, if any.

(C) Whether the peace officer seized any property and, if so, the type of property that was seized and the basis for seizing the property.

(c) If more than one peace officer performs a stop, only one officer is required to collect and report to his or her agency the information specified under subd. (b).

(d) State and local law enforcement agencies shall not report the name, address, social security number, or other unique personal identifying information of persons stopped, searched, or subjected to a property seizure, for purposes of this section. Notwithstanding any other law, the data reported shall be available to the public, except for the badge number or other unique identifying information of the peace officer involved, which shall be released to the public only to the extent the release is permissible under state law.

(e) Not later than January 1, 2017, the Attorney General, in consultation with stakeholders, including the Racial and Identity Profiling Advisory Board (RIPA) established pursuant to P.C. § 13519.4(j)(1), federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies and community, professional, academic, research, and civil and human rights organizations, shall issue regulations for the collection and reporting of data required under subd. (b). The regulations shall specify all data to be reported, and provide standards, definitions, and technical specifications to ensure uniform reporting practices across all reporting agencies. To the best extent possible, such regulations should be compatible with any similar federal data collection or reporting program.

(1) For purposes of this section, "peace officer," as defined in P.C. §§ 830 et seq., is limited to members of the California Highway Patrol, a city or county law enforcement agency, and California state or university educational institutions. "Peace officer," as used in this section, does not include probation officers and officers in a custodial setting.

(2) For purposes of this section, "stop" means any detention by a peace officer of a person, or any peace officer interaction with a person in which the peace officer conducts a search, including a consensual search, of the person's body or property in the person's possession or control.

Pen. Code § 13012: Reporting Requirements for the Department of Justice:

(a) The annual report of the Department of Justice provided for in P.C. § 13010 (see below) shall contain statistics showing all of the following:

(1) The amount and the types of offenses known to the public authorities.

(2) The personal and social characteristics of criminals and delinquents.

(3) The administrative actions taken by law enforcement, judicial, penal, and correctional agencies or institutions, including those in the juvenile justice system, in dealing with criminals or delinquents.

(4) The administrative actions taken by law enforcement, prosecutorial, judicial, penal, and correctional agencies, including those in the juvenile justice system, in dealing with minors who are the subject of a petition or hearing in the juvenile court to transfer their case to the jurisdiction of an adult criminal court or whose cases are directly filed or otherwise initiated in an adult criminal court.

(A) The total number of each of the following:

(i) Citizen complaints received by law enforcement agencies under P.C. § 832.5.

(ii) Citizen complaints alleging criminal conduct of either a felony or misdemeanor.

(iii) Citizen complaints alleging racial or identity profiling, as defined in P.C. § 13519.4(e). These statistics shall be disaggregated by the specific type of racial or identity profiling alleged, such as based on a consideration of race, color, ethnicity, national origin, religion, gender identity or expression, sexual orientation, or mental or physical disability.

(B) The statistics reported under this paragraph shall provide, for each category of complaint identified under subpara. (A), the number of complaints within each of the following disposition categories:

(i) "Sustained," which means that the investigation disclosed sufficient evidence to prove the truth of allegation in the complaint by preponderance of evidence.

(ii) "Exonerated," which means that the investigation clearly established that the actions of the personnel that formed the basis of the complaint are not a violation of law or agency policy.

The reports shall not disclose the identity of peace officers.

Note: P.C. § 13010, effective on 1/1/2010, mandates certain data collection requirements for the Department of Justice.

Pen. Code § 13519.4: Racial and Identity Profiling; Guidelines, Training, and Legislative Findings:

(a) & (b): Amended section mandates the development and dissemination of guidelines and training for all peace officers on the racial and cultural differences among residents, stressing the understanding and respect for racial, identity, and cultural differences and the development of effective, non-combative methods of carrying out law enforcement duties in a diverse racial, identity, and cultural environment. The training is to include instruction on racial, identity, and cultural diversity, fostering a mutual respect and cooperation between law enforcement and members of all racial, identity, and cultural groups.

(c) Definitions are provided as follows:

(1) "Disability," "gender," "nationality," "religion," and "sexual orientation" have the same meaning as in P.C. § 422.55.

(2) "Culturally diverse" and "cultural diversity" include, but are not limited to, disability, gender, nationality, religion, and sexual orientation issues.

(3) "Racial" has the same meaning as "race or ethnicity" in P.C. § 422.55.

(4) "Stop" has the same meaning as in Gov't Code § 12525.5(g)(2).

(d) The Legislature finds and declares as follows:

(1) The working men and women in California law enforcement risk their lives every day. The people of California greatly appreciate the hard work and dedication of peace officers in protecting public safety. The good name of these officers should not be tarnished by the actions of those few who commit discriminatory practices.

(2) Racial or identity profiling is a practice that presents a great danger to the fundamental principles of our Constitution and a democratic society. It is abhorrent and cannot be tolerated.

(3) Racial or identity profiling alienates people from law enforcement, hinders community policing efforts, and causes law enforcement to lose credibility and trust among the people whom law enforcement is sworn to protect and serve.

(4) Pedestrians, users of public transportation, and vehicular occupants who have been stopped, searched, interrogated, and subjected to a property seizure by a peace officer for no reason other than the color of their skin, national origin, religion, gender identity or expression, housing status, sexual orientation, or mental or physical disability are the victims of discriminatory practices.

(5) It is the intent of the Legislature in enacting the changes to this section made by the act that added this paragraph that additional training is required to address the pernicious practice of racial or identity profiling and that enactment of this section is in no way dispositive of the issue of how the state should deal with racial or identity profiling.

(e) "Racial or identity profiling," for purposes of this section, is the consideration of, or reliance on, to any degree, actual or perceived race, color, ethnicity, national origin, age, religion, gender identity or expression, sexual orientation, or mental or physical disability in deciding which persons to subject to a stop or in deciding upon the scope or substance of law enforcement activities following a stop, except that an officer may consider or rely on characteristics listed in a specific suspect description. The activities include, but are not limited to, traffic or pedestrian stops, or actions during a stop, such as asking questions, frisks, consensual and nonconsensual searches of a person or any property, seizing any property, removing vehicle occupants during a traffic stop, issuing a citation, and making an arrest.

(f) A peace officer shall not engage in racial or identity profiling.

(g) Every peace officer in this state shall participate in expanded training as prescribed and certified by the Commission on Peace Officers Standards and Training.

(h) The curriculum shall be evidence-based and shall include and examine evidence-based patterns, practices, and protocols that make up racial or identity profiling, including implicit bias. This training shall prescribe evidenced-based patterns, practices, and protocols that prevent racial or identity profiling. In developing the training, the commission shall consult with the Racial and Identity Profiling Advisory Board established pursuant to subd. (j). The course of instruction shall include, but not be limited to, significant consideration of each of the following subjects:

(1) Identification of key indices and perspectives that make up racial, identity, and cultural differences among residents in a local community.

(2) Negative impact of intentional and implicit biases, prejudices, and stereotyping on effective law enforcement, including examination of how historical perceptions of discriminatory enforcement practices have harmed police-community relations and contributed to injury, death, disparities in arrest detention and incarceration rights, and wrongful convictions.

(3) The history and role of the civil and human rights movement and struggles and their impact on law enforcement.

(4) Specific obligations of peace officers in preventing, reporting, and responding to discriminatory or biased practices by fellow peace officers.

(5) Perspectives of diverse, local constituency groups and experts on particular racial, identity, and cultural and police-community relations issues in a local area.

(6) The prohibition against racial or identity profiling in subd. (f).

(i) Once the initial basic training is completed, each peace officer in California as described in P.C. § 13510(a) who adheres to the standards approved by the commission shall be required to complete a refresher course every five years thereafter, or on a more frequent basis if deemed necessary, in order to keep current with changing racial, identity, and cultural trends.

(1) Beginning July 1, 2016, the Attorney General shall establish the "Racial and Identity Profiling Advisory Board" (RIPA) for the purpose of eliminating racial and identity profiling, and improving diversity and racial and identity sensitivity in law enforcement.

(2) RIPA shall include the members as specifically listed in subpara. (A) through (M), with duties and limitations as listed in subpara. (3)(A) through (F) and subpara. (4) through (8). (See the section)

Forfeiture of an Issue by Failure to Object:

Rule:

"It is hornbook law that an objection to evidence is forfeited for purposes of appeal if not raised below." (People v. Jimenez (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 712, 723; citing Evid. Code § 353(a).)

Evid. Code § 353: A verdict or finding shall not be set aside, nor shall the judgment or decision based thereon be reversed, by reason of the erroneous admission of evidence unless:

> (a) There appears of record an objection to or a motion to exclude or to strike the evidence that was timely made and so stated as to make clear the specific ground of the objection or motion; and
> (b) The court which passes upon the effect of the error or errors is of the opinion that the admitted evidence should have been excluded on the ground stated and that the error or errors complained of resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

"'Ordinarily, a criminal defendant who does not challenge an assertedly erroneous ruling of the trial court in that court has forfeited his or her right to raise the claim on appeal,' and '[t]he purpose of this rule is to encourage parties to bring errors to the attention of the trial court, so that they may be corrected.'" (People v. Rorabaugh (2022) 74 Cal.App.5th 296, 314; quoting In re Sheena K. (2007) 40 Cal.4th 875, 880–881.)

> However, "Pen. Code, § 1538.5, subd. (h) permits defendant to bring a new suppression motion 'if there occur[s] an intervening change in the applicable law . . . in support of suppression." (Ibid, quoting People v. Superior Court* (Edmonds) (1971) 4 Cal.3rd 605, 611.)

Case Law:

Defense counsel's failure to object to the admissibility of a non-Mirandized statement forfeited the issue on appeal. (People v. Alvarez (2022) 75 Cal.App.5th 28, 33-34; defendant's un-Mirandized admission, in response to a deputy sheriff's question whether a black plastic bag near the scene of defendant's unlawful entry of a residence, and important on the issue of his intend in breaking into the residence, was not challenged by defense counsel.)

In People v. Ray (1996) 13 Cal.4th 313, at p.339, the Supreme Court declined to consider a claim of involuntariness for the first time on appeal. (Id. at p. 339.) The Court explained that, because the defendant had not moved to suppress based on involuntariness, "the parties had no incentive to fully litigate this theory below, and the trial court had no opportunity to resolve material factual disputes and make necessary factual findings. Under such circumstances, a claim of involuntariness generally will not be addressed for the first time on appeal. [Citations.]" (Accord; People v. Cruz (2008) 44 Cal.4th 636, 669.)

Exception: Legal Question on Undisputed Facts:

Despite the lack of an objection at the trial court level, an appellate court "'may consider new arguments that present pure questions of law on undisputed facts. [Citations.]'" (People v. Jimenez (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 712, 723, quoting People v. Runyan (2012) 54 Cal.4th 849, 859, fn. 3; and citing People v. Hines (1997) 15 Cal.4th 997, 1061.)

This is apparently a "discretionary" call which a court is more prone to make when the evidence at issue deals with a defendant's constitutional rights. (Ibid.)

The Court in Jimenez also noted that "(g)iven that we have such discretion, one sound reason to exercise it is to head off a future habeas corpus petition asserting ineffective assistance of counsel. (Id., at p. 724, citing In re Spencer S. (2009) 176 Cal.App.4th 1315, 1323.)

Note, however, that the California Supreme Court in People v. Kelly (1992) 1 Cal.4th 495, at p. 519, fn. 5, "has mused about whether the rule that an objection is not required when the evidence of involuntariness is uncontradicted 'has survived in light of subsequent authority and the development of the law of ineffective assistance of counsel . . . .'" The Court, in Kelly, did not answer this question. (People v. Jimenez, supra, at pp. 724-725.)

"To sum up, 'because "special policy considerations preclude the use of involuntary statements," review of the admissibility of such statements based on the evidence that is not in conflict is permitted despite the lack of a timely objection. [Citation.]'" (Id., at p. 725; quoting People v. Cahill (1994) 22 Cal.App.4th 296, 309, fn. 3.)

Defendant's conviction was reversed on the ground that statements he made (and that a witness made) were involuntary, even though "defendant's attorney did not make a sufficient and timely objection . . . ." It was noted that "the evidence was uncontroverted that the prior statements of defendant and (the witness) were coerced . . . ." (People v. Underwood (1964) 61 Cal.2d 113, 126.)

The California Supreme Court held in In re Cameron (1968) 68 Cal.2nd 487, at p. 503: "From the record at the trial it appears as a matter of law that the [defendant's] second confession was involuntary. In such a case, a defendant is not precluded from raising the issue on appeal even though he did not object in the trial court. [Citations.]"

Factual Innocence:

Penal Code § 1473.7(a)*: A person who is no longer in criminal custody may file a motion to vacate a conviction or sentence for any of the following reasons:

(2) Newly discovered evidence of actual innocence exists that requires vacation of the conviction or sentence as a matter of law or in the interests of justice.

The burden of proof is by a preponderance of the evidence. (Subd. (e)(1))

Case Law:

A motion to vacate a conviction may be filed if the person is no longer in criminal custody for the particular conviction. The Legislature did not intend to bar persons from moving under P.C. § 1473.7 when they are in custody for another, unrelated conviction. (People v. Rodriguez (2021), 68 Cal.App.5th 301.)

Justiciable Controversies Only*:

It is a rule of law that: "'California courts decide only justiciable controversies and do not resolve lawsuits that are not based on an actual controversy.' (Bichai v. Dignity Health (2021) 61 Cal.App.5th 869, 879. . . .) For example, 'unripeness and mootness describe situations where there is no justiciable controversy.' (Ibid.) 'Where there is no justiciable controversy the proper remedy is not to render judgment for one side or the other, but to dismiss.' (Connerly v. Schwarzenegger (2007) 146 Cal.App.4th 739, 752. . . .)" (Los Angeles Police Protective League v. City of Los Angeles (2022) 78 Cal.App.5th 1081, 1092, fn. 6.)

Expert Testimony; Admissibility*:

As noted in the federal district court of appeal decision of Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006.); "(a) party seeking to offer expert testimony must establish that the testimony satisfies Rule 702 of the Federal Rules of Evidence. Rule 702 provides: "A witness who is qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education may testify in the form of an opinion or otherwise if:

> (a) The expert's scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will help the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue;
> (b) The testimony is based on sufficient facts or data;
>
> (c) The testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods; and
> (d) The expert has reliably applied the principles and methods to the facts of the case.

"As gatekeepers, trial judges make a preliminary assessment as to whether expert testimony is admissible. Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharms., Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 589, 597, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993). Specifically, 'the trial judge must ensure that any and all scientific testimony or evidence admitted is not only relevant, but reliable.' Id. at 589. To meet the requirements of Rule 702, an expert must be qualified, the expert's opinion must be reliable in that it is based on sufficient facts or data and is the product of reliable principles and methods, and the expert's testimony must fit the case such that the expert's opinion is relevant. Id. at 589-95. The Rule 702 inquiry is 'flexible.' Id. at 594. The focus 'must be solely on principles and methodology, not on the conclusions that they generate.' Id. at 595. Because the requirements of Rule 702 are conditions for determining whether expert testimony is admissible, a party offering expert testimony must show by a preponderance of the evidence that the expert's testimony satisfies Rule 702. Fed. R. Evid. 104(a); see also Lust v. Merrell Dow Pharms. Inc., 89 F.3rd 594, 598 (9th Cir. 1996)." (Ibid.)

The "Kelly/Frye" (People v. Kelly (1976) 17 Cal.3rd 24; Frye v. United States (D.C. Cir. 1923) 293 F. 1013.) standard does not apply to a DNA data base search used to identify a possible suspect. Requiring inmates to supply a DNA sample, even though not a criminal suspect at the time of the taking of the sample, is a constitutional "search" pursuant to Pen. Code § 295. (People v. Johnson (2006) 139 Cal.App.4th 1135.)

The trial court was held not to have erred in relying on expert testimony presented at a Kelly (i.e., "Kelly/Frye:" People v. Kelly (1976) 17 Cal.3rd 24; Frye v. United States (D.C. Cir. 1923) 293 F. 1013.) hearing in determining that a method of DNA analysis, which had been used on blood from a murder scene, had gained general acceptance. One expert was not shown to be biased, while another expert who had a vested professional interest in the method's acceptance did not fail to set forth the scientific community's views fairly and impartially while including any opposing scientific views,. Further, the prosecution supported the latter expert's testimony with literature and legal decisions. The evidence was also held not to be unduly prejudicial under Evid. Code § 352 because it was highly probative on the issue of identity and would not have caused the jury to decide the case on an improper basis. Lastly, due process was not violated because the jury was instructed with CALCRIM No. 332; i.e., that it was not required to accept expert testimony. (People v. Davis (2022) 75 Cal.App.5th 694.)

Juvenile Cases:

General Procedures:

"Generally, any person under the age of 18 who is charged with violating a law is considered a 'minor.' (See [Welf. & Inst. Code] § 602.) A 'juvenile court' is a separate, civil division of the superior court. ([Welf. & Inst. Code] § 246.) A prosecutor charges a minor with an offense by filing a juvenile petition, rather than a criminal complaint. (See [Welf. & Inst. Code] §§ 653.7, 655.) Minors 'admit' or 'deny' an offense, rather than plead 'guilty' or 'not guilty.' (§ 702.3.) There are no 'trials,' per se, in juvenile court, rather there is a 'jurisdictional hearing' presided over by a juvenile court judge. ([Welf. & Inst. Code] § 602.) The jurisdictional hearing is equivalent to a 'bench trial' in a criminal court. (See Cal. Rules of Court, Rule 5.780.) Although a juvenile court judge adjudicates alleged law violations, there are no 'conviction[s]' in juvenile court. ([Welf. & Inst. Code] § 203.) Rather, the juvenile court determines—under the familiar beyond the reasonable doubt standard and under the ordinary rules of evidence—whether the allegations are 'true' and if the minor comes within its jurisdiction. (See [Welf. & Inst. Code] § 602 et seq.)

"There is no 'sentence,' per se, in juvenile court. Rather a judge can impose a wide variety of rehabilitation alternatives after conducting a 'dispositional hearing,' which is equivalent to a sentencing hearing in a criminal court. ([Welf. & Inst. Code,] § 725.5; In re Devin J. (1984) 155 Cal.App.3rd 1096, 1100 . . . .) In the more serious cases, a juvenile court can 'commit' a minor to juvenile hall or to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ), formerly known as the California Youth Authority (CYA). In order to commit a minor to the DJJ, the record must show that less restrictive alternatives would be ineffective or inappropriate. (In re Teofilio A. (1989) 210 Cal.App.3d 571, 576 . . . .) The DJJ, rather than the court, sets a parole consideration date. DJJ commitments can range from one year or less for nonserious offenses, and up to seven years for the most serious offenses, including murder. (See Cal. Code Regs., tit. 15, §§ 4951–4957.) A minor committed to DJJ must generally be discharged no later than 23 years of age. ([Welf. & Inst. Code] § 607, subd. (f).)" (In re M.S. (2019) 32 Cal.App.5th 1177, 1192-1193; quoting People v. Vela (2018) 21 Cal.App.5th 1099, 1104–1105.)

The Exclusionary Rule: The exclusionary rule applies to juvenile proceedings that are filed pursuant to the Welfare and Institutions Code. (In re William G. (1985) 40 Cal.3rd 550, 567, fn. 17; In re Tyrell J. (1994) 8 Cal.4th 68, 75-76.)

Civil Liability: A law enforcement officer who violates a subject's Fourth Amendment rights also, in addition to having the resulting evidence exposed to possible suppression in a criminal case, potentially opens him or herself up to civil liability.

*The Civil Rights Act; 42 U.S.C. § 1983: When filed in federal court: "The Civil Rights Act codified in 42 U.S.C. § 1983 provides a cause of action against state officials who deprive a plaintiff of her federal constitutional rights." (Sinclair v. City of Seattle (9th Cir. 2023) 61 F.4th 674, 678.)

See "Federal Civil 42 U.S.C. § 1983 Civil Liability and Qualified Immunity*," below.

Integral Participation Requirement:

"An officer can be held liable for a constitutional violation only when there is a showing of 'integral participation' or 'personal involvement' in the unlawful conduct, as opposed to mere presence at the scene." (Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 879; citing Jones v. Williams (9th Cir. 2002) 297 F.3rd 930, 935-936.)

"(I)integral participation does not require that each officer's actions themselves rise to the level of a constitutional violation." (Bonivert v. City of Clarkston, supra, citing Boyd v. Benton County (9th Cir. 2004) 374 F.3rd 773, 780.)

In Bonivert, where it was alleged that deputies from another agency backing up the original agency helped to develop a plan of entry with the initial officers, provided armed backup to the supervising officer as he broke into defendant's back door, and entered the home on the officer's heels, it was held that the backup officers were also potentially liable for an illegal entry into a residence.

Due Process: Violating a person's "due process" rights will also generate civil liability for a police officer, as well as for the agency that employs the officer:

Under the state-created "danger doctrine," police officers violated the constitutional right to due process of a victim of domestic violence when the supervisor on the scene remarked positively about the alleged abuser and his family while simultaneously ordering other officers not to arrest the abuser despite the presence of probable cause, thus acting with deliberate indifference to the risk of future abuse when they ignored the risk of the abuser's violent tendencies. Nonetheless, the officers were entitled to qualified immunity under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 because at the time of these events, a reasonable officer would not have known that such conduct violated the due process rights of the domestic violence victim. (Martinez v. City of Clovis (9th Cir. 2019) 943 F.3rd 1260.)

See also Martinez v. High (2024) 91 F.4th 1022, reaching the same "qualified immunity" result in favor of another Clovis P.D. officer who deliberately passed along confidential information concerning the abuse that was on-going.

See "The Failure to Protect: 'Danger Doctrine,'" under "The Bill of Rights Protections" (Chapter 7), below.

Qualified Immunity:

General Rules:

"A government official (who is) sued under (42 U.S.C.) § 1983 is entitled to qualified immunity unless the official violated a statutory or constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct." (See Ashcroft v. al-Kidd (2011) 563 U.S. 731, 735 [131 S.Ct. 2074; 179 L.Ed.2nd 1149]; Pearson v. Callahan (2009) 555 U.S. 223, 231 [129 S.Ct. 808; 172 L.Ed.2nd 565; District of Columbia v. Wesby et al. (2018) 583 U.S. 48, 65 [138 S.Ct. 577; 199 L. Ed.2nd 453]; West v. City of Caldwell (9th Cir. 2019) 831 F.3rd 978, 982-983; Tuuamalemalo v. Greene (9th Cir. 2019) 946 F.3rd 471, 476-477; Tobias v. Arteaga (9th Cir. 2021) 996 F.3rd 571, 579; Andrews v. City of Henderson (9th Cir. 2022) 35 F.4th 710, 714-715; Hopson v. Alexander (9th Cir. 2023) 71 F.4th 692.)

"Qualified immunity protects government officials acting in good faith and under the color of state law from suit under § 1983. . . Qualified immunity bars suits against government officials when either (1) no deprivation of constitutional rights was alleged or (2) the law dictating that specific constitutional right was not yet clearly established. . . . Courts may begin with either prong of the analysis. (Cates v. Stroud (9th Cir. 2020) 976 F.3rd 972, 978; citing Pearson v. Callahan, supra, at pgs. 231 & 236.)

> Qualified immunity balances "the need to hold public officials accountable when they exercise power irresponsibly and the need to shield officials from harassment, distraction, and liability when they perform their duties reasonably." (Pearson v. Callahan, supra; Martinez v. City of Clovis (9th Cir. 2019) 943 F.3rd 1260, 1274-1275.)

"The Supreme Court long ago laid down the principle that qualified immunity protects government officials 'from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'" (Thompson v. Rahr (9th Cir. WA 2018) 885 F.3rd 582, 587-590; quoting Harlow v. Fitzgerald (1982) 457 U.S. 800, 818 [102 S.Ct. 2727; 73 L.Ed.2nd 396]; Cortesluna v. Leon (9th Cir. 2020) 979 F.3rd 645, 651-652.)

On the issue of determining the propriety of qualified immunity in a given case, "requiring the comparing of a given case with existing statutory or constitutional precedent, is quintessentially a question of law for the judge, not the jury. A bifurcation of duties is unavoidable. Only the jury can decide the disputed factual issues, while only the judge can decide whether the right was clearly established once the factual issues are resolved. "'The controlling distinction between the power of the court and that of the jury is that the former is the power to determine the law and the latter to determine the facts.'" (Morales v. Fry (9th Cir. 2017) 873 F.3rd 817, 823; quoting Dimick v. Schiedt (1935) 293 U.S. 474, 486 [55 S.Ct. 296; 79 L.Ed. 603].)

The fact that there is a genuine issue to debate does not end the inquiry. "(T)he existence of a genuine dispute about the reasonableness of an officer's use of force does not preclude granting qualified immunity or eliminate any basis for an immediate appeal of denial of qualified immunity." (Isayeva v. Sacramento Sheriff's Department (9th Cir. 2017) 872 F.3rd 938, 944-950.)

"Defining the clearly established law with 'specificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context, where it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'" (Seidner v. De Vries (9th Cir. 2022) 39 F.4th 591, 601; quoting City of Tahlequah v. Bond (Oct. 18, 2021) __ U.S. __ [142 S.Ct. 9; 211 L.Ed.2nd 170].)

An exception to these rules might be when the officer at issue actually knew of the relevant rules, even though the rule at issue might not yet have been clearly established. Justice Brennan's brief concurrence in Harlow v. Fitzgerald (1982) 457 U.S. 800, 821 [102 S.Ct. 2727; 73 L.Ed.2d 396].), notes that although the qualified-immunity doctrine focuses on the objective legal reasonableness of an official's conduct, it does "not allow the official who actually knows that he was violating the law to escape liability for his actions, even if he could not 'reasonably have been expected' to know what he actually did know." (Frasier v. Evans (10th Cir. 2021) 992 F.3rd 1003.)

> The Tenth Circuit, in Frasier v. Evans, disagreed with this theory, holding that the issue as to whether a rule was "clearly established" is an objective one, making an individual officer's own subjective knowledge totally irrelevant, citing the majority opinion in Harlow as authority for this conclusion, and noting that "whatever training the officers received concerning the First Amendment was irrelevant to the clearly-established-law inquiry."

"Qualified immunity protects government officials 'from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.' Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818, 102 S. Ct. 2727, 73 L. Ed. 2d 396 (1982). It protects government officials 'unless (1) they violated a federal statutory or constitutional right, and (2) the unlawfulness of their conduct was "clearly established at the time."' District of Columbia v. Wesby, 583 U.S. 48, 62-63, 138 S. Ct. 577, 199 L. Ed. 2d 453 (2018) (quoting Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658, 664, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 182 L. Ed. 2d 985 (2012))." (Waid v. County of Lyon (9th Cir. 2023) 87 F.4th 383, 387.)

Defendant police officers not entitled to qualified immunity on the issue of whether they used unreasonable force by ordering an 83-year-old, 5'2", 117-pound, unarmed, completely compliant woman, to get on her knees and handcuffing her when it was suspected that she might be driving a stolen car. (Brown v. County of San Bernardino (9th Cir. 2023) 2023 U.S.App. LEXIS 2941; unpublished: Petition denied by U.S. Supreme Court, Dec. 11, 2023, 2023 U.S. LEXIS 4763.)

> But see the dissenting opinion where it was argued that the constitutionality of doing so was not "'beyond debate' by existing precedent," and that therefore, the officers were entitled to qualified immunity on the issue of whether the force used was unreasonable.

Note also, however, that the panel was unanimous on the issue of whether the officers were entitled to qualified immunity on the lawfulness of detaining (or arresting) the woman for auto theft, until it could be determined whether she was lawfully driving the car in question.

Two Steps:

An Appellate Court's "review of a grant of summary judgment based on qualified immunity involves two distinct steps: government officials are not (Italics added) entitled to qualified immunity if (1) the facts '[t]aken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury . . . show [that] the [defendants'] conduct violated a constitutional right' and (Italics added) (2) 'the right was clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation." (Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 871-872; quoting Saucier v. Katz (2001) 533 U.S. 194, 201 [121 S.Ct. 2151; 150 L.Ed.2nd 272]; Martinez v. City of Clovis (9th Cir. 2019) 943 F.3rd 1260, 1270. See also Pike v. Hester (9th Cir. Nev. 2018) 891 F.3rd 1131, 1137; Tuuamalemalo v. Greene (9th Cir. 2019) 946 F.3rd 471, 476-477; Cortesluna v. Leon (9th Cir. 2020) 979 F.3rd 645, 651-652; (Williamson v. City of National City (9th Cir. 2022) 23 F.4th 1146, 1151; Waid v. County of Lyon (9th Cir. 2023) 87 F.4th 383.)

"Qualified immunity applies either where there was no constitutional violation or where the constitutional violation was not clearly established." The Court has the discretion to consider these two questions in either order, "in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand." (Martinez v. City of Clovis, supra.)

The second step (i.e., the right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation) is never reached if a reasonable jury would necessarily find that the police officers used reasonable force in attempting to subdue the petitioner. (See dissenting opinion in Lombardo v. City of St. Louis (June 28, 2021) __ U.S. __, __ [141 S.Ct. 2239; 210 L.Ed.2nd 609].)

A plaintiff has the burden of showing that a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. To meet this burden, the plaintiff must allege facts that would permit a reasonable juror to find that: (1) the defendant (police officer) violated a constitutional right; and (2) the right was clearly established. (Habich v. Wayne County (6th Cir. 2023) 2023 U.S.App. LEXIS 8868.)

"At the summary judgment stage, '[t]he evidence of the non-movant is to be believed, and all justifiable inferences are to be drawn in his favor.'" (Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc. (1986) 477 U.S. 242, 255 [106 S.Ct. 2505; 91 L.Ed.2nd 202].); "see also Jesinger v. Nevada Fed. Credit Union, 24 F.3rd 1127, 1131 (9th Cir. 1994) (the court determines whether there is a genuine issue for trial but does not weigh the evidence or determine the truth of matters asserted). That said, '[w]hen opposing parties tell two different stories, one of which is blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it, a court should not adopt that version of the facts for purposes of ruling on a motion for summary judgment.' Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 380, 127 S.Ct. 1769, 167 L.Ed.2nd 686 (2007)." (Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006.); Seidner v. De Vries (9th Cir. 2022) 39 F.4th 591, 599-600.)

> The Court in Seidner notes that "flight" increases significantly the Government's interest in affecting a stop and detention. (Id., at p. 600; "(F)light increases the government's interest to use force to 'stop a suspect and show that flight from the law is no way to freedom.'" (Quoting County of Sacramento v. Lewis (1998) 523 U.S. 833, 853 [118 S.Ct. 1708; 140 L.Ed.2nd 1043].)

"The Supreme Court has 'warned against beginning with the first prong of the qualified-immunity analysis when it would unnecessarily wade into "difficult questions" of constitutional interpretation that have no effect on the outcome of the case.' Sjurset v. Button, 810 F.3rd 609, 615 (9th Cir. 2015) (quoting Pearson, 555 U.S. at 236-237). But the Supreme Court has also recognized that the two-step qualified immunity procedure 'is intended to further the development of constitutional precedent.' Horton ex rel. Horton v. City of Santa Maria, 915 F.3rd 592, 602 (9th Cir. 2019) (quoting Pearson, 555 U.S. at 237). Even in difficult cases, our court tends 'to address both prongs of qualified immunity where the "two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent' in an area where this court's guidance is . . . needed.'" Id. (quoting Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3rd 433, 440 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc))." (Martinez v. City of Clovis, supra, at p. 1270.)

Exception to the "general rule" that a court must view the facts in light most favorable to the Plaintiff:

> When deciding whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity, the court is generally bound to view the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff. However, in Scott v. Harris (2007) 550 U.S. 372, 380-381 [127 S.Ct. 1769; 167 L.Ed.2nd 686], the Supreme Court held that when video footage exists, the reviewing court need not credit the version of a party who claims facts that are "blatantly contradicted" by the videotape. Instead, the reviewing court should view the facts in the light depicted by the videotape. (Cunningham v. Shelby County (6th Cir. 2021) 944 F.3d 761.)
> > Sheriff's deputies in Cunningham were entitled to qualified immunity where the decedent, who had called 911 to report that she would shoot anyone who approached, came out of her house carrying what appeared to be a .45 caliber pistol (which was in fact a BB gun), and pointed it at the officers in her driveway.
>
> The district court's disregarding of plaintiff's claim that he had offered to exit his vehicle peaceably before officers unleashed a police dog on him was contradicted by an officer's bodycam footage of the arrest, providing an exception to the rule. (Hernandez v. Town of Gilbert (9th Cir. 2021) 989 F.3rd 739.)
> See also Hughes v. Rodriguez (9th Cir. 2022) 31 F.4th 1211, at p. 1218, the Ninth Circuit, citing Scott v. Harris, supra, where the Court noted that the district court had "properly relied on the bodycam footage and audio to the extent they 'blatantly contradicted' (Plaintiff) Hughes's deposition testimony" in determining whether the arresting officers had used excessive force in arresting him. The Court further noted other authority from other circuits to the same effect:
>
> > Coble v. City of White House (6th Cir. 2011) 634 F.3rd 865, 868-869; audio from dashcam footage, at least up to the point where the officer and the plaintiff were no longer within view of the dashcam.

Curran v. Aleshire (5th Cir. 2015) 800 F.3rd 656, 663; still photographs.

McManemy v. Tierney (8th Cir. 2020) 970 F.3rd 1034, 1038; taser log.

White v. Georgia (11th Cir. 2010) 380 Fed. App'x 796, 797; uncontradicted medical testimony.

Scott v. County of San Bernardino (9th Cir. 2018) 903 F.3rd 943, 952: Defendant officers' claim that the students' behavior in the classroom justified an arrest because there was reason to believe the students would engage in imminent fights was belied by an audio record of the encounter which "quite clearly contradicts the version of the story told by" the officers, the students being quiet and in control. (Cited in Andrews v. City of Henderson (9th Cir. 2022) 35 F.4th 710, 713, fn. 1.)

Note: The Court in Hughes v. Rodriguez, in a footnote (p. 1219, fn. 2.) further noted that "While the trier of fact may rely on the rule of falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus to decide that a witness who has lied about one material fact must be disbelieved as to all facts, . . . this rule is not a binding mandate, and is certainly not to be applied by judges ruling on motions for summary judgment. (Italics added.)

However, in Hughes v. Rodriguez, after one officer's bodycam was turned off, and a second not focused on plaintiff's arrest, the plaintiff's assertion that he was beaten by police after being handcuffed was only partly disputed (i.e., as to the duration, but not on the issue of whether it occurred at all) and, as such, on appeal from summary judgment for the defendant officers, had to be accepted as true. (Id., at pp. 1218-1220.)

"Clearly Established" Principles:

"A right is clearly established only if its contours are sufficiently clear that 'a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right." (Anderson v. Creighton (1987) 483 U.S. 635, 640 [97 L.Ed.2nd 523]; Tuuamalemalo v. Greene (9th Cir. 2019) 946 F.3rd 471, 477.)

"Although 'a case directly on point' is not necessarily required, a rule is only clearly established if it has been 'settled' by 'controlling authority' or 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' that 'clearly prohibit[s] the officer's conduct in the particular circumstances,' with 'a high degree of specificity.'" (Hopson v. Alexander (9th Cir. 2023) 71 F.4th 692, 697; quoting District of Columbia v. Wesby (2018) 583 U.S. 48, 64 [138 S.Ct. 577; 199 L. Ed.2nd 453])

> Per the Ninth Circuit: "These guideposts, which the Supreme Court has insistently fixed in many cases, have special relevance in the Fourth Amendment context. See Mullenix v. Luna, 577 U.S. 7, 12, 136 S. Ct. 305, 193 L. Ed. 2d 255 (2015) (per curiam). Fourth Amendment violations generally, and excessive force claims more specifically, can involve situations 'in which the result[s] depend[] very much on the facts of each case.' Plumhoff (v. The often fact-dependent nature of judicial decision-making in this area can make it difficult for officers to know in advance whether their actions will be found unlawful. See Mullenix, 577 U.S. at 12. Plaintiffs asserting excessive force claims must thus point to an existing rule that 'squarely governs' the facts at issue and that moves the officer's actions outside the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.' Brosseau, 543 U.S. at 201 (quotation omitted); see also Rivas-Villegas v. We do not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate. The U.S. Supreme Court held in a 7-to-1 decision that Texas prison guards can be sued over claims that they placed a mentally ill inmate in cells covered in feces and raw sewage, reversing a decision from the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeal that shielded the guards under the doctrine of qualified immunity. The case stems from six days that inmate Trent Taylor spent at a psychiatric prison unit in Lubbock, Texas, where guards first placed him in a cell covered in what court documents described as "massive amounts of feces." After days of refusing to eat or drink for fear that his food would be contaminated, Taylor was moved to a separate cell without a bed. There, he was left to sleep in naked in a pool of sewage after a drain in the cell overflowed. The Fifth Circuit had ruled that the guards could not be held responsible because there was no "clearly established law" that prisoners cannot be held in such conditions for the specific time period of six days. The Supreme Court rejected that finding, holding that "no reasonable correctional officer could have concluded that, under the extreme circumstances of this case, it was constitutionally permissible to house Taylor in such deplorably unsanitary conditions for such an extended period of time." Per the Supreme Court, "a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question" (citing Hope* v. *Pelzer (2002) 536 U. S. 730, 741 [122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2nd 666].) (Taylor v. Riojas (Nov. 2, 2020) __ U.S. __ [141 S.Ct. 52; 208 L.Ed.2nd 164].)

> Note: The ruling in this case seems to say that even though there may not be a specific prior case directly on point, "obvious clarity" may be found based upon general case law, putting any "reasonable" officer on notice that what he is doing constitutes "cruel and unusual" activity.

In a companion case to the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna (Oct. 18, 2021) __ U.S.__, __ [142 S.Ct. 4; 211 L.Ed.2nd 164].), the High Court reversed where it was held by the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeal (Oklahoma), when the officers involved were sued by the decedent's estate, that the officers who shot and killed a hammer-wielding, intoxicated suspect, were not entitled to qualified immunity. In reversing the 10th Circuit, the Court held that it was unnecessary to decide whether the police officers involved did in fact violate the Fourth Amendment in the first place, or whether they recklessly created a situation that required deadly force. (It was alleged that by stepping towards the decedent and cornering him in the garage, the officers "recklessly" caused him to react by grabbing the hammer.) On this record, the officers plainly did not violate any clearly established law. The officers engaged in a conversation with the decedent, followed him into a garage at a distance of 6 to 10 feet, and did not yell at him until after he picked up a hammer and took a stance as if he was about to throw the hammer or charge at the officers. It was at this point that the officers shot and killed the decedent. Neither the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeal, nor respondent, was able to identify a single case law precedent finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances. The officers were thus entitled to qualified immunity. (City of Tahlequah v. Bond (Oct. 18, 2021) __ U.S. __ [142 S.Ct. 9; 211 L.Ed.2nd 179].)

> In so finding, the Supreme Court chastised the 10th Circuit, as the justices have so often done with the Ninth Circuit, telling the lower court: "We have repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality. (Citation) It is not enough that a rule be suggested by then-existing precedent; the 'rule's contours must be so well defined that it is "clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted."' Defendant police officers not entitled to qualified immunity on the issue of whether they used unreasonable force by ordering an 83-year-old, 5'2", 117-pound, unarmed, completely compliant woman, to get on her knees and handcuffing her when it was suspected that she might be driving a stolen car. (Brown v. County of San Bernardino (9th Cir. 2023) 2023 U.S.App. LEXIS 2941; Unpublished; Petition denied by U.S. Supreme Court, Dec. 11, 2023, 2023 U.S. LEXIS 4763.)

The Third Circuit Court of Appeal reviewed a lower court's denial of qualified immunity status for officers involved in the arrest of the deceased Thomas. Upon Thomas' arrest, he appeared to have recently ingested a large amount of crack cocaine for the purpose of hiding it from the arresting officers. Each officer present, two initially, and later five total, concluded that Thomas had likely ingested the drugs. Upon his arrest, but in violation of department policy, he was not taken to a hospital but booked into jail instead. Two hours after booking, Thomas passed out in his cell and was finally taken to the hospital. He died three days later without regaining consciousness. His Estate sued in federal court, claiming two separate Fourteenth Amendment causes of action: (1) Failure to Render Aid and Fourteenth Amendment and (2) Failure to Intervene. Thomas's Estate claimed a violation of the well-established constitutional right to medical care. To plead a violation of the right to medical care, an individual must allege (1) "a serious medical need" and (2) "acts or omissions by [individuals] that indicate a deliberate indifference to that need." In inadequate medical care cases, courts have specifically found deliberate indifference where objective evidence of a serious need for care was ignored and where "necessary medical treatment is delayed for non-medical reasons." The Court found the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on the claim of failure to render medical care. The Appeals Court then conducted a separate analysis regarding the second claim that "failure to intervene" involved a constitutional violation. However, it also concluded that no previous appeals court has recognized any such right, nor has the Supreme Court. Though courts have recognized a right to have a government actor intervene when the underlying constitutional violation involves excessive force or sexual assault of a person in custody or detention, courts have since concluded that there is no precedent, let alone a clearly established right to intervention in other contexts. Because there is not a clearly established right to intervention to prevent a violation of the right to medical care, the Officers were entitled to qualified immunity as to Thomas's Estate's second claim failure to intervene. (Thomas v. City of Harrisburg (3rd Cir. 2023) 88 F.4th 275.)

Qualified immunity from civil liability for using excessive force was denied where defendant police detective executed a search warrant on the plaintiff's apartment to look for property allegedly purchased with another deputy's stolen credit card, the detective and victim deputy were close friends, the detective purposely executed the warrant when he knew the plaintiff's children (by the deputy) were in her apartment, an excessive number of officers were used to execute the warrant, and plaintiff was handcuffed so tightly as to cause bruises. > > In Reichle v. Howards, the Supreme Court held that it was not clearly established that when an arrest is made with probable cause, a law enforcement officer might still be violating the arrestee's First Amendment freedom of speech where the arrestee

Where a sheriff's deputy was alleged to have aggressively grabbed plaintiff by the arm and pull him toward the curb, swinging him around, and then kick his feet out from under him causing him to fall to the pavement, after which a knee went into his back and a boot pushed his head into the pavement before being handcuffed, a jury found the force to be unreasonable under the circumstances. However, citing White v. Pauly (2017) 580 U.S. 73 [137 S.Ct. 548; 196 L.Ed.2nd 463], the Court held that where no case could be identified that would have put the sheriff's deputy on notice that the force he used was unreasonable, entitling the deputy to qualified immunity, the jury's verdict and damage award was set aside. (Shafer v. County of Santa Barbara (Padilla) (9th Cir. 2017) 868 F.3rd 1110, 1115-1118.)

Finding photographs of the plaintiffs' three female children, ages 5, 4 and 1½ years, showing the children lying while nude on a blanket with their buttocks and "some genitalia" showing, without any evidence to support a belief that the children were being sexually exploited, was insufficient to give defendant social worker sufficient "reasonable cause" to believe that the minors were "at imminent risk of serious bodily injury or molestation." Taking them from the custody of the plaintiffs was held to violate the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. With the applicable legal standards being clearly established, defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. (Demaree v. Pederson (9th Cir. 2018) 887 F.3rd 870, 878-884.)

In a case where the deceased son sued an officer for failing to recognize a medical condition, the Court held that to the extent the district court found that the officer's video (bodycam) evidence contradicted anything in the amended complaint, it rejected the son's conclusory allegations regarding whether the officers' conduct met the legal standard of a constitutional violation. In doing so, the district court acted within its discretion. The son's allegations suggested that the moving force behind the alleged constitutional violation against the detainee was not a failure to train, but the officers' failure to heed their training. The son did not show that the alleged unlawfulness of the officers' conduct was clearly established at the time they encountered the detainee. The son's argument concerning the deprivation of life claim had been waived. (J.K.J. v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2022) 42 F.4th 990.)

Absolute Immunity from Civil Liability*:

Law Enforcement Officer Cases Denying Absolute Immunity:

Where a courtroom marshal "shoved" the disruptive plaintiff out of a courtroom upon the order of the judge, the marshal was not entitled to absolute immunity when sued for using excessive force. However, the marshal is entitled to qualified immunity where a reasonable marshal under the circumstances could have believed that the Fourth Amendment permitted him to use the amount of force the plaintiff claimed the marshal used. (Brooks v. Clark County (9th Cir. 2016) 828 F.3rd 910.)

Under the procedures followed by an Oregon County Circuit Court, the "defendant release assistance officer" had not been delegated authority to make release decisions. Rather, pursuant to Or. Rev. Stat. § 135.235, he was authorized only to make recommendations to a judge. Therefore, the officer's action in submitting a bare unsigned warrant for plaintiff's arrest to a judge should have been seen as making a recommendation only that the warrant be signed. Accordingly, the officer was not entitled to absolute immunity in plaintiff's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 lawsuit. (Patterson v. Van Arsdel (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 826.)

Prosecutors:

Prosecutors enjoy absolute immunity from civil liability so long as the forced detention of a person, done for the purpose of interviewing her, is considered to be "advocacy conduct that is intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process." A videotape of undisputed validity should be treated as providing undisputed facts under a summary judgment motion. (Scott v. Harris (2007) 550 U.S. 372, 380-381 [127 S.Ct. 1769; 167 L.Ed.2nd 686]; Recchia v. City of Los Angeles Department of Animal Services (9th Cir. 2018) 889 F.3rd 553, 556, fn. 1.)

An officer is entitled to qualified immunity from a civil allegation of unlawful arrest so long as at the time of the arrest (1) there was probable cause for the arrest, or (2) "it is reasonably arguable that there was probable cause for arrest—that is, whether reasonable officers could disagree as to the legality of the arrest such that the arresting officer is entitled to qualified immunity." (Rosenbaum v. Washoe County (9th Cir. 2011) 663 F.3rd 1071, 1076; finding that because no Nevada statute applied to the plaintiff's "scalping" of tickets to a fair, his arrest was unlawful and because no reasonable officer would have believed so, the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity.)

Qualified immunity may be available, depending upon the circumstances, to off-duty police officers acting as private security guards, but only if it is shown that the officer was, under the circumstances, serving a public, governmental function even though being paid by a private company to provide private security. Where the off-duty officer/defendant in this case, while acting as a hotel security but in full uniform complete with his badge, failed to intercede to stop an assault on the plaintiff by other hotel security guards, he was held not to be entitled to qualified immunity for failing to have met this standard. Also, where a reasonable jury could find that the officer exposed the plaintiff to harm he would not otherwise have faced, that the harm was foreseeable, and the officer acted with deliberate indifference to the presence of a known danger that was created by his conduct, he was not entitled to qualified immunity. (Bracken v. Okura (9th Cir. 2017) 869 F.3rd 771.)

Qualified immunity for an Internal Revenue Service Agent was properly denied in an action alleging that the agent violated plaintiff's Fourth Amendment right to bodily privacy when, during the lawful execution of a search warrant at plaintiff's home, the agent (a female) escorted plaintiff (also a female) to the bathroom and monitored her while she relieved herself. Given the scope, manner, justification, and place of the search, a reasonable jury could conclude that the agent's actions were unreasonable and violated plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights. The agent's general interests in preventing destruction of evidence and promoting officer safety did not justify the scope or manner of the intrusion into plaintiff's most basic subject of privacy, her naked body. A reasonable officer in the agent's position would have known that such a significant intrusion into bodily privacy, in the absence of legitimate government justification, was unlawful. (Ioane v. Hodges (9th Cir. 2019) 939 F.3rd 945, 956-957.)

In a 42 USC § 1983 Fourth Amendment excessive force case involving two police officers who had responded to a 911 domestic disturbance call, and where one of the officers "took him . . . to the ground and handcuffed him," the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal erred, again, in reversing and remanding the district court's ruling where both officers had been granted qualified immunity. As to one officer, the Ninth Circuit offered no explanation for its decision, which was erroneous in light of the district court's conclusion that only the other officer was involved in the excessive force claim. The Ninth Circuit also erred as to the other officer because it defined the clearly established right at a "high level of generality" by saying only that the "right to be free of excessive force" was clearly established, and this formulation of the clearly established right was too general, particularly as the Circuit Could made no effort to explain how the case law prohibited the officer's actions in this case. (Escondido v. Emmons (Jan. 7, 2019) __ U.S. __ [139 S.Ct. 500; 202 L.Ed.2nd 455].)

In a guardian's state law and 42 U.S.C. § 1983 suit against a city, its police department, and an officer, alleging deliberate indifference to the ward's serious medical needs when, while the ward was detained in a holding cell and left unattended for about 30 minutes, he attempted suicide, causing permanent and severe injury, the officer was entitled to qualified immunity because, given the available case law at the time of the attempted suicide, a reasonable officer would not have known that failing to check on the ward immediately after his mother advised that he had suicidal tendencies presented such a substantial risk of harm that the failure to act was unconstitutional. (Horton v. City of Santa Maria (2019) 915 F.3rd 592.)

Transportation Security Administration (TSA) officers do not have absolute immunity from civil suit for conducting abusive searches of travelers at airport. Plaintiff's claims brought under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), 28 U.S.C. § 2680(h), to recover against Transportation Security Officers (TSOs) at airports when TSOs allegedly detained her, damaged her property, and fabricated charges against her, were improperly dismissed because TSOs were officers of United States empowered to execute searches for violations of Federal law. (Pellegrino v. Transportation Security Administration (3rd Cir. 2019) 937 F.3rd 164.)

> First, the Court noted that TSOs are officers by name, wear uniform with badges noting that title, and serve in positions of trust and authority. Although TSOs are designated as "employees" under the Aviation Security Act (ASA) and not "law enforcement officers," the court found there is no indication that only a specialized "law enforcement officer" as defined in the ASA qualifies as an officer of the United States under the FTCA.

> Second, the Court held that TSO screenings are searches under the Fourth Amendment and under the definition provided by the Supreme Court in Terry v. Ohio. In Terry, the Court found that "a careful exploration of the outer surfaces of a person's clothing all over his or her body" in an attempt to find weapons constitutes a "search." Here, the court found this to be an accurate description of the duties of a TSO, who are empowered by 49 U.S.C. § 44935(f)(1)(B)(v) to "thoroughly conduct" an exploration "over an individual's entire body."
> Finally, the Court held that TSOs' searches are "for violations of Federal law" given that their inspections are for items such as firearms and explosives, which is banned on aircraft pursuant to federal law.

Under the state-created "danger doctrine," it was held that police officers violated the constitutional right to due process of a victim of domestic violence when they remarked positively about the alleged abuser's family while simultaneously ordering other officers not to arrest the abuser despite the presence of probable cause to arrest because they acted with deliberate indifference to the risk of future abuse when they ignored the risk of the abuser's violent tendencies. Nonetheless, the officers were entitled to qualified immunity under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 because at the time of these events, a reasonable officer would not have known that such conduct violated the due process rights of the domestic violence victim. (Martinez v. City of Clovis (9th Cir. 2019) 943 F.3rd 1260, 1271-1277.)

The Ninth Circuit affirmed in part and reversed in part the district court's denial, on summary judgment, of qualified immunity to medical providers at Orange County Jail in an action brought pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 alleging that defendants (a jail doctor and several nurses) were deliberately indifferent to the medical needs of Patrick John Russell, a pretrial detainee who died from a ruptured aortic dissection. Applying Sandoval v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2021) 985 F.3d 657, the Court ruled that to defeat a claim of qualified immunity plaintiffs must show that, given the available case law at the time, a reasonable official, knowing what the jail doctor and nurses knew, and would have understood that their actions presented such a substantial risk of harm to Russell that the failure to act was unconstitutional. Their actual subjective appreciation of the risk was not an element of the established-law inquiry. The Court held that under the circumstances of this case, taking the facts most favorably to the plaintiffs, the on-call physician at the time could not have reasonably believed that based on the clearly established law as it stood then that he could provide constitutionally adequate care without even examining a patient with Russell's symptoms who had not responded to a dose of nitroglycerin. Therefore, the district court was correct in denying summary judgment on qualified immunity to the jail doctor. The Court held that Nurse Teofilo had access to facts from which an inference could be drawn that Russell was at serious risk. Yet she did not call the paramedics, nor did she call the doctor to ask whether Russell's worsening symptoms required anything more than the Motrin that had previously been prescribed. The district court was correct in denying summary judgment on qualified immunity to Nurse Teofilo. A reasonable jury could conclude that she met the standard for deliberate indifference. The panel held that Nurse Trout was entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity. A jury could not, on the facts pleaded, reasonably conclude that Nurse Trout was deliberately indifferent. Though perhaps she should have called the paramedics, her having promptly called the physician on call and followed his instructions could not be categorized as deliberate indifference. Lastly, the Court held that Nurse Lumitap was not entitled to qualified immunity. Drawing all inferences in plaintiff's favor, a reasonable person in Nurse Lumitap's position would have inferred that Russell was at serious risk if not hospitalized. (Russell v. Lumitap (9th Cir. 2022) 31 F.4th 729.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal reversed the district court's order on summary judgment denying qualified immunity to police officers in an action alleging, in part, First Amendment retaliation arising from the police officers/defendants' investigation of two arsons at properties connected to plaintiff Greg Moore. Plaintiffs alleged that in retaliation for Mr. Moore remaining silent during police questioning and plaintiffs' subsequent civil rights lawsuit and request for disclosures of public records, defendants, among other things, opened criminal investigations against them and attempted to induce the IRS into opening a criminal investigation. The Court concluded that plaintiffs failed to show that defendants' conduct violated clearly established law. It was not clearly established, for instance, that Mr. Moore has a First Amendment right to remain silent when questioned by the police. Nor was it clearly established that a retaliatory investigation per se violates the First Amendment. Defendants were therefore entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment claims based on Mr.

> Moore's silence and plaintiffs' lawsuits and requests for public disclosures. (Moore v. Garnand (9th Cir. 2023) 83 F.4th 743.)

California Civil Code § 52.1; the "Bane Act:"

> California's Civil Code § 52.1, the so-called "Bane Act" (the state equivalent to a federal 42 U.S.C. § 1983 civil suit), authorizes a civil action "against anyone who interferes, or tries to do so, by threats, intimidation, or coercion, with an individual's exercise or enjoyment of rights secured by federal or state law." (See Jones v. Kmart Corp. (1998) 17 Cal.4th 329, 331.) The Bane Act applies whenever there is a Fourth Amendment use of force violation. An illegal arrest (i.e., without probable cause) accompanied by the use of excessive force constitutes a Bane Act violation. It does not require a showing that the conduct also caused a violation of a separate and distinct constitutional right. (Bender v. County of Los Angeles (2013) 217 Cal.App.4th 968, 976-981.)

> "The Tom Bane Civil Rights Act, . . . was enacted in 1987 to address hate crimes. The Bane Act civilly protects individuals from conduct aimed at interfering with rights that are secured by federal or state law, where the interference is carried out 'by threats, intimidation or coercion.' See Venegas v. County of Los Angeles ((2007)) 153 Cal.App.4th 1230, . . . Section 52.1 'provides a cause of action for violations of a plaintiff's state or federal civil rights committed by "threats, intimidation, or coercion."' Chaudhry v. City of Los Angeles, 751 F.3rd 1096, 1105 (9th Cir. 2014) (quoting Cal. Civ. Code § 52.1). (fn. omitted) Claims under section 52.1 may be brought against public officials who are alleged to interfere with protected rights, and qualified immunity is not available for those claims. See Venegas, 63 Cal. Rptr. 3rd at 753." (Reese v. County of Sacramento (9th Cir. 2018) 888 F.3rd 1030, 1040-1041.)
> > In Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, supra, the California Supreme Court, in holding that a Section 52.1 plaintiff need not be a member of a protected class, found that plaintiffs had "adequately stated a cause of action under section 52.1" where they alleged warrantless, unconsented searches and unlawful detention.
> However, Section 52.1 "does not require proof of discriminatory intent." Also, "a successful claim for excessive force under the Fourth Amendment provides the basis for a successful claim under § 52.1." (Chaudhry v. City of Los Angeles, supra, at p. 1105.)

"(T)he use of excessive force can be enough to satisfy the 'threat, intimidation or coercion' element of Section 52.1." (Cornell v. City and County of San Francisco (2017) 17 Cal.App.5th 766, 799.)

> Cornell, however, also held that there is an "egregiousness require(ment)" under Section 52.1, necessitating a finding of circumstances indicating that the arresting officer had "a specific intent to violate the arrestee's right to freedom from unreasonable seizure." In so holding, Cornell adopted a specific intent standard for assessing criminal violations of federal civil rights. (Reese v. County of Sacramento, supra, at p. 1043, citing Cornell v. City and County of San Francisco, supra, at pp. 801-802; and Screws v. United States (1945) 325 U.S. 91 [65 S.Ct. 1031; 89 L.Ed. 1495].)

Thus, the Ninth Circuit reached two conclusions relative to the Bane Act's application: "First, the Bane Act does not require the 'threat, intimidation or coercion' element of the claim to be transactionally independent from the constitutional violation alleged. (Citation). Second, the Bane Act requires 'a specific intent to violate the arrestee's right to freedom from unreasonable seizure.' (Citation)" (Reese v. County of Sacramento, supra; holding that the trial court failed to properly instruct the jury that the deputies' had the specific intent not only to use force, but also to use unreasonable force.)

"The Bane Act permits an individual to pursue a civil action for damages where another person 'interferes by threat, intimidation, or coercion, or attempts to interfere by threat, intimidation, or coercion, with the exercise or enjoyment by any individual or individuals of rights secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or of the rights secured by the Constitution or laws of this state.' (Civ. Code, § 52.1, subd. (a).) 'The essence of a Bane Act claim is that the defendant, by the specified improper means (i.e., "threat[], intimidation or coercion"), tried to or did prevent the plaintiff from doing something he or she had the right to do under the law or to force the plaintiff to do something that he or she was not required to do under the law.' (Citation)" (King v. State of California (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 265, 294.)

> Evidence as presented in a civil rights action was held to be insufficient to support a Bane Act claim because the driver did not testify that the officer's threat made during a frisk caused him to do anything or refrain from doing anything; only that it caused him fear. The driver had no right to resist the unconstitutional frisk and thus the threat did not interfere with the exercise of his constitutional rights. (Id., at pp. 293-295.)

"California's Bane Act requires proof of an underlying constitutional violation. Reese v. County of Sacramento, 888 F.3rd 1030, 1044 (9th Cir. 2018) ('[T]he elements of the excessive force claim under [the Bane Act] are the same as under § 1983[.]' (quoting Chaudhry v. City of Los Angeles, 751 F.3rd 1096, 1105 (9th Cir. 2014)))." (Williamson v. City of National City (9th Cir. 2022) 23 F.4th 1146, 1155; holding that since plaintiff failed to prove defendants used excessive force as a matter of law, the defendants were entitled to summary judgement on the Bane Act allegation.)

On the Issue of a Government Agency's "Duty of Care," and/or "Duty to Warn" a Potential Victim and "Special Relationships:"

General Rule: "As a general rule, one owes no duty to control the conduct of another, nor to warn those endangered by such conduct. Such a duty may arise, however, if '(a) a special relation exists between the actor and the third person which imposes a duty upon the actor to control the third person's conduct, or (b) a special relation exists between the actor and the other which gives the other a right to protection.'" (Italics added; Russell v. Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 916, 931; quoting Davidson v. City of Westminster (1982) 32 Cal.3rd 197, 203.)

"'As a general principle, a "defendant owes a duty of care to all persons who are foreseeably endangered by his conduct, with respect to all risks which make the conduct unreasonably dangerous.'"" (Golick v. State of California (2022) 82 Cal.App.5th 1127, 1138, quoting Tarasoff v. Regents of University of California (1976) 17 Cal.3rd 425, 434–435, and citing Civ. Code § 1714.)

However, "(a) duty exists only if 'the plaintiff's interests are entitled to legal protection against the defendant's conduct.' . . . 'Recovery for negligence depends as a threshold matter on the existence of a legal duty of care.'" (Golick v. State of California, supra., quoting Brown v. USA Taekwondo (2021) 11 Cal.5th 204, at p. 213.)

"[W]hen the avoidance of foreseeable harm requires a defendant to control the conduct of another person, or to warn of such conduct, the common law has traditionally imposed liability only if the defendant bears some special relationship to the dangerous person or to the potential victim." (Italics added; Ibid; quoting Zelig v. County of Los Angeles (2002) 27 Cal.4th 1112, 1129.)

"Whether a defendant has a special relationship giving rise to a duty to warn rests on policy and is a question of law." (Russell v. Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation, supra, at pp. 934-935, citing Regents of University of California v. Superior Court (2018) 4 Cal.5th 607, 620, and multiple other authorities.)

In Russell, the trial court erroneously (without objection from either party) "instructed the jury to make a factual finding regarding the existence of a special relationship between the Department's agents (the civil defendant) and Russell (the victim), and later provided the jury with a list of factors for it to consider when making that determination." The Court held this to be error, and grounds for reversal. "(T)he existence of a legal duty in a given factual situation is a question of law that the trial court should have determined." (pgs. 935-936.)

The Court in Russell had some difficulty defining what is meant by a "special relationship," trying to explain the concept by example rather than giving us a one-size-fits-all definition. For instance, per the Court (at pp. 931-932), special relationships have "an aspect of dependency in which one party relies to some degree on the other for protection." (Regents of University of California v. Superior Court (2018) 4 Cal.5th 607, 620–621.) "The corollary of dependence in a special relationship is control. Whereas one party is dependent, the other has superior control over the means of protection. '[A] typical setting for the recognition of a special relationship is where "the plaintiff is particularly vulnerable and dependent upon the defendant who, correspondingly, has some control over the plaintiff's welfare."'" (Id. at p. 621.) The Court further notes that "the factors to a finding of a special relationship include 'detrimental reliance by the plaintiff on the officer's conduct, statements made by them which induced a false sense of security and thereby worsened her position.'" (Citing Williams v. State of California (1983) 34 Cal.3rd 18, 28.) "Recovery has been denied, however, for injuries caused by the failure of police personnel to respond to requests for assistance, the failure to investigate properly, or the failure to investigate at all, where the police had not induced reliance on a promise, express or implied, that they would provide protection.' (Id. at p. 25.)"

Duty of Care to Third Parties:

General Rule:

"(N)egligence liability for an officer's unreasonable use of deadly force may potentially extend to unintended victims whom the officer injures in the course of a deadly force incident. If a third party suffers physical injury during a deadly force incident, that person may have a negligence claim based on the officer's duty to act reasonably when using deadly force against the suspect." (Golick v. State of California (2022) 82 Cal.App.5th 1127, 1140, citing Brown v. Ransweiler (2009) 171 Cal.App.4th 516, 534; and Koussaya v. City of Stockton (2020) 54 Cal.App.5th 909 937; while noting that "there is no duty to act to protect others from the

> "'Unlike private citizens, police officers act under color of law to protect the public interest. They are charged with acting affirmatively and using force as part of their duties, because "the right to make an arrest or investigatory stop necessarily carries with it the right to use some degree of physical coercion or threat thereof to effect it." (Edson v. City of Anaheim (1998) 63 Cal.App.4th 1269, 1273 . . .], quoting Graham v. Connor (1989) 490 U.S. 386, 396 [104 L.Ed. 2nd 443; 109 S.Ct. 1865].) Thus, under California law, a peace officer "may use reasonable force to make an arrest, prevent escape or overcome resistance, and need not desist in the face of resistance."' (Brown v. Ransweiler (2009) 171 Cal.App.4th 516, 527 . . . ; see Pen. Code, § 835a.) [¶] An important corollary to these principles is that police officers have a duty in tort to act reasonably when employing deadly force against a suspect.'" (Golick v. State of California (2022) 82 Cal.App.5th 1127, 1138-1139; quoting Hayes v. County of San Diego (2013) 57 Cal.4th 622, 629.)
>
> "(A)n 'officer's lack of due care can give rise to negligence liability for the intentional shooting death of a suspect.'" (Golick v. State of California, supra, at p. 1139, quoting Munoz v. Olin (1979) 24 Cal.3rd 629, 634.)

Also: "Under California law, the general duty to exercise due care for the safety of others is broad, 'but it has limits.' . . . This general duty of care applies 'only when it is the defendant who has 'created a risk' of harm to the plaintiff, including when 'the defendant is responsible for making the plaintiff's position worse.'" . . . By contrast, a defendant is generally not liable in tort for failing to protect another from a peril that the defendant did not create. . . . This is because the law does not impose a general duty to protect others from the conduct of third parties." (Golick v. State of California (2022) 82 Cal.App.5th 1127, 1143-1144, quoting Brown v. USA Taekwondo (2021) 11 Cal.5th 204, 214, and citing Williams v. State of California (1983) 34 Cal.3rd 18, 23; there is no general "duty to come to the aid of another"].)

> The rule is simple enough: "(O)ne owes no duty to control the conduct of another, nor to warn those endangered by such conduct." . . . These principles apply to law enforcement officers who, 'like other members of the public, generally do not have a legal duty to come to the aid of [another] person.'" (Golick v. State of California, supra, at p. 1144; quoting Davidson v. City of Westminster (1982) 32 Cal.3rd 197, 203; and Lugtu v. California Highway Patrol (2001) 26 Cal.4th 703, 717; and citing Benavidez v. San Jose Police Dept. (1999) 71 Cal.App.4th 853, 859–860.)

Case law:

The California Supreme Court, in determining the tort liability of a police officer for shooting and killing a mentally ill person, ruled that law enforcement's pre-shooting conduct may be relevant "to the extent it shows, as part of the totality of the circumstances, that the shooting itself was negligent." In reaching this conclusion, the Court cautioned that "the reasonableness of the officers' pre-shooting conduct should not be considered in isolation," but "should be considered in relation to the question whether the officers' ultimate use of deadly force was reasonable." (Hayes v. County of San Diego (2013) 57 Cal.4th 622, 631-632.)

A peace officer does not have a legal duty to take reasonable care in attempting to prevent a threatened suicide from being carried out. (Adams v. City of Fremont (1998) 68 Cal.App.4th 243, 276.)

See Koussaya v. City of Stockton (2020) 54 Cal.App.5th 909 (as described in Golick v. State of California, supra, at p. 1140.) where a woman ("plaintiff") alleged police were liable for injuries she sustained while being held hostage by bank robbers.
The woman was one of three hostages the bank robbers took after police confronted them at the bank. The robbers walked the hostages through the bank parking lot, ignoring commands from an officer who aimed his weapon at them and ordered them to stop, and the robbers fled with their hostages in a Ford Explorer. Less than a minute later, one of the hostages was shot by one of the robbers and pushed out of the Explorer. Then another robber "fired a barrage of bullets" from his assault rifle at a pursuing police car, shattering the back window of the Explorer. The pursuit evolved into a high speed chase and twice during the chase officers exchanged fire with the robber in the back of the Explorer. Shortly after the second exchange of gunfire, the plaintiff decided to jump out of the Explorer, fearing she would be shot if she remained in the car when the chase ended. Minutes later, the chase did end, at which point police officers fired several hundred rounds into the Explorer, killing two of the robbers and the remaining hostage. The plaintiff sued the city and the officers who fired at the Explorer while she was in it, alleging causes of action for assault and battery, intentional infliction of emotional distress and negligence. Her theory was that the officers' use of deadly force against the robbers was unreasonable and had caused her injuries. The city and the officer defendants filed separate motions for summary judgment, which were granted. The Appellate Court affirmed, holding that the officers' use of deadly force against the robbery suspects was reasonable as a matter of law.

A patrol officer who orders a speeding motorist to pull over owes the passengers of the vehicle a duty to exercise reasonable care not to expose them to a risk of harm by other motorists. In such a situation, the general rule that there is no duty to protect a plaintiff from third party injury does not apply because the officer has exercised his authority to direct the motorist to stop in the center median strip of a divided highway. In giving such a directive, the officer has a duty to use reasonable care "so as not to place the person in danger or to expose the person to an unreasonable risk of harm." (Lugtu v. California Highway Patrol (2001) 26 Cal.4th 703, 715-718.)

Good Samaritan Rule:

What is sometimes referred to as the "negligent undertaking doctrine" or the "Good Samaritan rule," it has been held that a person may be civilly liable upon negligently attempting to render services to another. (See Rest.3rd Torts, Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm (2012) § 42 [Duty Based on Undertaking].) Under this doctrine, "one who undertakes to aid another is under a duty to exercise due care in acting and is liable if the failure to do so increases the risk of harm or if the harm is suffered because the other relied on the undertaking." (Paz v. State of California (2000) 22 Cal.4th 550, 553, 558-559; see also Delgado v. Trax Bar & Grill (2005) 36 Cal.4th 224, 249.)

See also Mann v. State of California (1977) 70 Cal.App.3rd 773, 776 & 780: State held liable for an officer's negligence in leaving stranded motorist unprotected while the officer undertook to investigate a dangerous situation.

Duty to Warn: In determining whether a government agency has a "duty to warn" a potential victim, a court must make a two-step inquiry:

> "First, the court must determine whether there exists a special relationship between the parties or some other set of circumstances giving rise to an affirmative duty to [warn]. Second, if so, the court must consult the factors described in [Rowland v. Christian (1968) 69 Cal.2nd 108 . . . .] to determine whether relevant policy considerations counsel limiting that duty." (Italics added; Russell v. Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 916, 930-931; quoting Brown v. USA Taekwondo (2021) 11 Cal.5th 204, 209; see also Golick v. State of California (2022) 82 Cal.App.5th 1127, 1144.)
> > See Rowland v. Christian, supra, at p. 119, for the California Supreme Court's discussion concerning a landowner's "duty to warn" others of hazardous conditions on the landowner's property: I.e.; that there was a "defective and dangerous (condition), that the defect was not obvious, and that plaintiff was about to come in contact with the defective condition, and under the undisputed facts (the civil defendant/landowner) neither remedied the condition nor warned plaintiff of it."
> >
> > In Rowland, supra, it was further noted: "Where the occupier of land is aware of a concealed condition involving in the absence of precautions an unreasonable risk of harm to those coming in contact with it and is aware that a person (i.e., the plaintiff) on the premises is about to come in contact with it, the trier of fact can reasonably conclude that a failure to warn or to repair the condition constitutes negligence. Whether or not a guest has a right to expect that his host will remedy dangerous conditions on his account, he should reasonably be entitled to rely upon a warning of the dangerous condition so that he, like the host, will be in a position to take special precautions when he comes in contact with it."
> > And then Roland (at p. 113) sets for the factors to consider when determining whether there is a "duty of care" is imposed upon a person: "(T)he foreseeability of harm to the plaintiff, the degree of certainty that the plaintiff suffered injury, the closeness of the connection between the defendant's conduct and the injury suffered, the moral blame attached to the defendant's conduct, the policy > of preventing future harm, the extent of the burden to the defendant and consequences to the community of imposing a duty to exercise care with resulting liability for breach, and the availability, cost, and prevalence of insurance for the risk involved." (See Golick v. State of California (2022) 82 Cal.App.5th 1127, 1136-1137.)

Police officers surveilling a laundromat watched as a man suspected of stabbing women in the laundromat "entered and left the laundromat 'several times.'" The officers saw Ms. Davidson in the laundromat but did not warn or otherwise intercede to protect her and, foreseeably, the suspect eventually stabbed her. The California Supreme Court concluded no cause of action for negligence was stated because the officers owed Davidson no "duty to warn or protect." (Davidson v. City of Westminster (1982) 32 Cal.3rd 197, 209.)

Examples of Qualifying or Non-Qualifying "Special Relationships:"

Rule:

> A duty of care to protect a victim from third party harm may arise when the defendant has a special relationship with either the victim or the third party. (Golick v. State of California (2022) 82 Cal.App.5th 1127, 1149; citing Zelig v. County of Los Angeles (2002) 27 Cal.4th 1112, 1129.)

Case Law:

> A relationship that has an aspect of dependency in which one party relies to some degree on the other for protection. (Regents of University of California v. Superior Court (2018) 4 Cal.5th 607, 620–621.)
>
> > "The corollary of dependence in a special relationship is control. Whereas one party is dependent, the other has superior control over the means of protection. '[A] typical setting for the recognition of a special relationship is where "the plaintiff is particularly vulnerable and dependent upon the defendant who, correspondingly, has some control over the plaintiff's welfare."'" (Italics added; Id., at p. 621.)

> Also, "Special relationships also have defined boundaries. They create a duty of care owed to a limited community, not the public at large." (Ibid.)

As for the government being held civilly liable due to a "special relationship" between a government agent and a crime victim, it has been held that there must be "circumstances under which the government may be liable based on law enforcement's failure to act reasonably in protecting members of the public: the factors to a finding of a special relationship include 'detrimental reliance by the plaintiff on the officer's conduct, statements made by them which induced a false sense of security and thereby worsened her position.'" (Williams v. State of California (1983) 34 Cal.3rd 18, 28.)

> "Recovery has been denied, however, for injuries caused by the failure of police personnel to respond to requests for assistance, the failure to investigate properly, or the failure to investigate at all, where the police had not induced reliance on a promise, express or implied, that they would provide protection." (Id., at p. 25.)

Where a deputy sheriff voluntarily promised to warn the victim if a prisoner, who had threatened the victim's life, was released, but failed to do so when the prisoner was released, and then killed the victim. The Appellate Court recognized an exception to the general rule of "nonliability for an unperformed gratuitous undertaking," or nonfeasance, "'where a person, in reasonable reliance thereon, suffers harm, as by refraining from securing other necessary assistance.'" (Italics in original, Morgan v. County of Yuba (1964) 230 Cal.App.2nd 938, 944.)

Where an agent of the government requested that the plaintiff provide a foster home for a 16-year-old boy without warning the plaintiff of the boy's homicidal tendencies and violent background, and subsequently, the boy attacked and injured the plaintiff, the plaintiff filed suit against the state for failing to warn her about the boy's history and propensity for violence. The California Supreme Court concluded that "the state's relationship to [the] plaintiff was such that its duty extended to warning of latent, dangerous qualities suggested by the parolee's history or character." The Court further noted that a duty is imposed "upon those who create a foreseeable peril, not readily discoverable by endangered persons, to warn them of such potential peril. Accordingly, the state owed a duty to inform [the plaintiff] of any matter that its agents knew or should have known that might endanger [the plaintiff's] family; at a minimum, these facts certainly would have included 'homicidal tendencies, and a background of violence and cruelty' as well as the youth's criminal record." (Johnson v. State of California (1968) 69 Cal.2nd 782, 785-786.)

A defendant therapist had a special relationship with the patient giving rise to a duty to warn a potential victim where the patient made specific threats against the victim. However, the defendant law enforcement officers who had briefly detained the patient had no duty of care to the decedent because there was no "special relationship" between them and either the victim or the patient. Also, the Court found no facts to support a cause of action under Restatement Second of Torts (1965) section 321, which provides: "'If the actor does an act, and subsequently realizes or should realize that it has created an unreasonable risk of causing physical harm to another, he is under a duty to exercise reasonable care to prevent the risk from taking effect.'" (Tarasoff v. Regents of University of California (1976) 17 Cal.3rd 425, 436, 444, and fn. 18.)

Plaintiffs brought an action against a county after their five-year-old son was killed by a juvenile offender within 24 hours of the offender's release on temporary leave. The plaintiffs alleged that the county was negligent in releasing the juvenile into the community and for failing to warn parents in the vicinity of the juvenile's release. The trial court sustained the county's demurrer and the California Supreme Court affirmed. The Court distinguished Johnson v. State of California, supra, noting that the county neither had a special and continuous relationship with the plaintiffs nor knowingly placed the decedent into a foreseeably dangerous position. The Court distinguished Tarasoff v. Regents of University of California, supra, on the basis that the decedent was not a foreseeable or readily identifiable target of the juvenile's threats. In summary, the Court held: "[P]ublic entities and employees have no affirmative duty to warn of the release of an inmate with a violent history who has made nonspecific threats of harm directed at nonspecific victims." (Italics in original;

Where the assailant was under surveillance by two police officers for the purpose of preventing assaults and apprehending a man who had previously stabbed other women in the area, the officers were aware of the plaintiff's presence but did not warn him. Eventually, the assailant stabbed the plaintiff. The trial court sustained the defendant City's demurrer. The California Supreme Court affirmed. The Court held that the officers had no duty to warn the plaintiff because there was no special relationship between the officers and the plaintiff. The court recognized a common theme running through cases in which a special relationship had been found, and where there "was the voluntary assumption by the public entity or official of a duty toward the injured party." "'Absent an indication that the police had induced decedent's reliance on a promise, express or implied, that they would provide her with protection, it must be concluded that no special relationship existed and that appellant has not stated a cause of action.'" (Davidson v. City of Westminster (1982) 32 Cal.3rd 197, 203-206; quoting Hartzler v. City of San Jose (1975) 46 Cal.App.3rd 6, 10.)

California's Supreme Court has also recognized that a special relationship may be predicated on a victim's dependence upon the police for protection. But the Court distinguished Johnson v. State of California, supra, by concluding that in this case the victim's peril was not created by the officers, and the victim did not rely on the officers for protection. The court emphasized: "There is simply no reason to speculate that anyone . . . would have acted differently had the officers not placed the laundromat under surveillance." (Davidson v. City of Westminster (1982) 32 Cal.3rd 197, 207-208.)

Where a witness testified in criminal proceedings after a hearing, the witness who had just testified against the defendant asked a police detective if he should be concerned for his safety. The detective told the witness "he did not have anything to worry about." The witness relied on the detective's statement and did not act to protect himself. The police learned that the suspect had put "'a contract hit'" on the witness but failed to warn him, and the witness was later shot. (Id. at pp. 927–929.) The appellate court recognized that a plaintiff may establish a special relationship by showing reliance on the officers' conduct and statements, which induced a false sense of security and thereby worsened the plaintiff's position. (Carpenter v. City of Los Angeles (1991) 230 Cal.App.3rd 923, 927, 931-932.)

"(A)lthough §§ 815.2 and 820.2 may limit liability for discretionary acts such as a government agency's decision to investigate, subsequent illegal actions taken in the course of carrying out such a discretionary decision are not similarly shielded. In Johnson (v. State (1968) 69 Cal.2nd 782), the California Supreme Court noted that although a determination of which governmental actions are 'discretionary' and therefore immune from liability would have to occur on a case by case basis, the distinction 'between the "planning" and "operational" levels of decision making . . . offers some basic guideposts' for making that determination. . . . In general, the court suggested, policy decisions would be protected by § 820.2, while the steps taken in implementing those decisions, though involving an exercise of discretion at some level, would not be. . . . Thus, in that case, the State of California could be held liable for the negligent actions of a placement officer of the Youth Authority in failing to warn foster parents that the child placed with them had a history of violence and cruelty." (Rattray v. City of National City (9th Cir. 1994) 51 F.3rd 793, 798.)

The trial court erred by denying the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation's motions for nonsuit and judgment notwithstanding the verdict after a jury found the Department was partially at fault for a parolee's crimes based upon the Department's failure to warn the victim of the parolee's dangerous propensities. The Court ruled that the evidence was insufficient to establish that a "special relationship" existed between the parole agents and the victim. Absent evidence that either agent who had been assigned to supervise the parolee had made an express or implied promise of protection causing detrimental reliance by the victim, who was the parolee's grandmother, in opening her home to the parolee, the Department had no civil liability. The evidence also did not demonstrate that either agent had created a foreseeable peril that was not readily discoverable by the victim because neither agent was shown to have been aware that the parolee posed a particularized threat of harm to the victim. (Russell v. Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 916.)

See Conway v. County of Tuolumne (2014) 231 Cal.App.4th 1005, 1013-1021: Under the circumstances of this case, the defendant county of Tuolumne was held to be immune from civil liability for the discretionary (as opposed to ministerial) conduct of its officers. Once officers decided to arrest plaintiff's son, they were vested with the discretion in determining the best way to accomplish that goal, using personal deliberation, decision, and professional judgment. This discretion included the possible use of tear gas as a way to determine whether plaintiff's son was in plaintiff's mobile home. Given the potential impact of liability on such decisions, Gov't. Code § 820.2 provided immunity for the officers' actions. (See also Caldwell v. Montoya (1995) 10 Cal.4th 972, 980.)

In a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 civil action against a city (Clovis) and a county (Fresno), whose SWAT teams had caused substantial damage to plaintiffs' property while attempting to make an arrest, the federal district court was held to have properly found that the plaintiffs' evidence failed to create a genuine issue of fact because record evidence showed that the city and county defendants had a general policy of obtaining warrants prior to entry, of using reasonable force, and the reasonable use of tear gas. The plaintiffs failed to establish a triable issue that any of these policies caused any constitutional injuries, or that there was a persistent and widespread violation of these policies. The district court did not err in concluding that the defendants were immune from liability for negligence because public entities like defendants were immune if the alleged injuries were caused by the officers' "discretionary acts," pursuant to Cal. Gov't Code §§ 820.2 and 815.2(b). (Jessen v. County of Fresno (9th Cir. 2020) 808 F. Appx. 432; unpublished.)

But 'to be entitled to immunity the state must make a showing that such a policy decision, consciously balancing risks and advantages, took place.' Johnson v. State, 69 Cal.2nd 782, 794 n.8, . . . (1968)." (Recchia v. P.C. § 597(a)(1) reads as follows: "(W)hen [an] officer has reasonable grounds to believe that very prompt action is required > to protect the health or safety of the animal or the health or safety of others, the officer shall immediately seize the animal."

"(A)lthough §§ 815.2 and 820.2 may limit liability for discretionary acts such as a government agency's decision to investigate, subsequent illegal actions taken in the course of carrying out such a discretionary decision are not similarly shielded. In Johnson (v. State (1968) 69 Cal.2nd 782), the California Supreme Court noted that although a determination of which governmental actions are 'discretionary' and therefore immune from liability would have to occur on a case by case basis, the distinction 'between the "planning" and "operational" levels of decision making . . . offers some basic guideposts' for making that determination. . . . In general, the court suggested, policy decisions would be protected by § 820.2, while the steps taken in implementing those decisions, though involving an exercise of discretion at some level, would not be. . . . Thus, in that case, the State of California could be held liable for the negligent actions of a placement officer of the Youth Authority in failing to warn foster parents that the child placed with them had a history of violence and cruelty." Gov't. Code § 820.4: Non-Negligent Law Execution or Enforcement; Absence of Immunity for False Arrest or Imprisonment:

> A public employee is not liable for his act or omission, exercising due care, in the execution or enforcement of any law. Nothing in this section exonerates a public employee from liability for false arrest or false imprisonment.

Gov't. Code § 820.6: Good Faith Action Under Unconstitutional, Invalid, or Inapplicable Enactment:

> If a public employee acts in good faith, without malice, and under the apparent authority of an enactment that is unconstitutional, invalid or inapplicable, he is not liable for an injury caused thereby except to the extent that he would have been liable had the enactment been constitutional, valid and applicable.

Gov't. Code § 820.8: Act or Omission of Another Person; Absence of Immunity from Liability for Own Act or Omission:

> Except as otherwise provided by statute, a public employee is not liable for an injury caused by the act or omission of another person. Nothing in this section exonerates a public employee from liability for injury proximately caused by his own negligent or wrongful act or omission.

Gov't. Code § 821.6: A public employee is not liable for injury caused by his instituting or prosecuting any judicial or administrative proceeding within the scope of his employment, even if he acts maliciously and without probable cause.

> Where a plaintiff brought an action for false imprisonment against the Los Angeles County Sheriff, asserting the plaintiff was jailed for longer than his sentence due to administrative errors, the California Supreme Court reversed the trial court's judgment for the county based on section 821.6 immunity. The Supreme Court held that the section did not immunize the sheriff for liability for false imprisonment, and accordingly, the county could be liable for the sheriff's conduct under section P.C. 815.2(b). The Court's reasoning what that: "[T]he history of section 821.6 demonstrates that the Legislature intended the section to protect public employees from liability only for malicious prosecution and not for false imprisonment. … [¶] … [T]he suits against government employees or entities cited by the Senate Committee in commenting upon section 821.6 all involve the government employees' acts in filing charges or swearing out affidavits of criminal activity against the plaintiff. No case has predicated a finding of malicious prosecution on the holding of a person in jail beyond his term or beyond the completion of all criminal proceedings against him." (Sullivan v. > And see Leon v. County of Riverside (2023) 14 Cal.5th 910, at pp. 918-919, discussed below, noting that the rule as enunciated in Sullivan (i.e., that there must be an actual prosecution for immunity under Gov't. Code § 821.6 to apply) is not limited to a false imprisonment scenario.

But see Asgari v. City of Los Angeles (1997) 15 Cal.4th 744, at p. 748, where the Court held immunity under section 821.6 extended to prevent a plaintiff from recovering damages for false arrest attributable to the period in which the plaintiff was incarcerated after he was arraigned on criminal charges. The court observed that although section 821.6 had been primarily applied to immunize prosecuting attorneys and similarly-situated individuals, it also "applies to police officers as well as public prosecutors since both are public employees within the meaning of the Government Code." (Id. at p. 757.)

"(A)lthough the Courts of Appeal had primarily applied section 821.6 to immunize prosecuting attorneys, the section had been construed broadly to immunize torts committed in the course of police investigations, including by police officers, citing Lawrence v. Superior Court (2018) 21 Cal.App.5th 513, 526. . . . (where) § 821.6 immunized CHP from liability for releasing a vehicle impounded during an investigation to the wrong claimant." (Silva v. Langford (2022) 79 Cal.App.5th 710, 715; the Court reversing the trial court's granting of a demurrer in favor of the civil defendants.)

> In Silva, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that the trial court had erroneously granted the civil defendant CHP officer's demurrer where it was alleged that the officer, traveling over the speed limit and without lights or siren, hit and killed the plaintiffs' deceased son. However, the Court declined to decide whether 821.6 immunized the officer in that the Court also held that the officer was immune from suit under Vehicle Code Section 17004 as an emergency responder.)

The California Supreme Court has since taken a more restrictive view:

> In Leon v. County of Riverside (2023) 14 Cal.5th 910, plaintiff's husband was shot and killed in the driveway of a mobile home lot near his home. When sheriff's deputies arrived on the scene, they heard additional shots. The deputies dragged the husband to where he was shielded by a vehicle, where they unsuccessfully attempted to revive him. That movement, however, had caused the victim's pants to slide down to his ankles, exposing his naked body. The victim's body remained in that uncovered state for approximately eight hours while officers searched for the shooter and investigated the shooting. Plaintiff sued the county of Riverside, asserting a single cause of action for the "negligent infliction of emotional distress." Plaintiff's complaint alleged that the deputies failed to exercise reasonable care when they left her husband's body exposed and uncovered for hours, in view of both plaintiff and the general public. The trial court granted the county's motion for summary judgment and entered judgment for the county. The Court of Appeal, Fourth District, Div. Two, affirmed, holding that because the deputies' negligence, if any, in failing to promptly cover or remove plaintiff's husband's body from the scene occurred during the course of the their performance of their official duties and their investigation of the shooting, both the deputies and the county were immune. The California Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeal and remanded the matter for further proceedings. The court concluded the Court of Appeal erred in finding Gov't. Code § 821.6 conferred absolute immunity on the county for negligent infliction of emotional distress arising out of the alleged mishandling of plaintiff's husband's body. Because plaintiff's claim did not concern alleged harms from the institution or prosecution of judicial or administrative proceedings, § 821.6 did not apply. While other provisions of the Government Claims Act may confer immunity for certain investigatory actions, § 821.6, does not broadly immunize police officers or other public employees for any and all harmful actions they may take in the course of investigating crime. (Overruling Leon v. County of Riverside (2021) 64 Cal.App.5th 837, which had held to the contrary.)

The Court also held that to the extent that they are inconsistent with this decision, the following cases are disapproved:

Gov't. Code § 821.6; (3) arrest-warrant immunity under Cal. Civ. Code § 43.55(a); and (4) false-arrest immunity under Cal. Penal Code § 847(b), in an "unlawful retaliation" case.

> "The 'prosecutorial' immunity under Cal. Gov. Code § 821.6 does not apply because it is limited to malicious-prosecution claims. (fn. omitted) In 1974, the California Supreme Court held that § 821.6 immunity does not extend beyond malicious-prosecution claims. Sullivan v. Cty. of Los Angeles, 12 Cal. 3d 710, . . . (Cal. 1974). Since then, intermediate appellate courts have expanded the immunity to investigative steps taken prior to a judicial proceeding, including action by police officers. E.g., Gillian v. City of San Marino, 147 Cal. App. 4th 1033, 1048, . . . (2007). But '[w]hen interpreting state law, a federal court is bound by the decision of the highest state court.' Hewitt v. Joyner, 940 F.2d 1561, 1565 (9th Cir. 1991) (emphasis added) (internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, because California's highest court has not extended § 821.6 immunity to actions outside of malicious prosecution, this immunity does not apply here." (pgs. 920-921.)

Gov't. Code § 825: Duty of Public Entity to Pay Judgment, Compromise, or Settlement:

> (a) Except as otherwise provided in this section, if an employee or former employee of a public entity requests the public entity to defend him or her against any claim or action against him or her for an injury arising out of an act or omission occurring within the scope of his or her employment as an employee of the public entity and the request is made in writing not less than 10 days before the day of trial, and the employee or former employee reasonably cooperates in good faith in the defense of the claim or action, the public entity shall pay any judgment based thereon or any compromise or settlement of the claim or action to which the public entity has agreed.

If the public entity conducts the defense of an employee or former employee against any claim or action with his or her reasonable good–faith cooperation, the public entity shall pay any judgment based thereon or any compromise or settlement of the claim or action to which the public entity has agreed. However, where the public entity conducted the defense pursuant to an agreement with the employee or former employee reserving the rights of the public entity not to pay the judgment, compromise, or settlement until it is established that the injury arose out of an act or omission occurring within the scope of his or her employment as an employee of the public entity, the public entity is required to pay the judgment, compromise, or settlement only if it is established that the injury arose out of an act or omission occurring in the scope of his or her employment as an employee of the public entity.

Nothing in this section authorizes a public entity to pay that part of a claim or judgment that is for punitive or exemplary damages.

(b) Notwithstanding subdivision (a) or any other provision of law, a public entity is authorized to pay that part of a judgment that is for punitive or exemplary damages if the governing body of that public entity, acting in its sole discretion except in cases involving an entity of the state government, finds all of the following:

(1) The judgment is based on an act or omission of an employee or former employee acting within the course and scope of his or her employment as an employee of the public entity.

(2) At the time of the act giving rise to the liability, the employee or former employee acted, or failed to act, in good faith, without actual malice and in the apparent best interests of the public entity.

(3) Payment of the claim or judgment would be in the best interests of the public entity.

As used in this subdivision with respect to an entity of state government, "a decision of the governing body" means the approval of the Legislature for payment of that part of a judgment that is for punitive damages or exemplary damages, upon recommendation of the appointing power of the employee or former employee, based upon the finding by the Legislature and the appointing authority of the existence of the three conditions for payment of a punitive or exemplary damages claim. The provisions of subdivision (a) of Section 965.6 shall apply to the payment of any claim pursuant to this subdivision.

The discovery of the assets of a public entity and the introduction of evidence of the assets of a public entity shall not be permitted in an action in which it is alleged that a public employee is liable for punitive or exemplary damages.

The possibility that a public entity may pay that part of a judgment that is for punitive damages shall not be disclosed in any trial in which it is alleged that a public employee is liable for punitive or exemplary damages, and that disclosure shall be grounds for a mistrial.

(c) Except as provided in subdivision (d), if the provisions of this section are in conflict with the provisions of a memorandum of understanding reached pursuant to Chapter 10 (commencing with Section 3500) of Division 4 of Title 1, the memorandum of understanding shall be controlling without further legislative action, except that if those provisions of a memorandum of understanding require the expenditure of funds, the provisions shall not become effective unless approved by the Legislature in the annual Budget Act.

(d) The subject of payment of punitive damages pursuant to this section or any other provision of law shall not be a subject of meet and confer under the provisions of Chapter 10 (commencing with Section 3500) of Division 4 of Title 1, or pursuant to any other law or authority.
(e) Nothing in this section shall affect the provisions of Section 818 prohibiting the award of punitive damages against a public entity. This section shall not be construed as a waiver of a public entity's immunity from liability for punitive damages under Section 1981, 1983, or 1985 of Title 42 of the United States Code.

(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), a public entity shall not pay a judgment, compromise, or settlement arising from a claim or action against an elected official, if the claim or action is based on conduct by the elected official by way of tortiously intervening or attempting to intervene in, or by way of tortiously influencing or attempting to influence the outcome of, any judicial action or proceeding for the benefit of a particular party by contacting the trial judge or any commissioner, court–appointed arbitrator, court–appointed mediator, or court–appointed special referee assigned to the matter, or the court clerk, bailiff, or marshal after an action has been filed, unless he or she was counsel of record acting lawfully within the scope of his or her employment on behalf of that party.

Notwithstanding Section 825.6, if a public entity conducted the defense of an elected official against such a claim or action and the elected official is found liable by the trier of fact, the court shall order the elected official to pay to the public entity the cost of that defense.

(2) If an elected official is held liable for monetary damages in the action, the plaintiff shall first seek recovery of the judgment against the assets of the elected official. If the elected official's assets are insufficient to satisfy the total judgment, as determined by the court, the public entity may pay the deficiency if the public entity is authorized by law to pay that judgment.

(3) To the extent the public entity pays any portion of the judgment or is entitled to reimbursement of defense costs pursuant to paragraph (1), the public entity shall pursue all available creditor's remedies against the elected official, including garnishment, until that party has fully reimbursed the public entity.

(4) This subdivision shall not apply to any criminal or civil enforcement action brought in the name of the people of the State of California by an elected district attorney, city attorney, or attorney general.

Gov't. Code § 825.2: Right of Employee or Former Employee to Recover Amount of Payment from Public Entity:

(a) Subject to subdivision (b), if an employee or former employee of a public entity pays any claim or judgment against him, or any portion thereof, that the public entity is required to pay under Section 825, he is entitled to recover the amount of such payment from the public entity.

(b) If the public entity did not conduct his defense against the action or claim, or if the public entity conducted such defense pursuant to an agreement with him reserving the rights of the public entity against him, an employee or former employee of a public entity may recover from the public entity under subdivision (a) only if he establishes that the act or omission upon which the claim or judgment is based occurred within the scope of his employment as an employee of the public entity and the public entity fails to establish that he acted or failed to act because of actual fraud, corruption or actual malice or that he willfully failed or refused to conduct the defense of the claim or action in good faith or to reasonably cooperate in good faith in the defense conducted by the public entity.

(c) If the provisions of this section are in conflict with the provisions of a memorandum of understanding reached pursuant to Chapter 12 (commencing with Section 3560) of Division 4 of Title 1, the memorandum of understanding shall be controlling without further legislative action, except that if such provisions of a memorandum of understanding require the expenditure of funds, the provisions shall not become effective unless approved by the Legislature in the annual Budget Act.

Gov't. Code § 825.4: Indemnification of Public Entity Paying Claim or Judgment; When Public Employee Not Liable to Indemnify:

Except as provided in Section 825.6, if a public entity pays any claim or judgment against itself or against an employee or former employee of the public entity, or any portion thereof, for an injury arising out of an act or omission of the employee or former employee of the public entity, he is not liable to indemnify the public entity.

Gov't. Code § 825.6: When Public Entity May Recover from Employee or Former Employee:

(1) Except as provided in subdivision (b), if a public entity pays any claim or judgment, or any portion thereof, either against itself or against an employee or former employee of the public entity, for an injury arising out of an act or omission of the employee or former employee of the public entity, the public entity may recover from the employee or former employee the amount of that payment if he or she acted or failed to act because of actual fraud, corruption, or actual malice, or willfully failed or refused to conduct the defense of the claim or action in good faith. Except as provided in paragraph (2) or (3), a public entity may not recover any payments made upon a judgment or claim against an employee or former employee if the public entity conducted his or her defense against the action or claim.

(2) If a public entity pays any claim or judgment, or any portion thereof, against an employee or former employee of the public entity for an injury arising out of his or her act or omission, and if the public entity conducted his or her defense against the claim or action pursuant to an agreement with him or her reserving the rights of the public entity against him or her, the public entity may recover the amount of the payment from him or her unless he or she establishes that the act or omission upon which the claim or judgment is based occurred within the scope of his or her employment as an employee of the public entity and the public entity fails to establish that he or she acted or failed to act because of actual fraud, corruption, or actual malice or that he or she willfully failed or refused to reasonably cooperate in good faith in the defense conducted by the public entity.

(3) If a public entity pays any claim or judgment, or any portion thereof, against an employee or former employee of the public entity for an injury arising out of his or her act or omission, and if the public entity conducted the defense against the claim or action in the absence of an agreement with him or her reserving the rights of the public entity against him or her, the public entity may recover the amount of that payment from him or her if he or she willfully failed or refused to reasonably cooperate in good faith in the defense conducted by the public entity.

(1) Upon a felony conviction for a violation of Section 1195 of this code, or of Section 68, 86, 93, 165, 504, or 518 of the Penal Code, by an elected official or former elected official of a public entity for an act or omission of that person while in office, the elected official or former elected official shall forfeit any rights to defense or indemnification under Section 825 with respect to a claim for damages for an injury arising from that act or omission.

(2) If a public entity pays any claim or judgment, or any portion thereof, either against itself or against an elected official or former elected official of the public entity, for an injury arising out of an act or omission of the elected official or former elected official of the public entity, which act or omission constituted a felony violation of Section 1195 of this code, or of Section 68, 86, 93, 165, 504, or 518 of the Penal Code, the public entity shall recover from the elected official or former elected official the amount of that payment upon the felony conviction of the elected official or former elected official for that act or omission. Upon that conviction, the public entity shall also recover from the elected official the costs of any defense to a civil action filed against the elected official for that act or omission.

(c) If the provisions of this section are in conflict with the provisions of a memorandum of understanding reached pursuant to Chapter 12 (commencing with Section 3560) of Division 4 of Title 1, the memorandum of understanding shall be controlling without further legislative action, except that if the provisions of a memorandum of understanding require the expenditure of funds, the provisions shall not become effective unless approved by the Legislature in the annual Budget Act.

Gov't. Code § 850.4: "Neither a public entity, nor a public employee acting in the scope of his employment, is liable for any injury resulting from the condition of fire protection or firefighting equipment or facilities or, except as provided in Article 1 (commencing with Section 17000) of Chapter 1 of Division 9 of the Vehicle Code, for any injury caused in fighting fires."

The Department of Forestry and Fire Protection was held to be immune from tort liability under Government Code section 850.4—which immunizes public entities and employees from liability "'for any injury caused in fighting fires,'" "'except as provided in'" Vehicle Code section 17000 et sequitur—where the plaintiffs were engulfed in a wildfire after their vehicle broke down and the firefighters placed them inside the firefighter's fire truck. The court reasoned there was a "latent ambiguity" in Government Code section 850.4 because "a literal interpretation of statute would . . . produce absurd consequences the Legislature did not intend" and "eliminate a very large portion of the immunity the Legislature intended to confer under section 850.4." (Varshock v. Department of Forestry & Fire Protection (2011) 194 Cal.App.4th 635, 643-644.)

"Government Code section 850.4 immunity exists 'when a firefighter operates a motor vehicle at the scene of a fire as part of efforts to rescue persons or property from the fire or otherwise combat the fire,' but 'immunity under section 850.4 does not apply, and potential liability under the Vehicle Code section 17001 exception exists, if injury results from a firefighter's tortious act or omission in the operation of a motor vehicle while proceeding from another location to a fire in response to an emergency call'" (Silva v. Langford (2022) 79 Cal.App.5th 710, 722-723.)

Civ. Code § 43.55(a): "There shall be no liability on the part of, and no cause of action shall arise against, any peace officer who makes an arrest pursuant to a warrant of arrest regular upon its face if the peace officer in making the arrest acts without malice and in the reasonable belief that the person arrested is the one referred to in the warrant."

See Sharp v. County of Orange (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 901, 920-921; discussing (1) "discretionary" immunity under Cal. Gov't. Code § 820.2; (2) "prosecutorial" immunity under Cal. Gov't. Code § 821.6; (3) arrest-warrant immunity under Cal. Civ. Code § 43.55(a); and (4) false-arrest immunity under Cal. Penal Code § 847(b), in an "unlawful retaliation" case.

> "The arrest-warrant immunity under Cal. Civ. Code § 43.55(a) shields officers from suit when executing an arrest warrant when they act with a 'reasonable belief' that the arrestee is the subject of the warrant. (fn. omitted) As we have already explained, however, the deputies unreasonably assumed that Sharp III was the warrant subject. This immunity therefore does not apply." (pg. 821.)

Pen. Code § 836(a), (b): Such arrest was lawful or when the officer, at the time of the arrest, had reasonable or probable cause to believe the arrest was lawful.

Pen. Code § 838: A magistrate orally ordered the officer to arrest a person who was committing a public offense in the magistrate's presence.

Pen. Code § 839: An officer was responding to an oral request for assistance in making an arrest.

Pen. Code § 847(b)(1): "There shall be no civil liability on the part of, and no cause of action shall arise against, any peace officer . . . for false arrest or false imprisonment arising out of any arrest under any of the following circumstances: [] The arrest was lawful, or the peace officer, at the time of the arrest, had reasonable cause to believe the arrest was lawful."

Gov't. Code § 821.6; (3) arrest-warrant immunity under Cal. Civ. Code § 43.55(a); and (4) false-arrest immunity under Cal. Penal Code § 847(b), in an "unlawful retaliation" case.

> > "The false-arrest immunity under Cal. Penal Code § 847(b)(1) protects officers from suit when they make an arrest that they had 'reasonable cause' to believe was lawful. (fn. omitted) As with the previous immunity, our conclusion that the arresting deputies lacked such a reasonable belief precludes the application of state-law immunity under Cal. Penal Code § 847(b)(1)." (pg. 921.)

Veh. Code § 17001: A statutory exception to public entities' general tort immunity: "A public entity is liable for death or injury to person or property proximately caused by a negligent or wrongful act or omission in the operation of any motor vehicle by an employee of the public entity acting within the scope of his employment.

Veh. Code § 17004: A public employee is not liable for civil damages on account of personal injury to or death of any person or damage to property resulting from the operation, in the line of duty, of an authorized emergency vehicle while responding to an emergency call or when in the immediate pursuit of an actual or suspected violator of the law, or when responding to but not upon returning from a fire alarm or other emergency call.

> However, a public entity's argument that the entity was also immunized from liability under Vehicle Code section 17001 for injuries caused by its police officers during a high-speed chase, even though the police officers enjoyed first-responder immunity under Vehicle Code § 17004, was rejected by the California Supreme Court. The Court explained that in considering whether Government Code § 815.2(b) applies, "[t]he question . . . is whether liability is 'otherwise provided by statute.' The Court held that it must be answered in the affirmative. (Brummett v. County of Sacramento (1978) 21 Cal.3rd 880, 885-886.)

Langford (2022) 79 Cal.App.5th 710, 716-717, where the defendant CHP officer was operating his patrol car in the line of duty and was responding to an emergency call when he struck and killed the plaintiffs' son. As such, the plaintiffs conceded on appeal that the officer was therefore immune from civil liability under Veh. Code § 17004. (pgs. 716-717.) However, the Court also noted that the officer's employing agency may not be: "(I)t appears to be desirable to provide by statute that a public entity is liable even when the employee is immune." (pg. 721.)

Veh. Code § 17004.7: Immunity of a Public Agency Employing Peace Officers in Civil Action Resulting From a Vehicular Pursuit:

> Limits the liability that § 17001 otherwise permits by affording immunity to public agencies that adopt and implement appropriate vehicle pursuit policies. (Ramirez v. City of Gardena (2018) 5 Cal.5th 995, 999.)
> Veh. Code § 17004.7(b)(1): A public agency employing peace officers that adopts and promulgates a written policy on, and provides regular and periodic training on an annual basis for, vehicular pursuits complying with subdivisions (c) and (d) is immune from liability for civil damages for personal injury to or death of any person or damage to property resulting from the collision of a vehicle being operated by an actual or suspected violator of the law who is being, has been, or believes he or she is being or has been, pursued in a motor vehicle by a peace officer employed by the public entity.

Because Sheriff's Deputies had been trained in accordance with the sheriff's vehicle pursuit policy, which included adequate consideration of speed limits under Pen. Code, § 13519.8(b), the sheriff's office was entitled to immunity under Veh. Code § 17004.7 in a personal injury suit brought by a motorcyclist who had been struck by fleeing suspects. The policy satisfied the promulgation requirement of V.C. § 17004.7(b)(2) because a general order requiring officers to sign off on all policies adequately ensured certification, an electronic sign-off procedure provided certification in writing consistent with Evid. Code § 250, and noncompliance by some officers did not amount to a failure to implement the policy. The policy complied with subdivision (c)(8) of V.C. § 17004.7 because it did not give officers unfettered discretion in determining whether to request air support. (Riley v. Alameda County Sheriff's Office (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 492.)

Summary judgment was improperly entered in favor of a city in a wrongful death and negligence action against it arising from the death of a motorcyclist who was the subject of a police vehicle pursuit when he crashed. In so holding, it was noted that the city was not entitled to immunity under Veh. Code § 17004.7, given the absence of vehicle pursuit training that met the standards imposed by Cal. Code Regs., tit. 11, § 1081, because not only did the city fail to present undisputed evidence that the training it provided in the year prior to the incident at issue met the annual one-hour standard, the city failed to dispute the fact, put forth by plaintiffs, that the training implemented by the city comprised a single video of less than half the required one-hour duration. (Flores v. City of San Diego (2022) 83 Cal.App.5th 360.)

Public Entities: Under California law, public entities are liable for violation of state law only as provided by statute. (Eastburn v. Reg'l Fire Prot. Auth. (2003) 31 Cal.4th 1175, 1183.)

Federal Immunity under the Public Readiness and Emergency Preparedness ("PREP") Act*: 42 U.S.C. § 247d-6d:

Reversing the district court's denial of Oregon State Governor Kate Brown and Director of the Oregon Health Authority Patrick Allen's motion to dismiss a claim brought by Oregon state inmates for damages stemming from defendants' assignment of a lower priority COVID-19 vaccination tier to state inmates than to correctional officers, the panel held that the civil defendants were immune from liability for the vaccination prioritization claim under the Public Readiness and Emergency Preparedness ("PREP") Act. At the start of the COVID-19 pandemic, Governor Brown and Director Allen, both responsible for crafting the state's response to the virus's spread, established priority tiers to guide the state's vaccine rollout, and assigned state prison inmates to a lower priority vaccination tier than correctional officers. On March 17, 2020, the Secretary of Health and Human Services issued a declaration announcing that COVID-19 constituted a public health emergency and that immunity as prescribed in the PREP Act was in effect for the "manufacture, testing, development, distribution, administration, and use of" covered countermeasures. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that the statutory requirements for the PREP Act immunity were met with respect to the vaccine prioritization damages claim because the "administration" of a covered countermeasure includes prioritization of that countermeasure when its supply was limited. The panel further concluded that the PREP Act's provisions extend immunity to persons who make policy-level decisions regarding the administration or use of covered countermeasures. The Ninth Circuit next held that the PREP Act provides immunity from suit and liability for constitutional claims brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Although the PREP Act does not specifically mention § 1983, Congress used terms that plainly and unambiguously define a broad scope of immunity that includes claims brought under § 1983. Congress, therefore, intended to expressly immunize covered persons from § 1983 actions for claims covered by the PREP Act, even if those claims are federal constitutional claims. (Maney v. Brown (9th Cir. 2024) 91 F.4th 1296.)

Case Law Immunity*:

Case Law Immunity from Civil Liability and the Requirement of a "Special Relationship:"

"As a general rule, a person who has not created a peril has no duty to come to the aid of another 'no matter how great the danger in which the other is placed, or how easily he could be rescued, unless there is some relationship between them which gives rise to a duty to act. [Citations.]' [Citation.] This rule applies to police officers as well as to other citizens: The police owe duties of care only to the public at large and, except where they enter into a 'special relationship,' have no duty to offer affirmative assistance to anyone in particular." (Benavidez v. San Jose Police Dept. (1999) 71 Cal.App.4th 853, 859–860.)

In a case in which a decedent's wife and family sued a county for wrongful death, negligence, negligent infliction of emotional distress, and a deprivation of constitutional rights, the trial court erred by ruling the county did not owe a duty of care. The sheriff's department, through its actions, undertook the responsibility of rescuing the lost decedent because the sheriff's department was actively involved in all aspects of locating the decedent, and by appointing an incident commander, the sheriff's department signaled that it was taking control of the rescue. (Arista v. County of Riverside (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1051, 1060-1066.)

In a wrongful death case, the Appellate Court concluded that an arrestee's negligence in swallowing methamphetamine was not relevant to the CHP officers' response, while his post-ingestion negligence was relevant. The trial court properly excluded evidence of the former and permitted the jury to consider evidence of the latter. The trial court did not err in denying defendants' motion in limine to exclude evidence or argument that the officers attempted to coerce the arrestee's confession to drug possession. It was relevant for the jury to understand that the arrestee had an incentive to lie about what he ingested and decline medical care in order to avoid admitting the crime of possession of a controlled substance, and to assess whether and how a reasonable officer would have taken this into account in responding to the situation. As a rule, one has no duty to come to the aid of another. A person who has not created a peril is not liable in tort merely for failure to take affirmative action to assist or protect another unless there is some relationship between them which gives rise to a duty to act. There is a special relationship between a jailer and prisoner. It has been observed that a typical setting for the recognition of a special relationship is where the plaintiff is particularly vulnerable and dependent upon the defendant who, correspondingly, has some control over the plaintiff's welfare. Therefore, once in custody, an arrestee is vulnerable, dependent, subject to the control of the officer and unable to attend to his or her own medical needs. Due to this special relationship, the officer owes a duty of reasonable care to the arrestee. (Frausto v. Department of the California Highway Patrol (2020) 53 Cal.App.5th 973.)

The trial court erred by denying the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation's motions for nonsuit and judgment notwithstanding the verdict after a jury found the Department was partially at fault for a parolee's crimes based upon the Department's failure to warn the victim of the parolee's dangerous propensities. The Court ruled that the evidence was insufficient to establish that a "special relationship" existed between the parole agents and the victim. Absent evidence that either agent who had been assigned to supervise the parolee had made an express or implied promise of protection causing detrimental reliance by the victim, who was the parolee's grandmother, in opening her home to the parolee, the Department had no civil liability. The evidence also did not demonstrate that either agent had created a foreseeable peril that was not readily discoverable by the victim because neither agent was shown to have been aware that the parolee posed a particularized threat of harm to the victim.

Effect of an Employer-Employee Relationship:

A police officer employed by the police department of the City and County of San Francisco (City) left his department-approved firearm unsecured in his vehicle after returning home from an assigned training session. That evening his vehicle was burglarized and the firearm stolen. Soon thereafter, plaintiff's son was killed with that weapon. Plaintiff sued the City, but the trial court granted the City's motion for summary judgment, finding as a matter of law the officer's conduct was not within the scope of his employment. The Appellate Court reversed, holding that in the context of the enterprise of policing, a jury could reasonably find the officer's failure to safely secure his weapon was "not so unusual or startling that it would seem unfair to include the loss (of an employee's firearm) resulting from it among other costs of the employer's business." (Perez v. City and County of San Francisco (2022) 75 Cal.App.5th 826; citing Farmers Ins. Group v. County of Santa Clara (1995) 11 Cal.4th 992, 1003.)

Effect of a Prior Conviction, Sentence, or Probable Cause Determination*:

Rule: Heck v. Humphrey (1994) 512 U.S. 477 [114 S.Ct. 2364; 129 L.Ed.2nd 383] bars a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 civil rights lawsuit if the lawsuit is inconsistent with a prior criminal conviction or sentence arising out of the same facts, unless the conviction or sentence has been subsequently resolved in the plaintiff's favor. (Id., at pp. 486-487.)

Heck requires the reviewing court to answer three questions:

(1) Was there an underlying conviction or sentence relating to the section 1983 claim?

(2) Would a "judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the section 1983 action necessarily imply the invalidity of the prior conviction or sentence?"

(3) If so, was the prior conviction or sentence already invalidated or otherwise favorably terminated?

(Fetters v. County of Los Angeles (2016) 243 Cal.App.4th 825, 834-835; citing Magana v. County of San Diego (S.D.Cal. 2011) 835 F.Supp.2nd 906, 910.)

> See also Yount v. City of Sacramento (2008) 43 Cal.4th 885, 893-894; extending Heck to California state law claims.

The Rule Under Heck: "'When a plaintiff who has been convicted of a crime under state law seeks damages in a § 1983 suit, "the district court must consider whether a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence.'" . . . If it would, the civil action is barred." (Reese v. County of Sacramento (9th Cir. 2018) 888 F.3rd 1030, 1045-1046; quoting Hooper v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2011) 629 F.3rd 1127, 1130.)

> In Reese, plaintiff was shot by a sheriff's deputy after displaying a knife. He later pled guilty to the misdemeanor crime of exhibiting a weapons in a rude and threatening manner, per P.C. § 417(a)(1). Upon suing the deputy in federal court pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 1983, for using unnecessary force in arresting him, the Court held that Heck did not prevent the plaintiff from bringing the lawsuit in that the deputy failed to identify anything in the record showing the specific factual basis for the plaintiff's misdemeanor conviction. "Without such information, this Court cannot determine that Reese's claim of excessive force in this case would call into question the validity of his misdemeanor weapon conviction." (Id., at p. 1046.)

The defendant's later withdrawal of his plea and dismissal of the case, following the completion of his sentence, does not negate the applicability of the rule of Heck. (Fetters v. County of Los Angeles (2016) 243 Cal.App.4th 825, 834-835, and fn. 6.)

However, a subsequent dismissal of the civil plaintiff's criminal conviction under P.C. § 1203.4 (permitting the dismissal of a guilty verdict after a person has successfully fulfilled their term of probation) does not invalidate the conviction for purposes of removing the Heck bar, and thus prevents the plaintiff from bringing a civil action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 where it was alleged that the plaintiff was the victim of excessive force used by a police officer/civil defendant and the criminal jury's guilty verdict necessarily found that the force used was not unreasonable under the circumstances. (Baranchik v. Fizulich (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 1210.)

Heck's holding has been extended to claims for declaratory relief. (Edwards v. Balisok (1997) 520 U.S. 641, 648 [117 S.Ct. 1584; 137 L.Ed.2nd 906].)

> The plaintiff in Edwards alleged that he had been deprived of earned good-time credits without due process of law, because the decision-maker in disciplinary proceedings had concealed > exculpatory evidence. Because the plaintiff's claim for declaratory relief was "based on allegations of deceit and bias on the part of the decision-maker that necessarily imply the invalidity of the punishment imposed," Edwards held, it was "not cognizable under § 1983." Id. Edwards went on to hold, however, that a requested injunction requiring prison officials to date-stamp witness statements was not Heck-barred, reasoning that a "prayer for such prospective relief will not 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of a previous loss of good-time credits, and so may properly be brought under § 1983." (Ibid.)

Heck bars 42 U.S. C. § 1983 suits even when the relief sought is prospective injunctive or declaratory relief, "if success in that action would necessarily demonstrate the invalidity of confinement or its duration." (Wilkinson v. Dotson (2005) 544 U.S. 74, 81-82 [125 S.Ct. 1242; 161 L.Ed.2nd 253].)

> However, Wilkinson also held that the plaintiffs in that case could seek a prospective injunction compelling the state to comply with constitutional requirements in parole proceedings in the future. The Court observed that the prisoners' claims for future relief, "if successful, will not necessarily imply the invalidity of confinement or shorten its duration." (Id., at 82.)

Although the Heck line of cases precludes most—but not all—requests for retrospective relief, that doctrine has no application to a request for an injunction enjoining prospective enforcement of the ordinances. (Martin v. City of Boise (9th Cir. 2019) 920 F.3rd 584, 611-613.)

> Certiorari has been granted in this case and is currently pending before the U.S. Supreme Court.

The theory of Heck prevented a plaintiff's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 suit for wrongful incarceration (I.e., 42 years) where, although pursuant to a plea bargain his prior 1972 jury conviction was vacated, plaintiff entered a new "no contest" plea in 2013 to the same charges for which he was sentenced to "time served." Allowing plaintiff's lawsuit to go forward "would necessarily imply the invalidity of his [2013] conviction or sentence," in violation of the rule of Heck. (Taylor v. County of Pima (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 930, 935.)

A federal district court's dismissal of defendant's Fourth Amendment excessive force § 1983 civil rights complaint was affirmed because it was barred by Heck v. Humphrey (1994) 512 U.S. 477 [114 S.Ct. 2364; 129 L.Ed.2nd 383]. Defendant had been charged with resisting arrest under Cal. Penal Code § 148(a)(1). Per the court, Hooper v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2011) 629 F.3rd 1127 (see below), did not help him in that the court could not separate out which of his obstructive acts led to his conviction since all of them did. The dog bite was unquestionably part of the actions that formed the basis of his conviction. The Court also ruled that he could not stipulate to the lawfulness of the dog bite as part of his § 148(a)(1) guilty plea and then use the very same act to allege an excessive force claim under § 1983 as success on such a claim would necessarily imply that his conviction was invalid. (Sanders v. City of Pittsburg (9th Cir. 2021) 14 F.4th 968.)

Exceptions:

Plaintiff appealed from the judgment of the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, which granted summary judgment to defendant on her excessive force claims, holding that the claims were barred as a result of her conviction for resisting a peace officer under Cal. Penal Code § 148(a)(1). The Ninth Circuit reversed. Cal. Penal Code § 148(a)(1) does not require that an officer's lawful and unlawful behavior be divisible into two discrete "phases," or time periods. It was sufficient for a valid conviction under Cal. Penal Code § 148(a)(1) that at some time during a continuous transaction an individual resisted, delayed, or obstructed an officer when the officer was acting lawfully. It did not matter that the officer might also, at some other time during that same "continuous transaction," have acted unlawfully. Accordingly, success in plaintiff's later 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983 excessive force claim would not necessarily have implied the invalidity of her Cal. Penal Code § 148 conviction. So plaintiff's excessive force claim was not barred by Heck. (Hooper v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2011) 629 F.3rd 1127.) Pleading guilty to a charge (possession of firearms on the grounds of the U.S. Capital) does not prevent defendant from challenging on appeal the constitutionality of the statute to which he pled guilty. (Class v. United States (2018) 583 U.S. 174 [138 S.Ct. 798; 200 L.Ed.2nd 37].)

Heck does not apply where the written record of a prior conviction fails to show the factual basis for that conviction. (Reese v. County of Sacramento (9th Cir. 2018) 888 F.3rd 1030, 1045-1046.)

The appellate court held that Heck did not bar a civil suit alleging the police use of excessive force after the person had been convicted in criminal court of disturbing the peace because the past conviction did not establish whether or not the officer used only reasonable force. The first criminal conviction thus is consistent with the second civil case. Whether the force used against plaintiff was reasonable remained unresolved. Therefore, plaintiff's excessive force suit could proceed. (Kon v. City of Los Angeles (2020) 49 Cal.App.5th 858.)

Reversing its own 3-justice decision (see 9th Cir. 2021) 5 F.4th 979), an en banc panel of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that the district court erred in granting a sheriff's deputy, county sheriff, and county, summary judgment under Heck v. Humphrey in an arrestee's (plaintiff's) action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 where she alleged that the deputy used excessive force in arresting her because the action was not barred on the basis that the plaintiff had been convicted under Penal Code § 148(a)(1) for willfully resisting, delaying, or obstructing the deputy during the same interaction. Because the record did not show the plaintiff's § 1983 action necessarily rested on the same event as her criminal conviction, success in the former would not necessarily imply the invalidity of the latter. The jury was told that it could find the arrestee guilty based on any one of four acts she committed during the course of her interaction with the deputy. Because the jury returned a general verdict, it was not know which act it thought constituted an offense. (Lemos v. County of Sonoma (9th Cir. 2022) 40 F.4th 1002.)

Where plaintiff's criminal charges were dismissed after entry of a plea was held in abeyance pending compliance with certain conditions, the district court erred in dismissing plaintiff's 42 U.S.C § 1983 claims because plaintiff pled no contest to the resisting arrest charge and the state court never entered an order finding him guilty. (Duarte v. City of Stockton (9th Cir. 2023) 60 F.4th 566, 570-573.]

Civil Suits Based Upon an Alleged Retaliation Theory*:

In the civil (42 U.S.C. § 1983) context, even if retaliation might have been a substantial motive for a city's Board of Education's action in failing to rehire the untenured plaintiff, because there were other incidents which, standing alone, would have justified the dismissal, there was no liability unless the alleged action committed by plaintiff was a "but-for cause" of the employment termination. There being other reasons cited for dismissing the plaintiff, the city had no liability. (Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Ed.* v. Doyle (1977) 429 U.S. 274 [97 S.Ct. 568; 50 L.Ed.2nd 471]; see also Board of Comm'rs, Wabaunsee Cty. v. *Umbehr (1996) 518 U.S. 668 [116 S.Ct. 2342; 135 L.Ed.2nd 843].)

Where plaintiff was prosecuted for violating various criminal statutes allegedly committed during his lobbying activities that were critical of the Postal Service, following his acquittal of those charges, it was held that whether or not plaintiff could maintain a civil lawsuit against the Postal Service for an alleged violation of his First Amendment freedom of expression rights hinged on whether or not there was probable cause to support the alleged criminal charges. "(A) plaintiff alleging a retaliatory prosecution must show the absence of probable cause for the underlying criminal charge." (Hartman* v. *Moore (2006) 547 U.S. 250 [126 S.Ct. 1695; 164 L.Ed.2nd 441].)

> It was further noted in Hartman that "(a)n action for retaliatory prosecution 'will not be brought against the prosecutor, who is absolutely immune from liability for the decision to prosecute.' . . . 'Instead, the plaintiff must sue some other government official and prove that the official 'induced the prosecutor to bring charges that would not have been initiated without his urging.'" (Id., at pp. 261-262.)

However, while a finding of probable cause may be a bar to a retaliatory prosecution, per Hartman, supra, the Supreme Court has held that the fact that plaintiff was arrested with probable cause is not a bar to civil suit alleging a retaliatory arrest. (Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach (June 18, 2018) __ U.S.__, __ [138 S.Ct. 1945; 201 L.Ed.2nd 342].)

> In Lozman, the plaintiff alleged "more governmental action than simply an arrest. His claim (was) that the City itself retaliated against him pursuant to an 'official municipal policy' of intimidation," under Monell v. Department of Social Services of the City of New York (1978) 436 U.S. 658 [98 S.Ct. 2018; 56 L.Ed.2nd 611]; (see "Civil Liability of an Employing Government Entity," below), thus separating his claim from the typical retaliatory arrest claim. (Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, supra, at p. __.)
> "(W)hen retaliation against (First Amendment) protected speech (and the right to petition government for redress of grievances) is elevated to the level of official policy, there is a compelling need for adequate avenues of redress," thus allowing for a federal 42 U.S.C. § 1983 lawsuit. (Id., at p. __.)
> In Lozman, where it was assumed, without deciding, that the City maintained an official policy discriminating against the plaintiff, the case was remanded to the Court of Appeal for a determination whether (among other issues) under Mt. Healthy, supra, the City had proved that it "would have arrested Lozman regardless of any retaliatory animus." (Id., at p. __.)

Sheriff's deputies who allegedly made defamatory statements and unlawfully entered a residence while attempting to execute a bench warrant that had been recalled were not acting in furtherance of the exercise of the constitutional right of petition under Code of Civ. Proc. § 425.16(e)(4) (Strategic Lawsuit Against Public Participation, or "Anti-SLAPP") with regard to executing the warrant, nor was any connection with an issue of public interest shown. Also, the alleged defamatory statements were not protected under Code of Civ. Proc. § 425.16(e)(1) because they were not made in a judicial proceeding or in preparation for litigation. Accordingly, the deputies did not meet their burden to show that the claims arose from protected activity, the burden never shifted to the claimant to establish a probability of prevailing on the merits, and the deputies' anti-SLAPP motion was properly denied. (Anderson v. Geist (2015) 236 Cal.App.4th 79, 84-90.)

Defendant's claim that two police officers retaliated against him for his protected First Amendment speech by arresting him for disorderly conduct and resisting arrest during a winter sports festival could not survive summary judgment. The only evidence of retaliatory animus identified by the court of appeals was defendant's affidavit alleging that one of the officers said; "Bet you wish you would have talked to me now." But that allegation said nothing about what motivated the second officer, who had no knowledge of defendant's prior run-in with the first officer. In any event, defendant's retaliatory arrest claim against both officers could not succeed because they had probable cause to arrest him. The existence of probable cause to arrest defendant defeated his First Amendment claim as a matter of law. (Nieves v. Bartlett (May 28, 2019) __ U.S. __ [139 S.Ct. 1715; 204 L.Ed.2nd 1].)

> Like retaliatory prosecution cases, evidence of the presence or absence of probable cause for the arrest will be available in virtually every retaliatory arrest case. Because probable cause speaks to the objective reasonableness of an arrest, its absence will--as in retaliatory prosecution cases--generally provide weighty evidence that the officer's animus caused the arrest, whereas the presence of probable cause will suggest the opposite. (Id., at p. __.)
> See Ballentine v. Tucker (9th Cir. 2022) 28 F.4th 54, at p. 62, for an exception to the general rule that the existence of probable cause to arrest typically precludes a finding of unconstitutional retaliation.

Plaintiff father sufficiently stated a First Amendment retaliation claim by alleging that a social worker coerced his former wife into filing an ex parte custody application, because his criticism of the agency was protected activity, the threat of losing custody would chill a person of ordinary firmness from voicing criticism of official conduct, and the social worker allegedly lacked any substantiated concern for the children's safety and treated him differently than his former wife. The social worker was not entitled to qualified immunity because a reasonable official would have known that threatening to terminate a parent's custody of his children, when such step would not have been taken absent retaliatory intent, violated the First Amendment. However, the father's Fourth Amendment claim failed because he failed to show interviews of the children at their school were seizures. (Capp v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2019) 940 F.3rd 1046.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed in part and vacated in part a federal district court's order dismissing a complaint on qualified immunity grounds, and remanded, in an action brought pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against the Los Angeles County Department of Children and Family Services and four individual employees alleging sexual harassment in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, retaliation under the First Amendment, and related constitutional claims. Department of Children and Family Services social workers were not entitled to qualified immunity on a guardian's First Amendment retaliation claim because it was clearly established at the time of the workers' conduct that the First Amendment prohibited them from threatening to remove the child from her custody to chill her protected speech about her having been sexually harassed. The Court reluctantly affirmed qualified immunity for the social workers on the guardian's Fourth Amendment equal protection claim because the right of private individuals to be free from sexual harassment at the hands of social workers was not clearly established at the time of their conduct even though the social workers clearly violated the Equal Protection Clause when they sexually harassed plaintiff while providing her with social services. (Sampson v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2020) 974 F.3rd 1012.)

The U.S. Supreme Court held that the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals plainly erred when it created a cause of action for the bed-and-breakfast owner's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim because Congress was better positioned to create remedies in the border-security context, and the Government already had provided alternative remedies that protected plaintiffs like the owner. Because matters intimately related to foreign policy and national security were rarely proper subjects for judicial intervention, a Bivens cause of action may not lie where national security was at issue. The Ninth Circuit also plainly erred when it created a cause of action for the bed-and-breakfast owner's First Amendment retaliation claim because there was no Bivens action for First Amendment retaliation. There were many reasons to think that Congress, not the courts, was better suited to authorize such a damages remedy. (*Egbert v. Boule (June 8, 2022) __ U.S. __ [142 S.Ct. 1793; 213 L.Ed.2nd 54], reversing Boule v. Egbert (9th Cir. 2020) 980 F.3rd 1309.)

Official reprisal for protected speech offends the Constitution because it threatens to inhibit exercise of the protected right, and the law is settled that as a general matter the First Amendment prohibits government officials from subjecting an individual to retaliatory actions for speaking out. A plaintiff in a civil suit making a First Amendment retaliation claim must allege that (1) he was engaged in a constitutionally protected activity, (2) the defendant's actions would chill a person of ordinary firmness from continuing to engage in the protected activity and (3) the protected activity was a substantial or motivating factor in the defendant's conduct. In this case, the district court erred in denying the illegal alien's habeas petition because the U.S. Supreme Court in Nieves v. Bartlett (May 28, 2019) __ U.S. __ [139 S.Ct. 1715; 204 L.Ed.2nd 1] (see above), a suit for damages brought under 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983 and arising out of a criminal arrest, did not extend to an alien's habeas challenge to his bond revocation. Also, the district court failed to apply the proper burden-shifting standard to the alien's retaliation claim. (Bello-Reyes v. Gaynor (9th Cir. 2021) 985 F.3rd 696.)

In a case involving practicing Muslims who sued under Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), claiming that federal FBI agents placed them on the "No Fly List" in retaliation for their refusal to act as informants against their religious communities, the Court held that RFRA's express remedies provision permits litigants, when appropriate, to obtain money damages against federal officials in their individual capacities. Under RFRA's definition, relief that can be executed against an "official of the United States" is relief against a government. Given that RFRA reinstated pre-Smith (see below) protections and rights, parties suing under RFRA must have at least the same avenues for relief against officials that they would have had before Smith. That means RFRA provides, as one avenue for relief, a right to seek damages against government employees. (Tanzin v. Tanvir (Dec. 10, 2020) __ U.S. __ [141 S.Ct. 486; 208 L.Ed.2nd 295].)

In a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 suit, arrestees/plaintiffs, who were engaged in protesting police activities by writing messages in chalk on police and other public property, sufficiently showed that their arrests were done in retaliation for their exercise of their First Amendment rights because a reasonable factfinder could conclude that the anti-police content of the arrestees' chalk messages was a substantial or motivating factor for their arrests, particularly as the arresting officer knew that the arrestees were activists that were vocally critical of the police. The arresting officer was not entitled to qualified immunity because it was clearly established at the time of the arrests that an arrest, even though supported by probable cause, but made in retaliation for protected speech, violated the First Amendment. (Ballentine v. Tucker (9th Cir. 2022) 28 F.4th 54.)

> The Court in Ballentine (at p. 62) notes an exception to the general rule that the existence of "probable cause" to arrest generally defeats any argument that the arrest was in retaliation for the plaintiff's acts. Per the Ninth Circuit: "(T)he Supreme Court also carved out a "narrow" exception for cases where "officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so. . . . To be sure, the Nieves exception applies only 'when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'" (Citing Capp v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2019) 940 F.3d 1046, 1056, and quoting Nieves v. Bartlett (May 28, 2019) __ U.S. __, at p. __ [139 S.Ct. 1715, at p. 1727; 204 L.Ed.2nd 1].)

In a suit under 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983 involving a school district that severed its longstanding business relationship with a company that provided field trip venues for public school children following the company's owner making allegedly controversial social media postings, there was a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether plaintiffs' First Amendment rights were violated. However, the school officials were entitled to qualified immunity as to plaintiffs' damages claims because the right at issue was not clearly established when the conduct took place. The court therefore reversed the district court's grant of summary judgment to the school officials on plaintiffs' claim for injunctive relief, because there was a genuine issue of material fact whether the school officials were maintaining an unconstitutional, retaliatory policy barring future patronage to the vendor. (Riley's American Heritage Farms v. Elsasser (9th Cir. 2022) 29 F.4th 484.)

Doctrine of "Issue Preclusion" or "Collateral Estoppel."

Rule:

> Based upon the United States Constitution's "Full Faith and Credit Clause," recognition must be given by each state and the federal government to each other states' public acts, records, and judicial Proceedings. (U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1.)
>
> "Issue preclusion," or "collateral estoppel," precludes relitigation of an issue already litigated and determined in a previous proceeding between the same parties. Clark (v. Bear Stearns & Co., Inc. (9th Cir. 1992) 966 F.2nd 1318,) at 1320. A federal court applying issue preclusion 'must give state court judgments the preclusive effect that those judgments would enjoy under the law of the state in which the judgment was rendered.' Far Out Prods., Inc. v. Oskar, 247 F.3rd 986, 993 (9th Cir. 2001)." (Pike v. Hester (9th Cir. 2018) 891 F.3rd 1131, 1138; finding the issue of an alleged Fourth Amendment violation to have been decided on the merits by a Nevada State Justice Court, preventing its relitigation in federal court upon the filing of a federal civil suit. Pgs. 1137-1141.)

The Doctrine:

> "'The law of preclusion helps to ensure that a dispute resolved in one case is not relitigated in a later case. Although the doctrine has ancient roots [citation], its contours and associated terminology have evolved over time. We now refer to "claim preclusion" rather than 'res judicata' [citation], and use "issue preclusion" in place of "direct or collateral estoppel" [citations].' (Samara v. Matar (2018) 5 Cal.5th 322, 326. . . .) [⁋] 'Claim and issue preclusion have different requirements and effects.' (Samara, supra, 5 Cal.5th at p. 326.) 'Claim preclusion "prevents relitigation of the same cause of action in a second suit between the same parties or parties in privity with them."' (DKN Holdings LLC v. Faerber (2015) 61 Cal.4th 813, 824. . . . .) 'Claim preclusion arises if a second suit involves (1) the same cause of action (2) between the same parties (3) after a final judgment on the merits in the first suit.' (Ibid.) [⁋] 'Issue preclusion prohibits the relitigation of issues argued and decided in a previous case, even if the second suit raises different causes of action. [Citation.] Under issue preclusion, the prior judgment conclusively resolves an issue actually litigated and determined in the first action.' (DKN Holdings, supra, 61 Cal.4th at p. 824.) '[I]ssue preclusion applies (1) after final adjudication (2) of an identical issue (3) actually litigated and necessarily decided in the first suit and (4) asserted against one who was a party in the first suit or one in privity with that party.' (Id. at p. 825.) [⁋] Even if these threshold requirements are satisfied, courts may consider the public policies underlying issue preclusion in determining whether the doctrine should be applied. (Murray v. Alaska Airlines, Inc. (2010) 50 Cal.4th 860, 879. . . .) These policies include 'conserving judicial resources and promoting judicial economy by minimizing repetitive litigation, preventing inconsistent judgments which undermine the integrity of the judicial system, and avoiding the harassment of parties through repeated litigation.' (Ibid.)" (Meridian Financial Services v. Phan (2021) 67 Cal.App.4th 657, 686-687.) Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1738, federal courts must "give to a state-court judgment the same preclusive effect as would be given that judgment under the law of the State in which the judgment was rendered." (Rodriguez v. City of San Jose (9th Cir. July 23, 2019) 930 F.3rd 1123, 1130; quoting Migra v. Warren City Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ. (1984) 465 U.S. 75, 81 [104 S.Ct. 892; 79 L.Ed.2nd 56].).

> This requirement has equal force in federal civil suits brought under the authority of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. (Rodriguez v. City of San Jose, supra, citing Allen v. McCurry (1980) 449 U.S. 90, 97-98 [101 S.Ct. 411; 66 L.Ed.2nd 308].)

Two Forms: There are two forms of "preclusion" (Rodriguez v. City of San Jose (9th Cir. 2019) 930 F.3rd 1123, 1130):

1. "Claim," also known as "Res Judicata."

> "Claim preclusion" provides that a final judgment forecloses successive litigation of the very same claim, whether or not relitigation of the claim raises the same issues as the earlier suit. (Id., citing White v. City of Pasadena (9th Cir. 2012) 671 F.3rd 918, 926; see also Parkford Owners for a Better Community v. Windeshausen (2022) 81 Cal.App.5th 216.)
> > "'The law of preclusion helps to ensure that a dispute resolved in one case is not relitigated in a later case. Although the doctrine has ancient roots [citation], its contours and associated terminology have evolved over time.' (Samara v. Matar (2018) 5 Cal.5th 322, 326 . . . . Courts have at times used "res judicata"—"Latin for 'a thing adjudicated'"—as an umbrella term, encompassing both the primary aspect of claim preclusion and the secondary aspect of issue preclusion." (Parkford Owners for a Better Community v. Windeshausen, supra, at pp. 224-225.)

"As generally understood, '[t]he doctrine of res judicata gives certain conclusive effect to a former judgment in subsequent litigation involving the same controversy.'" (Italics added; State Compensation Insurance fund v. ReadyLink Healthcare, Inc. (2020) 50 Cal.App.5th 422, 446; quoting People v. Barragan (2004) 32 Cal.4th 236, 252.)

2. "Issue," also known as "Collateral Estoppel."

"Issue preclusion," in contrast, bars successive litigation of an issue of fact or law actually litigated and resolved in a valid court determination essential to the prior judgment in prior, separate proceeding, even if the issue recurs in the context of a different claim." (Rodriguez v. City of San Jose, supra, quoting Taylor v. Sturgell (2008) 553 U.S. 880, 892 [128 S.Ct. 2161; 171 L.Ed.2nd 155].)

Issue preclusion applies when six criteria are satisfied:

1. The issue sought to be precluded from relitigation must be identical to that decided in a former proceeding;

2. The issue to be precluded must have been actually litigated in the former proceeding;

3. The issue to be precluded must have been necessarily decided in the former proceeding;

4. The decision in the former proceeding must be final and on the merits;

5. The party against whom preclusion is sought must be the same as, or in privity with, the party to the former proceeding; and

6. Application of issue preclusion must be consistent with the public policies of preservation of the integrity of the judicial system, promotion of judicial economy, and protection of litigants from harassment by vexatious litigation.

(Lucido v. Superior Court (1990) 51 Cal.3rd 335; see also Rodriguez v. City of San Jose, infra, at p. 1131, referring to the above as the "Lucido factors.")

In denying defendant's petition to vacate a murder conviction under Pen. Code § 1172.6, the trial court's finding that defendant was the actual killer should not have been based on facts stated in the appellate opinion affirming his conviction, but the error was harmless because standard principles of issue preclusion applied and the issue of whether defendant was the shooter was actually litigated. The firearm enhancements were alleged in the information; they were submitted to the jury for determination; and the jury made a true finding on them. In addition, the prosecution introduced evidence that defendant was the shooter. Moreover, trial counsel did have an incentive to contest the issue but made a tactical decision not to; it did not matter that it was unforeseeable that the issue would have additional future consequences. (People v. Bratton (2023) 95 Cal.App.5th 1100.)

Forfeiture: The Ninth Circuit has also found "issue preclusion" arguments less likely to be forfeited by a party's failure to raise the issue on appeal than "claim preclusion," given the stronger public interest in the former to have the matter litigated and settled. (Rodriguez v. City of San Jose (9th Cir. 2019) 930 F.3rd 1123, 1030-1131.)

Case Law:

Defendant had been charged with several other men of robbing six men, but was acquitted at trial on one of the robbery counts based on insufficient evidence that he was one of the robbers. He was then retried and convicted under a separate robbery count, unsuccessfully appealing his conviction and unsuccessfully seeking a writ of habeas corpus to hear his claim that his second prosecution violated his right not to be put in jeopardy twice. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that "collateral estoppel," or "issue preclusion," was a part of the guarantee under the Fifth Amendment against double jeopardy. The Court reviewed the record to determine if defendant's criminal conviction could have been decided upon any issue other than that which he sought to foreclose from consideration. The Court found that the only rationally conceivable issue in dispute before the jury in defendant's first trial was whether he was one of the robbers. Since the jury had concluded that he was not, collateral estoppel made his second prosecution for the robbery unconstitutional and

The question of whether a finding of probable cause in a preliminary hearing precludes a subsequent false arrest civil suit (i.e., "collateral estoppel," or "issue preclusion") has been certified to the California Supreme Court by the federal Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal for decision, given the conflict in the case law. (Patterson v. City of Yuba City (2018) 884 F.3rd 838; citing McCutchen v. City of Montclair (4th Dist. 1999) 73 Cal.App.4th 1138, 1146 [Yes, "in some situations"], and Schmidlin v. City of Palo Alto (6th Dist. 2007) 157 Cal.App.4th 728, 767 [No].)

In Rodriguez v. City of San Jose (9th Cir. 2019) 930 F.3rd 1123, 1130-1136, plaintiff sued the City of San Jose in federal court, seeking the return of firearms seized when her husband was taken into custody for a mental health evaluation pursuant to W&I Code § 5150, claiming that the City's refusal to return the firearms was a violation of her Second Amendment rights. Prior to her seeking the return of the firearms, the City had petitioned in California Superior Court to retain the firearms under W&I Code § 8102(c) on the ground that the firearms would endanger plaintiff's husband or another member of the public. Plaintiff had objected at the hearings on that petition, arguing that the confiscation and retention of the firearms, in which she had ownership interests, violated her Second Amendment rights. The court granted the City's petition over petitioner's objection; a decision that was upheld on appeal in an unpublished decision. (See C*ity of San Jose v. Rodriguez (2015) 2015 Cal.App. Unpub. LEXIS 2315.) Plaintiff, after reregistering the firearms under her own name alone, and obtaining gun release clearances from the Department of Justice, then filed this federal lawsuit seeking the return of the firearms to her custody. The federal district court granted the City's summary judgement motion. The Ninth Circuit affirmed, ruling that the issue had already been decided by the California state courts and that under the doctrine of "issue preclusion," the federal courts would not re-decide the issue.

Where a Pakistani alien, who was granted asylum, was denied adjustment of status on the basis that he was inadmissible for having supported a Tier III terrorist organization, collateral estoppel did not apply during the adjustment of status hearing to preclude litigation of the alien's terrorism-related activities because the issue of terrorism-related inadmissibility was not actually litigated at the asylum proceedings. An issue is actually litigated for purposes of collateral estoppel only if it was raised, contested, and submitted for determination in the prior adjudication. (Janjua v. Neufeld (9th Cir. 2019) 933 F.3rd 1061.)

When defendant is found not guilty on a traffic citation after having testified that he was not the driver of the car involved, but there is evidence that he testified falsely (i.e., committed perjury), he cannot later be prosecuted for that perjury. To do so violates the Fifth Amendment's double jeopardy protections. (Wilkinson v. Magrann (9th Cir. 2019) 781 F.3rd Appx 669 (unpublished).)

Claim preclusion was held in a civil case not to bar a competitor from asserting its settlement agreement defense in a third action with the trademark holder where that case involved different marks, different legal theories, and different conduct occurring at different times. Thus, the third action and the previous action lacked a common nucleus of operative facts. Moreover, case law did not support a version of defense preclusion doctrine that extended to the facts of the instant case in that the competitor's defense in the third action did not threaten the judgment issues in the prior action. (Lucky Brand Dungarees, Inc. v. Marcel Fashions Group, Inc. (May 14, 2020) __ U.S. __ [140 S.Ct. 1589; 206 L.Ed.2nd 893].)

The trial court in Santa Clara County did not err in giving preclusive effect to an Orange County's judge's unclean hands finding and granting summary judgment to respondents based on that finding. The Orange County decision was sufficiently firm, and therefore final for purposes of issue preclusion notwithstanding a stipulated order partly vacating it. The unclean hands finding was not dicta. The evidence of appellants' misconduct and the determination that appellants acted with unclean hands were a substantial focus of the decision and not mere commentary on extraneous issues of fact or law. (Meridian Financial Services v. Phan (2021) 67 Cal.App.4th 657.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, in a split, 2-to-1 decision, vacated the district court's dismissal of a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 action brought against the City of Pasadena and several of its police officers. In 2018, petitioner Shane Love filed a federal Terry action against the Defendants, seeking to recover for the death of Reginald Thomas, a father figure to petitioner. The Terry action, which included a section 1983 claim, was dismissed with prejudice for lack of Article III standing in 2019. Petitioner then filed a nearly identical lawsuit in California state court, which the defendants removed to federal court and successfully moved to dismiss based on issue preclusion. The Ninth Circuit held that a plain reading of the first district court's judgment established that Article III standing was actually litigated and decided, although erroneously. However, erroneous, unappealed judgments are still owed preclusive effect. The Court concluded that issue preclusion was available, and petitioner was bound by the prior standing determination. While issue preclusion was available, the Court held that the defendants waived issue preclusion by removing the refiled case to federal court because a removing defendant voluntarily invokes and acquiesces to the federal courts and bears the burden of establishing subject-matter jurisdiction and Article III standing. Accordingly, the Court vacated and remanded to the second and current district court to determine, in the first instance, whether jurisdiction lies in the federal courts and whether petitioner adequately stated a claim, if the defendants pursue such an argument on remand. (Love v. Villacana (9th Cir. 2023) 73 F.4th 751.)

Examples Where Issue Preclusion Found Not to Apply:

The district court was held to have erred in holding that the probable cause determination made at a prior preliminary hearing precluded plaintiff from asserting in his federal lawsuit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging that the defendant officers lacked probable cause to arrest and detain him because plaintiff's argument alleged that the officers fabricated evidence or undertook other wrongful conduct in bad faith, such allegations creating a triable issue of material fact as to whether or not probable cause in fact existed. The district court's grant of summary judgment to the police defendants was reversed because the officers did not offer any evidence that negated the evidence in defendant's sworn statement. (Scafidi v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department (9th Cir. 2020) 966 F.3rd 960.)

A trial court erred in denying a wife's request to renew a restraining order against her former husband under California's Domestic Violence Prevention Act based on "issue preclusion" because issue preclusion did not apply. The court thus erroneously considered only whether the husband committed acts of domestic violence during a narrow window of time when the original restraining order was in effect, and not whether the wife had a reasonable fear of future abuse in light of all relevant facts and circumstances. The trial court then compounded its error in granting the motion in limine by also excluding evidence underlying the original restraining order (even though the husband did not request that relief) because it wrongly believed that it could not consider that evidence. (Marriage of Brubaker and Strum (2021) 73 Cal.App.5th 525.)

"Law of the Case" Doctrine:

"The law-of-the-case doctrine generally provides that 'when a court decides upon a rule of law, that decision should continue to govern the same issues in subsequent stages in the same case.'" Musacchio v. United States (2016) 577 U.S. 237 [136 S.Ct. 709, 716; 193 L.Ed.2nd 639]; quoting Pepper v. United States (2011) 562 U.S. 476, 506 [131 S.Ct. 1229; 179 L. Ed.2nd 196].)

"The law of the case doctrine does not preclude a court from reassessing its own legal rulings in the same case. The doctrine applies most clearly where an issue has been decided by a higher court; in that case, the lower court is precluded from reconsidering the issue and abuses its discretion in doing so except in the limited circumstances the district court identified." (Askins v. United States Department of Homeland Security (9th Cir. 2018) 899 F.3rd 1035, 1042, citing United States v. Cuddy (9th Cir. 1987) 147 F.3rd 1111, 1114; United States v. > In Askins, it was held that the trial court erroneously held that "the law of the case" doctrine precluded the court from reconsidering the issues upon the filing of an amended complaint, holding that: "Once the plaintiff elects to file an amended complaint, the new complaint is the only operative complaint before the district court." (at p. 1043; citing Ferdik v. Bonzelet (9th Cir. 1992) 963 F.2nd 1258, 1262.)
> "The rule is that the mandate of an appeals court precludes the district court on remand from reconsidering matters which were either expressly or implicitly disposed of upon appeal. (United States v. Miller, supra.)
> "The legal effect of the doctrine of the law of the case depends upon whether the earlier ruling was made by a trial court or an appellate court. . . . A trial court may not, however, reconsider a question decided by an appellate court." (United States v. Houser, supra.)

"A court may also decline to revisit its own rulings where the issue has been previously decided and is binding on the parties—for example, where the district court has previously entered a final decree or judgment. . . . The law of the case doctrine does not, however, bar a court from reconsidering its own orders before judgment is entered or the court is otherwise divested of jurisdiction over the order." (Askins v. United States Department of Homeland Security, supra, at pp. 1042-1043; citing City of Los Angeles v. Santa Monica Baykeeper (9th Cir. 2001) 254 F.3rd 882, 888-889; United States v. Houser, supra, at p. 567; and Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(b) "[A]ny order or other decision, however designated, that adjudicates fewer than all the claims or the rights and liabilities of fewer than all the parties . . . may be revised at any time before the entry of a judgment adjudicating all the claims and all the parties' rights and liabilities.")

Summary Judgment:

An Appellate Court is to review a trial court's granting of summary judgment in a civil case "de novo." The Court is to determine whether "taking the evidence and all reasonable inferences drawn therefrom in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, there are no genuine issues of material fact." In the absence of material factual disputes, the objective reasonableness of a police officer's conduct is "a pure question of law." (Lowry v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2017) 858 F.3rd 1248, 1254; citing and quoting Torres v. City of Madera (9th Cir. 2011) 648 F.3rd 1119, 1123; and Scott v. Harris (2007) 550 U.S. 372, 381 n.8 [127 S.Ct. 1769; 167 L. Ed.2nd 686].)

"A motion for summary judgment shall be granted when 'all the papers submitted show that there is no triable issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law.' [Citation.] A summary adjudication is properly granted only if a motion therefor completely disposes of a cause of action, an affirmative defense, a claim for damages, or an issue of duty. [Citation.] Motions for summary adjudication proceed in all procedural respects as a motion for summary judgment." (Jameson v. Desta (2015) 241 Cal.App. 4th 491, 497; quoting Jameson v Desta (2013) 215 Cal.App.4th 1144, 1163.)

"On appeal, the reviewing court makes 'an independent assessment of the correctness of the trial court's ruling, applying the same legal standard as the trial court in determining whether there are any genuine issues of material fact or whether the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'" (Jameson v. Desta, supra, 241 Cal.App.4th 491; citing Trop v. Sony Pictures Entertainment, Inc. (2005) 129 Cal.App.4th 1133, 1143; which quotes Iverson v. Muroc Unified School Dist. (1995) 32 Cal.App.4th 218, 222-223.)

In a summary judgment finding favoring the civil defendants, the appellate court is to "independently review the record that was before the trial court when it ruled on defendants' motion. [Citations.] In so doing, (the Court will) view the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiffs as the losing parties, resolving evidentiary doubts and ambiguities in their favor." (B.H. v. County of San Bernardino (2015) 62 Cal.4th 168, 178; quoting Elk Hills Power, LLC v. Board of Equalization (2013) 57 Cal.4th 593, 605-606.)

Directed Verdict:

"A directed verdict (in a civil suit) in favor of a (civil) defendant (or a civil plaintiff) is proper if, after disregarding conflicting evidence and drawing every legitimate inference in favor of the plaintiff, there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of the plaintiff (or defendant). (Wolf v. Walt Disney Pictures & Television (2008) 162 Cal.App.4th 1107, 1119 . . . .) In ruling on the motion, the trial court may not weigh the evidence, consider conflicting evidence or judge the credibility of witnesses. (Hilliard v. A.H. Robines Co. (1938) 148 Cal.App.3rd 374, 395 . . . .) Appellate review of an order granting a directed verdict is quite strict, with all inferences and presumption drawn against such orders. (Alshafie v. Lallande (2009) 171 Cal.App.4th 421, 432 . . . .) The reviewing court must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff (or defendant), resolve all conflicts in the evidence and draw all inferences in the plaintiff's (or defendant's) favor, and disregard conflicting evidence. (Wolf, supra, at p. 1119.) (Guillory v. Hill (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 240, 249.)

In federal court, see Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 50(a): "(I)f, under the governing law, there can be but one reasonable conclusion as to the verdict." (Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc. (1986) 477 U.S. 242, 250 [91 L.Ed.2nd 202] Conversely, "[i]f reasonable minds could differ as to the import of the evidence, . . . a verdict should not be directed." (Id., at pp. 250-251.) When deciding whether to grant a Rule 50(a) motion, "[t]he court must draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the nonmoving party, and it may not make credibility determinations or weigh the evidence." (Reeves v. Sanderson Plumbing Prods., Inc. (2000) 530 U.S. 133, 150 [120 S.Ct. 2097; 147 L.Ed.2nd 105].)

Civil Liability of an Employing Government Entity:

Monell v. Department of Social Services of the City of New York (1978) 436 U.S. 658 [98 S.Ct. 2018; 56 L.Ed.2nd 611].): Municipalities may not be held vicariously liable for the unconstitutional acts of their employees under the theory of "respondeat superior."

> "To prevail on a municipal liability claim, a plaintiff must show that the city 'had a deliberate policy, custom, or practice that was the 'moving force' behind the constitutional violation he suffered.' Galen v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 477 F.3d 652, 667 (9th Cir. 2007) (quoting Monell v. Dep't of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 694, 98 S. Ct. 2018, 56 L. Ed. 2d 611 (1978)). 'To meet this causation requirement, the plaintiff must establish both causation-in-fact and proximate causation.' Harper v. City of Los Angeles, 533 F.3d 1010, 1026 (9th Cir. 2008). 'The requisite causal connection can be established not only by some kind of direct personal participation in the deprivation, but also by setting in motion a series of acts by others which the [government] actor knows or reasonably should know would cause others to inflict the constitutional injury.' Lacey v. Maricopa Cnty., 693 F.3d 896, 915 (9th Cir. 2012) (quoting Johnson v. Duffy, 588 F.2d 740, 743-44 (9th Cir. 1978))." (Sinclair v. City of Seattle (2023) 61 F.4th 674, 680, fn. 3.)
> A governmental entity may be held liable for the torts of its employees:
>
> > (1) When the individual who committed the constitutional tort was an official with final policy-making authority or such an official ratified a subordinate's unconstitutional decision or action and the basis for it;
> > (2) When implementation of its official policies or established customs inflicts the constitutional injury; and

(3) When "omissions," including the failure to train employees, "amount to the local government's own official policy."

(Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006.), citing Clouthier v. County of Contra Costa (9th Cir. 2010) 591 F.3rd 1232, 1249, and finding that a reasonable jury could find liability under the first category above.)

In Wheatcroft, the Court discussed three possible theories for finding Monell liability, with the findings, as indicated:

> Ratification: "Here, no triable issue of fact exists as to the City of Glendale's ratification of the Officers' conduct, so summary judgment is granted for Defendant City of Glendale." (pgs. 43-45.)
>
> Policies, Customs, Practices: Although "(a) municipality may be held liable if a plaintiff can 'prove that (1) he was deprived of a constitutional right; (2) the municipality had a policy; (3) the policy amounted to deliberate indifference to [plaintiff's] constitutional right; and (4) the policy was the moving force behind the constitutional violation," (Citing Lockett v. County. of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2020) 977 F.3rd 737, 741.), (and a) policy within the meaning of Monell exists where official policy makers 'consciously' choose a particular course of action or procedure 'from among various alternatives,'" in this case, plaintiff was not the driver of the car stopped by the defendant police officers, but rather a mere passenger. Plaintiff's allegation, therefore, that defendants had "the practice of stopping vehicles for turn signal violations even when the elements [of a turn signal violation] were not met" in that it was not plaintiff who was stopped for making an illegal turn. (pgs. 46-47.)
>
> Failure to Train and Supervise: To find this element to be relevant, it must be shown that the defendant officers' supervisors showed "deliberate indifference" in a failure to train or supervise the officers, and that there is a "direct causal link between a municipal policy or custom and the alleged constitutional deprivation." Here, the plaintiff was held to have failed to "provide any specific allegations or facts that would support a claim that the City of Glendale was deliberately indifferent to the rights of citizens in failing to train or supervise its police officers in a manner that would give rise to liability under § 1983." Summary > judgment was therefore granted to the City of Glendale. (pgs. 47-49.)

"(I)n a (42 U.S.C.) § 1983 case a city or other local governmental entity cannot be subject to liability at all unless the harm was caused in the implementation of 'official municipal policy.'" (Monell v. Department of Social Services of the City of New York, supra, at p. 691; citing also Los Angeles County* v. *Humphries (2010) 562 U.S. 29, 36 [131 S.Ct. 447; 178 L.Ed.2nd 460]; see also Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach (June 18, 2018) __ U.S.__, __ [138 S.Ct. 1945; 201 L.Ed.2nd 342].)

"A municipality may be liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for constitutional violations inflicted by its employees 'when the execution of the government's policy or custom . . . inflicts the injury.' (Citations)" (Lowry v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2017) 858 F.3rd 1248, 1266.)

"Municipalities and other local governmental units are 'persons' subject to suit under (42 U.S.C.) § 1983, but to prevail on a claim against a municipal entity for a constitutional violation, a plaintiff must also show that his or her injury is attributable 'to official municipal policy of some nature.'" (Kirkpatrick v. County of Washoe (9th Cir. 2016) 843 F.3rd 784, 788.)

> A government entity may be civilly liable when the plaintiff's constitutional injury (i.e., a warrantless seizure of an infant from her mother, in this case) was the result of a "systemic failure to train" its officers, "pursuant 'to (an) official . . . policy of some nature.'" Liability exists only where the failure to properly train its employees reflects a "conscious choice" by the government; i.e., it is intentional. "In other words, the government's omission must amount to a 'policy' of deliberate indifference to constitutional rights." In proving a deliberate indifference, a "showing of 'obviousness' can substitute for the pattern of violations ordinarily necessary to establish municipal culpability." (Id., at pp. 793-794.)

"A § 1983 plaintiff can establish municipal liability in three ways: (1) the municipal employee committed the constitutional violation pursuant to an official policy; (2) the employee acted pursuant to a longstanding practice or custom; and (3) the employee functioned as a final policymaker." (Barone v. City of Springfield (9th Cir. 2018) 902 F.3rd 1091, 1107; citing Lytle v. Carl (9th Cir. 2004) 382 F.3rd 978, 982.)

However, it was not err for a trial court to sustain the county's demurrer to the deprivation of rights cause of action in that the plaintiffs' Monell claim failed to allege facts supporting a finding of deliberate indifference. (Arista v. County of Riverside (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1051, 1060-1066.)

To establish Monell liability, the Court need not apply a "shocks the conscience" standard in order for the parents of children taken by the County, where child abuse was suspected, to establish a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim. A Monell claim may be based on the County's undisputed policy or practice of failing to notify parents of medical examinations of the children, for which the parents are only required to prove that the County acted with "the state of mind required to prove the underlying violation." (See Gibson v. County of Washoe, Nev. (9th Cir. 2002) 290 F.3rd 1175, 1185-1186.) The County's deliberate adoption of its policy or practice "establishes that the municipality acted culpably." (Mann v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2018) 907 F.3rd 1154, 1163-1164.)

The federal government properly prevailed in a civil action under the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act, 34 U.S.C. § 12601, which prohibits any governmental authority from engaging in a pattern or practice of conduct by law enforcement officers or government agents that deprive persons of constitutional rights. Section 12601 specifically allows for respondeat superior liability. The record here shows that the town had a practice of discrimination against residents who were not members of a particular church. Unlike claims under § 1983, § 12601 does not require a showing of an official municipal policy of violating residents' constitutional rights, and thus, Monell does not apply to § 12601 claims because the statute does not explicitly limit liability to those who caused citizens or persons to be subjected to a deprivation of their constitutional rights. (United States v. Town of Colorado City (9th Cir. 2019) 935 F.3rd 804.)

To establish Monell liability, it is not necessary that a civil plaintiff show evidence of a department's formal policy or deficient training. Evidence of an informal practice or custom will suffice. (Nehad v. Browder (9th Cir. 2019) 929 F.3rd 1125, 1141-1142; reversing the trial court's granting of summary judgment, holding that plaintiff was at least entitled to a jury determination of the existence of an informal policy or practice relating to the use of deadly force.)

Gov't. Code § 945.3 provides that a plaintiff (criminal defendant) may not file a civil Monell claim while the underlying criminal charges, related to the plaintiff's claim that officers used excessive force, are pending. Thus the statute of limitation is tolled on the plaintiff's Monell lawsuit (i.e., that the officers' government employer is responsible) for that period of time that those charges are pending, up until when the criminal charges against the plaintiff are dismissed. (Lockett v. County of Los Angeles (2020) 977 F.3rd 737.)

A federal district court did not err by dismissing the decedent's son's 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983 claim against the city (a "Monell claim") because he alleged no facts that indicated that any deficiency in training actually caused the police officers' alleged indifference to the decedent's medical needs. The district court did not err by dismissing the decedent's son's claims against the individual officers because he did not plausibly allege a violation of the decedent's constitutional rights. Before falling unconscious, defendant gave alternative explanations for having vomited, denied having ingested anything, and insisted she did not want to go to jail. In addition, the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because the officers' failure to recognize and respond to the decedent's serious medical need was not clearly established under the facts of the case. (J.K.J. v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2021) 17 F.4th 1247.)

In an action brought by plaintiffs, a journalist and a magazine, alleging that city police officers violated their First Amendment rights when they prevented the journalist from engaging in dialogue with a protester under threat of arrest, the officer was entitled to qualified immunity because plaintiffs had not identified any clearly established right that the officer violated in enforcing separate protest zones. Also, the city could not be held liable under a Monell theory because even assuming city police officers violated the journalist's First Amendment rights, nothing in the complaint plausibly alleged a policy, custom, or practice leading to that violation, and plaintiffs' allegations amounted to no more than an isolated or sporadic incident that could not form the basis of Monell liability for an improper custom. (Saved Magazine v. Spokane Police Department (9th Cir. 2021) 19 F.4th 1193.)

Where the law is not well settled on the issue with which the plaintiff alleges the officers failed to comply (i.e., whether a detained suspect refusing to identify himself is a violation of P.C. § 148(a)(1); obstructing an officer in the performance of his duties), plaintiff cannot show a "pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees," which is a necessary element of an alleged Monell violation. (Vanegas v. City of Pasadena (9th Cir. 2022) 46 F.4th 1159, 1167.)

Police Power*:

Rule: The police power of a state has been held to embrace, at least, such reasonable regulations established directly by legislative enactment as will protect the public health and the public safety. The state may invest local administrative bodies with authority to safeguard the public health and the public safety. The mode or manner is within the discretion of the state, subject only to the condition that no rule prescribed by a state, nor any regulation adopted by a local governmental agency acting under the sanction of state legislation, shall contravene the Constitution of the United States or infringe any right granted or secured by that instrument. A local enactment or regulation must always yield in case of conflict with the exercise by the general government of any power it possesses under the Constitution, or with any right which that instrument gives or secures. (Jacobson v. Massachusetts (1905) 197 U.S. 11 [25 S.Ct. 358; 49 L.Ed. 643]; upholding a Massachusetts state law authorizing forced small pox vaccinations, absent evidence that such a vaccination was hazardous to a specific individual's health, finding that such a mandatory vaccination program did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause.

> Per the Court: "The authority of the State to enact this statute is to be referred to what is commonly called the police power. . . . (T)he police power of a State must be held to embrace, at least, such reasonable regulations established directly by legislative enactment as will protect the public health and the public safety." (Id., at pp. 24-25.)
> Note: One's "religion," by the way (along with "personal wishes, . . . pecuniary interests, . . . or political convictions"), was only mentioned in relation to one's refusal to submit to a military draft, indicating that religious scruples are not an excuse to refuse "to take his place in the ranks of the army of his country and risk the chance of being shot down in its defense." (Id., at p. 29, citing Allgeyer v. Louisiana (1897) 165 U.S. 578 [17 S.Ct. 427; 42 L.Ed. 832].)
>
> But the Supreme Court (citing Jacobson v. Massachusetts, supra, with approval) has ruled (in a 5-to-4 decision) that a state governor has the power by executive order to restrict access to "places of worship" to 25% of capacity, up to a maximum of 100 people, during a pandemic (COVID-19; i.e., the "coronavirus;" "a novel severe acute respiratory illness that has killed thousands of people in California and more than 100,000 nationwide."), holding that such an executive order appears consistent with the Free Exercise of Religion Clause of the First Amendment. (South Bay United Pentecostel Church v. Newsom (May 29, 2020) __ U.S.__ [140 S.Ct. 1613; 207 L.Ed.2nd 254.)

Police Power vs. Fifth Amendment Eminent Domain:

> Rule: Where there is a government required "forfeited as a public nuisance" (or other destruction) of personal (or real) property (e.g., a vehicle [or one's home; see below]), the state is not required to compensate plaintiff (who shared ownership of the vehicle with her husband), reasoning that when state acquires property "under the exercise of governmental authority other than the power of eminent domain," government is not "required to compensate an owner for [that] property." (Italic added; Bennis v. Michigan (1996) 516 U.S. 442, 443–444, 452–353 [116 S.Ct. 994; 134 L.Ed.2nd 68].)

> "Police power should not be confused with (Fifth Amendment) eminent domain, in that the former controls the use of property by the owner for the public good, authorizing its regulation and destruction without compensation, whereas the latter takes property for public use and compensation is given for property taken, damaged[,] or destroyed."). (Lamm v. Volpe (10th Cir. 1971) 449 F.2nd 1202, 1203.)

Examples:

> No Fifth Amendment taking (i.e., eminent domain) occurs where the government physically seized (and ultimately "rendered worthless") the plaintiff's pharmaceuticals "in connection with [a criminal] investigation" because "the government seized the pharmaceuticals in order to enforce criminal laws," an action the Federal Circuit said fell well "within the bounds of the police power." (AmeriSource Corp. v. United States (Ct. of Fed. Claims 2008) 525 F.3rd 1149.)
> "When private property is damaged incident to the exercise of the police power, such damage," even when physical in nature, "is not a taking for the public use, because the property has not been altered or turned over for public benefit" (Bachmann v. United States (Fed. Cl. 2017) 134 Fed. Cl. 694, 696.)
>
> Plaintiff failed to establish a Fifth Amendment Takings Clause violation where federal agents physically damaged his property by, for example, tearing out door jambs and removing pieces of interior trim from his home, while executing a search warrant. (Lawmaster v. Ward (10th Cir. 1997) 125 F.3rd 1341.)

Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act*, or* "POBRA" (Gov't. Code §§ 3300 et seq.):

> "POBRA 'provides a catalog of basic rights and protections that must be afforded all peace officers by the public entities which employ them.' (California Correctional Peace Officers Assn. v. State of California (2000) 82 Cal.App.4th 294, 304. . . .) The Act's purpose is 'to maintain stable employer-employee relations and thereby assure effective law enforcement.' (Lybarger v. City of Los Angeles (1985) 40 Cal.3rd 822, 826. . . .) 'Although notions of fundamental fairness for police officers underlie the Act, a number of its provisions also reflect the Legislature's recognition of the necessity for internal affairs investigations to maintain the efficiency and integrity of the police force serving the community.' (Pasadena Police Officers Assn. v. City of Pasadena (1990) 51 Cal.3rd 564, 572. . . .) POBRA thus reflects the Legislature's balancing of two competing interests: 'the public interest in maintaining the efficiency and integrity of its police force, which, in enforcing the law, is entrusted with the protection of the community it serves'; and the peace officer's 'personal interest in receiving fair treatment' during an investigation that may subject the officer to punitive action. (Pasadena Police, at p. 569; see White v. County of Sacramento (1982) 31 Cal.3rd 676, 681. . . .)" (Lozano v. City of Los Angeles (2022) 73 Cal.App.5th 711, 729-730.)

> "Like POBRA generally, section 3303, subdivision (i) balances an officer's interest in a fair disciplinary process with the public's interest in maintaining an efficient police force. The statute protects the officer's interest by affording an officer the right to have a representative of his or her choosing present 'whenever an interrogation focuses on matters that are likely to result in punitive action against' the officer. (fn. omitted) (§ 3303, subd. (i).) But, critically, the statute also ensures that this protection does not generate needless inefficiency by expressly specifying that the right to representation does 'not apply to any interrogation of a public safety officer in the normal course of duty, counseling, instruction, or informal verbal admonishment by, or other routine or unplanned contact with, a supervisor or any other public safety officer.' (§ 3303, subd. (i).) This provision 'was included to avoid claims that almost any communication is elevated to an "investigation"' by expressly 'exclud[ing] routine communication within the normal course of administering the department,' as well as 'innocent preliminary or casual questions and remarks between a supervisor and officer.' (City of Los Angeles v. Superior Court* (Labio) (1997) 57 Cal.App.4th 1506, 1514. . . .)" (Id., at p. 730.)

> In Lozano, it was held that two officers' sergeant, meeting the officers in the field to ask about why they had not responded to a high priority robbery call, resulting in an admonishment that they pay more attention to their radio, was not a communication that required the officers to have present a representative under POBRA. (pgs. 730-731; "the 'meeting did not violate POBRA' because it "'was in the normal course of Sergeant Gomez'[s] duty [to provide] counseling [and] instruction and was routine and expected of a supervisor.'")

Standards of Proof*:

Reasonable Suspicion:

Information which is sufficient to cause a reasonable law enforcement officer, taking into account his or her training and experience, to reasonably believe that the person to be detained is, was, or is about to be, involved in criminal activity. The officer must be able to articulate more than an "inchoate and unparticularized suspicion or 'hunch' of criminal activity." (Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1, 27 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889, 909].)

The "reasonable suspicion" standard is "not a particularly demanding one, but is, instead, 'considerably less than proof of wrongdoing by a preponderance of the evidence,'" (People v. Letner and Tobin (2010) 50 Cal.4th 99, 146; quoting United States v. Sokolow (1989) 490 U.S. 1, 7 [109 S.Ct. 1581; 104 L. Ed. 2nd 1]; and citing United States v. Valdes-Vega (9th Cir. 2013) 738 F.3rd 1074, 1078.)

See "Reasonable Suspicion," under "Detentions" (Chapter 4), below.

Preponderance of the Evidence:

"A preponderance of the evidence standard . . . 'simply requires the trier of fact "to believe that the existence of a fact is more probable than its nonexistence'" (Lillian F. v. Superior Court (1984) 160 Cal.App.3d 314, 320.)

"Proof by a 'preponderance of the evidence' for an uncharged offense is a considerably lower burden of proof than the due process requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt for a charged offense. (Citation)" (People v. Nicolas (2017) 8 Cal.App. 5th 1165, 1177.)

Probable Cause:

"Probable cause means 'specific and articulable facts which, taken together with rational inferences from those facts, reasonably warrant [the] belief or suspicion' that the person is mentally disordered. [Citation.]" (In re Azzarella (1989) 207 Cal.App.3rd 1240.)

"[P]robable cause means 'fair probability,' not certainty or even a preponderance of the evidence." (United States v. Gourde (9th Cir. 2006) 440 F.3rd 1065, 1069.)

"Reasonable or probable cause is shown if a man of ordinary care (or caution) and prudence (or a reasonable and prudent person) would be led to believe and conscientiously entertain an honest and strong suspicion that the accused is guilty." (See People v. Lewis (1980) 109 Cal.App.3rd 599 608-609; People v. Campa (1984) 36 Cal.3rd 870, 879; People v. Price (1991) 1 Cal.4th 324, 410.)

"'Reasonable or probable cause' means such a state of facts as would lead a [person] of ordinary caution or prudence to believe, and conscientiously entertain a strong suspicion of the guilt of the accused." (People v. Garcia (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 864, 870, quoting People v. Mower (2002) 28 Cal.4th 457, 473.)

> Note: The terms "reasonable" and "probable" cause are used interchangeably in both the codes (see P.C. § 995(a)(1)(B)) and case law, but (when properly used) mean the same thing. "Reasonable cause" and "reasonable suspicion" (i.e., the standard of proof for a detention), on the other hand, do not mean the same thing, and are not to be confused.
> "(R)easonable cause"—a synonym for "probable cause . . . ." (Heien v. North Carolina (2014) 574 U.S. 54, 62 [135 S.Ct. 530; 190 L.Ed.2nd 475, 483].)

"'[P]robable cause is a flexible, common-sense standard. It merely requires that facts available to the officer would "warrant a man of reasonable caution in the belief," [citation], that certain items may be contraband or stolen property or useful as evidence of a crime.'" (People v. Tran (2019) 42 Cal.App.5th 1, 9; quoting Texas v. Brown (1983) 460 U.S. 730, 742 [75 L.Ed.2nd 502; 103 S.Ct. 1535].)

See "Standard of Proof," under "Arrests" (Chapter 5), and "Probable Cause," under "The Affidavit to the Search Warrant," under "Searches with a Search Warrant" (Chapter 10), below.

Clear and Convincing Evidence:

"Clear and convincing" evidence requires a finding of high probability. Such a test requires that the evidence be "so clear as to leave no substantial doubt"; "sufficiently strong to command the unhesitating assent of every reasonable mind." (People v. Mary H. (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 246, 256; quoting Lillian F. v. Superior Court (1984) 160 Cal.App.3rd 314, 320.)

> See also San Diego Police Department v. Geoffrey S. (2022) 86 Cal.App.5th 550, adding (at pg. 576): " . . . and sufficiently strong to command the unhesitating assent of every reasonable mind." (Citing In re Angelia P. (1981) 28 Cal.3rd 908, 919.)
> > "When reviewing a finding that a fact has been proved by clear and convincing evidence, the question before the appellate court is whether the record as a whole contains substantial evidence from which a reasonable fact finder could have found it highly probable that the fact was true." >
> "This standard, which 'is less commonly used' (Citation), tends to be seen in civil cases involving 'interests . . . deemed to be more substantial than mere loss of money." (People v. Mary H., supra.)

"The standard of proof known as clear and convincing evidence demands a degree of certainty greater than that involved with the preponderance standard, but less than what is required by the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. This intermediate standard 'requires a finding of high probability.'" (Conservatorship of O.B. (2020) 9 Cal.5th 989, 998; citing (In re Angelia P. (1981) 28 Cal.3d 908, 919; see also CACI No. 201.)

Proof Beyond a Reasonable Doubt:

> CALCRIM No. 220: "Proof beyond a reasonable doubt is proof that leaves you with an abiding conviction that the charge is true."
>
>
> > An inmate convicted of first degree murder was entitled to 28 U.S.C. § 2254 federal habeas corpus relief because, in overruling defense counsel's objection to the prosecutor's statements in closing argument that the presumption of innocence no longer applied, the state court violated defendant's due process rights under Darden. The state appellate court was objectively unreasonable in holding that any error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt in light of the fact that the weight of the evidence against the inmate was not great, but rather circumstantial, incomplete, and in conflict in a very close case. (Ford v. Peery (9th Cir. 2020) 976 F.3rd 1032.)

Pursuant to Darden v. Wainwright (1986) 477 U.S. 168 [106 S.Ct. 2464, 91 L.Ed.2nd 144], in evaluating whether a prosecutor violated due process in closing arguments, the so-called Darden factors are as follows; the weight of the evidence, the prominence of the comment in the context of the entire trial, whether the prosecution misstated the evidence, whether the judge instructed the jury to disregard the comment, whether the comment was invited by defense counsel in its summation and whether defense counsel had an adequate opportunity to rebut the comment. Courts are to place improper argument in the context of the entire trial to evaluate whether its damaging effect was mitigated or aggravated.

In "a criminal case, … [in which] the interests of the defendant are of such magnitude that historically and without any explicit constitutional requirement they have been protected by standards of proof designed to exclude as nearly as possible the likelihood of an erroneous judgment. In the administration of criminal justice, our society imposes almost the entire risk of error upon itself. This is accomplished by requiring under the Due Process Clause that the state prove the guilt of an accused beyond a reasonable doubt." (People v. Mary H. (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 246, 256; quoting Addington v. Texas (1979) 441 U.S. 418, 423 [99 S.Ct. 1804; 60 L.Ed.2nd 323].)

The California Supreme Court has commented more than once that in discussing "reasonable doubt" with a jury, "modifying the standard instruction [on reasonable doubt] is perilous, and generally should not be done . . . ." (People v. Daveggio and Michaud (2018) 4 Cal.5th 790, 844; citing People v. Freeman (1994) 8 Cal.4th 450, 504.)

In Daveggio and Michaud, the Court had talked about the reasonable doubt standard during jury selection, months before the jury was formally instructed just prior to jury deliberations. The Court ruled that if the prior discussions were improper, the error was harmless in light of the standard jury instruction (CALJIC 2.90) being also given. (Id., at pp. 838-844.)

"Burden of proof" Defined: This term refers to the obligation of a party to establish by evidence a requisite degree of belief concerning a fact in the mind of the trier of fact or the court. (Evid. Code § 115)

Plea Bargaining and Cooperation Agreements:

Police Officers Plea Bargaining:

Rule: A police officer has no independent authority to plea bargain with criminal suspects or their attorneys. (See below) Only the prosecuting attorney, with the approval of the Court, has the authority to plea bargain. (See Pen. Code §§ 1192.1 et seq.)

Case Law:

"A cooperation agreement generally involves 'an agreement between a defendant and a law enforcement agency." ((People v.) C.S.A. ((2010)) 181 Cal.App.4th (773) at p. 778.) 'As with a plea agreement, "[t]he government is held to the literal terms of [a cooperation] agreement … ." [Citation.] And, like a plea agreement, "an agreement to cooperate may be analyzed in terms of contract law standards."' (Id. a pp. 778-779.) However, and of particular importance to this case, '"[a] defendant who seeks specifically to enforce a promise, whether contained in a plea agreement or a freestanding cooperation agreement, must show … that the promisor had actual authority to make the particular promise … ."' (C.S.A., supra, 181 Cal.App.4th at p. 779.) (fn. omitted.) In California, '"state and local prosecutors are invested with the prosecutorial power of the state." (C.S.A., supra, at p. 783.) "'And just as federal law enforcement officers have no independent authority to make promises about the filing and prosecution of federal criminal charges, state and local law enforcement officers have no independent authority to make promises about the filing and prosecution of state criminal charges."' (Ibid.) Thus, in order to enforce a cooperation agreement in California, the defendant must show that a state or local prosecutor authorized the agreement, thereby granting the law enforcement officer '"'actual authority'"' to enter into the agreement. (Id. at p. 779; see also Id. at p. 784 [concluding that trial court erred in dismissing charges based on law enforcement officer's '"'apparent authority'"' to enter into cooperation agreement].)" (People v. Perez (2016) 243 Cal.App.4th 863, 879-880.)

"'[T]he remedy for breach of an unauthorized cooperation agreement usually is a sanction short of dismissal.' ((People v.) C.S.A. ((2010)) 181 Cal.App.4th (773), 780, citing, inter alia, State of North Carolina v. Sturgill (1996) 121 N.C.App. 629 [469 S.E.2d 557, 568] [concluding exclusion of evidence, rather than dismissal of charges, was proper remedy for defendant's reliance on unauthorized cooperation agreement and stating, '[W]e are not required, as a result of the "constable's blunder," to place defendant in a better position than he enjoyed prior to making the agreement with the police.'" (Id., at p. 881, fn. 12.)

Plea Bargaining by the Court:

"[O]nly the prosecutor is authorized to negotiate a plea agreement on behalf of the state. '[T]he court has no authority to substitute itself as the representative of the People in the negotiation process and under the guise of "plea bargaining" to "agree" to a disposition of the case over prosecutorial objection. Such judicial activity would contravene express statutory provisions requiring the prosecutor's consent to the proposed disposition, would detract from the judge's ability to remain detached and neutral in evaluating the voluntariness of the plea and the fairness of the bargain to society as well as to the defendant, and would present a substantial danger of unintentional coercion of defendants who may be intimidated by the judge's participation in the matter. [Citation.]' [Citations.]" (People v. Hernandez (2020) 55 Cal.App.5th 942, 948; quoting People v. Segura (2008) 44 Cal.4th 921, at p. 930.)

Review was granted in Hernandez by the California Supreme Court, with this decision eventually being vacated. (See People v. Hernandez, 2021 Cal. LEXIS 8869 (Cal., Dec. 22, 2021).)

The Trial Court and Prosecutor's Immunity*:

The Court:

"'Judges . . . are absolutely immune from damage[s] liability for acts performed in their official capacities.' Ashelman v. Pope, 793 F.2nd 1072, 1075 (9th Cir. 1986). Judicial immunity is only overcome in two circumstances: when the judge 'acts in the clear absence of all jurisdiction or performs an act that is not judicial in nature.' Schucker v. Rockwood, 846 F.2nd 1202, 1204 (9th Cir. 1988)." (Harper v. Wright (9th Cir. 2021) 956 F.4th Appx.653; an unpublished decision.

In Harper, an attorney sued federal District Court Judge Otis D. Wright after Judge Wright held attorney Caree Harper in contempt for refusing to answer questions about exorbitant attorney's fees (42%) in a civil suit. Harper claimed that the judge authorized bailiffs to use excessive force in taking her into custody, and committed other un-judicial-like acts. Plaintiff Harper appealed from an order by the district court dismissing her lawsuit with prejudice.

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court's dismissal of two putative class actions brought pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and Judge Eric C. Taylor, alleging that defendants set cash bail that plaintiffs could not afford and therefore unlawfully detained them pretrial. The Court held that actions against state courts and state court judges in their judicial capacity are barred by Eleventh Amendment immunity. The Superior Court of the State of California had sovereign immunity as an arm of the state. The exception in Ex parte Young (1908) 209 U.S. 123 [28 S.Ct. 441; 52 L.Ed. 714], did not apply because the Superior Court cannot be sued in an individual capacity. Judge Taylor had Eleventh Amendment immunity because state court judges cannot be sued in federal court in their judicial capacity under the Eleventh Amendment. To the extent that Wolfe v. Strankman (9th Cir. 2004) 392 F.3rd 358, can be read to hold that the Ex parte Young exception allows injunctions against judges acting in their judicial capacity, that conclusion is clearly irreconcilable with Whole Woman's Health v. Jackson (2021) 595 U.S. 30 [142 S.Ct. 522; 211 L.Ed.2nd 316], and is thus overruled. (Munoz v. Superior Court (9th Cir. 2024) 91 F.4th 977.)

The Prosecutor:

Absolute Immunity:

Prosecutors enjoy absolute immunity from civil liability so long as the forced detention of a victim, done for the purpose of interviewing her, is considered to be "advocacy conduct that is intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process." (Giraldo v. Kessler (2nd Cir. 2012) 684 F.3rd 161.)

However, the federal Fifth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that immunity for prosecutors, at least in the 5th Circuit's jurisdiction, is limited. In so ruling, it noted that a state prosecutor was not entitled to dismissal of 42 U.S.C.S. §§ 1983, 1988 civil rights claims because absolute prosecutorial immunity did not apply to alleged fabrication of evidence that deprived a criminal defendant of due process and a fair trial where such activity was "investigative" (i.e., the prosecutor acting as a DA investigator or police officer) and not "prosecutorial." A detective also was not absolutely immune. (Wearry v. Foster (5th Cir. 2022) 33 F.4th 260.)

Ethical Considerations:

"(B)ecause of the unique function prosecutors perform in representing the interests of—and exercising the power of—the state, they 'are held to an elevated standard of conduct.'" (People v. Zarazua (2022) 85 Cal.App.5th 639, 645, fn. 2; quoting People v. Peoples (2016) 62 Cal.4th 718, 792.)

> People v. Zarazua, supra, dealt with a prosecutor's ethical obligation to not engage in "misgendering," which is defined as; "the assignment of a gender with which a party does not identify, through the misuse of gendered pronouns, titles, names, and honorifics." (Citing McNamarah; Misgendering (2021) 109 Cal. L.Rev. 2227, 2232.)

"(A prosecutor) . . . is not a neutral, he is an advocate; but an advocate for a client whose business is not merely to prevail in the instant case. (The prosecutor's) . . . chief business is not to achieve victory but to establish justice. . . . '(T)he Government wins its point when justice is done in its courts.'" (Brady v. Maryland (1963) 373 U.S. 83, 87, fn. 2 [10 L.Ed.2nd 215; 83 S.Ct. 1194], referencing Judge Simon E. Sobeloff's comments, made when he was Solicitor General (i.e., the lawyer responsible for arguing cases for the Government before the Supreme Court), in addressing the duties of a solicitor general before the Judicial Conference of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeal on June 29, 1954, and quoting his predecessor, Solicitor General Frederick William Lehmann. "Prosecutor" has been substituted for "solicitor general," the two being substantially the same from an ethical standpoint.)

The United States Supreme Court pointedly held as long as over 85 years ago that a prosecutor, ". . . is the representative not of an ordinary party to a controversy, but of a sovereignty whose obligation to govern impartially is as compelling as its obligation to govern at all; and whose interest, therefore, in a criminal prosecution is not that it shall win a case, but that justice shall be done. As such, he is in a peculiar and very definite sense the servant of the law, the twofold aim of which is that guilt shall not escape or innocence suffer. He may prosecute with earnestness and vigor—indeed, he should do so. But, while he may strike hard blows, he is not at liberty to strike foul ones. It is as much his duty to refrain from improper methods calculated to produce a wrongful conviction as it is to use every legitimate means to bring about a just one." (Berger* v. *United States (1935) 295 U.S. 78, 88 [79 L.Ed. 1314; 55 S.Ct. 629].)

Aside from civil liability issues, prosecutors are held to a higher standard of professional ethics. For instance, in a hearing on a sexually violent predator's petition to be placed in conditional release program, where the prosecutor discouraged a defendant from testifying by inferring that he might be subject to a perjury charge if he did so (thus violating his Sixth Amendment right to testify), the Fourth District Court of Appeal (Div. 3), in holding that "(p)rosecutors . . . are not allowed to engage in conduct that undermines the willingness of a defense witness to take the stand," and reversing defendant's conviction, had this to say: "It's not about convictions, it's not about courtroom mastery, it's not about prison sentences. And it's certainly not about won/lost records. It's about fair trials. Fairness is the sine qua non of the criminal justice system, and no amount of technical brilliance or advocative skill can make up for a failure to provide it." (People v. Force (2019) 39 Cal.App.5th 506, 511-519.)

"A prosecutor's conduct 'violates the federal Constitution when it comprises a pattern of conduct "so egregious that it infects the trial with such unfairness as to make the conviction a denial of due process." [Citation.] But conduct by a prosecutor that does not render a criminal trial fundamentally unfair is prosecutorial misconduct under state law only if it involves 'the use of deceptive or reprehensible methods to attempt to persuade either the court or the jury.'"'" (People v. Zarazua 2022) 85 Cal.App.5th 639, 644; quoting People v. Rhoades (2019) 8 Cal.5th 393, 418.)

> In Zarazua, at p. 644, the Court notes that: "Prosecutorial misconduct may result in reversal under federal law if the error "was not 'harmless beyond a reasonable doubt,'" and it may result in reversal "under state law if there was a 'reasonable likelihood of a more favorable verdict in the absence of the challenged conduct.'" (Quoting People v. Rivera (2019) 7 Cal.5th 306, 333–334.)

Malicious Prosecution:

"To prevail on their malicious prosecution claim, Plaintiffs 'must show that the [D]efendants prosecuted [Wheatcroft] with malice and without probable cause, and that they did so for the purpose of denying [him] equal protection or another specific constitutional right.' Freeman v. City of Santa Ana, 68 F.3d 1180, 1189 (9th Cir. 1995) (citations omitted)." (⁋) "'Even assuming that the malice and lack of probable cause elements can be met, the presumption of prosecutorial independence must still be rebutted.' Ordinarily, the decision to file a criminal complaint is presumed to result from an independent determination of the prosecutor, and, thus, precludes liability for those who participated in the investigation or filed a report that resulted in initiation of proceedings. However, the presumption of prosecutorial independence does not bar a subsequent § 1983 claim against state or local officials who improperly exerted pressure on him, knowingly provided misinformation to the prosecutor, concealed exculpatory evidence, or otherwise engaged in wrongful or bad faith conduct that was actively instrumental in causing the initiation of legal proceedings. Awabdy (v. City of Adelanto (9th Cir. 2004)) 368 F.3rd (1062) at 1067. Malicious prosecution actions are not limited to suits against prosecutors and may also be "brought against other persons who have wrongfully caused the charges to be filed.' Id. at 1066." (Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006.)

> Finding no evidence of the officers pressuring the prosecutor to charge defendant, the Court held that the officers were entitled to summary judgment on the allegation. (Ibid.)

In a 6-to-3 decision, the United States Supreme Court has held that in order for a "malicious prosecution" allegation under the Fourth Amendment, brought via 42 U.S.C. § 1983, to be sustained, the plaintiff need not show that the criminal prosecution ended with some affirmative indication of innocence. A plaintiff need only show that the criminal prosecution ended without a conviction, overruling the Second Circuit Court of Appeal's decision on this issue. (Thompson v. Clark (Apr. 4, 2022) __ U.S. __ [142 S.Ct. 1332; 212 L.Ed.2nd 382]; finding that the plaintiff in this case had satisfied this requirement.)

Plaintiffs' malicious prosecution complaint was fatally defective because a warrantless arrest—or any other event lacking some adjudicatory involvement by a court—could not constitute an action for purposes of malicious prosecution, and because neither bail nor search warrant proceedings could support a malicious prosecution claim. The trial court properly denied the plaintiffs' leave to amend because the proposed factual allegations they proffered they could allege if given leave to amend would not address the deficiency in the only cause of action alleged in the complaint. Plaintiffs were not entitled to add an abuse of process claim they had not previously alleged, as that claim was time-barred and did not relate back to the sole cause of action in the operative complaint. (Bidari v. Kelk (2023) 90 Cal.App.5th 1152.)

Brady v. Maryland; Due Process and Discovery Obligations*:

General Rule: Prosecutors, as "agents of the sovereign," must honor the Fourteenth Amendment's due process obligations. (See Kyles v. Whitley (1995) 514 U.S. 419, 438 [131 L.Ed.2nd 490; 115 S.Ct. 1555]; Mooney v. Holohan (1935) 294 U.S. 103, 112–113 [79 L.Ed. 791; 55 S.Ct. 340].) "A prosecutor must refrain from using evidence that the prosecutor knows to be false. (Mooney, at pp. 112–113; see also Pyle v. State of Kansas (1942) 317 U.S. 213, 216 [87 L.Ed. 214; 63 S.Ct. 177].) A prosecutor must correct false evidence 'when it appears.' (Napue v. Illinois (1959) 360 U.S. 264, 269 [3 L.Ed.2nd 1217; 79 S.Ct. 1173].) And, under Brady, a prosecutor must disclose to the defense evidence that is 'favorable to [the] accused' and 'material either to guilt or to punishment.' (Brady, (infra), 373 U.S. at p. 87.)" (Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. Superior Court (2019) 8 Cal.5th 28, 40; referring to Brady v. Maryland (1963) 373 U.S. 83 [10 L.Ed.2nd 215; 83 S.Ct. 1194].)

Brady v. Maryland:

General Rules: "A prosecutor in a criminal case must disclose to the defense certain evidence that is favorable to the accused. (Brady v. Maryland (1963) 373 U.S. 83 [10 L.Ed.2nd 215; 83 S.Ct. 1194] . . .) This duty sometimes requires disclosure of evidence that will impeach a law enforcement officer's testimony. (Giglio v. United States (1972) 405 U.S. 150, 154–155 [31 L.Ed.2nd 104; 92 S.Ct. 763] . . .) Such disclosure may be required even if the prosecutor is not personally aware that the evidence exists. (Kyles v. Whitley (1995) 514 U.S. 419, 437 [131 L.Ed.2nd 490; 115 S.Ct. 1555] . . .) Because the duty to disclose may sweep more broadly than the prosecutor's personal knowledge, the duty carries with it an obligation to 'learn of any favorable evidence known to the others acting on the government's behalf in the case, including the police.' (Ibid.)" (Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. Superior Court (2019) 8 Cal.5th 28, 36.)

Per Napue v. Illinois (1959) 360 U.S. 264, 269 [3 L.Ed.2nd 1217; 79 S.Ct. 1173], a prosecutor is precluded from knowingly using false testimony. Per Brady, failing to provide the defense with material information related to that false testimony is a due process violation, and grounds for reversal. (Dickey v. Davis (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 624. 636-648.)

"Under Brady, '[t]he prosecution has a duty under the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause to disclose evidence to a criminal defendant when the evidence is both favorable to the defendant and material on either guilt or punishment.'" (People v. Fultz (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 395, 415; quoting People v. Stewart (2020) 55 Cal.App.5th 755, 769.)

Under Brady and its progeny, the prosecution has a constitutional duty to disclose to the defense material exculpatory evidence, including potential impeaching evidence. The duty extends to evidence known to others acting on the prosecution's behalf, including the police. Thus, the prosecution is responsible not only for evidence in its own files but also for information possessed by others acting on the government's behalf that were gathered in connection with the investigation. But the prosecution cannot reasonably be held responsible for evidence in the possession of all governmental agencies, including those not involved in the investigation or prosecution of the case. Conversely, a prosecutor does not have a duty to disclose exculpatory evidence or information to a defendant unless the prosecution team actually or constructively possesses that evidence or information. Thus, information possessed by an agency that has no connection to the investigation or prosecution of the criminal charge against the defendant is not possessed by the prosecution team, and the prosecutor does not have the duty to search for or to disclose such material. Therefore, the Drug Enforcement Administration's (DEA's) refusal to produce potentially exculpatory evidence did not deprive defendants of a fair trial because DEA was not working on behalf of the prosecution and was not part of the investigation. (People v. Aguilera (2020) 50 Cal.App.5th 894.)

"In order to comply with Brady, . . . 'the individual prosecutor has a duty to learn of any favorable evidence known to the others acting on the government's behalf in this case, including the police.'" (People v. Fultz (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 395, 415; quoting People v. Salazar (2005) 35 Cal.4th 1031, 1042.)

A jury found defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter. The Court of Appeal, Second Dist., Div. One, denied defendant's petition for writ of habeas corpus, finding that evidence allegedly suppressed by the People was not material under Brady. On appeal to the California Supreme Court, the Supreme Court granted defendant's petition for review on the limited issue of whether the Attorney General had a duty, in response to the petition for writ of habeas corpus, to disclose the same evidence that formed the basis of her Brady claim. Defendant's Brady claim was remanded for the Court of Appeal to consider the petition for writ of habeas corpus on a record prepared in accordance with clarification of the Attorney General's disclosure duties. Where allegedly suppressed evidence forming the basis of a claim in a petition for writ of habeas corpus is in fact subject to Brady, the Attorney General has a constitutional duty of disclosure that exists as of the time of the filing of the petition. Where such evidence is not subject to Brady, but is subject to Rules Prof. Conduct, rule 3.8(d), the Attorney General has an ethical duty of disclosure as of the time of the filing of the petition. Where such evidence is neither subject to Brady nor subject to disclosure under Rule 3.8(d), the respondent has a duty to disclose the existence of the evidence that arises after the issuance of an order to show cause. The judgment of the court of appeal was therefore reversed, and the matter was remanded to that court for further proceedings. (In re Jenkins (2023) 14 Cal.5th 493.)

The Issue of Materiality:

"(E)vidence is material 'if there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different.'" (People v. Fultz (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 395, 415.)

"'For Brady purposes, evidence is favorable if it helps the defense or hurts the prosecution, as by impeaching a prosecution witness.' (People v. Zambrano (2007) 41 Cal.4th 1082, 1132 . . . ; see also United States v. Bagley (1985) 473 U.S. 667, 676 [87 L.Ed.2nd 481; 105 S. Ct. 3375]; Giglio (v. United States (1972) 405 U.S. 150), 154–155 ([31 L.Ed.2nd 104; 92 S.Ct. 763].) Evidence is material 'if there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different.'" (Kyles (v. Whitley (1995) 514 U.S. 419, 433-434 [131 L.Ed.2nd 490, 115 S.Ct. 1555].)) Evaluating materiality requires consideration of the collective significance of the undisclosed evidence (Kyles, at p. 436), as well as 'the effect of the nondisclosure on defense investigations and trial strategies' (Zambrano, at p. 1132). (See also Kyles, at p. 439; Bagley, at p. 701 (dis. opn. of Marshall, J.).) 'A reasonable probability does not mean that the defendant "would more likely than not have received a different verdict with the evidence," only that the likelihood of a different result is great enough to "undermine[] confidence in the outcome of the trial.' (Smith v. Cain (2012) 565 U.S. 73, 75 [181 L.Ed.2nd 571; 132 S. Ct. 627].) (¶) This materiality standard applies both after judgment, when evaluating whether Brady was violated, and before judgment, when evaluating whether evidence favorable to the defense must be disclosed. (See Kyles, supra, 514 U.S. at pp. 437–438; United States v. Agurs (1976) 427 U.S. 97, 108 [49 L.Ed.2nd 342; 96 S. Ct. 2392].) Because it may be difficult to know before judgment what evidence will ultimately prove material, 'the prudent prosecutor will resolve doubtful [Brady] questions in favor of disclosure.' (Agurs, at p. 108; see also Kyles, at pp. 438–439.) Statutory and ethical obligations may require even more. (See, e.g., Pen. Code, § 1054.1, subds. (d)–(e) [statutory disclosure obligation]; Rules Prof. Conduct, rule 3.8(d) & com. [3] [ethical disclosure obligation].)" (Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. Superior Court (2019) 8 Cal.5th 28, 40.)

"Such evidence is material 'if there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different.'" (People v. Fultz (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 395, 415; evidence of the terms of a plea bargain offered to two codefendants held to be material, and thus Brady error for the prosecution's failure to advise defense counsel before trial. Pgs. 418-420.)

However, where a federal investigative agency (i.e., the FBI and DEA, in this case) have declined to provide the prosecution with requested information, such as information related to a drug cartel's drug-smuggling business and a target of defendant's "third party culpability" defense in this case, the Ninth Circuit held that neither Brady nor Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, Rule 16 requires the prosecution to provide such evidence. A defendant must show that the prosecution has both knowledge of, and access to, such information. Another federal agencies refusal to comply denies the prosecution to "access" to such information. (United States v. Cano (9th Cir. 2019) 934 F.3rd 1002, 1022-1026.)

The federal district court properly denied defendant's request for habeas corpus relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254(d)(1), (2). Although the prosecution had an obligation under Brady to disclose jailhouse informants' statements known to law enforcement, the California Supreme Court's conclusion that statements were not material was not contrary to, or an unreasonable application of, Brady. The co-defendant's credibility was heavily bolstered by fact he knowingly subjected himself to criminal liability. Also, the informants lacked credibility and the jury heard other impeachment evidence regarding the co-defendant. The Court therefore concluded that the undisclosed evidence was not material at the guilt or penalty phase of the proceedings was not contrary to or an unreasonable application of Brady, nor did it amount to an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the circumstances. (Ochoa v. Davis (9th Cir. 2021) 16 F.4th 1314.)

In a murder trial, redacted portions of the district attorney's confidential, internal memoranda, particularly those parts describing past incidents with factual similarities to the current case, could have had impeachment value supporting defendant's contentions that the medical examiner displayed confirmation bias, failed to gather key evidence, and did not consider potential alternative causes of death. However, the failure to disclose this information was held not to be material for purposes of Brady or Pen. Code § 1054.1, because the jury did not accept the medical examiner's testimony that the victim was beaten to death. The jury convicted defendant of involuntary manslaughter, not murder, suggesting that they agreed with the defense characterization that the victim died from a fall. Further, the defense effectively utilized the portion of impeachment evidence that had been disclosed. (People v. Deleoz (2022) 80 Cal.App.5th 642.)

See also the dissenting opinion in a U.S. Supreme Court's denial of certiorari, where the issue was whether a third person's confession to committing a murder with another co-suspect, when that confession failed to mention whether or not the petitioner was present at all (the petitioner arguing that he was not), was sufficiently material to constitute exonerating evidence to be Brady error when the petitioner's attorney wasn't told about the confession until after petitioner's sentence of death. The majority of the Court did not feel that it was. (Brown v. Louisiana (Apr. 3, 2023) __ U.S. ___ [143 S.Ct. 886; 215 L.Ed.2nd 404].)

Elements of a Brady Violation:

"There are three components to a true Brady violation: '[t]he evidence at issue must be favorable to the accused, either because it is exculpatory, or because it is impeaching; that evidence must have been suppressed by the State, either willfully or inadvertently; and prejudice must have ensued.'" (Benson v. Chappell (9th Cir. 2020) 958 F.3rd 801, 837; quoting Strickler v. Greene (1999) 527 U.S. 263, 281-282 [119 S.Ct. 1936, 144 L.Ed.2nd 286].)

"A Brady violation is 'material only if there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different. A "reasonable probability" is a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome."'" (Benson v. Chappell, supra; quoting Amado v. Gonzalez (9th Cir. 2014) 758 F.3rd 1119, 1139; which, in turn, quotes United States v. Bagley (1985) 473 U.S. 667, 682 [105 S. Ct. 3375, 87 L.Ed.2nd 481].)

> Because there was a reasonable likelihood that undisclosed evidence impeaching a witness could have affected the judgment of the jury, defendants' convictions for federal mortgage fraud were overturned by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal in a split, two-to-one decision. The district court's instruction to disregard the witness's testimony did not fully cure the prejudice that resulted from the government's Brady violation. While the instruction informed the jury that the government had erred and that it should disregard the witness's testimony and argument about her, it did not tell the jury that the government's powerful closing argument was premised on a false narrative; i.e., the witness's reliability. Nor did it explain how defense counsel had presented the case one way, only to learn afterwards that the truth was something else. (United States v. Obagi (2020) 965 F.3rd 993.)
> The district court properly dismissed "with prejudice," due to Brady violations, an indictment charging defendants with obstructing federal law enforcement officials carrying out lawful court orders because given the evidence that the government acted with at least reckless disregard for the Brady value of some evidence that prejudiced the defense's ability to marshal their case, the district court's findings of substantial prejudice and flagrant misconduct in part were not clear error. (United States v. Bundy (9th Cir. 2020) 968 F.3rd 1019.)

Confidential Records and Brady: For some time, prosecutors were unsure how to satisfy their Brady obligations while also complying with the statutory confidentiality restrictions contained in Penal Code §§ 832.7 and 832.8, and the procedural requirements under the Evidence Code, as mandated under Pitchess v. Superior Court (1974) 11 Cal.3rd 531 (see below). The California Supreme Court finally solved (or at least discussed) this dilemma in 2015 in the case of People v. Superior Court* (*Johnson (2015) 61 Cal.4th 696.

> The major procedural difference between Brady and Pitchess is that under Brady, the prosecution must produce any "material evidence favorable to the defense" even though no request for such information has been made. Under Pitchess, it is the defense's obligation to affirmatively seek discovery of "potentially exculpatory information" in an officer's personnel records which a court will grant only after the defense makes a "threshold showing" of the existence of such information and its relevance to the instant case, following the procedures as set out in Evidence Code §§ 1043 et seq. "The relatively relaxed standards for a showing of good cause under [Evidence Code] section 1043, subdivision (b)—'materiality' to the subject matter of the pending litigation and a 'reasonable belief' that the agency has the type of information sought—insure the production for inspection of all potentially relevant documents." (*City of Santa Cruz v. Municipal Court (1989) 49 Cal.3rd 74, 84.)

The issue presented in People v. Superior Court* (Johnson) was who—the prosecution or the trial court—has the responsibility for examining an officer's confidential personnel file for Brady material.

The California Supreme Court in Johnson overruled the trial court's finding that P.C. § 832.7(a) was unconstitutional to the extent that it prevented the prosecution from examining a police department's confidential personnel files. To the contrary: "(T)he prosecution does not have unfettered access to confidential personnel records of police officers who are potential witnesses in criminal cases." If the prosecution wishes to obtain information from such files, "it must follow the same procedures that apply to criminal defendants, i.e., file a Pitchess motion, in order to seek information in those records." (Id., at p. 705.)

Whenever the prosecution is put on notice, as it was in the Johnson case, that there is information that is potentially favorable to the defendant in an officer's personnel file, it fulfills its Brady obligations not by rummaging through such files itself, nor by filing a motion with the trial court to review the files (as was done in Johnson), but rather by merely informing the defense of what the police department informed the prosecutor; i.e., that the specified records might contain exculpatory information. This way, a defendant may then decide for himself whether to seek discovery, following the Pitchess (Evid. Code §§ 1043, 1045) procedures if he does. The information the police department has provided to the prosecution, as it is relayed to the defense, together with some explanation of how the officers' credibility might be relevant to the case, satisfies the threshold showing a defendant must make in order to trigger judicial review of the records under Pitchess. When such a showing is made, the trial court is then obligated to sit down with the law enforcement custodian of such records, reviewing those records itself for any relevant, discoverable information, which it may then provide to the defense subject to any protective orders necessary to protect the officer's privacy interests to the extent possible. (Id., at pp. 715-722.) This, of course, puts the onus on law enforcement to notify the prosecution when a police officer witness in a pending criminal litigation has potential Brady material in his or her confidential personnel file. The California Supreme Court, in the case of Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. Superior Court (2019) 8 Cal.5th 28, has authorized law enforcement to make such a notification, holding that while a police department's list of officers with Brady information in their respective personnel file is confidential, a law enforcement agency does not violate that confidentiality by sharing with prosecutors the identity of an officer on its so-called "Brady list" who is a potential witness in a specific pending case.

Therefore, a law enforcement agency may (and under Brady, must) disclose to the prosecution the name and identifying number of an officer who is a potential witness in any pending criminal litigation, along with the fact that that officer may have relevant exonerating or impeaching material in his or her confidential personnel file, without the prosecution first having had to comply with the statutory procedures (Evid. Code §§ 1043-1047; a "Pitchess motion") for the release of such information. (Id., at pp. 43-56.)

Additional Case Law:

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal reversed the district court's denial of defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings, and remanded, in an action brought pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 alleging defendants violated plaintiff's due process rights under Brady v. Maryland (1963) 373 U.S. 83 [83 S.Ct. 1194; 10 L.Ed.2nd 215], by suppressing another person's confession to a murder for which plaintiff was arrested and held for almost four years before the charges were dismissed. The Court held that plaintiff could not show prejudice from the nondisclosure of the confession. A Brady violation requires that the withheld evidence have a reasonable probability of affecting a judicial proceeding. Plaintiff did not state a Brady claim because he did not assert the nondisclosure would have changed the result of any proceeding in his criminal case. The Court rejected plaintiff's contention that the prejudice inquiry should be whether the withheld evidence had a reasonable probability of affecting counsel's strategy. The Court noted that no court has adopted plaintiff's proposed rule, and most other courts require a conviction to establish prejudice. Moreover, here, the cause of plaintiff's continued detention was not the suppression of the confession, but the District Attorney's continued prosecution even after receiving the confession. The Court held that plaintiff might be able to establish a different due process claim, as recognized in Tatum v. Moody (9th Cir. 2014) 768 F.3rd 806, arising out of his continued detention after it was or should have been known that he was entitled to release. In this interlocutory appeal, however, the Court was not asked to address the merits of such a claim. Plaintiff can seek leave to amend his complaint to assert that claim on remand. Concurring, Judge R. Nelson wrote separately to address why Brady should not be extended to pretrial proceedings, explaining that the Supreme Court has framed Brady as a trial right and has never extended Brady to pretrial hearings. (Parker v. County of Riverside (9th Cir. 2023) 78 F.4th 1109.)

Pen. Code § 141: A Prosecutor Withholding Exculpatory Evidence:

Addition of new subdivision (c) in 2017 provides that "(a) prosecuting attorney who intentionally and in bad faith alters, modifies, or withholds any physical matter, digital image, video recording, or relevant exculpatory material or information, knowing that it is relevant and material to the outcome of the case, with the specific intent that the physical matter, digital image, video recording, or relevant exculpatory material or information will be concealed or destroyed, or fraudulently represented as the original evidence upon a trial, proceeding, or inquiry, is guilty of a felony . . . ."

Punishment: Felony; 16 months, 2 or 3 years in prison or county jail pursuant to P.C. § 1170(h).

While already grounds for reversal of a conviction or other court-imposed sanctions against the prosecution (See Brady v. Maryland (1963) 373 U.S. 83 [10 L.Ed.2nd 215; 83 S.Ct. 1194]; generically referred to as a "Brady Violation.), a prosecutor intentionally withholding exculpatory evidence is now a felony offense. Peace officers doing the same (per subd. (b)) is already a felony offense, but with a greater punishment; 2, 3 or 5 years in prison. For anyone else, the offense is a misdemeanor (subd. (a)).

Juvenile Court Records: A similar problem occurs when the potential Brady material is contained in Juvenile Court records; an issue that was recently addressed by California's First District Court of Appeal (Div. 2) in People v. Stewart (2020) 55 Cal.App.5th 755.

A juvenile's Juvenile Court records are private. Obtaining access to such records without a court order is a violation of the juvenile's right to privacy. (See Gonzalez v. Spencer (9th Cir 2003) 336 F.3rd 832.)

However, the Ninth Circuit also held in a subsequent decision that the rule in Gonzalez was too "opaque" to clearly establish this right, thus resulting in a subsequent decision holding that attorneys for the county who obtained plaintiff's juvenile court records without judicial authorization were entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability. (Nunes v. Arata, Swingle, Van Egmond & Goodwin (9th Cir. 2020) 983 F.3rd 1108.)

Citing U.S. Supreme Court authority (See Pennsylvania v. Ritchie (1987) 480 U.S. 39 [94 L.Ed.2nd 40; 107 S.Ct. 989], the Stewart Court noted that a state's interest in the confidentiality of certain records does not take precedence over a criminal defendant's Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment rights to discover favorable evidence. An in camera review of such records by the court is sufficient to protect the interests of both the defendant with a pending criminal case and who is seeking access to such records, as well as the person who's confidential records are being sought. (People v. Stewart, supra, at pp. 771-772.)

As noted in Stewart, when it is determined that Brady information is contained in a witness' juvenile court records, for instance, Pitchess does not apply. Rather, the Welfare and Institutions Code, section 827, puts the onus for protecting from disclosure, and authorizing exceptions, on the Juvenile Court as opposed to an adult trial court. (Id., at p. 773.)

Although Pitchess does not apply to the juvenile records situation, the procedures for a criminal defendant to obtain Brady information from those records are similar. When a criminal defendant files a section 827 petition with the Juvenile Court requesting that the court review a confidential juvenile file—the petition to include information establishing a reasonable basis to support the defendant's claim that the file contains Brady exculpatory or impeachment material—the Juvenile Court must then conduct an in camera review, releasing only those records the court finds to be relevant to the Brady issue. (See J.E. v. Superior Court (2014) 223 Cal.App.4th 1329, 1333.)

As for the prosecutor's Brady obligations, it is noted that although section 827 authorizes a prosecutor to inspect juvenile files without a court order, neither he nor any other person who is entitled to inspect such records without a court order is permitted to disseminate confidential information contained in juvenile files to a person not so authorized. (W&I § 827, subd. (a)(1)(B).) Instead, others (such as the defense counsel in Stewart) are required, as noted above, to take the initiative and file a petition with the Juvenile Court, asking for permission to obtain access to the records in issue. W&I § 827(a)(3)(A); see also W&I § 827(a)(1)(Q).

Upon learning that relevant Brady material is held in a witness' juvenile court records, the prosecutor meets his Brady obligations merely by informing the defense of this fact. "(T)the government's Brady obligations with respect to juvenile records are satisfied if the prosecutor informs the defendant that there is Brady material in the relevant files and the defense can then avail itself of juvenile court review of the relevant files under section 827 to identify and turn over to the defense any exculpatory or impeachment material." (People v. Stewart, supra, at p. 774.)

Infractions:

A trial court was held to have appropriately dismissed an infraction case against defendant as a sanction under Pen. Code § 1054.5(c), where defendant's federal constitutional rights under Brady were violated because substantial evidence supported an inference that the city attorney made no efforts to learn and disclose Brady-required materials. (People v. Houser (2022) 78 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1.)

Note: The Reporter of Decisions was directed not to publish in the Official Appellate Reports the opinion in this case, per Cal. Const., art. VI, section 14; Cal. Rules of Court, rule 8.1125(c)(1).

Federal Law Enforcement and Prosecutor's Obligations: Federal law enforcement officers and federal prosecutors do not have to be concerned with California's statutory requirements, but rather have their own statutes with which to contend; specifically, Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16. Under Rule 16, the government, upon request, has an obligation to turn over any documents within its "possession, custody, or control" that are "material to preparing the defense." (Fed. R. Crim. Pro. 16(a)(1)(E)(i).)

Similar to the procedures as set out under Pitchess and the California Evidence Code, in order to trigger this requirement, the defendant "must make a threshold showing of materiality, which requires a presentation of facts which would tend to show that the Government is in possession of information helpful to the defense." (United States v. Muniz-Jaquez (9th Cir. 2013) 718 F.3rd 1180, 1183-1184; quoting United States v. Stever (9th Cir. 2010) 603 F.3rd 747, 752.)

It has also been held that because "[i]nformation that is not exculpatory or impeaching may still be relevant to developing a possible defense," Rule 16 is "broader than Brady." (United States v. Muniz-Jaquez, supra, at 1183. See also United States v. Cano (9th Cir. 2019) 934 F.3rd 1002, 1022-1026.)

Pitchess v. Superior Court and Evidence Code §§ 1043 et seq.:

Rule: Under Pitchess; A "criminal defendant may, in some circumstances, compel the discovery of evidence in the arresting law enforcement officer's personnel file that is relevant to the defendant's ability to defend against a criminal charge." (People v. Mooc (2001) 26 Cal.4th 1216, 1219; referring to Pitchess v. Superior Court (1974) 11 Cal.3rd 531.)

Statutory Procedures: Pitchess procedures and discovery requirements have since been codified in:

Evid. Code § 1043: Discovery or Disclosure of Peace Officer's Personnel Records:

(a) In any case in which discovery or disclosure is sought of peace or custodial officer personnel records or records maintained pursuant to Section 832.5 of the Penal Code or information from those records, the party seeking the discovery or disclosure shall file a written motion with the appropriate court or administrative body upon written notice to the governmental agency which has custody and control of the records. The written notice shall be given at the times prescribed by subdivision (b) of Section 1005 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Upon receipt of the notice the governmental agency served shall immediately notify the individual whose records are sought.

(b) The motion shall include all of the following:

(1) Identification of the proceeding in which discovery or disclosure is sought, the party seeking discovery or disclosure, the peace or custodial officer whose records are sought, the governmental agency which has custody and control of the records, and the time and place at which the motion for discovery or disclosure shall be heard.

(2) A description of the type of records or information sought.

(3) Affidavits showing good cause for the discovery or disclosure sought, setting forth the materiality thereof to the subject matter involved in the pending litigation and stating upon reasonable belief that the governmental agency identified has the records or information from the records.

(c) No hearing upon a motion for discovery or disclosure shall be held without full compliance with the notice provisions of this section except upon a showing by the moving party of good cause for noncompliance, or upon a waiver of the hearing by the governmental agency identified as having the records.

Evid. Code § 1044: Access to Medical or Psychological History:

Nothing in this article shall be construed to affect the right of access to records of medical or psychological history where such access would otherwise be available under (Evid. Code) Section 996 or 1016.

Evid. Code § 1045: Access to Records of Complaints Where Investigations or Discipline Concern a Peace Officer:

(a) Nothing in this article shall be construed to affect the right of access to records of complaints, or investigations of complaints, or discipline imposed as a result of those investigations, concerning an event or transaction in which the peace officer or custodial officer, as defined in Section 831.5 of the Penal Code, participated, or which he or she perceived, and pertaining to the manner in which he or she performed his or her duties, provided that information is relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending litigation.

(b) In determining relevance, the court shall examine the information in chambers in conformity with (Evid. Code) Section 915, and shall exclude from disclosure:

(1) Information consisting of complaints concerning conduct occurring more than five years before the event or transaction that is the subject of the litigation in aid of which discovery or disclosure is sought.

(2) In any criminal proceeding the conclusions of any officer investigating a complaint filed pursuant to Section 832.5 of the Penal Code.

(3) Facts sought to be disclosed that are so remote as to make disclosure of little or no practical benefit.

(c) In determining relevance where the issue in litigation concerns the policies or pattern of conduct of the employing agency, the court shall consider whether the information sought may be obtained from other records maintained by the employing agency in the regular course of agency business which would not necessitate the disclosure of individual personnel records.

(d) Upon motion seasonably made by the governmental agency which has custody or control of the records to be examined or by the officer whose records are sought, and upon good cause showing the necessity thereof, the court may make any order which justice requires to protect the officer or agency from unnecessary annoyance, embarrassment or oppression.

(e) The court shall, in any case or proceeding permitting the disclosure or discovery of any peace or custodial officer records requested pursuant to (E.C.) Section 1043, order that the records disclosed or discovered may not be used for any purpose other than a court proceeding pursuant to applicable law.

> "'When a defendant shows good cause for the discovery of information in an officer's personnel records, the trial court must examine the records in camera to determine if any information should be disclosed. (Citation) Although Evidence Code section 1045, subdivision (b)(1) excludes from disclosure "[i]nformation consisting of complaints concerning conduct occurring more than five years before the event or transaction that is the subject of the litigation in aid of which discovery or disclosure is sought," disclosure of such information may still be required under Brady v. Maryland (1963) 373 U.S. 83 [10 L.Ed.2nd 215; 83 S.Ct. 1194]. (See City of Los Angeles v. Superior Court (2002) 29 Cal.4th 1, 13–15 & fn. 3 . . . .)" (People v. McDaniel (2021) 15

Evid. Code § 1046: Motion to Include Copy of Police Report in Excessive Force Case:

> In any case, otherwise authorized by law, in which the party seeking disclosure is alleging excessive force by a peace officer or custodial officer, as defined in Section 831.5 of the Penal Code, in connection with the arrest of that party, or for conduct alleged to have occurred within a jail facility, the motion shall include a copy of the police report setting forth the circumstances under which the party was stopped and arrested, or a copy of the crime report setting forth the circumstances under which the conduct is alleged to have occurred within a jail facility.

Evid. Code § 1047: Police Records not Subject to Disclosure:

> Records of peace officers or custodial officers, as defined in Section 831.5 of the Penal Code, including supervisorial officers, who either were not present during the arrest or had no contact with the party seeking disclosure from the time of the arrest until the time of booking, or who were not present at the time the conduct is alleged to have occurred within a jail facility, shall not be subject to disclosure.

Pen. Code § 832.5: Procedure for Investigation of Citizens' Complaints Against Personnel:

> > (1) Each department or agency in this state that employs peace officers shall establish a procedure to investigate complaints by members of the public against the personnel of these departments or agencies, and shall make a written description of the procedure available to the public.
> > (2) Each department or agency that employs custodial officers, as defined in (P.C.) Section 831.5, may establish a procedure to investigate complaints by members of the public against those custodial officers employed by these departments or agencies, provided however, that any procedure so established shall comply with the provisions of this section and with the provisions of (P.C.) Section 832.7.

(b) Complaints and any reports or findings relating to these complaints shall be retained for a period of at least five years. All complaints retained pursuant to this subdivision may be maintained either in the peace or custodial officer's general personnel file or in a separate file designated by the department or agency as provided by department or agency policy, in accordance with all applicable requirements of law. However, prior to any official determination regarding promotion, transfer, or disciplinary action by an officer's employing department or agency, the complaints described by subdivision (c) shall be removed from the officer's general personnel file and placed in separate file designated by the department or agency, in accordance with all applicable requirements of law.

(c) Complaints by members of the public that are determined by the peace or custodial officer's employing agency to be frivolous, as defined in Section 128.5 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or unfounded or exonerated, or any portion of a complaint that is determined to be frivolous, unfounded, or exonerated, shall not be maintained in that officer's general personnel file. However, these complaints shall be retained in other, separate files that shall be deemed personnel records for purposes of the California Public Records Act (Chapter 3.5 (commencing with Section 6250) of Division 7 of Title 1 of the Government Code) and Section 1043 of the Evidence Code.

(1) Management of the peace or custodial officer's employing agency shall have access to the files described in this subdivision.

(2) Management of the peace or custodial officer's employing agency shall not use the complaints contained in these separate files for punitive or promotional purposes except as permitted by subdivision (f) of Section 3304 of the Government Code.

(3) Management of the peace or custodial officer's employing agency may identify any officer who is subject to the complaints maintained in these files which require counseling or additional training. However, if a complaint is removed from the officer's personnel file, any reference in the personnel file to the complaint or to a separate file shall be deleted.

(d) As used in this section, the following definitions apply:

(1) "General personnel file" means the file maintained by the agency containing the primary records specific to each peace or custodial officer's employment, including evaluations, assignments, status changes, and imposed discipline.

(2) "Unfounded" means that the investigation clearly established that the allegation is not true.

(3) "Exonerated" means that the investigation clearly established that the actions of the peace or custodial officer that formed the basis for the complaint are not violations of law or department policy.

Pen. Code § 832.7: Confidentiality of Peace Officer Records: Exceptions:

(a) Except as provided in subdivision (b), the personnel records of peace officers and custodial officers and records maintained by any state or local agency pursuant to (P.C.) Section 832.5, or information obtained from these records, are confidential and shall not be disclosed in any criminal or civil proceeding except by discovery pursuant to Sections 1043 and 1046 of the Evidence Code. This section shall not apply to investigations or proceedings concerning the conduct of peace officers or custodial officers, or an agency or department that employs those officers, conducted by a grand jury, a district attorney's office, or the Attorney General's office.

(1) Notwithstanding subdivision (a), subdivision (f) of Section 6254 of the Government Code, or any other law, the following peace officer or custodial officer personnel records and records maintained by any state or local agency shall not (Italics added) be confidential and shall be made available for public inspection pursuant to the California Public Records Act (Chapter 3.5 (commencing with Section 6250) of Division 7 of Title 1 of the Government Code):

> > (i) An incident involving the discharge of a firearm at a person by a peace officer or custodial officer.
> >
> > (ii) An incident in which the use of force by a peace officer or custodial officer against a person resulted in death, or in great bodily injury.
>
> > (i) Any record relating to an incident in which a sustained finding was made by any law enforcement agency or oversight agency that a peace officer or custodial officer engaged in sexual assault involving a member of the public.
> >
> > (ii) As used in this subparagraph, "sexual assault" means the commission or attempted initiation of a sexual act with a member of the public by means of force, threat, coercion, extortion, offer of leniency or other official favor, or under the color of authority. For purposes of this definition, the propositioning for or commission of any sexual act while on duty is considered a sexual assault.
> >
> > (iii) As used in this subparagraph, "member of the public" means any person not employed by the officer's employing agency and includes any participant in a cadet, explorer, or other youth program affiliated with the agency.

(C) Any record relating to an incident in which a sustained finding was made by any law enforcement agency or oversight agency of dishonesty by a peace officer or custodial officer directly relating to the reporting, investigation, or prosecution of a crime, or directly relating to the reporting of, or investigation of misconduct by, another peace officer or custodial officer, including, but not limited to, any sustained finding of perjury, false statements, filing false reports, destruction, falsifying, or concealing of evidence.

(2) Records that shall be released pursuant to this subdivision include all investigative reports; photographic, audio, and video evidence; transcripts or recordings of interviews; autopsy reports; all materials compiled and presented for review to the district attorney or to any person or body charged with determining whether to file criminal charges against an officer in connection with an incident, or whether the officer's action was consistent with law and agency policy for purposes of discipline or administrative action, or what discipline to impose or corrective action to take; documents setting forth findings or recommended findings; and copies of disciplinary records relating to the incident, including any letters of intent to impose discipline, any documents reflecting modifications of discipline due to the Skelly or grievance process, and letters indicating final imposition of discipline or other documentation reflecting implementation of corrective action.

Note: Referring to Skelly* v. *State Personnel Board (1975) 15 Cal.3rd 194, dealing with due process and disciplinary proceedings.

(3) A record from a separate and prior investigation or assessment of a separate incident shall not be released unless it is independently subject to disclosure pursuant to this subdivision.

(4) If an investigation or incident involves multiple officers, information about allegations of misconduct by, or the analysis or disposition of an investigation of, an officer shall not be released pursuant to subparagraph (B) or (C) of paragraph (1), unless it relates to a sustained finding against that officer. However, factual information about that action of an officer during an incident, or the statements of an officer about an incident, shall be released if they are relevant to a sustained finding against another officer that is subject to release pursuant to subparagraph (B) or (C) of paragraph (1).

(5) An agency shall redact a record disclosed pursuant to this section only for any of the following purposes:

> (A) To remove personal data or information, such as a home address, telephone number, or identities of family members, other than the names and work-related information of peace and custodial officers.
>
> (B) To preserve the anonymity of complainants and witnesses.
>
> (C) To protect confidential medical, financial, or other information of which disclosure is specifically prohibited by federal law or would cause an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy that clearly outweighs the strong public interest in records about misconduct and serious use of force by peace officers and custodial officers.
>
> (D) Where there is a specific, articulable, and particularized reason to believe that disclosure of the record would pose a significant danger to the physical safety of the peace officer, custodial officer, or another person.

(6) Notwithstanding paragraph (5), an agency may redact a record disclosed pursuant to this section, including personal identifying information, where, on the facts of the particular case, the public interest served by not disclosing the information clearly outweighs the public interest served by disclosure of the information.

(7) An agency may withhold a record of an incident described in subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) that is the subject of an active criminal or administrative investigation, in accordance with any of the following:

(i) During an active criminal investigation, disclosure may be delayed for up to 60 days from the date the use of force occurred or until the district attorney determines whether to file criminal charges related to the use of force, whichever occurs sooner. If an agency delays disclosure pursuant to this clause, the agency shall provide, in writing, the specific basis for the agency's determination that the interest in delaying disclosure clearly outweighs the public interest in disclosure. This writing shall include the estimated date for disclosure of the withheld information.

(ii) After 60 days from the use of force, the agency may continue to delay the disclosure of records or information if the disclosure could reasonably be expected to interfere with a criminal enforcement proceeding against an officer who used the force. If an agency delays disclosure pursuant to this clause, the agency shall, at 180-day intervals as necessary, provide, in writing, the specific basis for the agency's determination that disclosure could reasonably be expected to interfere with a criminal enforcement proceeding. The writing shall include the estimated date for the disclosure of the withheld information. Information withheld by the agency shall be disclosed when the specific basis for withholding is resolved, when the investigation or proceeding is no longer active, or by no later than 18 months after the date of the incident, whichever occurs sooner.

(iii) After 60 days from the use of force, the agency may continue to delay the disclosure of records or information if the disclosure could reasonably be expected to interfere with a criminal enforcement proceeding against someone other than the officer who used the force. If an agency delays disclosure under this clause, the agency shall, at 180-day intervals, provide, in writing, the specific basis why disclosure could reasonably be expected to interfere with a criminal enforcement proceeding, and shall provide an estimated date for the disclosure of the withheld information. Information withheld by the agency shall be disclosed when the specific basis for withholding is resolved, when the investigation or proceeding is no longer active, or by no later than 18 months after the date of the incident, whichever occurs sooner, unless extraordinary circumstances warrant continued delay due to the ongoing criminal investigation or proceeding. In that case, the agency must show by clear and convincing evidence that the interest in preventing prejudice to the active and ongoing criminal investigation or proceeding outweighs the public interest in prompt disclosure of records about use of serious force by peace officers and custodial officers. The agency shall release all information subject to disclosure that does not cause substantial prejudice, including any documents that have otherwise become available.

(iv) In an action to compel disclosure brought pursuant to Section 6258 of the Government Code, an agency may justify delay by filing an application to seal the basis for withholding, in accordance with Rule 2.550 of the California Rules of Court, or any successor rule thereto, if disclosure of the written basis itself would impact a privilege or compromise a pending investigation.

(B) If criminal charges are filed related to the incident in which force was used, the agency may delay the disclosure of records or information until a verdict on those charges is returned at trial or, if a plea of guilty or no contest is entered, the time to withdraw the plea pursuant to (P.C.) Section 1018.

(C) During an administrative investigation into an incident described in subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1), the agency may delay the disclosure of records or information until the investigating agency determines whether the use of force violated a law or agency policy, but no longer than 180 days after the date of the employing agency's discovery of the use of force, or allegation of use of force, by a person authorized to initiate an investigation, or 30 days after the close of any criminal investigation related to the peace officer or custodial officer's use of force, whichever is later.

(8) A record of a civilian complaint, or the investigations, findings, or dispositions of that complaint, shall not be released pursuant to this section if the complaint is frivolous, as defined in Section 128.5 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or if the complaint is unfounded. (Italics added)

(c) Notwithstanding subdivisions (a) and (b), a department or agency shall release to the complaining party a copy of his or her own statements at the time the complaint is filed.

(d) Notwithstanding subdivisions (a) and (b), a department or agency that employs peace or custodial officers may disseminate data regarding the number, type, or disposition of complaints (sustained, not sustained, exonerated, or unfounded) made against its officers if that information is in a form which does not identify the individuals involved.

(e) Notwithstanding subdivisions (a) and (b), a department or agency that employs peace or custodial officers may release factual information concerning a disciplinary investigation if the officer who is the subject of the disciplinary investigation, or the officer's agent or representative, publicly makes a statement he or she knows to be false concerning the investigation or the imposition of disciplinary action. Information may not be disclosed by the peace or custodial officer's employer unless the false statement was published by an established medium of communication, such as television, radio, or a newspaper. Disclosure of factual information by the employing agency pursuant to this subdivision is limited to facts contained in the officer's personnel file concerning the disciplinary investigation or imposition of disciplinary action that specifically refute the false statements made public by the peace or custodial officer or his or her agent or representative.

(1) The department or agency shall provide written notification to the complaining party of the disposition of the complaint within 30 days of the disposition.

(2) The notification described in this subdivision shall not be conclusive or binding or admissible as evidence in any separate or subsequent action or proceeding brought before an arbitrator, court, or judge of this state or the United States.

(g) This section does not affect the discovery or disclosure of information contained in a peace or custodial officer's personnel file pursuant to Section 1043 of the Evidence Code.

(h) This section does not supersede or affect the criminal discovery process outlined in Chapter 10 (commencing with Section 1054) of Title 6 of Part 2, or the admissibility of personnel records pursuant to subdivision (a), which codifies the court decision in Pitchess v. Superior Court (1974) 11 Cal.3rd 531.

(i) Nothing in this chapter is intended to limit the public's right of access as provided for in Long Beach Police Officers Association v. City of Long Beach (2014) 59 Cal.4th 59.

Note: In Long Beach Police Officers Association v. City of Long Beach, supra, a trial court denied appellant police union's request for a permanent injunction against disclosure of the names of police officers involved in certain shootings while on duty pursuant to exemptions set forth in the California Public Records Act. The California Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District (Div. 2), affirmed the denial of the request for injunctive relief (Long Beach Police Officers Assn. v. City of Long Beach (2012) 203 Cal.App.4th 292.); a decision in which the California Supreme Court granted review. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the particularized showing necessary to outweigh the public's interest in disclosure was not made in this case, where the union and appellant city, which aligned itself with the union (opposing disclosure), relied on only a few vaguely worded declarations making only general assertions about the risks officers face after a shooting. In weighing the competing interests, the balance tipped strongly in favor of identity disclosure and against the personal privacy interests of the officers involved.

The California Department of Justice is required to disclose as public records under the California Public Records Act; specifically, Gov't. Code, §§ 6252(e), and 6253(a), all responsive officer-related records in its possession that are subject to disclosure under Pen. Code § 832.7(b)(1), regardless of whether it was the employing agency or whether it created the records, because the plain statutory language does not limit disclosure obligations to an officer's employing agency and the right of access under Cal. Const., art. I, § 3, subd. (b)(1), merits a broader interpretation. The catchall exemption in Gov't. Code, § 6255(a) can apply to officer-related records subject to disclosure because no statutory conflict exists; The department failed to demonstrate a basis for applying the catchall exemption because its evidence does show undue burden and duplicative efforts. (Becerra v. Superior Court (2020) 44 Cal.App.5th 897.)

Pen. Code § 832.8: Definitions:

As used in (P.C.) Section 832.7, the following words or phrases have the following meanings:

(a) "Personnel records" means any file maintained under that individual's name by his or her employing agency and containing records relating to any of the following:

(1) Personal data, including marital status, family members, educational and employment history, home addresses, or similar information.

(2) Medical history.

(3) Election of employee benefits.

(4) Employee advancement, appraisal, or discipline.

> (5) Complaints, or investigations of complaints, concerning an event or transaction in which he or she participated, or which he or she perceived, and pertaining to the manner in which he or she performed his or her duties.
> (6) Any other information the disclosure of which would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

> (b) "Sustained" means a final determination by an investigating agency, commission, board, hearing officer, or arbitrator, as applicable, following an investigation and opportunity for an administrative appeal pursuant to Sections 3304 and 3304.5 of the Government Code, that the actions of the peace officer or custodial officer were found to violate law or department policy.
>
> (c) "Unfounded" means that an investigation clearly establishes that the allegation is not true.

Case Law:

> The trial court did not err in denying defendant's Pitchess motion. The proffered justification for the motion was not "plausible" in light of surveillance videos of the event. The videos did not leave in question the nature of the force used or conduct of defendant that preceded the use of that force. (People v. Mackreth (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 317, 341-342.)

Limitation: "(T)he Pitchess statutes 'must be viewed against the larger background of the prosecution's" Brady obligation "so as not to infringe the defendant's right to a fair trial.'" (Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. Superior Court (2019) 8 Cal.5th 28, 41; quoting People v. Mooc 26 Cal.4th 1216, 1225.)

Procedure: The California Supreme Court, in Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. Superior Court (2019) 8 Cal.5th 28, 40-43, provides an excellent review of the Pitchess motion procedures, necessary before a law enforcement officer's confidential personnel file information will be released to a defendant:

"Penal Code section 832.7 renders confidential certain personnel records and records of citizens' complaints, as well as information 'obtained from' those records. (Pen. Code, § 832.7, subd. (a) . . . Upon a motion showing good cause, a litigant may obtain a court's in camera inspection of the confidential information and, possibly, win the information's disclosure. But the less reason there is to believe that an officer has engaged in misconduct, the harder it is to show good cause." (Id., at p. 36.)

"The threshold question under the Pitchess statutes is whether the information requested is confidential. (See Pen. Code, § 832.7, subds. (a)–(b).) If it is, the information may generally be disclosed only 'by discovery pursuant to' Evidence Code sections 1043, 1045, and 1046. (§ 832.7(a); see Johnson (v. Superior Court (2015)) 61 Cal.4th (696) at p. 712, fn. 2.). Requests for disclosure are ordinarily made in criminal cases but may also arise in connection with civil or quasi-criminal proceedings. (See § 832.7(a); see also, e.g., (Riverside County Sheriff's Dept. v.) Stiglitz 60 Cal.4th (624) at p. 628 [appeal of employee discipline]; City of San Jose v. Superior Court (1993) 5 Cal.4th 47, 53 . . . [juvenile wardship proceeding].)" (Id., at p. 41.)

"A party seeking disclosure under the Pitchess statutes must file a written motion and give notice to the agency with custody and control of the records. (Evid. Code, § 1043, subd. (a).) Among other things, the motion must identify the officer or officers at issue (id., § 1043, subd. (b)(1)); describe 'the type of records or information' desired (id., § 1043, subd. (b)(2)); and, by affidavit, show 'good cause for the discovery or disclosure sought' (id., § 1043, subd. (b)(3)). (footnote 2)." (Id., at p.41.)

> Footnote 2: "The affidavit may be executed by an attorney based on information and belief; personal knowledge is not required. (See Garcia v. Superior Court (2007) 42 Cal.4th 63, 74 . . . ; see also City of Santa Cruz v. Municipal Court (1989) 49 Cal.3rd. 73, 86 . . . ; People v. Memro (1985) 38 Cal.3rd 658, 676 . . . .)"

"This 'good cause' (Italics added) requirement has two components. First, the movant must set forth 'the materiality' of the information sought 'to the subject matter involved in the pending litigation.' (Evid. Code, § 1043, subd. (b)(3).) The function of this requirement is to 'exclude[] requests for officer information that are irrelevant to the pending charges.' (Warrick v. Superior Court (2005) 35 Cal.4th 1011, 1021 . . . .) If the movant shows that the request is 'relevant to the pending charges, and explains how, the materiality requirement will be met.' (Johnson, supra, 61 Cal.4th at p. 721; see also Richardson v. Superior Court (2008) 43 Cal.4th 1040, 1048–1049 . . .] ['The materiality standard is met if evidence of prior complaints is admissible or may lead to admissible evidence'].) If information is 'material' within the meaning of Brady, it is necessarily material 'to the subject matter involved in' a criminal prosecution. (Evid. Code, § 1043, subd. (b)(3); see City of Los Angeles (v. Superior Court) 29 Cal.4th (1), at p. 10.)" (Id., at pp. 41-42; see also People v. Mackreth (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 317, 339-342.)

"Second, the "good cause" (Italics added) requirement obliges the movant to articulate 'a "reasonable belief" that the agency has the type of information sought.' (City of Santa Cruz, supra, 49 Cal.3rd at p. 84; see also Evid. Code, § 1043, subd. (b)(3).) This belief 'may be based on a rational inference' (Johnson, supra, 61 Cal.4th at p. 721); for example, that because officers allegedly used excessive force in a pending case, 'other complaints of excessive force "may have been filed'" (City *of Santa Cruz, at p. 90; see also id., at p. 93, fn. 9). Certainly, a movant is not required "'to allege with particularity the very information'" sought. (Johnson, at p. 721, quoting Memro, supra, 38 Cal.3rd at p. 684.) At the least, the requisite 'reasonable belief' exists when a movant declares that the agency from which the movant seeks records has placed the officer at issue on a Brady list. (See ibid.)" (Id., at p. 42.)

"The function of the "good cause" (Italics added) requirement at this stage of the Pitchess process is not to determine whether documents will be disclosed to the movant; it is to determine whether information will be reviewed in camera. Accordingly, the burden imposed by the requirement 'is not high.' (Johnson, supra, 61 Cal.4th at p. 720; see City *of Santa Cruz, supra, 49 Cal.3rd at p. 84 [requirement is designed to ensure 'the production for inspection of all potentially relevant documents'].)" (Id., at p. 42.)

"When a court determines that a movant has made a showing sufficient to justify in camera inspection, 'the custodian of records should bring to court all documents "potentially relevant" to the . . . motion.' ((People v.) Mooc 26 Cal.4th (1216) at p. 1226.) '[I]f the custodian has any doubt whether a particular document is relevant, [the custodian] should present it to the trial court.' (Id., at p. 1229.) The court must examine those documents 'in conformity with [Evidence Code] section 915 (i.e., out of the presence of all persons except the person authorized to claim the privilege and such other[s as that person] is willing to have present).' (City of Santa Cruz, supra, 49 Cal.3rd at p. 83; see Evid. Code, §§ 915, 1045, subd. (b).) To facilitate appellate review, the court should make a record of what it has examined. (See People v. Townsel (2016) 63 Cal.4th 25, 69 . . . ; see also Mooc, at p. 1229–1230; see generally People v. Gaines (2009) 46 Cal.4th 172 . . . .) Questioning the custodian of records under oath regarding which documents were produced helps both to facilitate appellate review and to ensure that information is not withheld from the movant improperly. (See Mooc, at p. 1229 & fn. 4.)" (Id., at pp. 42-43.)

"After conducting in camera review, a court has discretion regarding which documents, if any, it will disclose to a movant. (See, e.g., People v. Myles (2012) 53 Cal.4th 1181, 1209.) Evidence Code section 1045 guides the exercise of that discretion, requiring the court to "exclude from disclosure" certain information (id., § 1045, subd. (b)(1)–(3)) and to 'consider' whether the movant could obtain certain other information without disclosure of individual personnel records (id., § 1045, subd. (c)). (See also Evid. Code, § 1047; Stiglitz, supra, 60 Cal.4th at pp. 641–642.) Notwithstanding these provisions, however, the court must disclose information that is favorable to the defense and "material" within the meaning of Brady. (Johnson, supra, 61 Cal.4th at p. 720.)" (Id., at p. 43.)

"Finally, the Pitchess statutes protect information that is disclosed to a movant from further dissemination. 'The court shall, in any case or proceeding permitting the disclosure or discovery of any peace or custodial officer records requested pursuant to [Evidence Code] Section 1043, order that the records disclosed or discovered may not be used for any purpose other than a court proceeding pursuant to applicable law.' (Evid. Code, § 1045, subd. (e); see generally Chambers v. Superior Court (2007) 42 Cal.4th 673 . . . ; Alford v. Superior Court (2003) 29 Cal.4th 1033 . . . .) Upon a proper motion by the custodian or the officer at issue, the court may also 'make any order which justice requires to protect the officer or agency from unnecessary annoyance, embarrassment or oppression.' (Evid. Code, § 1045, subd. (d).)" (Id., at p. 43.)

Confidentiality: Based upon an analysis of the above statutes and case law, specifically Brady and Pitchess, the California Supreme Court held that a police department's Brady list is confidential to the extent it is derived from confidential personnel records. However, a law enforcement agency does not violate that confidentiality by sharing with prosecutors the identity of law enforcment officers on their Brady list who are potential witnesses in a specific pending case. Therefore, when a peace officer on a department's Brady list is a potential witness in a specific pending criminal prosecution, that department may disclose to the prosecution the name and identifying number of the officer and the fact that the officer may have relevant exonerating or impeaching material in his or her confidential personnel file without the prosecution first having had to comply with the statutory procedures (Evid. Code §§ 1043-1047) for the release of such information. (Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. Superior Court (2019) 8 Cal.5th 28.)

Duty to Preserve Evidence*:

Rule: "Law enforcement agents have a constitutional duty to preserve evidence, but that duty is limited to evidence that might be expected to play a significant role in the suspect's defense. (California v. Trombetta (1984) 467 U.S. 479, 488 [81 L.Ed.2nd 413; 104 S Ct. 2528]) To reach this standard of constitutional materiality, the evidence must both possess an exculpatory value that was apparent before it was destroyed, and be of such a nature that the defendant would be unable to obtain comparable evidence by other reasonably available means. (Id. at p. 489; accord, People v. Carte*r* (2005) 36 Cal.4th 1215, 1246 . . . .) (¶) The defendant bears a higher burden to establish a constitutional violation when no more can be said of the evidence than that it could have been subjected to tests, the results of which might have exonerated the defendant. (Arizona v. Youngblood (1988) 488 U.S. 51, 57 [102 L.Ed.2nd 281; 109 S.Ct. 333]. . . .) In such cases, unless a criminal defendant can show bad faith on the part of the police, failure to preserve potentially useful evidence does not constitute a denial of due process of law. (Id. at p. 58; accord, (People v.) Duff (2014) . . . 58 Cal.4th (527) at p. 549.) The assessment of bad faith must necessarily turn on the police's knowledge of the exculpatory value of the evidence at the time it was lost or destroyed. (Youngblood, at p. 57 [fn. omitted].)" (People v. Flores (2020) 9 Cal.5th 371, 394.)

> "To establish a due process violation, defendant therefore must prove that the police acted in bad faith." (Id., at p. 395; citing Youngblood, supra, 488 U.S. at p. 57; and Duff, supra, 58 Cal.4th at p. 549.)
> Bad faith in the destruction of evidence requires more than mere negligence or recklessness. An adverse inference jury instruction regarding the government's destruction of evidence need not be given where no bad faith failure to preserve the evidence was shown. (Id., at p. 397; fingerprints on a firearm used in a murder were wiped off by a Mexican law enforcement officer.)

Case Law:

> "'Due process does not impose upon law enforcement "an undifferentiated and absolute duty to retain and to preserve all material that might be of conceivable evidentiary significance in a particular prosecution." [Citation.] At most, the state's obligation to preserve evidence extends to "evidence that might be expected to play a significant role in the suspect's defense." (People v. Duff ((2014)) 58 Cal.4th (527,) at p. 549.) Whether the loss of evidence rises to the level of a due process violation is governed by the principles set forth by the United States Supreme Court in Trombetta and Youngblood. (People v. Alvarez (2014) 229 Cal.App.4th 761, 771 . . . .) Under Trombetta, law enforcement agencies must preserve evidence only if the evidence possesses exculpatory value that was apparent before it was destroyed and if the evidence is of a type not obtainable by other reasonably available means. (People v. Velasco (2011) 194 Cal.App.4th 1258, 1262 . . . ; California v. Trombetta, supra, 467 U.S. at pp. 488–489.) As an alternative to establishing the apparent exculpatory value of the lost evidence, Youngblood provides that a defendant may show that 'potentially useful' evidence was destroyed as a result of bad faith. (fn. omitted) (Velasco, at p. 1262; see Arizona v. Youngblood, supra, 488 U.S. at p. 58.)" (People v. Fultz (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 395, 424.)

"'(D)ue process does not require the police to collect particular items of evidence. [Citation.] "The police cannot be expected to] gather up everything which might eventually prove useful to the defense."' (People v. Montes (2014) 58 Cal.4th 809, 837 . . . [no duty to collect blood samples]; see People v. Mills (1985) 164 Cal.App.3rd 652, 656 . . . [no duty to collect breath samples]; see also People v. Harris (1985) 165 Cal.App.3rd 324, 329 . . . ['To date there is no authority for the proposition that sanctions should be imposed for a failure to gather evidence as opposed to a failure to preserve evidence']; People v. Bradley (1984) 159 Cal.App.3rd 399, 406 . . . ['[W]e have found no cases of precedential value which squarely hold that the prosecution's duty to preserve material evidence encompasses an initial duty to affirmatively collect or gather or seize potentially material evidence in the course of an investigation for defendant's use'].)'" (People v. Fultz, supra, at p. 425; noting, however, that "there may be an appropriate case where the failure to collect evidence might warrant due process considerations," citing People v. Montes, supra, at p. 838; and Miller v. Vasquez (9th Cir. 1989) 868 F.2nd 1116, 1119.)

> In Fultz, two co-defendants accepted plea agreements on the condition that they testify against the sole remaining defendant (i.e., Fultz), and that they do so truthfully. Unfortunately, the pre-trial interview of these two co-defendants, although recorded, was muted. Law enforcement argued that the muting was accidental. The trial court disbelieved them, finding the muting to have occurred in bad faith. The Appellate Court upheld the trial court's determination that this constituted a "due process" violation, and a failure to preserve relevant evidence in violation of Trombetta. (Id., at pp. 426-429.)

> The Fultz Court made similar findings as to law enforcement's loss of a photograph of a co-conspirator's (who testified with immunity) shoes and her taped interview. (Id., at p. 430.)

The trial court dismissed three felony charges against defendant due to the loss of dashcam evidence which occurred during the prosecution's five-year delay in prosecuting the case after filing charges against defendant (Cal. Const., art. I, § 15). The Court of Appeal reversed the judgment, finding that there was no evidence that the loss of evidence prejudiced defendant. Defendant offered only unsupported speculation that dashcam footage had exculpatory value, in that it might have contradicted the arresting officer's version of events. (People v. Manzo (2023) 96 Cal.App.5th 538; petition for review denied, Jan. 10, 2024; 2024 Cal. LEXIS 33.)

Defendant argued that the charges against him should be dismissed because the officer failed to preserve the dashboard footage from the traffic stop, thus depriving him of due process. The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeal held that spoliation of evidence, or the destruction of or failure to preserve evidence, can indeed be a due-process violation. However, to rise to the level of a due process violation, the defendant must show that the unpreserved evidence had "an exculpatory value that was apparent before the evidence was destroyed and was of such a nature that the defendant would be unable to obtain comparable evidence by other reasonably available means." In addition, the defendant must establish that the police acted in "bad faith" in failing to preserve the evidence. Thus, spoliation will only violate due process where the police themselves by their conduct indicate that the evidence could form a basis for exonerating the defendant" yet still failed to preserve it. In this case, defendant failed to satisfy any of these elements. Here, the officer and a dashboard-camera expert both testified that the officer's bodycam captured the same, if not better, footage of the traffic stop. The jury watched that video and found nothing exculpatory. The record further suggests the dashcom video would have confirmed what the bodycam video already captured. The fact that the two videos were duplicative also prevents defendant from arguing that "comparable evidence" was not reasonably available. Finally, defendant failed to show that the officer did not preserve potentially exculpatory evidence in bad faith. Therefore, his due-process argument failed. (United States v. Perry (4th Cir. 2024) 92 4th 500.)

Case Law Priorities*:

The Courts' Order of Priority: Federal and California law is cited in this outline. In reviewing the cases listed, it must be remembered that tactical decisions and actions of state and local law enforcement officers, as well as state and local prosecutors, are bound, and must be guided, in order of priority, by the decisions of:

1. The United States Supreme Court
2. The California Supreme Court
3. The various state District Courts of Appeal (Districts 1 through 6)
4. The various state Appellate Departments of the Superior Court
5. Opinions of the California Attorney General
6. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal
7. All other Federal Circuit Courts of Appeal
8. The Federal District Courts
9. Decisions from other states.

Decisions from the United States Supreme Court; The Doctrine of Stare Decisis: California's courts, interpreting the U.S. Constitution, federal statutes, etc., must abide by decisions in prior cases when based upon similar facts as announced by the U.S. Supreme Court. (Auto Equity Sales v. Superior Court (1962) 57 Cal.2nd 450, 454, 456.)

> The United States Constitution is the "Supreme Law of the Land, and therefore takes precedence over any contrary rules from the states. (U.S. Const. Art VI, clause 2: "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.")
> See also Cal. Const., Art. III, § 1: "The State of California is an inseparable part of the United States of America, and the United States Constitution is the supreme law of the land."
>
> "I fully recognize that under the doctrine of stare decisis, I must follow the rulings of the Supreme Court, and if that court wishes to jump off a figurative Pali, I, lemming-like, must leap right after it. However, I reserve my First Amendment right to kick and scream on my way down to the rocks below." (People v. Musante (1980) 102 Cal.App.3d 156, 159; conc. opn. of Gardner, P.J.)
>
> Lower appellate courts, state and federal, are, of course, bound by decisions from the U.S. Supreme Court, even if inconsistent with prior decisions from that lower court: "[W]here the reasoning or theory of our prior circuit authority is clearly irreconcilable with the reasoning or theory of intervening higher authority, a three-judge panel should consider itself bound by the later and controlling authority, and should reject the prior circuit opinion as having been effectively overruled." (Miller v. Gammie (9th Cir. 2003) 335 F.3rd 889, 893.)

Decisions from the California Supreme Court:

"(W)e follow the path staked out for us by our Supreme Court . . . because it is the Supreme Court's role to blaze the trails and our role to follow the trail so blazed. (Auto Equity Sales, Inc. v. Superior Court (1962) 57 Cal.2d 450, 455–456 . . . 'Courts exercising inferior jurisdiction must accept the law declared by courts of superior jurisdiction.')" (In re J.W. (2020) 56 Cal.App.5th 355, 361-362.)

From the federal Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals: "When interpreting state law, we are bound to follow the decisions of the state's highest court, and when the state supreme court has not spoken on an issue, we must determine what result the court would reach based on state appellate court opinions, statutes and treatises." Diaz (v. Kubler Corp. (9th Cir. 2015)) 785 F.3rd (1326) at 1329 (cleaned up). "We will ordinarily accept the decision of an intermediate appellate court as the controlling interpretation of state law," Tomlin v. Boeing Co., 650 F.2nd 1065, 1069 n.7 (9th Cir. 1981), "unless the federal court finds convincing evidence that the state's supreme court likely would not follow it," Ryman v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 505 F.3rd 993, 994 (9th Cir. 2007)" (Tabares v. City of Huntington Beach (9th Cir. 2021) 988 F.3rd 1119, 1124.)

Decisions from lower Federal Courts:

Rule: Decisions of the Federal District (i.e., trial) Courts, and federal Circuit Courts of Appeal (including the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal), while entitled to "great weight," are considered to be "persuasive" only, and are not controlling in California state courts. (Raven v. Deukmejian (1990) 52 Cal.3rd 336, 352; People v. Bradley (1969) 1 Cal.3rd 80, 86; In re Tyrell J. (1994) 8 Cal.4th 68, 79; People v. Zapien (1993) 4 Cal.4th 929, 989; Clark v. Murphy (9th Cir. 2003) 317 F.3rd 1038, 1044; Tully v. World Savings & Loan Assn. (1997) 56 Cal.App.4th 654, 663; People v. Noriega (2015) 237 Cal.App.4th 991, 1003.)

> A federal district court decision is not controlling authority in any jurisdiction. (Ashcroft v. al-Kidd (2011) 563 U.S. 731, 741 [131 S.Ct. 2074; 179 L.Ed.2nd 1149].)

State Court Interpretation taking Precedence: For state and local law enforcement officers, a state court interpretation of the various Fourth Amendment rules will take precedence over Federal District (i.e., trial) and Circuit Court of Appeal decisions. (See People v. Middleton (2005) 131 Cal.App.4th 732, 738, fn. 3.)

> "Where California intermediate appellate court cases conflict, any trial court may choose the decision it finds most persuasive." (Sears v. Morrison (1999) 76 Cal.App.4th 577, 587.)
> Note: Federal decisions cannot be ignored. Even purely state cases may eventually end out in a federal court, where federal rules will be applied, through a Writ of Habeas Corpus or in a civil rights lawsuit pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983.
>
> "A federal court may grant habeas relief to a state prisoner if a state court's adjudication of his constitutional claim was 'contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.'" (Middleton v. McNeil (2004) 541 U.S. 433, 436 [158 L.Ed.2nd 701]; citing 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(1).)
>
> Note: Title 42 United States Code § 1983: Provides for federal civil liability for "Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State . . ." subjects, or causes to be subjected any person within the United States to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the United States Constitution and laws.

Federal Decisions From Other Circuits:

> "[T]he prior precedent must be 'controlling'—from the Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court—or otherwise be embraced by a 'consensus' of courts outside the relevant jurisdiction." (West v. City of Caldwell (9th Cir. 2019) 831 F.3rd 978, 986; quoting Wilson v. Layne (1999) 526 U.S. 603, 617 [119 S.Ct. 1692; 143 L.Ed.2nd 818].)

Decisions From Other States: California courts are not bound by case decisions from other states (J.C. Penney Casualty Ins. Co. v. M.K. (1991) 52 Cal.3rd 1009, 1027.), although they may be considered absent any direct California case law on the issue. (People v. Valencia (2011) 201 Cal.App.4th 922, 932.)

> Where "no California cases have decided the issue presented, we may look to other jurisdictions for guidance." (Emphasis added: Rappaport v. Gelfand (2011) 197 Cal.App.4th 1213, 1227.)
> "(O)ut-of-state decisions . . . have persuasive value. 'In resolving questions of statutory construction, the decisions of other jurisdictions interpreting similarly worded statutes, although not controlling, can provide valuable insight.'" (Italics added: People v. Wade (2016) 63 Cal.4th 137, 141; quoting In re Joyner (1989) 48 Cal.3rd 487, 491.)

> Prior precedent may be reconsidered when the "the clear consensus of . . . out-of-state cases" suggests such precedence falls well outside the mainstream. (Moradi-Shalal v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Companies (1988) 46 Cal.3rd 287, 298. See also People v. Lopez (2019) 8 Cal.5th 353, 379.)

Equally Split Decisions:

> "Opinions which are affirmed by an equally divided en banc Court of Appeals have no precedential value." (United States v. Yarbrough (9th Cir. 1988) 852 F.2nd 1522, 1538, fn. 8.)
>
> "Decisions by an equally divided en banc court have no value as binding precedent." (United States v. Mendoza-Gonzalez (5th Cir. 2003) 318 F.3rd 663, 667 fn. 5.)
> See West v. City of Caldwell (9th Cir. 2019) 831 F.3rd 978, 985-896, citing the above.)

Opinions of the California Attorney General: A published opinion of the California Attorney General is apparently on about equal footing with federal appellate court decisions, it having been held that these opinions are "entitled to great weight in the absence of controlling state statutes and court decisions" to the contrary. (Phyle v. Duffy (1948) 334 U.S. 431, 441 [68 S.Ct. 1131; 92 L.Ed. 1494, 1500].)

Writs of Habeas Corpus: When a defendant claims to be in actual or constructive custody in violation of the United States Constitution (e.g., as the result of a Fourth Amendment violation), a Writ of Habeas Corpus filed in state (P.C. §§ 1473 et seq.) or federal (28 U.S.C. § 2254) court (see Wright v. West (1992) 505 U.S. 277 [120 L.Ed.2nd 225].) is the vehicle by which he or she may test the issue.

> A prisoner in state custody cannot use a civil 42 U.S.C. § 1983 action to challenge the fact or duration of his or her confinement, but must instead seek federal habeas corpus relief or analogous state relief. (Preiser v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 475, 477, 500 [93 S.Ct. 1827; 36 L.Ed.2nd 439]; barring inmates from obtaining an injunction to restore good-time credits via a § 1983 action.)
> > "Preiser (however, does) not 'preclude a litigant with standing from obtaining by way of ancillary relief an otherwise proper injunction enjoining the prospective enforcement of invalid prison regulations.'" (Martin v. City of Boise (2019) 920 F.3rd 584, 611; quoting Wolff v. McDonnell (1974) 418 U.S. 539, 555 [94 S. Ct. 2963; 41 L.Ed.2nd 935].)

Certiorari has been granted in Boise and is currently pending before the U.S. Supreme Court.

With regard to retrospective relief, as a general rule, any petition for a writ of habeas corpus must be filed while the petitioner is "in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court." (See 28 U.S.C. § 2254(a); Spencer v. Kemna (1998) 523 U.S. 1, 7, 17-18 [118 S.Ct. 978; 140 L.Ed.2nd 43].).

When a habeas corpus remedy is sought in federal court, the United States Supreme Court has noted that: "(W)here the State has provided an opportunity for full and fair litigation of a Fourth Amendment claim, a state prisoner may not be granted federal habeas corpus relief on the ground that evidence obtained in an unconstitutional search or seizure was introduced at his trial." (fns. omitted; Stone v. Powell (1976) 428 U.S. 465, 494 [49 L.Ed.2nd 1067, 1088]; see also Allen v. McCurry (1980) 449 U.S. 90 [101 S.Ct. 411; 66 L.Ed.2nd 308].)

Also, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d), a federal court "may not grant habeas relief from a state court conviction unless the state court proceedings were 'contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States[,]' or if the state court's conclusions were 'based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the State court proceedings.'" (Jackson v. Giurbino (9th Cir. 2004) 364 F.3rd 1002, 1005 (reversed on other grounds), quoting Killian v. Poole (9th Cir. 2002) 282 F.3rd 1204, 1207.)

Also see 28 U.S.C. § 2255: "Section 2255 is a substitute for habeas corpus relief for federal prisoners . . . and allows a petitioner to file a motion to 'vacate, set aside or correct' the petitioner's conviction or sentence 'upon the ground that the sentence was imposed in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States, or that the court was without jurisdiction to impose such sentence, or that the sentence was in excess of the maximum authorized by law, or is otherwise subject to collateral attack.' 28 U.S.C. § 2255(a)." (See United States v. Swisher (9th Cir. 2014) 771 F.3rd 514, 519.)

(Italics added) (See People v. Williams (2009) 176 Cal.App.4th 1521, 1529.)

(b) Exceptions: An unpublished opinion may be cited or relied on:

(1) When the opinion is relevant under the doctrines of law of the case, res judicata, or collateral estoppel; or

(2) When the opinion is relevant to a criminal or disciplinary action because it states reasons for a decision affecting the same defendant or respondent in another such action.

Federal Rules of Appellate Proc., Rule 32.1:

Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 32.1 permits attorneys to cite to federal courts of appeals their unpublished opinions issued 2007 or later. Unpublished opinions issued before 2007 may be cited to the courts if permitted by the courts' local rules.

Federal Officers; a Bivens Cause of Action*:

General Rule: While 42 U.S.C. § 1983 is available when suing state officers, the U.S. Supreme Court has held that there is an implied right of action for civil damages against federal officers alleged to have violated a citizen's constitutional rights. (Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics (1971) 403 U.S. 388 [91 S.Ct. 1999; 29 L.Ed.2nd 619].)

In Bivens, the U.S. Supreme Court held that it had authority to create "a cause of action under the Fourth Amendment" against federal agents who allegedly manacled the plaintiff and threatened his family while arresting him for narcotics violations. (Id., at p. 397.)

42 U.S.C. § 1983 does not apply to civil suits against federal officers. (Id., at p. 398, fn. 1; concurring opinion.)

The Supreme Court first recognized an implied right of action for damages against federal officers in Bivens. The Court held that damages were recoverable directly under the Fourth Amendment when federal officers arrested and searched plaintiff Webster Bivens without a warrant or probable cause, and when they allegedly employed unreasonable force in making the arrest. "In Bivens, the Supreme Court recognized, for the first time, an implied cause of action arising directly under the Constitution for damages against federal officers alleged to have violated a plaintiff's constitutional rights." (Hoffman v. Preston (9th Cir. 2022) 26 F.4th 1059, 1064, citing Bivens, 403 U.S. at 389.)

Limitations:

However, a Bivens theory of liability has been held to be a "more limited" "federal analog" to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 statutory liability. (Hernandez v. Mesa (Feb. 25, 2020) __ U.S. __ [140 S.Ct. 735; 747; 206 L.Ed.2nd 29], citing Hartman* v. *Moore (2006) 547 U.S. 250, 254, fn. 2 [126 S.Ct. 1695; 164 L.Ed.2nd 441].)

Only twice since Bivens was decided has the Court fashioned new causes of action under the Constitution:

1. For a former congressional staffer's Fifth Amendment sex-discrimination claim. (Davis. v. Passman (1979) 442 U.S. 288 [99 S.Ct. 2264; 60 L.Ed.2nd 846].)

   However, see Egbert v. Boule (June 8, 2022) __ U.S. __, at p. __ [142 S.Ct. 1793; 213 L.Ed.2nd 54], questioning whether, in light of subsequent Supreme Court decisions, Passman was appropriately decided.

2. For a federal prisoner's inadequate-care claim under the Eighth Amendment. (Carlson* v. *Green (1980) 446 U. S. 14 [100 S.Ct. 1468; 64 L.Ed.2nd 15].)

The Issue:

Taking the above into consideration, it has been held that a Bivens cause of action is appropriate where:

> Damages were sought against federal officers who violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures. (Bivens, supra.)
> Damages are sought under the Fifth Amendment's "due process" clause for gender discrimination by a member of the United States Congress. (Davis v. Passman (1979) 442 U.S. 228, 239 [99 S.Ct. 2264; 60 L.Ed.2nd 846].)
>
> An implied claim under the Eighth Amendment's cruel and unusual punishment clause for prison officials' failure to provide adequate medical care to a severely asthmatic prisoner, resulting in the prisoner's death. (Carlson v. Green (1980) 446 U.S. 14, 16-18, & fn. 1. [100 S.Ct. 1468; 64 L. Ed.2nd 15].)
> In the unpublished decision of Martinez v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons (9th Cir. 2020) 830 F. App'x 234, 235, a previously incarcerated plaintiff sought a Bivens remedy under Carlson for an Eighth Amendment claim for inadequate exercise. Although both the claims in Martinez and those in Carlson arose under the Eighth Amendment, the court affirmed the district court's finding that the plaintiff's claim in this case was a "new context," because the inadequate exercise claim was "demonstrably different in kind . . . from that of Carlson." A Bivens remedy was therefore denied.

Bivens Actions as a Disfavored Remedy:

Per the U.S. Supreme Court; "special factors . . . counsel hesitation" in over-using a Bivens theory of liability, concentrating on whether the judiciary is well suited, absent congressional action or instruction, to consider and weigh the costs and benefits of allowing a damages action to proceed. (Ziglar v. Abbasi (June 19, 2017) __ U.S. __ [137 S.Ct. 1843, 1848-1849; 198 L.Ed.2nd 290].)

The Supreme Court made it clear in Ziglar that "expanding the Bivens remedy is now a disfavored judicial activity," although a Bivens remedy is still available in appropriate cases where there are "powerful reasons" to retain it in its "common and recurrent sphere of law enforcement." (Id., at 137 S.Ct. at p. 1857.)

However, it has been ruled that "Abbasi makes clear that, though disfavored, Bivens may still be available in a case against an individual federal officer who violates a person's constitutional rights while acting in his official capacity." (See Lanuza v. Love (9th Cir. 2018) 899 F.3rd 1019, 1028.)

Note: See Hernandez v. Mesa, below, for the "special factors" identified by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Where a U.S. Border Patrol agent, in reaction to subjects throwing rocks at him while he attempted to detain a subject who had illegally crossed the international border with Mexico, shot across the border into Mexico, killing a Mexican national standing on the Mexico side, the U.S. Supreme Court (reversing the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeal's holding that the agent was entitled to qualified immunity; see Hernandez v. Mesa (5th Cir. 2015) 785 F.3rd 117.) remanded the case to reconsider the viability of a civil suit on Fourth Amendment (excessive force) grounds in light of the Court's decision in Ziglar v. Abbasi, supra, which discussed various "special factors" that "counsel hesitation" in allowing a federal civil action per Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, supra, against a federal officer for his alleged use of excessive force. (Hernandez v. Mesa (2017) 582 U.S. 548 [137 S.Ct. 2003; 198 L.Ed.2nd 625].)

> The Hernandez Court also ruled that granting the federal agent qualified immunity from Fifth Amendment "due process" liability was inappropriate when the nationality and the extent of the victim's ties to the United States were unknown to the agent at the time of the shooting. "The qualified immunity analysis thus is limited to the facts that were knowable to the defendant officers at the time they engaged in the conduct in question." (Id., at p. 554.)

On Hernandez's second trip to the U.S. Supreme Court, after remand back to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeal, the High Court ruled that the decedent's family in this cross-border shooting could not bring Bivens claims against the agent for alleged Fourth and Fifth Amendment violations because the Court refused to extend Bivens (Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics (1971) 403 U.S. 388 [91 S.Ct. 1999; 29 L.Ed.2nd 619].) into that new field of legal liability. Factors that counseled hesitation included the potential effect on foreign relations, the risk of undermining border security, and the fact that when Congress had enacted statutes creating a damages remedy for persons injured by U.S. government officers, it had precluded claims for injuries that occurred abroad. (Hernandez v. Mesa (2017) 582 U.S. 548 [137 S.Ct. 2003; 198 L.Ed.2nd 625].)

> See Egbert v. Boule (June 8, 2022) __ U.S. __, at p. __ [142 S.Ct. 1793; 213 L.Ed.2nd 54], quoting Haig v. Agee (1981) 453 U.S. 280, at p. 292 [101 S.Ct. 2766; 69 L.Ed.2nd 640]; "Matters intimately related to foreign policy and national security are rarely proper subjects for judicial intervention. In Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580 (1952), the Court observed that matters relating 'to the conduct of foreign relations . . . are so exclusively entrusted to the political branches of government as to be largely immune from judicial inquiry or interference.' Id., at 589."

See also Elhady v. Unidentified CBP Agents (6th Cir. MI 2021) 18 F.4th 880, where the Sixth Circuit declined to extend Bivens to a Fifth Amendment due process claim, defendant suing over having been left in an allegedly freezing holding cell by Border Patrol agents without blankets or sufficient clothing to the point where he was hospitalized, citing Hernandez v. Mesa (5th Cir. 2015) 785 F.3rd 117.

The U.S. Supreme Court held that the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals plainly erred when it created a cause of action for the bed-and-breakfast owner's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim because Congress was better positioned to create remedies in the border-security context, and the Government already had provided alternative remedies that protected plaintiffs like the owner. Because matters intimately related to foreign policy and national security were rarely proper subjects for judicial intervention, a Bivens cause of action may not lie where national security was at issue. The Ninth Circuit also plainly erred when it created a cause of action for the bed-and-breakfast owner's First Amendment retaliation claim because there was no Bivens action for First Amendment retaliation. There were many reasons to think that Congress, not the courts, was better suited to authorize such a damages remedy. (*Egbert v. Boule (June 8, 2022) __ U.S. __ [142 S.Ct. 1793; 213 L.Ed.2nd 54], reversing the Ninth Circuit at Boule v. Egbert (9th Cir. 2020) 980 F.3rd 1309.)

> Note: See the concurring opinion in Egbert at pp. __-__, where Justice Gorsuch questions whether the Court shouldn't just quit beating around the bush and overrule Bivens altogether, leaving it up to Congress to enact penalties for when U.S. officers violate anyone's constitutional rights.

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal reversed the denial of a Federal Protective Service officer's motion to dismiss a protester's action because the Court found no Bivens cause of action was available in this case. The officer was directing a multi-agency operation to protect federal property and carrying out an executive order. Allowing a Bivens action to proceed in this case could expose sensitive communications between the officer and other high-level executive officers regarding the implementation of policy. Furthermore, Congress afforded plaintiffs like the protester an alternative remedy that independently foreclosed a Bivens action; i.e.; "(A)ggrieved parties can report any alleged misconduct to the Inspector General of the Department of Homeland Security, who must either investigate or refer the matter to the Officer for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties. 5 U.S.C. app. 3 § 8I(f)(2)(B)-(C), (F)-(G); see also 6 U.S.C. § 345(a)(1), (4), (6) (requiring Officer for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties to investigate alleged misconduct)." (Pettibone v. Russell (9th Cir. 2023) 59 F.4th 449.)

Bivens Extension Issues:

Bivens protections extended to a damages remedy for a gender discrimination claim against a United States Congressman under the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause. (Davis v. Passman (1979) 442 U.S. 228 [99 S.Ct. 2264; 60 L.Ed.2nd 846].)

A Bivens damages remedy was recognized against federal prison officials for failure to provide adequate medical treatment under the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. (Carlson v. Green (1980) 446 U.S. 14 [100 S.Ct. 1468; 64 L.Ed.2nd 15].)

See also Elhady v. Unidentified CBP Agents (6th Cir. MI 2021) 18 F.4th 80, where the Sixth Circuit declined to extend Bivens to a Fifth Amendment due process claim, defendant suing over having been left in an allegedly freezing holding cell by Border Patrol agents without blankets or sufficient clothing to the point where he was hospitalized.

But see Hoffman v. Preston (9th Cir. 2022) 26 F.4th 1059, where, in a split 2-to-1 decision, the Ninth Circuit held that Bivens applied to a federal prisoner's claims that a federal prison guard intentionally targeted him for harm by spreading malicious rumors about and offering bribes to other inmates to attack him, the inmate was attacked because of the officer's conduct, and the officer failed to protect the inmate against the known risk of harm that the officer himself created.

> At pgs. 1069-1070, the Hoffman Court notes that the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA"), 28 U.S.C. § 1915A(a) was not intended to be a substitute for in-court litigation of an alleged wrong done to prison inmates. "(T)he PLRA makes clear that a prisoner may bring a federal action after he exhausts the grievance process. 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(a). The Supreme Court has acknowledged as much, explaining that 'federal prisoners suing under [Bivens] must first exhaust inmate grievance procedures.' Porter v. Nussle, 534 U.S. 516, 524, 122 S. Ct. 983, 152 L. Ed. 2d 12 (2002). The purpose of this exhaustion requirement is to 'promote administrative redress, filter out groundless claims, and foster better prepared litigation of claims aired in court,' id. at 528 (citation omitted)—not to exclude from federal court meritorious claims that cannot be resolved by the grievance process. Bistrian (v. Levi) (3rd Cir. 2018)) 912 F.3rd (79) at 92 (citation omitted); see also Bivens, 403 U.S. at 410 (Harlan, J., concurring) (the remedy is available for cases in which 'it is damages or nothing')."

However, a non-statutory Bivens cause of action, although possible under the right circumstances, remains a "disfavored remedy," per the U.S. Supreme Court:

caution.' Id., at ___, 140 S.Ct. 735, 206 L.Ed.2nd 29 (slip op., at 6).

'[I]f there are sound reasons to think Congress might doubt the efficacy or necessity of a damages remedy[,] the courts must refrain from creating [it].' Ziglar, 582 U.S., at 121, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 198 L.Ed.2nd 290 (slip op., at 13). '[E]ven a single sound reason to defer to Congress' is enough to require a court to refrain from creating such a remedy. Nestlé USA, Inc.* v. *Doe, 593 U. S. ___, ___, 141 S.Ct. 1931, 210 L.Ed.2nd 207 (2021) (plurality opinion) (slip op., at 6). Put another way, 'the most important question is who should decide whether to provide for a damages remedy, Congress or the courts?' Hernández, 589 U.S., at ___-___, 140 S.Ct. 735, 206 L.Ed.2nd 29 (slip op., at 19-20) (internal quotation marks omitted). If there is a rational reason to think that the answer is 'Congress'—as it will be in most every case, see Ziglar, 582 U. S., at 121-122, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 198 L.Ed.2nd 290 (slip op., at 12)—no Bivens action may lie. Our cases instruct that, absent utmost deference to Congress' preeminent authority in this area, the courts 'arrogat[e] legislative power.' Hernández, 589 U.S., at ___, 140 S.Ct. 735, 206 L.Ed.2nd 29 (slip op., at 5)." (Egbert v. Boule (June 8, 2022) __ U.S. __. __ [142 S.Ct. 1793; 213 L.Ed.2nd 54].)

In determining whether a Bivens cause of action is appropriate, the U.S. Supreme Court (at Egbert v. Boule (June 8, 2022) __ U.S. __. __ [142 S.Ct. 1793; 213 L.Ed.2nd 54].) has noted that a court is to consider two steps:

> "First, we ask whether the case presents 'a new Bivens context'—i.e., is it "meaningful[ly]" different from the three cases in which the Court has implied a damages action. Ziglar, 582 U. S., at ___, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 198 L.Ed. 2nd 290 (slip op., at 16). Second, if a claim arises in a new context, a Bivens remedy is unavailable if there are 'special factors' indicating that the Judiciary is at least arguably less equipped than Congress to 'weigh the costs and benefits of allowing a damages action to proceed.' Ziglar, 582 U. S., at 121-122, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 198 L.Ed.2nd 290 (slip op., at 12) (internal quotation marks omitted). If there is even a single 'reason to pause before applying Bivens in a new context,' a court may not recognize a Bivens remedy. Hernández, 589 U. S., at ___, 140 S.Ct. 735, 206 L.Ed.2nd 29 (slip op., at 7)." (Italics added)
> The Egbert Court also noted, however, that the above two "steps often resolve to a single question: whether there is > any reason to think that Congress might be better equipped to create a damages remedy." (Id., at p. __.)

>
> Finally, the Egbert Court also recognized that "a court may not fashion a Bivens remedy if Congress already has provided, or has authorized the Executive to provide, 'an alternative remedial structure.'" (Id., at p. __; quoting Ziglar v. Abbasi (June 19, 2017) 582 U.S. 120, 121 [137 S.Ct. 1843; 198 L.Ed.2nd 290].)
>
> Summarizing the above, the Supreme Court in Egbert noted that it is important to remember that "the relevant question is not whether a Bivens action would 'disrup[t]' a remedial scheme, Schweicker, 487 U.S., at 426, 108 S.Ct. 2460, 101 L.Ed.2nd 370, or whether the court 'should provide for a wrong that would otherwise go unredressed.' Bush, 462 U.S., at 388, 103 S.Ct. 2404, 76 L.Ed.2nd 648. Nor does it matter that 'existing remedies do not provide complete relief.' Ibid. Rather, the court must ask only whether it, rather than the political branches, is better equipped to decide whether existing remedies 'should be augmented by the creation of a new judicial remedy.' Ibid; see also id., at 380, 103 S.Ct. 2404, 76 L.Ed.2nd 648 ('the question [is] who should decide')." (Egbert v. Boule, supra, at p. __.)
> In sum, the Supreme Court in Egbert rejected a Bivens remedy for a Fourth Amendment, international border use of excessive force claim (pgs. _) as well as a First Amendment, retaliation claim (pgs. __).

In an interlocutory appeal, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal reversed the district court's denial of defendants' motion to dismiss an action alleging due process violations and seeking damages pursuant to Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics (1971) 403 U.S. 388 [91 S.Ct. 1999 [29 L.Ed.2nd 619]. In this case, David Harper, a former Bureau of Land Management ("BLM") Law Enforcement Ranger in Idaho, challenged adverse employment actions taken against him by the Department of the Interior and BLM officials. He sued defendants alleging a violation of his Fifth Amendment right to due process. The Court held that Harper had no claim for money damages under Bivens. Citing Egbert v. Boule (2022) __ U.S. __ [142 S.Ct. 1793; 213 L.Ed.2nd 54], noting that the Supreme Court means what it says: Bivens claims are limited to the three contexts the Court has previously recognized and are not to be extended unless the Judiciary is better suited than Congress to provide a remedy. Here, Harper's claims arose in a different context than what the Court has recognized. Congress has also already provided a remedy in this context under the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978. Because this case involves an alternative remedial structure, this case exists in a novel context outside the preexisting Bivens framework. Extending Bivens here would risk impermissible intrusion into the functioning of both the Legislative and Executive Branches. (Harper v. Nedd (9th Cir. 2023) 71 F.4th 1181.)

In Chambers v. Herrera (9th Cir. 2023) 78 F.4th 1100, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal affirmed in part, reversed in part, and vacated in part the district court's order dismissing for failure to state a claim a federal prisoner's First and Eighth Amendment claims brought under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics (1971) 403 U.S. 388 [91 S.Ct. 1999; 29 L.Ed.2nd 619], and remanded.

> In evaluating plaintiff's claims, the Court applied the two-part framework set forth in Ziglar v. Abbasi (2017) 582 U.S. 120 [137 S.Ct. 1843; 198 L.Ed.2nd 290, and Hernandez v. Mesa (2020) __ U.S.__ [140 S.Ct. 735; 206 L.Ed.2nd 29, asking first whether the claim arose in a new context, and second, if so, whether other special factors counseled hesitation against the extension of Bivens. Affirming the dismissal of the First Amendment retaliation claim, the panel agreed with plaintiff that the Supreme Court's decision in Egbert v. Boule (2022) __ U.S.__ [142 S.Ct. 1793; 213 L.Ed.2nd 54, explicitly disavowed any Bivens claims based on First Amendment retaliation. The Court held that plaintiff's Eighth Amendment failure to protect claim failed to state a claim under Egbert because: (1) the claim represented a new Bivens context, noting that no case has extended Bivens to claims that Bureau of Prisons employees violated the Eighth Amendment by failing to protect an inmate from other staff members. Also, (2) Congress was better suited than the Judiciary to construct a damages remedy. The panel held that plaintiff's Eighth Amendment excessive force claim similarly failed under Bivens, but dismissal of that claim should be with prejudice because even plausible allegations could not constitute a Bivens claim for excessive force under Egbert and amendment would be futile. Addressing plaintiff's Eighth Amendment claim for medical indifference, the panel determined that it was unclear whether the Bivens claim was viable because plaintiff failed to allege any facts about his injuries, examination, or treatment. The panel remanded the claim for the district court to consider whether plaintiff, proceeding pro se, should be allowed to amend his complaint and the potential merits of any amended claim.

In an action brought pursuant to Bivens, alleging that federal correctional officials failed to protect plaintiff from other detainees at a jail, the panel reversed the district court's denial of defendant officers' motion to dismiss and declined to extend a Bivens action to include a Fifth Amendment failure-to-protect claim. When a party seeks to bring a Bivens action, courts apply a two-step test; i.e., whether the case presents a new Bivens context, and, if so, whether there "special factors" that counsel against extending Bivens. Applying the first step, the panel held that this case presents a new Bivens context that the Supreme Court has not recognized in its Bivens jurisprudence. The panel declined to recognize an implied Bivens context arising from Farmer v. Brennan (1994) 511 U.S. 825, which involved an Eighth Amendment failure-to-protect claim by a female-presenting transsexual individual who was assaulted by other inmates. The panel noted that nearly thirty years have passed since the Supreme Court decided Farmer and if the Court were inclined to recognize it as one of the few acceptable Bivens contexts, it would have done so. The panel further determined that plaintiff's claim was meaningfully distinguishable from Farmer, which involved an Eighth Amendment rather than a Fifth Amendment claim, alleged a different category of harm, and arose in a different factual setting. Applying the second step, the panel held that special factors counsel against extending Bivens to this case. The legislature and executive were best positioned to address plaintiff's interest, and have, in fact, provided alternative remedies through administrative review procedures offered by the Board of Prisons. Accordingly, the panel declined to overstep its constitutional role to create a new damages action. Concurring in the judgment, Judge W. Fletcher noted that had a state prisoner made the same factual allegations as plaintiff did here, he would have a cause of action for damages. Denying a damages remedy to a federal prisoner while granting it to a state prisoner in the same circumstance constitutes a miscarriage of justice. (Marquez v. Rodriguez (9th Cir. 2023) 81 F.4th 1027.)

Additional Case Law:

Respondent former inmate sued petitioner halfway house operator for negligence. Treating the complaint as a Bivens action, the district court dismissed the cause of action. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed, finding that the former inmate could bring a Bivens action against the halfway house operator. The halfway house operator's petition for certiorari to the appellate court was granted. In this case, the halfway house operator, a private corporation under contract with the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP), operated a halfway house at which the former inmate resided. The former inmate alleged that an employee of the halfway house operator forbade him to use the elevator to reach his fifth-floor bedroom, even though he was supposed to be allowed to use the elevator due to a heart condition. The former inmate suffered a heart attack after climbing the stairs. In the former inmate's negligence action, which was treated as a Bivens action, the Supreme Court declined to extend the implied damages action recognized in Bivens to allow recovery against the halfway house operator. The former inmate did not lack effective remedies, and he had full access to remedial mechanisms established by the BOP. The former inmate's suit would not have advanced Bivens' core purpose of deterring individual officers from engaging in unconstitutional wrongdoing. The Supreme Court therefore reversed the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. (Correctional Services Corp.* v. *Malesko (2001) 534 U.S. 61 [122 S.Ct. 515; 151 L.Ed.2nd 456].)

The federal district court properly denied qualified immunity to a U.S. Border Patrol agent who, while standing on American soil, shot and killed a teenage Mexican citizen who was walking down a street on the Mexico side of the border. The use of force was held to be unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment given that the teenager was not suspected of any crime, was not fleeing or resisting arrest, and did not pose a threat to anyone. No reasonable officer could have thought that he could shoot the teenager if, as pleaded, the teenager was innocently walking down a street in Mexico. (Rodriguez v. Swartz (9th Cir. 2018) 899 F.3rd 719, 728-734.)

> Plaintiff was also held to be entitled to bring a "Bivens cause of action" for money damages, per Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics (1971) 403 U.S. 388 [91 S.Ct. 1999; 29 L.Ed.2nd 619]. (Id., at pp. 734-739.)

"The Fourth Amendment's particularity requirement is not a mere technicality; it is an express constitutional command. The particularity requirement 'confines an officer executing a search warrant strictly within the bounds set by the warrant.' Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Fed. Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388, 394 n.7, 91 S.Ct. 1999, 29 L.Ed.2nd 619 (1971). 'To the extent [government] agents want[] to seize relevant information beyond the scope of the warrant, they should [seek] a further warrant.' United States v. Sedaghaty, 728 F.3rd 885, 914 (9th Cir. 2013)." (⁋) "The particularity requirement serves foundational constitutional interests and must be zealously protected. 'The requirement that warrants shall particularly describe the things to be seized makes general searches under them impossible and prevents the seizure of one thing under a warrant describing another.' Marron v. United States, 275 U.S. 192, 196, 48 S. Ct. 74, 72 L.Ed. 231, Treas. Dec. 42528 (1927). In addition, the particularity requirement 'assures the individual whose property is searched or seized of the lawful authority of the executing officer, his need to search, and the limits of his power to search,' Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 561, 124 S. Ct. 1284, 157 L.Ed.2nd 1068 (2004) (citation omitted), and 'greatly reduces the perception of unlawful or intrusive police conduct,' Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 236, 103 S. Ct. 2317, 76 L.Ed.2nd 527 (1983). To serve these ends, the particularity requirement leaves nothing 'to the discretion of the officer executing the warrant.' Marron, 275 U.S. at 196. 'Absent some grave emergency, the Fourth Amendment has interposed a magistrate between the citizen and the police.' McDonald v. United States, 335 U.S. 451, 455, 69 S.Ct. 191, 93 L.Ed. 153 (1948)." (United States v. Ramirez (9th Cir. 2020) 976 F.3rd 946, 951-952.)

See also Perez v. United States (9th Cir. 2021) 8 F.4th 1095, where an officer fatally shot a Mexican national at the border. This allegation was determined to be "different in a meaningful way" from Bivens, which involved an officer arresting the plaintiff in, and searching, his home.

In a split 2-to-1 decision, the Ninth Circuit held that Bivens applied to a federal prisoner's claims that a federal prison guard intentionally targeted him for harm by spreading malicious rumors about and offering bribes to other inmates to attack him, the inmate was attacked because of the officer's conduct, and the officer failed to protect the inmate against the known risk of harm that the officer himself created. (Hoffman v. Preston (9th Cir. 2022) 26 F.4th 1059.)

Before the 2016 Democratic National Convention, the Secret Service announced that access to certain areas would be restricted. Graber, a paramedic, joined political protests outside the Restricted Area. When protestors breached the gated perimeter, the Philadelphia Police Department apprehended those within the Restricted Area. Graber was one of seven individuals taken into custody although the police did not prepare any arrest paperwork for Graber. Special Agent Boresky was charged with serving as an affiant for a criminal complaint against the arrestees. Another agent e-mailed Boresky a synopsis of the events and photographs. Boresky later appeared before a Magistrate and signed an affidavit for an arrest warrant identifying Graber as having been arrested inside the Restricted Area, based upon his "personal knowledge," "information developed during the course of this investigation," and information imparted by other officers. Boresky was not present at the arrest, did not view any video evidence, and did not write the affidavit. Graber was detained overnight. Graber's counsel provided news video clips confirming that Graber never passed through the fence, resulting in the charges against Graber being dismissed. Citing "Bivens," Graber sued Boresky for false arrest, unlawful detention, and false charges. Denying a motion to dismiss, the district court held that a Bivens claim could be brought against Boresky. The court later dismissed Boresky's qualified immunity summary judgment motion. The Third Circuit dismissed an appeal for lack of jurisdiction noting that the Bivens ruling is not a final decision and is not appealable under the collateral order doctrine. (Graber v. Boresky (3rd Cir. 2023) 59 F.4th 603.)

Federal Civil 42 U.S.C. § 1983 Civil Liability and Qualified Immunity:

In a civil 42 U.S.C. § 1983 lawsuit (which provides a cause of action for the deprivation of constitutional rights by persons acting under color of state law) for the use of excessive, deadly force, where the defendant/officer moved for summary judgment, the trial court must look at the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff/non-moving party with respect to the central facts of the case. In this case, where the defendant/officer shot the plaintiff in the chest, the Fifth Circuit failed to acknowledge and credit plaintiff's evidence with regard to the lighting, his mother's demeanor, whether he shouted words that were an overt threat, and his positioning during the shoot. The case was remanded for a consideration of these facts. (Tolan v. Cotton (2014) 572 U.S. 650 [134 S.Ct. 1861; 188 L.Ed.2nd 895].)

On appeal, an appellate court is required to recount the facts in the light most favorable to petitioner. (Torres v. Madrid (Mar. 25, 2021) __ U.S. __, __ [141 S.Ct. 989; 209 L.Ed.2nd 190].)

In contrast, a Bivens theory of liability has been held to be a "more limited" "federal analog" to § 1983. ("Hernandez v. Mesa (Feb. 25, 2020) __ U.S. __ [140 S.Ct. 735; 747; 206 L.Ed.2nd 29], citing Hartman* v. *Moore (2006) 547 U.S. 250, 254, fn. 2 [126 S.Ct. 1695; 164 L.Ed.2nd 441].)

See "Federal Officers; a Bivens Cause of Action," above.

"Public officials are immune from suit under 42 U. S. C. § 1983 unless they have 'violated a statutory or constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.' (Plumhoff v. Rickard (2014) 572 U.S. 756, 766-767 [134 S.Ct. 2012; 188 L.Ed.2nd 1056].) An officer 'cannot be said to have violated a clearly established right unless the right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in [his] shoes would have understood that he was violating it,' (Ibid.), meaning that 'existing precedent . . . placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' (Ashcroft v. al-Kidd (2011) 563 U.S. 731, 741 [131 S.Ct. 2074; 179 L.Ed.2nd 1149, 1159].). This exacting standard 'gives government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments' by 'protect[ing] all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.' (Id., at 743 [131 S.Ct. 2074; 179 L.Ed.2nd 1149, 1160].)" (City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan (2015) 575 U.S. 600, 610 [135 S.Ct. 1765, 1775-1776; 191 L.Ed.2nd 856].)

The U.S. Supreme Court severely criticized the Ninth Circuit Court of appeal for using the general rationale of prior decisions in holding that officers should have been aware of any particular rule. "We have repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality." (City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, supra at p. 614 [135 S.Ct. at pp.1775-1776; quoting and citing Ashcroft v. al-Kidd (2011) 563 U.S. 731, 742 [131 S.Ct. 2074; 179 L.Ed.2nd 1149, 1159]; and Lopez v. Smith (2014) 574 U.S. 1, 6 [135 S.Ct. 1; 190 L.Ed.2nd 1, 5]; see also Kisela v. Hughes (2018) 584 U.S. 100, 104 [200 L.Ed.2nd 449; 138 S.Ct. 1148]; noting that the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal is a frequent offender of this rule. See also Felarca v. Birgeneau (2018) 891 F.3rd 809, 816.)

> It was also noted in Sheehan that the fact that officers may violate or ignore their training and written policies in forcing entry and using force does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted. (City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, supra, at p. 617 [135 S.Ct. at p. 1777].)

Note also the dissenting opinion to the Ninth Circuit's denial of a motion for rehearing and for a decision en banc, reported at Slater v. Deasey (9th Cir. 2019) 943 F.3rd 898, where a four-justice dissent written by Justice Collins, joined by Justices Bea, Ikuta, and Bress, noted that in holding that the police officers in this case violated clearly established law when they restrained Plaintiff Joseph Slater in the back of a patrol car, allegedly causing his death, the panel continued the Ninth Circuit's troubling pattern of ignoring the Supreme Court's controlling precedent concerning qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases. It was noted that Plaintiffs had the burden to find a controlling precedent that squarely governed the specific facts of this case. They failed to carry that burden, per the dissent, and the district court's grant of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds should have been affirmed. The dissenting justices criticized the majority's finding of "sufficiently analogous" authority a single Ninth Circuit decision—Drummond v. City of Anaheim (9th Cir. 2003) 343 F.3rd 1052. In applying this lesser "sufficiently analogous" standard, the panel committed the very same error for which the Court was summarily reversed in Kisela v. Hughes (2018) 584 U.S. 100 [200 L.Ed.2nd 449; 138 S.Ct. 1148], where Ninth Circuit had denied qualified immunity "because of Circuit precedent that the court perceived to be analogous." Secondly, the panel violated governing Supreme Court authority when it extracted from Drummond a "clearly established" rule that is framed at a much higher level of generality than was the Drummond case itself.

> Justice Bea added: "In holding that the police officers in this case violated clearly established law when they restrained Joseph Slater in the back of a patrol car, allegedly causing his death, the panel continues this court's troubling pattern of ignoring the Supreme Court's controlling precedent > concerning qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases. Indeed, over just the last ten years alone, the Court has reversed our denials of qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases at least a half-dozen times, often summarily. By repeating—if not outdoing—the same patent errors that have drawn such repeated rebukes from the high Court, the panel here once again invites summary reversal. I respectfully dissent from our failure to rehear this case en banc." (Id., at pp. 898-899.)

> In this case, officers used handcuffs and three "hobble" belts to restrain the physically resisting decedent, who was under the influence of a methamphetamine overdose (suffering from "acute methamphetamine intoxication") and totally irrational, in order to get him into the back seat of a patrol vehicle. Per the Plaintiffs' expert, Slater died from "respiratory compromise, vomiting with aspiration of vomit into his airway, and loss of consciousness," happening "within seconds of the final hobbles being attached and pulled tight. The prone and hobbled position Mr. Slater was in compromised his ability to breathe, compressed his abdomen and chest, and led to his vomiting and aspirating the vomit into his lungs. This prevented sufficient breathing, leading to loss of consciousness and resulting in death." (Id., at pp. 899-900.)

After shooting and killing the decedent (plaintiff's son) when he was confronted by a state trooper and refused to comply with the trooper's commands to put down his weapon, the trooper was held to be entitled to qualified immunity where he knew that (1) the decedent had violated a restraining order within the last hour; (2) was in possession of a firearm that he had brandished at the victim during that contact; and (3) was reportedly mentally ill and may not have been taking his medication. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals held that the trooper did not violate a clearly established right because at the time of the incident no Supreme Court precedent, Third Circuit precedent, or other persuasive case law had held that an officer acting under similar circumstances as the trooper violated the Fourth Amendment. As a result, the court held that the trooper was entitled to qualified immunity. (James v. N.J. State Police (3rd Cir. 2020) 957 F.3rd 165.)

Plaintiffs failed to establish that an officer violated "clearly established" law when he shot and killed plaintiffs' adult son where the civil defendant officer had twice broken up fighting in which the decedent was involved, and the officer was soon after told that someone in the adjacent parking lot had a gun. When the officer went to investigate, he saw the decedent, with a gun in his hand, walking towards other people in the parking lot. When the officer ordered the decedent to drop the gun, the decedent ignored him, ducked between parked vehicles, and tried to give the gun to someone else. The court found that, even under the plaintiffs' version of events, it was undisputed that the decedent refused to drop the gun when ordered to do so by the officer and that the decedent could have quickly pointed it at him. The court stated, "[w]e have never required officers to wait until a defendant turns towards them, with weapon in hand, before applying deadly force to ensure their safety." Consequently, the court held that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity because he did not violate clearly established law. (Garcia v. Blevins (5th Cir. 2020) 957 F.3rd 596.)

Consensual Encounters:

General Rule: Contrary to a not uncommonly held belief that law enforcement contacts with private citizens require some articulable reason to be lawful, it is a general rule that any peace officer may approach and contact any person in public, or anywhere else the officer has a legal right to be, and engage that person in conversation without necessarily having to justify such a contact. (Wilson v. Superior Court (1983) 34 Cal.3rd 777; People v. Brown (2015) 61 Cal.4th 968, 974; People v. Parrott (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 485, 492; In re Edgerrin J. (2020) 57 Cal.App.5th 752, 759; People v. Cuadra (2021) 71 Cal.App.5th 348, 352; People v. Tacardon (2022) 14 Cal.5th 235, 241.)

> "The Supreme Court has held that 'a seizure does not occur simply because a police officer approaches an individual and asks a few questions.'" (United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2021) 996 F.3rd 998, 1005, quoting Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, 434 [111 S.Ct. 2382; 115 L.Ed.2nd 389]; see also People v. Tacardon, supra, at p. 241.)
> > As a common example, in United States v. Brown, the Ninth Circuit found the officer's initial contact with the defendant to be a consensual encounter only, based upon the following circumstances:
> >
> > - The encounter occurred in the middle of the day, in public view.
> > - Defendant was seated on a block wall when the police arrived and from which he showed no inclination to depart.
> > - The officers' initial approach was casual and nonthreatening, opening with the greeting, "Howdy, guys" and an open-ended question about what they were doing.
> > - The officers told defendant and his acquaintance why they were there (a report of urinating in public), accusing the acquaintance of doing that.
> > - Most of the questioning was directed at the acquaintance.
> > - Questions directed at defendant were "generic," asking for identification and whether he was staying at a nearby motel.
> > - It was never suggested that defendant was not free to leave or to decline to answer questions.
> > - Defendant felt free to take a personal cellphone call.
> > - The officers never drew attention to their weapons.
> > In United States v. Brown, defendant was not held to be detained until the officer directed him to stand up and turn around, after seeing defendant reach for his pocket.

In United States v. Brown, supra, where an officer's use of his vehicle's emergency lights was held to constitute a detention, the California Supreme Court noted the use of the red and blue emergency lights is but one factor to consider. In so holding, the California Supreme Court noted that "a motorist whose car had broken down on the highway might reasonably perceive an officer's use of emergency lights as signaling that the officer has stopped to render aid or to warn oncoming traffic of a hazard, rather than to investigate crime. Ambiguous circumstances may be clarified by whether other cars are nearby or by the officer's conduct when approaching." (Id., at p. 980.)

In Tacardon, supra, an officer stopped behind an already stopped (parked) vehicle, shined his patrol car's spotlight into the back window of defendant's car (it being at night and dark out), and then walked up to the vehicle and its occupants. Despite telling a passenger to stand near the sidewalk at the rear of the vehicle where he could watch her, the Court held that, when considering the "totality of the circumstances," defendant was not detained until after the point where the officer observed marijuana in plain sight in the vehicle. (Id., at pp. 242-253.)

Other Examples and General Rules:

"A police officer is allowed to question people on the street, who themselves are free both to refuse to answer the officer and to refuse even to listen to the officer. People are fully at liberty merely to go on their way." (People v. Flores (2021) 60 Cal.App.5th 978, 981, citing Florida v. Royer (1983) 460 U.S. 491, 497–498 [75 L. Ed.2nd 229, 103 S.Ct. 1319].)

"A consensual encounter between a police officer and a citizen does not implicate the Fourth Amendment." (People v. Chamagua (2019) 33 Cal.App.5th 925, 928; citing Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429 [115 L.Ed.2nd 389, 434; 111 S.Ct. 2382].)

"[N]ot all personal intercourse between policemen and citizens involves 'seizures' of persons. Only when the officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, has in some way restrained the liberty of a citizen may we conclude that a 'seizure' has occurred." (Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1, 19, fn. 16 [20 L.Ed.2nd 889; 88 S.Ct. 1868]; see also People v. Tacardon (2022) 14 Cal.5th 235, 240, 241.)

The law does not prohibit an officer from approaching any person in a public place and engaging that person in uncoerced conversation. (People v. Divito (1984) 152 Cal.App.3rd 11, 14; Florida v. Royer (1983) 460 U.S. 491 [103 S.Ct. 1319; 75 L.Ed.2nd 229]; People v. Mendoza (2011) 52 Cal.4th 1056, 1081.)

"(L)aw enforcement officers do not violate the Fourth Amendment by merely approaching an individual on the street or in another public place, by asking him if he is willing to answer some questions, (or) by putting questions to him if the person is willing to listen." (Florida v. Royer, supra, at p. 497 [103 S.Ct. 1319; 75 L.Ed.2nd 229]; People v. Parrott, supra, at pp. 492-493.)

It does not become a detention (see below) merely because an officer approaches an individual on the street and asks a few questions. (In re Manuel G. (1997) 16 Cal.4th 805, 821.)

But: The person contacted is free to leave and need not respond to an officer's inquiries. (See below)

"'It is well established that law enforcement officers may approach someone on the street or in another public place and converse if the person is willing to do so' without having any 'articulable suspicion of criminal activity.'" (People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, 20; quoting People v. Parrott (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 485, 492.)

"The Supreme Court has held 'that the Fourth Amendment permits police officers to approach individuals at random in airport lobbies and other public places to ask them questions . . . so long as a reasonable person would understand that he or she could refuse to cooperate.' (Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, 431 [115 L. Ed. 2d 389, 111 S. Ct. 2382].) 'The citizen participant in a consensual encounter may leave, refuse to answer questions or decline to act in the manner requested by the authorities.' (People v. Franklin (1987) 192 Cal.App.3d 935, 941 . . . ." (People v. Paul (2024) 99 Cal.App.5th 832, 838.)

Test: Would a "reasonable person" under the same or similar circumstances feel that he or she is free to leave? (Wilson v. Superior Court, supra, at p. 790, quoting from United States v. It is not what the defendant himself believes or should believe. (In re Manuel G., supra, at p. 821.)

"(T)he officer's uncommunicated state of mind and the individual citizen's subjective belief are irrelevant in assessing whether a seizure triggering Fourth Amendment scrutiny has occurred. "The test is necessarily imprecise because it is designed to assess the coercive effect of police conduct, taken as a whole, rather than focus on particular details of that conduct in isolation." (People v. Verin (1990) 220 Cal.App.3rd 551 556.)

The "reasonable person" test presupposes an "innocent person." (Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, 438 [111 S.Ct. 2382; 115 L.Ed.2nd 389, 400]; United States v. The circumstances which a court will take into account in determining whether a person is detained include (but are not limited to):

1. The threatening presence of several officers;
2. The display of a weapon by an officer;
3. Some physical touching of the person of the citizen;
4. The use of language or tone of voice indicating that compliance with the officer's request might be compelled;
5. The time and place of the encounter;
6. Whether the police indicated the defendant was suspected of a crime;

7. Whether the police retained the defendant's documents; and
8. Whether the police exhibited other threatening behavior.

(People v. Linn (2015) 241 Cal.App.4th 46, 58; see also In re Manuel G. (1997) 16 Cal.4th 805, 821; People v. Parrott (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 485, 493.)

"In situations involving a show of authority (italics added), a person is seized 'if "in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave,"' or '"otherwise terminate the encounter."'" (People v. Cuadra (2021) 71 Cal.App.5th 348, 352; quoting People v. Brown (2015) 61 Cal.4th 968, at p. 974.)

Unless lawfully detained, a person is free to refuse to identify himself and may lawfully walk away. (People v. Thomas (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1107, 1117.)

> "Refusal to cooperate with police, without more, does not create an objective justification for an investigative detention." (People v. Flores (2021) 60 Cal.App.5th 978, 981, citing Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, 437 [115 L.Ed.2nd 389; 111 S.Ct. 2382].)
> Absent a sufficient reasonable suspicion justifying a lawful detention, a person under such circumstances "may not be detained even momentarily without reasonable, objective grounds for doing so; and his refusal to listen or answer does not, without more, furnish those grounds." (Ibid., quoting Florida v. Royer (1983) 460 U.S. 491, 498 [75 L.Ed.2nd 229, 236; 103 S.Ct. 1319]; see also Illinois v. Wardlow (2000) 528 U.S. 119, 125 [145 L.Ed.2nd 570, 577; 120 S.Ct. 673].)

Note: Courts tend to ignore the inherent coerciveness of a police uniform and/or badge and gun, and the fact that most people are reluctant to ignore a police officer's questions.

> However, see People v. Linn (2015) 241 Cal.App.4th 46, 68, fn. 10, where the Court notes that: "These and similar cases are particularly noteworthy in light of recent empirical research suggesting that a significant number of people do not feel free to leave when approached by police, and even less so when police assert even mild forms of authority." (See Casual or Coercive? Retention of Identification in Police-Citizen Encounters (2013) 113 Colum. L.Rev. 1283, 1313, noting studies such as one in which half the respondents indicated that they would feel either not free to leave or less than somewhat free to leave in a mere conversation with police on a sidewalk and concluding, "[t]hus, it appears that any interaction with a police officer, even at the lowest level of intrusiveness, makes most citizens feel that they are not free to leave;" Smith et al., Testing Judicial Assumptions of the "Consensual" Encounter: An Experimental Study

(2013) 14 Fla. Coastal L.Rev. 285, 319–320, noting that while nearly three-quarters of the sample used in the study perceived the encounters with sworn, armed security as consensual, 45 percent also believed they had no right to walk away or ignore the security officers' requests. Limitations: A contact that is intended to be a consensual encounter may degrade into a detention or even an arrest if not handled properly. (People v. Cuadra (2021) 71 Cal.App.5th 348, 352; "A consensual encounter may ripen into a seizure for Fourth Amendment purposes 'when the officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, has in some way restrained the liberty of a citizen.'" Quoting People v. Brown (2015) 61 Cal.4th 968, at p. 974.)

Searches, Frisks and Detentions Not Allowed: Obviously, there being no "probable cause" or "reasonable suspicion" to believe any criminal activity is occurring during a consensual encounter, no search, frisk, or involuntary detention is allowed absent additional information amounting to at least a "reasonable suspicion" to believe that the person contacted is, was, or is about to be involved in criminal activity. (Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1, 27 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889, 909]; and see below)

Unintended Detentions*: "If the consensual encounter has ripened into an investigatory detention under Terry, then the officer must have 'reasonable suspicion'—that is, 'a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person stopped' of breaking the law.'" (United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2021) 996 F.3rd 998, 1005, quoting Heien v. North Carolina (2014) 574 U.S. 54, 60 [135 S.Ct. 530; 190 L.Ed.2nd 475].)

"In distinguishing a detention from a consensual encounter, 'a court must consider all the circumstances surrounding the encounter to determine whether the police conduct would have communicated to a reasonable person that the person was not free to decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter.'" (In re T.F.-G. (2023) 94 Cal.App.5th 893, 903; quoting Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, 439 [115 L. Ed.2nd 389; 111 S.Ct. 2382].)

Elevating a "consensual encounter" into a "detention" without legal cause may result in one or more of the following legal consequences:

Suppression of any resulting evidence under the "Exclusionary Rule." (See "The Exclusionary Rule," under "The Constitutional Basis For Searches and Seizures," Chapter 1, above.)

Criminal prosecution of the offending law enforcement officer(s) for false imprisonment, pursuant to P.C. §§ 236 and 237.

Civil liability and/or criminal prosecution for violation of the subject's civil rights. (E.g.; P.C. § 422.6, Cal. Civil Code § 52.1, 42 U.S.C. § 1983, 18 U.S.C. §§ 241, 242.)

See "Consensual Encounters vs. Detentions or Arrests," below.

"'(W)hen the officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, has in some way restrained the liberty of a citizen,' the officer effects a seizure of that person, which must be justified under the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution." (People v. Tacardon (2022) 14 Cal.5th 235, ruling that an officer merely putting on his vehicle's spotlight on the rear of defendant's vehicle, without more, was not such a "show of authority" so as to convert a consensual encounter into a detention, the Court noting that: "A detention occurs, not the moment a person knows an officer would like to interact, but when a person would reasonably believe he or she 'was not free to leave' or 'otherwise terminate the encounter,' and submits to the officer's show of authority." (Id., at p. 250; quoting People v. Brown (2015) 61 Cal.4th 968, 974.)

Defendant was convicted of possession of a firearm with a prior violent conviction pleading no contest following the denial of his motion to suppress evidence of a firearm. He contended that the evidence of the firearm should have been excluded because law enforcement officers discovered it only after they unlawfully detained him to verify his parole status. Reversing the trial court, the Court of Appeal found that the initial encounter between defendant and the officers was indeed an unlawful detention. The court pointed to several factors leading to this conclusion such as the positioning of the officers that blocked defendant from leaving, the officers approaching defendant from both sides of his car and shining their flashlights into his car, and the fact that the officers approached him while he was on his phone in a legally parked vehicle. The court held that these factors would lead a reasonable person to believe they are not free to leave, thus constituting a detention. Therefore, the court reversed the trial court's judgment and vacated its order denying defendant's motion to suppress evidence. The court concluded that the officers would not have obtained defendant's parole status if they had not first unlawfully detained him and thus, the firearm was not lawfully obtained and should be suppressed. (People v. Paul (2024) 99 Cal.App.5th 832, 837-841.)

> "The test is 'not whether the citizen perceived that he was being ordered to restrict his movement, but whether the officer's words and actions would have conveyed that to a reasonable person.'" (Id., at pp. 838-839; quoting People v. Garry (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th 1100 at p. 1106.)

No Detention: Consensual encounters may involve investigative functions without necessarily converting the contact into a detention or arrest. Examples:

Obtaining Personal Identification Information from a person and running a warrant check, so long as nothing is done which would have caused a reasonable person to feel that he was not free to leave, does not, by itself, convert the contact into a detention. (People v. Bouser (1994) 26 Cal.App.4th 1280; People v. Gonzalez (1985) 164 Cal.App.3rd 1194, 1196-1197; Florida v. Rodriguez (1984) 469 U.S. 1, 5-6 [105 S.Ct. 308; 83 L.Ed.2nd 165, 170-171]; United States v. Mendenhall (1980) 446 U.S. 544 [100 S.Ct. 1870; 64 L.Ed.2nd 497].)

However, a person who has been "consensually encountered" only, need not identify himself, nor even talk to a police officer if he so chooses. (Kolender v. Lawson (1983) 461 U.S. 352 [103 S.Ct. 1855; 75 L.Ed.2nd 903]; Brown v. Texas (1979) 443 U.S. 47, 52 [99 S.Ct. 2637; 61 L.Ed.2nd 357].)

In consensually talking to a non-detained person, an officer's reasonable suspicion may be aroused through inconsistent responses, allowing for additional questioning, a patdown, and an eventual arrest. (E.g., see United States v. Clark (1st Cir. ME 2018) 879 F.3rd 1.)

Asking for Identification, by itself, is not usually a detention. (People v. Gonzales (1985) 164 Cal.App.3rd 1194; People v. Ross (1990) 217 Cal.App.3rd 879; People v. Lopez (1989) 212 Cal.App.3rd 289; People v. Terrell (1999) 69 Cal.App.4th 1246, 1251; People v. Bouser (1994) 26 Cal.App.4th 1280, 1287; People v. Parrott (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 485, 494.)

"In the ordinary course a police officer is free to ask a person for identification without implicating the Fourth Amendment." (Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada (2004) 542 U.S. 177, 185 [124 S.Ct. 2451; 159 L.Ed.2nd 292].)

But; retaining the identification longer than necessary is a detention, and illegal unless supported by a reasonable suspicion the detainee is engaged in criminal conduct. (United States v. Chan-Jimenez (9th Cir. 1997) 125 F.3rd 1324: The consent to search obtained during this illegal detention, therefore, was also illegal.)

Asking for defendant's identification and holding onto it while running a check for warrants would cause a reasonable person to believe he was not free to leave. The detention, however, was held to be reasonable under the circumstances. (People v. Castaneda (1995) 35 Cal.App.4th 1222, 1227.)

Merely requesting identification from a suspect, or even retaining it, absent more coercive circumstances, does not by itself convert a consensual encounter into a detention. (People v. Leath (2013) 217 Cal.App.4th 344, 350-353.)

> However, where a robbery had just occurred in the vicinity with the suspect and vehicle description, although not perfect, very close, and with defendant having just parked his car "weirdly," not quite at the curb, with a door left open, and defendant apparently attempting to separate himself from his car, the officers had a reasonable suspicion to detain defendant anyway. (Id., a pp. 353-356.)

However, in suppressing evidence related to defendant's DUI arrest, it was held that although the taking of a person's identification does not necessarily result in a detention, under the "totality of the circumstances" (which included the officer stopping his marked police motorcycle within three feet of defendant's already stopped vehicle as she exited her vehicle, talk with her about her passenger flicking ashes out of the vehicle's window as defendant drove, asking her for her driver's license without explanation as he commanded her to put out her cigarette and put down her soda can, retaining her driver's license as he conducted an unexplained record check, and questioning of the passenger for personal details that the officer recorded on a form), defendant had been detained, and such detention was unsupported by reasonable suspicion in that the officer did not notice the odor of alcohol on her until after all the above had occurred. "No objectively reasonable person would believe she was free to end this encounter under the totality of these circumstances, regardless of the officer's polite demeanor and relatively low-key approach." (People v. Linn (2015) 241 Cal.App.4th 46, 50.)

> Tip: Ask for identification, transfer the necessary information to a notebook without leaving the person's immediate presence, and promptly return the identification to the person. (See People v. Linn, supra., at p. 67: "The taking of defendant's driver's license would be less significant if (the officer) . . . had merely taken defendant's driver's license, examined it, and promptly returned it to her.")

> Note that in United States v. Ahmad (7th Cir. 2021) 21 F.4th 475, defendant argued that his consent to search his RV was obtained while his driver's license and rental agreement were in a deputy sheriff's possession. The Court noted, however, in upholding defendant's conviction, that while the retention of a person's identification documents could turn a consensual encounter into a seizure, it was critical to analyze how long, and under what circumstances, the person's documents were retained. Here, the deputy held onto defendant's driver's license and RV rental agreement for only a few minutes before defendant consented to the search.

"(M)ere Police Questioning does not constitute a seizure." (Desyllas v. Bernstine (9th Cir. 2003) 351 F.3rd 934, 940; quoting Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, 434 [111 S.Ct. 2382; 115 L.Ed.2nd 389, 398]; Martinez-Medina v. Holder (9th Cir 2010) 616 F.3rd 1011, 1015.)

> Contacting and questioning a person without acting forcefully or aggressively will, in the absence of any other factors which would have indicated to a reasonable person that he was not free to leave, be a consensual encounter only. (United States v. Summers (9th Cir. 2001) 268 F.3rd 683, 686.)

(Citation omitted) People targeted for police questioning rightly might believe themselves the object of official scrutiny. Such directed scrutiny, however, is not a detention. >
> Defendant was observed by officers walking alone in a housing complex on the city's south side. Defendant appeared surprised to see the officer, turned sharply, and walked in the opposite direction into a housing complex. One of the officers "jogged" after defendant, finding him at the front of a residences, ringing the doorbell. The officer approached defendant and promptly asked him if he had drugs or a gun on him, to which he admitted that he had a gun in his pocket. Arrested for being a felon in possession of a firearm, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeal held the encounter to be consensual in that the officer was alone when he jogged after the defendant, he did not draw his firearm nor touch the defendant, and did not order defendant to put his hands up. A reasonable person in defendant's position would have felt free to disregard the officer and leave. (United States v. Holly (7th Cir. 2019) 940 F.3rd 995.)
>
> In contacting defendants in their vehicle in a school parking lot for the purpose of telling them to leave (there having been recent incidents of theft in that parking lot), the officer did no more than consensually encounter them. In making this determination, the Court noted that first, the officer was alone, she did not display a weapon, she did not touch the defendants, and she did not use forceful language. Second, she parked her vehicle 10 to 15 feet away, beside the defendants' car rather than in front of or behind it so the driver would have been able to drive away. Third, she did not ask the occupants to get out of the car until she knew they had provided false names. Finally, the officer's request for identification, and her questions to the defendants, did not convey a message that their compliance was required. (United States v. Campbell-Martin (8th Cir. IA 2021) 17 F.4th 807.)

Upon contacting defendants at a roadside gas station/truck stop by a deputy sheriff, they were both told individually that they were not being detained and were free to leave whenever they wished. Upon being asked for identification and a rental agreement for the defendant's RV, the deputy retained the documents while talking to both defendants further. During this time, the defendant gave his consent to have a drug-sniffing dog sniff his RV, resulting in the dog alerting on what was soon determined to be a large amount of marijuana. Both defendants were arrested and charged in federal court. Upon appeal from defendant's conviction, he argued that he was unlawfully seized under the Fourth Amendment when the deputy retained his driver's license and the rental agreement, and that his consent to the dog-sniff was obtained during that time he was unlawfully detained. As a result, defendant argued that this consent to the dog-sniff was involuntary. The Court disagreed based upon the following: (1) The deputy's initial questioning up until defendant's arrest occurred in a public place, a truck stop parking lot. (2) The deputy spoke in normal, conversational tones, never raised his voice, and made no verbal commands. (3) The deputy did not physically touch defendant or restrain his movement. (4) The deputy did not draw his weapon and he was the only officer on the scene until the K-9 officer, by which time defendant had already consented to the search. (5) The deputy told defendant that he was free to leave and never indicated otherwise until after the dog alerted on his RV. (6) The deputy's retention of defendant's license and rental agreement did not automatically transform the otherwise consensual encounter into a Fourth Amendment seizure. (United States v. Ahmad (7th Cir. 2021) 21 F.4th 475.)

> Note also that while the court recognized that the retention of a person's identification documents could turn a consensual encounter into a seizure, it was critical to analyze how long, and under what circumstances, the person's documents were retained. Here, the deputy held onto defendant's driver's license and RV rental agreement for only a few minutes before defendant consented to the search.

Walking Along With (People v. Capps (1989) 215 Cal.App.3rd 1112.), or Driving Next To (Michigan v. Chesternut (1988) 486 U.S. 567 [108 S.Ct. 1975; 100 L.Ed.2nd 565].), a Subject While Asking Questions, but without interfering with the person's progress, is not a detention.

See United States v. Gross (D.C. Cir. 2015) 784 F.3rd 784, where it was held that driving alongside the defendant who was walking down the sidewalk, flashlighting him, and, and while the officer was still inside his car, asking him, "Hey, . . . how are you doing? Do you have a gun?", and then, "Can I see your waistband?", and then, when defendant lifted only one side of his jacket, "Can I check you out for a gun?", causing defendant to flee, all held not to be a detention, and lawful.

But, in a "close case," the act of asking a subject to stop walking, after the officers had been driving parallel to him while talking to him and asking him questions, was held to be a detention without the necessary reasonable suspicion. The later discovered firearm was suppressed. (United States v. Hernandez (10th Cir. Colo. 2017) 847 F.3rd 1257; a questionable decision, depending upon how the defendant was "asked.")

Parking Nearby and Approaching the Occupant of a Vehicle, without spotlighting the subject or using a police vehicle's light bar or siren, and while leaving him enough room to drive away if he so chose, and where the officers did not display their weapons, issue any commands, or otherwise communicate to the defendant that he was not free to leave, is not a detention, thus not requiring any suspicion in order to be lawful. (United States v. Knights (11th Cir. 2020) 967 F.3rd 1266.)

But see Brendlin v. California (2007) 551 U.S. 249 [127 S.Ct. 2400; 168 L.Ed.2nd 132], below.

Asking a person to remove his hands from his pockets (when done for officers' safety), or asking him to keep his hands away from his pocket, without exhibiting a "show of authority such that (a person) reasonably might believe he had to comply," is not, necessarily, a detention. (People v. Franklin (1987) 192 Cal.App.3rd 935, 941; In re Frank V. (1991) 233 Cal.App.3rd 1232; People v. Parrott (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 485, 494.)

During a lawful search, although commanding a person to show his hands is a "meaningful interference" with a person's freedom, and thus technically a "seizure" for purposes of the Fourth Amendment, it is such a "de minimis" seizure that, when balanced with the need for a police officer to protect himself, it is allowed under the Constitution. (United States v. Enslin (9th Cir. 2003) 315 F.3rd 1205, 1219-1227.)

"Flashlighting" or "Spotlighting" a Person, by itself, is not a detention. (People v. Franklin (1987) 192 Cal.App.3rd 935; People v. Rico (1979) 97 Cal.App.3rd 124, 130.)

An officer walking up to defendant as defendant crouched behind a car with the officer's flashlight trained on him was held not to constitute a detention. Defendant was not detained until the officer told defendant to stand and put his hands behind his head, preparatory to putting handcuffs on him as a safety measure. (People v. Flores (2021) 60 Cal.App.5th 978, 988-990.)

> See dissenting opinion (at pp. 990-994), however, noting many facts and some on-point case law that were left out of the majority opinion. Among the facts ignored by the majority was that as defendant was in the process of moving around to the back side of his car, the officers drove up and parked their patrol car "a little askew to and behind" defendant's vehicle. The officers then shined their vehicle's spotlight on defendant as he bent over behind his car. The dissent also cites two cases totally ignored by the majority: People v. Garry (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th 1100, and People v. Roth (1990) 219 Cal.App.3rd 211. Both cases are spotlight cases which are nearly identical to Flores' situation, where spotlighting the suspect while (in Garry) the officer "briskly" approached the suspect, and (in Roth) "commanding" the suspect to approach the officer, respectively, were held to constitute detentions. Also not mentioned by the majority was the fact that while the one officer approached defendant (commanding him to stand up) from the rear of defendant's vehicle, the ofther officer was walking around the front of defendant's car, boxing him in between the two officers, his vehicle, and an iron spiked fence running parallel to the sidewalk, creating a situation where it is certainly arguable that defendant would have reasonably believed that with all that attention directed at him (spotlights, flashlights, being approached from both sides, with at least one officer issuing commands to stand up), and nowhere to go, he was in fact detained before ever being told to put his hands behind his head; i.e., that he could not have reasonably felt free to just walk away.

Where an officer investigating a recent shooting saw a car driving on the freeway that matched the description of a suspect vehicle, the officer pulled alongside the car and shined a spotlight on it. He then dropped back and followed the car for approximately five minutes without activating his emergency lights. The driver eventually pulled over on his own, and the officer stopped several car lengths behind, again turned on his spotlight, and engaged the car's occupants. He ultimately recovered a rifle, the butt of which he saw sticking out from under the driver's seat. The Appellate Court concluded that the officer's initial "momentary use of the spotlight" to observe the suspect vehicle's occupants as he was driving next to them was not a detention "in the absence of flashing lights, sirens or a directive over the loudspeaker." Indeed, the officer "immediately pulled back without any show of authority." (People v. Rico, supra, at pp. 129-130.)

Where an officer saw the defendant walking in a high crime area wearing a full-length camouflage jacket on a warm summer evening, and finding this odd, the officer shined a spotlight on the defendant and parked the patrol car directly behind him. The defendant approached the officer and asked, "What's going on?" Defendant appeared to the officer to be sweaty and "'jittery.'" When the officer asked the defendant to remove his hands from his pockets, he saw what appeared to be blood on the defendant's hands and a vial in his pocket containing white powder. The defendant fled and was detained. The Court of Appeal concluded that shining a spotlight on the defendant and parking behind him was not a detention in that "the officer did not block [the defendant's] way; he directed no verbal requests or commands to [the defendant]. Further, the officer did not alight immediately from his car and pursue [the defendant]. Coupling the spotlight with the officer's parking the patrol car, [the defendant] rightly might feel himself the object of official scrutiny. However, such directed scrutiny does not amount to a detention." (Italics added; People v. Franklin (1987) 192 Cal.App.3rd 935, 938-941.)

See United States v. Gross (D.C. Cir. 2015) 784 F.3rd 784, where it was held that driving alongside the defendant who was walking down the sidewalk, flashlighting him, and, and while the officer was still inside his car, asking him, "Hey, . . . how are you doing? Do you have a gun?", and then, "Can I see your waistband?", and then, when defendant lifted only one side of his jacket, "Can I check you out for a gun?", causing defendant to flee, all held not to be a detention, and lawful.

A deputy sheriff parked 15 to 20 feet behind a lawfully parked car, shined a spotlight into the interior, and approached. When a female suddenly got out, he ordered her to remain at the curb. At about that point the deputy smelled marijuana and observed large marijuana bags on the floorboard. Defendant, in the driver's seat, proved to be on probation. A subsequent search produced additional contraband evidencing drug sales. The Third District Court of Appeal reversed a superior court ruling that defendant had been unlawfully detained. Disagreeing with People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12 (see below), the court held that while the use of a spotlight might cause someone to feel "scrutiny, such directed scrutiny does not amount to a detention." Although the female who had gotten out of the car was detained, "there is no evidence defendant observed the deputy's interaction with [her] . . . ." By the time the deputy addressed defendant, having smelled marijuana and having seen the large bags of marijuana, defendant was appropriately and lawfully detained. Significantly, the deputy never blocked defendant's egress, he never used emergency lights, and his approach to the car was casual. (People v. Tacardon (2022) 14 Cal.5th 235, 253-256.)

And see People v. Perez (1989) 211 Cal.App.3rd 1492, where a police officer parked his patrol car in front of Perez's vehicle, leaving "plenty of room" for Perez to drive away, and activated both spotlights on the patrol car "to get a better look at the occupants and gauge their reactions." (Id. at p. 1494.) The officer then walked over to the car, tapped on the window, and asked the driver to roll down the window. (Ibid.) The appellate court concluded: "[T]he conduct of the officer here did not manifest police authority to the degree leading a reasonable person to conclude he was not free to leave. While the use of high beams and spotlights might cause a reasonable person to feel himself [or herself] the object of official scrutiny, such directed scrutiny does not amount to a detention. [Citations.]" (Italics added; Id. at p. 1496.)

Inquiring Into Possible Illegal Activity: A consensual encounter does not become a detention just because a police officer enquires into possible illegal activity during an otherwise unintimidating conversation. (United States v. Ayon-Meza (9th Cir. 1999) 177 F.3rd 1130.)

Displaying a Badge, or even Being Armed, absent active brandishing of the weapon, will not, by itself, convert a consensual encounter into a detention. (United States v. Drayton (2002) 536 U.S. 194 [122 S.Ct. 2105; 153 L.Ed.2nd 242]; The Supreme Court finding no detention where there was "no application of force, no intimidating movement, no overwhelming show of force, no brandishing of weapons, no blocking of exits, no threat, no command, not even an authoritative tone of voice." (Id., at p. 204.)

Telling a Subject to Place His Hands on His Head has been held to be a show of authority sufficient to constitute a detention. (United States *v. Brodie (D.C. Cir. 2014) 742 F.3rd 1058, 1061; see also United v. Brown (4th Cir. 2005) 401 F.3rd 588, 595.)

Contacts on Buses, as long as conducted in a non-coercive manner, do not automatically become a detention despite the relative confinement of the bus. (United States v. Drayton, supra; Florida v. Bostick, supra.)

See "Contacts on Buses," under "Specific Issues," below.

During a "Knock and Talk:" Contacting a person at the front door of their residence, done in a non-coercive manner, is not a detention. (United States v. Crapser (9th Cir. 2007) 472 F.3rd 1141, 1145-1147.)

Drawing a person out of his residence by simply knocking at the door and then stepping to the side for purposes of insuring the officer's safety: No detention when the officers then contacted him outside. (People v. Colt (2004) 118, Cal.App.4th 1404, 1411; "The officers did not draw their weapons. (Defendant) was not surrounded. No one stood between (defendant) and the room door. No one said that (defendant) was not free to leave.")

Entering the defendant's driveway, through an open or unlocked gate to a low, chain-link fence, to contact and talk with (consensual encounter) a subject observed working in the driveway (apparently stripping copper wires from an air-conditioner), even if that area is considered to be part of the curtilage of the residence, is not illegal. (People v. Lujano (2014) 229 Cal.App.4th 175, 182-185; "(T)he officers exercised no more than the same license to intrude as a reasonably respectful citizen—any door-to-door salesman would reasonably have taken the same approach the house.")

The "constitutionality of police incursion into curtilage depends on 'whether the officer's actions are consistent with an attempt to initiate consensual contact with the occupants of the home'" (Id., at p. 184; citing United States v. Perea-Rey (9th Cir. 2012) 680 F.3rd 1179, 1188.)

It is an open, undecided issue, with authority going both ways, as to whether it is lawful for an officer to conduct a "knock and talk" at other than the front door. The U.S. Supreme Court declined to resolve the issue. (Carroll v. Carman (2014) 574 U.S. 13 [135 S.Ct. 348; 190 L.Ed.2nd 311]; determining that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity in that the issue is the subject of some conflicting authority.)

However, while declining to decide the correctness of the generally held opinion that a police officer, in making contact with a resident, is constitutionally bound to do no more than restrict his "movements to walkways, driveways, porches and places where visitors could be expected to go," the Court cited a number of lower federal and state appellate court decisions which have so held: E.g., United States v. Titemore (2nd Cir. 2006) 437 F.3rd 251; United States v. James (7th Cir 1994) 40 F.3rd 850, vacated on other grounds at 516 U.S. 1022; United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 1993) 997 F.2nd 1273, 1279-1280; and State v. Domicz (2006) 188 N.J. 285, 302. (Carroll v. Carman, supra, at pp. 19-20.)

See "Knock and Talk," below.

Following a Lawful Detention:

Although defendant, driving a semi with an attached trailer, had initially been detained when a highway patrol officer initiated a traffic stop of his tractor-trailer and he pulled to the side of a freeway, that detention had ended by the time defendant gave his consent to search the tractor-trailer. The officer had returned defendant's documents, told him he was free to leave, and allowed him to walk partway back to his vehicle when the officer asked for consent to search his vehicle. Thus, the request for permission to search defendant's truck did not occur during a prolonged detention. (People v. Arebalos-Cabrera (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 179, 183-190.)

Consensual Encounters vs. Detentions or Arrests:

The Three Contact Categories: "'Police contacts with individuals may be placed into three broad categories ranging from the least to the most intrusive:

Consensual encounters that result in no restraint of liberty whatsoever;

Detentions, which are seizures of an individual that are strictly limited in duration, scope, and purpose; and Formal arrests or comparable restraints on an individual's liberty. [Citations.] . . . Consensual encounters do not trigger Fourth Amendment scrutiny. [Citation.] Unlike detentions, they require no articulable suspicion that the person has committed or is about to commit a crime.'"

See People v. Linn (2015) 241 Cal.App.4th 46, 57; quoting In re Manuel G. (1997) 16 Cal.4th 805, 821; see also People v. Cuadra (2021) 71 Cal.App.5th 348, 352.

Factors to Consider:

> However, a consensual encounter may be inadvertently converted into a detention, or even an arrest, by "any (or a combination of) the following: . . .
> > . . . the presence of several officers,
> >
> > . . . an officer's display of a weapon,

>
> The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has added several other factors to consider (United States v. Washington (9th Cir. 2007) 490 F.3rd 765, 771-772, citing Orhorhaghe v. INS (9th Cir. 1994) 38 F.3rd 488, 494-496.):

> A consensual encounter will become an unlawful arrest if done without probable cause. (See United States v. Redlightning (9th Cir. 2010) 624 F.3rd 1090, 1103-1106, adding a consideration of the act of confronting the defendant with evidence of his guilt.)
>
> See also People v. Chamagua (2019) 33 Cal.App.5th 925, 929: "In contrast to a consensual encounter, a seizure is when an officer restrains the individual's liberty, whether by means of physical force or by a show of authority."
>
> The definition of a "seizure" was expanded a bit by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Torres v. Madrid (Mar. 25, 2021) __ U.S. __, __ [141 S.Ct. 989; 209 L.Ed.2nd 190], where the Court ruled that a "seizure" occurs when "(t)he application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure, even if the force does not succeed in subduing the person."

The Madrid Court overruled a lower court's holding that a suspect's continued flight after being shot by police negates a Fourth Amendment excessive-force claim.

Additional Case Law:

In United States v. Washington (9th Cir. 2007) 490 F.3rd 765, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal found a detention when two white police officers had contact with the black defendant late at night, and then asked him for consent to search. The consensual encounter, however, reverted to an illegal detention due to the "authoritative" manner of conducting the search, by walking defendant back to the patrol car, having him put his hands on the patrol vehicle while facing away from the officer, during a patdown, with the second officer standing between him and his car. It was also noted that the local "Police Bureau" (in Portland, Oregon) had published a pamphlet telling African-Americans to submit to a search when "ordered" to do so by the police following several instances of white police officers shooting black citizens during traffic stops.

While it is a crime to falsely identify oneself when lawfully detained, per Pen. Code § 148.9, this section is not violated where (1) the person is unlawfully detained, or (2) where he is the target of a consensual encounter only. (People v. Walker (2012) 210 Cal.App.4th 1372, 1392.)

Because defendant discarded a firearm prior to being taken into physical custody, recovery of the gun was not a Fourth Amendment violation. Defendant's momentary hesitation and merely walking away from the officers instead of running as the officers approached did not constitute submission. Until a person is physically taken into custody, or submits to the officer's authority, there is no detention. (United States v. McClendon (9th Cir. 2013) 713 F.3rd 1211, 1214-1217; citing California v. Hodari D. (1991) 499 U.S. 621 [111 S.Ct. 1547; 113 L.Ed.2nd 690].)

A consensual encounter developed into an illegal detention (there being no reasonable suspicion to believe defendant was engaged in any criminal activity) at some point during the encounter, and certainly upon asking defendant and his brother if they would sit on the curb, because of the number of officers present (four), a consensual patdown, and the series of other accusatory questions, so that by the time the officer asked for permission to search defendant's backpack, the defendant was being detained. The gun found in the backpack, as a product of that illegal detention, should have been suppressed in that the consent to search was involuntary. (In re J.G. (2014) 228 Cal.App.4th 402, 408-413.)

Asking a person to walk to the sidewalk, reasonably under the circumstances understood for safety reasons, is not as intrusive as telling him to sit on the curb, and does not (absent more) constitute a detention. Asking him to verbally identify himself also is not a detention. (People v. Parrott (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 485, 494.)

Where defendant was observed standing next to a vehicle at 2:15 a.m. as the officers approached, and he raised his hands and stepped back in reaction to being told to approach the hood of the officer's vehicle, the Court held that he had been unlawfully detained. Per the Court (at p. 353): "Raising one's hands and stepping back is a universally acknowledged submission to authority. It is an accepted way to reassure someone who is armed and confronting you that you pose no threat because you have no weapon in hand, your arms are not poised to attack, and you are not advancing in a menacing way. By putting up both hands appellant yielded to the officers' show of authority." Being no reasonable suspicion sufficient to justify a detention, defendant had been unlawfully detained. A budge in his waist band observed as a result was held to have been observed illegal, requiring the suppression of a handgun subsequently found during a patdown search. (People v. Cuadra (2021) 71 Cal.App.5th 348, 352-354.)

An officer merely putting on his vehicle's spotlight on the rear of defendant's already parked vehicle, without more, was not such a "show of authority" so as to convert a consensual encounter into a detention. (People v. Tacardon (2022) 14 Cal.5th 235, at pg. 252; noting that a court must take into consideration the "totality of the circumstances" in determining whether a reasonable person, in the suspect's position, would feel that he was free to leave.)

Defendant was convicted of possession of a firearm with a prior violent conviction pleading no contest following the denial of his motion to suppress evidence of a firearm. He contended that the evidence of the firearm should have been excluded because law enforcement officers discovered it only after they unlawfully detained him to verify his parole status. Reversing the trial court, the Court of Appeal found that the initial encounter between defendant and the officers was indeed an unlawful detention. The court pointed to several factors leading to this conclusion such as the positioning of the officers that blocked defendant from leaving, the officers approaching defendant from both sides of his car and shining their flashlights into his car, and the fact that the officers approached him while he was on his phone in a legally parked vehicle. The court held that these factors would lead a reasonable person to believe they are not free to leave, thus constituting a detention. Therefore, the court reversed the trial court's judgment and vacated its order denying defendant's motion to suppress evidence. The court concluded that the officers would not have obtained defendant's parole status if they had not first unlawfully detained him and thus, the firearm was not lawfully obtained and should be suppressed. (People v. Paul (2024) 99 Cal.App.5th 832, 837-841.)

Specific Issues:

Contacts on Buses:

The United States Supreme Court has repeatedly ruled that law enforcement officers checking buses for immigration or drug interdiction purposes are not detaining the passengers when the officers do no more than "ask questions of an individual, ask to examine the individual's identification, and request consent to search his or her luggage so long as the officers do not convey a message that compliance with their requests is required." The fact that the contact took place in the cramped confines of a bus is but one factor to consider in determining whether the encounter was in fact a detention. (Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429 [111 S.Ct. 2382; 115 L.Ed.2nd 389]; United States v. Drayton (2002) 536 U.S. 194 [122 S.Ct. 2105; 153 L.Ed.2nd 242].)

However, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held to the contrary in a similar circumstance, without attempting to differentiate the facts from Bostick (the case being decided before Drayton), finding that the officers should have informed passengers that they were not obligated to speak with the officers. (United States v. Stephens (9th Cir. 2000) 206 F.3rd 914.)

The Supreme Court in Drayton, supra, however, has specifically held that it is not required that officers inform citizens of their right to refuse when the officer is seeking permission to conduct a warrantless consent search. (United States v. Drayton, supra.)

Note: It is questionable whether Stephens is good law in light of Bostick and Drayton.

Other circuits have upheld such a "bus interdiction," finding them lawful. (E.g., see United States v. Wise (5th Cir. TX 2017) 877 F.3rd 209.)

Flight:

Rule: The long-standing rule has always been that "flight alone," without other suspicions circumstances, is not sufficient to justify a detention. (People v. Souza (1994) 9 Cal.4th 224.)

> A vehicle driver's apparent attempt to elude a police officer when there is no legal justification for making a traffic stop, is not illegal in itself in that the driver is under no duty to stop. (Liberal v. Estrada (9th Cir. 2011) 632 F.3rd 1064, 1078.)

Note: If a person may walk away from a consensual encounter (See People v. Thomas (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1107, 1117.), he or she may also leave at a full run. The courts, state and federal, have consistently held that this act, by itself, is not suspicious enough to warrant a detention.

Note: However, a defendant's flight may be used as evidence against him at trial, showing an "awareness of guilt." (See P.C. § 1127c and CALCRIM No. 372. See also People v. Price (2017) 8 Cal.App.5th 409, 454-458.)

Reasoning:

"(T)he high court . . . has a long history of recognizing that innocent people may reasonably flee from police: '[I]t is a matter of common knowledge that men who are entirely innocent do sometimes fly (sic) from the scene of a crime through fear of being apprehended as the guilty parties, or from an unwillingness to appear as witnesses. Nor is it true as an accepted axiom of criminal law that "the wicked flee when no man pursueth, but the righteous are as bold as a lion." Innocent men sometimes hesitate to confront a jury—not necessarily because they fear that the jury will not protect them, but because they do not wish their names to appear in connection with criminal acts, are humiliated at being obliged to incur the popular odium of an arrest and trial, or because they do not wish to be put to the annoyance or expense of defending themselves.' (Alberty v. United States (1896) 162 U.S. 499, 511 [40 L.Ed. 1051; 16 S.Ct. 864]; see also (People v.) Souza ((1994) . . . 9 Cal.4th (224,) at p. 243 (conc. opn. of Mosk, J.) [noting the 'unfortunate reality that some individuals in our society, often members of minority groups, improperly view the police more as sources of harassment than of protection. These individuals may innocently flee at the first sight of police in order to avoid an encounter that their experience has taught them might be troublesome'].)" (People v. Flores (2019) 38 Cal.App.5th 617, 629, 630.)

Exceptions:

Flight, however, need not be ignored. The Supreme Court has recognized that: "'[U]nprovoked flight upon noticing the police . . . is certainly suggestive' of wrongdoing and can be treated as 'suspicious behavior' that factors into the totality of the circumstances." (District of Columbia v. Wesby et al. (2018) 583 U.S. 48, 59 [138 S.Ct. 577; 199 L.Ed.2nd 453], citing Illinois v. Wardlow (2000) 528 U.S. 119, 124-125 [120 S.Ct. 673; 145 L.Ed.2nd 570].)

> "Nervous and evasive behavior is a pertinent factor in determining whether suspicion is reasonable." (People v. Flores (2021) 60 Cal.App.5th 978, 990, citing Wardlow, supra, at p. 124.)
> "In fact, 'deliberately furtive actions and flight at the approach of . . . law officers are strong indicia of mens rea.'" (District of Columbia v. Wesby et al., supra, at p. 59; citing Sibron v. New York (1968) 392 U.S. 40, 66 [88 S.Ct. 1889; 20 L.Ed.2nd 917].)

Also, the U.S. Supreme Court has lowered the bar a little by holding that flight from officers while in a "high narcotics area" is sufficient in itself to justify a temporary detention (and patdown for weapons). (Illinois v. Wardlow (2000) 528 U.S. 119 [120 S.Ct. 673; 145 L.Ed.2nd 570].)

Flight of two people is more suspicious than one. Added to this the fact that there appeared to be drug paraphernalia on a table where the two persons had been sitting and that defendant was carrying something in his hand as he fled, it was held that the officer had sufficient reasonable suspicion to detain them. (People v. Britton (2001) 91 Cal.App.4th 1112, 1118-1119.)

Stopping, detaining, and patting down a known gang member, observed running through traffic in a gang area while looking back nervously as if fleeing from a crime (as either a victim or a perpetrator), was held to be lawful. (In re H.M. (2008) 167 Cal.App.4th 136.)

Observing defendant and three others running down the street, carrying rudimentary weapons (i.e., a brick, rock and part of a lamp) in a gang area, with defendant being recognized as a member of that gang, with one of the subjects yelling "He's over there" and another pointing up the street, was sufficient probable cause to arrest the subjects for possession of a deadly weapon for the purpose of committing an assault, per P.C. § 12024 (now P.C. § 17500). (In re J.G. (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 1501.)

Tossing an unknown object over a fence during a foot pursuit, particularly when this occurs immediately after defendant had been seen in a vehicle that had refused to stop, and which defendant abandoned during a high speed pursuit, is sufficient to justify a detention. (People v. Rodriguez (2012) 207 Cal.App.4th 1540, 1543.)

Flight, when combined with grabbing his front pants pocket while in a high-crime area, provided sufficient reasonable suspicion to justify defendant's detention and a patdown for weapons which resulted in the recovery of a firearm. Also, no detention occurred when the officers initially chased defendant who fled from the attempted contact. (United States v. Jeter (6th Cir. 2013) 721 F.3rd 746, 750-755.)

Flight of a person who is subject to a lawful detention, thus avoiding a statutory requirement that he identify himself (as required under Nevada law), is probable cause to arrest him. (United States v. Williams (9th Cir. 2017) 846 F.3rd 303, 310-312; discussing the interplay of Nevada statutes N.R.S. §§ 171.123 and 199.280, which, together, make it an arrestable offense for a lawfully detained individual to refuse to identify himself.)

There was no detention under circumstances when defendant fled from an officer, where the officer had not yet objectively communicated the use of his official authority to restrain defendant until he grabbed defendant's arm because prior to that the officer had acted on his own, he had not touched his weapon, he had not touched defendant, and he had not given any orders or made any threats even though defendant had stopped when the officer called his name. (United States v. Belin (1st Cir. Mass. 2017) 868 F.3rd 43)

However, the rule of Wardlow has it limits: In a similar situation, reasonable suspicion was found to be lacking under the Fourth Amendment for an investigative detention where defendant's mere presence by daylight in an area frequented by a street gang, absent any reports of criminal activity at that time, did not provide specific, articulable grounds to justify his detention. The detaining officer's testimony that defendant had been "walking briskly" did not establish that defendant had fled from other officers investigating the gang. Even if defendant's quick pace could be characterized as flight, it did not justify a detention because it was not "headlong flight" as described in the case law on which the prosecution relied. Because the detention was unlawful, as was a subsequent search of defendant's residence, all evidence had to be suppressed pursuant to Pen. Code § 1538.5, including illegal drugs and statements. (People v. Flores (2019) 38 Cal.App.5th 617.)

Defendant's immediate attempt to walk away from officers who had just arrived at a person's house to serve an arrest warrant, where the officers feared that if defendant were able to get out of their sight (as he walked towards the rear of the house), he might draw a weapon or warn the occupant of the officers' arrival, all occurring in a "high crime" area, justified defendant's detention and (upon observing several knives "hooked onto his belt") patdown for weapons. The fact that the officers did not observe defendant committing any criminal activity did not affect the reasonableness of their suspicion as Terry v. Ohio only requires a reasonable suspicion supported by articulable facts that criminal activity "may be afoot," and not absolute certainty that a crime is being committed. (United States v. Darrell (5th Cir. 2019) 945 F.3rd 929.)

Flight, however, where there is sufficient reasonable suspicion to justify a detention, is a criminal offense, punishable under P.C. 148(a)(1). (In re T.F.-G. (2023) 94 Cal.App.5th 893, 993-894.)

Exception to the Exception:

The rule of Wardlow has it limits: In a similar situation, reasonable suspicion was found to be lacking under the Fourth Amendment for an investigative detention where defendant's mere presence by daylight in an area frequented by a street gang, absent any reports of criminal activity at that time, did not provide specific, articulable grounds to justify his detention. The detaining officer's testimony that defendant had been "walking briskly" did not establish that defendant had fled from other officers investigating the gang. Even if defendant's quick pace could be characterized as flight, it did not justify a detention because it was not "headlong flight" as described in the case law on which the prosecution relied. Because the detention was unlawful, as was a subsequent search of defendant's residence, all evidence had to be suppressed pursuant to P.C. § 1538.5, including illegal drugs and statements. (People v. Flores (2019) 38 Cal.App.5th 617.)

> "(F)light is probative 'only in those instances in which there is other indication of criminality, such as evidence that the defendant fled from a crime scene or after being accused of a crime.'" (People v. Flores, supra, quoting People v. Souza, supra, at pp. 235–236; and noting that there must be "flight plus" to justify a detention.)

Chasing the Suspect; Items Dropped During the Chase:

Trying to catch a person who runs from a consensual encounter is not a constitutional issue until he is actually caught and detained or arrested. A person is not actually detained (thus no Fourth Amendment violation) until he is either physically restrained or submits to an officer's authority to detain him. (California v. Hodari D. (1991) 499 U.S. 621 [111 S.Ct. 1547; 113 L.Ed.2nd 690]; "threatening an unlawful detention," by chasing a person with whom a consensual encounter is being attempted, is not a constitutional violation in itself. See also United States v. Smith (9th Cir. 2011) 633 F.3rd 889.)

Actions taken by the subject being chased, such as dropping contraband prior to being caught, will, if observed by the pursuing officer, justify the detention once the subject is in fact caught. (People v. Rodriguez (2012) 207 Cal.App.4th 1540, 1543-1544.)

Defendant who refused to submit to an illegal, suspicionless detention, physically threatening the officer before fleeing, could lawfully be arrested upon the making of the threat. Therefore, arresting him after a foot pursuit was lawful. (United States v. Caseres (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1064, 1069.)

Defendant discarding a firearm as officers were attempting to (arguably) illegally arrest him, did not require the suppression of the firearm in that when the gun was discarded, defendant had not yet been "touched" nor had he "submitted" to the officers. Thus, the Fourth Amendment was not yet implicated. (United States v. McClendon (9th Cir. 2013) 713 F.3rd 1211, 1214-1217.)

> The Court noted that neither defendant's temporary hesitation, nor the officer's use of a firearm while telling him he was under arrest, alters the rule of Hodari D. (Id., at pp. 1216-1217.)

Contacts with Gang Members:

Gang members may be consensually encountered like anyone else. However, membership in a street gang is not in and of itself a crime. (See P.C. § 186.22) The practice of stopping, detaining, questioning, and perhaps photographing a suspected gang member, based solely upon the person's suspected gang membership, is illegal. (People v. Green (1991) 227 Cal.App.3rd 692, 699-700.)

Stopping and detaining gang members for the purpose of photographing them is illegal without a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. Merely being a member of a gang, by itself, is neither illegal nor cause to detain. (People v. Rodriguez (1993) 21 Cal.App.4th 232, 239.)

> The Rodriguez court noted that; "While this policy (of stopping and questioning all suspected gang members) may serve the laudable purpose of preventing crime, it is prohibited by the Fourth Amendment." (Id., at p. 239; citing Brown v. Texas (1979) 443 U.S. 47, 52 [99 S.Ct. 2637; 61 L.Ed.2nd 357, 363].)

See "Detentions" (Chapter 4), below.

See also "Videotaping and Photographing," under "New and Developing Law Enforcement Tools and Technology" (Chapter 14), below.

Knock and Talks:

Rule: Where the officer does not have probable cause prior to the contact (thus, he is not able to obtain a search warrant), there is no constitutional impediment to conducting what is known as a "knock and talk;" i.e., making contact with the occupants of a residence at their front door for the purpose of asking for a consent to enter and/or to question the occupants. (United States v. Cormier (9th Cir. 2000) 220 F.3rd 1103.)

> State authority similarly upholds the practice. (People v. Colt (2004) 118, Cal.App.4th 1404, 1410-1411.)

Case Law:

> Contacting a person at the front door of their residence, done in a non-coercive manner, is not a detention. (United States v. Crapser (9th Cir. 2007) 472 F.3rd 1141, 1145-1147.)
>
> The California Supreme Court has noted that: "It is not unreasonable for officers to seek interviews with suspects or witnesses or to call upon them at their homes for such purposes. Such inquiries, although courteously made and not accompanied with any assertion of a right to enter or search or secure answers, would permit the criminal to defeat his prosecution by voluntarily revealing all of the evidence against him and then contending that he acted only in response to an implied assertion of unlawful authority." (People v. Michael (1955) 45 Cal.2nd 751, 754.)
>
> The key to conducting a lawful "knock and talk," when there is no articulable suspicion that can be used to justify an "investigative detention," is whether "a reasonable person would feel free 'to disregard the police and go about his business.'" [Citation] If so, no articulable suspicion is required to merely knock on the defendant's door and inquire of him who he is and/or to ask for consent to search. (People v. Jenkins (2004) 119 Cal.App.4th 368.)

But see United States v. Jerez (7th Cir. 1997) 108 F.3rd 684, where a similar situation was held to constitute an "investigative detention," thus requiring an "articulable reasonable suspicion" to be lawful, because the officers knocked on the motel room door in the middle of the night continually for a full three minutes, while commanding the occupants to open the door.

An otherwise lawful "knock and talk," where officers continued to press the defendant for permission to enter his apartment after his denial of any illegal activity, converted the contact into an unlawfully "extended" detention, causing the Court to conclude that a later consent-to-search was the product of the illegal detention, and thus invalid. (United States v. Washington (9th Cir. 2004) 387 F.3rd 1060.)

The information motivating an officer to conduct a knock and talk may be from an anonymous tipster. There is no requirement that officers corroborate anonymous information before conducting a knock and talk. (People v. Rivera (2007) 41 Cal.4th 304.)

The United States Supreme Court has found it to be an open, undecided issue, with authority going both ways, as to whether it is lawful for an officer to conduct a "knock and talk" at other than the front door, the Court declining to resolve the issue. (Carroll v. Carman (2014) 574 U.S. 13 [135 S.Ct. 348; 190 L.Ed.2nd 311]; determining that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity in that the issue is the subject of some conflicting authority.)

> However, while declining to decide the correctness of the generally held opinion that a police officer, in making contact with a resident, is constitutionally bound to do no more than restrict his "movements to walkways, driveways, porches and places where visitors could be expected to go," the Court cited a number of lower federal and state appellate court decisions which have so held: E.g., United States v. Titemore (2nd Cir. 2006) 437 F.3rd 251; United States v. James (7th Cir 1994) 40 F.3rd 850, vacated on other grounds at 516 U.S. 1022; United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 1993) 997 F.2nd 1273, 1279-1280; and State v. Domicz (2006) 188 N.J. 285, 302. (Id., 19-20.)

Conducting a "knock and talk" to ask a homeowner about the strong odor of marijuana noted during a prior contact was upheld as reasonable, the Court noting that this conduct fell "squarely within the scope of the knock and talk exception." (United States v. White (8th Cir. MO 2019) 928 F.3rd 734.)

Chapter 4*:

Detentions:

General Rule: A police officer has the right to stop and temporarily detain someone for investigation whenever the officer has a "reasonable suspicion" some criminal activity is afoot and that the person was, . . . is, . . . or is about to be involved in that criminal activity. (Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1, 27 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889, 909]; People v. Walker (2012) 210 Cal.App.4th 1372, 1381; United States v. Williams (9th Cir. 2017) 846 F.3rd 303, 308-310; People v. Parrott (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 485, 492, 494-495; People v. Fews (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 553, 559; United States v. Bontemps (9th Cir. 2020) 977 F.3rd 909, 913.)

Often referred to as a "Terry stop*." (See Thomas v. Dillard (9th Cir. 2016) 818 F.3rd 864, 875; United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2021) 996 F.3rd 998, 1004.)

"Under the authority recognized in Terry, a police officer who 'observes unusual conduct which leads him reasonably to conclude in light of his experience that criminal activity may be afoot' may 'briefly stop the suspicious person and make "reasonable inquiries" aimed at confirming or dispelling his suspicions.'" (United States v. Brown, supra, quoting Minnesota v. Dickerson (1993) 508 U.S. 366, at p. 373 [113 S.Ct. 2130; 124 L.Ed.2nd 334], which I turn quotes Terry v. Ohio, supra, at p. 30.)

"One of these exceptions is the Terry stop, which permits an officer with reasonable suspicion that an individual is engaged in a crime to briefly detain the individual and make 'reasonable inquiries' aimed at confirming or dispelling [the officer's] suspicions.'" (United States v. Baker (9th Cir. 2023) 58 F.4th 1109, 1117.)

"Detentions are 'seizures of an individual which are strictly limited in duration, scope and purpose, and which may be undertaken by the police "if there is an articulable suspicion that a person has committed or is about to commit a crime."'" (People v. Gutierrez (2018) 21 Cal.App.5th 1146, 1153; quoting Wilson v. Superior Court (1983) 34 Cal.3rd 777, 784.)

"Unlike consensual encounters, '[a] detention … is a seizure, albeit a limited one, for which reasonable suspicion is required.'" (In re T.F.-G. (2023) 94 Cal.App.5th 893, 903; quoting People v. Linn (2015) 241 Cal.App.4th 46, 57; see also People v. Brown (2015) 61 Cal.4th 968, 981.)

"[T]o justify an investigative stop or detention the circumstances known or apparent to the officer must include specific and articulable facts causing him to suspect that (1) some activity relating to crime has taken place or is occurring or about to occur, and (2) the person he intends to stop or detain is involved in that activity." (People v. Thomas (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1107, 1115.); citing In re

Tony C. (1978) 21 Cal.3rd 888, 893; People v. Souza (1994) 9 Cal.4th 224, 231; People v. Flores (2019) 38 Cal.App.5th 617, 627; and Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1, 30 [20 L.Ed.2nd 889; 88 S. Ct. 1868].)

But the other side of this coin dictates that: "The Fourth Amendment protects the 'right of the people to be secure in their persons . . . against unreasonable searches and seizures' by the government. U.S. Const. amend. IV. 'This inestimable right of personal security belongs as much to the citizen on the streets of our cities as to the homeowner closeted in his study to dispose of his secret affairs.'" (Thomas v. Dillard, supra, at p. 874; quoting Terry v. Ohio, supra, at pp. 8-9.)

> In perhaps an understatement, it has been noted that; "(t)he interaction between a peace officer and a person suspected of committing a crime is not a game." (People v. Quick (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 1006, 1008; chastising a detained defendant for attempting to create his own "'do it yourself' suppression motion" by throwing his jacket containing a controlled substance into his vehicle, along with the car keys, and locking the door.)
> The officer's belief that two subjects are engaged in an act of domestic violence by itself is insufficient to justify a detention and a frisk for weapons absent some other facts indicating that at least one of the subjects is armed. (Thomas v. Dillard, supra, at pp. 875-886; but see dissent at pp. 892-901, arguing that the fact alone that domestic violence is involved, given the dangerousness of domestic violence incidents, is sufficient to justify a patdown for weapons.)
>
> > Nor did the suspect's non-compliance with the officer's illegal order to submit to a frisk make the subsequent continued detention lawful. (Id, at p. 889.)
> Also, merely being present at the scene of some unexplained police activity, being observed opening a garage door, appearing to be surprised, and wearing baggie clothing with the pockets apparently being "full of items," held not to justify a "Terry stop" nor a patdown of the defendant's clothing. (United States v. Job (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 852, 861.)

"'A person is seized by the police and thus entitled to challenge the government's action under the Fourth Amendment when the officer, "by means of physical force or show of authority," terminates or restrains his freedom of movement, [citation] 'through means intentionally applied' [citation].'" (People v. Arebalos-Cabrera (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 179, 186; quoting Brendlin v. California (2007) 551 U.S. 249, 254 [168 L.Ed.2nd 132; 127 S.Ct. 2400]; see also People v. Flores (2019) 38 Cal.App.5th 617, 626-627; In re T.F.-G. (2023) 94 Cal.App.5th 893, 903-904.)

Note: Detentions are sometimes referred to in the case law as simply "investigative stops," particularly by the federal courts. (See United States v. Kim (9th Cir. 1994) 25 F.3rd 1426; and United States v. Summers (9th Cir. 2001) 268 F.3rd 683.)

> But the concept of the "investigatory stop" is recognized by the state courts as well: "The Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution protects against unreasonable searches and seizures, including brief investigatory stops." (In re Edgerrin J. (2020) 57 Cal.App.5th 752, 759, citing the Fourth Amendment and People v. Souza (1994) 9 Cal.4th 224, 229.)

Purpose*:

A detention is allowed so a peace officer may have a reasonable amount of time to investigate a person's possible involvement in an actual or perceived criminal act, allowing the officer to make an informed decision whether to arrest, or to release, the subject. "An investigative detention must be temporary and last no longer than is necessary to effectuate the purpose of the stop. Similarly, the investigative methods employed should be the least intrusive means reasonably available to verify or dispel the officer's suspicion in a short period of time." (In re Antonio B. (2008) 166 Cal.App.4th 435, 440.)

See also United States v. Place (1983) 462 U.S. 696, 702-707 [103 S.Ct. 2637; 77 L. Ed.2nd 110]; apply the Terry principles to the temporary seizure and inspection of a suspect's luggage for the purpose of investigating an officer's reasonable suspicion that the luggage may contain contraband.

> However, in that the luggage seizure in this case before being subjected to the dog-sniff was 90 minutes, the Court held that Terry v. Ohio did not apply to such an extended time period. (United States v. Place, supra, at p. 709.)

Seriousness of the Offense Involved*:

Note that the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has attached a requirement that the suspected offense for which a person is to be detained must be "serious," thus apparently making it a Fourth Amendment violation to stop and detain someone when the offense is not serious. See United States v. Vandergroen (9th Cir. 2020) 964 F.3rd 876, 879; detaining defendant upon a reasonable suspicion that he might be in illegal possession of a firearm—a serious offense under California law—held to be justified, while noting that stopping and detaining an individual for a non-serious offense would not be lawful. Deciding what is "serious" and what is not is the unresolved issue.

> The Court cites United States v. Grigg (9th Cir. 2007) 498 F.3rd 1070, as authority for this argument. Griggs, however, while discussing the issue, declines to decide where to draw the line, holding only that: "We adopt the rule that a reviewing court must consider the nature of the misdemeanor offense in question, with particular attention to the potential for ongoing or repeated danger (e.g., drunken and/or reckless driving), and any risk of escalation (e.g., disorderly conduct, assault, domestic violence). An assessment of the 'public safety' factor should be considered within the totality of the circumstances, when balancing the privacy interests at stake against the efficacy of a Terry stop, along with the possibility that the police may have alternative means to identify the suspect or achieve the investigative purpose of the stop." (At p. 1081.)

There does not appear to be any requirement under California law that the offense for which one is to be detained must be classified as "serious."

> E.g. see People v. Thompson (2006) 38 Cal.4th 811, and Sims v. Stanton (9th Cir. 2013) 706 F.3rd 954 (certiorari granted), both cases discussing the legal issues involved in detaining or arresting someone in their residence, where the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held in Sims that unless the offense for which one is to be detained is "serious," entry into a residence for that purpose is illegal. The California Supreme Court disagrees, as noted in Thompson, and notes (at pp. 821-824) that the Ninth Circuit's opinion on this issue is a minority opinion.
> The U.S. Supreme Court has specifically declined to rule on the issue of whether it is lawful to stop and detain someone for a non-serious offense. (See United States v. Hensley (1985) 469 U.S. 221, 229 [105 S.Ct. 675; 83 L.Ed.2nd 604].)

Note: If this is an issue at all, a "serious offense" may be definable by whether the arrested-for offense was "jailable," or "non-jailable." (See People v. Thompson (2006) 38 Cal.4th 811, at p. 824.)

Show of Authority*:

"'In situations involving a show of authority, a person is seized "if 'in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave,'"" or ""'otherwise terminate the encounter"'"" [citation], and if the person actually submits to the show of authority [citation].'"" (Italics added; People v. Arebalos-Cabrera (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 179, 186; quoting People v. Brown (2015) 61 Cal.4th 968, 974: See also In re Edgerrin J. (2020) 57 Cal.App.5th 752, 760.)

> In Edgerrin J., The Juvenile Court's denial of a suppression motion was reversed for having erroneously determined that a police-defendant encounter was consensual and not a detention. A citizen had approached four police officers, reporting to them that black males sitting in a car on the street in her neighborhood were "acting shady." In two patrol cars, the officers parked behind defendant's lawfully parked car. The first patrol car turned its emergency lights on and the four officers approached each of the car's doors. The three minors sitting in the vehicle were directed to roll down the windows and provide IDs. Defendant (in the driver's seat) was determined to have a Fourth waiver. A search of the car revealed an illegal loaded firearm and evidence of a robbery. The Court ruled that the officers' show of authority (i.e., turning on their emergency lights) amounted to an unlawful detention. Per the Court: "Under these facts, no reasonable person in defendant's position would feel free to leave." The citizen's tip was infirm because it "provided only a vague and highly subjective characterization of what she saw" and was therefore "insufficiently reliable as to any illegal behavior to provide a basis for a detention." The Court ordered a renewed hearing to clarify to what extent the officers previously knew about defendant's Fourth waiver, his gang membership, and his presence in a rival gang territory—points that the Juvenile Court had sidestepped.

The "reasonable person" test presupposes an innocent person. (United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2021) 996 F.3rd 998, 1005; citing Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, at p. 438 [111 S.Ct. 2382; 115 L.Ed.2nd 389].)

"A detention occurs when an officer intentionally applies physical restraint or initiates a show of authority to which an objectively reasonable person innocent of wrongdoing would feel compelled to submit, and to which such a person in fact submits." (People v. Linn (2015) 241 Cal.App.4th 46, 57; see also People v. Parrott (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 485, 492.)

> The "reasonable person" test presupposes an innocent person. (United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2021) 996 F.3rd 998, 1005; citing Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, at p. 438 [111 S.Ct. 2382; 115 L.Ed.2nd 389].)

"A seizure of the person occurs '"whenever a police officer 'by means of physical force or show of authority' restrains the liberty of a person to walk away."'" (People v. Thomas (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1107, 1112-1113.); citing People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 860, which in turn quoted People v. "A consensual encounter with a police officer ripens into a seizure when, under 'all the circumstances surrounding the encounter,' the 'police conduct would have communicated to a reasonable person that the person was not free to decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter.'" (United States v. Brown

Blocking a vehicle in, in which defendant was a passenger, with two police cars constitutes sufficient "show of authority" to deem defendant to have been detained. (United States v. Hester (3rd Cir. NJ 2018) 910 F.3rd 78; the Court ruling that the detention was lawful given the suspicious circumstances of being parked illegal outside a liquor store where the officers knew drug dealing to be common.)

> See also People v. Wilkins (1986) 186 Cal.App.3d 804, 809: A detention occurred when the officer in a marked patrol car parked diagonally behind defendant's vehicle so it could not exit the parking lot.

Although "consensual encounters present no constitutional concerns and do not require justification . . . 'when the officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, has in some way restrained the liberty of a citizen,' the officer effects a seizure of that person, which must be justified under the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution." (People v. Brown (2015) 61 Cal.4th 968, 974, where the officer pulled his patrol car in behind the defendant's car and activated his emergency lights, quoting Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, 434 [111 S.Ct. 2382; 115 L.Ed.2nd 389], the Court held that the stop was supported by a reasonable suspicion.)

Three officers confronting defendant and his two companions where his two companions had already been patted down for weapons, plus the persistent nature of the officer's questions which continued despite defendant's attempts to end the encounter, communicated to defendant that the officer was not going to take no for an answer. Also, the Court found that examining the officers' interaction with defendant and the other men in a broader context intensified the coercive nature of the encounter. For example, the encounter occurred at night, with the three uniformed officers all shining their flashlights at defendant and his two companions, while defendant's avenues of egress were at least partially being restricted by the officers, their car, and a fence. Considering all the circumstances, the Court concluded a reasonable person in defendant's position would not have felt free to ignore the officers and walk away. Next, the court held that by staying where he was even as the officer's questioning grew more persistent and not leaving although he clearly wanted to, defendant was submitting to the officer's show of authority, even if it was only for a brief time. As a result, the court held that defendant was seized for Fourth Amendment purposes prior to an attempt to flee from the officers during which he dropped a satchel he was carrying. The search of the satchel and then defendant's person violated the Fourth Amendment. (United States v. Mabry (D.C. Cir. 2021) 997 F.3rd 1239.)

While a curfew was in effect, but which did not apply to private property, a deputy sheriff began the detention process when he approached defendant in a hotel parking lot and "asked" him to come toward the hood of the patrol car. By raising both his hands, defendant yielded to the officers' show of authority. There was neither probable cause to arrest defendant but for the illegal detention, nor was this a consensual encounter after the officers directed defendant to the hood of the car. All the officers knew was that defendant was standing next to a car in a motel parking lot at 2:00 a.m. Under the totality of circumstances, defendant submitted to a show of authority. His detention was not founded on reasonable suspicion, consent, nor probable cause to arrest. The stop did not pass constitutional muster and a revolver seized as a result of the search should have been suppressed. (People v. Cuadra (2021) 71 Cal.App.5th 348.)

An "officer's use of a sustained spotlight on an individual at night . . . [is a show of authority that] undoubtedly signals on the otherwise empty street that the individual is 'the focus of the officer's particularized suspicion'" (People v. Kasrawi (2021) 65 Cal.App.5th 751, 757.)

Defendant's seizure was unreasonable under Fourth Amendment where officers knew defendant's home address and that he had an eight-year-old arrest for trespass. This alone failed to constitute reasonable suspicion that defendant was trespassing as a non-resident who was not a resident's guest, an employee, or pursuing a legitimate business or social purpose. The Court held that although the officers did not physically restrain defendant until he lifted his shirt high enough for the officer to see the outline of a firearm, it wasn't until some badgering that he did so. The officers seized defendant without reasonable suspicion upon "requesting" that he lift his shirt at least fifteen times, inferring that he should submit to a pat down two times, and mentioning that defendant could be taken to jail for trespass two times that. If wasn't until after all this that the officer observed "what appeared to be like the bulge or the outline of a muzzle of a pistol" below defendant's belt buckle. The Court concluded that the Government's factors—when weighed and assessed in the totality of the circumstances—do not constitute reasonable suspicion to justify the seizure. (United States v. Peters (4th Cir. 2023) 60 F.4th 855.)

An officer's "systematic physical intrusion and show of authority as to" defendant's acquaintances . . . "would have objectively communicated to a reasonable person in T.F.-G.'s (the defendant) position that he was not free to go." (In re T.F.-G. (2023) 94 Cal.App.5th 893, 906; his resulting attempt to flee being valid grounds to arrest him for interfering with the officers in the performance of their duties, per P.C. § 148(a)(1).)

Defendant was convicted of possession of a firearm with a prior violent conviction pleading no contest following the denial of his motion to suppress evidence of a firearm. He contended that the evidence of the firearm should have been excluded because law enforcement officers discovered it only after they unlawfully detained him to verify his parole status. Reversing the trial court, the Court of Appeal found that the initial encounter between defendant and the officers was indeed an unlawful detention. The court pointed to several factors leading to this conclusion such as the positioning of the officers that blocked defendant from leaving, the officers approaching defendant from both sides of his car and shining their flashlights into his car, and the fact that the officers approached him while he was on his phone in a legally parked vehicle. The court held that these factors would lead a reasonable person to believe they are not free to leave, thus constituting a detention. Therefore, the court reversed the trial court's judgment and vacated its order denying defendant's motion to suppress evidence. The court concluded that the officers would not have obtained defendant's parole status if they had not first unlawfully detained him and thus, the firearm was not lawfully obtained and should be suppressed. (People v. Paul (2024) 99 Cal.App.5th 832, 837-841.)

> Officers were looking for someone reported as a male, black adult wearing a gray hooded sweatshirt and black pants. Defendant (presumably a Black male), who was the only one in the area (70 to 80 yards from the complaining business) almost 2½ hours later, and was found by officers wearing "bulky clothing, bulky hooded sweatshirt and bulky pants, as well as a windbreaker jacket on top of that," in an area where there were a lot of homeless people. Add to this that defendant was not reported to be doing anything illegal, except to be "harassing" passers-by, the Court held this to be insufficient to constitute reasonable suspicion sufficient to justify a detention, or the subsequent patdown. However, in Thomas, defendant was not contacted until almost 2½ hours after the 9-1-1 call to the police department, and was found some 70 to 80 yards away from where he was reported to have been, in an area with "significant foot traffic" in the middle of the day.

However, ordering a person out of his house with only a reasonable suspicion to believe that he might be involved in criminal activity, and to back up as he did so, holding onto him (albeit without handcuffs) with his hands behind his back while asking for his consent to search his person, was illegal. > Veh. Code § 24403(a) provides that a motor vehicle "may be equipped with not more than two fog lamps that may be used with, but may not be used in substitution of, headlamps." The Fourth Amendment was held to require suppression of drug evidence where a U.S. Customs and Border Protection agent did not have sufficient reasonable suspicion for a traffic stop based on the facts that defendant was driving in a known drug trafficking corridor in a vehicle that had crossed the U.S.-Mexico border a week earlier and that she slowed and moved over behind the agent after he pulled alongside her vehicle in an unmarked car. "(W)hen the agent pulled alongside defendant, it was his conduct that looked suspicious, not hers." It was also noted that the Customs and Border Protection agent's instinct, even though based on training in "behavior analysis" and experience, was not enough to justify stopping a vehicle and searching it. (People v. Mendoza (2020) 44 Cal.App.5th 1044.)

Exigent circumstances did not justify the suspicionless, investigatory stop of defendant, who was walking calmly in an open field where others were also walking, in the vicinity of an apartment complex from where shots had been heard. The trial court properly granted defendant's motion to suppress a firearm and other evidence. The exigent circumstances doctrine typically involved emergencies justifying a warrantless search of a home, not an investigatory stop of a person, other than when the government isolated a discrete area or group of people in an effort to search for a suspect implicated in a known crime in the vicinity. In the few cases that have applied the exigent circumstances doctrine to justify the suspicionless, investigatory seizure of a person, the officers; (1) had searched for a suspect implicated in a known crime, and in their search for that suspect, (2) had isolated a geographic area with clear boundaries or a discrete group of people to engage in minimally intrusive searches. For example, one line of cases found it reasonable for officers to establish vehicular checkpoints and stop all motorists along routes that they reasonably expected to be used by suspects leaving the scene of a known crime. Beyond the context of vehicular checkpoints, however, courts have similarly required that officers have specific information about the crime and suspect before conducting suspicionless stops of individuals. Defendant's detention, therefore, which led to a patdown and the recovery of a firearm, was held to have been illegal. (United States v. Curry (4th Cir. 2020) 965 F.3rd 313.)

The Ninth Circuit affirmed a criminal judgment in a case in which the district court denied the defendant's motion to suppress evidence, and the defendant entered a conditional guilty plea to being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm. In this case, police detectives detained the defendant after observing a bulge under his sweatshirt that likely indicated a concealed firearm, which is presumptively unlawful to carry in California. Defendant was verbally uncooperative, yelling at the detectives. After defendant's companion was found to be in possession of a firearm, defendant was tased and searched, resulting in the recovery of a firearm in a shoulder holster. The Court held that the district court did not clearly err in crediting the detective's testimony that he observed on the defendant a "very large and obvious bulge" that suggested (in the officer's training and experience) a concealed firearm. The Court further held that reasonable suspicion supported the detention, and that the district court therefore properly denied the defendant's motion to suppress evidence found during the search. (United States v. Bontemps (9th Cir. 2020) 977 F.3rd 909: "In California, evidence that a person is concealing a firearm provides an adequate basis to suspect illegal activity, and thus grounds to initiate a Terry stop." Pg. 914.)

> "That is so 'even if the tip does not state that the person is carrying the firearm illegally or is about to commit a crime.' . . . '[g]iven the insignificant number of concealed carry permits issued in California, a reasonable officer could conclude that there is a high probability that a person identified in a 911 call as carrying a concealed handgun is violating California's gun laws.'" (Ibid., quoting Foster v. City of Indio (9th Cir. 2018) 908 F.3rd 1204, 1215-1216; stop based upon a reliable tip.)

A dissenting justice in Bontemps argued that, without other corroborating evidence, a sweatshirt bulge alone did not give an objectively reasonable and particularized suspicion to stop and detain the defendant. (United States v. Bontemps, supra, at pp. 919-923.)

Officers responded to the 3500 block of 13th Street Southeast in Washington D.C. based upon a "spotfinder" report of shots fired at that location, soon confirmed by persons calling into the Metropolitan Police Department (MPD). No injured persons were found at that location. But defendant was observed walking there, and that he was the only person on that block at the time. He was quickly detained. Found to be in the illegal possession of a firearm, defendant argued that his detention was illegal and that the gun should have been suppressed. The Court disagreed, finding that the officers had a reasonable suspicion to detain him based upon the following: (1) The ShotSpotter alert and dispatcher report from MPD indicating that shots were fired in the 3500 block of 13th Street Southeast; (2) the officers arrived at the location of the reported gunshots within a minute and a half of the MPD call; (3) officers observation of defendant being the only person on that block; (4) defendant was walking quickly away from the location of the shooting; and (5) defendant did not initially respond to an officer's repeated efforts to get his attention and continued to walk away. (United States v. Jones (D.C. Cir. 2021) 1 F.4th 50.)

Upon patting defendant (detained for possible trespass) down for weapons, and finding none, officers seized a car key that was hanging on his belt, and used the fob attached to the key in an attempt to locate a car for which that key belonged. The Ninth Circuit ruled such use of the key fop absent any reasonable suspicion that a car might be related to the purpose of the detention was illegal, requiring the suppression of a firearm (found later to have been used in robbery) as a product of an illegal extension of the detention. Per the Court: "Where a 'protective search goes beyond what is necessary to determine if the suspect is armed, it is no longer valid under Terry and its fruits will be suppressed.'" (United States v. Baker (9th Cir. 2023) 58 F.4th 1109, 1118; quoting Minnesota v. Dickerson (1993) 508 U.S. 366, at p. 373 [113 S.Ct. 2130; 124 L.Ed.2nd 334].)

Denial of defendant's motion to suppress under Fourth Amendment was proper because his answers to officer's questions about why he was at salvage lot at 3:00 a.m. were odd; he claiming to be there waiting until the lot opened so that he could inquire about a stolen car when no such theft had been reported. Under a totality of circumstances analysis, these facts were sufficient to provide officer with reasonable suspicion to conduct a Terry stop. (United States v. Stokes (8th Cir. 2023) 62 F.4th 1104.)

Two Yellowstone Park rangers received information that a park employee had a conversation with an individual by the name of Michael Bullinger, giving the rangers a vehicle description of a white Toyota with Missouri license plates. Bullinger was a fugitive wanted for allegedly shooting and killing three women in Idaho. Rangers found the white Toyota with Missouri plates out of the park and stopped it some 16 miles east of the park entrance. While waiting for county law enforcement, the rangers held the occupants of the white Toyota at gunpoint, instructed the driver, over a loudspeaker, to throw out the keys, and ordered the occupants to place their hands on the ceiling of the vehicle. Once county law enforcement arrived, the rangers ordered the two adult occupants out of the vehicle, handcuffed them, and then placed them in separate police cruisers. The two occupants were subsequently released, however, upon determining that neither of them was Bullinger. Inside the white Toyota was Brett Hemry, along with his wife, Genalyn, and their seven-year-old daughter. The Hemrys sued under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for false arrest, false imprisonment, and excessive force. On appeal, the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the district court's denial of the civil defendant's motion for summary judgement. The court concluded the rangers were entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time of the incident, the law did not clearly establish the investigative detention of Mrs. Hemry amounted to: (1) an arrest of Mrs. Hemry without probable cause; or (2) excessive force against the Hemrys. The court recognized there are "three types of police-citizen encounters: (1) consensual encounters which do not implicate the Fourth Amendment; (2) investigative detentions, or Terry stops, which are Fourth Amendment seizures of limited scope and duration and must be supported by a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity; and (3) arrests, the most intrusive of Fourth Amendment seizures and reasonable only if supported by probable cause." Here, the court found that the rangers had reasonable suspicion to stop Mrs. Hemry. To satisfy the reasonable suspicion standard, court found that "an officer need not rule out the possibility of innocent conduct." Instead, the officer must only maintain a "reasonable suspicion supported by articulable facts that criminal activity may be afoot." In this case, the rangers reasonably suspected they were confronting a fugitive triple-murderer accompanied by an unknown passenger, that could have been a collaborator or a hostage. In addition, the court rejected Mrs. Hemry's claim that the rangers' use of firearms to detain her transformed the investigative detention into an arrest requiring probable cause. The court found that it was reasonable for the rangers to believe they were confronting a fugitive, triple murderer, who was accompanied by an unknown passenger. Although the information the rangers received did not include the presence of an adult passenger, the information also did not indicate that Bullinger travelled alone. In addition, given the matching vehicle and license plate number, the court added that it would have been unreasonable for the rangers to conclude they were free from danger. The court further held that the duration of Mrs. Hemry's detention did not transform the investigative detention into an arrest requiring probable cause. The court recognized that "an officer can detain a suspect without arresting him." However, an officer cannot detain a suspect beyond the time "reasonably needed to effectuate the [purpose of the stop]." The court commented that the reasonableness of the duration of an investigative detention "is not an exercise in counting minutes." Instead, a court must analyze the factual context and the "underlying justification" for the detention. (Hemry v. Ross (10th Cir. 2023) 62 F.4th 1248.)

(See "Traffic Stops," under "Types of Detentions," below.)

Test: Generally, a person is detained if a reasonable person in the suspect's shoes, under the circumstances, would have known that he or she is not free to leave. (People v. Rios (2011) 193 Cal.App.4th 584, 592; People v. Walker (2012) 210 Cal.App.4th 1372, 1382; People v. Parrott (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 485, 492.)

The "reasonable person" test presupposes an innocent person. (United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2021) 996 F.3rd 998, 1005; citing Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, at p. 438 [111 S.Ct. 2382; 115 L.Ed.2nd 389].)

However, courts also consider the reasonableness of the officer's actions, under the circumstances, and may find a detention only, despite the suspect's reasonable belief that he is under arrest. (See People v. Pilster (2006) 138 Cal.App.4th 1395, 1406, below.)

The fact that "an encounter is not a seizure when a reasonable person would feel free to leave do(es) not mean that an encounter is a seizure just because a reasonable person would not feel free to leave." There must be "an intentional acquisition of physical control." A detention occurs "only when there is a governmental termination of freedom of movement through means intentionally applied." (United States v. Nasser (9th Cir. 2009) 555 F.3rd 722; defendant stopped his vehicle on his own even though Border Patrol agents had not intended to stop him. Resulting observations, made before defendant was detained, were lawful.)

A detention is a "seizure" for purposes of the Fourth Amendment, and occurs whenever a law enforcement officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, in some way restrains the liberty of a citizen. (Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, 434 [111 S.Ct. 2382; 115 L.Ed.2nd 389, 398]; People v. Rios, supra.)

(People v. Brown (2015) 61 Cal.4th 968, 974; see also People v. Linn (2015) 241 Cal.App.4th 46.)

> The California Supreme Court in Brown explains the analytical sequence depending upon the circumstances. Citing United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 554 [64 L. Ed.2nd 497], the Court held that a seizure occurs if "in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave." If, however, the circumstances did not allow for the defendant to leave, such as when he is a passenger on a bus (see Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, 434-435 [115 L.Ed.2nd 389, 398-399]) then the test is whether "a reasonable person would feel free to decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter." When the suspect is the passenger in a motor vehicle driven by another which is stopped by police, we must ask whether "any reasonable passenger would have understood the police officers to be exercising control to the point that no one in the car was free to depart without police permission." (Brendlin v. California (2007) 551 U.S. 249, 254-255 [127 S.Ct. 2400; 168 L.Ed.2nd 142].) The Court also compared the circumstances such as described in California v. Hodari D. (1991) 499 U.S. 621 [111 S.Ct. 1547; 113 L.Ed.2nd 690], where it was held that a person who lawfully runs from the police, there being no reasonable suspicion which would have allowed for his detention, a person is not actually detained (thus no Fourth Amendment issue) until he is either physically restrained or submits to an officer's authority to detain him. > The definition of a "seizure" was expanded a bit by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Torres v. Madrid (Mar. 25, 2021) __ U.S. __, __ [141 S.Ct. 989; 209 L.Ed.2nd 190], where the Court ruled that a "seizure" occurs when "(t)he application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure, even if the force does not succeed in subduing the person."
> > The Madrid Court overruled a lower court's holding that a suspect's continued flight after being shot by police negates a Fourth Amendment excessive-force claim.

"A person is seized by the police and thus entitled to challenge the government's action under the Fourth Amendment when the officer 'by means of physical force or show of authority' 'terminates or restrains his freedom of movement.' (Citations)" (Brendlin v. California (2007) 551 U.S. 249 [127 S.Ct. 2400; 168 L.Ed.2nd 132]; People v. Zamudio (2008) 43 Cal.4th 327, 341-342; Nelson v. City of Davis (9th Cir. 2012) 685 F.3rd 867, 875.)

Burden of Proof*:

It is the prosecution's burden to prove "that the warrantless search or seizure was reasonable under the circumstances." (People v. Williams (1999) 20 Cal.4th 119, 130. People v. Thomas (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1107, 1114.)

Factors*:

Factors to consider when determining whether a person has been detained include:

- The number of officers involved.
- Whether weapons were displayed.
- Whether the encounter occurred in a public or nonpublic setting.
- Whether the officers' officious or authoritative manner would imply that compliance would be compelled.
- Whether the offices advised the detainee of his right to terminate the encounter.

(Orhorhaghe v. INS (9th Cir. 1994) 38 F.3rd 488, 494-496; United States v. Washington (9th Cir. 2004) 387 F.3rd 1060, 1068; (United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2009) 563 F.3rd 410, 415; People v. Davidson (2013) 221 Cal.App.4th 966, 972 In re J.G. (2014) 228 Cal.App.4th 402, 409-410; People v. Arebalos-Cabrera (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 179, 186.)

Note: United States v. Brown, supra, is also instructive in how an officer removing some of the above listed factors can convert what appeared to be an arrest back into merely a detention or even a consensual encounter; e.g., putting the firearms away, removing the handcuffs, telling the subject that she was not under arrest, and/or then letting her return to her apartment unaccompanied.

As analyzed by a California state court, the relevant factors also include:

- A threatening police presence;
- The display of a weapon by an officer;
- The physical touching of the citizen approached;
- The officer's language or voice indicating compliance with police demands might be compelled.

(People v. Walker (2012) 210 Cal.App.4th 1372, 1382.)

"The officer's uncommunicated state of mind and the individual citizen's subjective belief are irrelevant in assessing whether a seizure triggering Fourth Amendment scrutiny has occurred." (People v. Arebalos-Cabrera (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 179, 186-187; quoting In re Manuel G. (1997) 16 Cal.4th 805, 821.)

Also, "a police officer's admonition that the driver is 'free to go' is an important factor in the Fourth Amendment analysis. (See, e.g., State v. Green (2003) 375 Md. 595, 618 [826 A.2d 486].) However, because courts must consider the totality of the circumstances in deciding whether a detention has occurred, the presence or absence of this admonition is not determinative if other factors show that a reasonable person would in fact feel free to leave or otherwise terminate the encounter (or not)." (People v. Arebalos-Cabrera, supra, at p. 188.)

Significance of a Suspect's Nervousness*:

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal found a consent search, obtained after the purposes of the traffic stop had been satisfied, was invalid as a product of an illegally prolonged detention, the extended detention being the result of the officer's unnecessary inquiries made during the traffic stop. The defendant's nervousness was held to be irrelevant to the detention issue, per the Court. (United States v. Chavez-Valenzuela (9th Cir. 2001) 268 F.3rd 719, amended at 279 F.3rd 1062.)

"A police officer has a strong need to practice caution and self-protection when on patrol." (People v. Parrott (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 485, 495-496; a patdown for firearms was justified by a nervous suspect's continual touching of a bulge in his sweatshirt and his physical resistance to being detained.)

Handcuffing a detained suspect based upon defendant's size (6 foot, 250 pounds), the fact that he was "real nervous," and because he began to tense up as if he were about to resist, handcuffing him was held to be reasonable. (People v. Osborne (2009) 175 Cal.App.4th 1052, 1062.)

Stopping defendant for a simple traffic violation (i.e., following too close), and while discussing the violation, the officer began to make inquiries into the defendant's travel plans. During these inquires, the officer became suspicious (defendant's nervousness, inconsistent and evasive answers, etc.) as to whether defendant was telling the truth. This eventually led to the use of a drug-sniffing dog and the discovery of methamphetamine and heroin. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeal ruled that travel-plan questions are routine inquires that reasonably relate to the underlying traffic violation and roadway safety. As such, such questions ordinarily fall within "the mission of a traffic stop." First, the court found that travel-plan questions provide important context for the violation at hand. Also, a driver's travel plans may affect an officer's assessment of roadway safety concerns beyond the immediate violation. Finally, the court cautioned that an officer's travel-plan questions, like the officer's other actions during the stop, must remain reasonable based on the totality of the circumstances surrounding the stop. Applying these principles the Court held that the trooper's travel-plan questions during the initial roadside detention fell within the mission of the traffic stop and did not unlawfully prolong the traffic stop. It was only after defendant provided evasive, confusing, inconsistent, and improbable answers to some of these questions, while appearing nervous, that the trooper asked follow-up questions. Under these circumstances, the court held that the trooper's travel-plan questions were reasonable and not just a "fishing expedition." The Court then held that based upon this, while also being told by dispatch that defendant has three prior drug-transportation convictions, it was less than nine minutes into the stop that the trooper developed a reasonable suspicion that defendant was involved in criminal activity. As a result, the trooper had a lawful basis to prolong the duration of the stop in order to conduct a dog-sniff of defendant's vehicle. (United States v. Cole (7th Cir. 2021) 21 F.4th 421.)

A "knock and talk" at the defendant's motel room justified the eventual detention of defendant when (1) the officers had some limited information from an earlier traffic stop that defendant might be involved in the manufacturing of methamphetamine, including the presence of a pressure cooker which the officer knew could be used in the manufacturing of methamphetamine; (2) a roommate took a full two minutes to open the motel room door while the officers could hear noises like people moving things around inside; (3) when defendant was contacted, he acted extremely nervous, contrary to how he had acted during a previous contact by the same officers; and (4) the roommate admitted to being a methamphetamine user and that other people had visited the room the night before. (United States v. Crapser (9th Cir. 2007) 472 F.3rd 1141, 1147-1149.)

A traffic stop was held to have been unlawfully prolonged where the officer's body camera did not show that defendant was acting any more nervously than a typical person in a traffic stop. The officer conceded on cross-examination that: "Most people are nervous when they are pulled over by the police." (People v. Ayon (2022) 80 Cal.App.5th 926, 937-941.)

Significance of a Suspect Believed to be Carrying a Firearm*: An officer's reasonable suspicion to believe that a person might be carrying a firearm is, by itself, sufficient for the officer to believe that he might be doing so illegally, justifying a stop and detention, at least in California.

Given the insignificant number of concealed carry permits issued in California, a reasonable officer could conclude that there is a high probability that a person identified in a 911 call as carrying a concealed handgun is violating California's gun laws." (Foster v. City of Indio (9th Cir. 2018) 908 F.3rd 1204, 1215-1216; stop based upon a reliable tip.)

A bar employee (who later fully identified himself) calling 911 to report that three separate customers observed defendant in possession of a firearm, and then described for the 911 operator the movements of defendant as he fled in a particularly described vehicle, held to be of sufficient reliability to supply the necessary reasonable suspicion justifying the stopping of that vehicle. (United States v. Vandergroen (9th Cir. 2020) 964 F.3rd 876, 879-882.)

The Court noted that carrying a gun is not presumptively illegal in all states, citing Washington State (at p. 881) as one of those states where carrying a gun is presumptively legal. (See United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2019) 925 F.3rd 1150, 1154.)

The Ninth Circuit affirmed a criminal judgment in a case in which the district court denied the defendant's motion to suppress evidence, and the defendant entered a conditional guilty plea to being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm. In this case, Police Detectives detained the defendant after observing a bulge under his sweatshirt that likely indicated a concealed firearm, which is presumptively unlawful to carry in California. Defendant was verbally uncooperative, yelling at the detectives. After defendant's companion was found to be in possession of a firearm, defendant was tased and searched, resulting in the recovery of a firearm in a shoulder holster. The Court held that the district court did not clearly err in crediting the detective's testimony that he observed on the defendant a "very large and obvious bulge" that suggested (in the officer's training and experience) a concealed firearm. The Court further held that reasonable suspicion supported the stop, and that the district court therefore properly denied the defendant's motion to suppress evidence found during the search. A dissenting justice argued that, without other corroborating evidence, a sweatshirt bulge alone did not give an objectively reasonable and particularized suspicion to stop and detain the defendant. (United States v. Bontemps (9th Cir. 2020) 977 F.3rd 909.)

The Court in Bontemps, at p. 915, cites the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977) 434 U.S. 106, 111-112 [98 S.Ct. 330; 54 L.Ed.2nd 331], where the High Court noted that; "(t)he bulge in the jacket permitted the officer to conclude that Mimms was armed and thus posed a serious and present danger to the safety of the officer. In these circumstances, any man of 'reasonable caution' would likely have conducted the 'pat-down.'"

The Court in Bontemps also cites at pg. 914 United States v. Flatter (9th Cir. 2006) 456 F.3rd 1154, 1157, for the argument that observing a visible bulge in a person's clothing indicates the presence of a weapon. See also United States v. Alvarez (9th Cir. 1990) 899 F.2nd 833, 835, 839; United States v. Allen (9th Cir. 1980) 675 F.2nd 1373, 1383; and United States v. Hill (9th Cir. 1976) 545 F.2nd 1191, 1193.)

Also: "Considerations relevant to this inquiry typically include visible bulges or baggy clothing that suggest a hidden weapon; sudden movements or attempts to reach for an object that is not immediately visible; evasive and deceptive responses to an officer's questions about what the individual was doing; and unnatural hand postures that suggest an effort to conceal a weapon." (Italics added: In re Jeremiah S. (2019)

41 Cal.App.5th 299, 305, citing Thomas v. Dillard (9th Cir. 2016) 818 F.3rd 864, at p. 877.)

But note that the Court in Bontemps also indicates that an officer, based upon his training and experience, must be able to honestly testify that the particular bulge he observed could have been a firearm or other weapon, as opposed to something else, such as drugs or drug paraphernalia. (Id., at p. 916; citing United States v. Job (9th Cir. 2017 871 F.3rd 852, 861; United States v. Jones (8th Cir. 2001) 254 F.3rd 692; and United States v. Eustaqui*o* (8th Cir. 1999) 198 F.3rd 1068.)

Even in a jurisdiction where carrying a firearm in the open (i.e., "open carry") is lawful, such as West Virginia, observation of a person carrying a legal assault weapon, when combined with "something more," justifies a temporary detention for investigation so that the officers can determine whether the person is in violation of the law. That "something more" was found where the plaintiff in this lawsuit appeared to possibly be under age (he was determined to be 24 years of age), he was walking (rather than driving) towards, and within a mile of, a school, he was carrying an AR-15 assault rifle (known to be the firearm of choice for many mass shooters), and plaintiff was dressed to look like a soldier in a black sleeveless shirt and camouflage pants. In combination, these factors justified plaintiff's temporary detention for investigation. (Walker v. Donahoe (4th Cir. 2021) 3 F.4th 676.)

On Appeal*:

On appeal, an appellate court reviews reasonable suspicion determinations *de novo. (United States v. Raygoza-Garcia (9th Cir. 2018) 902 F.3rd 994, 999; citing United States v. Valdes-Vega (9th Cir. 2013) 738 F.3rd 1074, 1077).

An appellate court reviews a district court's finding of facts for clear error, giving "due weight" to the trial court's and officer's inferences drawn from those facts, deferring to the inferences drawn by the district court and the officers on the scene, not just the district court's factual findings. (United States v. Raygoza-Garcia, supra, citing United States v. Arvizu (2002) 534 U.S. 266, 278 [122 S. Ct. 744; 151 L.Ed.2nd 740].)

"'[T]o reverse a district court's factual findings as clearly erroneous, we must determine that the district court's factual findings were illogical, implausible, or without support in the record.' United States v. Spangle, 626 F.3rd 488, 497 (9th Cir. 2010) (citing United States v. Hinkson, 585 F.3rd 1247, 1262 (9th Cir. 2009) (en banc)). Moreover, '[w]here testimony is taken, we give special deference to the district court's credibility determinations,' United States v. Craighead, 539 F.3rd 1073, 1082 (9th Cir. 2008), and generally 'cannot substitute [our] own judgment of the credibility of a witness for that of the fact-finder.' United States v. Durham, 464 F.3rd 976, 983 n.11 (9th Cir. 2006).) (United States v. Bontemps (9th Cir. 2020) 977 F.3rd 909, 917.)

Patdown* (or "Frisks") for Weapons During a Detention:

Rule: "In the event that, during the Terry stop, the officer justifiably believes that 'the individual whose suspicious behavior he is investigating at close range is armed and presently dangerous to the officer or to others,' the officer 'may conduct a patdown search' or frisk 'to determine whether the person is in fact carrying a weapon.'" (United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2021) 996 F.3rd 998, 1004, quoting Minnesota v. Dickerson (1993) 508 U.S. 366, at p. 373 [113 S.Ct. 2130; 124 L.Ed.2nd 334], which in turn quotes Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1, at p. 24 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889]).

> Further noting that, "'(e)ach element, the stop and the frisk, must be analyzed separately; the reasonableness of each must be independently determined.'" (Ibid., quoting United States v. Thomas (9th Cir 1988) 863 F.2nd 622, 628.)

A "Stop and Frisk" (where a patdown for weapons is conducted during a detention) is constitutionally permissible if two conditions are met:

- The investigatory stop must be lawful; i.e., when a police officer reasonably suspects that the person apprehended is committing or has committed a criminal offense.

- The police officer must reasonably suspect that the person stopped is armed and dangerous.

  (Arizona v. Johnson (2009) 555 U.S. 323 [129 S.Ct. 781; 172 L.Ed.2nd 694].)

Case Law:

> "A police officer has a strong need to practice caution and self-protection when on patrol." (People v. Parrott (2017) 10 Cal.App.5th 485, 495-496; a patdown for firearms was justified by a nervous suspect's continual touching of a bulge in his sweatshirt and his physical resistance to being detained.)

Officer Safety*:

The plight of police officers and the dangers they face on the streets are not lost on the courts:

> "(E)ven when a police officer is careful, he is still subject to attack. The judiciary should not 'lightly second guess' an officer's decision to conduct a 'stop and frisk . . . . (P)olice officers (are) entitled to protect themselves during a detention: 'This is a rule of necessity to which a right even as basic as that of privacy must bow. To rule otherwise would be inhumanely to add another hazard to an already very dangerous occupation. Our zeal to fend off encroachments upon the right of privacy must be tempered by remembrance that ours is a government of laws, to preserve which we require law enforcement—live ones. Without becoming a police state, we may still protect the policeman's status.' [Citation omitted]" (In re Richard G. (2009) 173 Cal.App.4th 1252, 1255.)

"(L)aw enforcement officers may lawfully detain a defendant when detention is necessary to determine the defendant's connection with the subject of a search warrant and related to the need of ensuring officer safety." (People v. Steele (2016) 246 Cal.App.4th 1110, 1116-1117; recognizing "officer safety" as "a weighty public interest," and citing People v. Glaser (1995) 11 Cal.4th 354, 365.)

> Glaser involved the temporary detention of the defendant by putting him on the ground and handcuffing him when he suddenly showed up at a residence that the officers were just about to enter to execute a search warrant. The detention was upheld as necessary for officer safety under the circumstances.
> Steele involved the defendant's detention when he was driving a second vehicle that was caught between the officers' vehicle and another car that the officers were attempting to stop late at night in a dimly lit area. Finding that defendant had been detained, the detention was upheld for officer safety reasons.

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that for officer safety purposes, passengers in a lawfully stopped vehicle may be ordered to exit the vehicle. Passengers, by virtual of merely being present in a lawfully stopped vehicle, are detained. If anything, the need to protect the safety of the officers is even greater when he must deal with more than just a lone driver. (Maryland v. Wilson (1997) 519 U.S. 408 [117 S.Ct. 882; 137 L.Ed.2nd 41]; see also Ruvalcata v. City of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 1995) 64 F.3rd 1323.)

> Blocking a vehicle in, in which defendant was a passenger, with two police cars constitutes sufficient "show of authority" to deem defendant to have been detained. (United States v. Hester (3rd Cir. NJ 2018) 910 F.3rd 78; the Court ruling that the detention was lawful given the suspicious circumstances of being parked illegal outside a liquor store where the officers knew drug dealing to be common. See also People v. Wilkins (1986) 186 Cal.App.3rd 804, 809.)

An occupant of a house being subjected to a search pursuant to a search warrant may be detained during the search (1) in order to prevent flight, (2) to minimize the risk of harm to the officers, and (3) to facilitate an orderly search through cooperation of the residents. (Michigan v. Summers (1981) 452 U.S. 692, 702-703 [101 S.Ct. 2587; 69 L.Ed.2nd 340].)

This includes those who otherwise are not necessarily involved in the suspected criminal activity. (Bailey v. United States (2013) 568 U.S. 186, 192-202 [133 S.Ct. 1031, 1037-1043; 185 L.Ed.2nd 19]; citing Muehler v. Mena (2005) 544 U.S. 93 [125 S.Ct. 1465; 161 L.Ed.2nd 299].)

However, it has been held that "(c)onducting a Summers seizure incident to the execution of a warrant is not the Government's right; it is an exception—justified by necessity—to a rule that would otherwise render the [seizure] unlawful." (Bailey v. United States (2013) 568 U.S. 186, 204 [133 S.Ct. 1031; 185 L.Ed.2nd 19], restricting such detentions to occupants who are still in the "immediate vicinity" of the residence being searched. See also United States v. Ramirez (9th Cir. 2020) 976 F.3rd 946, 956; finding unlawful an FBI ruse, tricking defendant into returning to his residence with his vehicle so that he could be detained and questioned and his vehicle could be searched pursuant to a search warrant.)

The Ninth Circuit has ruled that the rule of Summers does not apply to the execution of an arrest warrant. (Sharp v. County of Orange (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 901, 912-916.)

California disagrees. (People v. Hannah (1997) 51 Cal.App.4th 1335.) The Eleventh Circuit also disagrees. (United States v. Mastin (11th Cir. AL. 2020) 972 F.3rd 1230.)

Also, the rule of Summers cannot be used as an excuse for the mass detention and interrogation of suspected illegal aliens at a factory when the ruse used to gain access to the factory and the suspects was a search warrant for employment documents. (Cruz v. Barr (9th Cir. 2019) 926 F.3rd 1128.)

With a search warrant authorizing the search of plaintiff's home, officers "had categorical authority" to detain her for the duration of the search. "The reasons for such a detention are particularly applicable in the context of a narcotics search because there is a heightened risk that an occupant could destroy evidence." So long as probable cause existed to continue searching the residence, the officers' authority to detain the plaintiff pursuant to that search was never extinguished. Old age (74, in this case) does not make a detention per se unreasonable. Further, plaintiff in this case was never handcuffed, but merely held away from her residence in a patrol car for no more than an hour; circumstances the Court found to be reasonable. (Blight v. City of Manteca (9th Cir. 2019) 944 F.3rd 1061, 1068-1068.)

Two subjects sitting in a vehicle within sight of the home of a suspected bank robber when a victim in the robbery had been shot, and with an unknown accomplice still outstanding, and after having watched the suspected bank robber twice come out of his house and contact the occupants of that vehicle earlier, was held to be sufficient, under Summers, upon the execution of a search warrant on the residence, to block the vehicle in, thus detaining the occupants of the vehicle. (United States v. Freeman (8th Cir. 2020) 964 F.3rd 774.)

Detention Without a Reasonable Suspicion*: In some instances, a person may be lawfully detained even though there is no reasonable suspicion to believe that he, himself, is involved in criminal activity.

See "Officer Safety," Above.

The United States Supreme Court has held that at least in a private motor vehicle (as opposed to a taxi, bus, or other common carrier), the passenger, by virtue of merely being in a vehicle stopped for a possible traffic infraction, is in fact detained, giving him the right to challenge the legality of the traffic stop. (Brendlin v. California (2007) 551 U.S. 249 [127 S.Ct. 2400; 168 L.Ed.2nd 132].)

The test is whether, "in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave." Or, in the case where the person has no desire to leave, "whether 'a reasonable person would feel free to decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter.'" (Id., 127 S.Ct., at pp. 2405-2406.)

If the driver is stopped for a traffic-related offense, a "passenger will expect to be subject to some scrutiny, and his attempt to leave the scene would be so obviously likely to prompt an objection from the officer that no passenger would feel free to leave in the first place." If the driver is stopped for something unrelated to his driving, a "passenger will reasonably feel subject to suspicion owning to close association" with the driver. (Id., 127 S.Ct., at p. 2407.)

Although Brendlin, on its face, appears to deal only with the right (i.e., "standing") of the passenger to challenge the legality of the traffic stop (Brendlin v. California, supra., at pp. 256-259.), and arguably was not intended as authority for the continued detention of a passenger who might choose to walk away, the U.S. Supreme Court subsequently ruled quite clearly that "(t)he police need not have, in addition, cause to believe any occupant of the (lawfully stopped) vehicle is involved in criminal activity" to justify a continued detention for the duration of the traffic stop. (Arizona v. Johnson (2009) 555 U.S. 323 [129 S.Ct. 781; 172 L.Ed.2nd 694].)

> Also; "The temporary seizure of driver and passengers ordinarily continues, and remains reasonable, for the duration of the stop." (Id., at p. 325.)
> And then: "(A) traffic stop of a car communicates to a reasonable passenger that he or she is not free to terminate the encounter with the police and move about at will." (Ibid.)

The California Supreme Court is in apparent agreement with this interpretation, holding that upon ordering the passenger out of the vehicle; "there is a social expectation of unquestioned police command, which is at odds with any notion that a passenger would feel free to leave without advance permission." (People v. Hoyos (2007) 41 Cal.4th 872, 892-894; brief, one-minute detention, necessitated for purposes of officer safety, held to be lawful.)

Blocking a vehicle in, in which defendant was a passenger, with two police cars, constitutes sufficient "show of authority" to deem defendant to have been detained. (United States v. Hester (3rd Cir. NJ 2018) 910 F.3rd 78; the Court ruling that the detention was lawful given the suspicious circumstances of being parked illegal outside a liquor store where the officers knew drug dealing to be common.)

> See "Show of Authority," above.

See also People v. Wilkins (1986) 186 Cal.App.3rd 804, 809: A detention occurred when the officer in a marked patrol car parked diagonally behind defendant's vehicle so it could not exit the parking lot.

In People v. Steele (2016) 246 Cal.App.4th 1110, defendant's detention was upheld when he was driving a second vehicle that was caught between the officers' vehicle and another car that the officers were attempting to lawfully stop late at night in a dimly lit area. Finding that defendant had been detained, the detention was upheld for officer safety reasons despite the lack of any reasonable suspicion to believe that defendant himself was engaged in any criminal activity (at least until the odor of marijuana was noticed coming from defendant's car).

The Court in Steele (supra, at p. 1118) cited the Colorado Supreme Court case of People v. Taylor (Colo. 2002) 41 P.3rd 681, where the Colorado High Court balanced the interests of the government and the defendant and did not require the government to demonstrate reasonable suspicion to stop the defendant. In Taylor, an officer stopped the vehicle the defendant was driving in order to arrest the defendant's passenger, for whom there were arrest warrants. The defendant did not commit a traffic violation, did not exhibit aberrant behavior, and the officer did not suspect that the defendant was engaged in criminal wrongdoing. The court in Taylor said that although the officer had seized the defendant within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, the seizure was not an arrest or an investigatory stop. According to the Court, the circumstances presented "one of those rare situations . . . "in which the balance of interests precludes insistence upon some quantum of individualized suspicion" that defendant is engaged in criminal activity to justify a seizure."

Defendant as the passenger in a vehicle where the driver was being arrested on warrants was upheld on the theory that an officer may detain the passengers as well as the driver while a traffic stop is ongoing. (United States v. Yancey (7th Cir. IL 2019) 928 F.3rd 627.)

Racial Profiling and Implicit Bias*:

Statutory Provisions*: California has sought to prevent racial and identity profiling through mandated written guidelines, training, and extensive reporting requirements on the details of all detentions and arrests.

Gov't. Code § 12525.5: The Racial and Identity Profiling Act of 2015 (Amended Stats 2022 (AB 2773), effective January 1, 2023, operative January 1, 2024.):

(1) Each state and local agency that employs peace officers shall annually report to the Attorney General data on all stops conducted by that agency's peace officers for the preceding calendar year.

(2) Each agency that employs 1,000 or more peace officers shall begin collecting data on or before July 1, 2018, and shall issue its first round of reports on or before April 1, 2019. Each agency that employs 667 or more but less than 1,000 peace officers shall begin collecting data on or before January 1, 2019, and shall issue its first round of reports on or before April 1, 2020. Each agency that employs 334 or more but less than 667 peace officers shall begin collecting data on or before January 1, 2021, and shall issue its first round of reports on or before April 1, 2022. Each agency that employs 1 or more but less than 334 peace officers shall begin collecting data on or before January 1, 2022, and shall issue its first round of reports on or before April 1, 2023.

(b) The reporting shall include, at a minimum, the following information for each pedestrian, traffic, or any other type of stop:

(1) The time, date, and location of the stop.

(2) The reason for the stop.

(3) The reason given to the person stopped at the time of the stop.

(4) The result of the stop, such as, no action, warning, citation, property seizure, or arrest.

(5) If a warning or citation was issued, the warning provided or violation cited.

(6) If an arrest was made, the offense charged.

(7) The perceived race or ethnicity, gender, and approximate age of the person stopped, provided that the identification of these characteristics shall be based on the observation and perception of the peace officer making the stop, and the information shall not be requested from the person stopped. For motor vehicle stops, this paragraph only applies to the driver, unless any actions specified under paragraph (8) apply in relation to a passenger, in which case the characteristics specified in this paragraph shall also be reported for that passenger.

(8) Actions taken by the peace officer during the stop, including, but not limited to, the following:

(A) Whether the peace officer asked for consent to search the person, and, if so, whether consent was provided.

(B) Whether the peace officer searched the person or any property, and, if so, the basis for the search and the type of contraband or evidence discovered, if any.

(C) Whether the peace officer seized any property and, if so, the type of property that was seized and the basis for seizing the property.

(c) If more than one peace officer performs a stop, only one officer is required to collect and report to the officer's agency the information specified under subdivision (b).

(d) State and local law enforcement agencies shall not report the name, address, social security number, or other unique personal identifying information of persons stopped, searched, or subjected to a property seizure, for purposes of this section. Notwithstanding any other law, the data reported shall be available to the public, except for the badge number or other unique identifying information of the peace officer involved. Law enforcement agencies are solely responsible for ensuring that personally identifiable information of the individual stopped or any other information that is exempt from disclosure pursuant to this section is not transmitted to the Attorney General in an open text field.

(e) Not later than January 1, 2018, the Attorney General, in consultation with stakeholders, including the Racial and Identity Profiling Advisory Board (RIPA) established pursuant to paragraph (1) of subdivision (j) of Section 13519.4 of the Penal Code, federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies and community, professional, academic, research, and civil and human rights organizations, shall issue regulations for the collection and reporting of data required under subdivision (b). The regulations shall specify all data to be reported, and provide standards, definitions, and technical specifications to ensure uniform reporting practices across all reporting agencies. To the best extent possible, the regulations should be compatible with any similar federal data collection or reporting program.

(f) All data and reports made pursuant to this section are public records within the meaning of Section 7920.530 and are open to public inspection pursuant to Sections 7922.500 to 7922.545, inclusive, 7923.000, and 7923.005.

(g)

(1) For purposes of this section, "peace officer," as defined in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code, is limited to members of the California Highway Patrol, a city or county law enforcement agency, and California state or university educational institutions. "Peace officer," as used in this section, does not include probation officers and officers in a custodial setting.

(2) For purposes of this section, "stop" means any detention by a peace officer of a person, or any peace officer interaction with a person in which the peace officer conducts a search, including a consensual search, of the person's body or property in the person's possession or control.

(h) This section shall become operative on January 1, 2024.

Pen. Code § 13012: Contents of Information on "Open Justice Web Portal:"

Subd. (a)(5)(A)(iii): Civilian complaints alleging racial or identity profiling, as defined in subdivision (e) of Section 13519.4. These statistics shall be disaggregated by the specific type of racial or identity profiling alleged, including, but not limited to, based on a consideration of race, color, ethnicity, national origin, religion, gender identity or expression, sexual orientation, or mental or physical disability.

Subd. (c): Each year, on an annual basis, the racial and Identity Profiling Advisory Board (RIPA), established pursuant to paragraph (1) of subdivision (j) of Section 13519.4, shall analyze the statistics reported pursuant to subparagraphs (A) and (B) of paragraph (5) of subdivision (a) of this section. RIPA's analysis of the complaints shall be incorporated into its annual report as required by paragraph (3) of subdivision (j) of Section 13519.4 and shall be published on the "OpenJustice Web portal." The reports shall not disclose the identity of peace officers.

Pen. Code § 745: The California Racial Justice Act of 2020 (as amended by AB 1118; effective Jan. 1, 2024):

(a) The state shall not seek or obtain a criminal conviction or seek, obtain, or impose a sentence on the basis of race, ethnicity, or national origin. A violation is established if the defendant proves, by a preponderance of the evidence, any of the following:

(1) The judge, an attorney in the case, a law enforcement officer involved in the case, an expert witness, or juror exhibited bias or animus towards the defendant because of the defendant's race, ethnicity, or national origin.

(2) During the defendant's trial, in court and during the proceedings, the judge, an attorney in the case, a law enforcement officer involved in the case, an expert witness, or juror, used racially discriminatory language about the defendant's race, ethnicity, or national origin, or otherwise exhibited bias or animus towards the defendant because of the defendant's race, ethnicity, or national origin, whether or not purposeful. This paragraph does not apply if the person speaking is relating language used by another that is relevant to the case or if the person speaking is giving a racially neutral and unbiased physical description of the suspect.

(3) The defendant was charged or convicted of a more serious offense than defendants of other races, ethnicities, or national origins who have engaged in similar conduct and are similarly situated, and the evidence establishes that the prosecution more frequently sought or obtained convictions for more serious offenses against people who share the defendant's race, ethnicity, or national origin in the county where the convictions were sought or obtained.

(A) A longer or more severe sentence was imposed on the defendant than was imposed on other similarly situated individuals convicted of the same offense, and longer or more severe sentences were more frequently imposed for that offense on people that share the defendant's race, ethnicity, or national origin than on defendants of other races, ethnicities, or national origins in the county where the sentence was imposed.

(B) A longer or more severe sentence was imposed on the defendant than was imposed on other similarly situated individuals convicted of the same offense, and longer or more severe sentences were more frequently imposed for the same offense on defendants in cases with victims of one race, ethnicity, or national origin than in cases with victims of other races, ethnicities, or national origins, in the county where the sentence was imposed.

(b) A defendant may file a motion pursuant to this section, or a petition for writ of habeas corpus or a motion under Section 1473.7, in a court of competent jurisdiction, alleging a violation of subdivision (a). For claims based on the trial record, a defendant may raise a claim alleging a violation of subdivision (a) on direct appeal from the conviction or sentence. The defendant may also move to stay the appeal and request remand to the superior court to file a motion pursuant to this section. If the motion is based in whole or in part on conduct or statements by the judge, the judge shall disqualify themselves from any further proceedings under this section.

(c) If a motion is filed in the trial court and the defendant makes a prima facie showing of a violation of subdivision (a), the trial court shall hold a hearing. A motion made at trial shall be made as soon as practicable upon the defendant learning of the alleged violation. A motion that is not timely may be deemed waived, in the discretion of the court.

> (1) At the hearing, evidence may be presented by either party, including, but not limited to, statistical evidence, aggregate data, expert testimony, and the sworn testimony of witnesses. The court may also appoint an independent expert. For the purpose of a motion and hearing under this section, out-of-court statements that the court finds trustworthy and reliable, statistical evidence, and aggregated data are admissible for the limited purpose of determining whether a violation of subdivision (a) has occurred.
> (2) The defendant shall have the burden of proving a violation of subdivision (a) by a preponderance of the evidence. The defendant does not need to prove intentional discrimination.
> (3) At the conclusion of the hearing, the court shall make findings on the record.

(d) A defendant may file a motion requesting disclosure to the defense of all evidence relevant to a potential violation of subdivision (a) in the possession or control of the state. A motion filed under this section shall describe the type of records or information the defendant seeks. Upon a showing of good cause, the court shall order the records to be released. Upon a showing of good cause, and in order to protect a privacy right or privilege, the court may permit the prosecution to redact information prior to disclosure or may subject disclosure to a protective order. If a statutory privilege or constitutional privacy right cannot be adequately protected by redaction or a protective order, the court shall not order the release of the records.

(e) Notwithstanding any other law, except as provided in subdivision (k), or for an initiative approved by the voters, if the court finds, by a preponderance of evidence, a violation of subdivision (a), the court shall impose a remedy specific to the violation found from the following list:

> (1) Before a judgment has been entered, the court may impose any of the following remedies:
>
> > (A) Declare a mistrial, if requested by the defendant.

(B) Discharge the jury panel and empanel a new jury.

(C) If the court determines that it would be in the interest of justice, dismiss enhancements, special circumstances, or special allegations, or reduce one or more charges.

(A) After a judgment has been entered, if the court finds that a conviction was sought or obtained in violation of subdivision (a), the court shall vacate the conviction and sentence, find that it is legally invalid, and order new proceedings consistent with subdivision (a). If the court finds that the only violation of subdivision (a) that occurred is based on paragraph (3) of subdivision (a), the court may modify the judgment to a lesser included or lesser related offense. On resentencing, the court shall not impose a new sentence greater than that previously imposed.

(B) After a judgment has been entered, if the court finds that only the sentence was sought, obtained, or imposed in violation of subdivision (a), the court shall vacate the sentence, find that it is legally invalid, and impose a new sentence. On resentencing, the court shall not impose a new sentence greater than that previously imposed.

(3) When the court finds there has been a violation of subdivision (a), the defendant shall not be eligible for the death penalty.

(4) The remedies available under this section do not foreclose any other remedies available under the United States Constitution, the California Constitution, or any other law.

(f) This section also applies to adjudications and dispositions in the juvenile delinquency system and adjudications to transfer a juvenile case to adult court.

(g) This section shall not prevent the prosecution of hate crimes pursuant to Sections 422.6 to 422.865, inclusive.

(h) As used in this section, the following definitions apply:

(1) "More frequently sought or obtained" or "more frequently imposed" means that the totality of the evidence demonstrates a significant difference in seeking or obtaining convictions or in imposing sentences comparing individuals who have engaged in similar conduct and are similarly situated, and the prosecution cannot establish race-neutral reasons for the disparity. The evidence may include statistical evidence, aggregate data, or nonstatistical evidence. Statistical significance is a factor the court may consider, but is not necessary to establish a significant difference. In evaluating the totality of the evidence, the court shall consider whether systemic and institutional racial bias, racial profiling, and historical patterns of racially biased policing and prosecution may have contributed to, or caused differences observed in, the data or impacted the availability of data overall. Race-neutral reasons shall be relevant factors to charges, convictions, and sentences that are not influenced by implicit, systemic, or institutional bias based on race, ethnicity, or national origin.

(2) "Prima facie showing" means that the defendant produces facts that, if true, establish that there is a substantial likelihood that a violation of subdivision (a) occurred. For purposes of this section, a "substantial likelihood" requires more than a mere possibility, but less than a standard of more likely than not.

(3) "Relevant factors," as that phrase applies to sentencing, means the factors in the California Rules of Court that pertain to sentencing decisions and any additional factors required to or permitted to be considered in sentencing under state law and under the state and federal constitutions.

(4) "Racially discriminatory language" means language that, to an objective observer, explicitly or implicitly appeals to racial bias, including, but not limited to, racially charged or racially coded language, language that compares the defendant to an animal, or language that references the defendant's physical appearance, culture, ethnicity, or national origin. Evidence that particular words or images are used exclusively or disproportionately in cases where the defendant is of a specific race, ethnicity, or national origin is relevant to determining whether language is discriminatory.

(5) "State" includes the Attorney General, a district attorney, or a city prosecutor.

(6) "Similarly situated" means that factors that are relevant in charging and sentencing are similar and do not require that all individuals in the comparison group are identical. A defendant's conviction history may be a relevant factor to the severity of the charges, convictions, or sentences. If it is a relevant factor and the defense produces evidence that the conviction history may have been impacted by racial profiling or historical patterns of racially biased policing, the court shall consider the evidence.

(i) A defendant may share a race, ethnicity, or national origin with more than one group. A defendant may aggregate data among groups to demonstrate a violation of subdivision (a).

(j) This section applies as follows:

(1) To all cases in which judgment is not final.

(2) Commencing January 1, 2023, to all cases in which, at the time of the filing of a petition pursuant to subdivision (f) of Section 1473 raising a claim under this section, the petitioner is sentenced to death or to cases in which the motion is filed pursuant to Section 1473.7 because of actual or potential immigration consequences related to the conviction or sentence, regardless of when the judgment or disposition became final.

(3) Commencing January 1, 2024, to all cases in which, at the time of the filing of a petition pursuant to subdivision (f) of Section 1473 raising a claim under this section, the petitioner is currently serving a sentence in the state prison or in a county jail pursuant to subdivision (h) of Section 1170, or committed to the Division of Juvenile Justice for a juvenile disposition, regardless of when the judgment or disposition became final.

(4) Commencing January 1, 2025, to all cases filed pursuant to Section 1473.7 or subdivision (f) of Section 1473 in which judgment became final for a felony conviction or juvenile disposition that resulted in a commitment to the Division of Juvenile Justice on or after January 1, 2015.

(5) Commencing January 1, 2026, to all cases filed pursuant to Section 1473.7 or subdivision (f) of Section 1473 in which judgment was for a felony conviction or juvenile disposition that resulted in a commitment to the Division of Juvenile Justice, regardless of when the judgment or disposition became final.

(k) For petitions that are filed in cases for which judgment was entered before January 1, 2021, and only in those cases, if the petition is based on a violation of paragraph (1) or (2) of subdivision (a), the petitioner shall be entitled to relief as provided in subdivision (e), unless the state proves beyond a reasonable doubt that the violation did not contribute to the judgment.

Note: Pen. Code §§ 1473 and 1473.7 add (1) grounds for permitting a writ of habeas corpus for a judgment entered on or after January 1, 2021, on the grounds that a criminal conviction or sentence was sought, obtained, or imposed in violation of new Pen Code § 745, and (2) to the list of circumstances permitting a defendant who is no longer in criminal custody to file a motion to vacate a conviction or sentence obtained in violation of new Pen Code § 745, respectively.

Case Law:

Denial of a discovery motion under Pen. Code,§ 745(d) of the California Racial Justice Act of 2020 was not supported where defendant argued that good cause for discovery was established because he was black, studies in California have shown black drivers were more likely to be stopped by police than any other racial group, and the circumstances suggested the underlying traffic stop was racially motivated. (Young v. Superior Court (2022) 79 Cal.App.5th 138; case remanded for a weighing of various factors related to whether the defendant is entitled to extensive discovery relevant to the issue of whether he was stopped, arrested, and charged in state court with possession of Ecstasy for sale.)

The factors to be considered include:

(1) Whether the material requested is adequately described;

(2) Whether the requested material is reasonably available to the governmental entity from which it is sought (and not readily available to the defendant from other sources);

(3) Whether production of the records containing the requested information would violate (i) third party confidentiality or privacy rights or (ii) any protected governmental interest;

(4) Whether the defendant has acted in a timely manner;

(5) Whether the time required to produce the requested information will necessitate an unreasonable delay of defendant's trial; and

(6) Whether the production of the records containing the requested information would place an unreasonable burden on the governmental entity involved. (Id., at pp. 144-145.)

The People charged petitioner with several firearm possession crimes after police discovered a handgun during a search of his car. Petitioner filed a motion under the California Racial Justice Act of 2020 (the Racial Justice Act; Pen. Code § 745), claiming that police stopped and searched his car because of his race. The trial court concluded that petitioner did not establish a prima facie violation of the Racial Justice Act and denied his motion. Petitioner challenged the trial court's ruling by filing a petition for writ of mandate in the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal issued a peremptory writ of mandate. In denying petitioner's motion, the trial court did not apply the correct legal standard at the prima facie stage. The trial court's review of petitioner's motion went beyond the confines of determining whether it stated a prima facie case. The trial court's statements during the hearing on petitioner's motion demonstrated that it weighed all the evidence presented during the earlier preliminary hearing—both favorable and unfavorable to petitioner's motion—rather than focusing on and accepting as true the evidence that supported petitioner. The focus at the prima facie stage of the Racial Justice Act proceedings should have been on the allegations and supporting evidence proffered by petitioner, not evidence supporting the People's argument. (Finley v. Superior Court (2023) 95 Cal.App.5th 12.)

The California Racial Justice Act of 2020 (RJA) is not violated when a testifying defendant follows his or her attorney's advice to speak authentically and in his or her normal manner, even if the result is that the defendant testifies using slang terms, a certain accent, or a certain linguistic style. (People v. Coleman (2024) 98 Cal.App.5th 709.)

Defendant forfeited review on direct appeal of a claim under the California Racial Justice Act, Pen. Code § 745, as amended by AB 1118 (2023-2024 Reg. Sess.), because he failed to make a motion before entry of judgment and the legislative history of amendments indicated the appellate courts retained discretionary authority to apply the general forfeiture rule to a claim that could have been, but was not, presented in the trial court. Defendant's arguments regarding constitutional issues and futility of objection did not excuse forfeiture because the claim did not present a pure question of law and the record did not demonstrate either that defendant could not object or that doing so would have been futile. There was no basis to stay and remand because defendant did not identify what factual development might be needed in the trial court. (People v. Lashon (2024) 98 Cal.App.5th 804.)

Pen. Code § 13519.4(e): "'Racial or Identity Profiling Defined:' For purposes of this section, is the consideration of, or reliance on, to any degree, actual or perceived race, color, ethnicity, national origin, age, religion, gender identity or expression, sexual orientation, or mental or physical disability in deciding which persons to subject to a stop or in deciding upon the scope or substance of law enforcement activities following a stop, except that an officer may consider or rely on characteristics listed in a specific suspect description. The activities include, but are not limited to, traffic or pedestrian stops, or actions during a stop, such as asking questions, frisks, consensual and nonconsensual searches of a person or any property, seizing any property, removing vehicle occupants during a traffic stop, issuing a citation, and making an arrest."

Pen. Code § 13519.4(f): Prohibition: "A peace officer shall not engage in racial or identity profiling."

Gov't. Code § 1031: Minimum Standards: In establishing minimum standards for peace officers,

> Gov't. Code § 1031 was amended, effective 1/1/2021 (AB 846), to provide the following:
> > Subd. (f) was amended to include among the minimum standards required of peace officers that the officer "(b)e found to be free from any physical, emotional, or mental condition, including bias against race or ethnicity, gender, nationality, religion, disability, or sexual orientation, that might adversely affect the exercise of the powers of a peace officer." (Italics added)

Gov't. Code § 1031.3: Explicit and Implicit Bias: Enacted to provide the following relative to "explicit and implicit bias:"

> The Commission on Peace Officer Standards and Training (POST) is, by January 1, 2022, to review and update the regulations and screening materials for a peace officer emotional and mental condition evaluation, adding to the list an evaluation the identification of "explicit and implicit bias towards race or ethnicity, gender, nationality, religion, disability, or sexual orientation." (Italics added)

Case Law:

> While a person's race may properly be used as an identification factor when in conjunction with other factors, but standing alone, a person's race is insufficient to justify the detention of a person as the suspect in a crime. (See People v. Walker (2012) 210 Cal.App.4th 1372, 1388-1389, and the cases cited therein: "(T)here was a sense that the detaining officer relied too heavily on the common general traits of race and age in attempting to justify a stop that had no other circumstances to warrant it."

"(T)he race of an occupant (of a vehicle), without more, does not satisfy the detention standard." (People v. Bates (2013) 222 Cal.App.4th 60, 67; citing People v. Bower (1979) 24 Cal.3rd 638, 644.)

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to a fair trial takes precedence over a state statute that precludes or restricts inquiry into the validity of a jury's verdict (i.e., the "no impeachment rule") when there is "compelling evidence" that a juror, during deliberations, made a clear statement indicating that he or she relied upon racial stereotypes or animus to convict a defendant. (Pena-Rodriguez v. Colorado (2017) 580 U.S. 206 [137 S.Ct. 855; 197 L.Ed.2nd 107].)

The U.S. Supreme Court has also held that a defendant (a black male) in a capital murder case received ineffective assistance of counsel (a Sixth Amendment violation) when his attorney called as an expert witness a psychologist who, as a part of his expert opinion as to the potential future dangerousness of the defendant, testified that black men are statistically more likely to be violent. The Court ruled that it was inappropriate for a jury to consider race no matter how it was injected into the proceeding, rejecting the argument that it was invited error because defendant's own attorney was the one who called the expert to testify. (Buck v. Davis (2017) 580 U.S. 100 [137 S.Ct. 759; 197 L.Ed.2nd 1].)

In a decision where the Appellate Court reversed defendant's Juvenile Court true finding after holding that defendant, a black male, was illegally detained, a concurring opinion provided some relevant insight: "We have resolved this appeal without delving into complex issue of race and policing, but I submit that as judges we must remain mindful of the broader context in which this case arose. . . . In situations like this, law enforcement officers must be sensitive to how implicit biases might influence what passersby perceive as a threat, just as judges must appreciate how officers on the receiving end of a vague, subjective tip might interpret the information they obtain. . . . Ultimately, there are myriad ways in which racial perceptions and biases might surface in a given criminal case, as in everyday life. And while the police officers here never inquired further to find out what exactly the tipster saw that concerned her, our opinion appropriately emphasizes the perils of relying solely on this type of report as a basis to detain. To that end, the objective standard of reasonable suspicion, which has always required more than a mere hunch to justify a detention, remains a vital safeguard for protecting our important Fourth Amendment rights." (In re Edgerrin J. (2020) 57 Cal.App.5th 752, 770-772.)

See the dissent in People v. Flores (2021) 60 Cal.App.5th 978, 993-994, which, after noting defendant's apparent Hispanic heritage, and interjecting current racial issues into its argument, notes that the majority "ignores applicable law and the realities of twenty-first century America . . . (targeting) a person wary of police interaction, . . ." Further along, in criticizing the majority's finding relative to defendant's suspicious acts upon the approach of the officers: "Indeed, some even might instruct their children remaining still is a prudent course of action (and even then, it may not work. #BlackLivesMatter.) To hold otherwise ignores the deep-seated mistrust certain communities feel toward police and how that mistrust manifests in the behavior of people interacting with them." (Parenthesis in the original.) The dissent ends the discussion with the following: "The majority opinion (which held that defendant's detention was lawful) narrows the options for those who want to be judged 'normal' and hence beyond suspicion. They must stand erect and chat up the officers who approach them. Tell that to Eric Garner.", referencing a person who died at the hands of a New York P.D. patrol officer while being subjected to a chokehold and while repeatedly complaining that he couldn't breathe.

> In a footnote (pg. 993, fn. 3), the dissent also makes reference to Ahmaud Marquez Arbery, a black man who was shot and killed by three white citizens as he was confronted while jogging through their neighborhood, but suspected by his assailants of burglarizing a garage as he did so.
> Note: Since publication of this decision, the three defendants were convicted of Arbery's murder.

Justice Goodwin Liu on Implicit Racial Biases: In a concurring opinion in the California Supreme Court decision of People v. McWilliams (2023) 14 Cal.5th 429, at pgs. 450-452, on the issue of whether the doctrine of "attenuation of the taint" overcomes the issue of a parole search based upon the discovery of a Black suspect's search and seizure conditions after he is detained illegally, Supreme Court Justice Goodwin Liu pens a short dissertation on the issue of implicit biases in cases where officers have the discretion to act (i.e., to detain, search, and/or arrest):

> "I write separately to note that in such circumstances, an officer's decision making may be vulnerable to implicit biases that result in a heightened risk of exploitation of the unlawful detention. This reality is a proper consideration under the second factor of the attenuation doctrine set out in Brown v. Illinois (1975) 422 U.S. 590, 603–604. . . . [¶] Empirical studies have shown that 'the conditions under which implicit biases translate most readily into discriminatory behavior are when people have wide discretion in making quick decisions with little accountability.' (Kang et al., Implicit Bias in the Courtroom (2012) 59 UCLA L.Rev. 1124, 1142; see id. at pp. 1142–1150 [citing studies]; Casey et al., Addressing Implicit Bias in the Courts (2013) 49 Ct.Rev. 64, 68 & fn. 38 [citing studies].) As Justice Danner noted in the Court of Appeal, the issue is not racism in the sense of intentional discrimination. It is the operation of 'attitudes and stereotypes' that 'are not consciously accessible through introspection' and 'can function automatically.' (Kang et al., at p. 1129.) Research confirms what is no surprise as a matter of common sense: On-the-spot discretionary decisions are vulnerable to implicit bias because they are neither constrained by a clear rubric of relevant criteria nor preceded by extensive deliberation. Where a discretionary search is preceded by an unlawful detention, the very impulses that may have given rise to the initial detention may also contribute to an officer's decision to conduct the search. Such impulses may include the well-documented unconscious 'stereotype of Black Americans as violent and criminal.' (Eberhardt et al., Seeing Black: Race, Crime, and Visual Processing (2004) 87 J. Personality & Soc. Psychol. 876; see Hetey & Eberhardt, Racial Disparities in Incarceration Increase Acceptance of Punitive Policies (2014) 25 Psychol. Sci. 1949.) [⁋] Black individuals like McWilliams disproportionately bear the brunt of discretionary decisions by law enforcement. 'Black Californians are significantly more likely to be stopped than white Californians, and experiences during stops and outcomes afterward also vary. . . . Black individuals are more than twice as likely to be searched as white individuals.' (Lofstrom et al., Racial Disparities in Law Enforcement Stops (Oct. 2021) p. 25.) Not only are Black people stopped and searched more often, but such searches are less likely to yield evidence or contraband. (Id. at pp. 14–16; see People v. Tacardon (2022) 14 Cal.5th 235, 264, . . . (dis. opn. of Liu, J.) [citing Ayres & Borowsky, A Study of Racially Disparate Outcomes in the Los Angeles Police Department (Oct. 2008) pp. 5–8 [Black and Hispanic residents of Los Angeles, compared to Whites, were more likely to be stopped, frisked, searched, and arrested but significantly less likely to be found with weapons or drugs]; Gross & Barnes, Road Work: Racial Profiling and Drug Interdiction on the Highway (2002) 101 Mich. L.Rev. 651, 668 [searches of White drivers in Maryland reveal drugs 22% more often than searches of Black drivers and over 200% more often than searches of Hispanic drivers]; Note, Discrimination During Traffic Stops: How an Economic Account Justifying Racial Profiling Falls Short (2012) 87 N.Y.U. Lofstrom et al., at p. 15 [contraband or evidence is found in 21.4 percent of searches overall]; Bar-Gill & Friedman, Taking Warrants Seriously (2012) 106 Nw. U. L.Rev. 1609, 1655 ['police find evidence in only about 10% to 20% of the total traffic searches'].) For every search of a Black person that yields contraband, there are far more—and disproportionately more—searches of Black people that turn up nothing. These practices are not only inefficient but also detrimental to building trust between minority communities and law enforcement. (People v. Tacardon, at p. 264 (dis. opn. of Liu, J.).) [¶] As today's decision explains, '[t]here is a danger that an officer who has unlawfully stopped a bystander without reasonable suspicion will regard the discovery of a parole search condition as a license to continue pursuing a baseless hunch, rather than fairly considering whether a search is appropriate to assess the individual's rehabilitation and monitor "his transition from inmate to free citizen." [Citation.] In other words, in the hands of the very same officer who conducted an illegal stop, there is a risk that the discretion to conduct a parole search will lead to the exploitation of that illegal conduct, rather than severing the causal connection between the stop and the search.' . . . It is appropriate for courts to recognize, in applying the second factor of Brown*'s attenuation inquiry, that this risk in a given case may be heightened by the operation of implicit biases, including the unconscious association between Blackness and criminality."

Detentions vs. Arrests*: If not handled properly, a "detention" could become an "arrest" (i.e., a "de facto arrest") which, if not supported by "probable cause" to arrest, would be illegal. (Orozco v. Texas (1969) 394 U.S. 324 [89 S.Ct. 1095; 22 L.Ed.2nd 311]; In re Antonio B. (2008) 166 Cal.App.4th 435; United States v. Redlightning (9th Cir. 2010) 624 F.3rd 1090, 1103-1106; People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 758-760.)

General Rule: "There is no bright-line rule to determine when an investigatory stop becomes an arrest." (Sialoi v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. May 24, 2016) 823 F.3rd 1223, 1232; quoting Washington v. Lambert (9th Cir. 1996) 98 F.3rd 1181, 1185. See also Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ, 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006, finding that the Officers did not effectuate an arrest until the point where they had removed plaintiff from his vehicle and put him into the patrol vehicle which, by that time, plaintiff had engaged in activity that could constitute the crime of assaulting an officer, so probable cause had accrued.)

The use of firearms, handcuffs, putting a person into a locked patrol car, transporting him without his consent, or simply a "show of force," may, under the circumstances, cause the court to later find that an attempted detention was in fact an arrest (i.e., a "de facto arrest.") and, if made without "probable cause," illegal. (United States v. Ramos-Zaragosa (9th Cir. 1975) 516 F.2nd 141, 144; New York v. Quarles (1984) 467 U.S. 649 [104 S.Ct. 2626; 81 L.Ed.2nd 550], handcuffs; Orozco v. Texas, supra, force.)

See also Hopson v. Alexander (9th Cir. 2023) 71 F.4th 692, 698-709: Use of handcuffs and drawn firearms held not to be sufficiently coercive to deny officers qualified immunity when used to detain suspects who appeared to be casing a convenience store in possible preparation for a possible planned armed robbery.

Factors to consider, including:

- Whether the suspect was handcuffed;
- Whether the police drew their weapons;
- Whether the police physically restrict the suspect's liberty, including by placing the suspect in a police car;
- Whether "special circumstances" (such as an uncooperative suspect or risk of violence) are present to justify the "intrusive means of effecting a stop"; and
- Whether the officers are outnumbered.

(Washington v. Lambert (9th Cir. 1996) 98 F.3rd 1181, 1188-1190; Sialoi v. City of* San Diego (9th Cir. 2016) 823 F.3rd 1223, 1232.)

Examples:

Handcuffing a detainee will not result in an arrest when, "at the time of the detention, the officer had a reasonable basis to believe the detainee presented a physical threat to the officer or would flee." (In re Antonio B. (2008) 166 Cal.App.4th 435, 442.)

Handcuffing an otherwise compliant 11-year-old minor (even though reported to be out of control, uncooperative, and "off his meds" by school officials) and transporting him from his school to a relative held to be an excessive use of force under the circumstances, and an unlawful seizure. Officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. (C.B. v. City of Sonora (9th Cir. 2014) 769 F.3rd 1005, 1029-1031, 1039-1040.)

Handcuffing the defendant and having him sit on the curb found to be a "de facto" arrest which, under the circumstances, was not supported by probable cause and also which, under the circumstances, negated his subsequent consent to search his vehicle. (People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 758-760.)

In order for the handcuffing of a suspect during an investigatory detention to not convert the detention into a de facto arrest, the handcuffing must be found to be "reasonable" under the circumstances. (United States v. Eatman (7th Cir. 2019) 942 F.3rd 344.)

The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals has held that the officers who handcuffed a suspect for nearly five minutes during a traffic stop did so illegally where they were unable to articulate any specific facts to support an objective concern for their safety. The court noted that initial stop and use of handcuffs was lawful based upon a reasonable suspicion that plaintiff may have been involved in a narcotics transaction minutes earlier and because he did not have a driver's license when stopped. However, during the stop, in which the officers outnumbered Haynes, they did not find any drugs or weapons on him nor did they see any drugs or weapons in his car. The Court added that the officers chose not to search plaintiff's car after he gave them consent to do so. Finally, according to the officers' testimony, aside from the suspected drug deal, nothing about plaintiff's behavior led them to believe that he was a safety risk or uncooperative. Consequently, the court held that keeping plaintiff in handcuffs after searching him "was not reasonably necessary to protect their personal safety or maintain the status quo during the investigatory stop." The court further held that, at the time of the incident, it was clearly established that handcuffing, "absent any concern for safety," violates the Fourth Amendment. (Haynes v. Minnehan (8th Cir. 2021)14 F.4th 830.)

However, there is case law supporting the argument that a detention does not necessarily become an arrest when the detention is prolonged for the purpose of awaiting the arrival of specialized federal officers. (See United States v. O'Looney (9th Cir. 544 F.2nd 385; United States v. Moore (9th Cir. 1980) 638 F.2nd 1171, and the concurring opinion in United States v. Guerrero (9th Cir. 2022) 47 F.5th 984, 987-988.)

In Guerrero, defendant was "detained" in handcuffs for about an hour awaiting federal officers to come and take him into custody. In the majority opinion, written in two concurring opinions, defendant was held to be either lawfully detained, or lawfully arrested (a "de facto" arrest, supported by probable cause) and searched incident to that arrest.

Indicators of an Arrest: Other courts have illustrated the relevant factors to an arrest:

The Use of Firearms. (People v. Taylor (1986) 178 Cal.App.3rd 217, 229; United States v. Ramos-Zaragosa, supra; Washington v. Lambert (9th Cir. 1996) 98 F.3rd 1181, 1185-1189; Green v. City & County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2014) 751 F.3rd 1039, 1047-1048.)

The Use of Handcuffs. (New York v. Quarles, supra; United States v. Purry (D.C. Cir. 1976) 545 F.2nd 217, 220; Washington v. Lambert, supra; Green v. City & County of San Francisco, supra; People v. Espino, supra.; In re K.J. (2018) 18 Cal.App.5th 1123, 1132.)

While putting a juvenile in a security office at the border, and frisking her, were not enough to constitute an arrest, handcuffing her shortly thereafter when contraband was found in her car was an arrest. (United States v. Juvenile* (RRA-A) (9th Cir. 2000) 229 F.3rd 737, 743.)

Whether or not a detention becomes an arrest depends upon "whether the use of handcuffs during a detention was reasonably necessary under all of the circumstances of the detention." (In re Antonio B. (2008) 166 Cal.App.4th 435, 441; defendant found to have been arrested, due to his handcuffing without probable cause.)

Handcuffing a person suspected of possible involvement in a narcotics transaction, but where the officer testified only that he was "uncomfortable" with the fact that defendant was tall (6'-6") and that narcotics suspects sometimes carry weapons (although the officer did not conduct a patdown for weapons), converted a detention into a "de facto" arrest, making the subsequent consent to search involuntary. (People v. Stier (2008) 168 Cal.App.4th 21.)

A Locked Patrol Car. (People v. Natale (1978) 77 Cal.App.3rd 568, 572; United States v. Parr (9th Cir. 1988) 843 F.2nd 1228; United States v. Ricardo D. (9th Cir. 1990) 912 F.2nd 337, 340; "Detention in a patrol car exceeds permissible Terry* (*v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889].) limits absent some reasonable justification."

During an Overwhelming Show of Force. (Orozco v. Texas (1969) 394 U.S. 324 [89 S.Ct. 1095; 22 L.Ed.2nd 311]; United States v. Ali (2nd Cir. 1996) 86 F.3rd 275; defendant was asked to step away from the boarding area at an airport, his travel documents were taken, and he was surrounded by seven officers with visible handguns; and Kaupp v. Texas (2003) 538 U.S. 626, 628-630 [123 S.Ct. 1843; 155 L.Ed.2nd 814, 819-820], three officers, with three more in the next room, commanded the 17-year-old defendant to get out of bed at 3:00 a.m., and took him to the police station for questioning.)

As a general rule: Detention + nonconsensual transportation = arrest.

See also People v. Harris (1975) 15 Cal.3rd 384, 390-392; transporting a subject from the site of a traffic stop back to the scene of the crime for a victim identification, absent one of the recognized exceptions, was held to be an arrest.

But see "Non-Consensual Transportation Exceptions," below.

Use of Emergency Lights:

Even though a vehicle is already stopped without police action, merely activating emergency lights on a police vehicle as officers contact the occupants of the vehicle is automatically a detention, and illegal if made without a reasonable suspicion. (People v. Bailey (1985) 176 Cal.App.3rd 402.)

Defendant was detained under the Fourth Amendment when a deputy sheriff investigating an emergency call of a fight in progress at 10:37 p.m. on a Sunday night, stopped his patrol car behind defendant's parked vehicle and activated his emergency lights. The Court held that a reasonable person under the circumstances would not have felt free to leave. Defendant submitted to the show of authority by remaining in his parked car. However, defendant's brief detention was supported by a reasonable suspicion based on the totality of the circumstances which included a reliable citizen's report of a violent fight potentially involving a firearm, the deputy's quick response time (3 minutes), and defendant's presence near the scene of the fight in the otherwise vacant alley. (People v. Brown (2015) 61 Cal.4th 968, 974-987.)

Defendant was the driver of a vehicle that was following another vehicle. Officers determined that the owner of the lead vehicle had an outstanding warrant for his arrest. Sheriff's Deputies activated their emergency lights just as both vehicles were in the process of parking. Defendant's vehicle was caught between the officers and the lead vehicle. The Court held that defendant was necessarily detained by this action, per Brown, even though there was no cause to believe that he was involved in any criminal activity. Officer safety considerations justified contacting defendant before proceeding to the lead vehicle. The odor of marijuana and plain sight observations of marijuana in the car lawfully lead to a search of the car and discovery of more contraband. (People v. Steele (2016) 246 Cal.App.4th 1110, 1115-1120.)

The use of the "wig wag" lights on a patrol car upon pulling up behind defendant's parked vehicle, done only to identify the officer as law enforcement and without turning on the full light bar, was held not to be a detention. The Court held that a reasonable person seeing the wig wag lights under these circumstances would have thought that he was still free to ignore the police presence and go about his business. (United States v. Cook (8th Cir. 2016) 842 F.3rd 597.)

The Juvenile Court's denial of a suppression motion was reversed for having erroneously determined that a police-defendant encounter was consensual and not a detention. Based upon a citizen's report that minors were "acting shady," four officers parked behind defendants' lawfully parked car, the first patrol car with its emergency lights on. The Court ruled that the officers' show of authority (i.e., turning on their emergency lights) amounted to an unlawful detention. Although noting that there is no "bright-line rule" that activating lights always constitutes a detention, the Court noted that the California "Supreme Court has long recognized that activating sirens or flashing lights can amount to a show of authority" sufficient to constitute a detention. (In re Edgerrin J. (2020) 57 Cal.App.5th 752, 760, citing People v. Brown (2015) 61 Cal.4th 968, at p. 980.)

Exceptions: The use of firearms, handcuffing, a non-consensual transportation, and/or putting a subject into a patrol car, if necessary under the circumstances, particularly if precautions are taken to make sure that the person knows he is only being detained as opposed to being arrested, or when the use of force is necessitated by the potential danger to the officers, may be found to be appropriate and does not necessarily elevate the contact into an arrest. (See People v. Celis (2004) 33 Cal.4th 667, 673-676.)

In General, the investigative methods used should be the least intrusive means reasonably available. (Florida v. Royer (1983) 460 U.S. 491, 500 [103 S.Ct. 1319; 75 L.Ed.2nd 229].) Although the use of some force does not automatically transform an investigatory detention into an arrest, any overt show of force or authority should be justified under the circumstances. (See, e.g., United States v. Holzman (9th Cir. 1989) 871 F.2nd 1496, 1502, restraints justified by belief suspect was attempting to flee; United States v. Buffington (9th Cir. 1987) 815 F.2nd 1292, 1300, given officer's knowledge of suspect's history of violence, show of force justified by fear for personal safety. (In re Ricardo D. (9th Cir. 1990) 912 F.2nd 337, 340.)

> However: "(I)t has been held that stopping a suspect at gunpoint, handcuffing him, and placing him in a patrol car does not automatically elevate a seizure into an arrest requiring probable cause. (Gallegos v. City of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2002) 308 F.3rd 987, 991–992; People v. Celis (2004) 33 Cal.4th 667, 675 . . . ; People v. Soun (1995) 34 Cal.App.4th 1499, 1517–1520 . . . .) This is because an officer may take reasonably necessary steps to protect his or her safety and to maintain the status quo during a detention. (Celis, supra, 33 Cal.4th at p. 675.) The issue is whether the methods used during a detention were reasonably necessary under all of the circumstances of the detention. ([People v.] Stier (2008) . . . , 168 Cal.App.4th [21] at p. 27; In re Antonio B. (2008) 166 Cal.App.4th 435, 441 . . . .)" (In re K.J. (2018) 18 Cal.App.5th 1123, 1132.)
> In order for the handcuffing of a suspect during an investigatory detention to not convert the detention into a de facto arrest, the handcuffing must be found to be "reasonable' under the circumstances. (United States v. Eatman (7th Cir. 2019) 942 F.3rd 344.)

Factors: The courts have allowed the use of especially intrusive means of effecting a stop yet still found the intrusion to be merely a detention in special circumstances, such as:

- Where the suspect is uncooperative or takes action at the scene that raises a reasonable possibility of danger or flight;
- Where the police have information that the suspect is currently armed;
- Where the stop closely follows a violent crime; or
- Where the police have information that a crime that may involve violence is about to occur.

> (Green v. City & County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2014) 751 F.3rd 1039, 1047; noting that "(t)hese factors should all be considered in light of the specificity of the information law enforcement has to suggest both that the individuals are the proper suspects and that they are likely to resist arrest or police interrogation." See also Washington v. Lambert (9th Cir. 1996) 98 F.3rd 1181, 1189.)

Also relevant, per the Green Court, is;

- The number of officers present.

Non-Consensual Transportation Exceptions: The Courts have found exceptions to the "detention + transportation = arrest" rule when the following might apply: "(T)he police may move a suspect without exceeding the bounds of an investigative detention when it is a reasonable means of achieving the legitimate goals of the detention 'given the specific circumstances' of the case." (United States v. Charley (9th Cir. 2005) 396 F.3rd 1074, 1080.)

But see Bailey v. The detention of an occupant who had just left the residence, and was already about a mile away, held to be illegal, at least under the rule of Summers.

Temporarily handcuffing a smuggling suspect stopped at the International Border where escape routes were close by, particularly when the subject is told that he is not under arrest and that the handcuffs were merely for everyone's safety and would be removed momentarily, and then walking him to a security office about 30 to 40 yards (United States v. Bravo (9th Cir. 2002) 295 F.3rd 1002.) or 35 feet (United States v. Zaragoza (9th Cir. 2002) 295 F.3rd 1025.) away, is reasonable and does not convert a detention into an arrest. (See also United States v. Hernandez (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 430.)

An individual is not arrested but merely detained when, at the border, he is asked to exit his vehicle, briefly handcuffed while escorted to the security office, uncuffed, patted down, and required to wait in a locked office while his vehicle is searched. (United States v. Nava (9th Cir. 2004) 363 F.3rd 942.)

People v. Soun (1995) 34 Cal.App.4th 1499; defendants, removed from their vehicle at gunpoint, were forced to lie on the ground, handcuffed, put into police vehicles and transported three blocks to a safer location: Detention only, based upon the circumstances.

Gallegos v. City of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2002) 308 F.3rd 987; where a 2-to-1 majority found that stopping a subject at gunpoint, handcuffing him, and then transporting him back to the scene of a crime to see if the victim could identify him, a procedure which took 45 minutes to an hour, was not an arrest, but was no more than an "investigative stop (that) worked as it should."

Transporting defendant to the police station for questioning from the hospital, when he was not handcuffed nor patted down for weapons prior to entering the patrol car, and where defendant did not object, held not to be "custody" for purposes of Miranda. (People v. Kopatz (2015) 61 Cal.4th 62, 80-81.)

The transportation of a criminal suspect to the police station for questioning will likely convert the contact to an arrest (See "Transporting a Detainee," under "Detentions vs. Arrests," above). However, where the subject is asked to voluntarily accompany the officers to the station for an interview, he is told he is not under arrest and that the proposed interview is voluntary, that he could stop the questioning at any time, no handcuffs were used, and he is in fact driven home after the interview, it was held that the defendant was neither under arrest nor even detained. (People v. Zaragoza (2016) 1 Cal.5th 21, 56-57.)

Additional Case Law:

United States v. Meza-Corrales (9th Cir. 1999) 183 F.3rd 1116; "(W)e allow intrusive and aggressive police conduct (handcuffing, in this case) without deeming it an arrest in those circumstances when it is a reasonable response to legitimate safety concerns on the part of the investigating officers."

United States v. Rousseau (9th Cir. 2001) 257 F.3rd 925, where it was held that using firearms and handcuffs did not convert a detention into an arrest when the use of force was necessitated by the potential danger to the officers.

Haynie v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2003) 339 F.3rd 1071: Handcuffing and putting an uncooperative suspect in the backseat of a patrol car while the officer checked the vehicle for weapons held not to be an arrest. "A brief, although complete, restriction of liberty, such as handcuffing (and, in this case, putting into a patrol car), during a Terry stop is not a de facto arrest, if not excessive under the circumstances." (Id., at p. 1077.)

Referring to Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889].

Stopping two suspects suspected of committing felony drug offenses, with the officers displaying their firearms, handcuffing the suspects, and making them sit on the ground while a two-minute check of their house for additional suspects, did not convert what was intended to be a detention into an arrest. (People v. Celis (2004) 33 Cal.4th 667, 673-676.)

> The California Supreme Court in Celis noted the below listed important factors to consider:
> - Whether the police diligently pursued a means of investigation reasonably designed to dispel or confirm their suspicions quickly, using the least intrusive means reasonably available under the circumstances.
> - The brevity of the invasion of the individual's Fourth Amendment interests.

Information that defendant had threatened a victim with a firearm and was presently sitting in a described vehicle justified a "felony stop," pulling the defendant and other occupants out of the car at gun point and making him lay on the ground until the car could be checked for weapons. Given the officers' safety issues, such a procedure amounted to no more than a detention. (People v. Dolly (2007) 40 Cal.4th 458.)

"Generally, handcuffing a suspect during a detention (without converting the contact into a de facto arrest) has only been sanctioned in cases where the police officer has a reasonable basis for believing the suspect poses a present physical threat or might flee." (People v. Stier (2008) 168 Cal.App.4th 21, 27.)

> Circumstances listed by the Stier court (at pp. 27-28) where handcuffing has been found to be reasonably necessary for a detention include when:
>
> - The suspect is uncooperative.
> - The officer has information the suspect is currently armed.
> - The officer has information the suspect is about to commit a violent crime.
> - The detention closely follows a violent crime by a person matching the suspect's description and/or vehicle.
> - The suspect acts in a manner raising a reasonable possibility of danger or flight.
> - The suspects outnumber the officers.

Handcuffing a detained suspect based upon defendant's size (6 foot, 250 pounds), the fact that he was "real nervous," and because he began to tense up as if he were about to resist, handcuffing him was held to be reasonable. (People v. Osborne (2009) 175 Cal.App.4th 1052, 1062.)

Confronting three people in the early morning hours, where one (defendant) had an "attitude," and another was carrying a knife on his belt in an open sheath, was sufficient cause to detain the three subjects and to initiate a patdown of the one with the knife. "A consensual encounter may turn into a lawful detention when an individual's actions give the appearance of potential danger to the officer." (People v. Mendoza (2011) 52 Cal.4th 1056, 1081-1082.)

Telling a person that he is not under arrest may not be enough by itself to negate what is otherwise an arrest (See United States v. Lee (9th Cir. 1982) 699 F.2nd 466, 467.). But even if it is not, it is at least a factor to consider when considering the "totality of the circumstances." (United States v. Bravo (9th Cir. 2002) 295 F.3rd 1002, 1011.)

An officer was held not to be entitled to qualified immunity from Fourth Amendment claims in a federal civil rights lawsuit arriving out of a detention of individuals during an investigation of a completed misdemeanor because there was no likelihood for repeated danger and there was a dispute as to whether it was reasonable to threaten to use a Taser under the circumstances. (Johnson v. Bay Area Rapid Transit Dist. (9th Cir. 2013) 724 F.3rd 1159, 1168-1170.)

With information that defendant had threatened another person, and that he was armed, detaining him at gunpoint, making him lie on the ground and handcuffing him before checking him for weapons, was lawful and not a "de facto arrest." (People v. Turner (2013) 219 Cal.App.4th 151, 162-164.)

Stopping defendant at gunpoint, having him kneel on the ground, and then handcuffing him, held to be a detention only in that the officers were investigating a report (anonymous, nonetheless) of someone, who matched defendant's description, shooting at vehicles. (United States v. Edwards (9th Cir. 2014) 761 F.3rd 977, 981-982.)

"If a police officer knows an individual is on PRCS, he may lawfully detain that person for the purpose of searching him or her, so long as the detention and search are not arbitrary, capricious or harassing." (People v. Douglas (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 855, 863.)

See "Post-Release Community Supervision Act of 2011," under "Fourth Waiver Searches" (Chapter 19), below.

Repeatedly attempting to access a crime scene after being told by an officer to stop and where the officer testified to his experience with individuals attempting to illegally obtain possession of abandoned vehicles during a police investigation, and where defendant gestured with his arms toward the officer while keeping his hands in his pockets while being told to take his hand out of his pockets, the court held that the combination of these facts established a reasonable suspicion to believe that defendant was involved in criminal activity, justifying his detention. (United States v. Reddick (8th Cir. AR 2018) 910 F.3rd 358; patting him down for weapons was also upheld under these circumstances.)

"Generally, whether a consensual encounter escalates into a seizure depends on the totality of the circumstances surrounding the encounter. (United States v.) Brown (9th Cir. 221) 996 F.3rd (998) at 1005; accord United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 557-58, 100 S.Ct. 1870, 64 L.Ed.2nd 497 (1980) ('[A] person has been "seized" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment only if, in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave.')." (United States v. Estrella (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 958, 965, fn. 5.)

Miranda*; Custody:*

Rule: "Custody" for purposes of Miranda v. Arizona (1966) 384 U.S. 436, 445 [86 S.Ct. 1602; 16 L.Ed.2nd 694, 708].), under the Fifth Amendment, involves a different analysis than "custody" for purposes of a detention or arrest under the Fourth Amendment. "In contrast (to Fourth Amendment search and seizure issues, where the reasonableness of the officer's actions under the circumstances is the issue), Fifth Amendment Miranda custody claims do not examine the reasonableness of the officer's conduct, but instead examine whether a reasonable person (in the defendant's position) would conclude the restraints used by police were tantamount to a formal arrest." (People v. Pilster (2006) 138 Cal.App.4th 1395, 1406.)

Case law:

Transporting defendant to the police station for questioning from the hospital, when he was not handcuffed nor patted down for weapons prior to entering the patrol car, and where defendant did not object, held not to be "custody" for purposes of Miranda. (People v. Kopatz (2015) 61 Cal.4th 62, 80-81.)

The fact that "custody" for purposes of the Fifth Amendment involves a different analysis than does custody for purposes of the Fourth Amendment has been recognized in by other federal circuits as well. (See United States v. Sullivan (4th Cir. 1998) 138 F.3rd 126, 131; United States v. Smith (7th Cir. 1993) 3 F.3rd 1088, 1097.)

"'Whether an individual has been unreasonably seized for Fourth Amendment purposes and whether that individual is in custody for Miranda purposes are two different issues. [Citation.]'" (People v. Bejasa (2012) 205 Cal.App.4th 26, 38' quoting People v. Pilster, supra, at p. 1405.)

"Reasonable Suspicion;" Defined: Less than "probable cause," but more than no evidence (i.e., a "hunch.") at all.

Defined: "Reasonable suspicion" is information which is sufficient to cause a reasonable law enforcement officer, taking into account his or her training and experience, to reasonably believe that the person to be detained is, was, or is about to be, involved in criminal activity. The officer must be able to articulate more than an "inchoate and unparticularized suspicion or 'hunch' of criminal activity." (Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1, 27 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889, 909].)

Note: "Hunch:" is defined as the inability to articulate reasons behind the belief. See "A Hunch," below.

"(O)fficers need only 'reasonable suspicion'—that is, 'a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person stopped' of breaking the law." (Heien v. North Carolina (2014) 574 U.S. 54, 60 [135 S.Ct. 530; 190 L.Ed.2nd 475, 482]; quoting Navarette v. California (2014) 572 U.S. 393, 396 [134 S.Ct. 1683; 188 L.Ed.2nd 680].)

Case Law:

See also People v. Corrales (2013) 213 Cal.App.4th 696, 699; a "reasonable suspicion," sufficient to justify a traffic stop, is less than "probable cause."

"(A)lthough facts, standing alone, can be 'innocent in the eyes of the untrained,' they 'may carry entirely different messages to the experienced or trained observer.'" (Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ, 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006; quoting Ramirez v. City of Buena Park (9th Cir. 2009) 560 F.3rd 1012, 1021.)

An officer's "training and experience" is not limited to on-the-job law enforcement experience, but includes the officer's everyday common sense. Nor is an officer required to point to "specific training materials or field experiences (in" justifying reasonable suspicion." (Kansas v. Glover

(Apr. 6, 2020) __ U.S. __, __ [140 S.Ct. 1183; 206 L.Ed.2nd 412]; noting that the Court was "in no way minimiz(ing) the significant role that specialized training and experience routinely play in law enforcement investigations." (Id., at p. __.)

"Because the 'balance between the public interest and the individual's right to personal security,' [Citation] tilts in favor of a standard less than probable cause in such cases, the Fourth Amendment is satisfied if the officer's action is supported by reasonable suspicion to believe that criminal activity '"may be afoot,"' (United States v. Sokolow (1989) 490 U.S. 1, 7 [109 S.Ct. 1581; 104 L.Ed.2nd 1, 10]; quoting Terry v. Ohio, supra, at p. 30 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd at p. 911]; see also People v. Osborne (2009) 175 Cal.App.4th 1052, 1058.)

The "reasonable suspicion" standard is "not a particularly demanding one, but is, instead, 'considerably less than proof of wrongdoing by a preponderance of the evidence,'" (People v. Letner and Tobin (2010) 50 Cal.4th 99, 146; quoting United States v. Sokolow (1989) 490 U.S. 1, 7 [109 S.Ct. 1581; 104 L.Ed. 2nd 1]; United States v. Valdes-Vega (9th Cir. 2013) 738 F.3rd 1074, 1078.)

> "In reviewing the propriety of an officer's conduct, courts do not have available empirical studies dealing with inferences drawn from suspicious behavior, and we cannot reasonably demand scientific certainty from judges or law enforcement officers where none exists. Thus, the determination of reasonable suspicion must be based on commonsense judgments and inferences about human behavior." (Ibid., quoting Illinois v. Wardlow (2000) 528 U.S. 119, 124–125 [120 S.Ct. 673; 145 L. Ed. 2nd 570].)
> In People v. Letner and Tobin, supra, a majority of the Supreme Court found that the unexplained driving at 40 mph in a 55 mph zone, indicating a possible DUI driver, particularly when combined with the officer's suspicions that the car might be stolen when there were water beads on it from a storm some hours earlier, indicating that it had not been driven far, and when found in an area known for its many thefts from the nearby car lots, justified an investigative traffic stop.
>
> "The reasonable-suspicion standard is not a particularly high threshold to reach. 'Although . . . a mere hunch is insufficient to justify a (traffic) stop, the likelihood of criminal activity need not rise to the level required for probable cause, and it falls considerably short of satisfying a preponderance of the evidence standard.'" (United States v. Valdes-Vega, supra, at p. 1078, quoting United States v. Arvizu (2002) 534 U.S. 266, 278 [122 S.Ct. 744; 151 L.Ed.2nd 740].)

> Further, "(r)easonable suspicion is a 'commonsense, nontechnical conception that deals with the factual and practical considerations of everyday life on which reasonable and prudent men, not legal technicians, act.'" (Id, quoting Ornelas v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 690, 699 [116 S.Ct. 1657; 134 L.Ed.2nd 911].)

"The 'reasonable suspicion' necessary to justify such a (traffic) stop 'is dependent upon both the content of information possessed by police and its degree of reliability.' [Citation] The standard takes into account 'the totality of the circumstances—the whole picture.' [Citation] Although a mere 'hunch' does not create reasonable suspicion, [Citation], the level of suspicion the standard requires is 'considerably less than proof of wrongdoing by a preponderance of the evidence,' and 'obviously less' than is necessary for probable cause. > However, "(r)easonable suspicion depends on 'the factual and practical considerations of everyday life on which reasonable and prudent men, not legal technicians, act.'" (Id., 134 S.Ct. at p. 1690; citing Ornelas v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 690, 696 [116 S.Ct. 1657; 134 L.Ed.2nd 911]; and ruling that the single act of running another vehicle off the road, as reported by the victim, was sufficient to cause a reasonable officer to believe that the defendant was driving while under the influence of alcohol.)

"Reasonable suspicion is a lesser standard than probable cause and can arise from less reliable information than that required for probable cause." (People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 757; citing People v. Wells (2006) 38 Cal.4th 1078, 1083.)

Observing defendant parked in a van next to a convenience store at night, in the shadows where other marked parking stalls were available, and even with the knowledge of prior thefts from that store where getaway cars would commonly park in such a position, was not enough to justify a reasonable suspicion sufficient to justify a detention of the defendant in that van. (People v. Casares (2016) 62 Cal.4th 808, 837-838; holding that the results of a patdown search of his person, and a consensual search of the van, should have been suppressed.)

The district court was held to have properly denied defendant's motion to suppress narcotics that Border Patrol agents found in defendant's vehicle because the agents, who had a particularized and objective basis for suspecting defendant was engaged in criminal activity, had sufficient reasonable suspicion to stop defendant's vehicle. (United States v. Raygoza-Garcia (9th Cir. 2018) 902 F.3rd 994, 999-1001.)

Note: Evidence of "unproductive stops" by Border Patrol agents in the same area, or stops from which no federal prosecutions arose, did not constitute facts that were "not subject to reasonable dispute," and thus (under Fed. R. Evid. 201(b)) were not the proper subject for a trial court to take "judicial notice." (Id., at pp. 1001-1002.)

"The line between a mere hunch and a reasonable suspicion based on articulable facts can be a fine one, but such a line does exist." (People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034, 1047.)

"Ignorance of a fact, without more, does not raise a suspicion of its existence." (Ibid; quoting from the dissenting opinion in the reversed decision reached by the lower appellate court; People v. Ovieda (2018) 19 Cal.App.5th 614, 629; review granted.)

See "Articulable Objective Suspicion," below.

Detention of a Victim or Witness:

General Rule:

While a victim or witness, as a general rule, may not be detained or forced to cooperate in a police investigation, it is argued by some that when the governmental need is strong and the intrusion upon the victim or witness is minimal, a temporary stop or detention of the victim or witness may be justifiable. (See Illinois v. Lidster (2004) 540 U.S. 419 [124 S.Ct. 885; 157 L.Ed.2nd 843]; vehicle check point used to locate witnesses to a previous fatal hit and run.)

Case Law:

A traffic stop of a witness absent evidence that he himself is involved in criminal activity, is illegal. Because defendant's stop was for "generalized criminal inquiry," it was illegal. (United States v. Ward (9th Cir. 1973) 488 F.2nd 162, 168-170.)

It is a "settled principle that while the police have the right to request citizens to answer voluntarily questions concerning unsolved crimes they have no right to compel them to answer." (Davis v. Mississippi (1969) 394 U.S. 721, 727, fn. 6 [89 S.Ct. 1394; 22 L.Ed.2nd 676].)

Detaining potential witnesses to a murder for some five hours pending being interviewed, particularly when using force, held to be an illegal arrest done without probable cause. (Maxwell v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2013) 708 F.3rd 1075, 1082-1086.)

Potential civil liability was held to exist where officers forced witnesses (for whom there was no evidence that they might be co-suspects) to a stabbing to come to the police station for questioning instead of going to the hospital where the victim (a relative of each of the witnesses) had been taken. The Court held that the trial court had correctly held that the defendant police officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. (Davis v. Dawson (8th Cir. 2022) 33 F.4th 993.)

Potential civil liability was held to exist where officers forced witnesses (for whom there was no evidence that they might be co-suspects) to a stabbing to come to the police station for questioning instead of going to the hospital where the victim (a relative of each of the witnesses) had been taken. The Court held that the trial court had correctly held that the defendant police officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. (Davis v. Dawson (8th Cir. 2022) 33 F.4th 993; a Miranda v. Arizona (1966) 384 U.S. 436 [86 S.Ct. 1602; 16 L.Ed.2nd 694] custody case.)

Exceptions:

"It appears the police are justified in stopping witnesses only where exigent circumstances are present, such as where a crime has recently been reported." (Metzker v. State (AK. 1990) 797 P.2nd 1219.)

In deciding whether detaining a victim or witness was reasonable, a court must looks to "the gravity of the public concerns served by the seizure, the degree to which the seizure advances the public interest, and the severity of the interference with individual liberty." (Brown v. Texas (1979) 433 U.S. 47, 51 [99 S.Ct. 2637; 61 L.Ed.2nd 357].)

As a general rule, a witness to crime may not be stopped and detained in any way, or frisked, and he may refuse to cooperate if he so chooses. A brief detention, however, may be reasonable depending upon the importance of the Government's interest. "At a minimum, officers had a right to identify witnesses to the shooting, to obtain the names and addresses of such witnesses, and to ascertain whether they were willing to speak voluntarily with the officers." (Walker v. City of Orem (10th Cir. 2006) 451 F.3rd 1139, 1148-1149; 90 minute detention held to be excessive.)

It is arguably lawful to stop and detain a witness for the purpose serving him with a subpoena, at least if there is evidence that the witness has been ducking the service of such a subpoena (which, is in itself, a criminal violation; e.g., P.C. §§ 136.1(a), 166(a)(4), (5), both of which are misdemeanors, and Cal. Civil Code § 1209(8)). (See Duncan v. County of Sacramento (2008 E.D.) 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13814; see also People v. Lewis (2015) 2015 Cal.App. Unpub. LEXIS 4038, unpublished.)

An occupant of a house being subjected to a search pursuant to a search warrant may be detained during the search (1) in order to prevent flight, (2) to minimize the risk of harm to the officers, and (3) to facilitate an orderly search through cooperation of the residents. (Michigan v. Summers (1981) 452 U.S. 692, 702-703 [101 S.Ct. 2587; 69 L.Ed.2nd 340, 349-350].)

> But see Bailey v. United States (2013) 568 U.S. 186, 192-202 [133 S.Ct. 1031, 1037-1043; 185 L.Ed.2nd 19], restricting such detentions to occupants who are still in the "immediate vicinity" of the residence being searched. The detention of an occupant who had just left the residence, and was already about a mile away, held to be illegal, at least under the rule of Summers.
> Also, the rule of Summers cannot be used as an excuse for the mass detention and interrogation of suspected illegal aliens at a factory when the ruse used to gain access to the factory and the suspects was a search warrant for employment documents. (Cruz v. Barr (9th Cir. 2019) 926 F.3rd 1128.)

Securing a home from the outside, detaining the occupant on his own porch pending the obtaining of a warrant, was upheld by the United States Supreme Court. (Illinois v. McArthur (2001) 531 U.S. 326 [121 S.Ct. 946; 148 L.Ed.2nd 838].)

> Such a "securing" of a house, however, is in fact a Fourth Amendment seizure. (United States v. Shrum (10th Cir. KS 2018) 908 F.3rd 1219.)

During the execution of a search warrant, until the rest of the house is checked for the suspects, other occupants may be detained. (Los Angeles County v. Rettele (2007) 550 U.S. 609 [127 S.Ct. 1989; 167 L.Ed.2nd 974].)

See "Detention of Residents (or Non-Resident) During the Execution of a Search Warrant," and "During Execution of a Search or Arrest Warrant, or During a Fourth Waiver Search," below.

Note: No case law yet upholds more than just a minimal detention, nor the transportation, of a victim or witness without that person's consent.

Television shows depicting non-consenting victims or witnesses being transported to a police station for questioning are clearly inaccurate.

Immunity Situations:

Where a Court Marshal "shoved" the disruptive plaintiff out of a courtroom upon the order of the judge, the marshal was held not to be entitled to absolute immunity when sued for using excessive force. However, the marshal was entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability where a reasonable marshal under the circumstances could have believed that the Fourth Amendment permitted him to use the amount of force the plaintiff claimed the marshal used. (Brooks v. Clark County (9th Cir. 2016) 828 F.3rd 910.)

Prosecutors may enjoy absolute immunity from civil liability so long as the forced detention of a victim, done for the purpose of interviewing her, is considered to be "advocacy conduct that is intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process." (Giraldo v. Kessler (2nd Cir. 2012) 684 F.3rd 161.)

Articulable Objective Suspicion: A detention, even if brief, is a sufficiently significant restraint on personal liberty to require "objective justification." (Florida v. Royer (1983) 460 U.S. 491, 498 [103 S.Ct. 1319; 75 L.Ed.2nd 229, 236-237].)

"Reasonable suspicion requires specific, articulable facts which, together with objective and reasonable inferences, form a basis for suspecting that a particular person is engaged in criminal conduct. (Citations) An officer is entitled to rely on his training and experience in drawing inferences from the facts he observes, but those inferences must also be grounded in objective facts and be capable of rational explanation. (Citation)" (Internal quotation marks and citations omitted; People v. Nice (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 928, 937: see also People v. Holiman (2022) 76 Cal.App.5th 825, 831.)

Note: Reasons which an officer feels give him or her reasonable suspicion to detain must be articulated, in detail, in an arrest report and later recounted in courtroom testimony.

An officer's inability to articulate those suspicious factors that give rise to the need to stop and detain a suspect is one of the more common causes of detentions being found to be illegal.

A prosecutor's failure to elicit a thorough description of all the suspicious factors by asking the right questions is another common cause.

> "(A)lthough facts, standing alone, can be 'innocent in the eyes of the untrained,' they 'may carry entirely different messages to the experienced or trained observer.'" (Wheatcroft v. "If the detaining officer's justification for a traffic stop is based on a mistake—either factual or legal—then the resulting search or seizure may still be lawful under the Fourth Amendment as long as the officer's mistake is objectively reasonable. (Citation.) "To be reasonable is not to be perfect, and so the Fourth Amendment allows for some mistakes on the part of government officials, giving them "fair leeway for enforcing the law in the community's protection.'" (Citation.) At the same time, 'an officer can gain no Fourth Amendment advantage through a sloppy study of the laws he is duty-bound to enforce.'" (People v. Holiman (2022) 76 Cal.App.5th 825, 831, citing and quoting Heien v. North Carolina (2014) 574 U.S. 54, 57, 60-61, 67 [135 S.Ct. 530; 190 L.Ed.2nd 475].)

> In Holiman, the Court determined that the officer's mistake in her interpretation of V.C. §§ 22107 & 22108 (signaling for the last 100 feet before turning when another car is affected thereby) was not reasonable; i.e., she believing that her patrol car, being behind defendant's was "affected" thereby. Thus, the subsequent traffic stop was illegal in that V.C. §§ 22107/22108 was not violated, and the resulting contraband found in defendant's car should have been suppressed.

A "Hunch:" An officer's decision to detain cannot be predicated upon a mere "hunch," but must be based upon articulable facts describing suspicious behavior which would distinguish the defendant from an ordinary, law-abiding citizen. (Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1, 27 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889, 909]; People v. Nice (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 928, 937; United States v. > "A hunch may provide the basis for solid police work; it may trigger an investigation that uncovers facts that establish reasonable suspicion, probable cause, or even grounds for a conviction. A hunch, however, is not a substitute for the necessary specific, articulable facts required to justify a Fourth Amendment intrusion." (Italics added; People v. A stop and detention based upon stale information concerning a threat, which itself was of questionable veracity, and with little if anything in the way of suspicious circumstances to connect the persons stopped to that threat, is illegal. (People v. Durazo (2004) 124 Cal.App.4th 728: Threat was purportedly from Mexican gang members, and defendant was a Mexican male who (with his passenger) glanced at the victim's apartment as he drove by four days later where the officer admittedly was acting on his "gut feeling" that defendant was involved.)

Seemingly innocuous behavior does not justify a detention of suspected illegal aliens unless accompanied by some particularized conduct that corroborates the officer's suspicions. (United States v. Manzo-Jurado (9th Cir. 2006) 457 F.3rd 928; standing around in their own group, conversing in Spanish, watching a high school football game.)

Observing defendant sitting in a parked motor vehicle late at night near the exit to a 7-Eleven store parking lot, with the engine running, despite prior knowledge of a string of recent robberies at 7-Elevens, held to be not sufficient to justify a detention and patdown. (People v. Perrusquia (2007) 150 Cal.App.4th 228.)

However, "the possibility of innocent explanations for the factors relied upon by a police officer does not necessarily preclude the possibility of a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. Detaining defendant, who was 5'10" tall, well-groomed, medium to dark-complected, with a mustache and slight goatee, based upon his alleged similarity to a suspect who was described as 6'1" tall, unkempt, light-complected, and with no facial hair, held to be insufficient to justify a reasonable suspicion. The fact that the suspected crime occurred at the same location a week earlier, and that the area was known as a high crime area, added nothing. (People v. Walker (2012) 210 Cal.App.4th 1372, 1381-1393.)

"(F)actors that would apply to a vast number of drivers and the law-abiding population. . . . (which would) include conduct that is innocent or innocuous on its own or when looked at in isolation," does not supply the necessary reasonable suspicion. The lawfulness of a detention is determined by balancing the public interest with the individual's right to personal security and the right to be free from arbitrary interference by law enforcement officers. (People v. Turner (2013) 219 Cal.App.4th 151, 161-162.)

A detention prolonging a lawful traffic stop was held to be lawful where the officer (1) had prior information suggesting that defendant may not have been in compliance with Penal Code section 290's registration requirements, (2) was aware that a confidential informant had information suggesting defendant may have been involved in selling drugs and guns, and (3) a civilian ride along had observed defendant making a furtive movement as the stop was being made. (People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 755-765.)

With police officers who had information from a telephone tipster who fully identified himself, including his phone number and address, and who described current on-going criminal activity (i.e., a trespass), while also indicating some knowledge of other more serious wrongdoing by the person described (i.e., selling drugs in the area), when the area itself was known by the officers to be a "high crime area," it was held that the officers would have been remiss had they not at least checked the parking lot for the described vehicle and suspect. Upon arrival in the area, the described vehicle, with defendant sleeping inside, was exactly as the telephone tipster had indicated. Upon contacting defendant, his immediate actions added to the officers' suspicions; i.e., looking around furtively and attempting to drive away. Upon contacting him, defendant attempted to flee on foot. With all this, the officers were held to have more than enough reasonable suspicion to detain defendant for investigation. (United States v. Williams (9th Cir. 2017) 846 F.3rd 303, 308-310.)

The officer had sufficient reasonable suspicion to stop and detain defendant where (1) the officer arrived within two-minutes of receiving the message from the 911 operator at a location known for criminal activity, (2) the officer saw a relatively short man wearing long sleeves, clothing that stood out from what others were wearing and which most closely matched the 911 caller's description, (3) the officer knew that defendant was a convicted felon who did not live at the apartment complex, and (4) defendant reacted by attempting to evade the officer. While the 911 caller's information did not match exactly with what the officer saw upon arriving, the court noted that reasonable suspicion to justify a Terry stop does not require "perfection." (United States v. Adair (7th Cir. IL 2019) 925 F.3rd 931.)

In evaluating the presence of a reasonable suspicion, while determining the legality of a detention and a patdown for weapons, a court is not to "focus on what was missing from this encounter, nor can (the court) isolate each component in analyzing a Terry stop; instead, (the court is to) evaluate the factors that were present, as part of the whole picture, to decide whether they gave rise to reasonable suspicion." (Italics in original; People v. Esparza (2023) 95 Cal.App.5th 1084, 1091, rejecting defendant's attempt to "pick these factors (see below) apart," as the Court rejected the defendant's argument that the court should consider "his calm conduct and agreeable demeanor during the traffic stop, plus the absence of any contraband in the car immediately visible to the officers."

> In Esparza, the Court found the following factors to be relevant to a determination that there was sufficient reasonable suspicion to justify patting defendant down for weapons: I.e.: Defendant was "identified by a veteran gang detective as an established gang member who was driving a car with (at least) two other gang members. (fn. omitted) At the moment of the traffic stop, he was driving through contested territory claimed by both his gang and a rival group. Each of the gangs were known for violent activity. A ghost gun with a magazine of ammunition had just been found on one of his passengers. (fn. omitted) Given that 'consideration of the modes or patterns of operation of certain kinds of lawbreakers' is a permissible point of reference from which a 'trained officer [can] draw[ ] inferences and make[ ] deductions." (Pgs. 1091-1092.)

Furtive Actions:

In a two-to-one decision, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that the trial court properly denied defendant's motion to suppress gun evidence where defendant was the target of a police detention. The trial judge expressly found three facts. First, defendant saw police and tried to avoid contact with them by ducking down behind a parked car. Second, during defendant's ducking and crouching, defendant was "toying with his feet." Defendant did not freeze or remain still. Rather than remain motionless, defendant continued doing something with his hands. Defendant kept his hands out of the sight of the approaching officer, as noted on a police video camera. Third, as police at night approached in an obvious way with a "huge light" on him, defendant persisted in his odd crouch position for "far too long a period of time," failing to respond as one might expect him to. The combination of these facts did not establish defendant was in fact engaged in illegal drug activity, but the trial court was right that together the facts justified a reasonable suspicion ant a "Terry stop." (People v. Flores (2021) 60 Cal.App.5th 978, 988-990.)

> The dissent, after noting defendant's apparent Hispanic heritage, and interjecting current racial issues into it's argument, notes that the majority "ignores applicable law and the realities of twenty-first century America . . . (targeting) a person wary of police interaction, . . ." Further along, in criticizing the majority's finding relative to defendant's suspicious acts upon the approach of the officers: "Indeed, some even might instruct their children remaining still is a prudent course of action (and even then, it may not work. #BlackLivesMatter.) To hold otherwise ignores the deep-seated mistrust certain communities feel toward police and how that mistrust manifests in the behavior of people interacting with them." (Parenthesis in the original.) The dissent ends the discussion with the following: "The majority opinion narrows the options for those who want to be judged 'normal' and hence beyond suspicion. They must stand erect and chat up the officers who approach them. Tell that to Eric Garner.", referencing a person who died at the hands of a New York P.D. patrol officer while being subjected to a chokehold while repeatedly complaining that he couldn't breathe. (Id., 993-994.)

In a footnote (pg. 993, fn. 3), the dissent also makes reference to Ahmaud Marquez Arbery, a black man who was shot and killed by three white citizens as he was confronted while jogging through their neighborhood, but suspected by his assailants of burglarizing a garage as he did so.

Note: The three white defendants have since been convicted of Arbery's murder.

The Officer's Subjective Conclusions: Whether or not an officer has sufficient cause to detain someone will be evaluated by the courts on an "objective" basis; or how a reasonable person would evaluate the circumstances. The officer's own "subjective" conclusions are irrelevant. (Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89]; United States v. Magallon-Lopez (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 671, 675.)

A Seizure: Although a detention is a "seizure" under the Fourth Amendment (Terry v. Ohio, supra, at p. 19, fn. 16 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd at pp. 904-905].), it is allowed on less than probable cause because the intrusion is relatively minimal and is done for a valid and necessary investigative purpose.

Probable Cause vs. Reasonable Suspicion: The occasional inarticulate judicial references to the need to prove "probable cause" (e.g., see United States v. Willis (9th Cir. 2005) 431 F.3rd 709, 715, referring to the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89].) was not intended to raise the standard of proof from one of needing only a "reasonable suspicion." (United States v. Lopez (9th Cir. 2000) 205 F.3rd 1101-1104.)

See Ybarra v. Illinois (1979) 444 U.S. 85 [100 S.Ct. 338; 62 L.Ed.2nd 238], condemning the detention and patdown of everyone at the scene absent individualized evidence connecting each person so detained and patted down with the illegal activity being investigated.

Various Factors which, when taken individually or in combination, help contribute to justifying a detention.

In General: Such factors include, but are not limited to, the following (see above and below):

- Whether the suspect resembles a wanted person.

- The suspect is contacted in a wanted vehicle.
- The suspect appears intoxicated or injured.
- The suspect's suspicious actions.
- The suspect's erratic or evasive driving, or other suspicious actions.
- The officer's prior knowledge of criminal activity by the suspect.
- The suspect's demeanor and/or reaction to seeing the officer.
- The suspect's nervousness, belligerence, etc.
- The suspect's evasive replies to questions.
- The time of day.
- Criminal history of the area. (E.g., a "high narcotics" or "crime area.")
- The proximity to a recent, or a series of crimes.
- The officer's expertise, training and/or experience for the type of crime suspected.
- The suspect's actions consistent with common patterns for the type of crime suspected.
- Informant information.

A "High Crime" or "High Narcotics" Area:

Although being in a so-called "high crime" or "high narcotics activity" area is a factor to be considered (see People v. Moore (2021) 64 Cal.App.5th 291, 301); "(a)n 'officer's assertion that the location lay in a "high crime" area does not (by itself) elevate . . . facts into a reasonable suspicion of criminality. The "high crime area" factor is not an "activity" of an individual. Many citizens of this state are forced to live in areas that have "high crime" rates or they come to these areas to shop, work, play, transact business, or visit relatives or friends. The spectrum of legitimate human behavior occurs every day in so-called high crime areas. . . .'" (Italics added; People v. Pitts (2004) 117 Cal.App.4th 881, 887; quoting People v. Loewen (1983) 35 Cal.3rd 117, 124; and People v. Bower (1979) 24 Cal.3rd 638, 546; see also People v. Walker (2012) 210 Cal.App.4th 1372, 1390-1391.)

> "(T)he time and location of an encounter are insufficient by themselves to cast reasonable suspicion on an individual." (People v. Medina (2003) 110 Cal.App.4th 171, 177; noting that neither the "nighttime factor" nor the "high crime area factor" are "activities" by a person sought to be detained.)

The mere presence in a high-crime area of a Samoan family, celebrating a birthday by barbequing and singing songs, cannot serve as the basis for detaining them, "because it merely 'cast[s] suspicion on entire categories of people without any individualized suspicion of the particular person to be stopped.'" (Sialoi v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2016) 823 F.3rd 1223, 1235; quoting United States v. Sigmond-Ballesteros (9th Cir. 2001) 285 F.3rd 1117, 1121.)

However, note that the United States Supreme Court has held that a subject's flight on foot from the police when it occurs in a so-called "high narcotics area" is sufficient in itself to justify a temporary detention (as well as a patdown for weapons). (Illinois v. Wardlow (2000) 528 U.S. 119 [120 S.Ct. 673; 145 L.Ed.2nd 570]; see "Flight" under "Consensual Encounters" (Chapter 3), above.)

"Although '[a]n individual's presence in an area of expected criminal activity, standing alone, is not enough to support a reasonable, particularized suspicion that the person is committing a crime,' police can consider the 'relevant characteristics of a location in determining whether the circumstances are sufficiently suspicious to warrant further investigation'" (United States v. Williams (9th Cir. 2017) 846 F.3rd 303, 309; quoting Illinois v. Wardlow, supra, at p. 124.)

It was shown that there was a strong governmental interest (i.e., a "special need") in responding to the sounds of gunfire and preventing violence in a high crime area where recent shootings and homicides (six shooting and two homicides in that past three months) had occurred, thus constituting an "exigent circumstance." (United States v. Curry (4th Cir. 2019) 937 F.3rd 363.)

Breaking down defendant's door and entering his home when he had refused to invite police in to investigate was not justified under the Fourth Amendment, even though someone had discharged a firearm outside the home in a high crime neighborhood, overruling the Court's prior decision in People v Rubio (2019) 37 Cal.App.4th 622, in light of the California Supreme Court decision of People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034, 1049.). The emergency aid exception does not apply because the police had no reasonable basis to conclude there was anyone inside the apartment who was in danger or distress, and the exigent circumstances exception does not apply because police had no reason to believe a shooter was hiding in the apartment or that evidence of criminal conduct would be destroyed before they had a chance to obtain a warrant. (People v. Rubio (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 342, 348-355.)

"(I)n general '[a]n area's reputation for criminal activity is an appropriate consideration in assessing whether an investigative detention is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment.' ((People v.) Souza ((1994) . . . 9 Cal.4th (224,) at p. 240.) But][a]n individual's presence in an area of expected criminal activity, standing alone, is not enough to support a reasonable, particularized suspicion that the person is committing a crime.' (fn.

omitted)" (People v. Flores (2019) 38 Cal.App.5th 617, 630; quoting Illinois v. Wardlow, supra, at p. 124.)

"Unprovoked flight" during an attempted traffic stop in a high crime area, running several stop signs in the process, serves to extend the "mission of the traffic stop" beyond what it would have taken to merely write a citation (for a license plate light violation, in this case). (United States v. Perry (4th Cir. Feb. 6, 2024) __ F.4th __ [2024 U.S.App. LEXIS 2691].)

Ethnicity:

"(I)t is no secret that people of color are disproportionate victims of [law enforcement] scrutiny." (Utah v. Strieff (2016) 579 U.S. 232, 254 [136 S.Ct. 2056, 2060-2064; 195 L.Ed.2nd 400].)

"Courts must be mindful that when officers rely on innocuous factors that may disproportionately apply to Latinos, or other persons of color, we may be making room for racial bias—whether it be explicit or implicit—to play a role." (United States v. Raygoza-Garcia (9th Cir. 2018) 902 F.3rd 994, 1003.)

> "(W)here a large portion of the area's population is Latino, officers cannot rely on an individual's apparent Latino appearance in making a reasonable suspicion determination because one's ethnicity or race is not sufficiently particularized to indicate the criminality of a particular person." (United States *v. Raygoza-Garcia, supra, citing United States v. Manzo-Jurado (9th Cir. 2006) 457 F.3rd 928, 935, fn. 6, and United States v. Montero-Camargo (9th Cir. 2009) 208 F.3rd 1122, 1132, and noting that while there was no direct evidence in this case that the agents took defendant's Latin ethnicity into account, an "officers' inferences must rationally explain how innocuous conduct and factors establish reasonable suspicion as to the particular person being stopped to avoid stops that might be interpreted as premised on race or ethnicity." (pg. 1004).)

See the dissent in People v. Flores (2021) 60 Cal.App.5th 978, at pages 993-994, which, after noting defendant's apparent Hispanic heritage, and interjecting current racial issues into its argument, notes that the majority decision in this case (which upheld defendant's detention in a "high crime" area) "ignores applicable law and the realities of twenty-first century America . . . (targeting) a person wary of police interaction, . . ." Further along, in criticizing the majority's finding relative to defendant's suspicious acts upon the approach of the officers: "Indeed, some even might instruct their children remaining still is a prudent course of action (and even then, it may not work. #BlackLivesMatter.) To hold otherwise ignores the deep-seated mistrust certain communities feel toward police and how that mistrust manifests in the behavior of people interacting with them." (Parenthesis in the original.) The dissent ends the discussion with the following: "The majority opinion narrows the options for those who want to be judged 'normal' and hence beyond suspicion. They must stand erect and chat up the officers who approach them. Tell that to Eric Garner.", referencing a person who died at the hands of a New York P.D. patrol officer while being subjected to a chokehold and while repeatedly complaining that he couldn't breathe.

In a footnote (pg. 993, fn. 3), the dissent also makes reference to Ahmaud Marquez Arbery, a black man who was shot and killed by three white citizens as he was confronted while jogging through their neighborhood, but suspected by his assailants of burglarizing a garage as he did so.

Note: The three white defendants have since been convicted of Arbery's murder.

See "Racial Profiling and Implicit Bias," above.

Statutory Interpretation*: The legality of a detention is often based upon an interpretation of a statute which the suspect is suspected of violating. This will necessarily involve an appellate court's employment of the rules of statutory interpretation, considering the meaning of the statute "de novo" (i.e., from the beginning, while ignoring the lower court's interpretation). (People v. Campuzano (2015) 237 Cal.App.4th Supp. 14, 18; citing People v. Glaser (1995) 11 Cal.4th 354, 262.)

The Rules of "Statutory Interpretation" are as follows:

(1) Courts look to the Legislature's intent to effectuate a statute's purpose.

(2) Courts give the words of a statute their usual and ordinary meaning.

(3) A statute's plain meaning controls the court's interpretation unless the statutory words are ambiguous.

(4) If the words of a statute do not themselves indicate legislative intent, courts may resolve ambiguities by examining the context and adopting a construction that harmonizes the statute internally and with related statutes.

(5) A literal construction does not prevail if it is contrary to the apparent legislative intent.

(6) If a statute is amenable to two alternative interpretations, courts will follow the one that leads to the more reasonable result.

(7) Courts may consider legislative history, statutory purpose, and public policy to construe an ambiguous statute.

(8) If a statute defining a crime or punishment is susceptible of two reasonable interpretations, courts will ordinarily adopt the interpretation more favorable to the defendant. (People v. Arias (2008) 45 Cal.4th 169, 177; People v. Campuzano, supra, at pp. 18-19.)

Restriction: Driver's License Check:

Veh. Code § 14607.6(b): A peace officer shall not stop a vehicle for the sole reason of determining whether the driver is properly licensed.

Restriction: Physician Traveling in Response to Emergency Call:

Veh. Code § 21058: "A physician traveling in response to an emergency call shall be exempt from the provisions of Sections 22351 and 22352 if the vehicle so used by him displays an insigne approved by the department indicating that the vehicle is owned by a licensed physician. The provisions of this section do not relieve the driver of the vehicle from the duty to drive with due regard for the safety of all persons using the highway, nor protect the driver from the consequences of an arbitrary exercise of the privileges of this section."

Notes: V.C. § 22351: Speed Law Violations:

(a) The speed of any vehicle upon a highway not in excess of the limits specified in Section 22352 or established as authorized in this code is lawful unless clearly proved to be in violation of the basic speed law.

(b) The speed of any vehicle upon a highway in excess of the prima facie speed limits in Section 22352 or established as authorized in this code is prima facie unlawful unless the defendant establishes by competent evidence that the speed in excess of said limits did not constitute a violation of the basic speed law at the time, place and under the conditions then existing.

V.C. § 22352: Prima Facie Speed Limits: Describes speed limits except where posted otherwise.

Restriction: Traffic Stops Performed Outside the Officer's Jurisdiction and Exception per Pen. Code § 830.1(a)(2) & (3):

The trial court denied defendant's motion for judgment of acquittal and convicted him of failing to stop at a red light (Veh. Code § 21453(a)). An officer of the Costa Mesa Police Department testified that defendant's vehicle crossed an intersection against a red light but in an otherwise safe manner and that no vehicles were coming in the cross-direction that were required to decelerate, brake, or stop to avoid the truck as it crossed the intersection. The offense occurred outside the city limits. The Appellate Department of the Superior Court (Orange County) reversed the judgment, holding that the officer acted in excess of his statutory authority because the jurisdictional exceptions for immediate danger or escape under Pen. Code § 830.1(a)(3), did not apply. I.e.: No persons or property were endangered. The exception conferring jurisdiction on an officer in case of an immediate danger of the escape of the perpetrator is limited to those instances where the officer has particularized cause to believe that a motorist is likely to take action to avoid being detained. That was not the situation in the case at bar because defendant immediately and fully complied with the officer's command to pull over. The citation was not proper as a citizen's arrest under Pen. Code § 837.1, because defendant was not taken to a magistrate or other peace officer, as required by Pen. Code § 847(a). (People v. Landis (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th Supp. 12.)

Note: The trial Court noted that it had "seen written agreements in other kinds of court cases in which Orange County police agencies consent to cross-jurisdictional activity by officers of other agencies." The trial court also observed that in traffic trials, the court "consistently takes the position that there is no legitimate jurisdictional issue where, as in this case, the Court credits the peace officer's testimony that the violation was observed to have been committed in his or her presence." However, no such agreement was proffered in this case, and the trial court therefore did not take judicial notice of any such agreements or suggest it gave any evidentiary value to any writing not before the court. (pg. 269.) Later, the Court noted that "(w)hile the trial court may have been correct that cities within Orange County have in place consent agreements for cross-jurisdictional activity, absent evidence of such an agreement in this case, there is no basis on which to find Officer Bao had authority to issue the citation pursuant to Penal Code section 830.1, subdivision (a)(2)" And then at footnote 3: "If indeed such agreements exist, this problem can be avoided in the future by having the testifying officer present a copy of any such agreement at the hearing and request that the court take judicial notice of its existence and applicability."

Additional Note: Such an agreement referred to above, allowing for a peace officer to cite for offenses outside that officer's jurisdiction when prior approval is given by "the chief of police or chief, director, or chief executive officer of a consolidated municipal public safety agency, or person authorized by that chief, director, or officer to give consent, if the place is within a city, or of the sheriff, or person authorized by the sheriff to give consent, if the place is within a county," is in fact statutorily allowed for by Pen. Code § 830.1(a)(2). It is the understanding of the author that such agreements are in fact in existence, memorialized in writing, and renewed annually.

A county deputy sheriff had the right and duty under Pen C § 830.1(c)(3) to stop a driver within city limits, there being reasonable and probable cause to believe a public offense had been committed in his presence, that there was danger to both persons and property from the driver's manner of driving, and that the driver would escape unless then stopped, where the deputy witnessed the driver weaving in sweeping curves on the road outside the city and followed him into the city, in which the driver failed to stop for a red light and blocked traffic. (People v. Tennessee (1970), 4 Cal.App.3rd 788; the Court noting at pg. 791 that the words "public offense" include misdemeanors and infractions as well as felonies.)

> In Glover, the United States Supreme Court held that observing defendant's vehicle, which a records check revealed was owned by someone with a revoked license, "provided more than reasonable suspicion" to assume that it was defendant who was driving at the time and to initiate a traffic stop, at least absent any other information that it was not the registered owner of the vehicle who was operating the car at the time. (Kansas v. Glover, supra, at p. __; noting on pg. __ that "the presence of additional facts might dispel reasonable suspicion."
> Note: In Glover, the officer's records check revealed that defendant's driver's license had been "revoked," which under Kansas law, meant that he had done something serious enough to show a proclivity for having little regard for Kansas' laws. As noted in the concurring opinion, the result might have been different had defendant's license merely been "suspended," which can happened for offenses as minor as failing to pay parking tickets, court fees, or child support. Under such a circumstance, two concurring justices would not have found sufficient reasonable suspicion to believe it was the defendant who was driving his own vehicle. (Id, at pp. __-__.)

"A police officer may legally stop a car to conduct a brief investigation if the facts and circumstances known to the officer support a reasonable suspicion that the driver may have violated the Vehicle Code or some other law." "A traffic stop is a seizure subject to the protections of the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution." (People v. Nice (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 928, 937, 940, fn. 3; noting that only a "reasonable suspicion," as opposed to "probable cause," is needed in order to justify the stop.)

> "(A) lawful traffic stop occurs when the facts and circumstances known to the police officer support at least a reasonable suspicion that the driver has violated the Vehicle Code or another law." (Id., at pp. 937-938.)

"[A]n officer may stop and briefly detain a suspect for questioning for a limited investigation even if the circumstances fall short of probable cause to arrest." Reasonable suspicion that criminal conduct has occurred "requires that officer to be able to 'point to specific articulable facts that, considered in light of the totality of the circumstances, provide some objective manifestation that the person detained may be involved in criminal activity.'" (Brierton v. Department of Motor Vehicles (2005) 130 Cal.App.4th 499, 509.)

In that the traffic stop itself (i.e., prior to the issuing of a citation), is considered to be no more than a detention, it only requires a "reasonable suspicion" that a traffic offense had been committed in order to be a lawful stop. (United States v. Lopez-Soto (9th Cir. 2000) 205 F.3rd 1101, 1104-1105; People v. Miranda (1993) 17 Cal.App.4th 917, 926; Brierton v. The district court was held to have properly denied defendant's motion to suppress narcotics that Border Patrol agents found in defendant's vehicle because the agents, who had a particularized and objective basis for suspecting defendant was engaged in criminal activity, had sufficieint reasonable suspicion to stop defendant's vehicle. (United States v. Raygoza-Garcia (9th Cir. 2018) 902 F.3rd 994, 999-1001.)

"Border Patrol Agents on roving border patrols may conduct 'brief investigatory stops' without violating the Fourth Amendment if the stop is supported by reasonable suspicion to believe that criminal activity may be afoot. (Citing United States v. Valdes-Vega (9th Cir. 2013) 738 F.3rd 1074, 1078.). 'Reasonable suspicion is defined as a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person stopped of criminal activity.' Id. (internal quotations and citation omitted). The standard 'is not a particularly high threshold to reach,' and '[a]lthough . . . a mere hunch is insufficient to justify a stop, the likelihood of criminal activity need not rise to the level required for probable cause, and it falls considerably short of satisfying a preponderance of the evidence standard.' (Id.)" (United States v. Raygoza-Garcia (9th Cir. 2018) 902 F.3rd 994, 999-1000.)

But see concurring opinion, at pp. 1002-1004, criticizing what the justices consider to be putting too much emphasis on otherwise innocent behavior in establishing a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity.

A traffic stop is lawful when an officer has a reasonable suspicion to believe that a violation is occurring. Observing a cracked windshield, which the officer believed to be unsafe, was held to be lawful even though it was quickly discovered that the crack did not obscure the driver's view, as required by state (Arkansas) law. Further, detaining the defendant long enough to check his driver's license and registration was lawful even though it had already been discovered that defendant was not in violation of Arkansas law relative to the cracked windshield. (United States v. Foster (8th Cir. Ark. 2021) 15 F.4th 874: A resulting patdown for weapons the lawful product of this traffic stop; an issue not contested.)

Random License Checks:

A random license check on the defendant's vehicle, resulting in information that the owner had an outstanding traffic warrant, justified the stop of that vehicle. (People v. Williams (1995) 33 Cal.App.4th 467.)

It is not a search to randomly check license plates that are otherwise visible to an officer, and to check law enforcement databases for information about that vehicle. Discovering in the process that a vehicle's registered owner has a suspended license, and noting that the observed driver resembles the physical description of the registered owner, stopping the car to check the driver's license status is lawful. (United States v. Diaz-Castaneda (9th Cir. 2007) 494 F.3rd 1146, 1150-1152.)

However, a misreading of a license number by an "automated license plate reader," at least when not verified by a visual check of the license number on the car, has been held not to provide a reasonable suspicion as a matter of law that the car is in fact stolen, it being a question for a civil jury to decide. (Green v. City & County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2014) 751 F.3rd 1039, 1045-1046.)

Defendant was arrested for a firearm offense after he was pulled over and during the traffic stop, the officer conducted a pat down search, finding a firearm. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeal affirmed the district court's denial of defendant's motion to suppress. The court explained that the officer had reasonable suspicion to make the traffic stop. Upon randomly checking the vehicle's license, the officer determined that there was a color discrepancy between the vehicle's actual color and the color listed on the vehicle registration. The officer also testified that, in his recent experience, several vehicles with mismatched colors came back as stolen. Thus, this gave the officer reasonable suspicion that the vehicle may have been stolen. (United States v. Brown (8th Cir. 2023) 60 F.4th 1179.)

Personal Observation:

Despite local statutes to the contrary, an officer need not, under the Fourth Amendment, have personally observed a traffic violation in order to justify making a traffic stop, so long as the necessary "reasonable suspicion" to believe a violation (such knowledge coming from another officer in this case) did in fact occur. (United States v. Miranda-Guerena (9th Cir. 2006) 445 F.3rd 1233.)

In establishing the necessary "reasonable suspicion," the officer is not required to personally "observe all elements of criminal conduct." He need only "be able to 'point to specific articulable facts that, considered in light of the totality of the circumstances, provide some objective manifestation that the person detained may be involved in criminal activity.' [Citation]" (Brierton v. Department of Motor Vehicles (2005) 130 Cal.App.4th 499, 509.)

> Then the citation (i.e., the arrest and release) is written based on the "probable cause" to believe a traffic infraction had been committed by the person being cited. (Ibid.)

Detention vs. Arrest: Although issuing a traffic citation is technically an arrest and release on the person's written promise to appear (see United States v. Leal-Feliz (9th Cir. 2011) 665 F.3rd 1037.), it is treated as a detention only because of the minimal intrusion involved. (Berkemer v. > In a trial for resisting, obstructing, or delaying a peace officer, in violation of P.C. § 148(a)(1), the jury was properly instructed that defendant could be found guilty if he refused to identify himself to a ranger who was writing a citation for violating a local ordinance making it an infraction to possess open containers of alcoholic beverages in a public place. When a person refuses to identify himself to an officer who is writing a citation to that person for an infraction offense, that refusal can be the basis for a finding that the person resisted, obstructed, or delayed an officer. (People v. Knoedler (2019) 44 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1.)

When No Law Enforcement Involvement:

> A suspect who stops on his own, even if mistakenly believing he was required to stop, but where law enforcement does nothing affirmatively to cause him to stop, has not been detained for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. A detention requires a "governmental termination of freedom of movement 'through means intentionally applied.'" (United States v. Nasser (9th Cir. 2009) 555 F.3rd 722.)

See People v. Linn (2015) 241 Cal.App.4th 46, 63-68, where defendant stopped and parked her car prior to being contacted, resulting in no more than a consensual encounter up until when the officer took her driver's license to do a radio check, at which time she was detained.

Moving Violations:

A citizen's report of a vehicle driving erratically, with a specific description of the vehicle (including a personalized license plate, although one digit was wrong), where the officer observed the vehicle shortly thereafter weave outside its lane, was cause to effect a traffic stop. (People v. Carter (2005) 36 Cal.4th 1114, 1139-1142.)

A pedestrian crossing diagonally across an intersection without interfering with any traffic is not a violation of V.C. § 21954(a) (Pedestrian's interference with traffic), and therefore does not justify a detention. (People v. Ramirez (2006) 140 Cal.App.4th 849.)

Failure to stop a vehicle before the front bumper crosses a crosswalk's limit line at an intersection is a violation of V.C. § 22450, justifying a traffic stop. People v. Binkowski (2007) 157 Cal.App.4th Supp. 1.)

A passenger in a vehicle, where there's evidence that she encouraged the driver to drive faster than is safe, and did so with the knowledge of the likelihood that the vehicle's tires would leave the roadway, resulting in a fatal accident, may herself be guilty of a violation of V.C. § 21701. (Navarrete v. Meyer (2015) 237 Cal.App.4th 1276; a civil case.)

> V.C. § 21701: "No person shall willfully interfere with the driver of a vehicle or with the mechanism thereof in such manner as to affect the driver's control of the vehicle."

Vehicle Code § 22107 (Failure to signal while turning): Turning without signaling is not a violation of this section unless there is another vehicle close enough to be affected by the defendant's failure to signal. (People v. Carmona (2011) 195 Cal.App.4th 1385; the officer's vehicle, being the only other car in the vicinity, was headed towards defendant and some 55 feet away when defendant turned off onto a side road without signaling; not a violation.)

Vehicle Code § 22108, requiring that a person signal for at least 100 feet before turning, is not a separate offense that may be charged. It takes effect only if, under section 22107, the driver was required to signal. (People v. Carmona, supra., at pp. 1391-1393.)

See also In re Jaime P. (2006) 40 Cal.4th 128, 131; People v. Cartwright (1999) 72 Cal.App.4th 1362, 1366; and United States v. Mariscal (9th Cir. 2002) 285 F.3rd 1127 (interpreting a similar Arizona statute, but where other "traffic," instead of "vehicle," may be affected).

Turning at an intersection without signaling was held not to be a violation of V.C. § 22108 where there was no evidence of another vehicle that was there that "may be affected by the movement." (United States v. Caseres (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3d 1064, 1068-1069.)

However, when an officer is within 100 feet, traveling in the same direction and at the same speed, the defendant's failure to signal a turn was a movement that could have affected the officer's vehicle. Failing to signal while changing lanes where "any other vehicle may be affected by the movement," per V.C. § 22107, applies even though the only affected vehicle is a police car. (People v. Logsdon (2008) 164 Cal.App.4th 741, 744; see also People v. Suff (2014) 58 Cal.4th 1013, 1055-1056.)

V.C. §§ 22107 and 22108 requires a signal when turning right at an intersection, even if the driver doesn't decide to turn until at the intersection, despite the sections' requirement (under § 22108) that a driver do so for 100 feet before making the turn. The Supreme Court ruled that the signaling requirements of §§ 22107 and 22108 apply whether turning "from a direct course" or "mov(ing) right or left upon a roadway," reflecting a legislative intent "that the signaling requirements apply to lane changes as well as changes of course." (People v. Suff, supra, at pp. 1054-1056.)

The Court also rejected the defendant's argument that § 22107's requirement that a driver must signal only "in the event any other vehicle may be affected by the movement" eliminated the need to signal in this case in that there was no vehicle that could have been affected by his turn, where a motorcycle officer was in fact directly behind defendant when he made his right turn in that had the officer attempted to move around to defendant's right side, as he legally could have done with defendant turning from a center lane, they would have collided. (Id., at pp. 1055-1056.)

See also People v. Holiman (2022) 76 Cal.App.5th 825, 831; "If the detaining officer's justification for a traffic stop is based on a mistake—either factual or legal—then the resulting search or seizure is lawful under the Fourth Amendment as long as the officer's mistake is objectively reasonable. (Citing Heien v. North Carolina, supra, at pp. 57, 60–61, 67; for the proposition that a traffic stop may be found lawful where an officer's mistake as to the meaning of a statute is objectively reasonable.

In Holiman, the Court determined that the officer's mistake in her interpretation of V.C. §§ 22107 & 22108 was not objectively reasonable by assuming that her car being positioned behind defendant's car was affected by defendant's failing to signal for 100 feet before making a turn. Ultimately, the Court ruled that it was not reasonable for the officer to believe that defendant, stopping at a stop sign with a full-sized car (the patrol car) behind him that could not have fit in the limited space to the right of defendant's car, could have been affected by defendant's failure to signal. Thus, the subsequent traffic stop was illegal in that V.C. §§ 22107/22108 was not violated, and the resulting contraband found in defendant's car should have been suppressed.

Defendant, having been observed while stopped at the side of the road and texting, was lawfully stopped five minutes later when observed pulling into traffic while learning forward and looking down, with hand movements consistent with texting, a violation of V.C. § 23123.5 (texting while driving). (People v. Corrales (2013) 213 Cal.App.4th 696, 669-700.)

But, seeing defendant bent over his phone which he was holding in his right hand may not be sufficient cause to effect a traffic stop when there are other uses of a cellphone while driving that are not illegal. (United States v. Paniagua-Garcia (7th Cir. 2016) 813 F.3rd 1013.)

Note: Per People v. Spriggs (2014) 224 Cal.App.4th 150, 156; some other uses of one's cellphone, such as using the map application while driving, are not prohibited by California law.

Under the basic speed law (V.C. § 22350), a police officer may stop and cite a person who is driving at a speed which, although under the posted speed limit and at a speed which is safe for current road and weather conditions, is unsafe when considering the manner in which the person is driving. (People v. Farleigh (2017) 13 Cal.App.5th Supp. 12; driving 45 mph in a posted 50 mph speed zone, but with no hands on the steering wheel because she was holding a cigarette out the window with one hand and her cellphone in the other.

The crime of evading an officer, per V.C. § 2800.2, is not part of the Vehicle Code's rules of the road and is not limited to driving on highways, thus making the section applicable to evading a peace officer while driving on private property. (People v. Corder (2018) 26 Cal.App.5th 554.)

Defendant's actions in attempting to pass on a two-lane road at night, resulting in a head-on collision, were sufficient to support the wanton disregard element of reckless driving under V.C. § 23103, because he could not see around the truck he sought to pass and yet pulled into the left lane on a dark, busy road and, driving 70 miles per hour, tried to pass two vehicles at once. Passing is only legal if it is safe. (People v. Escarcega (2019) 32 Cal.App.4th 362, 370-373.)

Estimates of Speed:

A properly trained and experienced police officer's estimate of defendant's speed is sufficient to provide the necessary reasonable suspicion to justify a traffic stop. (People v. Nice (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 928, 937-944.)

See also People v. Ramirez (1997) 59 Cal.App.4th 1548, 1551-1555; and United States v. Ludwig (10th Cir. 2011) 641 F.3rd 1243, 1247.

But see United States v. Sowards (4th Cir. 2012) 690 F.3rd 583; 591: "[T]he reasonableness of an officer's visual speed estimate depends, in the first instance, on whether a vehicle's speed is estimated to be in significant excess or slight excess of the legal speed limit. If slight, then additional indicia of reliability are necessary to support the reasonableness of the officer's visual estimate."

Lying to the Suspect as to the Reasons for the Stop:

In that an officer's reasonable suspicion of a violation of the law is enough to justify a stop a vehicle, and the test being an objective one so that the officer's subjective thinking is irrelevant, the fact that the officer lied to the defendant about the reasons for the stop is also irrelevant. (United States v. Magallon-Lopez (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 671, 675.)

In Retaliation:

After having stopped plaintiff once for speeding, but issuing a citation for a lesser non-moving offense, after which plaintiff made an obscene single-finger gesture as she drove off, the officer stopping her a second time and rewriting the ticket to the original offense of speeding, the second stop was held to be an unlawful seizure and a Fourth Amendment violation. A person has a First Amendment constitutional right to express her opinion of law enforcement, even through obscene gestures. (Cruise-Gulyas v. Minard (6th Cir. MI. 2019) 918 F.3rd 484.)

See "Civil Suits Based Upon an Alleged Retaliation Theory," under "Procedural Rules" (Chapter 2), above.

Avoiding a DUI (or Immigration) Checkpoint:

The Tenth Circuit Court of Appeal held that a driver's decision to use a rural highway exit after passing drug checkpoint signs may be considered as one factor in an officer's reasonable suspicion determination, but it is not a sufficient basis, by itself, to justify a traffic stop. The court noted that an officer must identify additional suspicious circumstances or independent evasive behavior to justify stopping a vehicle that uses an exit after driving past ruse drug-checkpoint signs. (United States v. Neff (10th Cir. 2012) 681 F.3rd 1134.)

Purposely avoiding an immigration checkpoint, plus other suspicious circumstances (i.e., the proximity of the checkpoint to the border and the defendants' peculiar attempt to conceal their avoidance of the checkpoint by purchasing containers of peppers at the vegetable stand) was held to be sufficient to justify a stop and detention. (United States v. Compton (2nd Cir. 2016) 830 F.3rd 55.)

Vehicle Code Registration Violations: A police officer may make an investigatory traffic stop anytime the officer has a "reasonable suspicion" to believe that the vehicle is in violation of the registration laws. (People v. Dotson (2009) 179 Cal.App.4th 1045, 1049.)

A license plate, although only partially obscured by a trailer hitch, violates V.C. § 5201 and justifies a traffic stop and citation. (People v. White (2001) 93 Cal.App.4th 1022.)

It has been held that it is reasonable for an officer to assume (without the court deciding whether the officer was actually right) that a license plate holder that obscures the registration tab only is a violation of a state requirement that the plate be "clearly visible." (United States v. Henry (5th Cir. La. 2017) 853 F.3rd 754; a Louisiana state case with a statute similar to California's V.C. § 5201(a); Positioning of License Plates.)

Note: V.C. § 5201(d) (to be subd. (e) as of 1/1/2019) excuses the obstruction of a rear license plate by a wheelchair lift or carrier if by a disabled person with the applicable disabled person plates or placard, and a decal with the license plate number is clearly visible in the rear window.

Mounting a license plate (the front plate, in this case) upside down is also a violation of V.C. § 5201, in that it is not "clearly legible" as required by the statute. (People v. Duncan (2008) 160 Cal.App.4th 1014.)

A missing front license plate, a violation of V.C. § 5200, is legal justification upon which to base a traffic stop. (People v. Saunders (2006) 38 Cal.4th 1129, 1136; People v. Vibanco (2007) 151 Cal.App.4th 1, 8.)

A traffic stop for the purpose of checking the validity of a red DMV temporary operating permit displayed in a vehicle's window (i.e., the red sticker; see V.C. § 4156), when the number on the permit was visible to the officer before the stop and appeared to be current, is a stop based upon no more than a "hunch," and is illegal. (People v. Nabong (2004) 115 Cal.App.4th Supp. 1; vehicle with expired registration tab on plate; People v. Hernandez (2008) 45 Cal.4th 295, vehicle with no license plates.)

> It is irrelevant that the officer believes, in his experience, that such temporary operating permits are often forged or otherwise invalid. (People v. Hernandez, supra., at p. 299.)
>
> In a case decided by the United States Supreme Court out of California, it was assumed for the sake of argument and without discussing the issue, that stopping a car for the purpose of checking the validity of the temporary operating permit without reason to believe that it was not valid, is illegal. (See Brendlin v. California (2007) 551 U.S. 249 [127 S.Ct. 2400; 168 L.Ed.2nd 132].)
>
> > On remand, the People conceded that a traffic stop made for the purpose of checking the validity of the temporary red sticker visible in the window, absent cause to believe it was invalid, was an illegal traffic stop. (People v. Brendlin (2008) 45 Cal.4th 262, 268; expired registration tab on plate.)
>
> But, a traffic stop is legal when the vehicle had only one license plate (the front plate being missing) and the registration tab on the rear plate was expired. (People v. Saunders (2006) 38 Cal.4th 1129: The missing license plate, a violation of V.C. § 5200, at the very least constitutes a reasonable suspicion to believe that the red temporary operator's permit, despite a current visible month on the permit, might not be for that vehicle.)
>
> A missing rear license plate and no visible temporary registration displayed in the rear window, even though the temporary registration is later found to be in the front

windshield, but not visible to the officer coming up behind the vehicle, is sufficient reasonable suspicion to justify a traffic stop. (In re Raymond C. (2008) 45 Cal.4th 303.)

> As noted in fn. 2: "A temporary permit is to be placed in the lower rear window. However, if it would be obscured there, it may be placed in the lower right corner of either the windshield or a side window." (DMV Handbook of Registration Procedures (Oct. 2007) ch. 2, § 2.020, p. 7.)

An officer's observation that a vehicle was missing both license plates, absent some other indication that the vehicle was properly or temporarily registered, was enough by itself to establish a reasonable suspicion for the officer to believe that defendant was in violation of V.C. § 5200. (People v. Dotson (2009) 179 Cal.App.4th 1045, 1051-1052; rejecting the defendant's argument, and the Attorney General's concession, that the officer had a duty to look for a temporary registration in the vehicle's windows before making the traffic stop.)

Information from DMV that a vehicle's registration has expired, at least in the absence of any other information to the effect that the vehicle is in the process of being re-registered, justifies a traffic stop despite the visible presence of an apparently valid temporary registration sticker in the window. (People v. Greenwood (2010) 189 Cal.App.4th 742.)

Upon observation of a piece of paper in the window of a vehicle without license plates, but not being able to determine whether the piece of paper was a temporary registration, allowed for the stop of the vehicle for the purpose of determining whether the vehicle was registered. (United States v. Givens (8th Cir. 2014) 763 F.3rd 987.)

> As it turned out, the piece of paper was in fact a valid temporary registration sticker. But by then, the officer had smelled the odor of marijuana emanating from the car. The officer was able to testify that in his experience, registration stickers were normally legible from a distance. (Ibid.)
> The federal Tenth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that once an officer has been assured during a traffic stop that a temporary tag is valid, the stop having been made because the tag was not visible due to the tint in the rear window, the officer should explain to the driver the reason for the initial stop and then allow the driver to continue on his way without requiring the driver to produce his license and registration. (Vasquez v. Lewis (10th Cir. 2016) 834 F.3rd 1132.)

Similarly, absent a statute authorizing a warrantless, suspicionless administrative inspection of a commercial truck for a permit to drive on a parkway, and without any articulable reasonable suspicion to believe that defendant did not have such a permit, stopping the vehicle to check for a permit is unlawful. (United States v. Feliciana (4th Cir. 2020) 974 F.3rd 519.)

Vehicle Code Equipment Violations:

A cracked windshield (V.C. § 26710) justifies a traffic stop. (People v. Vibanco (2007) 151 Cal.App.4th 1; United States v. Foster (8th Cir. Ark. 2021) 15 F.4th 874.)

In Foster, a traffic stop was held to be lawful when an officer has a reasonable suspicion to believe that a violation is occurring. Observing a cracked windshield, which the officer believed to be unsafe, was held to be lawful even though it was quickly discovered that the crack did not obscure the driver's view, as required by state (Arkansas) law. Further, detaining the defendant long enough to check his driver's license and registration was lawful even though it had already been discovered that defendant was not in violation of Arkansas law relative to the cracked windshield. A resulting patdown for weapons the lawful product of this traffic stop; an issue not contested.

An inoperable third (rear window) brake light is a Vehicle Code violation (V.C. § 24252(a)), and justifies a traffic stop and citation. (In re Justin K. (2002) 98 Cal.App.4th 695.)

Seat Belt Violations:

An officer's determination that defendant was not wearing a seat belt, even where it is reasonably uncertain whether the defendant's vehicle was even equipped with a shoulder harness, justified a stop to determine whether California's mandatory seat belt law was being violated. (Kodani v. Snyder (1999) 75 Cal.App.4th 471.)

Police officer had probable cause to arrest a driver for a violation of California's safety belt statute upon observing the driver wearing his seat belt under his left arm and not across his upper torso, barring the driver's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 unlawful arrest claim. The driver was not "properly restrained by a safety belt," as required by V.C. § 27315(d)(1). (Hupp v. City of Walnut Creek (N.D. Cal. 2005) 389 F.Supp.2nd 1229, 1232.)

See also Collier v. Montgomery (5th Cir. 2009) 569 F.3rd 214, 218; addressing a similar safety belt statute.

The requirement in V.C. § 27315(d)(1) that the driver and all passengers 16 years of age and older be "properly restrained" while the vehicle is in operation requires that both the shoulder harness and the lap belt portions of the safety belt assembly be used. (People v. Overland (2011) 193 Cal.App.4th Supp. 9.)

Illegally Tinted Windows (V.C. § 26708(a)) justifies a traffic stop. (See People v. Carter (2010) 182 Cal.App.4th 522; and People v. Vera (2018) 28 Cal.App.5th 1081.)

But see United States v. Caseres (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1064, 1069: An officer noting that a person's vehicle windows are tinted, believing that the windows might have been tinted in violation of V.C. § 26708(a)(1) (i.e., after-factory), is not reasonable suspicion of a violation absent other evidence tending to support this belief. "Without additional articulable facts suggesting that the tinted glass is illegal, the detention rests upon the type of speculation which may not properly support an investigative stop."

Windshield Obstructions:

An Anchorage, Alaska, Municipal Code ordinance forbidding any item affixed to the windshield (similar to California's V.C. § 26708(a)(1); see People v. White (2003) 107 Cal.App.4th 636, below.) was not violated by an air freshener dangling from the rear view mirror. A traffic stop was found to be illegal. (United States v. King (9th Cir. 2001) 244 F.3rd 736, 740.)

A traffic stop was illegal when based upon a perceived violation of V.C. § 26708(a)(2), for obstructing or reducing the driver's clear view through the windshield, for having an air freshener dangling from the rear view mirror. (People v. White, supra.)

However, an air freshener hanging from a car's rearview mirror was held to be a violation of V.C. § 26708(a)(2) in another case where a more thorough foundation was established through testimony of the officer, citing his personal experience and noting that the object was big enough to block out the view of a pedestrian or a vehicle, and where there was no defense-offered expert testimony relevant to the overall size of the air freshener relative to the size of the window. (People v. Colbert (2007) 157 Cal.App.4th 1068.)

A traffic stop for an equipment violation in a "high crime" (i.e., gang) area at night is not reasonable suspicion sufficient to justify a detention or patdown for weapons. (People v. Medina (2003) 110 Cal.App.4th 171.)

Observing a vehicle with the front windows illegally tinted in violation of V.C. § 26708(a) makes it lawful to stop the vehicle to cite its driver. The arrest of defendant who was a passenger in the vehicle and who resembled the suspect in a robbery just minutes earlier, was lawful. (People v. Carter (2010) 182 Cal.App.4th 522, 529-530; also holding that even if the stop had been illegal, discovery of an arrest warrant for defendant would have attenuated the taint of an illegal traffic stop.)

But see United States v. Caseres (9th Cir. 2008) 533 F.3rd 1064, 1069: An officer noting that a person's vehicle windows are tinted, believing that the windows might have been tinted in violation of V.C. § 26708(a)(1) (i.e., after-factory), is not reasonable suspicion of a violation absent other evidence tending to support this belief. "Without additional articulable facts suggesting that the tinted glass is illegal, the detention rests upon the type of speculation which may not properly support an investigative stop."

Traffic Stops by and Unmarked Police Vehicle:

Defendant was found guilty of possession for sale of marijuana following the denial by the trial court of his motion to suppress evidence of the marijuana and a scale found in the car. The record indicated that two plainclothes police officers on duty and driving an unmarked police car observed the automobile in which defendant was a passenger speeding through a residential area, and that after following it they observed that there was no illumination on the rear license plate. The officers then activated a handheld red light placed in the center of the windshield and attempted to stop defendant's automobile. Defendant, however, fled. During the pursuit, the officers saw defendant throw three large bricks of marijuana and several baggies of marijuana from the car into the street. After stopping the automobile, one of the officers detained defendant and the driver of the automobile while the other retrieved the marijuana from the street several blocks away. Defendant and his accomplice were arrested. A metal scale was found inside the automobile in a later search. The Court of Appeal affirmed defendant's conviction, upholding the search. The Court held that Veh. Code § 40800 provides that a traffic officer on duty for the exclusive or main purpose of enforcing traffic laws shall wear a uniform and drive a marked police car. This section does not, however, prohibit the officers from stopping defendant's automobile despite the fact that the officers were neither traffic policemen nor on duty for the exclusive or main purpose of enforcing traffic laws. Furthermore, the court held that § 40800 does not prohibit a traffic officer out of uniform and using an unmarked vehicle, or an officer on the street for some other purpose, from detaining and arresting a driver for a speed violation. Finally, the court held that in light of the facts that the officers observed the automobile speeding, and the automobile failed to have illumination on the rear license plate, they were justified in stopping and detaining the automobile, and that thus the evidence was not seized pursuant to an unlawful detention and threat of an illegal search. (People v. Tuck (1977) 75 Cal.App.3rd 639.)

See also Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89]: Washington D.C. vice officers became suspicious of a vehicle in a "high drug area." When the driver turned without signaling, the officers made a traffic stop. Upon approach, rock cocaine was observed in defendant's lap. Defendant argued the officers used the traffic violation as a ruse to investigate drug activity and that no reasonable vice officer in an unmarked vehicle would be enforcing traffic laws. (The officers, in fact, did not even carry a citation book!) The Supreme Court ruled that an ulterior motive does not invalidate a traffic detention based upon probable cause. Traffic stops made by plainclothes officers in unmarked cars is not an extreme practice.

Weaving Within the Lane:

California Rule:

Erratic driving that does not constitute a traffic violation may justify an officer to stop a vehicle. (People v. Russell

(2000) 81 Cal.App.4th 96, 102; "drifting and weaving" in traffic sufficient cause to stop the driver to determine whether he was driving under the influence of alcohol (i.e., "DUI").)

Observation of the defendant weaving within his traffic lane for one half of a mile is sufficient cause to stop him to determine whether he is driving while under the influence or the vehicle has some unsafe mechanical defect. (People v. Bracken (2000) 83 Cal.App.4th Supp. 1; weaving within his lane for half a mile.)

Weaving within a lane for three quarters of a mile justified a traffic stop for driving while under the influence. (People v. Perez (1985) 175 Cal.App.3rd Supp. 8.)

Weaving within a lane, almost hitting the curb, is sufficient reasonable suspicion for driving while under the influence to justify a traffic stop. (Arburn v. Department of Motor Vehicles (2007) 151 Cal.App.4th 1480.)

> The fact that the weaving was not for a "substantial" or "considerable" distance did not mean that the officer didn't have reasonable suspicion to justify the stop. (Id., at p. 1485.)

An officer's detention of the driver was justified where he drove 20 miles under the speed limit and was "weaving abruptly from one side of his lane to the other." (People v. Perkins (1981) 126 Cal.App.3rd Supp. 12, 14.)

Federal Rule: See United States v. Colin (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 439, where the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that weaving from lane line to lane line for 35 to 45 seconds is neither a violation of the lane straddling statute (V.C. § 21658(a)) nor reasonable suspicion that the driver may be under the influence; a questionable decision, and one that may probably be ignored by state law enforcement officers in light of Bracken and Perez.

Weaving Plus: A single pronounced weave within the lane, plus an experienced Highway Patrol officer's observation of the defendant sitting up close to the steering wheel, which the officer recognized as something an impaired driver does, was sufficient to corroborate second-hand information concerning defendant's "erratic driving" from Montana Department of Transportation employees, justifying the stop of the defendant's car. (United States v. Fernandez-Castillo (9th Cir. 2003) 324 F.3rd 1114.)

False Personation During a Traffic Stop:

Pursuant to the "Williamson rule*" (In re Williamson (1954) 43 Cal.2nd 651), which prohibits prosecution under a general statute when the conduct at issue also is covered under a more specific statute, prevented defendant from being convicted of the felony offense of false personation, per P.C. § 529(a)(3), by giving a police officer the name of a friend and signing a false or fictitious name on a promise to appear for a traffic citation, in that the misdemeanor offense of V.C. § 40504(b) applies. The fact that section 40504(b) can be violated in two different ways, one of which does not commonly violate P.C. § 529(a)(3) does not by itself render the Williamson rule inapplicable (People v. Henry (2018) 28 Cal.App.5th 786.)*

Vehicle Stops Involving Agricultural Irrigation Supplies; Veh. Code § 2810.2:

Subd. (a)(1): A peace officer may stop any vehicle transporting agricultural irrigation supplies that are in plain view for the purpose of inspecting the bills of lading, shipping, or delivery papers, or other evidence, to determine whether the driver is in legal possession of the load, whenever the vehicle is on an unpaved road within the jurisdiction of the Department of Parks and Recreation, the Department of Fish & Game, the Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, the State Lands Commission, a regional park district, the U.S. Forest Service, or the Bureau of Land Management, or is in a timberland production zone.

Subd. (a)(2): If there is a "reasonable belief" that the driver of a vehicle is not in legal possession of the load, the peace officer "shall" take custody of the load and turn it over to the sheriff for investigation.

Subd. (b): the Sheriff is thereafter responsible for the "care and safekeeping" of the apprehended materials, and for its "legal disposition" and any resulting investigation.

Subd. (c): Any expense incurred by the sheriff is a "legal charge against the county."

Subds. (d) & (e): If the driver is in violation of V.C. § 12500 (driving without a valid license), the peace officer who makes the stop shall make a reasonable attempt to identify the registered owner of the vehicle and release the vehicle to him or her. Impoundment of the vehicle is prohibited if the driver's only offense is V.C. § 12500.

Subd. (f): "Agricultural irrigation supplies" include agricultural irrigation water bladder and one-half inch diameter or greater irrigation line.

Subd. (g): A county board of supervisors must adopt a resolution before this section may be implemented in a particular county.

Note: The stated purpose of the above statute is to assist law enforcement in the combating of illegal marijuana cultivation sites in state parks and other resource lands due to the negative environmental effects of such grows (but not necessarily just because illegal grows are a bad thing). (Stats 2012, ch. 390.)

Community Caretaking Function:

Although the "community caretaking function" may justify a traffic stop, it will do so only when an officer is acting reasonably in determining that an occupant's safety or welfare is at risk. (People v. Madrid (2008) 168 Cal.App.4th 1050; see also Cady v. Dombrowski (1973) 413 U.S. 433 [93 S.Ct. 2523; 37 L.Ed.2nd 706].)

Per the Madrid Court (at pg. 1059, citing Wright v. State (Tex.Crim.App. 1999) 7 S.W.3rd 148, 151-152; and Corbin v. State (Tex.Crim.App. 2002) 85 S.W.3rd 272.), four factors are to be considered in determining whether the officer's actions are reasonable, with the most weight going to the first:

- The nature and level of the distress exhibited by the individual;
- The location of the individual;
- Whether or not the individual was alone and/or had access to assistance independent of that offered by the officer; and
- To what extent the individual—if not assisted—presented a danger to himself or others.

Parking Tickets:

> Writing a parking ticket justifies a temporary detention of the vehicle's occupant. The fact that parking tickets are subject to civil penalties only and governed by civil administrative procedures is irrelevant. (People v. Bennett (2011) 197 Cal.App.4th 907; citing Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89]; and United States v. Choudhry (9th Cir. 2006) 461 F.3rd 1097.)

Gang-Related Investigations:

> Seeing three vehicles with four Black male occupants each, one of the occupants who is known to be a gang member, driving as if in military formation at 12:30 at night, hours after a prior gang shooting, the vehicles being in one of the warring Black gang's territory, held to be insufficient to justify a stop and detention. (People v. Hester (2004) 119 Cal.App.4th 376, 385-392.)

Using a "Controlled Tire Deflation Device" ("CTDD"):

> The use of a "controlled tire deflation device" to stop a vehicle suspected of being used to smuggle controlled substances over the US/Mexico border held to be a detention only (thus requiring only a reasonable suspicion) and not excessive force under the circumstances. (United States v. Guzman-Padilla (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 865.)
>
> > Note: The "controlled tire deflation device," or "CTDD," is an accordion-like tray containing small, hollow steel tubes that puncture the tires of a passing vehicle and cause a gradual release of air, bringing the vehicle to a halt within a quarter to half a mile.
> >
> > See "A Controlled Tire Deflation Device ('CTDD'), under "New and Developing Law Enforcement Tools and Technology" (Chapter 14), below.

Checking the Vehicle for a Wanted Suspect:

> To serve a warrant, the officer need only know that the registered owner has an outstanding warrant and may stop the vehicle even without seeing the driver or the vehicle's occupants. (People v. Dominquez (1987) 194 Cal.App.3d 1315, 1317-1318; People v. Williams (1995) 33 Cal.App.4th 467, 476.)

An Investigative Stop of a Criminal Suspect:

> "Under the Fourth Amendment, an officer may conduct a brief investigative stop only where she has 'a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person stopped of criminal activity,' commonly referred to as 'reasonable suspicion.'" (United States v. Vandergroen (9th Cir. 2020) 964 F.3rd 876, 879; involving a reported suspect illegally carrying a concealed firearm, and citing Navarette v. California (2014) 572 U.S. 393, 396-97 [134 S.Ct. 1683; 188 L.Ed.2nd 680].
> In a robbery of a Sprint Wireless Express store, where the clerk slipped in a GPS tracker in with the items taken, officers responded to the intersection from where the GPS indicated, minutes later, that the GPS was responding. Two cars were located at that location, neither of which fit the vehicle description provided by the victim clerk. However, the occupants (two black males, when the robber was described as a black male) of one car paid no attention to the many police vehicles that inundated the area. Also, that vehicle was blue when the suspect vehicle was described as dark green, while the other vehicle was gray. Lastly, the suspect vehicle was described as a Pontiac while the vehicle at the scene was a Ford, but with a similar physical description as a Pontiac. Stopping and detaining (and subsequently arresting as the robbers) the Ford occupants was held to be lawful in that given what was available at that location, and despite the differences, the officers had a reasonable suspicion to believe that the Ford occupants were the robbers, justifying the stop. (United States v. Martin (8th Cir. IOWA, 2021) 15 F.4th 878.)

> Stopping a vehicle in a school parking lot where it had been observed parked partially outside a parking space, with its driver (defendant) apparently sleeping, with the engine running, and a crossbow visible on the back seat, was held to be lawful. Aside from the above factors, the Court noted that the visible crossbow on the back seat was sufficient "reasonable suspicion" all by itself to justify the stop in order to investigate the defendant having a dangerous weapon on school grounds. (United States v. Coleman (4th Cir. VA 2021) 18 F.4th 131.)

Stopping a Vehicle When Its Owner Has a Revoked License or a Warrant for His Arrest:

> "(T)he Fourth Amendment permits an officer to initiate a brief investigative traffic stop when he has 'a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person stopped of

> "'Although a mere "hunch" does not create reasonable suspicion, the level of suspicion the standard requires is considerably less than proof of wrongdoing by a preponderance of the evidence, and obviously less than is necessary for probable cause.'" (Kansas v. Glover, supra, quoting Navarette v. California (2014) 572 U.S. 393, 397 [134 S.Ct. 1683; 188 L.Ed.2nd 680 (quotation altered); and United States v. Sokolow (1989) 490 U.S. 1, 7 [109 S.Ct. 1581; 104 L.Ed.2nd 1].)
>
> In Glover, the United States Supreme Court held that observing defendant's vehicle, which a records check revealed was owned by someone with a revoked license, "provided more than reasonable suspicion" to assume that it was defendant who was driving at the time and to initiate a traffic stop, at least absent any other information that it was not the registered owner of the vehicle who was operating the car at the time. (Kansas v. Glover, supra, at p. __; noting on pg. __ that "the presence of additional facts might dispel reasonable suspicion."
> Note: In Glover, the officer's records check revealed that defendant's driver's license had been "revoked," which under Kansas law, meant that he had done something serious enough to show a proclivity for having little regard for Kansas' laws. As noted in the concurring opinion, the result might have been different had defendant's license merely been "suspended," which can happened for offenses as minor as failing to pay parking tickets, court fees, or child support. Under such a circumstance, two concurring justices would not have found sufficient reasonable suspicion to believe it was the defendant who was driving his own vehicle. (Id, at pp. __-__.)

See also States v. Yancey (7th Cir, 2019) 928 F.3rd 627, where officers stopped a vehicle because they believed the driver had an outstanding warrant. The stop was lawful. And then, after arresting the driver, the officers did not let the passenger drive the vehicle away, instead waiting to determine whether the passenger had a valid license. Without finding reasonable suspicion to continue to hold the passenger, the court held that ensuring the passenger "could legally drive the car" was part of the stop's mission and justified extending the detention for two additional minutes. (Id. at 631.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal also extended the rule of Glover to include with the officer has a reasonable suspicion to believe that the registered owner has an outstanding warrant for her arrest. (United States v. Nault (9th Cir. 2022) 41 F.4th 1073, 1079, and fn. 3.)

To serve a warrant, the officer need only know that the registered owner has an outstanding warrant and may stop the vehicle even without seeing the driver or the vehicle's occupants. (People v. Dominquez (1987) 194 Cal.App.3d 1315, 1317-1318; People v. Williams (1995) 33 Cal.App.4th 467, 476.)

Mistake of Law vs. Mistake of Fact:

Mistake of Law:

Original Rule:

The long-standing rule has been that an officer making a traffic stop based upon a misapprehension of the law, (i.e., a "mistake of law"), even if reasonable (but, see Heien, below), is an illegal stop. (United States v. Lopez-Soto (9th Cir. 2000) 205 F.3rd 1101; United States v. Morales (9th Cir. 2001) 252 F.3rd 1070, 1073, fn. 3.)

As a general rule, a mistake of law, whether reasonable or not, could not be the basis for finding probable cause or a reasonable suspicion. (People v. Teresinski (1982) 30 Cal.3rd 822; involving an officer's mistaken belief that a curfew violation applied. "Courts on strong policy grounds have generally refused to excuse a police officer's mistake of law." (Id., at p. 831.)

See People v. White (2003) 107 Cal.App.4th 636, 643-644; police officer unaware that Arizona did not require a front license plate; stop illegal.

There is some authority to the contrary. (People v. Glick (1988) 203 Cal.App.3rd 796.) But this is based upon an unusual fact situation; i.e., California police officer did not know that New Jersey doesn't require registration stickers on their license plates. This is a minority opinion that most courts will not follow.

An officer's mistake of law; i.e., his belief that Baja California, Mexico, required motorists to affix a registration sticker on the car so that it would be visible from the rear of the vehicle (the registration sticker is actually supposed to be affixed to the vehicle's windshield) resulted in a traffic stop made without the necessary reasonable suspicion. The resulting evidence, therefore, should have been suppressed. (United States v. Lopez-Soto (9th Cir. 2000) 205 F.3rd 1101.)

See United States v. Twilley (9th Cir. 2000) 222 F.3rd 1092; California police officer mistakenly believed that Michigan required two plates.

An officer's misapprehension that a person crossing the street other than in a cross walk was in violation of V.C. § 21954(a), did not justify a detention to cite for that offense when it is later held that the section did not apply. (People v. Ramirez (2006) 140 Cal.App.4th 849.)

An officer's mistaken belief that defendant's vehicle, with no front license plate, violated California law (i.e., V.C. § 5202), because it didn't have a front license plate but had a valid rear Florida license plate, when unknown to the officer Florida does not issue two license plates to automobiles, was an inexcusable mistake of law. (People v. Reyes (2011) 196 Cal.App.4th 856.)

New Rule:

Where a mistake of law is based upon a misapprehension of the scope of a statute that has yet to be decided, then such a mistake is "reasonable," and not a violation of the Fourth Amendment when a traffic stop is made based upon that misapprehension. (Heien v. North Carolina (2014) 574 U.S. 54 [135 S.Ct. 530; 190 L.Ed.2nd 475]; unclear under North Carolina statutes whether a vehicle with one brake light out was a vehicle code violation.)

Note: Although the general rule continues to be that a mistake of law does not excuse an otherwise illegal stop, detention, or arrest, Heien discredits any of the above cases to the extent that they held that such a mistake of law cannot overcome the fact of an illegal stop, detention, or arrest even though such a mistake is "objectively reasonable."

See also People v. Holiman (2022) 76 Cal.App.5th 825, 831; "If the detaining officer's justification for a traffic stop is based on a mistake—either factual or legal—then the resulting search or seizure is lawful under the Fourth Amendment as long as the officer's mistake is objectively reasonable. (Citing Heien v. North Carolina, supra, at pp. 57, 60–61, 67; for the proposition that the a traffic stop may be found lawful where an officer's mistake as to the meaning of a statute is reasonable.

In Holiman, the Court determined that the officer's mistake in her interpretation of V.C. §§ 22107 & 22108 was not objectively reasonable by assuming that her car being positioned behind defendant's car was affected by defendant's failing to signal for 100 feet before making a turn. Ultimately, the Court ruled that it was not reasonable for the officer to believe that defendant, stopping at a stop sign with a full-sized car (the patrol car) behind him that could not have fit in the limited space to the right of defendant's car, could have been affected by defendant's failure to signal. Thus, the subsequent traffic stop was illegal in that V.C. §§ 22107/22108 was not violated, and the resulting contraband found in defendant's car should have been suppressed.

Heien cites Michigan v. DeFillippo (1979) 443 U.S. 31 [99 S.Ct. 2627; 61 L.Ed.2nd 343], where a city ordinance allowing for defendant's arrest was declared, after the fact, to be unconstitutional. The officer's good faith reliance upon the city ordinance was held to be a reasonable mistake of law, justifying the arrest.

Where police officers detained defendant because he was "riding a bicycle in a business district," eventually arresting him for being under the influence of a controlled substance, when the initial detention was based upon a local ordinance prohibiting the operation of a bicycle "upon any sidewalk fronting any commercial business establishment unless official signs are posted authorizing such use" (San Diego Municipal Code § 84.09(a)), the detention was held to be illegal. Defendant was stopped in front of a building that was no longer operating as a business and thus, as interpreted by this court, not covered by the ordinance. With no prior guidance, however, the officers' "expansive" interpretation of the statute ("mistake of law") was not unreasonable under the circumstances. Pursuant to the rule of Heien v. North Carolina, supra, therefore, the officers' reasonable mistake of law did not negate defendant's detention and subsequent arrest. (People v. Campuzano (2015) 237 Cal.App.4th Supp. 14, 18-21.)

In a securities fraud case, it was alleged that between 2001 and 2007, each of 31 individual investors purchased one or more of 16 different investments from defendant's company. And for each of those investments, it was the prosecution's theory that various material omissions or misstatements were made either through the offering documents or during the sale of the investment. Upon defendant's conviction on all counts, the Appellate Court ruled that the trial court erred by failing to instruct the jury on "mistake of law" on those counts related to defendant's omissions, such omissions being argued by defendant as based on his four attorneys' advice. The error, however, was held to be harmless.

> "(M)istake of law can be a valid defense when the crime requires specific intent if the mistake of law negates the specific intent of the crime." (pg. 806.)

Mistake of Fact: An officer making a traffic stop based upon a "mistake of fact," "held reasonably and in good faith," will not invalidate the stop. (See below.)

> Sheriff's deputies stopping defendants' car based upon a computer check indicating that the vehicle's registration had expired, when in fact the registration had already been renewed. Absent some reason to believe that the computer information was not accurate, the stop was held to be lawful. (United States v. Miguel (9th Cir. 2004) 368 F.3rd 1150.)
>
> A missing rear license plate and no visible temporary registration displayed in the rear window, even though the temporary registration is later found to be in the front windshield, but not visible to the officer coming up behind the vehicle, is sufficient reasonable suspicion to justify a traffic stop. (In re Raymond C. (2008) 45 Cal.4th 303.)
>
> > As noted in fn. 2: "A temporary permit is to be placed in the lower rear window. However, if it would be obscured there, it may be placed in the lower right corner of either the windshield or a side window." (DMV Handbook of Registration Procedures (Oct. 2007) ch. 2, § 2.020, p. 7.)
>
> An officer stopping a vehicle for having illegally tinted windows, when the Plaintiff alleges that the windows were rolled down and not visible to the officer, is, at best, an unreasonable mistake of fact, and does not provide the officer with qualified immunity from civil liability. (Liberal v. Estrada (9th Cir. 2011) 632 F.3rd 1064, 1077-1078.)
> However, where a "high risk" stop of a suspected stolen vehicle was made, such stop being precipitated by a misreading of the license plate by an "automated license plate reader" and where the stop was made without first making a visual verification that the license on the stopped vehicle was as interpreted by the plate reader, the lawfulness of such a stop was held to be a triable issue for a civil jury to decide. (Green v. City & County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2014) 751 F.3rd 1039, 1045-1046; discounting without discussion the possibility that the stop was based upon a reasonable mistake of fact.)

> Note: In a case in which two organizations petitioned for a writ of mandate to compel disclosure of requested automated license plate reader (ALPR) data pursuant to the California Public Records Act, the California Supreme Court, reversing a lower court, concluded that the ALPR scan data at issue are not subject to Govt. Code § 6254(f)'s exemption for records of investigations. The process of ALPR scanning does not produce records of investigations because the scans are not conducted as a part of a targeted inquiry into any particular crime or crimes. Regarding the application of the catchall exemption set forth in Govt. Code § 6255(a), the Supreme Court noted the trial court appeared to have placed significant weight on speculative concerns about possible disclosure of mobile ALPR patrol patterns, without record evidence to support its conclusions. The Court held this to be error. (American Civil Liberties Union Foundation v. Superior Court (2017) 3 Cal.5th 1032.)

A man who went into the backyard of a home, tried unsuccessfully to break in, and was sitting on a bench when police encountered him, might actually have thought, as he claimed, that the house belonged to his cousin, the California Supreme Court held in a unanimous decision, criticizing the Court of Appeal's majority for usurping the function of a jury by factually finding that the account lacked credibility as an unreasonable mistake of fact. The rule is that a defendant's mistaken belief need not be reasonable, just genuinely held, contrary to instructions given by the trial court to the jury. The only question on appeal was whether the instructional error was prejudicial and thus required reversal. (People v. Hendrix (2022) 13 Cal.5th 933; holding that the error was prejudicial.)

Pretext Stops: A "pretext (or pretextual) stop" is one where law enforcement officers stop a vehicle usually for some minor traffic infraction but where the officers' true motivation is actually to investigate some more serious offense for which there is no reasonable suspicion.

Whren v. United States: A prior three-way split of opinion on the legality of such a practice was finally resolved by the U.S. Supreme Court in Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89], upholding the legality of such a practice. (See also People v. Gomez (2004) 117 Cal.App.4th 531, 537; and People v. Gallardo (2005) 130 Cal.App.4th 234.)

A law enforcement officer's actions, so long as objectively reasonable, might still result in the admissibility of illegally seized evidence because of the "good faith" exception. (United States v. Leon (1984) 468 U.S. 897 [104 S.Ct. 3405; 82 L.Ed.2nd 677]; see also People v. Hull (1995) 34 Cal.App.4th 1448; People v. Suff (2014) 58 Cal.4th 1013, 1054.) (See "Good Faith," below.)

Per Whren, so long as there is some lawful justification for making the stop, the officers' subjective motivations are irrelevant. (Ibid; see also United States v. Miranda-Guerena (9th Cir. 2006) 445 F.3rd 1233.)

Whren is based upon the United States Constitution's Fourth Amendment, precluding a state's attempt to impose a stricter standard upon law enforcement, unless the state chooses to employ its own Constitution (under the theory of "independent state grounds") (Arkansas v. Sullivan (2001) 532 U.S. 769 [532 S.Ct.769; 149 L.Ed.2nd 994].)

The "pretext stop" theory of Whren v. United States applies to civil parking violations as well as any criminal violation. (United States v. Choudhry (9th Cir. 2006) 461 F.3rd 1097.)

Under Whren, the reasonableness of a traffic stop under the Fourth Amendment is based on objective criteria and not the actual or subjective motivations of a law enforcement officer involved. Specifically, "as long as a traffic stop is warranted by objectively reasonable facts, a claim that the officer making the stop was acting in accordance with some hidden agenda will not be grounds a successful Fourth Amendment challenge." In this case, the Court held that a

Maine State Trooper had a reasonable basis to believe that defendant had committed a traffic infraction (ignoring a traffic sign commanding drivers to stay to the right except while passing). As a result, the Court held that the trooper was entitled to conduct the traffic stop, regardless of any subjective motivation he possessed. (United States v. Miles (1st Cir. ME 2021) 18 F.4th 76.)

"Pretextual stops are tolerated—so long as the lawful bounds that justify the stop are observed—because the subjective intent of officers is irrelevant in Fourth Amendment analysis." (People v. Esparza (2023) 95 Cal.App.5th 1084, 1094; citing Whren v. United States, supra, at p. 814.)

Old California Rule:

Until passage of Proposition 8, California Courts were obligated to follows California's stricter rules that in some circumstances may (and lawfully were allowed to) have been stricter than the federal standards. (See American Academy of Pediatrics v. Lungren (1997) 16 Cal.4th 307, 327-328; Raven v. Deukmejian (1990) 52 Cal.3rd 336. 353.)

California Courts' ability to use "Independent State Grounds" as a basis for imposing stricter rules on law enforcement was eliminated with passage of Proposition 8 in June, 1982, and its "Truth in Evidence" provisions. (In re Lance W. (1985) 37 Cal.3rd 873.)

Since passage of Proposition 8, California state courts now determine the reasonableness of a search or seizure by federal constitutional standards, and thus follows Whren. (People v. Schmitz (2012) 55 Cal.4th 909, 916; People v. Steele (2016) 246 Cal.App.4th 1110, 1114-1115.) (See "California's Exclusionary Rule; Proposition 8," under "Arrests" (Chapter 5), below.)

Pretext Issues:

Use of the federal material witness statute (18 U.S.C. 3144), authorizing the detention of a material witness based upon a reasonable suspicion, may lawfully be used as a pretext to arrest a material witness under certain circumstances, even where shown that there was no real intent to use the detainee as a witness. (Ashcroft v. al-Kidd (2011) 563 U.S. 731, 741-744 [131 S.Ct. 2074; 179 L.Ed. 2nd 1149].)

Stopping defendant's vehicle upon observing an expired temporary registration sticker upheld despite the officers' real purpose of investigating his involvement in the sale of narcotics. (United States v. Fowlkes (9th Cir. 2015) 804 F.3rd 954, 971.)

In that an officer's reasonable suspicion of a violation of the law is enough to justify a stop a vehicle, and test being an objective one so that the officer's subjective thinking is irrelevant, the fact that the officer lied to the defendant about the reasons for the stop is also irrelevant. (United States v. Magallon-Lopez (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 671, 675.)

Officers of the San Jose Police Department were held to have unlawfully prolonged a traffic stop (estimated at 18 minutes, based upon body camera recordings) in violation of defendant's Fourth Amendment rights, overruling the trial court on this issue. The record showed the stop was actually part of a preexisting drug investigation and that the officers had used the traffic investigation as a pretext for the stop. One of the officers who stopped defendant openly admitted on a body camera video of the stop that he never intended to issue a citation. The video also showed that a plainclothes officer requested a narcotics dog before conducting any purported sobriety checks. And the dog handler admitted he had been informed that his presence would be required before the stop had even occurred. The fact of the preexisting drug investigation established that the plainclothes officer's testimony about what he observed during the stop was neither reasonable nor credible, and thus did not constitute substantial evidence under the relevant legal standard. (People v. Ayon (2022) 80 Cal.App.5th 926, 937-941.)

> Note: This case might be interpreted by some as authority for the argument that a pretext stop is illegal where the officers never intended to write a citation for observed traffic infractions, but rather were intent on investigating defendant's suspected illegal transportation of drugs; a questionable conclusion considering that the U.S. Supreme Court has clearly held that pretext stops are lawful and that an officer's subjective motivations are irrelevant (see "Pretext Stops," above, and Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89]. In actuality, the Court here merely noted only that the officers' true intention to conduct a narcotics investigation is relevant to why the traffic stop was prolonged beyond the time it would have taken to conduct the "mission" of the traffic stop. Aside from this issue, the duration of the stop (18 minutes) clearly exceeded the time limits necessary for completing the mission of the traffic stop; i.e., to write a citation for the observed traffic violation.

"(I)nvestigations conducted by officers not directly related to the initial purpose of the stop 'do not convert the encounter into something other than a lawful seizure, so long as the inquiries do not measurably extend the stop's duration.'" (People v. Esparza (2023) 95 Cal.App.5th 1084, 1094; quoting Arizona v. Johnson (2009) 555 U.S. 323, 333 [172 L.Ed.2nd 694; 129 S.Ct. 781].)

Exceptions: The theory of Whren is subject to exceptions:

Rule: Contrary to the general rule, an officer's motivations in conducting a search do matter in three limited situations; i.e., in "special needs" searches, "administrative searches," and when conducting a "knock and talk" within the curtilage (e.g., front porch) of a home. (United States v. Lundin (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 1151, 1159-1160; see also United States v. McCarty (9th Cir. 2011) 2011 U.S. App. LEXIS 18874 [vacated and remanded]; child pornography observed during a lawful TSA administrative search may lawfully be used to establish probable cause to arrest.)

On remand of McCarty, defendant's motion to suppress was denied at United States v. McCarty (2011) 835 F.Supp.2nd 938.

In Lundin, the Ninth Circuit quoted the Supreme Court in Florida v. Jardines (2013) 569 U.S. 1 [133 S.Ct. 1409; 185 L.Ed.2nd 495], noting that: "After Jardines, it is clear that, like the special-needs and administrative-inspection exceptions, the 'knock and talk' exception depends at least in part on an officer's subjective intent." (United States v. Lundin, supra, at p. 1160.)

In Jardins, in discussing the legality of entering the front porch area of defendant's home (i.e., the "curtilage") with a drug-sniffing dog, the Supreme Court noted that: "Here, however, the question before the court is precisely whether the officer's conduct was an objectively reasonable search. As we have described, that depends upon whether the officers had an implied license to enter the porch, which in turn depends upon the purpose for which they entered. Here, their behavior objectively reveals a purpose to conduct a search, which is not what anyone would think he had license to do." (Italics in original; Id., 133 S.Ct. 1409, 1416-1417.)

See United States v. Orozco (9th Cir. 2017) 858 F.3rd 1204, 1210-1212, for a description of the various cases illustrating the exceptions to the rule of Whren.

Administrative Searches:

When the pretext used for making a stop is to conduct an "administrative search," such as inspecting the licensing of a taxicab, per local ordinance, or an inventory vehicle search, making a traffic stop is unlawful, and any direct products of that stop are subject to suppression. (People v. Valenzuela (1999) 74 Cal.App.4th 1202; Whren v. United States, supra, at pp. 811-812.)

Narcotics detection in the form of a highway check point cannot be justified as a valid administrative purpose. (City of Indianapolis v. Edmond (2000) 531 U.S. 32 [121 S.Ct. 447; 148 L.Ed.2nd 333].)

Use of Nevada's "NAS Level III paperwork inspection" administrative search statutes, which authorize the suspicionless search of a commercial truck under statutes that are intended "to enforce the provisions of state and federal laws and regulations relating to motor carriers, the safety of their vehicles and equipment, and their transportation of hazardous material and other cargo," as a pretext to search for smuggled drugs, held to be a illegal pretext search. The only purpose of the stop was to investigate criminal activity and that any alleged administrative purpose for the stop was "only a charade to camouflage the real purpose of the stop." (United States v. Orozco (9th Cir, 2017) 858 F.3rd 1204.)

> The Court held in Orozco that the presence of a criminal investigatory motive, by itself, will not necessarily render an administrative stop and search an illegal pretextual stop or search in all cases. The test is an objective one: A pretextual administrative search will be held to be illegal only in those cases where the officer would not have made the stop or search except for the presence of the invalid purpose. (Id. at pp. 1213-1216.)
> However, see the concurring opinion in United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2018) 889 F.3rd 1120, at pp. 1129-1133, where the two concurring justices note that "such decision contradicts earlier Supreme Court precedent and that Orozco therefore ought to be reconsidered by our court," and that the Supreme Court has explicitly—and unanimously—rejected the approach we adopted in Orozco," citing Brigham City v. Stuart (2006) 547 U.S. 398 [126 S.Ct. 1943; 164 L.Ed.2nd 650], as authority for this argument.

Vehicle Impound Searches:

> An officer's intent to use the impoundment of a vehicle driven by an unlicensed defendant and an inventory search as a pretext to look for narcotics-related evidence was found not to come within the legally recognized grounds for impounding vehicles pursuant to law enforcement's community caretaking function. Inventory searches being an exception to the rule of Whren, the officer's subjective intent in impounding defendant's car was held to be relevant. (People v. Torres (2010) 188

Cal.App.4th 775, 785-793; People v. Lee (2019) 40 Cal.App.5th 853. 867-869.)

The purpose of an inventory search of an impounded vehicle is to produce an inventory of the items in the car and not to look for incriminating evidence. An administrative search, such as a vehicle inventory search, is an exception to the general rule that an officer's subjective intent in conducting such a search is irrelevant. (United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2018) 889 F.3rd 1120, 1125.)

> However, see the concurring opinion at pp. 1129-1133, where the two concurring justices note that "such decision contradicts earlier Supreme Court precedent and that Orozco therefore ought to be reconsidered by our court," and that the Supreme Court has explicitly—and unanimously—rejected the approach we adopted in Orozco," citing Brigham City v. Stuart (2006) 547 U.S. 398 [126 S.Ct. 1943; 164 L.Ed.2nd 650], as authority for this argument.

Also see United States v. Snoddy (6th Cir. 2020) 976 F.3rd 630, where the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeal held that despite the officer's stated intent to impound defendant's vehicle in order to search for drugs (i.e., a "pretextual search"), the impound of his vehicle was lawful, defendant having been arrested on drug warrants and the community caretaking requirements satisfied). The impound and inventory search of defendant's car was therefore lawful.

Special Needs Searches or Seizures:

"(W)hile the traditional Fourth Amendment analysis 'is predominantly an objective inquiry,' the 'actual motivations' of officers may be considered when applying the special needs doctrine." (Scott v. County of San Bernardino (9th Cir. 2018) 903 F.3rd 943, 949, citing Ashcroft v. al-Kidd (2011) 563 U.S. 731, 736 [131 S.Ct. 2074; 179 L.Ed.2nd 1149].)

> "(W)here it is 'clear from the testimony' of the arresting officer that the seizure occurred for an impermissible motive, '[t]his alone is sufficient to conclude that [a] warrantless [arrest] [is] unreasonable' . . . An arrest meant only to 'teach a lesson' and arbitrarily punish perceived disrespect is clearly unreasonable under T.L.O." (at p. 950.) (Scott v. County of San Bernardino, supra, at p. 950.)

See also Gray ex rel. Alexander v. Bostic (8th Cir. 2006) 458 F.3rd 1295, 1306, finding the handcuffing of a young student to be unreasonable under T.L.O. where the arresting officer "candidly admitted" that he did so "to persuade her to get rid of her disrespectful attitude and to impress upon her the serious nature of committing crimes."

When the Use of a Pretext is illegal:

> When a stop or search is not a "run-of-the-mine" case, such as "cases where 'searches or seizures [were] conducted in an extraordinary manner, usually harmful to an individual's privacy or even physical interests—such as, for example, seizure by means of deadly force, unannounced entry into a home, entry into a home without a warrant, or physical penetration of the body.' (Citing Whren v. United States, supra, at p. 818.)" (United States v. Ibarra (9th Cir. 2003) 345 F.3rd 711, 715.)
> The theory of Whren is limited to those circumstances where a police officer is aware of facts that would support an arrest. "(A)lthough Whren stands for the proposition that a pretextual seizure based on the illegitimate subjective intentions of an officer may be permissible, it does not alter the fact that the pretext itself must be a constitutionally sufficient basis for the seizure and the facts supporting it must be known at the time it is conducted." (Moreno v. Baca (9th Cir. 2005) 431 F.3rd 633, 640; finding that a belatedly discovered arrest warrant and parole search conditions did not justify a detention and search.)

> Whren requires that there be some legal reason for the officer's actions. This does not allow for officers to bring a drug-sniffing dog into the curtilage of a suspect's home (i.e., the front porch), without a warrant, for the purpose of seeking evidence of the presence of contraband; held to be a search by the United States Supreme Court. (Florida v. Jardines (2013) 569 U.S. 1, 10 [133 S.Ct. 1409; 185 L.Ed.2nd 495].)

Racial Profiling: Query: Does Whren validate a traffic stop when the officer's real motivation is based upon prohibited "racial profiling?" The answer has to be: No!

> "(D)iscrimination on the basis of race, 'odious in all aspects, is especially pernicious in the administration of justice,'" (Pena-Rodriguez v. Colorado (2017) 580 U.S. 206, 223 [137 S.Ct. 855, 859; 197 L.Ed.2nd 107]; criticizing a juror's apparent prejudice towards Mexican males, and quoting Rose* v. *Mitchell (1979) 443 U.S. 545, 555 [99 S.Ct. 2993; 61 L.Ed.2nd 739].)
>
> Balancing the constitutional principles involved (e.g., Fourteenth Amendment and Calif. Const. Art I, §§ 7, 15, equal protection and due process), and the state and federal statutes the officer would be violating (18 U.S.C. §§ 241, 242; 42 U.S.C. 1983; P.C. §§ 422.6(a), 13519.4; and C.C. § 52.1), a court will not likely uphold such a stop. (See also Baluyut v. Superior Court (1996) 12 Cal.4th 826; equal protection; and Shapiro v. Thompson (1969) 394 U.S. 618 [89 S.Ct. 1322; 22 L.Ed.2nd 600]; discrimination may be so arbitrary and injurious as to be deemed a due process violation.
> > Note: The constitutional requirement of "Equal Protection" has an interesting history and application: "The United States Constitution as originally written had no provision guaranteeing equal treatment under the law. After the Civil War, discrimination against former slaves led to the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides: "No State shall … deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." (U.S. Const., 14th Amend., § 1.) Since its passage, courts have formulated a general analytical framework for analyzing equal protection claims.

(People v. Lynch (2012) 209 Cal.App.4th 353, 358 . . . .) The California Constitution also contains an equal protection clause (Cal. Const., art. I, § 7); the federal and state clauses are analyzed in substantially the same manner. (Lynch, at p. 358.) (⁋) An analysis of an equal protection claim proceeds as follows: 'We first ask whether the two classes are similarly situated with respect to the purpose of the law in question, but are treated differently. [Citation.] If groups are similarly situated but treated differently, the state must then provide a rational justification for the disparity. [Citation.] However, a law that interferes with a fundamental constitutional right or involves a suspect classification, such as race or national origin (italics added), is subject to strict scrutiny requiring a compelling state interest. [Citation.]' (People v. Lynch, supra, 209 Cal.App.4th at p. 358.) Equal protection claims are reviewed de novo. (People v. McKee (2012) 207 Cal.App.4th 1325, 1338 . . . .)" (People v. Wolfe (2018) 20 Cal.App.5th 673, 686-687; a DUI second degree murder case.)

The Supreme Court itself, in Whren, specifically noted that; "We of course agree with petitioners that the Constitution prohibits selective enforcement of the law based on considerations such as race." (Whren v. United States, supra, at p. 813 [135 L.Ed.2nd at p. 98].)

Discrimination by law enforcement officers based upon a person's race in the providing of both protective and non-protective services is a constitutional equal protection violation. (Ae Ja Elliot-Park v. Manglona (9th Cir. 2010) 592 F.3rd 1003.)

> However, to sustain an "equal protection" argument, a plaintiff must produce evidence sufficient to permit a reasonable trier of fact to find by a preponderance of the evidence that the officer's actions were racially motivated. (Sandoval v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't. (9th Cir. 2014) 756 F.3rd 1154, 1167)
>
> Such "racial profiling" would be a Fourteenth Amendment "due process" violation. (Ae Ja Elliot-Park v. Manglona, supra; see also United States v. Ibarra (9th Cir. 2003) 345 F.3rd 711, 714.)

While a person's race may properly be used as an identification factor when in conjunction with other factors, but standing alone, a person's race is insufficient to justify the detention of a person as the suspect in a crime. (See People v. Walker (2012) 210 Cal.App.4th 1372, 1388-1389: "(T)here was a sense that the detaining officer relied too heavily on the common general traits of race and age in attempting to justify a stop that had no other circumstances to warrant it."

"(T)he race of an occupant (of a vehicle), without more, does not satisfy the detention standard." (People v. Bates (2013) 222 Cal.App.4th 60, 67; citing People v. Bower (1979) 24 Cal.3rd 638, 644.)

Note also that California has sought to prevent racial and identity profiling through mandated written guidelines, training, and extensive reporting requirements on the details of all detentions and arrests. (See Gov't. Code § 12525.5: "The Racial and Identity Profiling Act of 2015."

> See also P.C. §§ 13012 and 13519.4. "A peace officer shall not engage in racial or identity profiling." (P.C. § 13519.4(f))

Also, the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to a fair trial takes precedence over a state statute that precludes or restricts inquiry into the validity of a jury's verdict (i.e., the "no impeachment rule") when there is "compelling evidence" that a juror, during deliberations, made a clear statement indicating that he or she relied upon racial stereotypes or animus to convict a defendant. (Pena-Rodriguez v. Colorado (2017) 580 U.S. 206 [137 S.Ct. 855; 197 L.Ed.2nd 107].)

The Supreme Court has also held that a defendant (a black male) in a capital murder case received ineffective assistance of counsel (a Sixth Amendment violation) when his attorney called as an expert witness a psychologist who, as a part of his expert opinion as to the potential future dangerousness of the defendant, testified that black men are statistically more likely to be violent. The Court ruled that it was inappropriate for a jury to consider race no matter how it was injected into the proceeding, rejecting the argument that it was invited error because defendant's own attorney was the one who called the expert to testify. (Buck v. Davis (2017) 580 U.S. 100 [137 S.Ct. 759; 197 L.Ed.2nd 1].)

See "Racial Profiling and Implicit Bias," above.

Motor Vehicle Passengers:

To Arrest a Passenger:

The stop of the defendant's car upon observing a passenger in the car for which there was a known outstanding arrest warrant is lawful. When the stop revealed the defendant/driver was in possession of a billy club, the officer lawfully arrested him as well. (In re William J. (1985) 171 Cal.App.3rd 72.)

"A momentary stop of an automobile by police to investigate a passenger reasonably believed to be involved in a past crime is proper. It creates a minimal inconvenience to the driver of that automobile, when balanced against the government's interest in apprehending criminals." (Id., at p. 77.)

To Detain a Passenger: Is a passenger in a vehicle when the driver is stopped and detained also subject to being detained, thus implicating the passenger's privacy rights?

The United States Supreme Court reversed the California Supreme Court on this issue and held that at least in a private motor vehicle (as opposed to a taxi, bus, or other common carrier), the passenger, by virtue of being in a vehicle stopped for a possible traffic infraction, is in fact detained, giving him the right to challenge the legality of the traffic stop. (Brendlin v. California (2007) 551 U.S. 249 [127 S.Ct. 2400; 168 L.Ed.2nd 132].)

The test is whether, "in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave." Or, in the case where the person has no desire to leave, "whether 'a reasonable person would feel free to decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter.'" (Id., 127 S.Ct., at pp. 2405-2406.)

If the driver is stopped for a traffic-related offense, a "passenger will expect to be subject to some scrutiny, and his attempt to leave the scene would be so obviously likely to prompt an objection from the officer that no passenger would feel free to leave in the first place." If the driver is stopped for something unrelated to his driving, a "passenger will reasonably feel subject to suspicion owning to close association" with the driver. (Id., 127 S.Ct., at p. 2407.)

This decision is in accord with the majority of prior cases that have considered this issue. (See People v. Bell (1996) 43 Cal.App.4th 754; see also People v. Grant (1990) 217 Cal.App.3rd 1451, 1460; People v. Hunt (1990) 225 Cal.App.3rd 498, 505; People v. Lionberger (1986) 185 Cal.App.3rd Supp. 1, 5; and People v. Lamont (2004) 125 Cal.App.4th 404; United States v. Twilley (9th Cir. 2000) 222 F.3rd 1092, 1095; United States v. Eylicio-Montoya (10th Cir. 1995) 70 F.3rd 1158, 1164; United States v. Kimball (1st Cir. 1994) 25 F.3rd 1, 5-6; United States v. Roberson (5th Cir. 1993) 6 F.3rd 1088, 1091; United States v. Rusher (4th Cir. 1992) 966 F.2nd 868, 874, fn. 4.)

Note also that even if the passenger is illegally detained, any evidence recovered from the vehicle, if not the product of the illegal detention, will be admissible. (United States v. Pulliam (9th Cir. 2005) 405 F.3rd 782, 787; a vehicle search was done independent of the defendant's detention.)

Although Brendlin, on its face, appears to deal only with the right (i.e., "standing") of the passenger to challenge the legality of the traffic stop (Brendlin v. California, supra., at pp. 256-259.), and arguably was not intended as authority for the continued detention of a passenger who might choose to walk away, the U.S. Supreme Court subsequently ruled quite clearly that "(t)he police need not have, in addition, cause to believe any occupant of the (lawfully stopped) vehicle is involved in criminal activity" to justify a continued detention for the duration of the traffic stop. (Arizona v. Johnson (2009) 555 U.S. 323 [129 S.Ct. 781; 172 L.Ed.2nd 694].)

> Also; "The temporary seizure of driver and passengers ordinarily continues, and remains reasonable, for the duration of the stop." (Id., at p. 325.)
> And then: "(A) traffic stop of a car communicates to a reasonable passenger that he or she is not free to terminate the encounter with the police and move about at will." (Ibid.)

The California Supreme Court is in apparent agreement with this interpretation, holding that upon ordering the passenger out of the vehicle; "there is a social expectation of unquestioned police command, which is at odds with any notion that a passenger would feel free to leave without advance permission." (People v. Hoyos (2007) 41 Cal.4th 872, 892-894; brief, one-minute detention, necessitated for purposes of officer safety, held to be lawful.)

Should additional justification be required to continue the detention of a passenger, prior case law notes that the detention can be justified by a showing that the passenger is in "close association" with persons (e.g., the driver) reasonably suspected of illegal activity. (People v. Samples (1996) 48 Cal.App.4th 1197.)

Otherwise, there must at least be some reason for the officer to believe that his safety will be placed in jeopardy in order to justify a refusal to allow a passenger to walk away from a traffic stop. (See People v. Vibanco (2007) 151 Cal.App.4th 1; and "Ordering In," below.)

Defendant as the passenger in a vehicle where the driver was being arrested on warrants was upheld on the theory that an officer may detain the passengers as well as the driver while a traffic stop is ongoing. (United States v. Yancey (7th Cir. IL 2019) 928 F.3rd 627.)

Ordering Out: The law is clear that upon making a lawful traffic stop, the driver may be ordered out of the vehicle without the need for the officer to justify why. (Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977) 434

U.S. 106, 111 [98 S.Ct. 330; 54 L.Ed.2nd 331, 337]; People v. Evans (2011) 200 Cal.App.4th 735, 743.)

> The Mimms majority notes that the justification for ordering the driver out of the car is "officer's safety." But the Court reversed the Pennsylvania Supreme Court's decision (at Commonwealth v. Mimms (1977) 471 Pa 546.) which held in effect that the Fourth Amendment had been violated "because the officer could not point to 'objective observable facts to support a suspicion that criminal activity was afoot or that the occupants of the vehicle posed a threat to police safety.'" (Id., at p. 108.)
>
> > Note: It appears from this that an officer's general justification of "officer's safety," without the need to specifically identify what factors contributed to this conclusion, is sufficient to justify ordering the driver out of his vehicle during a lawful traffic stop. It is suggested, however, to eliminate the issue, an officer, when testifying, note that "officer safety" was the reason (assuming the officer actually felt this) a driver was ordered out of his car, even if the officer cannot point to what it was that caused him or her concern for his or her safety.
>
> Although previously subject to a split of opinion, the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that the same rules apply to passengers other than the driver. If anything, the need to protect the safety of the officers is even greater when he must deal with more than just a lone driver. (Maryland v. Wilson (1997) 519 U.S. 408 [117 S.Ct. 882; 137 L.Ed.2nd 41]; see also Ruvalcata v. City of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 1995) 64 F.3rd 1323.)
>
> Prior state law was leaning in that direction anyway, allowing drivers and passengers to be ordered out of a vehicle with very little cause:
>
> > To corroborate the driver's identity, and for officer's safety. (People v. Maxwell (1988) 206 Cal.App.3rd 1004, 1009.)
> >
> > Where there is a legitimate need to search the vehicle. (People v. Webster (1991) 54 Cal.3rd 411.)

> Less justification than is needed for a patdown will warrant the ordering of a passenger out of a vehicle. (People v. Superior Court* [Simon] (1972) 7 Cal.3rd 186, 206, fn. 13.)

Citing Mimms and Wilson, the California Supreme Court has cited with approval "an officer's authority to order a passenger to exit a vehicle during a traffic stop as a matter of course." (People v. Saunders (2006) 38 Cal.4th 1129, 1134.)

The California Supreme Court has further held that it is also lawful to continue to detain the passenger for "at least as long as reasonably necessary for the officer to complete the activity the (lawful ordering out of the car) contemplates." (People v. Hoyos (2007) 41 Cal.4th 872, 892-893.)

Ordering In: The United States Supreme Court has cited studies to the effect that the safest procedure for a peace officer during a traffic stop is to require the driver to remain in his or her vehicle. (Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977) 434 U.S. 106, 119, fn. 10 [98 S.Ct. 330; 54 L.Ed.2nd 331, 337]; dissenting opinion.)

Under the same rationale, some federal courts have ruled that an officer may order a passenger to remain in the vehicle, at least where the passenger has not expressed an intent to simply leave the scene, or when the passenger is interfering with the officer's contact with the driver. (Rogala v. District of Columbia (D.C. Cir. 1998) 161 F.3rd 44; United States v. Moorefield (3rd Cir. 1997) 111 F.3rd 10, 13.)

The Ninth Circuit is in accord, finding that the officer's safety outweighs the minimal intrusion involved in maintaining the status quo by returning the passenger to where he was in the car. (United States v. Williams (9th Cir. 2005) 419 F.3rd 1029.)

> See also Id., at p. 1032, fn. 2, for a list of state cases (other than California) that are in accord.

See also People v. Castellon (1999) 76 Cal.App.4th 1369, upholding the officer's order to a passenger to remain in the vehicle: "(W)e will not second-guess (the officer's) reasonable in-the-field call; it was for the officer to decide whether his personal safety was better preserved by ordering Castellon to stay inside the car or by ordering him out of the vehicle."

But see People v. Gonzalez (1992) 7 Cal.App.4th 381, where ordering a passenger back into a vehicle was held to be an unlawful detention.

> Note: In light of Castellon and Williams, supra, and McDaniel, infra, it can be argued that Gonzalez is a minority opinion, and probably no longer a correct statement of the law, if it ever was. (See People v. McDaniel, infra, below.)
>
> Gonzalez was also criticized as no longer good law in People v. Vibanco (2007) 151 Cal.App.4th 1, at p. 11, where the court specifically held that: "The possibility of a violent encounter is likely to be even greater still when one or more of the passengers in a stopped car attempts to leave while others stay in the car," and that "Wilson can therefore reasonably be interpreted to allow officers as a matter of course to order a passenger or passengers either to get out of the car or to remain in the car during a lawful traffic stop if the officers deem it necessary for officer safety."

The California Supreme Court is also in accord, upholding the constitutionality of requiring a passenger to remain in a vehicle that is lawfully stopped. (People v. McDaniel (2021) 15 Cal.5th 97, 128-131; rejecting defendant's argument that articulable suspicion of criminal activity, over and above merely being the passenger in a lawfully stopped vehicle, is required.)

> After initially ordering defendant to remain in the vehicle, and then upon asking defendant to exit the vehicle, done for the purpose of conducting a pre-impound inventory search of the vehicle, a bulge was noticed in defendant's pocket and a firearm, used in an earlier homicide, was recovered as the result of a lawful patdown for weapons.

And see "To Detain a Passenger," above.

Opening the Door and Leaning Inside:

> But the right to order a suspect out of his vehicle under Mimms does not mean that an officer may open the door and lean into it. Police officers who have reasonable suspicion sufficient to justify a traffic stop—but who lack probable cause or any other particularized justification, such as a reasonable belief that the driver poses a danger—may not open the door to a vehicle and lean inside. Where an officer did so, the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court's denial of a motion to suppress a firearm observed inside the car, vacated his conviction for being a felon in possession of a firearm, and remanded for further proceedings. Because opening the car door and leaning into the car constituted an unlawful search under the Fourth Amendment, the Court ruled that the exclusionary rule applied to the loaded handgun found under the driver's seat because the government made no effort to satisfy its burden to show that the gun was not "the fruit of the poisonous tree," did not invoke the attenuation doctrine, and did not argue that the inevitable-discovery doctrine applied. (United States v. Ngumezi (9th Cir. 2020) 980 F.3rd 1285.)

Demanding Identification: The above case law, however, does not answer the question whether an officer may "demand" that the passenger identify himself.

> An officer may certainly "ask" for identification, so long as he understands that the passenger may refuse. (See Kolender v. Lawson (1983) 461 U.S. 352 [103 S.Ct. 1855; 75 L.Ed.2nd 903]; Brown v. Texas (1979) 443 U.S. 47, 52 [99 S.Ct. 2637; 61 L.Ed.2nd 357]; United States v. Diaz-Castaneda (9th Cir. 2007) 494 F.3rd 1146, 1152-1153.)
>
> But in light of the case law, above, to the effect that the passenger is in fact detained along with the driver (see Brendlin v. California (2007) 551 U.S. 249 [127 S.Ct. 2400; 168 L.Ed.2nd 132].), there's a viable argument that the officer may also require the passenger to identify himself. (See Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada (2004) 542 U.S. 177 [124 S.Ct. 2451; 159 L.Ed.2nd 292].) However, there's just no case directly on point yet.
> > Query: Is it not also arguable that a person detained based upon a reasonable suspicion that he is involved in criminal activity, per Terry v. Ohio, supra, is different than a person detained merely by virtue of being a passenger in a stopped motor vehicle, per Brendlin v. California, supra? While the former may be required to identify himself, the same rule might not apply to the latter. (See Stufflebeam v. Harris (8th Cir. 2008) 521 F.3rd 884; finding the arrest of a passenger who refused to identify himself to be illegal; decided after Brendlin, but failing to mention the case.)

The Ninth Circuit has ruled that demanding identification from a passenger in a vehicle during a lawful traffic stop, absent any reasonable suspicion that the passenger himself is engaged in criminal activity, creates an unlawfully prolonged traffic stop and is illegal. (United States v. Landeros (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 862.)

See "Demanding identification," below.

Flight: While the "flight" of the driver of a vehicle provides probable cause to arrest for various Vehicle Code violations (E.g., V.C. §§ 2800.1 et seq.), and a driver who is subject to citation may not avoid the citation by fleeing on foot (see P.C. § 148(a)), what if the passenger, for whom there is no connection with any illegal activity, chooses to exit the vehicle and run?

The long-standing rule has always been that "flight alone," without other suspicious circumstances, is not sufficient justification for a detention. (People v. Souza (1994) 9 Cal.4th 224.)

Flight, however, where there is sufficient reasonable suspicion to justify a detention, is a criminal offense, punishable under P.C. 148(a)(1). (In re T.F.-G. (2023) 94 Cal.App.5th 893, 903-904, 908.)

However, the United States Supreme Court lowered the bar a little by holding that flight from a so-called "high narcotics area" is sufficient in itself to justify a temporary detention. (Illinois v. Wardlow (2000) 528 U.S. 119 [120 S.Ct. 673; 145 L.Ed.2nd 570].)

Flight of two people is more suspicious than one. Add to this the fact that there appeared to be drug paraphernalia on a table where the two persons had been sitting, and that the defendant was carrying something in his hand as he fled; the officer had sufficient reasonable suspicion to detain him. (People v. Britton (2001) 91 Cal.App.4th 1112, 1118-1119.)

"Unprovoked flight" during an attempted traffic stop in a high crime area, running several stop signs in the process, serves to extend the "mission of the traffic stop" beyond what it would have taken to merely write a citation (for a license plate light violation, in this case). (United States v. Perry (4th Cir. 2024) 92 F.4th 500.)

Note: A defendant's flight may be used as evidence against him at trial, showing an "awareness of guilt." (See P.C. § 1127c and CALCRIM No. 372. See also People v. Price (2017) 8 Cal.App.5th 409, 454-458.)

See "Ordering In," above.

See also "Seriousness of the Offense," above.

Search Incident to a Citation: Although the issuance of a traffic citation is technically an arrest and release on one's promise to appear, it is treated by the courts as a temporary detention only. Temporary detentions do not include the power to conduct a search. Therefore, it is not constitutionally permissible to conduct a non-consensual search of a vehicle incident to a citation, even if authorized by statute. (Knowles v. Iowa (1998) 525 U.S. 113 [119 S.Ct. 484; 142 L.Ed.2nd 492]; see also People v. Brisendine (1975) 13 Cal.3rd 528, 538-552.)

Note: California has no such statute similar to Iowa's.

A "search incident to arrest" (see below) requires the transportation of the arrestee as a prerequisite to a search, absent probable cause to believe there is something illegal to seize. (United States v. Robinson (1973) 414 U.S. 218 [94 S.Ct. 467; 38 L.Ed.2nd 427]; People v. Brisendine (1975) 13 Cal.3rd 528; United States v. Moto (9th Cir. 1993) 982 F.2nd 1384.) Writing a person a traffic citation, of course, does not normally involve the transportation of the person who is cited. He is therefore not subject to search based upon the writing of a traffic ticket alone.

A traffic stop for an equipment violation in a "high crime" (i.e., gang) area at night is not reasonable suspicion sufficient to justify a detention or patdown for weapons. (People v. Medina (2003) 110 Cal.App.4th 171.)

But see People v. McKay (2002) 27 Cal.4th 601, 607-619, a violation of V.C. § 21650.1, riding a bicycle on the wrong side of the street; and People v. Gomez (2004) 117 Cal.App.4th 531, 538-539, a seat belt violation: U.S. Supreme Court decisions have held that a mere violation of state statutory restrictions on making a custodial arrest for a minor criminal offense (e.g., mere traffic infraction) does not mean that the Fourth Amendment was also violated. (See Atwater v. City of Lago Vista (2001) 532 U.S. 318 [121 S.Ct. 1536; 149 L.Ed.2nd 549]; People v. Gallardo (2005) 130 Cal.App.4th 234, 239, fn. 1; People v. Bennett (2011) 197 Cal.App.4th 907, 918.) Absent a constitutional Fourth Amendment violation, evidence that is the product of a state statutory violation is not subject to suppression.

However, "police may not use probable cause for a traffic violation to justify an arrest for an unrelated offense where, under the facts known to police, they have no probable cause supporting the unrelated offense." (People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 765; ruling that just because officers could have arrested defendant for speeding, doesn't mean that that fact justifies an arrest for some other bookable (i.e., a felony) offense for which there was no probable cause. Consent to search obtained without probable cause to justify the arrest for a felony was held to be invalid.)

See "Search Incident to a Citation" under "Other Requirements and Limitations," under "Searches of Persons" (Chapter 11), below.

Detention to Identify a Suspect in a Criminal Offense:

Stopping and detaining a suspect for a felony criminal offense, when balancing law enforcement's interest in identifying criminal suspects with the suspect's interest in personal security from government intrusion, is lawful. (United States v. Hensley (1985) 469 U.S. 221 [105 S.Ct. 675; 83 L.Ed.2nd 604]; a robbery.)

In United States v. Jones (6th Cir. 2020) 953 F.3rd 433, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeal, using the balancing test suggested in Hensley for misdemeanor cases (i.e., turning not on whether the suspect already completed a crime, but rather on the nature of the crime, how long ago the suspect committed it, and the ongoing risk of the individual to the public safety), held that stopping and detaining defendant (found, upon his detention, to be in illegal possession of a firearm) based upon a reasonable suspicion that he had committed a misdemeanor battery on his ex-girlfriend shortly before, was reasonable. In so ruling, the Court concluded that stopping defendant's vehicle, observed at a nearby intersection shortly after having battered the victim, directly promoted the interest of preventing crime in that the girlfriend credibly claimed that defendant intended to harm her or her home. Lastly, the Court held that the stop promoted public safety, as the girlfriend had told the officers that defendant could get a firearm easily and had attacked her in the past. The court concluded that it was reasonable for the officer to stop defendant to prevent him from committing further acts of violence.

The same may not be true in the case of a misdemeanor, noise violation, not occurring in the officer's presence, at least where there are possible alternative, less intrusive methods of identifying the suspect. Stopping the suspect's vehicle to identify him held to be illegal. (United States v. Grigg (9th Cir. 2007) 498 F.3rd 1070.)

The continuing validity of the Grigg decision has been questioned and is probably, if it ever was, no longer a valid rule. (See United States v. Creek (U.S. Dist. Ct, Ariz. 2009) 586 F. Supp.2nd 1099, 1102-1108; upholding the traffic stop of a petty theft (gas drive off) suspect.)

Signaling a car to stop at random, and without sufficient cause to believe it contained a theft suspect that the officers were looking for, held to be illegal. The fact that defendant, a passenger in the car, was later determined to be a probationer subject to search and seizure conditions did not retroactively allow for the stop of the vehicle, nor was it an attenuating factor sufficient to justify the resulting search. (People v. Bates (2013) 222 Cal.App.4th 60, 65-71; see also People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, 23.)

Detention of a Person to Determine Citizenship:

Rule: Unlike making illegal entry, the mere unauthorized presence in the United States is not necessarily a crime. Stopping and detaining individuals based solely on their apparent ethnicity to determine whether they are in the country illegally is an illegal detention. (de Jesus Ortega Melendres v. Arpaio (9th Cir. 2012) 695 F.3rd 990, 999-1002; citing Martinez-Medina v. Holder (9th Cir. 2011) 673 F.3rd 1029, 1036.)

Statutory Limitations:

Gov't. Code §§ 7284-7284.12; The "California Values Act," limiting law enforcement's ability to participate in enforcing federal immigration law:

Gov't. Code § 7284.6(a)(1): California law enforcement agencies shall not: Use agency or department moneys or personnel to investigate, interrogate, detain, detect, or arrest persons for immigration enforcement purposes, including any of the following:

(A) Inquiring into an individual's immigration status.

(B) Detaining an individual on the basis of a hold request.

(C) Providing information regarding a person's release date or responding to requests for notification by providing release dates or other information unless that information is available to the public, or is in response to a notification request from immigration authorities in accordance with Gov't. Code § 7282.5. Responses are never required, but are permitted under this subdivision, provided that they do not violate any local law or policy.

(D) Providing personal information, as defined in Civ. Code § 1798.3, about an individual, including, but not limited to, the individual's home address or work address unless that information is available to the public.

(E) Making or intentionally participating in arrests based on civil immigration warrants.

(F) Assisting immigration authorities in the activities described in 8 U.S.C. § 1357(a)(3).

(G) Performing the functions of an immigration officer, whether pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1357(g) or any other law, regulation, or policy, whether formal or informal.

Pen. Code § 679.015: Victim and Witnesses' Protection from being Turned over to Immigration Authorities:

> (a) It is the public policy of this state to protect the public from crime and violence by encouraging all persons who are victims of or witnesses to crimes, or who otherwise can give evidence in a criminal investigation, to cooperate with the criminal justice system and not to penalize these persons for being victims or for cooperating with the criminal justice system.
> (b) Whenever an individual who is a victim of or witness to a crime, or who otherwise can give evidence in a criminal investigation, is not charged with or convicted of committing any crime under state law, a peace officer may not detain the individual exclusively for any actual or suspected immigration violation or turn the individual over to federal immigration authorities absent a judicial warrant.

But see Muehler v. Mena (2005) 544 U.S. 93 [125 S.Ct. 1465; 161 L.Ed.2nd 299], where the U.S. Supreme Court recently ruled (rejecting the Ninth Circuit's unsupported conclusion—see Mena v. City of Simi Valley (9th Cir. 2003) 332 F.3rd 1255, 1264-1265; cert. granted—to the contrary) that an officer does not need a "a particularized reasonable suspicion that an individual is not a citizen" in order to ask him or her about the subject's citizenship. Based upon Muehler v. Mena, while a California law enforcement officer may be violating California statutes by questioning a person's citizenship, the officer is not also violating the Fourth Amendment by doing so.

Detentions in a Residence:

Ordering a person out of his house with only a reasonable suspicion to believe that he might be involved in criminal activity, and to walk backwards as he did so, holding onto him (albeit without handcuffs) with his hands behind his back while asking for his consent to search his person, was held to be illegal. Full probable cause was necessary. (People v. Lujano (2014) 229 Cal.App.4th 175, 185-189: The subsequent consent to search his person and his house was the product of that illegal detention and invalid.)

See also Moore v. Pederson (11th Cir. 2015) 806 F.3rd 1036; detention in plaintiff's home based upon no more than a reasonable suspicion held to be illegal, absent exigent circumstances. The defendant police officer was held to have qualified immunity, however, in that the issue had yet to be settled.

Detention of Residents (and Non-Residents) During the Execution of a Search Warrant:

The occupants of a residence may be detained during the execution of a search warrant even though they did not match the description of the suspects (e.g., Caucasian instead of African-American) believed to be living there at the time. (Los Angeles County v. Rettele (2007) 550 U.S. 609 [127 S.Ct. 1989; 167 L.Ed.2nd 974]; the court noting that until the rest of the house is checked for the suspects, other occupants may be detained.)

It was further held that with knowledge that one of the sought-for suspects had a firearm registered to him, the detainees could be held at gunpoint until the rest of the house could be checked, even though the detainees were unclothed at the time. It was not necessary to allow the detainees to cover us until officers' safety could be assured. (Ibid.)

See also Muehler v. Mena (2005) 544 U.S. 93 [125 S.Ct. 1465; 161 L.Ed.2nd 299]; detention of a resident held to be lawful while evidence in a gang shooting case was looked for, at least if not "prolonged." (See below)

A non-resident may also be detained when he comes upon the scene during the execution of a search warrant and there is evidence connecting him to the illegal activity at the location of the search. (United States v. Davis (9th Cir. 2008) 530 F.3rd 1069, 1080-1081.)

A probation officer may lawfully "briefly" detain a visitor in a house who is present in the house of a juvenile probationer during a Fourth waiver search long enough to determine whether he is an resident of the house or is otherwise connected to illegal activity. (People v. Rios (2011) 193 Cal.App.4th 584, 593-595; People v. Matelski (2000) 82 Cal.App.4th 837.)

The Court further determined that a probation officer has the legal authority to detain and patdown a non-probationer pursuant to P.C. § 830.5(a)(4) (i.e.; enforcing "violations of any penal provisions of law which are discovered while performing the usual or authorized duties of his or her employment.") (People v. Rios, supra, at p. 600.)

An occupant of a house being subjected to a search pursuant to a search warrant may be detained during the search (1) in order to prevent flight, (2) to minimize the risk of harm to the officers, and (3) to facilitate an orderly search through cooperation of the residents. (Michigan v. Summers (1981) 452 U.S. 692, 702-703 [101 S.Ct. 2587; 69 L.Ed.2nd 340, 349-350].)

But see Bailey v. United States (2013) 568 U.S. 186, 192-202 [133 S.Ct. 1031, 1037-1043; 185 L.Ed.2nd 19], restricting such detentions to occupants who are still in the "immediate vicinity" of the residence being searched. The detention of an occupant who had just left the residence, and was already about a mile away, held to be illegal, at least under the rule of Summers.

Also, the rule of Summers cannot be used as an excuse for the mass detention and interrogation of suspected illegal aliens at a factory when the ruse used to gain access to the factory and the suspects was a search warrant for employment documents. (Cruz v. Barr (9th Cir. 2019) 926 F.3rd 1128.)

See "During Execution of a Search or Arrest Warrant, or during a Fourth Waiver Search," below.

Detention of Residents (and Non-Residents) During the Execution of an Arrest Warrant:

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that the rule allowing for the detention of an occupant of a residence during the execution of a search warrant does not "categorically" apply during the execution of an arrest warrant. (Sharp v. County of Orange (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 901, 912-916.) California disagrees. (People v. Hannah (1997) 51 Cal.App.4th 1335.)

See "During Execution of a Search or Arrest Warrant, or during a Fourth Waiver Search," below.

Prolonged Detentions: A traffic stop (or any other detention) which is reasonable in its inception may become unreasonable if prolonged beyond that point reasonably necessary for the officer to complete the original purposes of the detention. (People v. McGaughran (1979) 25 Cal.3rd 577.)

During Issuance of a Traffic Citation:

"'Like a Terry stop, the tolerable duration of police inquiries in the traffic-stop context is determined by the seizure's "mission"—to address the traffic violation that warranted the stop, and attend to related safety concerns.' Rodriguez v. United States, 575 U.S. 348, 354, 135 S. Ct. 1609, 191 L. Ed. 2d 492 (2015). The "mission" of the traffic stop, as referred to above, has been held to include determining whether to issue a traffic ticket, making ordinary inquiries incident to the traffic stop, check the driver's license, determine whether there are outstanding warrants against the driver, inspect the automobile's registration and proof of service, and any activities that serve the purpose of enforcement of the traffic code and the safety precautions that officers may need to take while doing so. Detaining the defendant for ten minutes, until a radio check came back that the car was stolen, was not excessive, particularly when symptoms of intoxication were noted during the ten minutes. (People v. Carter (2005) 36 Cal.4th 1114, 1139-1142.)

The "mission" necessarily included the time required to write out the citation and obtain the offender's promise to appear. It will also include the time it takes to obtain and examine the offender's driver's license and registration. "(G)ood police practice" might also include the time it takes to discuss the violation with the motorist and listen to any explanation he may wish to offer. And if the vehicles are exposed to danger, the officer may require the driver to proceed to a safer location before the traffic stop is completed. (People v. Tully (2012) 54 Cal.4th 952, 980-981.)

> See United States v. Buzzard (4th Cir. WV. 2021) 1 F.4th 198; noting that questions related to officer safety are necessarily related to the traffic stop's mission.

Random warrant checks during routine traffic stops are lawful, but the subject must be released when the citation process is completed. (People v. McGaughran, supra; see also United States v. Luckett (9th Cir. 1973) 484 F.2nd 89.), or within a reasonable time thereafter. (People v. Brown (1998) 62 Cal.App.4th 493; one minute delay while awaiting the results of a warrant check was not unreasonable, even though the officer never wrote the ticket.)

See also United States v. Clark (1st Cir. ME 2018) 879 F.3rd 1, where the one minute it took to ask a vehicle passenger questions in clarification was held not to have unlawfully prolonged a traffic stop in that the questioning was "one of these negligibly burdensome precautions justified by the unique safety threat posed by traffic stops."

But see Rodriguez v. United States (2015) 575 U.S, 348 [135 S.Ct. 1609; 191 L.Ed.2nd 4927], above, holding that even a di minimis delay renders the detention illegal.

Asking defendant for a consent to search, even without any reason to believe there was anything there to search for, is lawful so long as done within the time it would have taken to write the citation which was the original cause of the stop. (People v. Gallardo (2005) 130 Cal.App.4th 234.)

By conducting an ex-felon registration check and a "dog sniff," both of which were unrelated to the traffic violation for which the officer had stopped defendant, the officer prolonged the traffic stop beyond the time reasonably required to complete his traffic mission, and so violated the Fourth Amendment absent some independent reasonable suspicion. (United States v. Evans (9th Cir. 2015) 786 F.3rd 779, 784-789.)

> While "vehicle records and warrants checks (are) tasks that are 'ordinary inquiries incident to the traffic stop,'" are lawful, conducting a separate "ex-felon registration check," done for the purpose of verifying that the detainee lives where he was registered, is not part of the traffic stop, and illegal unless supported by independent reasonable suspicion beyond that of the cause of the traffic stop itself, but is instead "a measure aimed at 'detect[ing] evidence of ordinary criminal wrongdoing.'" (Id. at p. 786.)

Upon remand, no such independent reasonable suspicion was found. (United States v. Evans (Nev. 2015) 122 F.Supp.3rd 1027.)

Note: This rule has been recognized as an exception to the general rule that warrant checks during a traffic stop are allowed, and do not result in an unnecessary prolongation of the traffic stop. (See United States v. Hylton (9th Cir. 2022) 30 F.4th 842, 847.)

The trial court erroneously denied defendant's motion to suppress evidence obtained as a result of a traffic stop in that the law enforcement officers were not entitled to extend the lawfully initiated vehicle stop just because the passenger (the defendant) refused to identify himself since there was no reasonable suspicion that the passenger had committed a criminal offense. (United States v. Landeros (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 862.)

Generally, a police officer may detain a driver once the initial traffic stop ends if, during the stop, "the officer develops an objectively reasonable and articulable suspicion that the driver is engaged in some illegal activity." To determine whether an officer has a reasonable suspicion to continue the detention, a court will "look at the totality of the circumstances of each case to see whether the detaining officer has a particularized and objective basis" for suspecting illegal activity. In using these principles, the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals held that at the conclusion of a traffic stop, specific and articulable facts existed to provide the trooper with reasonable suspicion that defendant was engaged in criminal activity. Specifically, the trooper's suspicion that three vehicles he observed were traveling in tandem to support a drug trafficking operation was supported by the following facts: (1) In his experience it was uncommon to see three vehicles with out-of-state plates traveling in close proximity to each other, east-bound on I-70. (2) The three vehicles were all traveling at approximately ten-miles-per-hour under the speed limit. (3) When the trooper got behind the rear vehicle, a compact car, it continued to travel at approximately ten-miles-per hour under the speed limit while the second vehicle, minivan, and the lead vehicle, a pickup truck, accelerated to the speed limit. (4) The pickup truck accelerated to approximately ten-miles-per hour over the speed limit almost immediately after the minivan committed a traffic violation. From these facts, the court concluded that it was reasonable for the trooper to infer that the pickup truck was intentionally diverting his attention from the minivan, which he believed to be the "load" vehicle because of its cargo capacity and because the pickup truck was registered to a private individual while the other two were rented. In the trooper's experience, he testified that he rarely saw large amounts of drugs transported in privately owned vehicles. Second, after stopping the minivan (which defendant was driving), the trooper's observations concerning defendant's cargo, in his experience, was not consistent with his claim that he was moving from Las Vegas to Minnesota. Specifically, defendant's minivan was densely packed with at least five large moving boxes for flat panel televisions and twelve full duffel bags and suitcases, which the trooper testified was inconsistent with what he typically sees when people are moving. Consequently, the court held that the trooper had reasonable suspicion to prolong the stop while he waited for another officer to bring a drug-sniffing dog which, when it arrived, alerted on defendant's vehicle. (United States v. Berg (10th Cir. 2020) 947 F.3rd 1313; 471 pounds of marijuana recovered.)

Even though the officer during a lawful traffic stop has already indicated that he is not going to write the driver a traffic citation, the officer may still conduct certain routine tasks related to the traffic violation. Some of these routine tasks include running a computerized check of the vehicle's registration and insurance, running a similar check of the occupants' identification documents and criminal histories, preparing the traffic citation or warning, and asking the occupants about their destination, route, and purpose. (United States v. Cox (8th Cir. 2021) 992 F.3rd 706.)

With two subjects stopped in a lawful traffic stop late at night and in a high crime area, defendants were not the subject of an unlawfully prolonged detention despite the officer asking if they had anything illegal in the vehicle while he waited for backup. The Court held that waiting for backup under those circumstances was reasonable, as was asking about the potential for weapons or contraband in the vehicle while the waited. (United States v. Buzzard (4th Cir. W.V. 2021) 1 F.4th 198; noting that questions related to officer safety are necessarily related to the traffic stop's mission.)

Asking extraneous questions during a traffic stop while issuing a traffic warning, and writing out the warning instead of making a computer-generated warning, does not constitute a prolonged detention. Obtaining a consent search during that time period (10 minutes and 45 seconds) was held to be lawful. (United States v. Salkil (8th Cir. IA, 2021) 10 F.4th 897.)

A traffic officer with 25 years of experience was held to have sufficient reasonable suspicion to continue a traffic stop longer than needed to write a warning when the defendant's responses did not appear to be logical (e.g., why he was there, reasons for traveling between Houston and Chicago, the excessive cost of a rental, and his stated purposes for the trip) and where defendant also appeared to avoid answering certain questions posed by the officer. (United States v. Gastelum (8th Cir. 2021) 11 F.4th 898; cocaine found in the trunk of his car during a consent search that was requested after giving defendant a warning for an unsafe lane change.)

Stopping defendant for a simple traffic violation (i.e., following too close), and while discussing the violation, the officer began to make inquiries into the defendant's travel plans. During these inquires, the officer became suspicious (defendant's nervousness, inconsistent and evasive answers, etc.) as to whether defendant was telling the truth. This eventually led to the use of a drug-sniffing dog and the discovery of methamphetamine and heroin. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeal ruled that travel-plan questions are routine inquires that reasonably relate to the underlying traffic violation and roadway safety. As such, such questions ordinarily fall within "the mission of a traffic stop." First, the court found that travel-plan questions provide important context for the violation at hand. Also, a driver's travel plans may affect an officer's assessment of roadway safety concerns beyond the immediate violation. Finally, the court cautioned that an officer's travel-plan questions, like the officer's other actions during the stop, must remain reasonable based on the totality of the circumstances surrounding the stop. Applying these principles the Court held that the trooper's travel-plan questions during the initial roadside detention fell within the mission of the traffic stop and did not unlawfully prolong the traffic stop. It was only after defendant provided evasive, confusing, inconsistent, and improbable answers to some of these questions, while appearing nervous, that the trooper asked follow-up questions. Under these circumstances, the court held that the trooper's travel-plan questions were reasonable and not just a "fishing expedition." The Court then held that based upon this, while also being told by dispatch that defendant has three prior drug-transportation convictions, it was less than nine minutes into the stop that the trooper developed a reasonable suspicion that defendant was involved in criminal activity. As a result, the trooper had a lawful basis to prolong the duration of the stop in order to conduct a dog-sniff of defendant's vehicle. (United States v. Cole (7th Cir. 2021) 21 F.4th 421.)

During a traffic stop for illegally tinted windows, the federal Seventh Circuit held that an officer was not prevented from asking the defendant to sit in the officer's car as a warning was being written, and asking questions unrelated to the traffic stop, so long as it doesn't prolong the duration of the traffic stop beyond what it reasonably takes for the officer to complete the "mission" of the stop. The Court further held that again, so long as the traffic stop is not illegally prolonged, it does not violate the Fourth Amendment to have a drug-sniffing dog sniff around the defendant's car. (United States v. Goodwill (7th Cir. 2022) 24 F.4th 612; the dog alerting on cocaine in the car, all accomplished within 10 minutes.)

During a lawful traffic stop, while the citation is being written, it is not unlawful to ask "persistent" questions, even if unrelated to the reason for the traffic stop, as long as doing so does not prolong the duration of the stop. Asking defendant for permission to search his vehicle after the purposes of the stop are completed is not unlawful. In determining the lawfulness of a consent obtained under these circumstances, a court will examine the totality of the circumstances including (but not limited to) the following factors: (1) the person's age, intelligence, and education; (2) whether he was advised of his constitutional rights; (3) how long he was detained before he gave his consent; (4) whether his consent was immediate, or was prompted by repeated requests by the authorities; (5) whether any physical coercion was used; and (6) whether the individual was in police custody when he gave his consent. In this case, defendant's consent, obtained after the citation was written and defendant was released, was held to be voluntary. Discovery of thirteen one-kilogram packages of methamphetamine was held to be lawful. (United States v. Ambriz-Villa (7th Cir. 2022) 28 F.4th 786.)

Officers of the San Jose Police Department were held to have unlawfully prolonged a traffic stop (estimated at 18 minutes, based upon body camera recordings) in violation of defendant's Fourth Amendment rights, overruling the trial court on this issue. The record showed the stop was actually part of a preexisting drug investigation and that the officers had used the traffic investigation as a pretext for the stop. One of the officers who stopped defendant openly admitted on a body camera video of the stop that he never intended to issue a citation. The video also showed that a plainclothes officer requested a narcotics dog before conducting any purported sobriety checks. And the dog handler admitted he had been informed that his presence would be required before the stop had even occurred. The fact of the preexisting drug investigation established that the plainclothes officer's testimony about what he observed during the stop was neither reasonable nor credible, and thus did not constitute substantial evidence under the relevant legal standard. (People v. Ayon (2022) 80 Cal.App.5th 926, 937-941.)

> Note: This case might be interpreted by some as authority for the argument that a pretext stop is illegal where the officers never intended to write a citation for observed traffic infractions, but rather were intent on investigating defendant's suspected illegal transportation of drugs; a questionable conclusion considering that the U.S. Supreme Court has clearly held that pretext stops are lawful and that an officer's subjective motivations are irrelevant (see "Pretext Stops," above, and Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89].), an issue clearly conceded by the Court. In actuality, the Court here merely noted only that the officers' true intention to conduct a narcotics investigation is relevant to why the traffic stop was prolonged beyond the time it would have taken to conduct the "mission" of the traffic stop. Aside from this issue, the duration of the stop (18 minutes) clearly exceeded the time limits necessary for completing the mission of the traffic stop; i.e., to write a citation for the observed traffic violation.

Defendant argued the district court erred because police officers did not have an objectively reasonable basis to believe he committed a traffic violation and then unconstitutionally expanded the stop while a drug dog sniffed the exterior of the vehicle. The Eighth Circuit disagreed. Given the undisputed facts regarding the length of the stop, the officer had a reasonable suspicion that defendant had committed a traffic offense, making the initial stop lawful. And then, given the detention's short duration, and the reasons given for the time it took to almost complete the purpose of the stop before the narcotics dog alerted to the rear of the driver's side of defendant's vehicle, the district court did not err in concluding that the officer did not unlawfully prolong the stop before the dog alert gave the officers probable cause to arrest Defendant and search the vehicle. Further, the court held that there was no Fourth Amendment violation before Defendant made incriminating statements after being given Miranda warnings. Thus, the district court properly rejected his argument that the statements should be suppressed as fruit of a poisonous tree. (United States v. Rutledge (8th Cir. 2023) 61 F.4th 597.) [2023

The Ninth Circuit affirmed the district court's denial of a motion to suppress evidence discovered following a traffic stop in a case in which Xzavione Taylor entered a conditional guilty plea to being a felon in possession of a firearm. Ruling that the officers did not unreasonably prolong the traffic stop, the Court held that an officer's asking defendant two questions about weapons early in the counter—once before the officer learned that defendant was on federal supervision for being a felon in possession and once after—was a negligibly burdensome precaution that the officer could reasonably take in the name of safety. Also, the officer did not unlawfully prolong the traffic stop when he asked defendant to exit the vehicle. The officers' subjective motivations are irrelevant because the Fourth Amendment's concern with reasonableness allows certain actions to be taking in certain circumstances, whatever the subjective intent. A criminal history check and the officers' other actions while defendant was outside the car were within the lawful scope of the traffic stop. A frisk and criminal history check were not beyond the original mission of the traffic stop, being permissible based on the officers' reasonable suspicion of an independent offense: i.e., defendant's unlawful possession of a gun. As to whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they searched defendant's car, the Court held that the district court did not err in finding that defendant unequivocally and specifically consented to a search of the car for firearms when he unambiguously responded: "It don't matter to me." (United States v. Taylor (9th Cir. 2023) 60 F.4th 1233; unpublished.)

Defendant's motion to suppress was properly denied as troopers did not illegally delay the traffic stop in order to conduct a drug-dog search as troopers had reasonable suspicion that defendant was involved in drug-related activity before stopping defendant and only 27 minutes passed from the stop until the dog's alert. (United States v. Rederick (8th Cir. 2023) 65 F.4th 961.)

(Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977) 434 U.S. 106, 111, fn. 6 [54 L.Ed.2nd 331, 98 S.Ct. 330].) Passengers are seized in traffic stops in the same manner as drivers (Brendlin v. Pg. 1098: "In contrast, the total time between the initial detention of Esparza's car and his patdown search was about seven minutes. As discussed above, (Officer) Arreola continued to move the mission of the stop forward in that period while simultaneously attending to legitimate safety considerations. (fn. omitted.)")

> In the omitted footnote, above (fn. 13, pg. 1098), the Court noted that it was irrelevant that defendant was never written a citation, assuming that he would have had he not been arrested.

Taking the time to check a rental agreement to determine if the driver is authorized to drive a rented motor vehicle is a part of an ordinary inquiry incident to a traffic stop, and was thus held by the 10th Circuit Court of Appeal to be part of an officer's mission during a traffic stop, and does not constitute an "unrelated investigation," or an "unlawfully prolonged" detention. (United States v. Dawson (2024) 90 F.4th 1286.)

Asking defendant questions related to the traffic stop for about six minutes, followed up by another five to six minutes of questioning about the purpose of his trip when it was determined that the car did not belong to him. "The circumstances here involved a foreign national driving a car that did not belong to him. It was entirely reasonable, and within the scope of the appropriate inquiries for the traffic stop, for Sergeant Taylor to make further inquiries of the dispatcher regarding the registered owner of the car. It was also reasonable for Sergeant Taylor to take a few minutes to repeat some of his questions to defendant in the presence of the Spanish-speaking officer, who had only just arrived, in order to confirm that he had properly understood defendant's responses." When defendant subsequently consented to the search of the car (resulting in the recovery of some illegal drugs and a firearm), the officer was making valid inquiries about the suspicious nature of defendant's possession of someone else's car. (People v. Felix (Mar. 7, 2024) __ Cal.App.5th __, __ [2024 Cal.App. LEXIS 154].)

While Investigating a Possible DUI Driver:

> Officers conducting a "criminal history check" while investigating defendant's possible inebriation when found in his vehicle unconscious with indications that he might have been under the influence of drugs, was held to be lawful. Even though defendant had been detained for some 36 minutes before it was discovered (during criminal history check) that he was a felon (a firearm already having been recovered from his vehicle), his detention was found not to be illegally "prolonged." (United States v. Hylton (9th Cir. 2022) 30 F.4th 842, 847-848; also finding that even if he was illegally detained in a prolonged detention, the firearm would have been inevitably recovered anyway.)

While Executing a Search Warrant:

> The Court rejected defendant's claim that a detention while a search warrant was being executed was too long "simply because of its one-and-a-half to two-hour length" because "the record is devoid of any evidence that the officers engaged in any misconduct or in any way delayed the search." (People v. Gabriel (1986) 188 Cal.App.3rd 1261, 1265.)

Unlawful Extensions of a Detention:

> Statements taken from a detained criminal suspect held for over 16 hours without probable cause to arrest, are subject to suppression as the product of an unlawfully prolonged detention. (People v Jenkins (2004) 122 Cal.App.4th 1160, 1174-1178.)
>
> An otherwise lawful "knock and talk," where officers continued to press the defendant for permission to enter his apartment after his denial of any illegal activity, converted the contact into an unlawfully "extended" detention, causing the Court to conclude that a later consent-to-search was the product of the illegal detention, and thus invalid. (United States v. Washington (9th Cir. 2004) 387 F.3rd 1060.)
> Holding onto a suspect (in handcuffs) for over 4½ hours (and maybe as long as 6½ hours) while narcotics officers drove up to a marijuana grow and searched the area to see if there was any evidence connecting him to the grow, was "diligent and reasonable" under the circumstances, and not an illegally prolonged detention. (People v. Williams (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th 949; also finding that the officers had enough to arrest him from the outset had they chosen to do so.)

A sheriff's investigator was held not to be protected by qualified immunity when sued for detaining partygoers for as long as 14 hours after a warrant search for evidence of illegal gaming was executed and completed. Interrogating the participants is not part and parcel of executing a warrant. Also, the detentions could not be justified as Terry stops because individualized suspicion was not established by the partygoers' mere presence in the same large (21,000 sq. ft.) mansion where some limited drug and gaming contraband was discovered, and because detentions as long as 14 hours did not remotely resemble the brief detention authorized by Terry v. Ohio. (Guillory v. Hill (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 240, 249-256.)

By conducting an ex-felon registration check and a "dog sniff," both of which were unrelated to the traffic violation for which the officer had stopped defendant, the officer prolonged the traffic stop beyond the time reasonably required to complete his traffic mission, and so violated the Fourth Amendment absent some independent reasonable suspicion. (United States v. Evans (9th Cir. 2015) 786 F.3rd 779, 784-789.)

> While "vehicle records and warrants checks (are) tasks that are 'ordinary inquiries incident to the traffic stop,'" are lawful, conducting a separate "ex-felon registration check," done for the purpose of verifying that the detainee lives where he was registered, is not part of the traffic stop, and illegal unless supported by independent reasonable suspicion beyond that of the cause of the traffic stop itself, but is instead "a measure aimed at 'detect[ing] evidence of ordinary criminal wrongdoing.'" (Id. at p. 786.)
> > Upon remand, no such independent reasonable suspicion was found. (United States v. Evans (Nev. 2015) 122 F.Supp.3rd 1027.)

In an asset forfeiture proceeding dealing with $167,070 seized from defendant's motorhome, it was held that the search of defendant's vehicle following the second half of a "coordinated traffic stop" (i.e., a first stop which itself lasted nearly half an hour, but didn't reveal any legal cause to search defendant's motorhome, followed by a second traffic stop set up with a drug-sniffing dog available to conduct a sniff around the exterior of the motorhome) violated the Fourth Amendment. Because the dog sniff, which gave the officer in the second stop the necessary probable cause to obtain a search warrant to search defendant's motorhome followed directly in an unbroken chain from the first prolonged traffic stop, the seized currency was held to be the "fruit of the poisonous tree" and was properly suppressed by the trial court. (United States v. Gorman (9th Cir. 2017) 859 F.3rd 706, 714-719; as amended at 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 18610.)

"When a motorist 'sees a policeman's lights flashing behind him,' he expects 'that he will be obliged to spend a short period of time answering questions and waiting while the officer checks his license and registration, that he may then be given a citation, but that in the end he most likely will be allowed to continue on his way.'" Detaining a 75-year old, 4'-11" female plaintiff in a parking lot for up to two hours, knowing that the plaintiff had urinated in her clothes, and after a search warrant had already been executed and a piece of contraband moonrock, which was the target of the instant investigation, had been seized, was arguably unreasonable, subjecting the agent-defendant to potential civil liability. The Court held that the agent was not entitled to qualified immunity under these circumstances in that a civil jury would have to determine whether the detention was unreasonably prolonged. (Davis v. United States (9th Cir. 2017) 854 F.3rd 594, 598-601.)

Detaining defendant for 30 to 50 minutes while officers conducted a Fourth waiver search held to be illegal, requiring the suppression of evidence discovered during this prolonged time period. While the initial detention may have been lawful, holding onto defendant after it could no longer be argued that he constituted a threat to the officers or the purposes of the search, was not justified. (People v. Gutierrez (2018) 21 Cal.App.5th 1146, 1153-1161.)

The trial court erroneously denied defendant's motion to suppress evidence obtained as a result of a traffic stop in that the law enforcement officers were not entitled to extend the lawfully initiated vehicle stop just because the passenger (the defendant) refused to identify himself since there was no reasonable suspicion that the passenger had committed a criminal offense. (United States v. Landeros (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 862.)

A police stop exceeding the time needed to handle the matter for which the stop was made violates the Constitution's shield against unreasonable seizures. A seizure justified only by a police-observed traffic violation, therefore, becomes unlawful if it is prolonged beyond the time reasonably required to complete the mission of issuing a ticket for the violation. (Rodriguez v. United States (2015) 575 U.S, 348 [135 S.Ct. 1609; 191 L.Ed.2nd 492]; finding a dog-sniff of the exterior of the defendant's car, conducted some seven to eight minutes after completing the purpose of the traffic stop, was illegal.)

> "Beyond determining whether to issue a traffic ticket, an officer's mission includes 'ordinary inquiries incident to [the traffic] stop.' [Citation]. > >
> > The Court in Vera also made the interesting comment (at pg. 1087) that the permissible duration of a traffic stop is not to be measured by the reasonable duration of traffic stops in general, but rather by the amount of time actually necessary to > perform the stop at issue, in an expeditious manner. (Citing Rodriguez, supra*, 135 S.Ct. at p. 1616].) In other words, a police officer does not earn "bonus time to pursue an unrelated criminal investigation" by writing the ticket as fast as he can, thinking that he can use the time saved to look for other evidence of "criminal wronging." "If an officer can complete traffic-based inquiries expeditiously, then that is the amount of 'time reasonably required to complete [the stop's] mission.'" Thus, the "critical question (in a dog sniff case) . . . is not whether the dog sniff occurs before or after the officer issues a ticket … but whether conducting the sniff 'prolongs'—i.e., adds time to—'the stop'" at issue.

Handcuffing plaintiffs at the scene of an officer-involved shooting of a teenager (one of the plaintiffs), and holding them at the scene while handcuffed for five hours while the shooting was investigated—long after probable cause had dissipated—is a Fourth Amendment violation. The fact that the defendant officer (Gutierrez), who was the shooting officer, was pulled aside (per department policy) and monitored during the investigation of the shooting, and no longer had any control over the scene, does not prevent that officer from being liable for the unlawfully prolonged detention. The Court held that an officer need not have been the sole party responsible for a constitutional violation before civil liability may attach. "An officer's liability under (18 U.S.C.) Section 1983 is predicated on his 'integral participation' in the alleged violation. Officers, like other civil defendants, are generally responsible for the 'natural' or 'reasonably foreseeable' consequences. Thus, an officer can be held liable where he is just one participant in a sequence of events that gives rise to a constitutional violation." The trial court's denial of qualified immunity for that officer was upheld. (Nicholson v. City of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2019) 935 F.3rd 685: The officer's potential civil liability for shooting the one plaintiff was not at issue in this appeal.)

Taking the time to check a rental agreement to determine if the driver is authorized to drive a rented motor vehicle is a part of an ordinary inquiry incident to a traffic stop, and was thus held by the 10th Circuit Court of Appeal to be part of an officer's mission during a traffic stop, and does not constitute an "unrelated investigation," or an "unlawfully prolonged" detention. (United States v. Dawson (2024) 90 F.4th 1286.)

Lawful Extensions of a Detention:

A person may be detained only as long as is reasonably necessary to accomplish the purpose of the original stop, possibly extended by the time needed to investigate any new information justifying a further detention which comes to light during the original detention. (People v. Russell (2000) 81 Cal.App.4th 96, 101.)

A "reasonable suspicion" of criminal activity developed during a detention that was initiated for other purposes will justify holding the detainee beyond the time it took to accomplish the original purposes of the stop. (United States v. Thompson (9th Cir. 2002) 282 F.3rd 673; a Coast Guard boat safety check developed cause to believe the subjects were smuggling drugs, justifying a further detention to investigate that possibility; see also People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 755-765.)

Where defendant himself (a 16-year-old juvenile), who the officers knew to be on probation, told the officers that he believed there was an outstanding warrant for his arrest, "it was rational for the officers to believe defendant, arrest him, and detain him until they learned otherwise." The Court rejected defendant's argument that his eventual confession was the product of an illegally prolonged detention, finding that taking 84 minutes to learn that there was no outstanding arrest warrant was not unreasonable where there was nothing in the record to show that discovery of the lack of a warrant could have been made sooner. (People v. Delgado (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 1092, 1102-1104.)

Although defendant, driving a semi with an attached trailer, had initially been detained when a highway patrol officer initiated a traffic stop of his tractor-trailer and he pulled to the side of a freeway, that detention had ended by the time defendant gave his consent to search the tractor-trailer. The officer had returned defendant's documents, told him he was free to leave, and allowed him to walk partway back to his vehicle when the officer asked for consent to search his vehicle. Thus, there was no prolonged detention. (People v. Arebalos-Cabrera (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 179, 183-190.)

Because the record did not indicate how long it took a police dog to alert to the presence of drugs in defendant's vehicle during a traffic stop and an officer's uncontroverted testimony established that the dog alerted to the trunk of the vehicle while another officer was filling out a citation for an infraction, the dog sniff was not shown to have unconstitutionally prolonged the traffic stop under

Fourth Amendment. The record did not demonstrate that the dog alert came after the time at which the citation reasonably should have been issued had there been no dog sniff because defendant did not show how long it normally took for a police officer to write a citation or that the officer who wrote defendant's citation took more time than usual to write it. (People v. Vera (2018) 28 Cal.App.5th 1081.)

> In Vera, it was held that the discovery of a knife that appeared to possibly be an illegal switchblade knife allowed for the prolonging of the traffic stop for the purpose of investigating whether the knife was in fact illegal. Per the Court: "(A) stop may be prolonged 'if the prolongation itself is supported by independent reasonable suspicion.'" (Id., at p. 1088; quoting United States v. Evans (9th Cir. 2015) 786 F.3rd 779, 788.)

A traffic stop may be extended beyond the point of completing its mission "if an officer develops reasonable suspicion of criminal activity." (United States v. Wallace (2nd Cir. 2019) 937 F.3rd 130; original traffic stop extended when information that the car may have been stolen was developed.

Developing a reasonable suspicion of other criminal activity (e.g., drug smuggling) during the reasonable duration of a traffic stop justified the prolongation of the stop in order to investigate the drug-smuggling suspicions. (United States v. Davis (8th Cir. 2019) 943 F.3rd 1129.)

Where officers stopped a vehicle because they believed the driver had an outstanding warrant, and after arresting the driver, the officers did not let the passenger drive the vehicle away. Instead, they waited to determine whether the passenger had a valid license. Without finding reasonable suspicion to continue to hold the passenger, the court held that ensuring the passenger "could legally drive the car" was part of the stop's mission and justified extending the detention for two additional minutes. Upon observing defendant run a red light and stopping him for this violation, the "collective knowledge doctrine" was held to apply to a traffic stop made by a patrol officer at the request of narcotics officers who were investigating defendant for selling drugs. While stopped, defendant called his brother who then showed up at the scene of the stop and tried to interject himself into the officer's contact with the defendant. The officer therefore waited an extra eleven minutes, waiting for back up to arrive, before he ran his drug-sniffing dog around the vehicle. Waiting for officer safety purposes, the Court held that under these circumstances, the extra eleven minutes was justified. (United States v. Jordan (4th Cir. 2020) 952 F.3rd 160.)

Upon determining that the driver of a vehicle was not the registered owner for whom an arrest warrant was outstanding, and who was found not to be in the vehicle, the Ninth Circuit held that continuing to detain the driver for long enough to complete the "mission" of a traffic stop was lawful. This '[t]ypically . . . involve(s) checking the driver's license, determining whether there are outstanding warrants against the driver, and inspecting the automobile's registration and proof of insurance." "Such routine checks 'ensur[e] that vehicles on the road are operated safely and responsibly.'" (United States v. Nault (9th Cir. 2022) 41 F.4th 1073, 1078.)

> The Court noted in footnote #2 (pg. 1078), where the "mission" of a traffic stop was not involved; "that other courts have found stops unconstitutional when prolonged by under thirty seconds before officers developed independent suspicion. See United States v. Clark, 902 F.3rd 404, 410-11 (3rd Cir. 2018) (twenty seconds of questioning about criminal history); United States v. Campbell, 26 F.4th 860, 885 (11th Cir. 2022) (en banc) (twenty-five seconds of questioning about contraband)."

Upon being subjected to a parole wavier search by one officer, at the direction of that officer's training officer who, as the department gang specialist, was aware of defendant's parole status, the "collective knowledge doctrine" served to support the legality of the search despite the lack of any direct knowledge held by the searching officer. (United States v. Estrella (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 958, 961, 966, fn. 6.)

The Prolonged "De Minimis" Detention:

Old Rule: A number of appellate court decisions have ruled that a "de minimis" extension of the time necessary to "complete the mission" of a traffic stop, even if done for the purpose of conducting a criminal investigation unrelated to the purposes of the stop, is not "constitutionally significant," and will be allowed.

> The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that a minimally prolonged detention (e.g., about four minutes), at least when motivated by other newly discovered information even though that new information by itself might not constitute a reasonable suspicion, does not make the prolonging of the detention unreasonable. Under such circumstances, a minimally prolonged detention is not unlawful. (United States v. Turvin et al. (9th Cir. 2008) 517 F.3rd 1097.)
>
> Abrogated to the extent that a "brief pause" in writing the defendant a ticket to inquire about defendant's possible (but without reasonable suspicion) drug trafficking was upheld as "reasonable," and was inconsistent with Rodriguez v. United States (2015) 575 U.S, 348 [135 S.Ct. 1609; 191 L.Ed.2nd 4927]. (United States v. Landeros (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 862, 866-867; see below.)
>
> > See also the dissenting opinion in Turvin, at p. 1104, and United States v. Cornejo (E.D. Cal. 2016) 196 F. Supp.3rd 1137, 1151.
> >
> > Note: Rodriguez involved a 7 to 8 minute delay.
> See also People v. Brown (1998) 62 Cal.App.4th 493, where a one minute delay while awaiting the results of a warrant check was held to be reasonable, even though the officer never wrote the ticket.

New Rule: However, the United States Supreme Court, seemingly overruling by inference all "de minimis" traffic cases, has subsequently held that a police stop exceeding the time needed to handle the matter for which the stop was made violates the Constitution's shield against unreasonable seizures. A seizure justified only by a police-observed traffic violation, therefore, becomes unlawful if it is prolonged beyond the time reasonably required to complete the mission of issuing a ticket or warning for the violation, no matter how minimal that extra time might be.

(Rodriguez v. United States (2015) 575 U.S, 348 [135 S.Ct. 1609; 191 L.Ed.2nd 4927]; finding a dog-sniff of the exterior of the defendant's car, conducted some seven to eight minutes after completing the purpose of the traffic stop, was illegal.)

> See also at 135 S.Ct. at p. 1616, holding that the test is how long it actually takes the officer to handle the traffic offense, proceeding with reasonable diligence, and that rushing the issuance of a ticket, for instance, does not "earn (the officer) bonus time to pursue an unrelated criminal investigation."

Citing Rodriguez v. United States, supra, the Ninth Circuit has held that "(a) routine traffic stop is more analogous to a Terry stop 'than to a formal arrest,' and it 'can become unlawful if it is prolonged beyond the time reasonably required to complete the mission of issuing a' ticket for the violation. Id. at 354-55 (cleaned up). '[T]he tolerable duration of police inquiries in the traffic-stop context is determined by the seizure's "mission"—to address the traffic violation that warranted the stop and attend to related safety concerns.' Id. at 354 (citations omitted). [⁋] The government's interest in officer safety 'stems from the mission of the stop itself' because '[t]raffic stops are especially fraught with danger to police officers, so an officer may need to take certain negligibly burdensome precautions in order to complete his mission safely.' Id. at 356 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). In making this observation, the Supreme Court cited favorably to a Tenth Circuit case, United States v. Holt, 264 F.3rd 1215, 1221-22 (10th Cir. 2001) (en banc) (abrogated on other grounds), which it characterized as 'recognizing officer safety justification[s] for criminal record and outstanding warrant checks.' Rodriguez, 575 U.S. at 356." (United States v. Hylton (9th Cir. 2022) 30 F.4th 842, 847; 36-minute detention upheld while investigating defendant's possible DUI-drugs status, and noting that a firearm recovered during that time period would have been inevitably discovered anyway.)

> The Ninth Circuit in Hylton further held that "criminal history checks are permissible post-Rodriguez," citing a number of federal court decisions from other circuits. (Ibid.*) The exception to this rule is when a traffic stop is prolonged while officers do "a computer check to see if a person is properly registered as a felon in Nevada per state law . . . (b)ecause such a check is 'unrelated to the traffic violation,'" (See United States v. Evans (9th Cir. 2015) 786 F.3rd 779, 786.)

See also United States v. Nault (9th Cir. 2022) 41 F.4th 1073, 1078-1081.)

But see United States v. Clark (1st Cir. ME 2018) 879 F.3rd 1, where the one minute it took to ask a vehicle passenger questions in clarification was held not to have unlawfully prolonged a traffic stop in that the questioning was "one of these negligibly burdensome precautions justified by the unique safety threat posed by traffic stops." Clark, being decided after Rodriguez v. United States, supra, seems to ignore any attempt in Rodriguez to condemn any delay, matter how minor. Rodriguez involved a 7 to 8 minute delay.

Extending the duration of a traffic stop in order to question a passenger, unsuccessfully attempting to get the passenger (the defendant) to identify himself when there was no reasonable suspicion that that passenger was engaged in any criminal activity, was unlawful. (United States v. Landeros (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 862, 866-870.)

Eighteen minutes between the traffic stop (for admitted traffic violations) until probable cause was developed (based upon a drug-detection dog alerting on defendant's vehicle) was held to be unlawfully prolonged. (People v. Ayon (2022) 80 Cal.App.5th 926, 936-944.)

Despite the above, asking drivers to produce a driver's license at a lawful DUI checkpoint has been held to be a "de minimis" intrusion, and thus lawful. (Demarest v. City of Vallejo (9th Cir. 2022) 44 F.4th 1209, 1223-1224.)

Over-Detention in Jail:

Another form of illegal detention is when a jail fails to release a prisoner when he is due to be released. Such an act potentially constitutes grounds for a federal civil suit, per 42 U.S.C. § 1983. However, in order to prove such a constitutional violation, the plaintiff/prisoner must be able to prove that the defendant officers personally participated in his over-detention or that the over-detention was the result of a pattern or custom on their part of the defendant law enforcement agency. (Avalos v. Baca (9th Cir. 2010) 596 F.3rd 583, 587.)

Being held in federal custody for some six weeks, during which time defendant made incriminating statements about murdering his wife (an uncharged state offense) to his cellmate who, as an undercover police agent, pumped him for information, defendant argued that pursuant to the Bail Reform Act of 1984 (18 U.S.C. § 3142(f)), he should have been released on bail and that being detained in custody was a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights (i.e., an unlawful seizure), and that anything he said should have been suppressed as the product of this unlawful detention. The California Supreme disagreed, holding that there was no authority for suppressing evidence as a remedy for violating the Bail Reform Act (assuming that it was in fact violated in this case). The "exclusionary rule is designed to deter police misconduct rather than to punish the errors of judges and magistrates." (People v. Fayed (2020) 9 Cal.5th 147, 166-167, quoting United States v. Leon (1984) 468 U.S. 897, 916.)

Enlarging the Scope of the Original Detention:

If the person voluntarily consents to having his vehicle searched after he is free to leave, there is no prolonged detention, at least where a reasonable person should have understood that the purposes of the traffic stop were done. The officer is under no obligation to advise him that he is no longer being detained or that he has a right to refuse to allow the officer to search. (Robinette v. Ohio (1996) 519 U.S. 33 [117 S.Ct. 417; 136 L.Ed.2nd 347].)

The Federal Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal: Up until recently, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has had difficulty accepting the idea that a police officer, during an otherwise lawful detention, and so long as that detention is not unlawfully prolonged (see above), may question the detained person about other possible criminal activity absent some "particularized suspicion" relevant to that other criminal activity:

See United States v. Chavez-Valenzuela (9th Cir. 2001) 268 F.3rd 719, amended at 279 F.3rd 1062, where the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal found a consent search, obtained after the purposes of the traffic stop had been satisfied, was invalid as a product of an illegally prolonged detention, the extended detention being the result of the officer's unnecessary inquiries made during the traffic stop. Robinette was not discussed by the Court. The defendant's nervousness was held to be irrelevant to the detention issue, per the Court. (See also People v. Lusardi (1991) 228 Cal.App.3rd Supp. 1, making a similar argument.)

Note United States v. Turvin et al. (9th Cir. 2008) 517 F.3rd 1097, discussing the invalidity of the primary holdings of the Chavez-Valenzuela decision, as it related to the issue of prolonged detentions. However, Turvin was subsequently abrogated to the extent that a "brief pause" in writing the defendant a ticket to inquire about defendant's possible (but without reasonable suspicion) drug trafficking was upheld as "reasonable," and was inconsistent with Rodriguez v. United States (2015) 575 U.S, 348 [135 S.Ct. 1609; 191 L.Ed.2nd 4927]. (United States v. Landeros (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 862, 866-867; see below.)

See also United States v. Murillo (9th Cir. 2001) 255 F.3rd 1169, 1174, where the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that an officer must be able to "articulate suspicious factors that are particularized and objective" in order to "broaden the scope of questioning" beyond the purposes of the initial traffic stop.

Note: This is a questionable ruling in light of Robinette.)

And see United States v. Mendez (9th Cir. 2006) 467 F.3rd 1162, where it was held that questioning a detainee about possible criminal activity not related to the cause of the detention, and without a "particularized suspicion" to support a belief that the detainee is involved in that activity, is a Fourth Amendment violation. The superseding version of Mendez, at (9th Cir. 2007) 476 F.3rd 1077, however, upheld the legality of such questioning so long as the initial detention wasn't unlawfully prolonged in the process. (Id., at pp. 1079-1081.)

The U.S. Supreme Court finally rejected the Ninth Circuit's unsupported conclusion that absent "a particularized reasonable suspicion that an individual is not a citizen," it would be a Fourth Amendment violation to ask him or her about the subject's citizenship (see Mena v. City of Simi Valley (9th Cir. 2003) 332 F.3rd 1255, 1264-1265; reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court in Muehler v. Mena (2005) 544 U.S. 93, 100-101 [125 S.Ct. 1465; 161 L.Ed.2nd 299].)

The Ninth Circuit has since overruled its decisions in Chavez-Valenzuela and Murillo, finally recognizing the Supreme Court's rulings to the contrary. (United States v. Mendez (9th Cir. 2007) 476 F.3rd 1077, 1079-1081.)

Questioning defendant/truck driver and asking for consent to search the vehicle, when the truck was initially stopped for no more than an administrative check of its paperwork, is not unconstitutional. (United States v. Delgado (9th Cir. 2008) 545 F.3rd 1195, 1205.)

In other cases, the Supreme Court has held: "Even when law enforcement officers have no basis for suspecting a particular individual, they may pose questions, ask for identification, and request consent to search luggage—provided they do not induce cooperation by coercive means." (United States v. Drayton (2002) 536 U.S. 194 [122 S.Ct. 2105; 153 L.Ed.2nd 242].); citing Florida v. Bostick (1991) 501 U.S. 429, 434-435 [111 S.Ct. 2382; 115 L.Ed.2nd 389, 398-399].)

It is a "settled principle that while the police have the right to request citizens to answer voluntarily questions concerning unsolved crimes they have no right to compel them to answer." (Davis v. Mississippi (1969) 394 U.S. 721, 727, fn. 6 [89 S.Ct. 1394; 22 L.Ed.2nd 676].)

More recently, in Illinois v. Caballes (2005) 543 U.S. 405 [125 S.Ct. 834; 160 L.Ed.2nd 842], the U.S. Supreme Court rejected the argument that allowing a narcotics-sniffing dog to sniff around the outside of a vehicle that was lawfully stopped for a traffic offense "unjustifiably enlarge(s) the scope of a routine traffic stop into a drug investigation." Per the Supreme Court: No expectation of privacy is violated by this procedure, and therefore does not implicate the Fourth Amendment.

> However, if the dog-sniff is conducted after the purposes of the traffic stop are completed, and thus during an unlawfully prolonged detention, then it is illegal and the resulting evidence will be suppressed. (Rodriguez v. United States (2015) 575 U.S, 348 [135 S.Ct. 1609; 191 L.Ed.2nd 4927]; the dog's alert to the presence of drugs being seven to eight minutes after the purposes of the traffic stop had been completed.)
> > "The seizure remains lawful only 'so long as [unrelated] inquiries do not measurably extend the duration of the stop.'" (Rodriguez v. United States, supra, at p. 355; quoting Arizona v. Johnson (2009) 555 U.S. 323, 333 [129 S.Ct. 781; 172 L.Ed.2nd 694].)

Also, the U.S. Supreme Court recently rejected the Ninth Circuit's unsupported conclusion that, absent "a particularized reasonable suspicion that an individual is not a citizen," it is a Fourth Amendment violation to ask him or her about the subject's citizenship. (See Mena v. City of Simi Valley (9th Cir. 2003) 332 F.3rd 1255, 1264-1265; reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court in Muehler v. Mena (2005) 544 U.S. 93 [125 S.Ct. 1465; 161 L.Ed.2nd 299].)

It is not unlawful to ask about a firearm during a detention even if there is otherwise no evidence of the illegal use of a gun, so long as it does not prolong the detention. (United States v. Basher (9th Cir. 2011) 629 F.3rd 1161, 1166, fn. 3.)

California courts are in accord with these latest Supreme Court pronouncements on the issue: "Questioning during the routine traffic stop on a subject unrelated to the purpose of the stop is not itself a Fourth Amendment violation. Mere questioning is neither a search nor a seizure. [Citation.] While the traffic detainee is under no obligation to answer unrelated questions, the Constitution does not prohibit law enforcement officers from asking. [Citation.]" (People v. Brown (1998) 62 Cal.App.4th 493, 499-500; see also People v. Bell (1996) 43 Cal.App.4th 754, 767; People v. Gallardo (2005) 130 Cal.App.4th 234, 238; People v. Tully (2012) 54 Cal.4th 952, 981-982; and People v. Gallardo (2005) 130 Cal.App.4th 234, 239; asking for consent to search during the time it would have taken to write the citation that was the original cause of the stop is legal, despite the lack of any evidence to believe there was something there to search for.)

"(I)nvestigations conducted by officers not directly related to the initial purpose of the stop 'do not convert the encounter into something other than a lawful seizure, so long as the inquiries do not measurably extend the stop's duration.'" (People v. Esparza (2023) 95 Cal.App.5th 1084, 1094; quoting Arizona v. Johnson (2009) 555 U.S. 323, 333 [172 L.Ed.2nd 694; 129 S.Ct. 781].)

Other Federal Circuits:

> Other federal circuit courts are in apparent accord: See United States v. Cone (10th Cir. Okla. 2017) 868 F.3rd 1150, where the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeal recognized that an officer's mission during a stop in not limited to determining whether to issue a ticket. Because traffic stops are potentially dangerous, the Supreme Court has held that officers may run computer checks for warrants and a motorist's criminal history. The court reasoned that if running a computer check of a driver's criminal history is justified, then simply asking the driver about that history is not unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. Here, the court concluded that the information requested by the officer did not exceed the scope of what a computer check would have revealed. The court added that a drivers' answer may not be as reliable as a computer check but the time involved is much shorter.
> During a traffic stop for illegally tinted windows, the federal Seventh Circuit held that an officer was not prevented from asking the defendant to sit in the officer's car as a warning was being written, and asking questions unrelated to the traffic stop, so long as it doesn't prolong the duration of the traffic stop beyond what it reasonably takes for the officer to complete the "mission" of the stop. The Court further held that again, so long as the traffic stop is not illegally prolonged, it does not violate the Fourth Amendment to have a drug-sniffing dog sniff around the defendant's car. (United States v. Goodwill (7th Cir. 2022) 24 F.4th 612; the dog alerting on cocaine in the car, all accomplished within 10 minutes.)

Note: Oregon Supreme Court authority to the contrary (i.e., State v. Arreola-Botello (2019) 365 OR 695), that says that for the purposes of Article I, section 9 of the Oregon Constitution, there are both "subject-matter and durational limitations" to the questioning that may occur during a traffic stop, thus making it illegal for Oregon law enforcement officers to question a subject stopped for a traffic violation about any other possible criminal activity whether or not it unlawfully prolongs the traffic stop, is not applicable to federal or California courts, and may (or "should") be ignored.

Despite conceding that he had been lawfully detained (the subject of a citizen's complaint that defendant, in a road rage incident, had threatened to shoot the complainant), defendant argued that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they continued to detain him after they frisked him and determined that he did not possess a firearm, and then by searching his vehicle. The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeal disagreed. First, the Court held that the officers lawfully continued their investigation after they determined via the patdown search that defendant was not carrying a gun because during the frisk defendant admitted to threatening to shoot the complainant. The court found that the officers had reasonable suspicion that defendant had committed harassment in violation of Iowa law. Consequently, the court concluded that the officer's request for Williams' identification was a reasonable and lawful extension of the initial investigatory stop. (United States v. Williams (8th Cir. 2020) 955 F.3rd 734; defendant's vehicle being subsequently searched based upon the odor of marijuana emanating from the vehicle, resulting in the recovery of the gun and 400 grams of marijuana.)

A traffic stop where an extended records check took 19 minutes to return, during which time a drug-sniffing dog was brought to the scene and alerted on defendant's vehicle, was held to be reasonable under the circumstances. The defendant, being from out-of-state (from Arizona, driving in Utah), a "Triple I" check was made, which took longer than a regular computer check. The court concluded that even if the Triple I check prolonged the duration of the stop, it was reasonable under the circumstances because; (1) the computer in the trooper's patrol car would have provided limited information with respect to out-of-state drivers such as defendant, (2) the trooper developed concerns for his safety based on defendant's apparent attempt to hide something (stooping over) as the trooper approached his car, and (3) defendant's inability to provide registration or insurance paperwork for the vehicle. Given these circumstances, the court held that the trooper's decision to run a Triple I check through dispatch as opposed to limiting his records check to the computer in his patrol car did not unreasonably prolong the stop, justifying a 19-minutes detention. (United States v. Mayville (10th Cir. 2020) 955 F.3rd 825.)

Taking Fingerprints: So long as there is a reasonable suspicion to detain an individual, it is lawful to also fingerprint the suspect on less than probable cause, at least if done at the scene and without transportation to a police station. (Davis v. Mississippi (1969) 394 U.S. 721 [89 S.Ct. 1394; 22 L.Ed.2nd 676]; Hayes v. Florida (1985) 470 U.S. 811 [105 S.Ct. 1643; 84 L.Ed.2nd 705]; Virgle v. Superior Court (2002) 100 Cal.App.4th 572.)

Note: Transporting the subject to the police station for the purposes of taking fingerprints, at least if done without the subject's voluntary consent, will likely convert the contact into an arrest which will be held to be illegal absent full probable cause to arrest him. (See "Transporting a Detainee," under "Detentions vs. Arrests," above.)

Driving Under the Influence ("DUI") (alcohol and/or drugs) and Other Regulatory Checkpoints:

Weaving: Observation of the defendant weaving within his traffic lane is sufficient cause to stop him to determine whether he is DUI or the vehicle has some unsafe mechanical defect. (People v. Bracken (2000) 83 Cal.App.4th Supp. 1, weaving within his lane for half a mile; see also People v. Perez (1985) 175 Cal.App.3rd Supp. 8; weaving within his lane for three quarters of a mile.)

But see United States v. Colin (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 439, where the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that weaving from lane line to lane line for 35 to 45 seconds is neither a violation of the lane straddling statute (V.C. § 21658(a)), nor reasonable suspicion that the driver may be under the influence; a questionable decision, and one than may probably be ignored by state law enforcement officers in light of Bracken and Perez.

A single pronounced weave within the lane, plus an experienced Highway Patrol officer's observation of the defendant sitting up close to the steering wheel, which the officer recognized as something an impaired driver does, was sufficient to corroborate second-hand information concerning defendant's "erratic driving" from Montana Department of Transportation employees, justifying the stop of the defendant's car. (United States v. Fernandez-Castillo (9th Cir. 2003) 324 F.3rd 1114.)

DUI (and Other Regulatory "Special Needs") Checkpoints:

General Rule: DUI Checkpoints are lawful if conducted according to specified criteria, and involve a "special needs," "regulatory" area of the law. (Ingersoll v. Palmer (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 1321; Michigan State Police Dept. v. Sitz (1990) 496 U.S. 444 [110 S.Ct. 2481; 110 L.Ed.2nd 412].)

Veh. Code § 2814.1(a) also provides statutory authority for DUI checkpoints: A "driver of a motor vehicle shall stop and submit to a sobriety checkpoint inspection conducted by a law enforcement agency when signs and displays are posted requiring that stop."

The section also contains detailed provisions relating to the impoundment of vehicles when the checkpoint reveals that the driver lacks a valid license. (See Veh. Code § 2814.2(b), (c).)

Note: See Birchfield v. North Dakota (2016) 579 U.S. 438, 444-450 [136 S.Ct. 2160, 2167-2170; 195 L.Ed.2nd 560], for a historical review of the development of DUI statutes and the importance of obtaining a reading of the suspect's "BAC" ("Blood Alcohol Concentration").

Also Note: "DUI," is short for "Driving while Under the Influence" of alcohol and/or drugs. Similarly, "DWI," also commonly used, and used interchangeably, is short for "Driving While Intoxicated."

Reasonableness Requirement: Whether or not a "DUI" (or other regulatory) roadblock or checkpoint is lawful depends upon whether it meets the federal standard for reasonableness.

"The federal test for determining whether a detention or seizure is justified balances the public interest served by the seizure, the degree to which the seizure advances the public interest and the severity of the interference with individual liberty. (Brown v. Texas (1979) 443 U.S. 47, 50-51 [99 S.Ct. 2637; 61 L.Ed.2nd 357, 361-362, . . .].)" (Emphasis added; People v. Banks (1994) 6 Cal.4th 926; holding that failure to publicize a DUI roadblock was not necessarily fatal to its lawfulness, under Brown v. Texas.)

Factors Determining Predetermined Specified Criteria: While standardless and unconstrained discretion on the part of government officers is prohibited; "stops and inspections for regulatory purposes, although without 'individualized suspicion,' may be permitted if undertaken pursuant to predetermined specified neutral criteria." (Italics added; Ingersoll v. Palmer, supra, at p. 1335.) The factors identified in Ingersoll (at pp. 1341-1347) are whether:

- The decision to establish a sobriety checkpoint, the selection of the site, and the procedures for the operation of the checkpoint, are made and established by supervisory law enforcement personnel.

- Motorists are stopped according to a neutral formula, such as every third, fifth or tenth driver.

- Adequate safety precautions are taken, such as proper lighting, warning signs, and signals, and whether clearly identifiable official vehicles and personnel are used.

- The location of the checkpoint was determined by a policy-making official, and was reasonable; i.e., on a road having a high incidence of alcohol-related accidents or arrests.

- The time the checkpoint was conducted and its duration reflect "good judgment" on the part of law enforcement officials.

- The checkpoint exhibits indicia of its official nature (to reassure the public of the authorized nature of the stop).

- The average length and nature of the detention is minimized.

- The checkpoint is preceded by publicity.

Case Law:

> A DUI checkpoint was upheld where the existence of supervisory control was indicated by documentary evidence that a sobriety checkpoint was planned for that date and by the fact that the checkpoint was staffed by seven police officers. Testimony that an officer was unaware of a neutral formula for stopping vehicles was not affirmative evidence overcoming the presumption of lawfulness. All 519 vehicles passing through the checkpoint were stopped, thus a neutral mathematical formula of 100 percent applied. The fact that the checkpoint was operated at a different location than given in a media advisory was insufficient to overcome the presumption as to decision making at the supervisory level or reasonable location. (Arthur v. Department of Motor Vehicles (2010) 184 Cal.App.4th 1199.)

A DUI checkpoint was struck down where the People failed to sustain their burden of proof as to (i) the role of supervisory personnel in prescribing the procedures to be used at the checkpoint, (ii) the rationale for selecting the particular location used for the checkpoint, (iii) the length of detentions, and (iv) advance publicity. (People v. Alvarado (2011) 193 Cal.App.4th Supp. 13.)

A vehicle checkpoint, set up for the purpose of checking automobile registrations and compliance with motor vehicle laws in order to ensure the safe and legal operation of motor vehicles on the roadway, was held to be lawful by the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeal in that it was operated by the officers in a reasonable manner. First, it was clearly visible, as flashing blue lights and traffic cones warned motorists of the need to slow to a stop, and the officers manning the checkpoint wore uniforms and reflective vests and hats. Second, and more importantly, the checkpoint was operated pursuant to a "systematic procedure that strictly limited the discretionary authority of the officers and reduced the potential for a motorist to be subjected to arbitrary treatment. Specifically, (1) multiple officers manned the checkpoint, as required by department policy; (2) officers were required to stop every vehicle and were trained to look primarily for violations of motor vehicle laws; (3) the checkpoint was approved and supervised by a commanding officer; and (4) officers did not detain drivers longer than reasonably necessary to accomplish the purpose of checking a license and registration. (United States v. Moore (4th Cir. 2020) 952 F.3rd 186; holding that extending the detention was lawful upon noting evidence that defendant was engaged in criminal activity; i.e., smoking marijuana while driving.)

circumscribed vehicle checkpoints where its primary purpose was to remove intoxicated drivers from the roadway. Any marginal intrusion on liberty associated with adding license checks to the city's DUI checkpoint was minimal and justified by the important interest in road safety served by such inquiries. Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights were not violated by an officer detaining and ultimately arresting plaintiff when he refused to produce his driver's license. Once plaintiff refused, the officer had probable cause to believe that he was violating Veh. Code § 12951(b). (Demarest v. City of Vallejo (9th Cir. 2022) 44 F.4th 1209, 1220-1226.)

> In determining the lawfulness of a checkpoint, the Ninth Circuit (at p. 1220) used what it referred to as a "two-step analysis." "At the first step, a court must determine . . . whether a checkpoint is 'per se invalid' because its 'primary purpose' is 'to advance the general interest in crime control' with respect to the occupants of the vehicles being stopped. . . . If the answer to that question is no, then the court must 'determine its "reasonableness, hence, its constitutionality, on the basis of the individual circumstances."'"

Issue; Avoiding a DUI Checkpoint: Is the observed avoidance of a DUI checkpoint sufficient cause to conduct a traffic stop?

The federal Tenth Circuit Court of Appeal is of the opinion that it is not. The Court held that a driver's decision to use a rural highway exit after passing drug checkpoint signs may be considered as one factor in an officer's reasonable suspicion determination, but it is not a sufficient basis, by itself, to justify a traffic stop. The court noted that an officer must identify additional suspicious circumstances or independently evasive behavior to justify stopping a vehicle that uses an exit after driving past ruse drug-checkpoint signs. (United States v. Neff (10th Cir. 2012) 681 F.3rd 1134.)

See also United States v. Compton (2nd Cir. 2016) 830 F.3rd 55: Purposely avoiding an immigration checkpoint, plus other suspicious circumstances (i.e., the proximity of the checkpoint to the border and the defendants' peculiar attempt to conceal their avoidance of the checkpoint by purchasing containers of peppers at the vegetable stand) was held to be sufficient to justify a detention.

Other Regulatory Checkpoints: Other than for DUI deterrence, roadblocks, checkpoints, and similar "administrative, special needs" searches have been approved in the following cases:

- License and/or registration inspection checkpoints. (Delaware v. Prouse (1979) 440 U.S. 648 [59 L.Ed.2nd 660]; People v. Washburn (1968) 265 Cal.App.2nd 665; People v. - A forest service checkpoint for identification and registration, targeting what in the past has been a "uniquely disruptive event," is not per se illegal. (Park v. Forest Service (8th Cir. 2000) 205 F.3rd 1034, 1040.)

- Traffic safety checkpoints. (United States v. Trevino (7th Cir. 1996) 60 F.3rd 333.)

- Checkpoint to "thwart an imminent terrorist attack or to catch a dangerous criminal who is likely to flee by way of a particular route." (See below; City of Indianapolis v. Edmond (2000) 531 U.S. 32 [121 S.Ct. 447; 148 L.Ed.2nd 333].)

  See "Drug Interdiction (or 'Ordinary Criminal Wrongdoing') Checkpoints," below.

- Checkpoints set up for the purpose of collecting information from the public concerning a prior criminal act (i.e., a fatal "hit and run" in this case), when set up at the location of the prior criminal act, and exactly one week after it occurred. Such a roadblock was differentiated from the attempt to discovery "ordinary criminal wrongdoing," as condemned in Indianapolis v. Edmond, supra. (Illinois v. Lidster (2004) 540 U.S. 419 [124 S.Ct. 885; 157 L.Ed.2nd 843].)

- An "information station" set up to provide park visitors with information concerning the rules of the park and be given a litter bag, where every vehicle was stopped. (United States v. Faulkner (9th Cir. 2006) 450 F.3rd 466.)

- A checkpoint set up for the purpose of preventing illegal hunting in a national park, justified by a legitimate concern for preservation of park wildlife, when confined to the park gate where visitors would expect to briefly stop anyway. (United States v. Fraire (9th Cir. 2009) 575 F.3rd 929.)

- Warrantless searching of luggage and other packages at selected entrances to New York's subway system, in response to the possibility of terrorists entering the system with explosives. (MacWade v. Kelly (2nd Cir. 2006) 460 F.3rd 260.)

- A vehicle-inspection exhaust checkpoint, pursuant to V.C. § 2814.1(a): A County Board of Supervisors is authorized by statute to establish to check for violations of V.C. §§ 27153 and 27153.5 (exhaust and excessive smoke violations).

    Note: V.C. § 2814.1(d): Motorcycle-only checkpoints are prohibited by statute.

Dual Purpose Checkpoints: Checkpoints may have a dual-purpose, such as the interdiction of drugs (but see below) and enforcement of driver's license and registration laws. (Merrett v. Moore (11th Cir. 1995) 58 F.3rd 1547.)

Multiple Agency Checkpoints: Checkpoints may be attended by more than one law enforcement agency, despite the different interests involved. (United States v. Barajas-Chavez (10th Cir. 1999) 162 F.3rd 1285, New Mexico DUI checkpoint with Border Patrol present in case the police discovered illegal aliens; United States v. Galindo-Gonzales (10th Cir. 1998) 142 F.3rd 1217, aliens found at state driver's license and vehicle registration roadblock.)

Drug Interdiction (or "Ordinary Criminal Wrongdoing") Checkpoints:

Rule:

Earlier cases from lower appellate courts upheld the validity of drug interdiction checkpoints upon the same reasoning as above. (See Merrett v. Moore (11th Cir. 1995) 58 F.3rd 1547; and Missouri v. Damask (1996) 936 S.W.2nd 565.)

However, the U.S. Supreme Court has since determined that "drug interdiction" checkpoints are not lawful. The difference is that drug interdiction checkpoints, rather than being "regulatory," or involving some "special need," are set up for the purpose of detecting "ordinary criminal wrongdoing." As such, drug interdiction checkpoints require the standard Fourth Amendment "individualized" or "particularized" suspicion to be lawful. (City of Indianapolis v. Edmond (2000) 531 U.S. 32 [121 S.Ct. 447; 148 L.Ed.2nd 333].)

Exceptions:

The Supreme Court in Edmond, supra, intimated strongly that roadblocks in unusual circumstances of criminal wrongdoing might be constitutionally acceptable. "(T)here are circumstances that may justify a law enforcement checkpoint where the primary purpose would otherwise, but for some emergency, relate to ordinary crime control." (Id., at p. 44.)

For example, as the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals noted in its reversed decision in Edmond (see Edmond v. Goldsmith (7th Cir. 1999) 183 F.3rd 659, 662-663.), "the Fourth Amendment would almost certainly permit an appropriately tailored roadblock set up to thwart an imminent terrorist attack or to catch a dangerous criminal who is likely to flee by way of a particular route." (Italics added; City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, supra, at p. 44 (146 L.Ed.2nd at p. 345].)

E.g.: See United States v. Paetsch (10th Cir. 2015) 782 F.3rd 1162; where barricading an intersection, thus preventing some 20 vehicles and 29 individuals from leaving the area for up to 30 minutes, was held to be lawful when in response to a bank robbery. The minimal intrusion on defendant's right to leave the area was held to be outweighed by the public's interest in apprehending a bank robber.

E.g.: See also United States v. Arnold (8th Cir. Ark. 2016) 835 F.3rd 833, where a road block, and the suspicionless stop of defendant's vehicle, was upheld where officers had reliable information that implicated co-defendant Johnson in two armed bank robberies, indicating that he was fleeing from the second robbery, and where defendant's vehicle was stopped at the same time at a roadblock. Second, the officers knew the roadblock was likely to be effective because they had a description of Johnson's vehicle and knew the route he was travelling. Third, the public interest advanced by the roadblock outweighed defendant's individual Fourth Amendment interests. Finally, only five or six minutes elapsed from the time defendant was stopped at the roadblock until the officers identified him as a co-suspect in the second bank robbery, along with Johnson, and discovered the existence of an outstanding warrant for his arrest.

And see Illinois v. Lidster (2004) 540 U.S. 419 [124 S.Ct. 885; 157 L.Ed.2nd 843], where the U.S. Supreme Court held that a checkpoint set up for the purpose of collecting information from the public concerning a prior criminal act (i.e., a fatal "hit and run" in this case), when set up at the location of the prior criminal act, and exactly one week after it occurred. Such a roadblock was differentiated from the attempt to discover "ordinary criminal wrongdoing," as condemned in Indianapolis v. Edmond, supra.

Checkpoints on Indian Land by Indian Authorities:

A roadblock set up on a public right-of-way within tribal territory, lawful under Indian law and established on tribal authority, is permissible only to the extent that the suspicionless stop of non-Indians is limited to the amount of time, and the nature of the inquiry, that can establish whether or not the person stopped is an Indian. (Bressi v. Ford (9th Cir. 2009) 575 F.3rd 891, 896-897.)

Indian law enforcement officers, when also certified to enforce state laws, may set up DUI or other regulatory roadblocks (as opposed to merely checking other Indians pursuant to Tribal law) on Indian land. But such roadblocks must meet the constitutional requirements set by the Supreme Court (see above). (Id., at p. 897.)

Field Interviews ("F.I.") of Persons Suspected of Criminal Activity:

General Rule: Temporarily detaining a person for the purpose of verifying (or negating) the person's possible connection with some criminal activity, based upon an articulable "reasonable suspicion" that the person may be involved in criminal activity, is lawful. (Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889]; In re Tony C. (1978) 21 Cal.3rd 888.)

Note: A "field interview" (or "F.I.") is a standard law enforcement technique used to identify individuals and document their presence at a particular location at a particular time, discourage planned criminal activity, and note companions with whom the person is associating; information which sometimes becomes important and relevant in later investigations or prosecutions. Field interviews may be handled as a consensual encounter or, if a reasonable suspicion exists, a detention.

Examples:

"(P)olice may . . . use group detentions (assuming the necessary reasonable suspicion is present) or (consensual encounters) encounters (when no reasonable suspicion is present) with suspected or known gang members in order to do in-field identifications, conduct field interviews, take photographs, or serve gang 'STEP notices.' (fn. 8)" (People v. Flores (2019) 38 Cal.App.5th 617, 635-636.)

> Per Footnote 8: "A STEP notice 'informs the recipient that he is associating with a known gang; that the gang engages in criminal activity; and that, if the recipient commits certain crimes with gang members, he may face increased penalties for his conduct. The issuing officer records the date and time the notice is given, along with other identifying information like descriptions and tattoos, and the identification of the recipient's associates.' (People v. Sanchez (2016) 63 Cal.4th 665, 672 . . . ; see Pen. Code, § 186.20 et seq. [California Street Terrorism Enforcement and Prevention Act]"

Being in the area of a house for which there is only a speculative belief that it might be involved in drug activity, even when it is known that the person to be detained has a prior drug-related record and that there exists prior untested, unreliable information that the person might be involved in the sale of drugs, is insufficient cause to detain. (People v. Pitts (2004) 117 Cal.App.4th 881.)

Spotlighting the defendant in a high narcotics area and then walking up to him "briskly" while asking questions held to be a detention under the circumstances. (People v. Garry (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th 1100; People v. Rico (1979) 97 Cal.App.3rd 124, 128–130.)

> Also, taking into account of the "totality of the circumstances," it was held that defendant was detained when the officer made a U-turn to pull in behind him and then trained the patrol car's spotlights on his car. (People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, 21-22.)
> But see People v. Tacardon (2022) 14 Cal.5th 235: A deputy sheriff parked 15 to 20 feet behind a lawfully parked car, shined a spotlight into the interior, and approached. When a female suddenly got out, he ordered her to remain at the curb. At about that point the deputy smelled marijuana and observed large marijuana bags on the floorboard. Defendant, in the driver's seat, proved to be on probation. A subsequent search produced additional contraband evidencing drug sales. The Third District Court of Appeal reversed a superior court ruling that defendant had been unlawfully detained. Disagreeing with People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, the court held that while the use of a spotlight might cause someone to feel "scrutiny, such directed scrutiny does not amount to a detention." Although the female who had gotten out of the car was detained, "there is no evidence defendant observed the deputy's interaction with [her] . . . ." By the time the deputy addressed defendant, having smelled marijuana and having seen the large bags of marijuana, defendant was appropriately and lawfully detained. Significantly, the deputy never blocked defendant's egress, he never used emergency lights, and his approach to the car was casual.

And see People v. Perez (1989) 211 Cal.App.3rd 1492, where a police officer parked his patrol car in front of Perez's vehicle, leaving "plenty of room" for Perez to drive away, and activated both spotlights on the patrol car "to get a better look at the occupants and gauge their reactions." (Id. at p. 1494.) The officer then walked over to the car, tapped on the window, and asked the driver to roll down the window. (Ibid.) The appellate court concluded: "[T]he conduct of the officer here did not manifest police authority to the degree leading a reasonable person to conclude he was not free to leave. While the use of high beams and spotlights might cause a reasonable person to feel himself [or herself] the object of official scrutiny, such directed scrutiny does not amount to a detention. [Citations.]" (Italics added; Id. at p. 1496.)

Handcuffing a suspect after he gave an implausible explanation as to why he was in the area of a marijuana grow at 5:30 a.m., and finding clothing in his backpack that smelled like growing marijuana, was a lawful detention even though the detention lasted at least 4½ hours while officers attempted to find physical evidence at the scene connecting him to the marijuana grow. (People v. Williams (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th 949.)

There is no "agreement" that prevents state and local law enforcement from communicating with aliens from another country, nor to "otherwise to cooperate" with federal authorities "regarding the immigration status of any individual." In fact, the cooperation between the police officers and the Border comes within the authority conferred by Congress in 8 U.S.C. § 1357(g)(10). Upon determining that defendant was probably in the United States illegally, it was held to be lawful for local law enforcement to detain him pending the arrival of a Border Patrol agent. (United States v. Puebla-Zamora (8th Cir. 2021) 996 F.3rd 535.)

Gang Membership:

Membership in a street gang (absent evidence that the person has "knowledge that its members engage in or have engaged in a pattern of criminal gang activity, and [that the person] . . . willfully promotes, furthers, or assists in any felonious criminal conduct by members of that gang") is not in and of itself a crime. (See P.C. § 186.22(a)) The practice of stopping, detaining, questioning, and perhaps photographing a suspected gang member, based solely upon the person's suspected gang membership, is illegal. (People v. Green (1991) 227 Cal.App.3rd 692, 699-700; People v. Rodriguez (1993) 21 Cal.App.4th 232, 239.)

The Rodriguez Court noted that; "While this policy (of stopping and questioning all suspected gang members) may serve the laudable purpose of preventing crime, it is prohibited by the Fourth Amendment." (Id., at p. 239; citing Brown v. Texas (1979) 443 U.S. 47, 52 [99 S.Ct. 2637; 61 L.Ed.2nd 357, 363].)

See "Videotaping, Tape-Recording, and Photographing," under "New and Developing Law Enforcement Tools and Technology" (Chapter 14), below.

During Execution of a Search or Arrest Warrant, or during a Fourth Waiver Search:

An occupant of a house being subjected to a search pursuant to a search warrant may be detained during the search (1) in order to prevent flight, (2) to minimize the risk of harm to the officers, and (3) to facilitate an orderly search through cooperation of the residents. (Michigan v. Summers (1981) 452 U.S. 692, 702-703 [101 S.Ct. 2587; 69 L.Ed.2nd 340, 349-350].)

This includes those who otherwise are not necessarily involved in the suspected criminal activity. (Bailey v. United States (2013) 568 U.S. 186, 192-202 [133 S.Ct. 1031, 1037-1043; 185 L.Ed.2nd 19]; citing Muehler v. Mena (2005) 544 U.S. 93 [125 S.Ct. 1465; 161 L.Ed.2nd 299].)

In Muehler v. Mena, supra, at p. 101, the Supreme Court reversed the Ninth Circuit's conclusion that the officers should have released Mena as soon as it became clear that she did not constitute an immediate threat, but noted that the detention "can become unlawful if it is prolonged beyond the time reasonably required to complete that mission." (See Guillory v. Hill (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 240, 250.)

Note, however, Ybarra v. Illinois (1979) 444 U.S. 85 [100 S.Ct. 338; 62 L.Ed.2nd 238], condemning the detention and patdown of everyone at the scene absent individualized evidence connecting each person so detained with the illegal activity being investigated.

The time allotted for the detention of the occupants of a residence does not, however, extend beyond the time it takes to execute the search warrant. Questioning the detainees is not part of the detention. Detaining and questioning that takes place beyond the execution of the warrant, therefore, constitutes an unlawfully prolonged detention. (Guillory v. Hill (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 240, 249-256.)

And, using an otherwise lawful detention during the execution of a search warrant as a tool with which to coerce the employees of a business to submit to interviews, conditioning their release on answering questions, is unlawful and a violation of the Fourth Amendment. (Ganwich v. Knapp (9th Cir. 2003) 319 F.3rd 1115.)

Officers acted reasonably by detaining a female occupant of a residence in handcuffs for two to three hours while a search was in progress, even though she was not the suspect the officers were looking for, given the fact that the search warrant sought weapons and evidence of gang membership. (Muehler v. Mena (2005) 544 U.S. 93 [125 S.Ct. 1465; 161 L.Ed.2nd 299].)

The justifications for detaining the occupants include:

- Preventing flight in the event that incriminating evidence is found;
- Minimizing the risk of harm to the officers, and
- Facilitating the orderly completion of the search while avoiding the use of force.

(Id., at p. 98.)

Recognizing the inherent dangerousness in serving narcotics-related search warrants and the common use of weapons, particularly firearms, in such cases, if for no other reason than the officers' safety, anyone present at the scene of the execution of such a warrant who appears to have a

"close physical and functional association" with the subjects of the search, may be temporarily detained while the person is identified and that possible association is investigated. (People v. Samples (1996) 48 Cal.App.4th 1197; defendant driving the car listed in the search warrant, in the company of two people listed in the warrant, lawfully detained.)

The same rules apply to detaining occupants of a residence while serving an arrest warrant. (People v. Hannah (1997) 51 Cal.App.4th 1335.)

> The Ninth Circuit disagrees with this theory, holding that the "categorical detention" of an occupant of a house while executing an arrest warrant is unconstitutional. (Sharp v. County of Orange (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 901, 912-916.)
>
> The Eleventh Circuit agrees with the California rule. (United States v. Mastin (11th Cir. AL. 2020) 972 F.3rd 1230.)

Also, police may lawfully "briefly" detain visitors to a probationer's home while executing a "Fourth Waiver*" search for purposes of identifying the visitors and for the officers' safety. (People v. Matelski (2000) 82 Cal.App.4th 837, suspected felon; People v. Rios (2011) 193 Cal.App.4th 584, 593-595, suspected gang member.)

Detaining defendant for 30 to 50 minutes while officers conducted a Fourth waiver search held to be illegal, requiring the suppression of evidence discovered during this prolonged time period. While the initial detention may have been lawful, holding onto defendant after it could no longer be argued that he constituted a threat to the officers or the purposes of the search, was not justified. (People v. Gutierrez (2018) 21 Cal.App.5th 1146, 1153-1161.)

However, a person merely approaching a house being searched, at least in the absence of any indication that the person has some connection with the illegal activity occurring in the house, may not be detained. (People v. Gallant (1990) 225 Cal.App.3rd 200, 203-204.)

But, a person who approaches a house being searched pursuant to a search warrant under circumstances either indicating some connection with the residence, or when his possible connection cannot be determined without a brief detention, may be detained long enough to investigate his connection with the illegal activity at the house and to ensure police safety during the search. (People v. Glaser (1995) 11 Cal.4th 354, 363-374.)

However, once the subject has left the "immediate vicinity" of the place being searched, he is no longer subject to being detained, at least under the theory of Michigan v. Summers (1981) 452 U.S. 692 [101 S.Ct. 2587; 69

L.Ed.2nd 340, 349-350] (above). (Bailey v. United States (2013) 568 U.S. 186, 192-202 [133 S.Ct. 1031, 1037-1043; 185 L.Ed.2nd 19]; restricting such detentions to occupants who are still in the "immediate vicinity" of the residence being searched. The detention of an occupant who had just left the residence, and was already about a mile away, held to be illegal, at least under the rule of Summers.)

Also, the rule of Summers cannot be used as an excuse for the mass detention and interrogation of suspected illegal aliens at a factory when the ruse used to gain access to the factory and the suspects was a search warrant for employment documents. (Cruz v. Barr (9th Cir. 2019) 926 F.3rd 1128.)

Pending the Obtaining of a Search Warrant:

Securing a home from the outside, detaining the occupant on his own porch pending the obtaining of a warrant, was upheld by the United States Supreme Court. (Illinois v. McArthur (2001) 531 U.S. 326 [121 S.Ct. 946; 148 L.Ed.2nd 838].)

> Such a "securing" of a house, however, is in fact a Fourth Amendment seizure. (United States v. Shrum (10th Cir. KS 2018) 908 F.3rd 1219.)

It is proper for the police to temporarily "detain a residence" from the outside, preventing people from entering, when there is a reasonable suspicion that contraband or evidence of a crime is inside, at least until the officers can determine through their investigation whether to seek a search warrant. (People v. Bennett (1998) 17 Cal.4th 373.)

Entering and securing a residence pending the obtaining of a search warrant was supported by exigent circumstances when officers received information that the occupant was about to destroy or remove contraband from the residence. (United States v. Fowlkes (9th Cir. 2015) 804 F.3rd 954, 969-971.)

> The fact that it took about an hour to coordinate the officers necessary to make the warrantless entry and securing of defendant's apartment was irrelevant; the exigency still existed. (Id., at p. 971.)
> See also United States v. Dent (1st Cir. Me. 2017) 867 F.3rd 37, where the court held that pending the obtaining of a search warrant, the securing of the residence, including doing a protective sweep during which illegal contraband was observed, did not affect the legality of the search warrant where there was no evidence that either the warrant or the decision to seek the warrant was based on anything the officers discovered during their warrantless entry. The court found that the process of applying for the search warrant had already been initiated based on other independent sources of information and that drugs observed under an air mattress were not included in the search warrant affidavit.

Such a "securing" of a house, however, is in fact a Fourth Amendment seizure. (United States v. Shrum (10th Cir. KS 2018) 908 F.3rd 1219.)

It is also lawful to detain packages and other containers. (United States v. Hernandez (9th Cir. 2002) 313 F.3rd 1206.) The rules generally parallel the requirements for detaining a person under Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1 (See United States v. Place (1983) 462 U.S. 696 [103 S.Ct. 2637; 77 L.Ed.2nd 110].).

When the container is a package that has been mailed, and the personal intrusion upon the intended recipient is less, the length of time the package may be detained is considerably longer than if taken from the defendant's person. In Place, for instance, the container was the defendant's luggage taken from him at an airport. The Supreme Court held that 90 minutes was too long. In contrast, the Hernandez case, where a 22-hour delay was upheld, cites prior authority where holding onto a mailed package for up to six days was approved.

Seizing and holding defendant's dash-cam pending the obtaining of a search warrant to search the dash-cam (which took three days) for evidence of defendant's reckless driving (causing a traffic collision and serious injury to a motorcyclist), held to be lawful. (People v. Tran (2019) 42 Cal.App.5th 1.)

Detentions Away from the Place being Searched:

Reversing the Second Circuit Court of Appeal (See United States v. Bailey (2nd Cir. 2011) 652 F.3rd 197.), where the defendant wasn't detained until after driving at least a mile from his home, and resolving a split of authority among other circuits, the United States Supreme Court held that Michigan v. Summers (1981) 452 U.S. 692 [101 S.Ct. 2587; 69 L.Ed.2nd 340, 349-350], does not permit the detention of occupants beyond the immediate vicinity of the premises which is the subject of a search warrant, at least when the sole reason for the detention is that the person's home was about to be searched. If police officers elect to detain an individual after he leaves the immediate vicinity of the premises being searched, that detention must be justified by some other rationale. (Bailey

v. United States (2013) 568 U.S. 186, 192-202 [133 S.Ct. 1031; 185 L.Ed.2nd 19].)

Detention Issues, in General:

Information From a Tipster; Reliability: In order for information from a tipster to justify a detention of a suspect, it must first be shown to be reliable.

A bar employee (who later fully identified himself) calling 911 to report that three separate customers observed defendant in possession of a firearm, and then described for the 911 operator the movements of defendant as he fled in a particularly described vehicle, held to be of sufficient reliability to supply the necessary reasonable suspicion justifying the stopping of that vehicle. (United States v. Vandergroen (9th Cir. 2020) 964 F.3rd 876, 879-882.)

The Court noted that; "(w)hile a tip such as the 911 call may generate reasonable suspicion, it can only do so when, under the "totality-of-the-circumstances," it possesses two features. United States v. Rowland, 464 F.3rd 899, 907 (9th Cir. 2006) (citation omitted). First, the tip must exhibit sufficient indicia of reliability, and second, it must provide information on potential illegal activity serious enough to justify a stop. United States v. Edward*s*, 761 F.3rd 977, 983 (9th Cir. 2014). The 911 call here satisfied both requirements." (Ibid.)

Factors Identified in Vandergroen:

Whether the tipper is known, rather than anonymous. (Florida v. J.L. (2000) 529 U.S. 266, 270 [120 S.Ct. 1375; 146 L.Ed.2nd 254];

Whether the tipper reveals the basis of his knowledge. (United States v. Rowland, supra, at p. 908);

Whether the tipper provides detailed predictive information indicating insider knowledge. (Id.);

Whether the caller uses a 911 number (allowing the call to be recorded and traced) rather than a non-emergency tip line. (Foster v. City of Indio (9th Cir. 2018) 908 F.3rd 1204, 1214); and

Whether the tipster relays fresh, eyewitness knowledge, rather than stale, second-hand knowledge. (United States v. Terry-Crespo (9th Cir. 2004) 356 F.3rd 1170, 1176-1177.)

> Also, "(w)hen evaluating the reliability of a tip such as the 911 call here, in which a caller reports information from a third party regarding possible criminal activity, we consider the reliability of both the caller himself and the third party whose tip he conveys. See United States v. Brown, 925 F.3rd 1150, 1153 (9th Cir. 2019) (considering both the fact that the caller was known and that the third-party tipster was anonymous in evaluating the reliability of such a tip)." (United States v. Vandergroen, at p. 880.)
>
> The Vandergroen Court also found the information from the patrons, whose identity was anonymous, to be reliable in that (1) the reports were based on fresh, first-hand knowledge, (2) they reported personally seeing the gun on the defendant shortly before they reported it to the bar employee who called 911, and thus was not "stale," "second-hand" information, (3) the fact that the witnesses to defendant's illegal possession of a firearm were still at the bar when reporting what they saw to the bar employee, thus "narrow(ing) the likely class of informants," making their reports more reliable, and (4) the fact that multiple individuals reported seeing a gun also made the information more reliable. (Ibid.)

Information From a Tipster; Illegal Activity: In order for information from a tipster to justify a detention of a suspect, it must describe serious illegal activity.

> Even if a 911 call from a tipster is shown to be reliable, it will only support the necessary showing of a reasonable suspicion if it also "provide[d] information on potential illegal activity." (United States v. Vandergroen (9th Cir. 2020) 964 F.3rd 876, 879, 881; quoting Foster v. City of Indio (9th Cir. 2018) 908 F.3rd 1204, 1214.)
>
> > The tip must demonstrate that "criminal activity may be afoot." (Id.; quoting Terry v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1, 30 [88 S.Ct. 1868; 20 L.Ed.2nd 889.)
> >
> > "The 'absence of any presumptively unlawful activity' from a tip will render it inadequate to support reasonable suspicion, (United States v.) Brown, 925 F.3d (1150) at 1153. Furthermore, any potential criminal activity identified must be serious enough to justify 'immediate detention of a suspect.' United States v. Grigg, 498 F.3d 1070, 1080-81 (9th Cir. 2007)." (States v. Vandergroen, supra, at p. 881.)
> > In Vandergroen, it was held that a 911 call to the effect that defendant was carrying a gun, which is presumptively illegal in California (P.C. § 25400), provided sufficient information to justify defendant's detention for investigation of whether or not he was in fact in illegal possession of a firearm. Also, the potential crime involved was serious enough, and was an "ongoing" crime, to justify an immediate detention for investigation. (Id., at pp. 879-882.)

Carrying a gun is not presumptively illegal in all states. The Vandergroen case (at p. 881) cites Washington State as one of those states where carrying a gun is presumptively legal. (See United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2019) 925 F.3rd 1150, 1154.)

Additional Case Law:

After questioning a person at an airport, a detention was held to be lawful where the name given to police was different than that put on checked luggage, with no documentary proof of identity, while traveling to a faraway city known for receiving narcotics, plus other suspicious circumstances. (People v. Daugherty (1996) 50 Cal.App.4th 275.)

Carrying an ax on a bicycle at 3:00 a.m. is reasonable suspicion of criminal activity justifying a detention for investigation. (People v. Foranyic (1998) 64 Cal.App.4th 186.)

Detaining a person on school grounds for purposes of investigating the lawfulness of his presence there, as an "administrative search," is lawful. (In re Joseph F. (2000) 83 Cal.App.4th 501.)

An Anchorage, Alaska, Municipal Code ordinance forbidding any item affixed to the windshield (similar to California's V.C. § 26708(a)(1); see People v. White (2003) 107 Cal.App.4th 636.) was not violated by an air freshener dangling from the rear view mirror. A traffic stop was found to be illegal. (United States v. King (9th Cir. 2001) 244 F.3rd 736, 740.)

A traffic stop for a violation of V.C. § 26708(a) was held to be illegal in People v. White, supra., where insufficient evidence was presented in court of an obstruction of the driver's view caused by an air freshener dangling from the rearview mirror, but legal in People v. Colbert (2007) 157 Cal.App.4th 1068, where the officer was able to testify why he believed the driver's view was obstructed by the same type of object and the defense failed to present any evidence to the contrary.

Observing defendant break traction for about 20 to 25 feet, lasting about 2 seconds, was sufficient cause to suspect a violation of V.C. § 23109(c), exhibition of speed. (Brierton v. Department of Motor Vehicles (2005) 130 Cal.App.4th 499, 509-510.)

Seeing three vehicles with four Black male occupants each, one of the occupants who is known to be a gang member, driving as if in military formation at 12:30 at night, hours after a prior gang shooting, the vehicles being in one of the warring Black gang's territory, held to be insufficient to justify a stop and detention. (People v. Hester (2004) 119 Cal.App.4th 376, 385-392.)

Where the defendant was confronted by six officers, all surrounding him, with five of them in uniform with visible firearms, in an area shielded from public view (an apartment hallway), where his request to shut the door to his room was denied, he was patted down for weapons, he was told three times that he was subject to arrest for failing to register (thus implying a need to cooperate should he wish to avoid the specter of arrest), and where he was never told that he was free to leave, a reasonable person in defendant's position at the time would not have believed that he was free to terminate the contact. (United States v. Washington (9th Cir. 2004) 387 F.3rd 1060, 1068-1069; finding that defendant's detention was "more intrusive than necessary" and that upon his denial of anything illegal in his room, the detention became illegal.)

A stop and detention based upon stale information concerning a threat, which itself was of questionable veracity, and with little if anything in the way of suspicious circumstances to connect the persons stopped to that threat, is illegal. (People v. Durazo (2004) 124 Cal.App.4th 728; The threat was purportedly from Mexican gang members, and defendant was a Mexican male who (with his passenger) glanced at the victim's apartment as he drove by four days later, where the officer admittedly was acting on his "gut feeling" that defendant was involved.)

Stopping the plaintiff, an African-American male, a half mile away while driving a gray car in the direction of a witness's house, 30 minutes after the witness called police to report that he had just been warned by a friend that two African-American males were coming to his house to do him harm and that he had just seen two such males driving by in a gray or black car, was held to be a lawful stop based upon a reasonable suspicion that the plaintiff was possibly one of the suspects. (Flowers v. Fiore (1st Cir. 2004) 359 F.3rd 24.)

Observation of a truck that matched the description of one that had just been stolen in a carjacking, but with a different license plate that appeared to be recently attached, and with two occupants who generally matched the suspects' description, constituted the necessary reasonable suspicion to justify the defendant's detention. (United States v. Hartz (9th Cir. 2006) 458 F.3rd 1011, 1017-1018.)

A search and seizure condition justifies a detention without a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. (People v. Viers (1991) 1 Cal.App.4th 990, 993-994; defendant stopped and detained in his vehicle.)

A "knock and talk" at the defendant's motel room justified the eventual detention of defendant when (1) the officers had some limited information from an earlier traffic stop that defendant might be involved in the manufacturing of methamphetamine, including the presence of a pressure cooker which the officer knew could be used in the manufacturing of methamphetamine; (2) a roommate took a full two minutes to open the motel room door while the officers could hear noises like people moving things around inside; (3) when defendant was contacted, he acted extremely nervous, contrary to how he had acted during a previous contact by the same officers; and (4) the roommate admitted to being a methamphetamine user and that other people had visited the room the night before. (United States v. Crapser (9th Cir. 2007) 472 F.3rd 1141, 1147-1149.)

Observing defendant sitting in a parked motor vehicle late at night near the exit to a 7-Eleven store parking lot with the engine running, despite prior knowledge of a string of recent robberies at 7-Elevens, held not to be sufficient to justify a detention and patdown. (People v. Perrusquia (2007) 150 Cal.App.4th 228.)

Spotlighting the defendant in a high narcotics area and then walking up to him "briskly" while asking questions held to be an unlawful detention under the circumstances. (People v. Garry (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th 1100.)

> See also People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, at pp. 21-22, where it was held that taking into account of the "totality of the circumstances," it was held that defendant was detained when the officer made a U-turn to pull in behind him and then trained the patrol car's spotlights on his car.
> But see People v. Tacardon (2020) 53 Cal.App.5th 89 (Petition granted; see People v. Tacardon (2022) 14 Cal.5th 235: A deputy sheriff parked 15 to 20 feet behind a lawfully parked car, shined a spotlight into the interior, and approached. When a female suddenly got out, he ordered her to remain at the curb. At about that point the deputy smelled marijuana and observed large marijuana bags on the floorboard. Defendant, in the driver's seat, proved to be on probation. A subsequent search produced additional contraband evidencing drug sales. The Third District Court of Appeal reversed a superior court ruling that defendant had been unlawfully detained. Disagreeing with People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, the court held that while the use of a spotlight might cause someone to feel "scrutiny, such directed scrutiny does not amount to a detention." Although the female who had gotten out of the car was detained, "there is no evidence defendant observed the deputy's interaction with [her] . . . ." By the time the deputy addressed defendant, having smelled marijuana and having seen the large bags of marijuana, defendant was appropriately and lawfully detained. Significantly, the deputy never blocked defendant's egress, he never used emergency lights, and his approach to the car was casual.

And see People v. Perez (1989) 211 Cal.App.3rd 1492, where a police officer parked his patrol car in front of Perez's vehicle, leaving "plenty of room" for Perez to drive away, and activated both spotlights on the patrol car "to get a better look at the occupants and gauge their reactions." (Id. at p. 1494.) The officer then walked over to the car, tapped on the window, and asked the driver to roll down the window. (Ibid.) The appellate court concluded: "[T]he conduct of the officer here did not manifest police authority to the degree leading a reasonable person to conclude he was not free to leave. While the use of high beams and spotlights might cause a reasonable person to feel himself [or herself] the object of official scrutiny, such directed scrutiny does not amount to a detention. [Citations.]" (Italics added; Id. at p. 1496, and cited with approval in People v. Tacardon, supra, at p. 98; petition granted.)

Voluntarily going with the police to the police station, where he was interviewed as a possible witness, and not a suspect, where nothing was ever done or said to indicate otherwise at least up until his arrest, was not an unlawful detention. (People v. Zamudio (2008) 43 Cal.4th 327, 341-346.)

Observation by an officer trained as a "drug recognition expert" of defendant apparently asleep in his vehicle in a drugstore parking lot, at 8:00 p.m., with the parking lights on, knowing that people who are under the influence of drugs tend to fall "asleep quickly, inappropriately, and sometimes uncontrollably," and then noticing that he was breathing faster than usual, and, when awakened, finding defendant to be irritable, aggressive, and overly assertive—all indications of someone under the influence of drugs—held to be sufficient cause to detain him. (Ramirez v. City of Buena Park (9th Cir. 2009) 560 F.3rd 1012, 1016-1018, 1020-1021.)

Observing defendant standing near the open trunk of a car, which he immediately shut upon the approach of the officers and walk away, while appearing nervous, when combined with the officer's plain sight observations of exposed wires in the vehicle where the door panel and the stereo trim had been removed, with tools such as screwdrivers and pliers lying around, was more than enough reasonable suspicion to justify the defendant's detention. (People v. Osborne (2009) 175 Cal.App.4th 1052, 1058.)

With personal knowledge that someone had been illegally shooting a firearm and had an illegal campfire in the area of defendant's campsite, contacting and detaining defendant at the campsite the following morning was lawful. (United States v. Basher (9th Cir. 2011) 629 F.3rd 1161, 1165-1166.)

Where a robbery had just occurred in the vicinity with the suspect and vehicle description, although not perfect, very close, and with defendant having just parked his car "weirdly," not quite at the curb, with a door left open, and defendant apparently attempting to separate himself from his car, the officers had a reasonable suspicion to detain defendant. (People v. Leath (2013) 217 Cal.App.4th 344, 354-355.)

A call made by an identified witness at the behest of an anonymous witness reporting a man with a gun did not support reasonable suspicion because the tip was neither reliable nor indicative of potentially illegal activity. "The tip suffer[ed] from two key infirmities—an unknown, anonymous tipster and the absence of any presumptively unlawful activity." (United States v. Brown (9th Cir. 2019) 925 F.3rd 1150.)

The Ninth Circuit affirmed a criminal judgment in a case in which the district court denied the defendant's motion to suppress evidence, and the defendant entered a conditional guilty plea to being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm. In this case, Police Detectives detained the defendant after observing a bulge under his sweatshirt that likely indicated a concealed firearm, which is presumptively unlawful to carry in California. Defendant was verbally uncooperative, yelling at the detectives. After defendant's companion was found to be in possession of a firearm, defendant was tased and searched, resulting in the recovery of a firearm in a shoulder holster. The Court held that the district court did not clearly err in crediting the detective's testimony that he observed on the defendant a "very large and obvious bulge" that suggested (in the officer's training and experience) a concealed firearm. The Court further held that reasonable suspicion supported the stop, and that the district court therefore properly denied the defendant's motion to suppress evidence found during the search. A dissenting justice argued that, without other corroborating evidence, a sweatshirt bulge alone did not give an objectively reasonable and particularized suspicion to stop and detain the defendant. (United States v. Bontemps (9th Cir. 2020) 977 F.3rd 909.)

Anonymous Information*:

Rule: An anonymous tip, absent corroborating circumstances, does not constitute a "reasonable suspicion" nor justify a detention. (Alabama v. White (1990) 496 U.S. 325, 331 [110 S.Ct. 2412; 110 L.Ed.2nd 301, 309]; In re Cody S. (2004) 121 Cal.App.4th 86.)

Patdown for Weapons:

An anonymous tip concerning a person carrying a firearm does not justify a patdown for weapons (nor a detention for that purpose). There is no such thing as a "firearms exception" to this rule. (Florida v. J.L. (2000) 529 U.S. 266 [120 S.Ct. 1375; 146 L.Ed.2nd 254]; see also People v. Jordan (2004) 121 Cal.App.4th 544, 562-564.)

> However, being familiar with the tipster's voice, and knowing that he has provided reliable information in the past, might be enough. (People v. Jordan, supra, a pp. 560-661.)

The victim of an assault by a person with a deadly weapon called 911, gave his name (that could not be verified), but claimed to not know the phone number from which he was calling and hesitated to give his location. Under these circumstances, it was held to be sufficient reasonable suspicion to detain and pat defendant down for weapons. The Court held that this was not "truly anonymous" in that he gave a name, called 911 concerning a crime that had just occurred, likening it to a "spontaneous declaration," and reported a crime about which he had obvious firsthand knowledge, all giving the information the "indicia of reliability." (United States v. Terry-Crespo (9th Cir. 2004) 356 F.3rd 1170.)

Sufficient corroboration was found, justifying a patdown for weapons, when the anonymous information came from two separate informants, where the tips were close in time, the informants contacted the officer personally (thus putting their anonymity at risk), and the setting was a crowded throng of celebrants at a New Year's Eve street party, thus increasing the dangerousness of the situation. (People v. Coulombe (2001) 86 Cal.App.4th 52.)

Information from an anonymous tipster who "(1) asserts eyewitness knowledge of the reported event; (2) reports contemporaneously with the event; and (3) uses the 911 emergency system, which permits call tracing" (per Navarette v. California (2014) 572 U.S. 393 [134 S.Ct. 1683; 188

L.Ed.2nd 680].), is sufficient to establish the necessary reasonable suspicion to justify a temporary detention of the defendant for investigation and patdown of the defendant, where it was reported by the tipster to a police dispatcher that a particularly described individual (the defendant) was seen in possession of a handgun and had just walked into a liquor store. (United States v. Swinney (7th Cir. 2022) 28 F.4th 864.)

Detentions in Highly Dangerous Situations:

Noting the U.S. Supreme Court's reference in Florida v. J.L., supra, to exceptions in highly dangerous situations, California's Fifth District Court of Appeal ruled that officers lawfully stopped defendant on information from an anonymous tipster who reported that defendant was driving to his wife's house for the purpose of shooting her. The lawfulness of the stop was based upon the dangerousness of the situation when combined with some weak corroboration which, by itself, might not have been enough to justify stopping defendant's vehicle. (People v. Castro (2006) 138 Cal.App.4th 486.)

A stop and detention of a suspect based upon an anonymous call was held to be justified where the tipster alleged a dangerous or potentially violent situation, the alleged crime had just occurred, the suspect would have left if not detained, and there is no reason to doubt the tipster's veracity. (People v. Rodgers (2005) 131 Cal.App.4th 1560.)

An anonymous tipster calling in, in an excited state, to report that defendant had just pointed a gun at him, giving detailed information concerning the defendant's description and his location, was held to be sufficient where the call was recorded, he called back a second time to correct the color of the car in which defendant was sitting, gave a first name, and stuck around long enough to insure that defendant was still there. The officers responded within 2 to 3 minutes and found the scene as the tipster described it. Defendant's detention and the warrantless search of the vehicle for the gun was upheld. (People v. Dolly (2007) 40 Cal.4th 458, 463-471; i.e., "[A] firsthand, contemporaneous description of the crime as well as an accurate and complete description of the perpetrator and his location, the details of which were confirmed within minutes by the police when they arrived." Id., at p. 468.)

Anonymous information reporting a dangerous circumstance involving a gun, then occurring, with an accurate description of the suspect and his location which is quickly verified, constitutes sufficient reasonable suspicion to stop, detain, and patdown the suspect. (People v. Lindsey (2007) 148 Cal.App.4th 1390.)

A late night radio call concerning two specifically described males causing a disturbance, with one possibly armed, in a known gang area at an address where a call concerning a daytime shooting days earlier resulted in the recovery of two firearms, and where the described males are found within minutes of the call, is sufficient to justify a detention. (In re Richard G. (2009) 173 Cal.App.4th 1252, 1257-1258.)

An anonymous tip concerning a man who had been shooting at passing vehicles was held to be sufficient to justify a detention when the officers responded within five minutes of the reported incident, observed defendant who closely matched a detailed description of the suspect, and contacted him with guns drawn. Legitimate safety concerns justified the officers' drawing their weapons, ordering defendant to his knees and handcuffing him. Second, the court held the information provided by the anonymous 911 caller was sufficiently reliable to provide the officers reasonable suspicion to conduct a Terry stop on defendant. Although he was anonymous, the caller reported firsthand information concerning an ongoing emergency while providing a detailed description of the suspect and location of the incident. (United States v. Edwards (9th Cir. 2014) 761 F.3rd 977, 981-982.)

Officers stopping a vehicle in which defendant was found, and then conducting a warrantless search (resulting in the recovery of a firearm from under the center console), based upon an identified person's 911 call to police reporting that three unidentified persons had reported to him having seen defendant in possession of a firearm, was held to be lawful. Denial of defendant's motion to suppress under Fourth Amendment was affirmed because the 911 call was sufficiently reliable to support reasonable suspicion where the 911 call conveyed information from three witnesses and the tip provided information on potentially then-occurring illegal activity as the 911 call gave the police sufficieint probable cause to believe defendant was carrying a concealed firearm. (United States v. Vandergroen (9th Cir. 2020) 964 F.3rd 876.)

See also United States v. Avilas-Vega (1st Cir. 2015) 783 F.3rd 69; where an anonymous tip under circumstances that appeared to be from a concerned citizen reporting a direct observation of a crime concerning two subjects passing around a pistol in a vehicle held to be sufficient reasonable suspicion to justify a traffic stop and a patdown of the subjects.

And see People v. Wells (2006) 38 Cal.4th 1078, at page 1087 (below), where the California Supreme Court differentiated J.L. from a DUI case noting that among other factors: "(A) report of a possibly intoxicated highway driver, 'weaving all over the roadway,' poses a far more grave and immediate risk to the public than a report of mere passive gun possession."

An anonymous call concerning a DUI driver weaving all over the road, the tipster correctly providing a detailed description of the vehicle, its location and direction of travel, given the dangerousness of leaving a drunk driver on the street, held to be sufficient "reasonable suspicion" to stop the vehicle and check its driver. (Ibid., citing United States v. Wheat (8th Cir. 2001) 278 F.3rd 722, and noting, among other factors (see below), the exigency involved in a DUI case.)

Stopping DUI and Reckless Driving Suspects Based Upon Anonymous Information:

In People v. Wells, supra, the California Supreme Court listed four factors to consider, justifying the stop of a DUI suspect based upon anonymous information:

- The exigency of a DUI driver loose on the road, with all the damage they do, justifies an immediate law enforcement response. "(A) report of a possibly intoxicated highway driver, 'weaving all over the roadway,' poses a far more grave and immediate risk to the public than a report of mere passive gun possession (as occurred in Florida v. J.L.)."

- A report from a citizen describing a contemporaneous event of reckless driving, presumably viewed by the caller, adds to the reliability of the information and reduces the likelihood that the caller is merely harassing an enemy.

- The level of intrusion upon one's personal privacy (in a place with a reduced expectation of privacy) and the inconvenience involved in a brief vehicle stop is considerably less than an "embarrassing police search" on a public street (as occurred in Florida v. J.L.).

- Reliability is added by the relatively precise and accurate description given by the tipster regarding the vehicle type, color, location and direction of travel.

A CHP officer stopped defendant shortly after an anonymous 911 caller reported that she had been run off the road by a pickup truck that fit the description of the truck the defendant was driving. He arrested defendant (and his passenger) after smelling marijuana, searched the truck, and found 30 pounds of marijuana in the truck. Defendant filed a motion to suppress the marijuana arguing that the officer who searched his truck lacked reasonable suspicion to conduct a stop. The motion was denied. The U.S. Supreme Court held that the traffic stop complied with the Fourth Amendment because, under the totality of the circumstances, the officer had a reasonable suspicion that the defendant was intoxicated. The behavior described by the 911 caller, viewed from the standpoint of an objectively reasonable police officer, amounted to a reasonable suspicion of drunk driving. (Navarette v. California (2014) 572 U.S. 393 [134 S.Ct. 1683; 188 L.Ed.2nd 680].)

> With the Court assuming for the sake of argument that the 911 call constituted an anonymous tip: "By reporting that she had been run off the road by a specific vehicle—a silver Ford F-150 pickup, license plate 8D94925—the caller necessarily claimed eyewitness knowledge of the alleged dangerous driving. That basis of knowledge lends significant support to the tip's reliability." (Id., 134 S. Ct. at p. 1689.)
> "'[An informant's] explicit and detailed description of alleged wrongdoing, along with a statement that the event was observed firsthand, entitles his tip to greater weight than might otherwise be the case'" (Ibid; citing Illinois v. Gates (1983) 462 U.S. 213, 234 [103 S.Ct. 2317; 76 L.Ed.2nd 527].)

An anonymous tipster describing defendant's reckless driving, giving a specific location and a detailed description of the car, the driver and the driver's actions, was held to be sufficient to provide the necessary indicia of reliability to justify a traffic stop. (Lowry v. Gutierrez (2005) 129 Cal.App.4th 926.)

> Note: The Court, however, also noted that the defendant's potential liability here was no more than a driver's license suspension, as opposed to a criminal prosecution, allowing for a lesser standard of "reasonable suspicion." It is unknown whether the Court would have applied the same standards had the consequences been a potential criminal prosecution and conviction instead.

Detentions with Sufficient Corroboration:

Corroboration of an anonymous tip sufficient to justify a detention and/or patdown for weapons can take various forms, such as:

- An accurate prediction of a suspect's future activity (i.e., "predictive information;" see above) by the tipster.

- Seemingly innocent activity when the anonymous tip casts the activity in a suspicious light.

- Presence of the person about whom the tip relates in a "high crime area."

- Verification of details provided by the tipster through police observation or other sources.

(People v. Ramirez (1996) 41 Cal.App.4th 1608, 1613-1620.)

Potential accountability may help to corroborate an informant's information as well, such "accountability" being in the form of:

- The ability of authorities to identify the informant;

- The consequences the informant is likely to experience as a result of providing false information; and

- The informant's perception of these factors.

(People v. Jordan (2004) 121 Cal.App.4th 544, 561-562.)

An in-person informant, even though unidentified, supplies the necessary indicia of reliability for two reasons:

- An in-person informant risks losing anonymity and being held accountable for a false tip.

- When a tip is made in-person, an officer can observe the informant's demeanor and determine whether the informant seems credible enough to justify immediate police action without further questioning.

(United States v. Palos-Marquez (9th Cir. 2010) 591 F.3rd 1272; with information corroborated by a Border Patrol Agent's own personal observations and knowledge of the area.)

Predictive Information: The Court in J.L. also discussed briefly "predictive information" which may supply the necessary corroboration, such as being able to correctly describe future actions of the suspect. Also, other unconnected anonymous informants, or anything that would add the element of credibility to the information, might sufficiently corroborate the anonymous informant. (Florida v. J.L., supra, at pp. 271 (concurring opinion), 275-276 [146 L.Ed.2nd 260, 263-264].)

> A single pronounced weave within the lane, plus an experienced Highway Patrol officer's observation of the defendant sitting up close to the steering wheel, which the officer recognized as something an impaired driver does, was sufficient to corroborate second-hand information concerning defendant's "erratic driving" from Montana Department of Transportation employees, justifying the stop of the defendant's car. (United States v. Fernandez-Castillo (9th Cir. 2003) 324 F.3rd 1114.)

An anonymous tip of drug dealing occurring from a particularly described vehicle at a particular location was corroborated by a trained law enforcement officer's observation of what appeared to be a hand-to-hand drug transaction, justifying a detention of the vehicle's occupant. (People v. Butler (2003) 111 Cal.App.4th 150, 159-162.)

Even though the original source of the information that defendant intended to shoot the victim was unknown, the tipster himself was known to the police as was the defendant himself. The information was also corroborated by other information that defendant had threatened a high school coach and that the threats were taken seriously by the coaches who all escorted their families out of the stadium after the game. Further, defendant was seen by the police outside the stadium where he was observed attempting to avoid contact with the police. The totality of the circumstances justified the detention (and even the handcuffing) of the defendant. (People v. Turner (2013) 219 Cal.App.4th 151, 164-170.)

An anonymous tip concerning a man who had been shooting at passing vehicles was held to be sufficient to justify a detention when the officers responded within five minutes of the reported incident, observed defendant who closely matched a detailed description of the suspect, and contacted him with guns drawn. Legitimate safety concerns justified the officers' drawing their weapons, ordering defendant to his knees and handcuffing him. Second, the court held the information provided by the anonymous 911 caller was sufficiently reliable to provide the officers reasonable suspicion to conduct a Terry stop on defendant. Although he was anonymous, the caller reported firsthand information concerning an ongoing emergency while providing a detailed description of the suspect and location of the incident. (United States v. Edwards (9th Cir. 2014) 761 F.3rd 977, 981-982.)

A bar employee (who later fully identified himself) calling 911 to report that three separate customers observed defendant in possession of a firearm, and then described for the 911 operator the movements of defendant as he fled in a particularly described vehicle, held to be of sufficient reliability to supply the necessary reasonable suspicion justifying the stopping of that vehicle. (United States v. Vandergroen (9th Cir. 2020) 964 F.3rd 876.)

Illegal Detentions; Examples:

An uncorroborated tip concerning contraband in a vehicle without any indication of "inside personal knowledge" is insufficient to justify a traffic stop of that vehicle (United States v. Morales (9th Cir. 2001) 252 F.3rd 1070.) or a detention of its driver. (People v. Saldana (2002) 101 Cal.App.4th 170; tip that the driver had a gun and cocaine in the vehicle.)

The fact that the physical description of a suspect is very specific, when reported by an anonymous tipster to have a gun in his pocket, but where that physical description would be visible to anyone, does not sufficiently corroborate the tipster's information. Absent at least some suspicious circumstances observed by the responding police officers, finding the person described by the tipster does not create a reasonable suspicion justifying a detention or a patdown for weapons. (People v. Jordan (2004) 121 Cal.App.4th 544, 553-652; the quick confirmation of the physical description of the defendant and his location, by itself, is legally insufficient.)

A tip forwarded by FBI agents to a local law enforcement officer "that he 'might want to pay particular attention to a certain house' in Tucson because there was 'suspicion that there was a possibility that there might be some narcotics' there" did not constitute sufficient reasonable suspicion to justify a stop of a vehicle coming from that house even though the tip had been corroborated by hearing "thumps" from the garage which the officer believed was someone loading something into the vehicle. Neither the source nor the specifics of the FBI's tip were ever identified or explained. (United States v. Thomas (9th Cir. 2000) 211 F.3rd 1186.)

An anonymous tip, even when corroborated by a generally matching (albeit unique) suspect description (i.e., 6'1", 200-pound black male with the same first name), was found to be not enough for a finding in civil court that, "as a matter of law," there was a "reasonable belief" a wanted suspect was both a co-resident and was presently at a particular residence. (Watts et al. v. County of Sacramento et al. (9th Cir. 2001) 256 F.3rd 886.)

An anonymous 911-hangup call, traceable to a particular motel, but without sufficient information to determine which room the call may have come from, did not allow for the non-consensual entry into the defendant's room merely because of the suspicious attempts by the person who answered the door to keep the officers from looking inside, and her apparent lies concerning no one else being there. (United States v. Deemer (9th Cir. 2004) 354 F.3rd 1130.)

Knock and Talks:

The information motivating an officer to conduct a residential "knock and talk" may be from an anonymous tipster. There is no requirement that officers corroborate anonymous information before conducting a knock and talk. (People v. Rivera (2007) 41 Cal.4th 304.)

See "Knock and Talk," under "Miscellaneous Issues," under "Searches of Residences and Other Buildings" (Chapter 13), below.

To Establish Probable Cause:

Anonymous information demonstrating a knowledge of inside information, describing ongoing criminal activity, and sufficiently corroborated, will justify the issuance of a search warrant. (United States v. Jennen (9th Cir. 2010) 596 F.3rd 594, 598-600; where an anonymous tip corroborated by a controlled buy was sufficient to establish probable cause for a search warrant.)

To corroborate the anonymous tip, there must be found to be additional evidence that shows the tip is reliable. For instance:

- The tip must provide a "range of details," and

- The future movements of the suspect must be corroborated by independent police observation. (Id., at p. 598.)

In Illinois v. Gates (1983) 462 U.S. 213 [103 S.Ct. 2317; 76 L.Ed.2nd 527], anonymous information reflecting inside, predictive behavior, corroborated in numerous respects through a police follow-up investigation, was determined to constitute probable cause (referred to by the Court as a "fair probability") when considering the "totality of the circumstances," justifying the issuance of a search warrant.

In a search warrant case involving child pornography under Pen. Code § 311.11, it was held that the search warrant affidavit was not rendered deficient by the fact that an alleged anonymous tipster provided the information linking defendant to two pornographic images. The police and magistrate had reason to believe that the cyber-tips came from a reliable witness employed by an electronic communication service provider who acted in accord with the provider's federal obligation to report apparent child pornography and that a reliable person at National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC) forwarded the two images to the police in accord with NCMEC's legal obligation. That the affidavit did not provide the name of either individual did not, under the totality of the circumstances, undermine the determination that the tips came from unbiased citizen informants who could be presumed reliable. (People v. Rowland (2022) 82 Cal.App.5th 1099.)

In Prison or Jail:

An anonymous tip that a particular prisoner is in possession of contraband was held to be sufficient cause to do a visual, clothed or unclothed, body cavity search. (People v. Collins (2004) 115 Cal.App.4th 137.)

California Code of Regulations, Title 15, § 3287(b), allows for a visual search of an inmate, clothed or unclothed, whenever there is a "substantial reason to believe the inmate may have unauthorized or dangerous items concealed on his or her person." (Italics added) Judicial authorization (i.e., a search warrant), and the use of "medical personnel in a medical setting," is only required in the case of a "physical (as opposed to a non-contact visual) body cavity search." In Collins, a visual inspection of the defendant's rectal area was intended, for which it is generally accepted that the rigorous requirements of the more intrusive "physical body cavity search" is not required.

Detentions Involving Minors*:

Minors on Campus: The Fourth Amendment protects students on a public school campus against unreasonable searches and seizures. (In re K.J. (2018) 18 Cal.App.5th 1123, 1128.)

By School Officials:

School officials have the power to stop a minor/student on campus in order to ask questions or conduct an investigation even in the absence of a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity or a violation of school rules, so long as this authority is not exercised in an arbitrary, capricious, or harassing manner. (In re Randy G. (2001) 26 Cal.4th 556.)

See Horton v. Goose Creek Independent School District (5th Cir. 1982) 690 F.2nd 470, 480 to 482, for a detailed analysis of the "The Fourth Amendment in the Public Schools," and why a relaxed search and seizure standard is applied in analyzing the relationship between students and school administrators.

Horton deals with the use of canines to "sniff" students, holding that such an act constitutes a "search" for Fourth Amendment purposes, eventually holding that "the type of canine inspection of the student's person involved in this > case cannot be justified by the need to prevent abuse of drugs and alcohol when there is no individualized suspicion, and we hold it unconstitutional." (Pgs. 482-483.)

California follows the federal rule on this issue, as described in New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985) 469 U.S. 325 [105 S.Ct. 733; 83 L.Ed.2nd 720], when applying the protections of the California Constitution. (In re William G. (1985) 40 Cal.3rd 550, 564.)

> New Jersey v. T.L.O., supra, allows for warrantless searches by school officials so long as the search is "reasonable." (e.g., a "reasonable suspicion?")
> In re William G., supra, at p. 564, specifically defines this standard as a "reasonable suspicion," holding that searches by school officials are lawful so long as the official has "a reasonable suspicion that the student or students to be searched have engaged, or are engaging, in a proscribed activity (that is, a violation of a school rule or regulation, or a criminal statute)."

The search of a student by a school administrator requires only that there be a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity or a violation of school rules. The extent of law enforcement's involvement, evaluating the totality of the circumstances, must be considered when determining whether law enforcement's probable cause standards apply. Finding that; "the police role in the search of appellant was at all times clearly subordinate to the role of the vice-principal, who made the decision to search and conducted the search," a vice principal's search of a student's locker was upheld under the T.L.O. standard despite the fact that the information came from law enforcement and officers stood by for safety reasons as the vice principal conducted the search. (In re K.S. (2010) 183 Cal.App.4th 72.)

Random metal detector searches of students, without any individualized suspicion, are justified by the "special needs" of keeping weapons off campuses. The Fourth Amendment is not violated by such searches where the government need is great, the intrusion on the individual is limited, and a more rigorous standard of suspicion is unworkable. (In re Latasha W. (1998) 60 Cal.App.4th 1524.)

Detaining a person on school grounds for purposes of investigating the lawfulness of his presence there, as an "administrative search," is lawful. (In re Joseph F. (2000) 83 Cal.App.4th 501.)

See In re Cody S. (2004) 121 Cal.App.4th 86, holding that upon requiring the minor, pursuant to school rules, to vacate his gym locker when pulled out of gym class at the request of the "school safety officer," the minor lost any expectation of privacy in the gym locker, and that this procedure did not constitute a search of that locker. Also, admitting that he had a knife in his backpack supplied the necessary "reasonable suspicion" for a warrantless search of his backpack.

The suspicionless search of a student was upheld where it was conducted pursuant to an established policy applying to all students and was consistent with the type of action on the part of a school administrator that fell well within the definition of "special needs" of a governmental agency. The search was of a limited nature, being told only to empty out his pockets, as he was not subjected to physical touching of his person nor was he exposed to the intimate process required for a urine sample necessary for drug testing. The purpose of the search was to prevent the introduction of harmful items (weapons and drugs) into the school environment. Given the general application of the policy to all students engaged in a form of rule violation that could easily lend itself to the introduction of drugs or weapons into the school environment (i.e., leaving during the school day without permission and returning later), further individualized suspicion was not required. (In re Sean A. (2010) 191 Cal.App.4th 182, 186-190.)

> But see the dissent (pgs. 191-198) criticizing the decision as a non-particularized, suspicionless search of a student in violation of the principles of New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985) 469 U.S. 325 [105 S.Ct. 733; 83 L.Ed.2nd 720], where the Supreme Court held that a reasonable suspicion is required. (See above)

"In practice, a public school student's legitimate expectation of privacy is balanced against the school's obligation to maintain discipline and to provide a safe environment for all students and staff. (Citation.) Accordingly, a school official may detain a student for questioning on campus, without reasonable suspicion, so long as the detention is not arbitrary, capricious, or for the purpose of harassment." (In re K.J. (2018) 18 Cal.App.5th 1123, 1129.)

Rejecting an argument that the fact that an officer assisting a school resource officer was not himself a resource officer necessitated a higher standard of proof. (Id., at pp. 1130-1131.)

Also rejecting the argument that the increased intrusiveness of having "escorted (defendant) out his class by the principal to awaiting police officer[s] who immediately removed his backpack, placed him in handcuffs, and searched his person," dictated that a higher standard of proof was required. (Id., at pp. 1132-1133.)

The Use of Restraints and/or Seclusion as a Disciplinary Measure by School Officials:

See A.T. v. Baldo (9th Cir. 2019) 2019 U.S. App. LEXIS 38325; (Unpublished.), where it was held that at the very least, teachers and staff were entitled to qualified immunity from an alleged Fourth Amendment violation for using "restraints and seclusion" (sometimes referred to as 'containment' or 'isolation') to discipline the plaintiff's child over three years, beginning in the second grade.

"The courts that have addressed this issue have concluded that, while students have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from arbitrary and excessive corporal punishment, the use of physical restraints and seclusion in school settings—particularly in special education classrooms—is not necessarily unlawful. See C.N. v. Willmar Pub. Schs., Indep. Sch. Dist. No. 347, 591 F.3rd 624, 633 (8th Cir. 2010) (teacher's allegedly excessive use of restraints and seclusion that were part of developmentally delayed student's IEP (Individualized Education Plan), 'even if overzealous at times and not recommended . . . was not a substantial departure from accepted judgment, practice or standards and was not unreasonable in the constitutional sense'); Couture (v. Bd. of Educ. of Albuquerque Pub. Schs) 535 F.3rd at 1251-52, 1256 (10th Cir. 2008) (repeated use of timeout rooms over a two-month period to address student's disruptive and dangerous behavior was reasonable, particularly in light of the fact that timeouts were prescribed in the student's IEP as a mechanism to teach him behavioral control); Alex G. ex rel. Dr. Steven G. v. Bd. of Trs. of Davis Joint Unified Sch. Dist., 387 F. Supp. 2nd 1119, 1125 (E.D. where restraints and seclusion are used in a manner that exceeds what is authorized in the student's IEP, courts have generally found their use to be constitutionally permissible. See Payne v. Peninsula Sch. Dist., 623 F. App'x 846, 847-48 (9th Cir. 2015) (no violation of clearly established rights where teacher repeatedly placed autistic student in prolonged isolation in a small, dark room as a punishment and had student assist in cleaning up after he defecated in the room, both of which violated student's IEP); Miller v. Monroe Sch. Dist., 159 F. Supp. 3rd 1238, 1249 (W.D. Wash. 2016) (finding no clearly established right against holds and seclusions that were performed for discriminatory reasons, by a teacher without the proper training, for lengths that exceeded the maximum time limit in student's IEP). (Ibid.)

In a case where students, including the plaintiff, were directed to stand beneath a covered snack bar forty feet from the classroom, and where the Vice Principal did not allow the plaintiff to leave the area when he sought to do so, the Ninth Circuit held that the school officials were not subject to any civil liability as a result. "We have said that 'a student is required to be on school premises, subject to the direction of school authorities, during the course of the school day.' Smith v. McGlothlin, 119 F.3d 786, 788 (9th Cir. 1997). In the circumstances of this case, we conclude that directing students to a covered snack bar area for five to ten minutes during an unquestionably legitimate dog sniff of the students' classroom is not a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. '[A] degree of supervision and control that could not be exercised over free adults' is permissible in the school context. Vernonia (School District 47J v. Acton (1995)) 515 U.S. (646) at 655-656 ([132 L.Ed.2nd 564; 115 S.Ct. 1286]).) Plumas Unified School District (9th Cir. 1999) 192 F.3rd 1260, 1269.)

By School Resource Officers:

A "school resource officer," although employed by a municipal police department, need only comply with the relaxed search and seizure standards applicable to school officials, when working on campus helping to enforce school rules as well as Penal Code violations. (In re William V. (2003) 111 Cal.App.4th 1464; see also In re Alexander B. (1990) 220 Cal.App.3rd 1572, 1577-1578; In re K.J. (2018) 18 Cal.App.5th 1123, 1129.)

"For purposes of Fourth Amendment analysis, 'school officials,' include police officers such as Officer Gulian, who are assigned to high schools as resource officers (Citation), as well as the backup officers who are called to assist them." (In re K.J., supra, at p. 1131.)

Although law enforcement is commonly held to stricter standards, when they are on campus and acting at a school official's request, they adopt the same relaxed standards that apply to those school officials. (Scott v. County of San Bernardino (9th Cir. 2018) 903 F.3rd 943, 949; citing, as examples, Doe ex rel. Doe v. Hawaii Department of Education (9th Cir. 2003) 334 F.3rd 906, 909-910; and C.B. v. City of Sonora (9th Cir. 2014) 769 F.3rd 1005, 1034.)

A Los Angeles Police Department officer, assigned to a high school, detaining and patting down minors on the school campus who were unable to satisfactorily identify themselves is lawful despite the lack of even a reasonable suspicion that the minors may be armed. (In re Jose Y. (2006) 141 Cal.App.4th 748.)

No Fourth Amendment violation occurred when defendant, a minor, was detained at school by an officer designated as a school resource officer, and a back-up officer. Prior to the detention at issue, the resource officer received a report from a vice principal that a male student had a gun. Having the principal remove defendant from class, and then the officer grabbing defendant's backpack and putting him in handcuffs as a safety measure, was reasonable under the circumstances. A warrantless search of the defendant's person was justified at its inception by an anonymous tip from another student who sent a text to the vice principal, saying that there was "a guy with a loaded gun" on campus, and in response to questions, that a video showed a student sitting in a classroom, displaying a gun and a magazine clip, and that she knew who the suspect was, even though she did not know his name. The vice principal's physical description of him as one of two students, with the tipster identifying defendant as the one with the gun, was sufficient to justify defendant's detention and search. (In re K.J. (2018) 18 Cal.App.5th 1123, 1128-1135.)

> "A search is 'justified at its inception' if under 'ordinary circumstances' the information constituted 'reasonable grounds for suspecting that the search will turn up evidence that the student has violated or is violating either the law or the rules of the school.'" (Id., at p. 1133; quoting New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985) 469 U.S. 325, 341-341 [105 S.C. 733; 83 L.Ed.2nd 720].)

However, applying the two-part reasonableness test set forth in New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985) 469 U.S. 325, 333 [105 S.Ct. 733; 83 L.Ed.2nd 720, it was held that arrests of a group of seventh graders (12 and 13 year-olds) by the school resource officer were unreasonable because they were not justified at their inception nor reasonably related in scope to the circumstances. The Court held that the summary arrest, handcuffing, and police transport to the station of the middle school girls was a disproportionate response to the school's need, which was dissipation of what the school officials characterized as an "ongoing feud" and "continuous argument" between the students. The Court further held that police officers were not entitled to qualified immunity because no reasonable officer could have reasonably believed that the law authorizes the arrest of a group of middle schoolers in order to "teach them a lesson" or to "prove a point." The evidence was insufficient to create probable cause to arrest the students for violating P.C. § 415(1) or W&I § 601(a). Plaintiffs were entitled to summary judgment in their favor on their state false arrest claim. (Scott v. County of San Bernardino (9th Cir. 2018) 903 F.3rd 943: "An arrest meant only to 'teach a lesson' and arbitrarily punish perceived disrespect is clearly unreasonable under T.L.O.*" (At p. 950.)*

By Other Law Enforcement Officers:

It is an open question whether municipal police officers, called onto a school campus at the request of school administrators, are entitled to adopt the relaxed search and seizure standards applicable to school officials. (C.B. v. City of Sonora (9th Cir. 2014) 769 F.3rd 1005, 1023-1024; but see In re K.S. (2010) 183 Cal.App.4th 72, above.)

As noted in City of Sonora, supra, two other federal circuits have held that law enforcement, when called to a school situation, may rely upon the relaxed "reasonableness" standard while on the school's campus. (See Gray ex rel. Alexander v. Bostic (11th Cir. 2006) 458 F.3rd 1295, 1303; and Shade v. City of Farmington (8th Cir. 2002) 309 F.3rd 1054, 1060-1061.)

Minors Violating Curfew:

Minors violating curfew may be stopped, detained, and transported to a curfew center, the police station, or other facility where the minor can await the arrival of a parent or other responsible adult. A search of the minor prior to placing him in a curfew center with other children is also reasonable. (In re Ian C. (2001) 87 Cal.App.4th 856.)

But see discussion, below ("Minors and Curfew," under "Arrests" (Chapter 5), below), referring to the taking of a minor into custody for a curfew violation as an "arrest." (In re Justin B. (1999) 69 Cal.App.4th 879; In re Charles C. (1999) 76 Cal.App.4th 420.)

Miranda*:

People who have been temporarily detained for investigation are generally not "in custody" for purposes of Miranda (Miranda v. Arizona (1966) 384 U.S. 436 [86 S.Ct. 1602; 16 L.Ed.2nd 694].), at least as a general rule, and do not have to be warned of their constitutional rights prior to questioning. (People v. Manis (1969) 268 Cal.App.2nd 653, 669; People v. Breault (1990) 223 Cal.App.3rd 125, 135; People v. Clair (1992) 2 Cal.4th 629, 675.)

But see People v. Pilster (2006) 138 Cal.App.4th 1395, at page 1406, where it was noted that "custody" for purposes of Miranda, under the Fifth Amendment, involves a different analysis than "custody" for purposes of a detention or arrest under the Fourth Amendment. "In contrast (to Fourth Amendment, search and seizure issues), Fifth Amendment *Miranda custody claims do not examine the reasonableness of the officer's conduct, but instead examine whether a reasonable person (in the defendant's position) would conclude the restraints used by police were tantamount to a formal arrest."

Refusal to answer questions during a detention does not, by itself, establish probable cause to arrest, but may be one factor to consider, so long as the refusal to answer questions is not interpreted as a Fifth Amendment self-incrimination invocation. (See People v. Clair (1992) 2 Cal.4th 629, 662.)

Also note that "a Miranda violation does not alone warrant suppression of the physical fruits of the defendant's inculpatory statements." (United States v. Mora-Alcaraz (9th Cir. 2021) 986 F.3rd 1151, 1153, citing United States v. Patane (2004) 542 U.S. 630, 635 [124 S.Ct. 2620; 159 L.Ed.2nd 667; remanding the case to the trial court for a determination whether his consent to search the trunk of this car, where a firearm was recovered, was voluntary.)

Note: The not uncommon occurrence on many television shows where an uncooperative witness or victim is threatened by police with being taken to the police station for questioning does not correctly reflect the law. Such a transportation, if unconsented to and absent probable cause, would be illegal as an arrest without probable cause. (See "Transporting a Detainee," under "Detentions vs. Arrests," above)

Use of Force*:

Rule: A peace officer may use that amount of force that is reasonably necessary under the circumstances in order to enforce a lawful detention. (In re Tony C. (1978) 21 Cal.3rd 888, 895; In re Gregory S. (1980) 112 Cal.App.3rd 764, 778. But see Pen. Code § 835a, below.)

> "Where the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others, it is not constitutionally unreasonable to prevent escape by using deadly force." (Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1, 11 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1]; see also Tabares v. City of Huntington Beach (9th Cir. 2021) 998 F.3rd 1119, 1126.)
>
> However, the use of excessive force constitutes a Fourth Amendment violation. (Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 879.)
>
> "'Federal law recognizes that "the right to make an arrest or investigatory stop necessarily carries with it the right to use some degree of physical coercion or threat thereof to effect it.' (Graham ((1989) 490 U.S. 386) at p. 396 ([109 S.Ct. 1865; 104 L.Ed.2nd at p. 455].) The reasonableness of that use of force 'must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.' (Graham, at p. 396.) The reasonableness inquiry is an objective one: 'whether the officers' actions are "objectively reasonable" in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them, without regard to their underlying intent or motivation.' (Id. at p. 397.) In other words, '[a]n officer's evil intentions will not make a Fourth Amendment violation out of an objectively reasonable use of force; nor will an officer's good intentions make an objectively unreasonable use of force constitutional.' (Ibid.) The reasonableness test evaluates the totality of the relevant circumstances, which may include 'the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.' (Id. at p. 396.)" (People v. Perry (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 444, 465-466.)
>
> A city's use of force policy is a matter a city may reasonably determine is mandated by state law and is not subject to a memorandum of understanding's grievance procedure. A city, therefore, is not precluded from making a policy decision on the permissible use of force. The fact that a police association does not agree with that policy does not make it a matter that is subject to arbitration. (San Francisco Police Officers' Assn. v. San Francisco Police Commission (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 676.)

Factors:

In determining the reasonableness of using force during a detention, the court must take into consideration the following factors:

- The severity of the suspected crime;
- Whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others;
- Whether the suspect is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade the officers by flight;
- Whether the detention during a search was unnecessarily painful, degrading or prolonged (Graham v. Connor (1989) 490 U.S. 386, 395-396 [109 S.Ct. 1865; 104 L.Ed.2nd 443, 455-456].);
- Or whether the detention involved an undue invasion of privacy. (Franklin v. Foxworth (9th Cir. 1994) 31 F.3rd 873, 876; see also Mendoza v. City of West Covina (2012) 206 Cal.App.4th 702, 712; Kisela v. Hughes (2018) 584 U.S. 100, 103-105, 113 [200 L.Ed.2nd 449; 138 S. Ct. 1148].)

The factors considered under Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1, 9-12 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1] are:

- The immediacy of the threat;
- Whether force was necessary to safeguard officers or the public; and
- Whether officers administered a warning, assuming it was practicable.

  (See also George v. Morris (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 829, 837.)

Factors to consider when a medical emergency is the cause of a plaintiff's physical resistance (e.g., plaintiff going into diabetic shock): As determined by the federal Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, in Estate of Hill v. Miracle (6th Cir. Mich. 2017) 853 F.3rd 306, the following factors apply:

- Was the person experiencing a medical emergency that rendered him incapable of making a rational decision under circumstances that posed an immediate threat of serious harm to himself or others?

- Was some degree of force reasonably necessary to ameliorate the immediate threat?

- Was the force used more than reasonably necessary under the circumstances? (i.e., was it excessive?)

  Note: A civil defendant (e.g., police officer) is entitled to qualified immunity if the answer to the first two questions above is "yes," and to the third is "no." (Ibid.)

Refusal to Submit*:

Refusal to submit to a lawful detention constitutes probable cause to arrest, pursuant to Penal Code § 148(a)(1) (Interfering with a peace officer in the performance of his or her duties). (In re Gregory S. (1980) 112 Cal.App.3rd 764, 780.)

> Note, however, that a violation of P.C. § 148(a)(1) is not proven in an attempted detention situation absent sufficient evidence that the defendant, when fleeing, knew, or reasonably should have known, that officers were pursing and attempting to detain him. (In re Charles G. (2017) 14 Cal.App.5th 945.)

In a trial for resisting, obstructing, or delaying a peace officer, in violation of P.C. § 148(a)(1), the jury was properly instructed that defendant could be found guilty if he refused to identify himself to a ranger who was writing a citation for violating a local ordinance making it an infraction to possess open containers of alcoholic beverages in a public place. When a person refuses to identify himself to an officer who is writing a citation to that person for an infraction offense, that refusal can be the basis for a finding that the person resisted, obstructed, or delayed an officer. (People v. Knoedler (2019) 44 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1.)

Even when the detention is illegal, every person has a legal duty to submit (Evans v. City of Bakersfield (1994) 22 Cal.App.4th 321.), although declining to do so is not a violation of P.C. § 148 in that a peace officer is not acting in the "performance of his (or her) duties" by unlawfully detaining someone.

> "One who flees an officer's lawful attempts to detain violates (Penal Code) section 148, subdivision (a)(1)." (In re T.F.-G. (2023) 94 Cal.App.5th 893, 903-904; citing People v. Allen (1980) 109 Cal.App.3rd 981, 985–987; and People v. Lopez (1986) 188 Cal.App.3rd 592, 601–602.)
> > In In re T.F.-G., supra, at p. 905, defendant minor was held to have been lawfully arrested when he fled from an attempt to detain him. "The totality of the circumstances persuades us that when

> T.F.-G. fled, 'a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave,' or 'otherwise terminate the encounter.'" (Quoting People v. Tacardon (2022) 14 Cal.5th 235, at p. 241.)

Whether or not a detention or an arrest is lawful, a suspect is not immunized from prosecution for any new crimes he might commit against the officer in response. A defendant's violent response to an unlawful detention, such as assaulting a police officer, may still be the source of criminal charges. A suspect has a duty to cooperate with law enforcement whether or not an attempt to detain or arrest him is later held to be in violation of the Fourth Amendment. (In re Richard G. (2009) 173 Cal.App.4th 1252, 1260-1263.)

> See People v. Southard (2021) 62 Cal.App.5th 424, 434, fn. 8; also citing People v. Cox (2008) 168 Cal.App.4th 702.
> In People v. Southard, supra, the Court held that the rule of In re Richard G. and People v. Cox pertain to a "motion to suppress" (pursuant to P.C. § 1538.5) only. At trial, the fact of a defendant's commission of an illegal act (such as battery on the arresting officer) subsequent to, or during an officer's illegal act (e.g., use of excessive force or an illegal arrest) is not excused by the fact that the officer had acted illegally. (An exception to this rule is when the defendant is reasonably acting in self-defense.) Neither case supports the argument that the same rule applies to trial, where the prosecution is obligated to prove beyond a reasonable doubt, each element of a charged offense, and the relevant jury instructions that are to be given to a jury in determining guilt or innocence.

Note that the law relevant to the issue of what needs to be proved in relation to an officer acting in the performance of his duties differs depending upon the circumstances:

> Motion to Suppress, per P.C. § 1538.5: See People v. Cox (2008) 168 Cal.App.4th 702, and In re Richard G. (2009) 173 Cal.App.4th 1252, 1260-1263.
> Civil case: See Evans v. City of Bakersfield (1994) 22 Cal.App.4th 321.
>
> Criminal Trial: People v. Southard (2021) 62 Cal.App.5th 424.
> Also, an excessive use of force used by the officer after the arrest does not itself negate the "in the performance of his (or her) duties" element of P.C. §§ 148(a) (or 69). (People v. Williams (2018) 26 Cal.App.5th 71.)

Pen. Code § 1538.5 does not require the trial court to hold an evidentiary hearing when the defendant's stated issue to be decided is not relevant to the motion to suppress. Section 1538.5(c)(1) requires the trial court to receive evidence on any issue of fact necessary to determine the motion. The lawfulness of the initial contact was not an issue of fact necessary for a determination of the motion in this case. The trial court properly rejected defendant's argument that he was entitled to an evidentiary hearing on any issue. The language of § 1538.5 limits the scope of such a hearing. In this case (a violation of P.C. § 148(a)(1)); "the lawfulness of the initial [police] contact is irrelevant to the suppression of evidence" because defendant's new criminal behavior broke any causal link to an underlying illegality. (People v. Chavez (2020) 54 Cal.App.5th 477.)

Reasonableness of the Force Used:

Rule:

The force used in effecting a detention or an arrest must be tailored to the circumstances. It must be reasonable under the circumstances. Yanking a person out of his vehicle, pushing him up against his car, and handcuffing him when that person is not attempting to escape nor resisting the officers in anyway other than being "verbally confrontational," may be excessive. (Liberal v. Estrada (9th Cir. 2011) 632 F.3rd 1064, 1078-1079.)

Where plaintiff physically resisted an officer's attempt to effect a detention by using physical force, the trial court was held to have erred by granting judgment as a matter of law in the officer's favor because there was sufficient evidence at trial on which a reasonable jury could have concluded that no probable cause for the arrest existed, based both on evidence that plaintiff did not in fact resist the officer nor did he impede the officer in the exercise of his lawful duties. Also, the trial court's granting of judgment as a matter of law on the lawfulness of the arrest, in conjunction with the court's erroneous instructions on the excessive use of force claim, improperly influenced the jury's consideration of plaintiff's excessive force claim. (Velazquez v. City of Long Beach (9th Cir. 2015) 793 F.3rd 1010, 1017-1027.)

The use of firearms, handcuffs, putting a person into a locked patrol car, or simply a "show of force," may, under the circumstances, cause a court to later find that an attempted detention was in fact an arrest, and, if made without "probable cause," excessive and illegal. (United States v. Ramos-Zaragosa (9th Cir. 1975) 516 F.2nd 141, 144; New York v. Quarles (1984) 467 U.S. 649 [104 S.Ct. 2626; 81 L.Ed.2nd 550]; handcuffs; Orozco v. Texas (1969) 394 U.S. 324 [89 S.Ct. 1095; 22 L.Ed.2nd 311]; force; United States v. Ricardo D. (9th Cir. 1990) 912 F.2nd 337, 340; "Detention in a patrol car exceeds permissible Terry* (*v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1 [20 L.Ed.2nd 889].) limits absent some reasonable justification."

An officer violates the Fourth Amendment if he abruptly resorts to overwhelming physical force rather than continuing verbal negotiations with an individual who poses no immediate threat or flight risk, and who engages in, at most, passive (i.e., verbal) resistance, and whom the officer stopped for a minor traffic violation. (Hanks v. Rogers (5th Cir. Tex. 2017) 853 F.3rd 738: Officer's use of a "half spear" to the plaintiff's back, forcing him against the car and forcing him to his knees, and handcuffing him, after plaintiff questioned the officer's actions instead of complying, where the original violations included driving too slow and not having proof of insurance, held to be excessive force as a matter of law under the circumstances.

While the use of force to subdue a resisting suspect may initially be lawful, once the person has been subdued (i.e., handcuffed and zip-tied, in this case) and he is no longer resisting, an officer's continued use of force (hitting and applying a carotid restraint hold on him, rendering him unconscious) is excessive, and a violation of the Fourth Amendment. (McCoy v. Meyers (10th Cir. KS 2018) 887 F.3rd 1034.)

At least in the federal Tenth Circuit, the law is clearly established that the gratuitous use of force against a fully compliant, restrained, non-threatening misdemeanant arrestee violated the Fourth Amendment. Therefore, an officer who drives recklessly, knowingly tossing about a suspect in the backseat of a patrol car who is handcuffed but otherwise unrestrained arrestee, is potentially subject to civil liability, as is an officer who deprives an arrestee of medical care. The officer's motion for summary judgement was property denied. (McClown v. Morales (10th Cir. N.M 2019) 945 F.3rd 1276.)

A district court's entry of summary judgment in favor of an officer was affirmed in part and vacated in part. The case was remanded since the officer in making an arrest and breaking the plaintiff's arm was entitled to qualified immunity as to the unlawful arrest claim because plaintiff conceded she was asked to leave a hospital's exam room at least two times by a security guard prior to the arrival of the officer. It was undisputed that the officer was asked to remove plaintiff from the property because she declined to leave. However, as to the Fourth Amendment excessive force claim, genuine issues of material fact existed as to the level of force employed by the officer and the level of resistance posed by plaintiff. If the force used by the defendant officers was as plaintiff alleged, clearly established law has held the alleged degree of force was excessive whether plaintiff was passively or minimally resisting. (Close v. City of Vacaville (9th Cir. 2021) 846 F.Appx. 513; unpublished.)

Lesser Degree of Force:

"As for using less intrusive alternatives, the courts have held that given the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation, they are not required to use the least intrusive degree of force possible." (Lowry v. City of San Diego (9th 2017) 858 F.3rd 1248, 1259-1260; rejecting plaintiff's argument that an officer could have kept his service dog on her leash instead of releasing her into a darkened commercial business where the dog found and bit the plaintiff as she slept on a couch.)

> The Lowry Court cited Miller v. Clark County (9th Cir. 2003) 340 F.3rd 959, at 968, where the Court concluded that the use of an off-leash police dog was reasonable and rejecting the alternative proposal of keeping the dog on-leash, because it could have led the officer into an ambush or pulled him "into a dangerous situation with no opportunity to react safely."

"Another relevant factor (in evaluating the reasonableness of an officer's use of deadly force) is 'the availability of alternative methods of capturing or subduing a suspect.' Smith (v. City of Hemet (9th Cir. 2005)) 394 F.3rd (689) at 703 (citing Chew v. Gates, 27 F.3rd 1432, 1441 n.5 (9th Cir. 1994)). Where an obese shoplifting suspect complained, after being handcuffed, that he was having trouble breathing, and subsequently died from a lack of oxygen in his body, the decedent's parents sued. The Court held that the handcuffs used on the decedent were no tighter than they would have been to restrain an arrestee in similar circumstances. Also, there was no evidence the officers were aware the handcuffs were causing the decedent's breathing trouble. He never complained that the tightness of the handcuffs was restricting his breathing nor was there any evidence to indicate the handcuffs contributed to his breathing difficulty until the autopsy report was released. In fact, the coroner noted no visible signs of trauma and the autopsy report indicated no lacerations or contusions on the decedent's wrists. Consequently, the court held that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because the officers did not violate the decedent's right "to be free from an officer's knowing use of handcuffs in a way that would inflict knowing pain or injury." (Day v. Wooten (7th Cir. 2020) 947 F.3rd 453.)

When Force is Used Against a Person Who was Not the Intended Target of the Force:

Accidental or unintended seizures are not violations of the Fourth Amendment. (Brower v. County of Inyo (1989) 489 U.S. 593, 596 [109 S.Ct. 1378; 103 L.Ed.2nd 628].)

An innocent bystander struck by a stray bullet from an officer's weapon is not "seized" for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. (United States v. Lockett (9th Cir. 1990) 919 F.2nd 585, 590.)

The individual seized has to be the deliberate object of the exertion of force intended to terminate the freedom of movement. The accidental injury of a bystander is not a Fourth Amendment seizure if an officer has "no reason, expressed or conjectural, to seek to restrain the bystander." (Rodriguez v. City of Fresno (E.D. Cal. 2011) 819 F.Supp.2nd 937, 946.)

Expert Testimony Re: Excessive Force Issue:

In a trial for an alleged violation of Penal Code § 69 (resisting an executive officer), where the victim officer is alleged to have struck the defendant repeatedly with a baton after defendant was on the ground, the defendant should have been permitted to introduce testimony from a use-of-force expert who would have testified, among other things, that the officer continued to strike defendant after realizing the strikes were ineffective. In some cases involving a claim of excessive force, expert testimony may be helpful to a jury's understanding of the use of special weapons and tactics, and therefore it was error to exclude the testimony on the basis that it invaded the province of the jury or involved an ultimate issue. However, with evidence that defendant had resisted arrest earlier, exclusion of the expert's testimony was harmless error in this case. (People v. Reardon (2018) 26 Cal.App.5th 727, 734-741.)

Note: "(T)he term 'executive officer' has long been held to include police officers." (People v. Buice (1964) 230 Cal.App.2nd 324, 335, citing People* v. Markham (1883) 64 Cal. 157; Harris v.

Superior Court (1921) 51 Cal.App. 15; and People v. Mathews (1954) 124 Cal.App.2nd 67.)

Note: A judge, however, being a member of the judicial branch, is not an executive officer for purposes of P.C. § 69 (People v. Hupp (2023) 96 Cal.App.5th 946.)

Narcotics-Related Traffic Stops Using a "Controlled Tire Deflation Device" ("CTDD"):

The use of a "controlled tire deflation device" to stop a vehicle suspected of being used to smuggle controlled substances over the US/Mexico border was held to be a detention only (thus requiring only a reasonable suspicion) and not excessive force under the circumstances. (United States v. Guzman-Padilla (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 865, 886-889.)

Note: The "controlled tire deflation device," or "CTDD," is an accordion-like tray containing small, hollow steel tubes that puncture the tires of a passing vehicle and cause a gradual release of air, bringing the vehicle to a halt within a quarter to half a mile.

See "A Controlled Tire Deflation Device ('CTDD'), under "New and Developing Law Enforcement Tool and Technology" (Chapter 14), below.

Use of Deadly Force:

Deadly force (i.e., force likely to cause death or great bodily injury) may not be used to enforce a detention, unless the officer is attacked and must defend him or herself against the use of deadly force by the suspect. (See People v. Ceballos (1974) 12 Cal.3rd 470, 478; Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1, 12-15 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1, 10-12].)

See "Deadly Force," under "Use of Force" (Chapter 6), below.

Demanding Identification; A Person's Refusal to Identify Himself*:

Rule: While it is clear that a person who has been "consensually encountered" (see Chapter 3, above) need not identify himself, nor even talk to a police officer (See Kolender v. Lawson (1983) 461 U.S. 352 [103 S.Ct. 1855; 75 L.Ed.2nd 903]; Brown v. Texas (1979) 443 U.S. 47, 52 [99 S.Ct. 2637; 61 L.Ed.2nd 357].), there is nothing improper with a peace officer asking, or even "demanding," that a detained person properly identify himself. (United States v. Christian (9th Cir. 2004) 356 F.3rd 1103; not discussing whether the officer can enforce the demand.)

See also People v. Leath (2013) 217 Cal.App.4th 344, 350-353: Merely requesting identification from a suspect, or even retaining it, absent more coercive circumstances, does not by itself convert a consensual encounter into a detention.

A passenger in a lawfully stopped vehicle may be "asked" for his identification. (United States v. Diaz-Castaneda (9th Cir. 2007) 494 F.3rd 1146, 1152-1153.)

While it is a crime to falsely identify oneself when lawfully detained, per P.C. § 148.9, this section is not violated where (1) the person is unlawfully detained, or (2) where he is the target of a consensual encounter only. (People v. Walker (2012) 210 Cal.App.4th 1372, 1392.)

The Fourth Amendment is not implicated by asking a detained individual for identification, at least so long as the detention is not unnecessarily prolonged in the process. (People v. Vibanco (2007) 151 Cal.App.4th 1, 13-14.)

The trial court erroneously denied defendant's motion to suppress evidence obtained as a result of a traffic stop in that the law enforcement officers were not entitled to extend the lawfully initiated vehicle stop just because the passenger (the defendant) refused to identify himself since there was no reasonable suspicion that the passenger had committed a criminal offense. (United States v. Landeros (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 862; specifically noting that "an officer may not lawfully order a person to identify herself absent particularized suspicion that she has engaged, is engaging, or is about to engage in criminal activity, . . " (at p. 869; citing Brown v. Texas (1979) 443 U.S. 47, 52 [99 S.Ct. 2637; 61 L.Ed.2nd 357].)

In Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ, 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006, a federal district court in Arizona ruled that the right to not identify oneself in such a detention (traffic stop, as the passenger in the vehicle) situation is not "clearly established," and held therefore the officer in plaintiff's civil suit was entitled to qualified immunity, thus entitling him to summary judgment on this issue. In so ruling, the Court provided the following analysis at pages 34-35:

> "Assuming that (plaintiff) Wheatcroft is entitled to a First Amendment right to refuse to identify himself during an investigatory stop exists, the right is not clearly established so Officer Schneider is entitled to qualified immunity. 'The relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' Saucier, 533 U.S. at 201. Wheatcroft maintains that he 'engaged in > protected speech' by 'questioning why he needed to provide identification when he did nothing wrong.' (Doc. 260 at 21.) But here, the relevant case law either suggests that the First Amendment precedent allows refusal-to-identify arrests during investigatory stops or concludes that the right is not clearly established. See Abdel-Shafy v. City of San Jose, No. 17-CV-07323-LHK, 2019 WL 570759, at *10 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 12, 2019) (concluding that Plaintiff did not have a clearly established First Amendment right to refuse to identify herself during a Terry stop); Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial Dist. Ct. of Nevada, 542 U.S. 177, 187, 124 S. Ct. 2451, 159 L. Ed. 2d 292 (holding that '[t]he principles of Terry permit a State to require a suspect to disclose his name in the course of a Terry stop' in the context of a Fourth and Fifth Amendment challenge, which likely extends to the First Amendment); see also Koch v. City of Del City, 660 F.3d 1228, 1244 (10th Cir. 2011) (finding 'no authority recognizing a First Amendment right to refuse to answer questions during a Terry stop'). Accordingly, finding the right is not clearly established, the Court need not proceed to the second prong of the analysis, and summary judgment for Defendant Schneider is granted as to this claim."

Issue: The only issue left hanging by Christian, Vibanco, and the other above cases, is whether a detained suspect must properly identify himself, or be subject to arrest for refusing to do so.

Case Law:

> The United States Supreme Court ruled in Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada (2004) 542 U.S. 177 [124 S.Ct. 2451; 159 L.Ed.2nd 292], that a person who is lawfully "detained" may be charged with a criminal violation for refusing to identify himself. Such an identification requirement violates neither the Fourth nor Fifth Amendment (self-incrimination) rights of the detained person.
>
> > Note, however, that the Court, in Hiibel, conceded that "a case may arise where there is a substantial allegation that furnishing identity at the time of a stop would have given the police a link in the chain of evidence needed to convict the individual of a separate offense," thus implicating the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. (Id., at p. 191.)
> >
> > Also note that Nevada has a specific statute making it a misdemeanor to refuse to identify oneself when lawfully detained. California does not have such a specific statute. (See United States v. Williams (9th Cir. 2017) 846 F.3rd 303, 310-312, > discussing the interplay of Nevada statutes N.R.S. §§ 171.123 and 199.280, which, together, make it an arrestable offense for a lawfully detained individual to refuse to identify himself.)

See People v. Quiroga (1993) 16 Cal.App.4th 961, 971-972, upholding a P.C. § 148(a)(1) conviction of an arrestee who refused to identify himself during the booking process for a felony offense.

> However, in noting that P.C. § 148(a)(1) applies only "when no other punishment is prescribed," the Court held that; "(a) refusal to disclose personal identification following arrest for a misdemeanor or infraction cannot constitute a violation of Pen. Code, § 148 (resisting a peace officer). By enacting Pen. Code, § 853.5 (refusal by person arrested for infraction to provide identification), Pen. Code, § 853.6, subd. (i)(5) (failure of person arrested for misdemeanor to provide satisfactory evidence of personal identification), Veh. Code, § 40302 (mandatory appearance before magistrate), and Veh. Code, § 40305 (failure of nonresident to furnish satisfactory evidence of identity), the Legislature established other ways of dealing with such nondisclosure." (Id., at p. 970.)

A P.C. § 148(a)(1) conviction was affirmed when the defendant was "belligerent, refused to give his name, refused to keep his hands visible, and refused to submit to a patdown." However, the court made it clear that the defendant's arrest was a "far cry" from a mere "refusal to identify himself." Instead, the lack of cooperation was "coupled with" belligerent conduct that interfered with the officer's patdown search. (People v. Lopez (2004) 119 Cal.App.4th 132.)

However, see People v. Knoedler (2019) 44 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1: In a trial for resisting, obstructing, or delaying a peace officer, in violation of P.C. § 148(a)(1), the jury was properly instructed that defendant could be found guilty if he refused to identify himself to an officer who intended to write a citation for violating a local ordinance making it an infraction to possess an open container of an alcoholic beverage in a public place. When a person refuses to identify himself to an officer who intends to cite the individual for an infraction offense, that refusal can be the basis for a finding that the person resisted, obstructed, or delayed an officer.

> The Court in Knoedler differentiates this defendant from that in People v. Quiroga, supra, by the fact that Knoedler had not yet been "arrested," while Quiroga had been, and refused to identify himself during the booking process. (People v. Knoedler, supra, at pp. 4-5.)

See also In re Gregory S. (1980) 112 Cal.App.3rd 764, 776, where the First District Court of Appeal (Div. 1) "assume(d) for the sake of discussion" that a violation of Penal Code section 148 may not be premised on a refusal to answer questions, including a request for identification. (Italics added) The issue, however, despite the Court's stated opinion that refusing to identify "probably" is not a P.C. § 148 violation (pg. 779), was neither analyzed nor even discussed in that other valid grounds for upholding a P.C. § 148 (delaying the officer in the performance of his duties) violation was found by the detainee attempting to walk away. Also, Gregory S. was decided some 24 years before Hiibel.

Also, decided well before Hiibel, was the case of Martinelli v. City of Beaumont (9th Cir. 1987) 820 F.2nd 1491, which held that P.C. § 148 was not violated by the defendant's refusal to identify oneself. However, the Court in this case, which cited Lawson v. Kolender (9th Cir. 1981) 658 F.2nd 1362 (Cert. granted), as its authority for this conclusion, failed to differentiate between a consensual encounter and a detention.

Note: A careful reading of Hiibel, Quiroga, and Gregory S. indicates that whether or not P.C. § 148(a)(1) can be charged in a circumstance where a detainee has refused to identify himself is a question that will depend upon the specific circumstances of the individual case at issue. In those cases where refusing to identify oneself does in fact delay the officer in the performance of his duties (i.e., did it unnecessarily extend the time required to complete the detention or otherwise draw the officer away from completing his other lawful duties?), the answer should be "yes." If not, then the answer, based upon the available case law, is clearly "no."

Note: Veh. Code § 31 can perhaps be used with the driver of a vehicle makes false statements to a law enforcement officer who is in the performance of this duties during a traffic stop (see People v. Morera-Munoz (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 838; enforcing section 31 does not violate the First Amendment.), but when the passenger does the same, it is unlikely that he has also violated this section in that it is limited to when necessary for the proper enforcement of the Vehicle Code. Questioning a passenger will generally have nothing to do with enforcing the provisions of the Vehicle Code.

Although the act of providing a false name, as a violation of P.C. § 148.9, is an arrestable offense (People v. Christopher (2006) 137 Cal.App.4th 418, 428.), refusing to provide any identification at all, even while detained, has been held not to violate P.C. § 148(a)(1), delaying or obstructing an officer in the performance of his or her duties, at least until the suspect is arrested and the booking process is initiated. In so ruling, the Court found that the evidence as presented was insufficient to show that a minor (the defendant) resisted, delayed, or obstructed a peace officer in violation of Pen. Code § 148(a)(1) merely by exhorted his cohorts not to cooperate with a police investigation. Per the Court, defendant's verbal protests against the detention of his friends, prearrest, were protected political speech under the First Amendment. His prearrest conduct in telling non-suspect minors not to cooperate amounted to nothing more than a lawful protest against an unlawful detention; and that his refusal to identify himself post-arrest, but before being transported to the station, was lawful silence under Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. (In re* Chase C. (2015) 243 Cal.App.4th 107, 117-118.)

> Despite the holding in Chase, supra, there is still some argument (albeit a weak one) that refusing to identify oneself during a detention is in fact a violation of P.C. § 148(a)(1), at least if such refusal does in fact cause a delay in an officer's investigation:
> "[T]he ability to briefly stop [a suspect], ask questions, or check identification in the absence of probable cause promotes the strong government interest in solving crimes and bringing offenders to justice." (Italics added; United States v. Hensley (1985) 469 U.S. 211 [105 S.Ct. 675; 83 L.Ed.2nd 604]; see also Hayes v. Florida (1985) 470 U.S. 811, 816 [105 S.Ct. 1643; 84 L.Ed.2nd 705].)
>
> "The principles of Terry (v. Ohio (1968) 392 U.S. 1.) permit a State to require a suspect to disclose his name in the course of a Terry stop." (Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada, supra, at p. 187.)

See State v. Aloi (2007) 280 Conn. 824, where the Connecticut Supreme Court found that by refusing to identify himself, the lawfully detained defendant was in fact in violation of a state statute that specifically provided: "A person is guilty of interfering with an officer when such person obstructs, resists, hinders or endangers any peace officer or firefighter in the performance of such peace officer's or firefighter's duties . . . ." (Gen. Statutes (Rev. to 2001) § 53a–167a; "Because a refusal to provide identification in connection with a Terry stop may hamper or impede a police investigation into apparent criminal activity, we see no reason why such conduct would be categorically excluded under the expansive language of § 53a-167a." (Id., at p. 833.)

The issue of whether a detained person violates P.C. § 148(a)(1) by refusing to identify himself when asked to do so by a law enforcement officer, still being an undecided issue, means that an officer who is sued for false arrest for using this section to arrest defendant under such circumstances is entitled to qualified immunity. (Vanegas v. City of Pasadena (9th Cir. 2022) 46 F.4th 1159, 1165-1166.)

The Court noted, however, that "multiple district courts, including the one here, thought Officer Klotz could make the arrest," citing Nakamura v. City of Hermosa Beach (C.D. Cal. 200) 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59824; Abdel-Shafy v. City of San Jose (N.D. Cal. 2019) 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22921; Vanegas v. City of Pasadena (C.D. Cal. 2021) 2021 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76047. The Ninth Circuit, in an unpublished decision, agreed. (See Kuhlken v. County of San Diego (9th Cir.2019) 764 F. App'x 612. (Id., at pp. 1166-1167.)

See the back-and-forth debate between justices on the issue of whether refusing to identify oneself, by itself, constitutes (or should constitute) a violation of P.C. § 148(a)(1), at pgs. 1167-1175.)

Also, stopping a suspect in a misdemeanor offense, a noise violation, not occurring in the officer's presence, at least where there are possible alternative, less intrusive methods, of identifying the suspect, has been held to be unlawful. The Court is to balance law enforcement's interest in crime prevention with the detainee's interest in personal security from government intrusion. (See United States v. Hensley (1985) 469 U.S. 221, 229 [105 S.Ct. 675; 83 L.Ed.2nd 604]; declining to decide whether the seriousness of the offense makes a difference.) In a misdemeanor situation, law enforcement's interest may not outweigh the suspect's, depending upon the circumstances. (United States v. Grigg (9th Cir. 2007) 498 F.3rd 1070, 1074-1083.)

The continuing validity of the Grigg decision has been questioned and is probably, if it ever was, no longer a valid rule. (See United States v. Creek (U.S. Dist. Ct, Ariz. 2009) 586 F. Supp.2nd 1099, 1102-1108; upholding the traffic stop of a petty theft (gas drive off) suspect. See also Stanton v. Sims (2013) 571 U.S. 3 [134 S.Ct. 3; 187 L.Ed.2nd 341], calling into question, but not deciding, the Ninth Circuit's sensitivity to apprehending misdemeanor suspects.)

It still follows, however, that a person who is only subject to a "consensual encounter" is not required to identify himself. (See Kolender v. Lawson (1983) 461 U.S. 352 [103 S.Ct. 1855; 75 L.Ed.2nd 903].)

Also Note: There is no authority for arresting a mere witness or victim for refusing to identify him or herself, or for refusing to submit to an interview or otherwise provide any information, such as by then "threatening" to take such an uncooperative victim or witness to the stationhouse for questioning. There is no crime (e.g., such as "obstruction of justice") that covers such a lack of cooperation. And even if there were, it would probably be unconstitutional per Kolender v. Lawson, supra.

Where defendant refused to identify himself to the officers who detained him while investigating his possible involvement in a series of cellphone thefts and robberies, the Court held that; "[T]he use of Section 148 to arrest a person for refusing to identify herself during a lawful Terry stop violates the Fourth Amendment's proscription against unreasonable searches and seizures." (Belay v. City of Gardena (C.D. Cal., 2017) 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66017; quoting Martinelli v. City of Beaumont (9th Cir. 1987) 820 F.2nd 1491, at p. 1494.)

Unless lawfully detained, a person is free to refuse to identify himself and may lawfully walk away. (People v. Thomas (2018) 29 Cal.App.5th 1107, 1117.)

> Absent a sufficient reasonable suspicion justifying a lawful detention, a person under such circumstances "may not be detained even momentarily without reasonable, objective grounds for doing so; and his refusal to listen or answer does not, without more, furnish those grounds." (Ibid, quoting Florida v. Royer (1983) 460 U.S. 491, 498 [103 S.Ct. 1319; 75 L.Ed.2nd 229, 236]; see also Illinois v. Wardlow (2000) 528 U.S. 119, 125 [120 S.Ct. 673; 145 L.Ed.2nd 570, 577; 120 S.Ct. 673].)
>
> The Ninth Circuit has ruled that demanding identification from a passenger in a vehicle during a lawful traffic stop, absent any reasonable suspicion that the passenger himself is engaged in criminal activity, creates an unlawfully prolonged traffic stop and is illegal. (United States v. Landeros (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 862.)

Detentions of an Employee in the Workplace*:

The Problem:

When an employee's supervisors (or a student's principal, a military supervisor, or a law enforcement supervisor) order the employee (or student, military subordinate, or police officer) to report to the office or remain in the workplace pending an interview at the request or complicity of law enforcement, is the employee "detained" for purposes of the Fourth Amendment?

Answer: Not necessarily, but it depends upon the circumstances. (See Aguilera v. Baca, infra.)

Case Law:

Where sheriff's deputies were ordered to remain at the station pending an interview by Internal Affairs investigators about an alleged excessive force citizen's complaint when criminal prosecution could result, the deputies were held to be not detained for purposes of the Fourth Amendment after an evaluation of the following factors:

- The experience level of the subordinate;
- Whether the treatment was consistent with that allowed by department guidelines or general policy;
- The occurrence of physical contact or threats of physical restraint;
- An explicit refusal of permission to depart;
- Isolation of the subordinate officer;
- Permission to use the restroom without accompaniment;
- The subordinate officer's being informed that he was the subject of a criminal investigation;
- Whether the subordinate officer was spoken to "in a menacing or threatening manner;"
- Whether the subordinate officer was under constant surveillance;
- Whether superior officers denied a request to contact an attorney or union representative;
- The subordinate officer's ability to retain law enforcement equipment, including weapons and badges;
- The duration of the detention; and
- The subordinate's receipt of overtime pay.

(Aguilera v. Baca (9th Cir. 2007) 510 F.3rd 1161, 1167-1171, citing Driebel v. City of Milwaukee (7th Cir. 2002) 298 F.3rd 622, 638.)

There is no seizure when an on-duty civilian Air Force employee was ordered to report for an interview with an intelligence officer. (United States v. Muegge (11th Cir. 2000) 225 F.3rd 1267, 1270.)

No seizure when an on-duty Coast Guard officer was ordered to report for an interview with an intelligence officer. (United States v. Baird (D.C. Cir. 1988) 851 F.2nd 376, 380-382.)

Detention of a Student at School*:

Rule: Interviews of minor students in a principal's office by social workers and/or law enforcement may constitute an unlawful seizure, depending upon the circumstances.

Case Law:

In a parent's 18 U.S.C. § 1983 federal lawsuit alleging violation of constitutional rights when a social worker sent a letter to the family court falsely stating that a decision had been made to remove the children from her custody and that her child's rights were violated when the social worker interviewed the child at her school for five minutes, the Fourteenth Amendment claims failed because there was no actual loss of custody. The mere threat of separation or being subjected to an investigation was insufficient to establish a Fourteenth Amendment violation. The district court erred in granting judgment as a matter of law on the child's Fourth Amendment claim regarding her alleged seizure at school because it impermissibly weighed the evidence and concluded that the child was seized and did not consent thereto although substantial evidence supported the jury's contrary verdict. (Dees v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2020) 960 F.3rd 1145.)

Note that Greene v. Camreta (9th Cir. 2009) 588 F.3rd 1011, where the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal ruled that interviewing a child victim on a school campus without the parents' consent, as a Fourth Amendment seizure, required a search warrant or other court order, or exigent circumstances, was overruled by the United States Supreme Court in Camreta v. Greene (2011) 563 U.S. 692 [179 L.Ed.2nd 1118]. The Ninth Circuit's decision, however, was merely vacated, leaving the issue undecided.

See P.C. § 11174.3(a), setting out statutory procedures police officers are to use in interviewing child victims of abuse or neglect while at school.

Subsequently, however, the Ninth Circuit ruled that because the theory of Camreta, having been vacated by the U.S Supreme Court, is not clearly established, civil defendants are entitled to qualified immunity where plaintiff's argument is that social workers violated the Constitution by interviewing his children at school without their parent's permission or a court order; a Fourth Amendment issue. (Capp v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2019) 940 F.3rd 1046, 1059-1060.)

Statutory Authority for Seizure of Firearms During a Detention*:

Gov't. Code § 8571.5 provides that a police officer may not seize or confiscate any firearm or ammunition from an individual who is lawfully carrying or possessing the firearm or ammunition. However, the officer may temporarily disarm an individual if the officer reasonably believes it is immediately necessary for the protection of the officer or another individual. An officer who disarms an individual is to return the firearm before discharging the individual unless the officer arrests the individual or seizes the firearm as evidence of the commission of a crime.

> Note: This new section is in the part of the Government Code entitled the "California Emergency Services Act." This section is intended to prohibit an executive order disarming individuals who are in lawful possession of firearms during a state of emergency or crisis, and will conform California law to a new federal law, Public Law 109-295, which prohibits the confiscation of otherwise legal firearms from law-abiding citizens during a state of emergency by any agent of the Federal Government or by anyone receiving federal funds. However, it appears to be written broad enough to affect a police officer's contacts with individuals on the street.

Pen. Code § 833.5, providing a peace officer the authority to detain for investigation anyone who the officer has "reasonable cause" to believe illegally has in his or her possession a firearm or other deadly weapon.

Pen. Code § 1524(a)(10) provides authority for the obtaining of a search warrant in the Sweig situation; i.e., when dealing with a person with mental issues under the Welfare and Institutions Code (see W&I §§ 5150 & 8102(a)).

> See People v. Sweig (2008) 167 Cal.App.4th 1145 (petition granted), below, declining to imply authority for the issuance of a search warrant under W&I Code § 8102, an issue that was subsequently resolved by the Legislature, adding new subd. (a)(10) to P.C. § 1524, authorizing the issuance of a search warrant when a person with a mental disorder owns or is in possession of a firearm.

Pen. Code §§ 18100-18500, provides for the seizure and retention of a person's firearms and ammunition via a "Gun Violence Restraining Order" (also known as California's "Red Flag Statutes") whenever "there is reasonable cause to believe that the person poses an immediate and present danger of causing personal injury to themselves or another person by having custody or control of a firearm." (P.C. § 18108(c))

Pen. Code § 25850(b) (formerly P.C. § 12031(e)) gives a peace officer the right to inspect a firearm carried by any person on his person or in a vehicle "on any public street in an incorporated city or prohibited area of an unincorporated territory" to determine whether a firearm is loaded in violation of subd. (a). Refusal to allow a peace officer to inspect a firearm is probable cause to arrest the subject for violating P.C. § 25850(a) (formerly P.C. § 12031(a)(1)); illegally carrying a loaded firearm in the listed public places.

Wel. & Inst. Code § 8102(a) authorizes the "confiscation" of firearms or other deadly weapons owned, possessed, or under the control of a detained or apprehended mental patient. However, it has been held that a search warrant must be used in order to lawfully enter the house and/or to search for weapons in those cases where there are no exigent circumstances and the defendant has not given consent. (People v. Sweig (2008) 167 Cal.App.4th 1145 (petition granted, see below); rejecting the People's argument that a warrantless entry to search for and seize the detainee's firearms was justified under law enforcement's "community caretaking" function.)

A petition to the California Supreme Court on People v. Sweig was granted, making this case no longer available for citation, with review being dismissed on 10/11/09 when the below amendment to P.C. § 1524 was enacted as a result.

Merchants, Library Employees Theater Owners and Amusement Park Employees:

Pen. Code § 490.5(f); Merchant, Library Employee or Theater Owner: Detention of a shoplift or theft suspect, or a person illegally recording a movie in a theater, by a merchant, library employee or theater owner, respectively, for the purpose of determining whether the suspect did in fact steal property belonging to the victim, or illegally record a movie, is authorized by statute.

Once the purpose of the detention is accomplished, the suspect must either be turned over to and arrested by police, or released.

Only non-deadly force may be used. (P.C. § 190.5(f)(2))

See People v. Zelinski (1979) 24 Cal.3rd 357; and In re Christopher H. (1991) 227 Cal.App.3rd 1567.)

Pen. Code § 490.6*(a)*; Amusement Parks: A person employed by an amusement park may detain a person for a reasonable time for the purpose of conducting an investigation in a reasonable manner whenever the person employed by the amusement park has probable cause to believe the person to be detained is violating lawful amusement park rules.

(b): It is a violation of P.C. § 602.1 (trespass) for a person to refuse a request to either comply with the park's rules of leave the premises.

(c): It is a defense to a civil suit if the park employee had "probable cause" to believe that the person was not following lawful amusement park rules and if the employee acted reasonably under all the circumstances.

However, unless shown as a matter of law, it is a jury issue whether the park employee had probable cause and that he acted reasonably under the circumstances. (Eckar v. Raging Waters Group (2001) 87 Cal.App.4th 1320.)

Indefinite Detentions Pursuant to Federal Law*:

Pen. Code § 145.5*: Effective since 1/1/2014, the California Legislature has dictated that California law enforcement will not participate in any manner with federal indefinite detentions.

It is the policy of California to refuse to provide material support for, or to participate in any way with, the implementation of any federal law that authorizes the indefinite detention of a person within California without charge or trial.

State agencies, state employees, and the California National Guard are prohibited from knowingly aiding an agency of the United States Armed Forces in an investigation, prosecution, or detention of a person within California pursuant to the indefinite detention provisions of the National Defense Authorization Act, the federal law known as the Authorization for Use of Military Force, or any other federal law if the state agency, employee, or member of the Guard would violate the U.S. Constitution, the California Constitution, or any California law by providing aid.

A local law enforcement agency, a local government, or an employee of a local agency or government is prohibited from using state funds allocated by the state to a local entity on or after January 1, 2013, to engage in any activity that aids an agency of the United States Armed Forces in the detention of a person within California for purposes of implementing the indefinite detention provisions of the National Defense Authorization Act or the federal law known as the Authorization for Use of Military Force, if the local agency, local government, or employee would violate the U.S. Constitution, the California Constitution, or any California law by providing aid.

Case Law Definition*:

"The Fourth Amendment protects against unreasonable seizures. (Citation) An arrest is the 'quintessential seizure of the person.'" (Williamson v. City of National City (9th Cir. Jan. 24, 2022) 23 F.4th 1146, 1151; quoting Torres v. Madrid (2021) __ U.S. __, __ [141 S.Ct. 989, 995; 209 L.Ed.2nd 190].)

"A person is seized by the police and thus entitled to challenge the government's action under the Fourth Amendment when the officer, 'by means of physical force or show of authority,' terminates or restrains his freedom of movement, [citation], 'through means intentionally applied,' [citation]. . . . 'When the actions of the police do not show an unambiguous intent to restrain or when an individual's submission to a show of governmental authority takes the form of passive acquiescence,' the test for determining if a seizure occurred is whether, "in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave," [citation].' The coercive effect of the encounter can be measured by whether 'a reasonable person would feel free to decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter,' [citations]." (People v. Kopatz (2015) 61 Cal.4th 62, 79; quoting Brendlin v. California (2007) 551 U.S. 249, 254-255 [127 S.Ct. 2400; 168 L.Ed.2nd 132].)

In the subsequent case of Torres v. Madrid (Mar. 25, 2021) __ U.S. __, __ [141 S.Ct. 989; 209 L.Ed.2nd 190], the United States Supreme Court expanded upon this theory concerning when a "seizure" occurs, ruling that a seizure occurs with "(t)he application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure, even if the force does not succeed in subduing the person."

The Madrid Court overruled a lower court's holding that a suspect's continued flight after being shot by police negates a Fourth Amendment excessive-force claim, given the lack of a "seizure." In other words, for Fourth Amendment purposes, the subject was seized when shot despite him having fled the police afterwards, and not being actually physically captured until sometime later. (See Torres v. Madrid (10th Cir. 2019) 769 Fed.Appx. 654.)

Standard of Proof: For an arrest of a person to be lawful, "Probable Cause" must be present.

Rule:

"(A) police officer may arrest without (a) warrant (a person) . . . believed by the officer upon reasonable (or "probable") cause to have been guilty of a felony (or misdemeanor)." (Emphasis added; United States v. Watson (1976) 423 U.S. 411, 417 [96 S.Ct. 820; 46 L.Ed.2nd 598, 605].)

"Reasonable" cause is a synonym for "probable" cause (not to be confused with a "reasonable suspicion"), and is used interchangeably in some case decisions.

"A warrantless arrest is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment 'if the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect committed a crime in the officer's presence.'" (Demarest v. City of Vallejo (9th Cir. 2022) 44 F.4th 1209, 1224, quoting District of Columbia v. Wesby (2018) 583 U.S. 48, 56 [138 S.Ct. 577; 199 L.Ed.2nd 453].)

Defined: Probable (or Reasonable) Cause to Arrest:

"Probable cause to arrest exists when there is a 'fair probability or substantial chance of criminal activity' by the arrestee based on the totality of the circumstances known to the officers at the time of arrest." (Vanegas v. City of Pasadena (9th Cir. 2022) 46 F.4th 1159, 1164; quoting Lacey v. Maricopa County (9th Cir. 2012) 693 F.3rd 896, 918.)

"Reasonable or probable cause is shown if a man of ordinary care (or caution) and prudence (or a reasonable and prudent person) would be led to believe and conscientiously entertain an honest and strong suspicion that the accused is guilty." (See People v. Lewis (1980) 109 Cal.App.3rd 599 608-609; People v. Campa (1984) 36 Cal.3rd 870, 879; People v. Price (1991) 1 Cal.4th 324, 410.)

Note: The terms "reasonable" and "probable" cause are used interchangeably in both the codes (see P.C. § 995(a)(1)(B)) and case law, but (when properly used) mean the same thing. "Reasonable cause" and "reasonable suspicion" (i.e., the standard of proof for a detention), on the other hand, do not mean the same thing, and are not to be confused.

"(R)easonable cause"—a synonym for "probable cause . . . ." (Heien v. North Carolina (2014) 574 U.S. 54, 62 [135 S.Ct. 530; 190 L.Ed.2nd 475, 483].)

Note: Probable cause is more than a "reasonable suspicion," but less than "clear and convincing evidence" or "proof beyond a reasonable doubt."

> "'Clear and convincing' evidence requires a finding of high probability. [Citation.] Such a test requires that the evidence be so clear as to leave no substantial doubt; sufficiently strong to command the unhesitating assent of every reasonable mind.' This standard, which 'is less commonly used' [Citation], tends to be seen in civil cases involving 'interests … deemed to be more substantial than mere loss of money.'" (People v. Mary H. (2016) 5 Cal.App.5th 246, 256; quoting Lillian F. v. Superior Court (1984) 160 Cal.App.3rd 314, 320.)
> In "a criminal case, … [in which] the interests of the defendant are of such magnitude that historically and without any explicit constitutional requirement they have been protected by standards of proof designed to exclude as nearly as possible the likelihood of an erroneous judgment. In the administration of criminal justice, our society imposes almost the entire risk of error upon itself. This is accomplished by requiring under the Due Process Clause that the state prove the guilt of an accused beyond a reasonable doubt." (People v. Mary H., supra; quoting Addington v. Texas (1979) 441 U.S. 418, 423 [99 S.Ct. 1804; 60 L.Ed.2nd 323]; Addington v. Texas (1979) 441 U.S. 418, 423-424 [60 L. Ed. 2d 323; 99 S. "Probable cause to arrest exists if facts known to the arresting officer would lead a person of ordinary care and prudence to entertain an honest and strong suspicion that an individual is guilty of a crime." (People v. Turner (2017) 13 Cal.App.5th 397, 404, 405; quoting People v. Kraft (2000) 23 Cal.4th 978, 1037; and upholding an arrest for trespass, per P.C. § 602.1.)

In a misdemeanor DUI case under V.C. § 3152(a), dismissal was error when based upon the prosecution's failure to offer expert testimony on horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) other than from the arresting officers. A police officer can use findings from horizontal gaze nystagmus testing as a basis for an opinion that the defendant was driving while under the influence of alcohol. The prosecution is not required to submit expert testimony to confirm the officer's evaluation of the HGN test. (People v. Randolph (2018) 28 Cal.App.5th 602.)

> People v. Williams (1992) 3 Cal.App.4th 1326, ruling that a police officer was not qualified to give such testimony (i.e., about horizontal gaze nystagmus), was disapproved to the extent it was inconsistent with this holding.

But 'where probable cause does exist civil rights are not violated by an arrest even though innocence may subsequently be established.' (Beauregard *v. Wingard, 362 F.2nd 901, 903 (9th Cir. 1966)." (Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale, supra.)
>
> In Wheatcroft, the Court found that plaintiff's arrest, supported by sufficient probable cause, had been lawful, given the fact that defendant had actively resisted arrest by that point, entitling the officers to summary judgment.

"Probable cause exists where the 'available facts suggest a fair probability that the suspect has committed a crime.'" (Hill v. City of Fountain Valley (9th Cir. 2023) 70 F.4th 507, 515; quoting Tatum v. City & County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2006) 441 F.3rd 1090, 1094.)

Notes:

While "probable cause" is sufficient to justify an arrest, it cannot be forgotten the legal standard for a prosecutor to convict at trial is the stricter standard of "proof beyond a reasonable doubt." (See Morrisette v. United States (1952 342 U.S. 246 [72 S.Ct. 240; 96 L.Ed.2nd 288]; Herrera v. Collins (1993) 506 U.S. 390, 398-399 [113 S.Ct. 853; 122 L.Ed.2nd 203.)

And for minors, "proof beyond a reasonable doubt supported by evidence, legally admissible in the trial of criminal cases, must be adduced to support a finding that the minor is a person described by (Welfare and Institutions Code) Section 602, and a preponderance of evidence, legally admissible in the trial of civil cases must be adduced to support a finding that the minor is a person described by Section 300 or 601." (W&I Code § 701)

W&I Code § 601: Persons subject to jurisdiction of court as ward for refusal to obey orders of parents, violation of curfew, or truancy.

W&I Code § 602: Persons subject to jurisdiction of juvenile court and to adjudication as ward for violation of law or ordinance defining crime.

W&I Code § 300: Persons subject to jurisdiction of juvenile court; i.e., child victims.

"Constitutional law requires probable cause for arrests. The essence of probable cause is a reasonable belief of criminal guilt that is particular to the arrested person. This standard is practical rather than technical; it deals with the factual aspects of everyday life on which reasonable and prudent people act. One need not be a legal technician to grasp the concept." (People v. Diaz (2024) 97 Cal.App.5th 1172, 1178, citing Maryland v. Pringle (2003) 540 U.S. 366, 370–371 [157 L.Ed.2nd 769; 124 S.Ct. 795].)

In Diaz, defendant was convicted of first degree murder, based on evidence that he shot a street vendor to death for selling on someone else's turf. The Court held that police had probable cause to arrest defendant. They had a location connected with the murder, they went to the suspect location as soon as they could get warrants, and, nearly immediately, defendant showed up and police observed his highly distinctive neck tattoo, a blue flower. The confluence of three independent factors (right place plus right time plus a highly distinctive personal feature) vastly increased the probability police had found a guilty man. (pgs. 1178-1180.)

Refusing to Cooperate with the Police:

"'[I]t is well established under California law that even an outright refusal to cooperate with police officers cannot create adequate grounds for police intrusion without more.'" (Hill v. City of Fountain Valley (9th Cir. 2023) 70 F.4th 507, 515; holding that the plaintiff's refusal to provided officers with his son's cellphone number did not establish probable cause to arrest; quoting Velazquez v. City of Long Beach (9th Cir. 2015) 793 F.3rd 1010, 1023.)

The Hill Court noted (Ibid.) that "California courts have held that passively blocking a door or refusing to open a door after a proper police demand are examples of permissible refusals to cooperate with police;" citing People v. Wetzel (1974) 11 Cal.3rd 104; and People v. Cressey (1970) 2 Cal.3rd 836.

Reasonableness of the Seizure: The U.S. Supreme Court has noted "'the general rule that Fourth Amendment seizures (including arrests) are "reasonable" only if based on probable cause' to believe that the individual has committed a crime. [Citation]. The standard of probable cause, with 'roots that are deep in our history,' [Citation], 'represent[s] the accumulated wisdom of precedent and experience as to the minimum justification necessary to make the kind of intrusion involved in an arrest "reasonable" under the Fourth Amendment.' [Citation]" (Bailey v. United States (2013) 568 U.S. 186, 192-193 [133 S.Ct. 1031, 1037-1043; 185 L.Ed.2nd 19].)

In November, 2014, plaintiff David Sosa was pulled over for a traffic stop during which a warrant from 1992, out of Texas, for "David Sosa" was discovered. Despite plaintiff not matching the wanted Sosa, in that his date of birth, height, and weight—a 40-pound difference—were different, and unlike the wanted Sosa, he had no tattoos. Plaintiff was arrested anyway, but released within three hours after a fingerprint comparison showed that he was the wrong Sosa. Then, three and a half years later, plaintiff was arrested again based upon the same information. This time, however, he was held in custody for three days before a fingerprint comparison showed that he was the wrong Sosa. Suing the County for the two unlawful seizures, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeal held that the officers in the first instance were entitled to qualified immunity, given the reasonableness of their mistake (i.e., plaintiff could have lost 40 pounds in the 22 years between issuance of the warrant, could have removed the tattoo in that time period, and was not otherwise shown to be substantially different in age or race). However, the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity for the second arrest in that it was unreasonable to hold him for three days before his fingerprints were checked, particularly where it was shown that the prints could have been checked within hours as opposed to days. (Sosa v. Martin County (11th Cir. FL. 2021) 13 F.4th 1254.)

Where officers reasonably believed that they were dealing with a possible kidnapping, and also reasonably believed that the plaintiff was protecting the kidnapper who was hiding in the plaintiff's home, arresting the plaintiff, even though there was insufficient probable cause justifying the arrest, was held to entitle the officers to qualified immunity from civil liability in that a reasonable officer might have believed, under the circumstances, that arresting the plaintiff for "obstruction" was lawful. (Hill v. City of Fountain Valley (9th Cir. 2023) 70 F.4th 507, 515-517.)

When Probable Cause Exists: "(P)robable cause" exists if, under the totality of the circumstances known to the arresting officers, a prudent person would have concluded that there was a fair probability that the individual had committed a crime." (Italics added; United States v. Hernandez (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 430, 434; see also Dunaway v. New York (1979) 442 U.S. 200, 208, fn. 9; [99 S.Ct. 2248; 60 L.Ed.2nd 824]; People v. Scott (2011) 52 Cal.4th 452, 474.) Various courts have used variations of this same definition to define probable cause:

"Probable cause to arrest exists when officers have knowledge or reasonably trustworthy information sufficient to lead a person of reasonable caution to believe an offense has been or is being committed by the person being arrested." John v. City of El Monte (9th Cir. 2008) 515 F.3rd 936, 940; citing Beck v. Ohio (1964) 379 U.S. 89, 91 [85 S.Ct. 223; 13 L.Ed.2nd 142]; Maxwell v. "Probable cause arises when an officer has knowledge based on reasonably trustworthy information that the person arrested has committed a criminal offense. (Citation)" (McSherry v. City of Long Beach (9th Cir. 2009) 584 F.3rd 1129, 1135.)

"In California, 'an officer has probable cause for a warrantless arrest "if the facts known to him would lead a [person] of ordinary care and (Citation omitted) (Rodis v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2007) 499 F.3rd 1094, 1099.)

"Probable cause" merely requires that "the facts and circumstances within [the officers'] knowledge and of which they had reasonably trustworthy information were sufficient to warrant a prudent man in believing that the [plaintiff] had committed or was committing an offense. . . . Police must only show that, under the totality of the circumstances, . . . a prudent person would have concluded that there was a fair probability that [the suspect] had committed a crime." Probable cause allows for an officer's reasonable mistake. It only means that he or she is "probably" right, or in effect, having more evidence for than against. (Ex Parte Souza (1923) 65 Cal.App. 9.)

"[P]robable cause means 'fair probability,' not certainty or even a preponderance of the evidence." (United States v. Gourde (9th Cir. 2006) 440 F.3rd 1065, 1069.)

"Probable cause to arrests exists when officers have knowledge or reasonably trustworthy information sufficient to lead a person of caution to believe that an offense has been or is being committed by the person being arrested." Under the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable officer could believe that the arrestee possessed cocaine in violation of Washington law. The arrestee's husband and 911 callers told the police that the arrestee was high on drugs. She said in her deposition that, given her comments to the police officers, it would have been reasonable for them to believe she was on drugs. The police officers also had reasonable cause to take her to the hospital for mental evaluation under Washington's mental health evaluation statute. (Luchtel v. Hagemann (9th Cir. 2010) 623 F.3rd 975.)

Detectives had probable cause to stop and arrest defendant and his cohorts the officers saw four males running from one street toward another. The officer observed defendant carrying an object which could be used as a deadly weapon. The officer also observed specific behavior that caused him to entertain an honest and strong suspicion that a crime was being committed. He observed a brick in defendant's hand, heard a shout of "he's over there" which he believed to have come from one of the four males, and witnessed a gesture from one of the group directing the others where to go. Viewed collectively, there were clearly facts to suggest the group intended to use their rudimentary weapons to harm someone. The officer's knowledge that defendant was a member of a street gang that "claimed" that particular area reasonably supported this analysis of the facts. At this point, probable cause existed to arrest defendant for possession of a deadly weapon with intent to commit an assault, per P.C. § 12024. (In re J.G. (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 1501.)

"Probable cause to arrest exists when officers have knowledge or reasonably trustworthy information sufficient to lead a person of reasonable caution to believe that an offense has been or is being committed by the person being arrested. Probable cause was found to exist with the defendant's statements to his girlfriend about his dream concerning the stabbing of the first victim in a series of crimes, even before the murder was reported in the newspapers. Also, defendant was known to be involved in the martial arts and liked to dress as a ninja which was consistent with the suspect information. Defendant told co-workers that he possessed a semiautomatic pistol similar to the weapon used in some of the crimes. Defendant also matched the physical description of the suspect in the various crimes, being a unique combination of Black and Japanese, with a dark complexion that tended to be lighter than most Blacks. (People v. Scott (2011) 52 Cal.4th 452, 474-476.)

Probable cause existed under Nevada law where the arresting agent knew that defendant (1) admitted to gambling at various casinos under a different name, (2) admitted to using identification not issued by a government entity identifying him by that different name, and (3) possessed and had used a credit card issued in that different name. (Fayer v. Vaughn (9th Cir. 649 F.3rd 1061, 1064-1065.)

Observing defendant on a public sidewalk (i.e., a "public place"), and then seconds later on his own front porch (not a "public place"), and then seeing a semi-automatic pistol in his hand while standing on his porch, provided the necessary probable cause to believe that he had been in violation of P.C. § 25850(a) (formerly § 12031(a)), carrying a loaded firearm in public, while on the sidewalk. The fact that he was carrying it around his house, where it would normally be used for self-defense or defense of habitation, also constituted probable cause to believe it was loaded. (United States v. Nora (9th Cir. 2014) 765 F.3rd 1049, 1052-1060; noting that we are only "deal(ing) in probabilities, not certainties." Id., at p. 1053.)

W&I §§ 601(a) and 625(a) do not allow for taking a minor into custody for a single instance of disobedience. The authority to take a minor into custody, as provided for under section 625(a), requires that the minor be a person described in section 601. However, section 601(a) requires that the minor "persistently or habitually refuses to obey" his or her parent or custodian, or is "beyond the control of that person." A single instance of disobedience does not qualify as "persistently or habitually," or being "beyond the control." Under these circumstances, the Court found no legal justification for officers to take an 11-year-old minor into physical custody at his school and remove him from the school grounds in handcuffs despite the school's administrators reporting him as being "out of control." (C.B. v. City of Sonora (9th Cir. 2014) 769 F.3rd 1005, 1031.)

A deputy sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity in a false arrest civil suit brought by a deputy public defender where a court referee ordered the deputy to get the public defender and bring her to court, or to get her supervisor if the public defender refused to come to court. The deputy sheriff had no reasonable basis for believing that he was authorized to arrest the public defender since the referee's order, by its clear terms, did not authorize the deputy to physically seize the public defender. Also, the deputy public defender's comment to the deputy sheriff that he would have to arrest her if he wanted her to come to court immediately could not reasonably have caused the deputy sheriff to believe that she was volunteering to be handcuffed. (Demuth v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2015) 798 F.3rd 837, 838-840.)

"Probable cause is shown 'when the facts known to the arresting officer would persuade someone of "reasonable caution" that the person to be arrested has committed a crime.'" (People v. Zaragoza (2016) 1 Cal.5th 21, 56-57; quoting People v. Celis (2004) 33 Cal.4th 667, 673.)

"'Under the Fourth Amendment, a warrantless arrest requires probable cause,' which 'exists when officers have knowledge or reasonably trustworthy information sufficient to lead a person of reasonable caution to believe that an offense has been or is being committed by the person being arrested.' United States v. Lopez 482 F.3rd 1067, 1072 (9th Cir. 2007). Whether probable cause exists depends 'on the totality of facts' available to the officers, who 'may not disregard facts tending to dissipate probable cause.' Id. at 1073 (internal quotation marks omitted). 'In some instances there may initially be probable cause justifying an arrest, but additional information obtained at the scene may indicate that there is less than a fair probability that the [individual] has committed or is committing a crime. In such cases, execution of the arrest or continuation of the arrest is illegal.' Id." (Sialoi v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2016) 823 F.3rd 1223, 1232.)

Probable cause may be established by a person's "vagueness and implausibility" of his or her story, leading an officer to reasonably believe that he or she is lying, suggesting a "guilty mind." (District of Columbia v. Wesby (2018) 583 U.S. 48, 59-60 [138 S.Ct. 577; 199 L.Ed.2nd 453], citing Devenpeck v. Alford (2004) 543 U.S. 146, 149 [125 S.Ct. 588; 160 L.Ed.2nd 537], noting that the suspect's "untruthful and evasive" answers to police questioning could support probable cause.)

> The Supreme Court in Wesby also criticized the lower courts' dissection of the various factors, considering them individually rather than following the "totality of the circumstances" rule, in determining the existence of probable cause. (District of Columbia v. Wesby, supra, at pp. 60-62.)
>
> > See also Hill v. City of Fountain Valley (9th Cir. 2023) 70 F.4th 507, 516, fn. 5: "The dissent lasers in on each piece of fact to argue that it alone cannot establish probable cause. But we cannot view each fact in isolation, and instead must analyze all the facts under a totality of the circumstances, which means we must consider the 'whole picture' that develops from the combined effect of all the available facts."" (Citing District of Columbia v. Wesby, supra, 138 S. Ct. at p. 588, which cites in turn United States v. Cortez (1981) 449 U.S. 411, 417 [101 S.Ct. 690; 66 L.Ed.2nd 621].) "Every fact leading up to the arrest should serve as a factor in the totality of the circumstances, > recognizing that the whole is often greater than the sum of the parts and that even seemingly innocent facts can suggest a crime is afoot." (Citing again District of Columbia v. Wesby, supra, 138 S.Ct. at 588.)

> The Court further criticized the appellate court's rejection of various factors merely because there might be some "innocent explanation" for them, noting that "the relevant inquiry is not whether particular conduct is 'innocent' or 'guilty,' but the degree of suspicion that attaches to particular types of noncriminal acts." Per the Court: "(T)he panel majority should have asked whether a reasonable officer could conclude—considering all of the surrounding circumstances, including the plausibility of the explanation itself—that there was a 'substantial chance of criminal activity.'" (Id., at p. 61; citing Illinois v. Gates (1983) 462 U.S. 213, 244, fn. 13 [103 S.Ct. 2317; 76 L.Ed.2nd 527].)

Shouting a profanity (i.e., "F__k you") at a police officer is not grounds for arresting the defendant for disturbing the peace or disorderly conduct (even though in the presence of women and children). The Court further held that defendant's profane shout was protected speech under the First Amendment. In addition, according to the trooper's affidavit, defendant's arrest was motivated in part by the content of the language in his shout at the trooper. Consequently, the court held that arresting him for the content of his speech constituted retaliation and would cause others to refrain from exercising their First Amendment rights in the future. The Court further held that the right to be free from retaliation was clearly established at the time of his arrest. Criticism of law enforcement officers, even with profanity, has been found to be protected speech. (Thurairajah v. City of Fort Smith (8th Cir. AR 2019) 925 F.3rd 979.)

> See also Wood v. Eubanks (6th Cir. 2022) 25 F.4th 414, where is was held that a subject wearing profanity (i.e., "F__k The Police") on his t-shirt and verbally using similar profanity against six officers who escorted him from the fairgrounds, was constitutionally (First Amendment) protected speech and insufficient to constitute "fighting words" under the state's disturbing the peace statutes (similar to California's Pen. Code § 415). Police officers are held to a higher standard than average citizens when confronted by insulting, abusive language.

In a trial for resisting, obstructing, or delaying a peace officer, in violation of P.C. § 148(a)(1), the jury was properly instructed that defendant could be found guilty if he refused to identify himself to a ranger who was writing a citation for violating a local ordinance making it an infraction to possess open containers of alcoholic beverages in a public place. When a person refuses to identify himself to an officer who is writing a citation to that person for an infraction offense, that refusal can be the basis for a finding that the person resisted, obstructed, or delayed an officer. (People v. Knoedler (2019) 44 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1.)

In a sex sting operation at South Dakota's annual Sturgis Motorcycle Rally, the Eighth Circuit Court of appeal upheld the trial court's determination that defendant was arrested on probable cause to believe that he was attempting to commit various sex trafficking crimes when he responded to an officer's posted advertisement entitled "Who Wants to Be Naughty" on a classified advertising website in its dating section under the category "women seeking men." In the resulting communications between the two, the officer posed as a 15-year-old female. Arrangements were made between the two to meet at a particular location. Defendant responded affirmatively to the officer's demand that defendant pay $200 for one hour of sexual intercourse, bring a condom, and not hurt her. Upon defendant showing up at the designated time and location with condoms and $200, the Court found this sufficient to establish the necessary probable cause to arrest defendant and to search his car incident to the arrest. (United States v. Slim (8th Cir. 2022) 34 F.4th 641.)

Whether officers had probable cause under the Fourth Amendment to make an arrest for child endangerment or public intoxication under Cal. Penal Code §§ 273a and 647(f) presented a jury question in a 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983 action. Although the video evidence did not establish the plaintiff was intoxicated, she did have unsealed alcohol containers in a vehicle and, as observed by one of the officers, smelled like alcohol. Although a reasonable jury could find probable cause was lacking, the officers were entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity because the law did not clearly establish the lack of probable cause. (Johnson v. Barr (9th Cir. 2023) 73 F.4th 644.)

Determination of Probable Cause by a Grand Jury:

"Generally, probable cause for an arrest 'may be satisfied by an indictment returned by a grand jury.' Lacy v. Cty. of Maricopa, 631 F. Supp. 2d 1183, 1194 (D. Ariz. 2008) (quoting Kalina v. Fletcher, 522 U.S. 118, 129, 118 S.Ct. 502, 139 L.Ed.2nd 471 (1997)); see also Palato v. Botello, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 184513, 2012 WL 7018239, at *2 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 11, 2013) ('The filing of a valid grand jury indictment establishes probable cause for plaintiff's arrest and vitiates his Fourth Amendment claims for wrongful arrest and false imprisonment.'). A grand jury indictment is prima facie evidence that the defendant has committed an offense. Bryant v. City of Goodyear, 2014 WL 2048013 (D. Ariz. May 19, 2014). However, '[t]his presumption of probable cause can be rebutted if officers improperly exerted pressure on the prosecutor, knowingly provided misinformation, concealed exculpatory evidence, "or otherwise engaged in wrongful or bad faith conduct that was actively instrumental in causing the initiation of legal proceedings."' (Id., quoting Awabdy v. City of Adelanto, 368 F.3rd 1062, 1067 (9th Cir. 2004))." (Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ, 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006.)

Finding no undue influence exerted upon the prosecutor in this case, the Court granted the defendant officer's summary judgment on plaintiff's allegations that he was arrested without probable cause. (Ibid.)

Judicial Determination of Probable Cause in Misdemeanor Custody Cases:

Pen. Code. § 991:

(a) If the defendant is in custody at the time he appears before the magistrate for arraignment and, if the public offense is a misdemeanor to which the defendant has pleaded not guilty, the magistrate, on motion of counsel for the defendant or the defendant, shall determine whether there is probable cause to believe that a public offense has been committed and that the defendant is guilty thereof.

(b) The determination of probable cause shall be made immediately unless the court grants a continuance for good cause not to exceed three court days.

(c) In determining the existence of probable cause, the magistrate shall consider any warrant of arrest with supporting affidavits, and the sworn complaint together with any documents or reports incorporated by reference thereto, which, if based on information and belief, state the basis for such information, or any other documents of similar reliability.

(d) If, after examining these documents, the court determines that there exists probable cause to believe that the defendant has committed the offense charged in the complaint, it shall set the matter for trial. If the court determines that no such probable cause exists, it shall dismiss the complaint and discharge the defendant.

(e) Within 15 days of the dismissal of a complaint pursuant to this section the prosecution may refile the complaint. A second dismissal pursuant to this section is a bar to any other prosecution for the same offense.

Case Law:

> On appeal of the dismissal of a misdemeanor complaint under P.C. § 991, the reviewing court need not determine whether the evidence is sufficient to convict the defendant. That is not the purpose of a section 991 hearing. The purpose of section 991 is only to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that a public offense has been committed by the defendant. (People v. Scott (1993) 20 Cal. App.4th Supp. 5.)
>
> This provision permits the trial court to dismiss individual charges from the complaint. (People v. McGowan (2015) 242 Cal.App.4th 377, as modified at 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 1095.)
>
> In a case in which defendant moved to dismiss a misdemeanor charge of carrying a dirk or dagger for lack of probable cause under P.C. § 991, arguing that the knife was recovered illegally, the appellate court concluded that suppression of illegally obtained evidence cannot be litigated on a motion to dismiss under § 991. The probable cause determination contemplated by § 991 does not include a determination that evidence was unlawfully obtained. The sole and exclusive means for a misdemeanor defendant to secure that determination is a noticed motion under P.C. § 1538.5. The only question for a trial court to answer on a defendant's § 991 motion is whether facts that have not yet been excluded by operation of a noticed motion under § 1538.5 exist sufficient to warrant a prudent person in believing that a public offense has been committed and that the defendant is guilty thereof. (Barajas v. Superior Court (2019) 40 Cal.App.5th 944; affirming the Appellate Department of the Superior Court's decision published at (2018) 30 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1.)

COVID-19 Executive Order Enforcement:

> The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal affirmed the district court's summary judgment in favor of Scottsdale Police Officer Christian Bailey and the City of Scottsdale in a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 action alleging constitutional violations arising from plaintiff's arrest and citation for violating a COVID-19 emergency executive order, which prohibited restaurants from offering on-site dining. Arizona Governor Ducey issued four COVID-19 executive orders between March 19, 2020, and June 29, 2020, that among other things prohibited on-site dining (EO-2020-09), included restaurants on a list of essential functions that could remain open during the pandemic (EO 2020-12), and required that notice and an opportunity to comply be given prior to any enforcement action (EO 2020-18). Plaintiff was the owner of Sushi Brokers, LLC, which operates a sushi restaurant in Scottsdale, Arizona. On April 11, 2020, officers cited and arrested plaintiff for violating Arizona Revised Statute ("A.R.S.") § 26-317, which makes it a misdemeanor to violate emergency executive orders. The charges were later dismissed. Plaintiff brought suit alleging, among other things, retaliatory arrest, in violation of the First Amendment, and false arrest, in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The Court first noted that both retaliatory and false arrest claims require showing the absence of probable cause. Here, given that officers had observed on-site dining at the restaurant and there were prior calls reporting violations, Officer Bailey had probable cause to arrest plaintiff under A.R.S. § 26-317 for violating an emergency order. The Court next rejected plaintiff's argument that that the warnings he received on March 27 and 28, 2020, did not qualify under EO 2020-18's notice requirement because they occurred prior to EO 2020-18's enactment. Holding that there was no constitutional violation, the panel noted that plaintiff was arrested for the exact same behavior for which he had received previous warnings. He had sufficient notice and opportunity to comply given the challenges presented by the COVID-19 pandemic. (Miller v. City of Scottsdale (9th Cir. 2023) 88 F.4th 800.)

Circumstances Affecting Probable Cause:

Mistaken Identity:

"In a case of mistaken identity, 'the question is whether the arresting officers had a good faith, reasonable belief that the arrestee was the subject of the warrant.' Rivera v. Cty. of Los Angeles 745 F.3rd 384, 389 (9th Cir. 2014); accord Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797, 802, 91 S.Ct. 1106, 28 L.Ed.2nd 484 (1971) ('[W]hen the police have probable cause to arrest one party, and when they reasonably mistake a second party for the first party, then the arrest of the second party is a valid arrest.' (internal quotation marks omitted)). The constitutionality of the arrest thus turns on the reasonableness of the deputies' mistake." (Sharp v. County of Orange (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 901, 910; finding plaintiff's arrest to be unreasonable, given the differences in the physical description between him and the man they were looking for, but finding the officers to be entitled to qualified immunity.

Mistaken Belief in the Existence of an Arrest Warrant:

Where defendant himself (a 16-year-old juvenile), who the officers knew to be on probation, told the officers that he believed there was an outstanding warrant for his arrest, "it was rational for the officers to believe defendant, arrest him, and detain him until they learned otherwise." (People v. Delgado (2018) 27 Cal.App.5th 1092, 1102-1104; finding that taking 84 minutes to learn that there was no outstanding arrest warrant was not unreasonable where there was nothing in the record to show that discovery of the lack of a warrant could have been made sooner.)

The "Collective Knowledge" Doctrine:

Probable cause can be established by the "collective knowledge" of other officers. The officer making a stop, search or arrest need not personally know all the precise information relied upon by other officers. (People v. Ramirez (1997) 59 Cal.App.4th 1548; United States v. Sandoval-Venegas (9th Cir. 2002) 292 F.3rd 1101; United States v. Butler (9th Cir. 1996) 74 F.3rd 916, 921; People v. Gomez (2004) 117 Cal.App.4th 531, 541; United States v. Mayo (9th Cir. 2005) 394 F.3rd 1271, 1276, fn. 7.)

> "[W]here law enforcement authorities are cooperating in an investigation . . . , the knowledge of one is presumed shared by all." (Illinois v. Andreas (1983) 463 U.S. 765, 722, fn. 5 [103 S.Ct. 3319; 77 L.Ed.2nd 1003].)
> "[W]hen police officers work together to build 'collective knowledge' of probable cause, the important question is not what each officer knew about probable cause, but how valid and reasonable the probable cause was that developed in the officers' collective knowledge." (People v. Gomez, supra, quoting People Ramirez, supra, at p. 1555.)

A law enforcement dispatcher's knowledge of specific facts not passed onto the officers in the field may also be considered as a part of the "collective knowledge" needed to substantiate a finding of a "reasonable suspicion" justifying a traffic stop. (United States v. Fernandez-Castillo (9th Cir. 2003) 324 F.3rd 1114, 1124.)

Information known to three separate officers, involving informant information from three informants of varying degrees of reliability, held to be sufficient to justify defendant's arrest and the impounding, and searching, of his vehicle even though the arresting officer, himself, did not have enough personal knowledge upon which to justify a finding of probable cause. (United States v. Jensen (9th Cir. 2005) 425 F.3rd 698.)

The collective knowledge doctrine is of two types: (1) When a number of law enforcement officers are all working together with bits and pieces of information spread out among the individual officers, but which when all added altogether, amounts to reasonable suspicion or probable cause. (2) When one or more officers with information amounting to reasonable suspicion or probable cause command a separate officer, who may know nothing about the nature of the investigation, to detain, arrest, and/or search. There is some difference of opinion as to whether the first category is sufficient unless there is shown to be some communication among the officers involved. The second category is universally accepted as coming within the rule. (United States v. Ramirez (9th Cir. 2007) 473 F.3rd 1026; narcotics officers commanding a patrol officer to make a traffic stop: The stop, detention, arrest and search all upheld.)

The "collective knowledge doctrine" does not apply unless (1) the separate law enforcement agents are working together in an investigation even though they may not have explicitly communicated to the other the facts that each has independently learned, or (2) unless one officer, with direct personal knowledge of all the facts necessary to give rise to a reasonable suspicion or probable cause, directs or requests another officer to conduct a stop, search, or arrest. Some cases suggest that for the first rule to apply, there must also have been some communication between the two agents. (United States v. Villasenor (9th Cir. 2010) 608 F.3rd 467, 475-476.)

See, however, United States v. Evans (Nev. 2015) 122 F.Supp.3rd 1027, at p. 1035, where a federal district court judge rejected the use of the collective knowledge doctrine to justify a prolonged traffic stop, citing no authority for why this theory might apply to the facts of this case (i.e., where a detective was working with a patrol deputy on a drug investigation).

The "collective knowledge doctrine" was held to apply to a traffic stop made by a patrol officer at the request of narcotics officers who were investigating defendant for selling drugs. Because the narcotics officers' knowledge of defendant's drug dealing was imputed to the patrol officer who made the stop, the officer had sufficient reasonable suspicion justifying an extra eleven minutes during the stop while he waited for backup and to run his drug-sniffing dog around the vehicle. (United States v. Jordan (4th Cir. 2020) 952 F.3rd 160.)

However, the collective knowledge doctrine does not apply where the prosecution fails to establish that the detaining officer had any information about some specific criminal activity. In People v. Chalak (2020) 48 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1, the prosecution failed to present any evidence that the detaining officer knew the person he detained, based upon a physical description, was suspected of committing an act of domestic violence. The prosecution failed to elicit from the officer reporting the alleged crime that he conveyed to the detaining officer that he had a reasonable suspicion or probable cause to believe that the person described was involved in criminal activity.

Upon being subjected to a parole wavier search by one officer, at the direction of that officer's training officer who, as the department gang specialist, was aware of defendant's parole status, the "collective knowledge doctrine" served to support the legality of the search despite the lack of any direct knowledge held by the searching officer. (United States v. Estrella (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 958, 961, 966, fn. 6.)

Evidence Within Reach of Multiple Suspects: Where evidence (e.g., contraband) is found in a vehicle within reach of more than one of the occupants, but no one admits ownership, who is subject to arrest?

Where a large amount of money is found rolled up in a vehicle's glove compartment, and five plastic glassine baggies of cocaine are found behind the center armrest of the backseat, with the armrest pushed up into the closed position to hide the contraband, such contraband being accessible to all the occupants of the vehicle, the arrest of all three subjects in the vehicle (driver, right front and rear seat passengers) was supported by probable cause. (Maryland v. Pringle (2003) 540 U.S. 366 [124 S.Ct. 795; 157 L.Ed.2nd 769].)

Officers had probable cause to arrest both the passenger and the driver for possession of a billy club seen resting against the driver's door. (People v. Vermouth (1971) 20 Cal. App.3rd 746, 756.)

Informing two suspects in a vehicle that they would both be arrested for possession of a concealed firearm, prompting a response from defendant that he'd "take the charge," was not the functional equivalent of an interrogation that required a Miranda admonishment. (United States v. Collins (6th Cir. 2012) 683 F.3rd 697, 701-703.)

Note: However, absent sufficient evidence to connect contraband found in the vehicle to one person or the other "beyond a reasonable doubt," the case is unlikely to be filed by a prosecutor.

Dissipation of Probable Cause or Reasonable Suspicion:

After receiving information about an apartment manager's 9-1-1 call regarding two black adult males, officers did not have probable cause to arrest three Samoan teenagers after it was determined almost immediately that a suspected gun was only a toy. At that point, any suspicion that the teenagers were engaged in a crime had dissipated. The officers, having detained numerous family members, many of them through the use of handcuffs, therefore violated the Fourth Amendment by continuing the seizure beyond that point, as well as the search of everyone present. They were also not entitled to qualified immunity for the warrantless entry and search of the family's apartment. (Sialoi v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2016) 823 F.3rd 1223, 1232-1233.)

"A traffic stop is reasonable at its inception if the detaining officer, at the very least, reasonably suspects the driver has violated the law." However, "[o]nce the purpose of the stop is satisfied and any underlying reasonable suspicion dispelled, the driver's detention generally must end without undue delay unless the officer has an objectively reasonable suspicion that illegal activity unrelated to the stop has occurred or the driver otherwise consents to the encounter." (Robinson v. City of San Diego (S.D. Cal. 2013) 954 F. Supp. 2nd 1010, 1019.)

Where an officer pulled the plaintiff over because he could not read the expiration date on the registration sticker on the back of the car—the expiration date appearing to have been covered in reflective tape—but when the officer approached on foot and saw that the reflective tape was a "new device used by the State of Colorado to prevent alteration of the sticker's expiration date" and that the registration was valid and not expired, there was no longer any justification for holding the driver. Nonetheless, the officer proceeded to question the vehicle occupants and to search the vehicle, ultimately arresting the occupants after finding a gun and what appeared to be crack cocaine in a duffel in the trunk of the vehicle. The court found that the arrest violated the Fourth Amendment because "[o]nce [the officer approached the vehicle on foot and observed that the temporary sticker was valid and not expired, the purpose of the stop was satisfied." Thus, the officer's further detention of the vehicle to question its occupants and request the driver's license and registration exceeded the scope of the stop's underlying justification. (United States v. McSwain (10th Cir. 1994) 29 F.3rd 558.)

Use of Hearsay:

Information used to establish probable cause need not be admissible in court: E.g., "hearsay," or even "double hearsay." (People v. Superior Court* (Bingham) (1979) 91 Cal.App.3rd 463, 469; see also Hart v. Parks (9th Cir. 2006) 450 F.3rd 1059, 1066-1067; People v. Suarez (2020) 10 Cal.5th 116, 153.)

Where a suspect is searched and arrested based solely on hearsay information received from witnesses—while maybe sufficient to stop and detain the suspect—must establish probable cause to believe that the suspect subsequently searched and arrested was doing sometime illegal. E.g.:

> The Ninth Circuit in a split 2-to-1 decision affirmed the district court's order granting defendant's motion to suppress evidence and statements obtained after his arrest, in a case that required the Court to determine whether there was probable cause to arrest defendant for displaying a weapon in a manner that "warrant[ed] alarm for the safety of other persons," per Wash. Rev. Code § 9.41.270(1). Defendant was arrested after two people separately reported that a man in a truck had displayed a firearm while asking them questions about an alleged kidnapping in the area. Defendant was contacted and immediately arrested based upon these witnesses' statements. A subsequent search of defendant's vehicle and person incident to that arrest resulted in the recovery of illegal firearms and a modified CO2 cartridge. He was charged in federal court with making and possessing a destructive device in violation of the National Firearms Act. In finding that the arrest and search was made without probable cause, the Court noted that Washington is an open carry state (i.e., it is presumptively legal to carry a firearm openly) although it is a misdemeanor to carry a concealed pistol without a license. Also, Washington is a "shall issue state," meaning that local law enforcement must issue a concealed weapons license if the applicant meets certain qualifications. The bare fact that defendant displayed a weapon, not being illegal and not indicative of the possibility that he might be illegally carrying a concealed firearm, did not supply the necessary probable cause because there is no evidence that defendant was carrying a concealed weapon. While defendant may have legally been detained for further investigation under the facts of this case, the information from the witnesses alone did not justify a conclusion that probable cause existed to believe that defendant was in illegal possession of a concealed firearm. Also, for the trial court to conclude that defendant did not display his firearm in a threatening manner, based upon the information supplied by the witnesses, was not clearly erroneous. (United States v. Willy (9th Cir. 2022) 40 F.4th 1074.)

An Officer's Expertise as an Element of Probable Cause:

The fact that the information available to police officers "gave rise to a variety of 'inferences,' some of which support (the suspect's) innocence," is irrelevant. "(O)fficers may 'draw on their own experiences and specialized training to make inferences from and deductions about the cumulative information available to them that might well elude an untrained person." (Hart v. Parks (9th Cir. 2006) 450 F.3rd 1059, 1067.)

"Police officers 'must be given some latitude in determining when to credit witnesses' denials and when to discount them, and we're not aware of any federal law . . . that indicates precisely where the line must be drawn.' (Citation)" "Probable cause arises when an officer has knowledge based on reasonably trustworthy information that the person arrested has committed a criminal offense. (Citation)" (McSherry v. City of Long Beach (9th Cir. 2009) 584 F.3rd 1129, 1135-1136.)

"(C)onduct meaningless 'to the untrained eye of an appellate judge . . . may have an entirely different significance to an experienced narcotics officer' like Agent Jones." (United States v. Iwai (9th Cir. 2019) 930 F.3rd 1141, 1145, quoting United States v. Hicks (9th Cir. 1985) 752 F.2nd 379, 384.)

In a case where the deceased son sued an officer for failing to recognize a medical condition, the Court held that to the extent the district court found that the officer's video (bodycam) evidence contradicted anything in the amended complaint, it rejected the son's conclusory allegations regarding whether the officers' conduct met the legal standard of a constitutional violation. In doing so, the district court acted within its discretion. The son's allegations suggested that the moving force behind the alleged constitutional violation against the detainee was not a failure to train, but the officers' failure to heed their training. The son did not show that the alleged unlawfulness of the officers' conduct was clearly established at the time they encountered the detainee. The son's argument concerning the deprivation of life claim had been waived. (J.K.J. v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2022) 42 F.4th 990.)

Conflicting Evidence:

The fact that if viewed in isolation, any single fact, independently, might not be enough to establish probable cause is unimportant. Probable cause is a determination made based upon "cumulative information" (often referred to as the "totality of the circumstances"). (Hart v. Parks (9th Cir. 2006) 450 F.3rd 1059, 1067.)

Probable cause to arrest and prosecute the plaintiff for assault and elder abuse was found where a police officer found an elderly and infirm man bleeding profusely from a head wound admittedly inflicted by the plaintiff who himself was without significant injuries. Also, the victim and his wife both told the officers at the scene that plaintiff had attacked him without provocation. The fact that the reporting officer began a romantic relationship with the plaintiff's wife after all of the evidence relating to the altercation had been collected and documented in official reports was irrelevant. His later misconduct does nothing to undermine the existence of probable cause that existed at the time of plaintiff's arrest. (Yousefian v. City of Glendale (9th Cir. 2015) 779 F.3rd 1010, 1014.)

> While exculpatory evidence that could negate probable cause cannot be ignored, or the fact that a criminal jury later determines that there was insufficient evidence to prove the case beyond a reasonable doubt, does not mean that an officer at the scene could not reasonably have concluded that probable cause to arrest the plaintiff existed at the time. (Id., at pp. 1014-1015.)

Also, the fact that it was the plaintiff who originally called the police to the scene of the altercation, and that he himself claimed to have been assaulted by the victim, did not overcome the other evidence establishing probable cause to believe that plaintiff had attacked the elderly victim. "(P)robable cause requires only that those 'facts and circumstances within the officer's knowledge are sufficient to warrant a prudent person to believe "that the suspect has committed . . . an offense."'" (Ibid., citing Barry v. Fowler (9th Cir. 1990) 902 F.2nd 770, 773; and Michigan v. DeFillippo (1979) 443 U.S. 31, 37 [99 S.Ct. 2627; 61 L.Ed.2nd 343].)

"(T)o focus on the noises (coming from within defendant's residence) in isolation from all other factors . . . is not a proper 'totality of the circumstances' analysis." (United States v. Iwai (9th Cir. 2019) 930 F.3rd 1141, 1145.)

"(E)ven in situations where 'no one event, considered in isolation, would be sufficient, the "succession of superficially innocent events [can proceed] to the point where a prudent man could say to himself that an innocent course of conduct was substantially less likely than a criminal one."'" (Id., fn. 1; quoting United States v. Bernard (9th Cir. 1979) 623 F.2nd 551, 560.)

A Suspect's Own Admissions:

The information used to establish probable cause may be from the defendant's own admissions which, without independent evidence of the corpus of the crime, will not be admissible in court. However, the likelihood of conviction is not relevant in establishing probable cause to arrest. (People v. Rios (1956) 46 Cal.2nd 297; defendant's admission that he had injected drugs two weeks earlier sufficient to establish probable cause for the past possession of a controlled substance. Search incident to the arrest was therefore lawful.)

Note: See "Searches with Probable Cause," under "Searches of Persons" (Chapter 11), below

Border Cases:

Probable cause was found where the defendant was in the presence of a commercial quantity of drugs while in a vehicle coming over the International Border from Mexico, defendant was the sole passenger (other than the driver), there was a strong odor of gasoline in the vehicle

(with the drugs being discovered in the gas tank), hiding drugs in a vehicle's gas tank was known as a common method used by drug smugglers, and the driver lied about his immigration status. (United States v. Carranza (9th Cir. 2002) 289 F.3rd 634.)

Probable cause found where defendant was the backseat passenger in a minivan in which a commercial quantity of marijuana was found, and defendant acted nervously and avoided eye contact with a Customs Inspector. (United States v. Hernandez (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 340.)

As the passenger in a vehicle crossing the U.S./Mexican border, ignoring a border inspector until another passenger was asked to move from a spot where contraband was later found to be hidden, at which time defendant attempted to distract the inspector by inviting him to a party, was sufficient to constitute probable cause for arrest as soon as the contraband was found. (United States v. Juvenile* (RRA-A) (9th Cir. 2000) 229 F.3rd 737, 743.)

See "Border Searches" (Chapter 18), below.

Indian Reservation Cases:

After seeing semiautomatic rifles and drugs in a truck parked on a public right-of-way within the Crow Reservation in the State of Montana, a Native American Tribe's police officer seized all contraband in plain view and took defendant, who was not a member of the Tribe, into custody and to the Reservation Police Department. The Supreme Court held that suppression of the evidence in subsequent federal criminal proceedings was not warranted because the tribal officer had authority to search and detain any person the officer believed might commit or had committed a crime on the Reservation, at least when that conduct threatened or had some direct effect on the health or welfare of the Tribe. The search of the car and detention of the defendant did not subject defendant to Tribal law, but only to state and federal laws that applied whether an individual was outside a reservation or on a state or federal highway within it. (United States v. Cooley (June 1, 2021) __ U.S. __ [141 S.Ct. 1638; 210 L.Ed.2nd 1].)

Because the cross-deputization agreement between the Assiniboine and Sioux Tribes of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation and the State of Montana was valid, a Montana state trooper was validly deputized to enforce tribal law, and he had jurisdiction to seize and search defendant's truck. Under that agreement, the state trooper was permitted to enforce tribal law, not just state law. Nothing in the Tribes' dependent status precluded them from entering into such an agreement with the State of Montana, nor did anything in federal law. The cross-deputization agreement was not a Special Law Enforcement Commission agreement under the Indian Law Enforcement Reform Act, 25 U.S.C.S. §§ 2801-2804. It was a compact between the Tribes and the State, and it neither deputized non-federal officers to enforce federal law nor deputized federal officers to enforce tribal law. (United States v. Fowler (9th Cir. 2022) 48 F.4th 1022.)

Retaliatory Arrests:

Arresting a person in retaliation for the defendant having made certain statements to the officer accusing the officer of being racially motivated, even where the officer had probable cause to make the arrest (but also had the option of releasing him on a citation), is a First Amendment violation of the defendant's freedom of speech, subjecting the officer to potential civil liability. (Ford v. City of Yakima (9th Cir. 2013) 706 F.3rd 1188, 1192-1196.)

See also "Civil Suits Based Upon an Alleged Retaliation Theory," under "Procedural Rules" (Chapter 2), above.
See also "In Retaliation for Engaging in Protected Speech," under "The Bill of Rights Protections" (Chapter 7), below.

Guilt by Association:

"'Mere propinquity to others independently suspected of criminal activity . . . does not, without more, give rise to probable cause.'" (United States v. Collins (9th Cir. 2005) 427 F.3rd 688, 691; quoting Ybarra v. Illinois (1979) 444 U.S. 85, 91 [100 S.Ct. 338; 62 L.Ed.2nd 238].)

Arrests in a Courthouse:

Civil Code § 43.54:

(a) A person shall not be subject to civil arrest in a courthouse while attending a court proceeding or having legal business in the courthouse.

(b) This section does not narrow, or in any way lessen, any existing common law privilege.

(c) This section does not apply to arrests made pursuant to a valid judicial warrant.

Note: The Legislative history of this bill (AB 668) provides that its purpose is to prevent arrests in courthouses by federal Immigration & Customs Enforcement (ICE) officers.

Code of Civ. Proc. § 177:

A judicial officer has the power "to prohibit activities that threaten access to state courthouses and court proceedings, and to prohibit interruption of judicial administration, including protecting the privilege from civil arrest at courthouses and court proceedings."

Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) Arrests in a State Court House:

Confirming the need for freely and fully functioning state courts, and in order to avoid chaos and intimidation throughout New York's judicial system, a federal district court judge held that an Immigration and Customs Enforcement's (ICE) policy of arresting people in state courthouses is illegal. (New York v. United States Immigration & Customs Enforcement (So. Dist. of N.Y., June 10, 2020) 2020 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101594.)

Additional Case Law:

Conceding that most other circuits have ruled that the mere passing of a counterfeit note (a $100 bill in this case), when coupled with an identification of the person who passed the note, furnishes probable cause to arrest the individual identified as passing the note (Citations at pg. 970, infra.), the Ninth Circuit declined to decide the issue, finding that whether or not the arrest was illegal, the arresting officers were entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability. (Rodis v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2009), 558 F.3rd 964; reversing its prior finding (at 499 F.3rd 1094.) that the officers lacked probable cause to make the arrest.)

Probable cause was found where the six-year-old victim, on two occasions, positively identified defendant as her attacker, and then a third time in court under oath. She also identified the defendant's father's car as the vehicle used. A crime lab analysis of semen taken from the victim could not eliminate defendant (pre-DNA). Also, defendant's modus operandi known to police from prior similar assaults matched. The fact that the victim's initial description of the assailant varied from how defendant actually appeared did not mean that the officer did not have probable cause to arrest defendant. (McSherry v. City of Long Beach (9th Cir. 2009) 584 F.3rd 1129, 1135.)

Issue*: Has a Person Been Arrested? Whether or not a person has been "arrested," (i.e., "seized,"), under the Fourth Amendment, is determined by considering whether, in view of all the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave and/or was about to go to jail. (See In re James D. (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 903, 913.)

> "The standard for determining whether a person is under arrest is not simply whether a person believes that he is free to leave, see United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 554, 64 L.Ed.2nd 497, 100 S. Ct. 1870 (1980), but rather whether a reasonable person would believe that he or she is being subjected to more than 'temporary detention occasioned by border-crossing formalities.' United States v. Butler, 249 F.3rd 1094, 1100 (9th Cir. 2001)." (United States v. Hernandez (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 430, 436; a border arrest and search case.)
>
> There was no arrest where Federal Bureau of Investigations (FBI) agents did not tell defendant that he had the right to refuse to accompany them to the FBI office, but neither did they tell him that he had to go. The agents used no tools of coercion to force defendant to go with them; i.e., they asked him if he would come in to talk because they were investigating cases, and he agreed to do so. Defendant was not in custody during the questioning until he confessed to the sexual assault and murder. In the time leading to the confession, a reasonable person in defendant's shoes would have thought that he or she could get up and go if declining to take part in further investigative questioning. (United States v. Redlightning (9th Cir. 2010) 624 F.3rd 1090.)

Consequences of an Unlawful Arrest:

> General Rule: An arrest, if done without probable cause, is a violation of the Fourth Amendment as an unlawful "seizure," and therefore unconstitutional. Any evidence seized as a direct product of an unlawful arrest is subject to possible suppression. (See below).
>
> Suppression of Resulting Evidence:
>
> > Any evidence recovered as a direct product of such an unlawful arrest will be subject to suppression. (See Smith v. Ohio (1990) 494 U.S. 541 [110 S.Ct. 1288; 108 L.Ed.2nd 464].)
> >
> > Confession obtained as the product of an illegal arrest is subject to suppression, absent attenuating circumstances. (Brown v. Illinois (1975) 422 U.S. 590, 603 [95 S.Ct. 2254; 45 L.Ed.2nd 416, 427]; Kaupp v. Texas (2003) 538 U.S. 626 [123 S.Ct. 1843; 155 L.Ed.2nd 814].)
> >
> > An unlawful arrest subjects the arresting officers to potential civil liability. (See "Civil Liability," under "Procedural Rules" (Chapter 2), above.

Effect of a Later Exoneration of an Arrestee Where Probable Cause to Arrest Existed:

> When probable cause exists, but the defendant is later exonerated, there is no basis for the officers' civil liability for an illegal arrest. "Probable cause arises when an officer has knowledge based on reasonably trustworthy information that the person arrested has committed a criminal offense. . . . 'Because many situations which confront officers in the course of executing their duties are more or less ambiguous, room must be allowed for some mistakes on their part.'" (McSherry v. City of Long Beach (2009) 584 F.3rd 1129, quoting, at p. 1135, Gausvik v. Perez (9th Cir. 2003) 345 F.3rd 813, 818.)
>
> An accusation of stalking that resulted in a warrantless arrest, where it turned out to be a false accusation, does not support a later civil claim of malicious prosecution alleged against the person making the accusation, even though the district attorney's office ultimately declines to prosecute. A cause of action for malicious prosecution cannot be premised on an arrest that does not result in formal charges, at least when the arrest is not pursuant to a warrant. (Van Audenhove v. Perry (2017) 11 Cal.App.5th 915.)

Effect of Conflicting Evidence on a Determination as to the Legality of an Arrest:

> The fact that it was the plaintiff who originally called the police to the scene of the altercation, and that he himself claimed to have been assaulted by the victim, did not overcome the other evidence establishing probable cause to believe that plaintiff had attacked the elderly victim. "(P)robable cause requires only that those 'facts and circumstances within the officer's knowledge are sufficient to warrant a prudent person to believe "that the suspect has committed . . . an offense."'" (Yousefian v. City of Glendale (9th Cir. 2015) 779 F.3rd 1010, 1014: citing Barry v. Fowler (9th Cir. 1990) 902 F.2nd 770, 773; and Michigan v. DeFillippo (1979) 443 U.S. 31, 37 [99 S.Ct. 2627; 61 L.Ed.2nd 343].)
>
> > "The absence of probable cause is a necessary element of (a 42 U.S.C.) § 1983 false arrest and malicious prosecution claims." (Yousefian v. City of Glendale, supra; citing Barry v. Fowler, supra; and Awabdy v. City of Adelanto (9th Cir.2004) 368 F.3rd 1062, 1066.)
>
> Also, while exculpatory evidence that could negate probable cause cannot be ignored, or the fact that a criminal jury later determines that there was insufficient evidence to prove the case beyond a reasonable doubt, does not mean that an officer at the scene could not reasonably have concluded that probable cause to arrest the plaintiff existed at the time. (Yousefian v. City of Glendale, supra, at pp. 1014-1015.)

An officer is entitled to qualified immunity from a civil allegation of unlawful arrest so long as at the time of the arrest (1) there was probable cause for the arrest, or (2) "it is reasonably arguable that there was probable cause for arrest—that is, whether reasonable officers could disagree as to the legality of the arrest such that the arresting officer is entitled to qualified immunity." (Rosenbaum v. Washoe County (9th Cir. 2011) 663 F.3rd 1071, 1076; finding that because no Nevada statute applied to the plaintiff's "scalping" of tickets to a fair, his arrest was unlawful and because no reasonable officer would have believed so, the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity.)

Exceptions to the Rule:

Abduction From Abroad:

"'The right to demand and obtain extradition of an accused criminal is created by treaty.' United States v. Van Cauwenberghe, 827 F.2nd 424, 428 (9th Cir. 1987) (quoting Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2nd 776, 782 (9th Cir. 1986)) . . . . The Treaty, effective January 25, 1980, imposes two requirements relevant to defendants' motions. ⁋ First, Article 17 of the Treaty incorporates the 'rule of specialty,' which precludes the requesting country from prosecuting a defendant for any offense other than that for which the surrendering country consented to extradite, unless surrendering country approves. See United States v. Iribe, 564 F.3rd 1155, 1158 (9th Cir. 2009). Article 17 states: 'A person extradited under the present Treaty shall not be detained, tried or punished in the territory of the requesting Party for an offense other than that for which extradition has been granted nor be extradited by that Party to a third State,' absent certain exceptions not relevant here. ⁋ Second, Article 2 incorporates the principle of 'dual criminality,' that 'an accused person can be extradited only if the conduct complained of is considered criminal by the jurisprudence or under the laws of both the requesting and requested nations.' Quinn, 783 F.2nd at 783. Article 2(1) provides that '[e]xtradition shall take place, subject to this Treaty, for willful acts which fall within any of the clauses of the Appendix and are punishable in accordance with the laws of both Contracting Parties by deprivation of liberty the maximum of which shall not be less than one year.' The Appendix to the Treaty lists 31 categories of offenses, including murder and robbery. Article 2(3) provides that '[e]xtradition shall also be granted for willful acts which, although not being included in the Appendix, are punishable, in accordance with the federal laws of both Contracting Parties, by a deprivation of liberty the maximum of which shall not be less than one year.' ¶ We 'defer to a surrendering sovereign's reasonable determination that the offense in question is extraditable.' United States v. Saccoccia, 58 F.3rd 754, 766 (1st Cir. 1995); see also Van Cauwenberghe, 827 F.2nd at 429 (courts should accord 'proper deference' to 'a surrendering country's decision as to whether a particular offense comes within a treaty's extradition provision'). But we review de novo the 'district court's decision that an offense is an extraditable crime.' Van Cauwenberghe, 827 F.2nd at 428. We likewise review de novo the district court's '[i]nterpretation of an extradition treaty, including whether the doctrines of dual criminality and specialty are satisfied.' United States v. Anderson, 472 F.3rd 662, 666 (9th Cir. 2006)." (United States v. Soto-Barraza (9th Cir. 2020) 2020 U.S. App. LEXIS 1742; unpublished]; where it was held that because Mexico elected to extradite defendants on all charges listed in the indictment, the Extradition Treaty between the United Mexican States and the United States of America's principles of specialty and dual criminality were satisfied, and defendants were properly extradited.)

However, it has also been held: "(T)he manner by which a defendant is brought to trial does not affect the government's ability to try him." (United States v. Matta-Ballesteros (9th Cir. 1995) 71 F.3rd 754, 762.)

"(T)he means used to bring a criminal defendant before a court do not deprive that court of personal jurisdiction over the defendant." Prosecution of a defendant is not precluded merely because a defendant is abducted abroad for the purpose of prosecution, even if done in violation of an extradition treaty, such as when U.S. law enforcement agents forcibly abduct a foreign national in Mexico and bring him to the United States for prosecution. (United States v. Anderson (9th Cir. 2006) 472 F.3rd 662, 666; citing United States v. Alvarez-Machain (1992) 504 U.S. 655, 661-662 [112 S.Ct. 2188; 119 L.Ed.2nd 441; Ker v. Illinois (1886) 119 U.S. 436 [7 S.Ct; 225; 30 L.Ed.421]; Frisbie v. Collins (1952) 342 U.S. 519 [72 S.Ct. 509; 96 L.Ed. 541]; see also People v. Salcido (2008) 44 Cal.4th 93, 119-126.)

> Exceptions: Where (1) the transfer of the defendant from a foreign country was done in violation of the terms of an applicable extradition treaty; or (2) the government engaged in misconduct of the most shocking and outrageous kind to obtain the defendant's presence. (United States v. Anderson, supra.)

Because defendant had not been extradited, his argument that his removal from Panama to the United States was not in compliance with the Extradition Treaty, U.S.-Pan., May 25, 1904, 34 Stat. 2851 failed. Moreover, the treaty did not prohibit the use of means besides extradition to obtain a defendant's presence in the United States. The Government had not engaged in shocking and outrageous conduct so as to warrant dismissal of the criminal case against him. The lies that an embassy official told Panamanian officials came after Panama had already decided to cooperate in returning defendant to the United States. Moreover, defendant was deported after his passport was revoked. The trial court properly denied dismissal based on its supervisory powers. There was no evidence that defendant's right to counsel was violated, and he had not developed his argument that international law was violated. Finally, even assuming the indictment process was deficient for its reliance on unlawfully obtained evidence, that deficiency was cured when defendant was convicted by a jury after a trial that excluded all of the suppressed evidence. (United States v. Struckman (9th Cir. 2010) 611 F.3rd 560, 569-575.)

In Violation of a State Statute:

Evidence will not be suppressed when an arrest is in violation of a statute only (e.g., misdemeanor arrest not in the officer's presence), not involving a constitutional violation, and where the statute violated does not specifically mandate suppression of the resulting evidence. (People v. Donaldson (1995) 36 Cal.App.4th 532; People v. Trapane (1991) 1 Cal.App.4th Supp. 10; People v. McKay (2002) 27 Cal.4th 601, 607-619, a violation of V.C. § 21650.1 (riding a bicycle in the wrong direction); and People v. Gomez (2004) 117 Cal.App.4th 531, 538-539, seat belt violation, citing Atwater v. City of Lago Vista (2001) 532 U.S. 318 [121 S.Ct. 1536; 149 L.Ed.2nd 549] see also People v. Gallardo (2005) 130 Cal.App.4th 234, 239, fn. 1; People v. Bennett (2011) 197 Cal.App.4th 907, 918.)

A violation by a police officer of a state statute, such statute limiting the officer's right to make a custodial arrest or a search, so long as not also in violation of the Fourth Amendment, does not result in the suppression of the resulting evidence unless mandated by the terms of the statute. While a state is empowered to enact more restrictive search and seizure rules, violation of those rules that are not also a Fourth Amendment violation, does not invoke the Fourth Amendment's exclusionary rule. (Virginia v. Moore (2008) 553 U.S. 164 [128 S.Ct. 1598; 170 L.Ed.2nd 559]; People v. Xinos (2011) 192 Cal.App.4th 637, 653.)

However, "police may not use probable cause for a traffic violation to justify an arrest for an unrelated offense where, under the facts known to police, they have no probable cause supporting the unrelated offense." (People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 765; ruling that just because officers could have arrested defendant for speeding, doesn't mean that that fact justifies an arrest for some other bookable (i.e., a felony) offense for which there was no probable cause. Consent to search obtained without probable cause to justify the arrest for a felony was held to be invalid.)

Prosecutions in Federal Court:

While a state may impose stricter standards on law enforcement in interpreting its own state constitution (i.e., "independent state grounds"), a prosecution in federal court is guided by the federal interpretation of the Fourth Amendment and is not required to use the state's stricter standards. (United States v. Brobst (9th Cir. 2009) 558 F.3rd 982, 989-991, 997.)

California's Exclusionary Rule; Proposition 8:

Cal. Const., Art I, § 28(d) (subsequently redesignated as section 28(f)(2)), the "Truth in Evidence" provisions of Proposition 8 (passed in June, 1982), abrogated California's "independent state grounds" theory of exclusion, leaving the United States Constitution and its amendments as the sole basis for imposing an "Exclusionary Rule" on the admissibility of evidence. (In re Lance W. (1985) 37 Cal.3rd 873; People v. Gutierrez (1984) 163 Cal.App.3rd 332, 334.)

Until passage of Proposition 8, California Courts were obligated to follows California's rules that in some circumstances may (and lawfully were allowed to) have been stricter than the federal standards. (See American Academy of Pediatrics v. Lungren (1997) 16 Cal.4th 307, 327-328; Raven v. Deukmejian (1990) 52 Cal.3rd 336. 353.)

Since passage of Proposition 8, California state courts now determine the reasonableness of a search or seizure by federal constitutional standards. (People v. Schmitz (2012) 55 Cal.4th 909, 916; People v. Steele (2016) 246 Cal.App.4th 1110, 1114-1115.)

It is "doubtful," however, whether Proposition 8's "truth-in-evidence provision applies where the requested remedy is not suppression of evidence, but dismissal of all charges based on the state's violation of a defendant's (Sixth Amendment, speedy trial, delay in filing charges) due process rights." (People v. Lazarus (2015) 238 Cal.App. 4th 734, 756.)

Statutory Elements of an Arrest:

Pen. Code § 834: The arrested person must be taken into custody in a case and in the manner authorized by law.

Pen. Code § 835: The arrest may be made by actual restraint of the person or the arrested person's submission to authority.

"A seizure occurs when there is 'either physical force . . . or, where that is absent, submission to the assertion of authority.'" (Italics in original; Hill v. City of Fountain Valley (9th Cir. 2023) 70 F.4th 507, 514; quoting California v. Hodari D. (1991) 499 U.S. 621, 626 [111 S.Ct. 1547; 113 L.Ed.2nd 690].)

"(T)he officer's show of authority must cause the plaintiff's submission." (Ibid.; citing California v. Hodari D., supra, at p. 596, which in turn cites Brower v. Inyo County (1989) 489 U.S. 593, 596 [109 S.Ct. 1378; 103 L.Ed.2nd 628].)

In Hill, plaintiffs were not arrested in that they were never taken into custody and never submitted to the officers' authority. (Pgs. 514-515.)

Legal Authority for Making an Arrests*:

Peace Officer:

Pen. Code § 830: Peace Officer Defined: "Any person who comes within the provisions of this chapter and who otherwise meets all standards imposed by law on a peace officer is a peace officer, and notwithstanding any other provision of law, no person other than those designated in this chapter is a peace officer."

Pen. Code § 830.1: Peace Officer Authority:

(a) Any sheriff, undersheriff, or deputy sheriff, employed in that capacity, of a county, any chief of police of a city or chief, director, or chief executive officer of a consolidated municipal public safety agency that performs police functions, any police officer, employed in that capacity and appointed by the chief of police or chief, director, or chief executive of a public safety agency, of a city, any chief of police, or police officer of a district, including police officers of the San Diego Unified Port District Harbor Police, authorized by statute to maintain a police department, any marshal or deputy marshal of a superior court or county, any port warden or port police officer of the Harbor Department of the City of Los Angeles, or any inspector or investigator employed in that capacity in the office of a district attorney, is a peace officer. The authority of these peace officers extends to any place in the state, as follows:

(1) As to any public offense committed or which there is probable cause to believe has been committed within the political subdivision that employs the peace officer or in which the peace officer serves.

(2) Where the peace officer has the prior consent of the chief of police or chief, director, or chief executive officer of a consolidated municipal public safety agency, or person authorized by him or her to give consent, if the place is within a city, or of the sheriff, or person authorized by him or her to give consent, if the place is within a county.

(3) As to any public offense committed or which there is probable cause to believe has been committed in the peace officer's presence, and with respect to which there is immediate danger to person or property, or of the escape of the perpetrator of the offense.

(b) The Attorney General and special agents and investigators of the Department of Justice are peace officers, and those assistant chiefs, deputy chiefs, chiefs, deputy directors, and division directors designated as peace officers by the Attorney General are peace officers. The authority of these peace officers extends to any place in the state where a public offense has been committed or where there is probable cause to believe one has been committed.

(c) A deputy sheriff of the County of Los Angeles, and a deputy sheriff of the Counties of Butte, Calaveras, Colusa, Del Norte, Glenn, Humboldt, Imperial, Inyo, Kern, Kings, Lake, Lassen, Madera, Mariposa, Mendocino, Merced, Mono, Plumas, Riverside, San Benito, San Diego, San Luis Obispo, San Mateo, Santa Barbara, Santa Clara, Shasta, Siskiyou, Solano, Sonoma, Stanislaus, Sutter, Tehama, Trinity, Tulare, Tuolumne, and Yuba who is employed to perform duties exclusively or initially relating to custodial assignments with responsibilities for maintaining the operations of county custodial facilities, including the custody, care, supervision, security, movement, and transportation of inmates, is a peace officer whose authority extends to any place in the state only while engaged in the performance of the duties of the officer's respective employment and for the purpose of carrying out the primary function of employment relating to the officer's custodial assignments, or when performing other law enforcement duties directed by the officer's employing agency during a local state of emergency.

Case Law:

> Because the cross-deputization agreement between the Assiniboine and Sioux Tribes of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation and the State of Montana was valid, a Montana state trooper was validly deputized to enforce tribal law, and he had jurisdiction to seize and search defendant's truck. Under that agreement, the state trooper was permitted to enforce tribal law, not just state law. Nothing in the Tribes' dependent status precluded them from entering into such an agreement with the State of Montana, nor did anything in federal law. The cross-deputization agreement was not a Special Law Enforcement Commission agreement under the Indian Law Enforcement Reform Act, 25 U.S.C.S. §§ 2801-2804. It was a compact between the Tribes and the State, and it neither deputized non-federal officers to enforce federal law nor deputized federal officers to enforce tribal law. (United States v. Fowler (9th Cir. 2022) 48 F.4th 1022.)

As a matter of law based on undisputed evidence, the victim of an assault was working as a peace officer at the time of the incident because he was employed as a deputy sheriff by San Bernardino County. The Legislature added a new category of custodial deputy sheriff with limited powers to the definition of a peace officer when it enacted subd. (c) of Pen. Code § 830.1, but it did not intend to subtract from the category of peace officers previously defined in subd. (a). (People v. Orosco (2022) 82 Cal.App.5th 348, 355-357.)

(e) Persons regularly employed as inspectors, supervisors, or security officers for transit districts, as defined in Section 99213 of the Public Utilities Code, if the district has concluded a memorandum of understanding permitting the exercise of that authority, with, as applicable, the sheriff, the chief of police, or the Department of the California Highway Patrol within whose jurisdiction the district lies. Transportation investigators authorized by this section shall not be deemed "peace officers" for purposes of Sections 241 and 243.

An illegal dumping enforcement officer or code enforcement officer may also be a person who is not regularly employed by a city, county, or city and county, but who has met all training requirements and is directly supervised by a regularly employed illegal dumping enforcement officer or code enforcement officer conducting illegal dumping enforcement. Har. & Nav. Code § 663: Peace Officer, Defined:

A "peace officer" is defined as "every peace officer of this state or of any city, county, city and county, or other political subdivision of the state . . .", providing such officers authority to "enforce this chapter and any regulations adopted by the department pursuant to this chapter and in the exercise of that duty shall have the authority to stop and board any vessel subject to this chapter, where the peace officer has probable cause to believe that a violation of state law or regulations or local ordinance exists."

Case Law:

A person who lacks the legislatively set qualifications to be a county sheriff may not run for that office. In disqualifying under Elec. Code § 13.5 a candidate who lacked the necessary experience to run for county sheriff under Gov't. Code §§ 24004.3 & 24009(a), the county clerk properly declined to consider constitutional arguments because Cal. Const., art. III, § 3.5(a), prohibited administrative declarations of unconstitutionality. A challenge to the Legislature's power to set qualifications lacked merit because Cal. Const., art. XI, § 1(b), expressly conferred upon the Legislature the power to set candidacy requirements for the elected office of county sheriff. A First Amendment free speech claim failed because the state had a strong interest in ensuring officeholder qualifications. Also, seeking writ relief after ballots were printed, which showed lack of vigilance under Civ. Code § 3527, supported a laches finding. (Boyer v. County of Ventura (2019) 33 Cal.App.5th 49.)

Arrests by a Peace Officer:

Pen. Code §§ 834, 836: When Arrests May be Made: A peace officer "may" make an arrest under the following circumstances:

- Pursuant to an arrest warrant; or
- Whenever the officer has reasonable (or probable) cause to believe the suspect has committed a crime; and
- Whenever the officer has reasonable (or probable) cause to believe a crime has in fact been committed.

Case Law:

"Warrantless arrests are lawful if there is 'probable cause to believe that the arrestee has committed, or is committing, an offense.'" (Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ, 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006; quoting Torres v. City of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2008) 548 F.3rd 1197, 1207, fn. 7.)

Only "reasonable" or "probable" cause is needed: The fact that the officer may be mistaken as to defendant's guilt, or that a crime even occurred, is irrelevant so long as the arrest is made with probable cause to believe he is guilty and that a crime occurred. Probable cause allows for an officer's reasonable mistake. It only means that he or she is "probably" right, or in effect, having more evidence for than against. (Ex Parte Souza (1923) 65 Cal.App. 9.)

The terms "reasonable" and "probable" cause are used interchangeably in both the codes (See P.C. § 995(a)(1)(B)) and case law, but (when properly used) mean the same thing. "(R)easonable cause"—a synonym for "probable cause . . . ." (Heien v. North Carolina ((2014) 574 U.S. 54, 62 [135 S.Ct. 530; 190 L.Ed.2nd 475, 483].)

The use of the word "may" in the statute indicates that the officer is under no obligation to make an arrest. It is a matter of discretion whether or not, despite the existence of "probable cause," an arrest will be made. An officer is not generally (absent a command to do so in a particular, applicable statute) required to arrest an individual despite the officer's determination that an arrest could legally be made. (Michenfelder v. City of Torrance (1972) 28 Cal.App.3rd 202, 206-207; Tomlinson v. Pierce (1960) 178 Cal.app.2nd 112, 116.)

See People v. Kenney (2023) 88 Cal.App.5th 516, dealing with the arrest of an individual for violating a temporary domestic violence restraining order (DVRO). Per the Court: "Section 836 authorizes a peace officer to arrest a person who has violated a DVRO where the officer 'has probable cause to believe that the person against whom the order is issued has notice of the order.' (§ 836, subd. (c)(1).) Under subdivision (c)(2) of section 836, a person who has not been served with a DVRO is nevertheless 'deemed to have notice of the order' if 'informed by a peace office[r] of the contents of the protective order.'" The Court held that when the officers told the defendant through his closed, locked bedroom door, that he had been given the necessary notice of the DVRO, and upon refusing to leave the premises (i.e., his own home), he violated P.C. § 148(a); resisting an officer acting in the performance of this duty. Per the Court: "The obvious purpose of the notice requirement in section 836 is to afford the restrained person a meaningful opportunity at the scene to conform his or her conduct to law." (Pg. 522.) Defendant here was given that opportunity, but refused to comply, putting him in violation of the terms of the DVRO.

> The Court further noted that there were other requirements imposed on defendant (i.e., a hearing date in 21 days and an order to stay away from his mother's grandson), which "(a)t some point, (he) needed to be informed of . . . . But given the volatile events unfolding at (his mother's home), that could wait." (Ibid.)

Note: "Reasonable cause" and "reasonable suspicion" (i.e., the standard of proof for a detention) do not mean the same thing and are not to be confused.

Pen. Code § 836: Arrests by a Peace Officer With or Without Warrants; Domestic Violence; Noncompliance with Protective Orders; Carrying of a Concealed Firearms:

(a) A peace officer may arrest a person in obedience to a warrant, or, pursuant to the authority granted to him or her by Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2, without a warrant, may arrest a person whenever any of the following circumstances occur:

(1) The officer has probable cause to believe that the person to be arrested has committed a public offense in the officer's presence.

(2) The person arrested has committed a felony, although not in the officer's presence.

(3) The officer has probable cause to believe that the person to be arrested has committed a felony, whether or not a felony, in fact, has been committed.

(b) Any time a peace officer is called out on a domestic violence call, it shall be mandatory that the officer make a good faith effort to inform the victim of his or her right to make a citizen's arrest, unless the peace officer makes an arrest for a violation of paragraph (1) of subdivision (e) of Section 243 or 273.5. This information shall include advising the victim how to safely execute the arrest.

(1) When a peace officer is responding to a call alleging a violation of a domestic violence protective or restraining order issued under Section 527.6 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the Family Code, Section 136.2, 646.91, or paragraph (2) of subdivision (a) of Section 1203.097 of this code, Section 213.5 or 15657.03 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, or of a domestic violence protective or restraining order issued by the court of another state, tribe, or territory and the peace officer has probable cause to believe that the person against whom the order is issued has notice of the order and has committed an act in violation of the order, the officer shall, consistent with subdivision (b) of Section 13701, make a lawful arrest of the person without a warrant and take that person into custody whether or not the violation occurred in the presence of the arresting officer. The officer shall, as soon as possible after the arrest, confirm with the appropriate authorities or the Domestic Violence Protection Order Registry maintained pursuant to Section 6380 of the Family Code that a true copy of the protective order has been registered, unless the victim provides the officer with a copy of the protective order.

> See People v. Kenney (2023) 88 Cal.App.5th 516; dealing with the arrest of an individual for violating a temporary domestic violence restraining order (DVRO), where defendant was given notice of the order at the scene, and then arrested when he refused to comply.

(2) The person against whom a protective order has been issued shall be deemed to have notice of the order if the victim presents to the officer proof of service of the order, the officer confirms with the appropriate authorities that a true copy of the proof of service is on file, or the person against whom the protective order was issued was present at the protective order hearing or was informed by a peace officer of the contents of the protective order.

(3) In situations where mutual protective orders have been issued under Division 10 (commencing with Section 6200) of the Family Code, liability for arrest under this subdivision applies only to those persons who are reasonably believed to have been the dominant aggressor. In those situations, prior to making an arrest under this subdivision, the peace officer shall make reasonable efforts to identify, and may arrest, the dominant aggressor involved in the incident. The dominant aggressor is the person determined to be the most significant, rather than the first, aggressor. In identifying the dominant aggressor, an officer shall consider (A) the intent of the law to protect victims of domestic violence from continuing abuse, (B) the threats creating fear of physical injury, (C) the history of domestic violence between the persons involved, and (D) whether either person involved acted in self-defense.

(d) Notwithstanding paragraph (1) of subdivision (a), if a suspect commits an assault or battery upon a current or former spouse, fiancé, fiancée, a current or former cohabitant as defined in Section 6209 of the Family Code, a person with whom the suspect currently is having or has previously had an engagement or dating relationship, as defined in paragraph (10) of subdivision (f) of Section 243, a person with whom the suspect has parented a child, or is presumed to have parented a child pursuant to the Uniform Parentage Act (Part 3 (commencing with Section 7600) of Division 12 of the Family Code), a child of the suspect, a child whose parentage by the suspect is the subject of an action under the Uniform Parentage Act, a child of a person in one of the above categories, any other person related to the suspect by consanguinity or affinity within the second degree, or any person who is 65 years of age or older and who is related to the suspect by blood or legal guardianship, a peace officer may arrest the suspect without a warrant where both of the following circumstances apply:

(1) The peace officer has probable cause to believe that the person to be arrested has committed the assault or battery, whether or not it has in fact been committed.

(2) The peace officer makes the arrest as soon as probable cause arises to believe that the person to be arrested has committed the assault or battery, whether or not it has in fact been committed.

(e) In addition to the authority to make an arrest without a warrant pursuant to paragraphs (1) and (3) of subdivision (a), a peace officer may, without a warrant, arrest a person for a violation of Section 25400 when all of the following apply:

(1) The officer has reasonable cause to believe that the person to be arrested has committed the violation of Section 25400.

(2) The violation of Section 25400 occurred within an airport, as defined in Section 21013 of the Public Utilities Code, in an area to which access is controlled by the inspection of persons and property.

(3) The peace officer makes the arrest as soon as reasonable cause arises to believe that the person to be arrested has committed the violation of Section 25400.

Pen. Code §§ 150, 1550: "Posse Comitatus" (Repealed; SB 192): Commanding Able-Bodied Individuals to Assist Law Enforcement:

Note: Both of the above provisions were repealed effective January 1, 2020, and are no longer enforceable.

Pen. Code § 150 provided that a uniformed peace officer, or any peace officer described in P.C. §§ 830.1, 830.2(a), (b), (c), (d), (e), or (f), or 830.33(a), had authority to command any "able-bodied" individual over the age of 18 to assist in an arrest.

Pen. Code § 1550 said that "(e)very peace officer or other person empowered to make the arrest hereunder shall have the same authority, in arresting the accused, to command assistance therefor as the persons designated in Section 150. Failure or refusal to render that assistance is a violation of Section 150."

Refusing such a command was an infraction, punishable by a fine of from $50 to $1,000.

In a Domestic Violence Case (see Pen. Code §§ 6200 et seq. and 13700 et seq.), a peace officer should be aware of the following:

- If a peace officer makes an arrest for a violation of Pen. Code § 243(e)(1) (domestic violence battery), it is no longer mandatory that the officer make a good faith effort to inform the victim of his or her right to make a citizen's arrest. (Pen. Code §§ 243(e)(5) & 836(b))

- Also, if a peace officer makes an arrest for a violation of Pen. Code § 273.5(a) (domestic violence involving corporal injury), it is no longer mandatory that the officer make a good faith effort to inform the victim of his or her right to make a citizen's arrest. (Pen. Code §§ 273.5(j) & 836(b))

- When responding to a situation involving the violation of a domestic violence restraining or protective order (per Fam. Code §§ 2040 et seq., 6200 et seq., or 7700 et seq.), or of a protective order issued pursuant to Pen. Code § 136.2 (Victim or Witness Intimidation), the peace officer him or herself must, absent exigent circumstances, make the arrest if, under the circumstances, it is lawful to do so. (Pen. Code §§ 836(c)(1), 13701(b))

  (See "Misdemeanor 'In The Presence' Requirement," below.)

  Note: The defendant need not be physically in the jurisdiction (i.e., California) to violate a domestic violence restraining order (now entitled a "California Restraining and Protective Order"). (See Hogue v. Hogue (2017) 16 Cal.App.5th 833; respondent (i.e., defendant) sent a faked suicide video from Georgia to plaintiff in California via social media, triggering the legal authority of the court to issue a restraining order pursuant to Fam. Code §§ 6200 et seq.)

- Criminal and civil protective orders may coexist, and the issuance of one does not bar the other. Appellant wife, who filed a request for a domestic violence restraining order (DVRO) (now entitled a "California Restraining and Protective Order") against her husband under the Domestic Violence Prevention Act, per Fam. Code §§ 6200 et seq., was correct in her assertion that the existence of a criminal protective order is not a bar to the issuance of a DVRO. The trial court erred by summarily denying the wife's DVRO request on the basis that a criminal protective order was already in place, and if the parties wanted a protective order with different terms, they were required to have the criminal court change its order. (Lugo v. Corona (2019) 35 Cal.App.5th 865.)

  Note: California's Family and Penal Codes provide two slightly different definitions of "domestic violence:"

  Fam. Code § 6211: "Domestic violence" is abuse perpetrated against any of the following persons:

  (a) A spouse or former spouse.
  (b) A cohabitant or former cohabitant, as defined in Section 6209.
  (c) A person with whom the respondent is having or has had a dating or engagement relationship. (See Fam. Code § 6210)

(d) A person with whom the respondent has had a child, where the presumption applies that the male parent is the father of the child of the female parent under the Uniform Parentage Act (Part 3 (commencing with Section 7600) of Division 12).
(e) A child of a party or a child who is the subject of an action under the Uniform Parentage Act, where the presumption applies that the male parent is the father of the child to be protected.
(f) Any other person related by consanguinity or affinity within the second degree. (See Fam. Code § 6205)

Note: "Abuse" "for purposes of this act" is defined in Fam. Code § 6203(a) as:

(1) To intentionally or recklessly cause or attempt to cause bodily injury.
(2) Sexual assault.
(3) To place a person in reasonable apprehension of imminent serious bodily injury to that person or to another.
(4) To engage in any behavior that has been or could be enjoined pursuant to Section 6320.

Pursuant to subd. (b): Abuse is not limited to the actual infliction of physical injury or assault.

Pen. Code § 13700(b): "Domestic violence" means abuse committed against an adult or a minor who is a spouse, former spouse, cohabitant, former cohabitant, or person with whom the suspect has had a child or is having or has had a dating or engagement relationship. For purposes of this subdivision, "cohabitant" means two unrelated adult persons living together for a substantial period of time, resulting in some permanency of relationship. Factors that may determine whether persons are cohabiting include, but are not limited to, (1) sexual relations between the parties while sharing the same living quarters, (2) sharing of income or expenses, (3) joint use or ownership of property, (4) whether the parties hold themselves out as spouses, (5) the continuity of the relationship, and (6) the length of the relationship.

Arrests by a Private Person:

Pen. Code § 490.5(f); Merchant, Library Employee or Theater Owner:

See Pen. Code § 490.5(f); Merchant, Library Employee or Theater Owner, under "Detentions" (Chapter 4), above.

Pen. Code § 490.6(a); Amusement Park Employees:

See Pen. Code § 490.6(a); "Amusement Parks," under "Detentions" (Chapter 4), above.

Pen. Code § 837: Arrests by Private Persons:

A private person may arrest another:

1. For a public offense committed or attempted in his presence.

2. When the person arrested has committed a felony, although not in his presence.

3. When a felony has been in fact committed, and he has reasonable cause for believing the person arrested to have committed it.

Note: Per the above, while a private person may be mistaken as to who committed a particular crime, there is no room for error as to whether a crime actually occurred.

Pen. Code § 839; Summoning Others to Assist: Private persons may summon others to assist in an arrest. However, there is no penalty for a person refusing to help.

A citizen in whose presence a misdemeanor has been attempted or committed may effect a citizen's arrest (Pen. C. § 837, subd. 1), and in so doing may both summon the police to his aid (Pen. C. § 839), and delegate to police the physical act of taking the offender into custody. (People v. Johnson (1981) 123 Cal.App.3rd 495.)

Pen. Code § 847; Disposition of Arrestee: A private person making an arrest must, without unnecessary delay, take the person arrested before a magistrate or deliver him or her to a peace officer.

The provision that a peace officer commits a felony should he or she refuse to take a subject who was arrested by a private citizen, even when the officer determines that the arrest was made without probable cause (Pen. Code § 142), was amended with the addition of subd. (c) which states that; "This section shall not apply to arrests made pursuant to Section 837;" i.e., a private person's arrest.

Law prior to enactment of subd. (c): Although taking a citizen's arrestee when not supported by probable cause, as it was widely believed Pen. Code § 142 as previously written required, would not subject the officer to any civil liability in state court (Kinney v. County of Contra Costa (1970) 8 Cal.App.3rd 761, 767-769; Hamburg v. Wal-Mart Stores (2004) 116 Cal.App.4th 497, 503-504.), the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal was of the opinion that the officer in such a situation would be subject to federal civil liability. (Arpin v. Santa Clara Valley Transportation Agency (9th Cir. 2001) 261 F.3rd 912, 924-925.) The addition of subdivision (c), eliminating the requirement that an officer accept a prisoner arrested by a private citizen, avoids the dilemma of incurring federal civil liability while attempting to follow the dictates of a state statute.

But the rule remains that for an officer to allow a private citizen to make a citizen's arrest and then to take the suspect into custody when there is insufficient probable cause to justify the arrest, the officer subjects himself to potential federal civil liability. (Hopkins v. Bonvicino (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 752, 774-776.)

> Federal civil liability still existed despite the fact that the officers were exempt from state civil liability in a citizen's arrest situation. (Ibid., and see Pen. Code § 847.)

The private person may delegate to a peace officer his or her authority to actually perform the arrest for the person. (People v. Sjosten (1968) 262 Cal.App.2nd 539.)

A police dispatcher, being subjected to defendant's numerous harassing telephone calls, may delegate to a police officer the responsibility to arrest the defendant for her. The offense, although over the phone, was held to be in her presence. The arrest was timely in that officers responded immediately to where defendant was calling from and took him into custody. The arrest was held to be a lawful citizen's arrest. (People v. Bloom (2010) 185 Cal.App.4th 1496.)

The Stale Misdemeanor Rule:

> The stale misdemeanor rule applies to private person's arrests as well. (See Green v. Department of Motor Vehicles (1977) 68 Cal.App.3rd 536; arrest made some 35 to 40 minutes after observation of the crime held to be lawful; see also Ogulin v. Jeffries (1953) 121 Cal.App.2nd 211; 20 minute delay; arrest lawful.) (See "Stale Misdemeanor Rule," below)

The "In the Presence" Requirement:

> Rule: Misdemeanors (and infractions) must have occurred in the private person's (in the case of a private person's arrest) presence. (P.C. §§ 836(a)(1), 837.1; Jackson v. Superior Court (1950) 98 Cal.App.2nd 183; see also Veh. Code § 40300.)

Out-of-State Officers in "Fresh Pursuit:"

> Pen. Code § 852.2: "Any peace officer of another State, who enters this State in fresh pursuit, and continues within this State in fresh pursuit, of a person in order to arrest him on the ground that he has committed a felony in the other State, has the same authority to arrest and hold the person in custody, as peace officers of this State have to arrest and hold a person in custody on the ground that he has committed a felony in this State."
>
> Pen. Code § 852.3: The arresting officer is then to take the arrestee "immediately before a magistrate" of the county in which the arrest is made. The magistrate is to determine whether the person had been lawfully arrested. If so, the arrestee is to be held for extradition. If not, he is to be "discharge(d)."

Federal Officers:

Pen. Code § 830.8:

Subd. (a) Federal criminal investigators and federal law enforcement officers are not California peace officers. However, after having been certified by their agency heads as having satisfied the training requirements of P.C. § 832, or the equivalent thereof, they may exercise the powers of arrest of a California peace officer under the following circumstances:

- Any circumstance specified in P.C. § 836 (see above) or W&I § 5150 (Mental patients who are a danger to themselves, others, or who are gravely disabled).

- When incidental to the performance of their federal law enforcement duties.

- When requested by a California law enforcement agency to be involved in a joint task force or criminal investigation.

- When probable cause exists to believe that a public offense that involves immediate danger to persons or property has just occurred or is being committed.

  See United States v. Artis (9th Cir. 2019) 919 F.3rd 1123, 1130, where it is noted that federal officers are not California peace officers, and thus violate the relevant California code sections requiring that state search warrants be executed by a "peace officer" when a federal officer executes a state warrant. However, it was held not to be a Fourth Amendment violation, and thus did not require the suppression of any resulting evidence, reversing the prior decision issued by a federal district court, reported at 315 F.Supp.3rd 1142 (U.S. Dist. Ct., ND Cal., 2018).

  > The Ninth Circuit's authority for this conclusion is cited as United States v. Green (10th Cir. 1999) 178 F.3rd 1099, 1106; United States v. Gilbert (11th Cir. 1991) 942 F.2nd 1537, 1540-1541); and United States v. Freeman (8th Cir. 1990) 897 F.2nd 346, 348-349.

  The San Ysidro Port of Entry, in San Diego, is state land and not federal, although the attached facilities belong to the federal government. A federal Immigration and Naturalization Agent at that location may therefore lawfully make a citizen's arrest for a state criminal violation (e.g., driving while under the influence) and turn him over to state and local law enforcement officers. (People v. Crusilla (1999) 77 Cal.App.4th 141.)

Where a federal officer arrested an obviously intoxicated driver just outside a federal enclave and beyond the officer's territorial jurisdiction after a lawful traffic stop, the Fourth Amendment does not require the exclusion of the evidence obtained in a search incident to the arrest because the arrest was supported by probable cause. Therefore, it was not an unreasonable seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment despite the lack of any statutory authority for making the arrest. (United States v. Ryan (1st Cir. 2013) 731 F.3rd 66.)

Subd. (b): Duly authorized federal employees who comply with the training requirements set forth in Section 832 are peace officers when they are engaged in enforcing applicable state or local laws on property owned or possessed by the United States government, or on any street, sidewalk, or property adjacent thereto, with the written consent of the sheriff or the chief of police, respectively, in whose jurisdiction the property is situated."

When arresting pursuant to Pen. Code § 830.8, an arrestee must be taken immediately before a magistrate or delivered to a peace officer, as specified in Pen. Code § 847.

Federal officers of the Bureau of Land Management and the Forest Service of the Department of Agriculture have no authority to enforce California statutes without the written consent of the sheriff or the chief of police in whose jurisdiction they are assigned.

A police officer with the United States Park Police had acted within the authority set forth in Pen. Code § 830.8, subd. (b), when he detained and arrested defendant on city property. The prosecution established that the search of defendant and his vehicle was reasonable. Upon defendant's failure to provide a valid registration and his provision of false identification of himself, the officer had authority to place defendant under arrest and had authority to search defendant incident to that arrest. (People v. Redd (2010) 48 Cal.4th 691, 703-704, 711-722.)

Subd. (c): National Park Rangers are not California peace officers. However, after having been certified by their agency heads as having satisfied the training requirements of Pen. Code § 832.3, or the equivalent thereof, they may exercise the powers of a California peace officer under any circumstance specified in Pen. Code § 836 (see above) or W&I § 5150 (Mental patients who are a danger to themselves, others, or who are gravely disabled), for violations of state or local laws, but only:

- When incidental to the performance of their federal duties; or

- When requested by a California State Park Ranger to assist in preserving the peace and protecting state parks and other property for which California State Park Rangers are responsible.

(See People v. Redd, supra.)

Subd. (d): Provides these officers with similar powers during a "state of war emergency or a state of emergency," as defined in Gov't. Code § 8558.

Subd. (e): Further provides for limited law enforcement powers for a qualified person who is appointed as a Washoe tribal law enforcement officer.

Pen. Code § 830.85: "Notwithstanding any other law, United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement officers and United States Customs and Border Protection officers are not California peace officers."

Supremacy Clause Immunity: There is an argument that federal officers are not necessarily bound by California's laws of arrest, or at least, cannot be held accountable for any more than what the federal law requires.

Rule: Under the federal "removal statute" (28 U.S.C. § 1442), a federal civil or criminal case against a federal officer can be removed from state to federal court—increasing the likelihood of an outright dismissal—if the federal officer involved shows: (1) that he or she is a federal official; (2) that the prosecution arises out of acts committed by him or her under color of federal law; and, (3) that he or she has a "colorable" federal defense.

"Colorable" only means that the defense is "plausible," not necessarily "clearly sustainable." If the defense is plausible, the district court judge should remove the case.

Removal provides the officer with a federal forum for the state trial, meaning the federal court shall decide the question of guilt or innocence and the availability of any defense, like immunity. (See 28 U.S.C. § 1442(a)(1); Texas v. Kleinhert (5th Cir. 2017) 855 F.3rd 305, 311-313.)

Case Law:

In re Neagle (1890) 135 U.S. 1 [10 S.Ct. 658; 34 L.Ed. 55]: Deputy United States Marshal David Neagle, after shooting and killing a person who was assaulting a U.S. Supreme Court Justice, was held to be immune from state prosecution for murder where he was doing no more than performing "an act which he was authorized to do by the law of the United States, which it was his duty to do as a marshal of the United States, and [] in doing that act he did no more than what was necessary and proper for him to do." Under such circumstances, "he cannot be guilty of a crime under the law of the State of California."

Clifton v. Cox (9th Cir. 1977) 549 F.2nd 722: Petitioner federal agent was a member of a task force from various agencies that secured a federal search warrant authorizing a search of a ranch, the alleged location of an illegal drug manufacturing operation. Petitioner, thinking that another agent had been shot, rushed the cabin and kicked in the door. As petitioner entered the front door, the owner started to flee, but petitioner leveled his pistol at the running figure, called halt twice, waited a second or two and then fired, killing the owner. Petitioner was indicted in the state court for second-degree murder and involuntary manslaughter. He subsequently petitioned and was granted a writ of habeas corpus and was released from state custody. On appeal, the court affirmed, holding that a federal agent could not be held on a state criminal charge where the alleged crime arose during the performance of his federal duties under the Supremacy Clause, U.S. Const. art. VI. The court concluded that even though petitioner federal agent's acts may have exceeded his express authority, this did not necessarily strip petitioner of his lawful power to act under the scope of authority given to him under the laws of the United States.

In considering a district court's order remanding complaints to state court after defendant energy companies had removed the complaints to federal court on eight separate grounds, the district court did not err in holding there was no subject-matter jurisdiction under the federal-officer removal statute, 28 U.S.C.S. § 1442(a)(1), because the energy companies were not "acting under" a federal officer's directions. In part, in the context of government lease agreements with the energy companies, the willingness to lease federal property or mineral rights to a private entity for the entity's own commercial purposes, without more, could not be characterized as the type of assistance that was required to show that the private entity was "acting under" a federal officer. (County of San Mateo v. Chevron Corporation (9th Cir. 2020) 960 F.3rd 586.)

Bounty Hunters or Bail Enforcement Agents have long exercised a Common Law power to locate, arrest, and return to custody persons released from custody on bail provided by a bail-bondsman, when the person fails to make a necessary court appearance. (Taylor v. Taintor (1872) 83 U.S. 366 [21 L.Ed. 287].)

General Rules:

Because state courts have found that a bounty hunter's broad authority comes from the implied terms of a private agreement between the bondsman (i.e., a private citizen) and the defendant, bounty hunters are unburdened by many of the constitutional and statutory restrictions which control the conduct of state law enforcement officers. (Reese v. United States (1969) 76 U.S. 13, 22 [76 S.Ct. 13; 19 L.Ed. 541, 544].)

Generally, "the common-law right of recapture is (only) limited by the reasonable means necessary to affect the arrest." (Lopez v. Cotter (10th Cir. 1989) 875 F.2nd 273, 277.)

Bounty hunters "enjoy extraordinary powers to capture and use force" in tracking down and arresting fugitives. (Kear v. Hilton (4th Cir. 1983) 699 F.2nd 181, 182.)

Not being agents of the state, bounty hunters are not restricted by the usual constitutional constraints that apply to law enforcement. (See People v. Johnson (1947) 153 Cal.App.2nd 870, 873; Landry v. A-Able Bonding, Inc. (5th Cir. 1996) 75 F.3rd 200, 203-205; United States v. Rhodes (9th Cir. 1983) 731 F.2nd 463, 467.)

E.g.: The "Exclusionary Rule" does not apply to the actions of a bounty hunter. (People v. Houle (1970) 13 Cal.App.3rd 892, 895.)

California has sought to regulate the licensing and training requirements for bounty hunters. (See Pen. Code §§ 1299 et seq. (see below) and Ins. Code § 1810.7.)

Other provisions provide for the arrest of a bail jumper by the bounty hunter when the bounty hunter's authority is in writing upon a certified copy of either the undertaking of bail or the certificate of a bail deposited with the court. (Pen. Code §§ 1300, 1301)

> Pen. Code § 1301 also requires the bondsman or bounty hunter to bring the bail jumper before a magistrate, or deliver him to the custody of a sheriff or police department, within 48 hours after arrest or after being brought into this state, excluding weekends and holidays. It is a misdemeanor to violate this section.

Pen. Code § 847.5 provides that an out-of-state bounty hunter must first seek an arrest warrant from a local magistrate, filing with the court an affidavit listing the name and whereabouts of the fugitive, certain particulars of the fugitive's offense, and the circumstances of the fugitive's violation of the terms of his bail. The bounty hunter is also required to bring the fugitive before the magistrate after which a hearing is held. The magistrate may then authorize the bounty hunter to remove the fugitive from the state.

However, a bounty hunter who ignores the requirements of section 847.5, because he acts outside California's statutory regulations, is not acting "under color of state law," and, therefore, is not civilly liable, at least in a Title 42 U.S.C. § 1983 federal civil rights suit. (Ouzts v. Maryland National Insurance Co. (9th Cir. 1974) 505 F.2nd 547.)

The Bail Fugitive Recovery Persons Act:

Pen. Code § 1299: Designates this article as the "Bail Fugitive Recovery Persons Act."

Pen. Code § 1299.01: Definitions:

> (a) For purposes of this article, the following terms shall have the following meanings:
>
> > (1) "Bail fugitive" means a defendant in a pending criminal case who has been released from custody under a financially secured appearance, cash, or other bond and has had that bond declared forfeited, or a defendant in a pending criminal case who has violated a bond condition whereby apprehension and reincarceration are permitted.

(2) "Bail" means a bail agent, bail permittee, or bail solicitor licensed by the Department of Insurance pursuant to Section 1802, 1802.5, or 1803 of the Insurance Code.

(3) "Depositor of bail" means a person who or entity that has deposited money or bonds to secure the release of a person charged with a crime or offense.

(4) "Bail fugitive recovery agent" means a person licensed pursuant to Section 1802.3 of the Insurance Code who is provided written authorization pursuant to Section 1300 or 1301 by the bail or depositor of bail, and is contracted to investigate, surveil, locate, and arrest a bail fugitive for surrender to the appropriate court, jail, or police department, and any person who is employed to assist a bail or depositor of bail to investigate, surveil, locate, and arrest a bail fugitive for surrender to the appropriate court, jail, or police department.

(b) This section shall become operative on July 1, 2023.

Pen. Code § 1299.02: Persons Authorized to Arrest Bail Fugitives:

(a) No person, other than a certified law enforcement officer, shall be authorized to apprehend, detain, or arrest a bail fugitive unless that person meets one of the following conditions:

(1) Is a bail as defined in paragraph (2) of subdivision (a) of Section 1299.01 who is also a bail fugitive recovery agent as defined in paragraph (4) of subdivision (a) of Section 1299.01.

(2) Is a bail fugitive recovery agent as defined in paragraph (4) of subdivision (a) of Section 1299.01.

(3) Is a licensed private investigator as provided in Chapter 11.3 (commencing with Section 7512) of Division 3 of the Business and Professions Code who is also a bail fugitive recovery agent as defined in paragraph (4) of subdivision (a) of Section 1299.01.

(b) This article shall not prohibit an arrest pursuant to Sections 837, 838, and 839, provided that no consideration is paid or allowed, directly or indirectly, to any person effecting an arrest pursuant to Sections 837, 838, and 839.

(c) Individuals who hold a bail license, bail fugitive recovery license, bail enforcer license, bail runner license, or private investigator license issued by another state shall not apprehend, detain, or arrest bail fugitives in California, unless that individual obtains a bail fugitive recovery agent license issued in this state and complies with California law.

(d) This section shall become operative on July 1, 2023.

Pen. Code § 1299.04: Qualifications of a Bail Fugitive Recovery Person:

(a) A bail fugitive recovery agent, bail agent, bail permittee, or bail solicitor who contracts their services to another bail agent or surety as a bail fugitive recovery agent for the purposes specified in paragraph (4) of subdivision (a) of Section 1299.01, and any bail agent, bail permittee, or bail solicitor who obtains licensing after January 1, 2000, and who engages in the arrest of a defendant pursuant to Section 1301 shall comply with Sections 1800 to 1823, inclusive, of the Insurance Code, and any regulations promulgated by the Insurance Commissioner.

(b) This section shall become operative on July 1, 2023.

Pen. Code § 1299.05: Bail Fugitive Apprehensions:

> In performing a bail fugitive apprehension, an individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.01 to apprehend a bail fugitive shall comply with all laws applicable to that apprehension.

Pen. Code § 1299.06: Required Apprehension Documentation:

> An individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive shall have in his or her possession proper documentation of authority to apprehend issued by the bail or depositor of bail as prescribed in P.C. §§ 1300 and 1301 before making any apprehension. The authority to apprehend document shall include all of the following information:
>
> (1) The name of the individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive and any fictitious name, if applicable;
>
> (2) The address of the principal office of the individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive; and
>
> (3) The name and principal business address of the bail agency, surety company, or other party contracting with the individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive.

Pen. Code § 1299.07: Representing Oneself to be a Sworn Law Enforcement Officer:

> Subd. (a): An individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive shall not represent himself or herself in any manner as being a sworn law enforcement officer.
>
> Subd. (b): An individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive shall not wear any uniform that represents himself or herself as belonging to any part or department of a federal, state, or local government. Any uniform shall not display the words United States, Bureau, Task Force, Federal, or other substantially similar words that a reasonable person may mistake for a government agency.

Subd. (c): An individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive shall not wear or otherwise use a badge that represents himself or herself as belonging to any part or department of the federal, state, or local government.

Subd. (d): An individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive shall not use a fictitious name that represents himself or herself as belonging to any federal, state, or local government.

Subd. (e): An individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive may wear a jacket, shirt, or vest with the words "BAIL BOND RECOVERY AGENT," "BAIL ENFORCEMENT," or "BAIL ENFORCEMENT AGENT" displayed in letters at least two inches high across the front or back of the jacket, shirt, or vest and in a contrasting color to that of the jacket, shirt, or vest.

Pen. Code § 1299.08: Procedural Requirements in Making Arrests:

Subd. (a): Except under exigent circumstances, an individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive shall, prior to and no more than six hours before attempting to apprehend the bail fugitive, notify the local police department or sheriff's department of the intent to apprehend a bail fugitive in that jurisdiction by doing all of the following:

(1): Indicating the name of an individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive entering the jurisdiction.

(2): Stating the approximate time an individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive will be entering the jurisdiction and the approximate length of the stay.

(3): Stating the name and approximate location of the bail fugitive.

Subd. (b): If an exigent circumstance does arise and prior notification is not given as provided in subd. (a), an individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive shall notify the local police department or sheriff's department immediately after the apprehension, and upon request of the local jurisdiction, shall submit a detailed explanation of those exigent circumstances within three working days after the apprehension is made.

Subd. (c): This section shall not preclude an individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive from making or attempting to make a lawful arrest of a bail fugitive on bond pursuant to P.C. §§ 1300 and 1301. The fact that a bench warrant is not located or entered into a warrant depository or system shall not affect a lawful arrest of the bail fugitive.

Subd. (d): For the purposes of this section, notice may be provided to a local law enforcement agency by telephone prior to the arrest or, after the arrest has taken place, if exigent circumstances exist. In that case the name or operator number of the employee receiving the notice information shall be obtained and retained by the bail, depositor of bail, or bail fugitive recovery person.

Pen. Code § 1299.09: Forcible Entries:

An individual, authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive shall not forcibly enter a premises except as provided for in P.C. § 844 (i.e., the "knock and notice" requirements).

Pen. Code § 1299.10: Use of Firearms or Other Weapons:

An individual authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive shall not carry a firearm or other weapon unless in compliance with the laws of the state.

A bail agent may, upon request of the surety liable for the undertaking, arrest a defendant and transport him to a court, magistrate, sheriff, or police, as directed; although a bail agent has no explicit statutory authority to carry a loaded firearm when performing his duties, like any person who does not have a permit to carry a firearm, he may carry a loaded firearm while engaged in the act of making or attempting to make a lawful arrest of the defendant. (81 Op.Cal.Atty.Gen. 257, 7/29/1998.)

A bail recovery agent was not "attempting to make a lawful arrest" when stopped by police officers, and thus the California statute providing that a person attempting to make lawful arrest may carry loaded handgun (i.e., formerly P.C. § 12031(k); now P.C. § 26050) was inapplicable. The officers had probable cause to arrest the agent for carrying loaded firearm when the agent was arrested because he was in his car half block away from fugitive. (Golt v. City of Signal Hill (C.D.Cal. 2001) 132 F.Supp.2nd 1271.)

Pen. Code § 1299.11: Violating the Bail Fugitive Recovery Persons Act:

It is a misdemeanor to violate or conspire to violate any provision of the Bail Fugitive Recovery Persons Act, or to hire an individual to apprehend a bail fugitive, knowing that the individual is not authorized by P.C. § 1299.02 to apprehend a bail fugitive.

Punishment: Misdemeanor: Up to one year in county jail and/or a $5,000 fine.

Pen. Code § 1299.12: Licensing Private Investigators:

The above is specifically not intended to exempt from licensure persons otherwise required to be licensed as private investigators pursuant to B&P §§ 7512 et seq.

Arrest Options*: A peace officer has five options when he or she makes an arrest pursuant to Pen. Code § 836 or takes custody of a prisoner from a private person, arrested pursuant to Pen. Code § 837:

1. Release Without Charges: If, after a subject has been arrested, the officer feels that based upon additional information collected, the arrest is not justified (i.e., there is insufficient probable cause), he or she may unconditionally release the prisoner pursuant to authority described in Pen. Code § 849(b)(1).

   If, when arrested by a private person, the person changes his or her mind about wanting to arrest the subject, the prisoner may simply be released without any further action.

   Otherwise, any such arrest and release must be documented pursuant to Pen. Code § 851.6, with a certificate issued to the arrested person by the arresting agency describing such action as a detention only.

The legal status of anyone so released shall be deemed a detention only; not an arrest. (Pen. Code § 849(c))

Pen. Code § 851.91: A detention facility, at the request of an arrestee upon release, is required to supply to him or her the Judicial Council form for sealing the record of an arrest that did not result in a conviction. Also requires a detention facility to post a sign stating that a person who has been arrested but not convicted may petition the court to have the arrest and related records sealed and that the form may be requested at the facility or found on the Internet.

Pen. Code § 849.5 provides that if a person is arrested and released and no accusatory pleading is filed, the arrest shall be deemed a detention only. Subdivision (b) of Pen. Code § 851.6 provides that the arresting agency shall issue the arrestee a certificate describing the action as a detention, and subdivision (d) provides that the official criminal records shall delete any reference to an arrest and refer to the action as a detention.

> Plaintiff in a class action suit against the CHP asked the court to require it to comply, and won. The Court on appeal affirmed, holding that Plaintiff "is entitled to have his arrest deemed a detention; entitled to a certificate from the CHP describing the action as a detention; and entitled to have his arrest deleted from the records of the CHP and the Department of Justice and have any such record refer to it as a detention." (Schmidt v. California Highway Patrol (2016) 1 Cal.App.5th 1287.)
> Note: Pursuant to Pen. Code § 853.6(e)(3), a prosecutorial agency has 25 days to decide to file. After that, the prosecutor can only proceed following a new arrest or the issuance of an arrest warrant. It therefore follows that a law enforcement agency has at least 25 days, or until there is a formal and permanent (i.e., not being held for further investigation) reject from the prosecutor (whichever occurs first) before the arresting agency has to worry about complying with the section 849.5 and 851.6 requirements. Upon the occurrence of one of these events (formal reject or 25 days), it is suggested that sections 849.5 and 851.6 be complied with "without delay."

Subd. (b)(4) adds as a legal basis for releasing a prisoner prior to booking or without citation when; "(t)he person was arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs and the person is delivered to a hospital for medical treatment that prohibits immediate delivery before a magistrate."

Subd. (b)(5) adds as a legal basis for releasing a prisoner prior to booking and without a citation when; "(t)he person was arrested and subsequently delivered to a hospital or other urgent care facility, including, but not limited to, a facility for the treatment of co-occurring substance use disorders, for mental health evaluation and treatment, and no further proceedings are desirable.

Note: It is also arguable that a law enforcement officer may choose to release a subject for whom probable cause does exist. There is nothing in the case or statutory law that says that Pen. Code § 849(b) is the exclusive authority for releasing an arrested prisoner.

Note, however, Pen. Code § 4011.10(b) prohibiting law enforcement from releasing a jail inmate for the purpose of allowing the inmate to seek medical care at a hospital, and then immediately re-arresting the same individual upon discharge from the hospital, unless the hospital determines this action would enable it to bill and collect from a third-party payment source.

Subd. (a): "It is the intent of the Legislature in enacting this section to provide county sheriffs, chiefs of police, and directors or administrators of local detention facilities with an incentive to not engage in practices designed to avoid payment of legitimate health care costs for the treatment or examination of persons lawfully in their custody, and to promptly pay those costs as requested by the provider of services. Further, it is the intent of the Legislature to encourage county sheriffs, chiefs of police, and directors or administrators of local detention facilities to bargain in good faith when negotiating a service contract with hospitals providing health care services."

2. Seek an Arrest Warrant: (I.e., a "Notify Warrant.") Should the peace officer determine that, although probable cause for an arrest exists, the person may not be lawfully arrested (e.g., a misdemeanor not in the officer's presence or the private person's presence, or a "stale misdemeanor," (see below; "Legal Requirements of an Arrest"), or as a discretionary option to taking the subject into custody or writing a misdemeanor citation, an arrest report may be filled out with the appropriate notation made (or box, e.g., "□ notify warrant," checked).

   This is not an arrest and requires (after a "detention for investigation" during which identification information is collected and a brief investigation is conducted) the immediate release of the subject. The local prosecuting agency to which the reports are forwarded will then notify the subject of when and where to appear in court to answer to any charges filed in court. Should the person fail to respond to this notification, an arrest warrant will be sought.

Stopping a suspect in a misdemeanor offense situation, a noise violation, not occurring in the officer's presence, at least where there are possible alternative less intrusive methods of identifying the suspect, may be unconstitutional. The Court is to balance law enforcement's interest in crime prevention with the detainee's interest in personal security from government intrusion. (See United States v. Hensley (1985) 469 U.S. 221 [105 S.Ct. 675; 83 L.Ed.2nd 604]; declining to decide the issue.) In a misdemeanor situation, law enforcement's interest may not outweigh the suspect's. (United States v. Grigg (9th Cir. 2007) 498 F.3rd 1070, 1074-1083.)

The continuing validity of the Grigg decision has been questioned and is probably, if it ever was, no longer a valid rule. (See United States v. Creek (U.S. Dist. Ct, Ariz. 2009) 586 F. Supp.2nd 1099, 1102-1108; upholding the traffic stop of a petty theft (gas drive off) suspect. See also Stanton v. Sims (2013) 571 U.S. 3 [134 S.Ct. 3; 187 L.Ed.2nd 341], calling into question, but not deciding, the Ninth Circuit's sensitivity to apprehending misdemeanor suspects.)

3. Issuance of a Misdemeanor Citation: A misdemeanor arrest for an offense which is not "stale" and which did occur in the officer's (or a private citizen's) presence, but when booking is either not legal or not appropriate under the circumstances, may result in the subject being cited and released at the scene.

   Misdemeanor citations are in fact an arrest, although the subject is released without booking, and must therefore be conducted according to the rules on misdemeanor crimes occurring in the officer's presence, etc. (See below; "Legal Requirements of an Arrest.")

   Misdemeanor arrestees are, as a general rule, to be cited and released unless one of the exceptions listed in Pen. Code § 853.6(i) applies. (Pen. Code § 853.6(a))

   Note also that all persons released on a misdemeanor citation must be booked and fingerprinted either at the scene or at the arresting agency at some point prior to appearing in court, but that if released prior to doing so, should be so notified of their responsibility to comply. (Pen. Code § 853.6(g))

Note: Booking at the scene requires the officer to use a mobile fingerprint device to take all fingerprints instead of merely a thumbprint.

4. Book into Jail: When one or more of the circumstances listed in Pen. Code § 853.6(i) does exist, and the subject is otherwise lawfully arrested (e.g., a felony arrest, or a misdemeanor in the officer or private person's presence which is not "stale."), the arrested person may be subjected to a custodial arrest and transported to county jail for booking.

   Pen. Code § 7, subd. (21): To "book" signifies the recordation of an arrest in official police records, and the taking by the police of fingerprints and photographs of the person arrested, or any of these acts following an arrest.

   Pen. Code § 853.5 has been held to provide the exclusive grounds for a custodial arrest for an infraction, and that 853.6 applies to misdemeanors only. (Edgerly v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2013) 713 F.3rd 976, 981-985; citing In re Rottanak K. (1995) 37 Cal.App.4th 260, and People v. Williams (1992) 3 Cal.App.4th 1100.)

   Note that when a subject is to be transported to jail (i.e., a "custodial arrest" as opposed to a cite-and-release), a pre-transportation search of his or her person is lawful; done for the purpose of removing any potential weapons from the subjects release and to prevent the introduction of evidence or contraband into the jail. (United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 793, 805.)

5. Take Directly Before a Magistrate: When court is in session, and a judge is available, a subject may be transported directly to the judge.

   The offense must be a felony, or the conditions for a lawful misdemeanor arrest must be present (i.e., in the presence of the officer or private person making the arrest and not stale).

   See also Pen. Code § 853.5 and Veh. Code §§ 40300.5, 40302, 40303, 40304, and 40305 (below), for conditions under which persons arrested for certain infractions or misdemeanors may be taken immediately before a magistrate.

Legal Requirements of an Arrest*:

Felonies: A peace officer may make an arrest for a felony, with or without a warrant, at any time, day or night, at any location, whether or not the felony has occurred in the officer's presence, so long as such arrest is supported by "probable cause." (P.C. § 836(a)(2), (3))

Exception: Warrantless arrests in a person's home. (See below)

See also Veh. Code § 40301: When probable cause exists to believe that a particular person has violated a Vehicle Code felony, the subject "shall be dealt with in like manner as upon arrest for the commission of any other felony," according to the general provisions of the Penal Code on felony arrests. (See People v. Superior Court (Simon) (1972) 7 Cal.3rd 186, 199.)

Misdemeanors and Infractions:

"In the Presence" Requirement: Misdemeanors (and infractions) must have occurred in the officer's (or private person's, in the case of a private person's arrest) presence. (Pen. Code §§ 836(a)(1), 837.1; Jackson v. Superior Court (1950) 98 Cal.App.2nd 183; see also Veh Code § 40300.)

Veh. Code § 40300: "The provisions of this chapter shall govern all peace officers in making arrests for violations of this code without a warrant for offenses committed in their presence, but the procedure prescribed herein shall not otherwise be exclusive of any other method prescribed by law for the arrest and prosecution of a person for an offense of like grade." (Italics added)

"In the Presence" Defined: "In the presence" is commonly interpreted to refer to having personal knowledge that the offense in question has been committed, made known to the officer through any of the officer's five senses. (See People v. Burgess (1959) 170 Cal.App.2nd 36, 41.)

The crime of making annoying or harassing telephone calls, per Pen. Code § 653x, is done in the listener's presence. (People v. Bloom (2010) 185 Cal.App.4th 1496; harassing phone calls to a police dispatcher.)

Exceptions: A peace officer has statutory authorization to affect a warrantless arrest for misdemeanors which did not occur in the officer's presence under limited circumstances:

1. Juvenile Arrests: (W&I Code § 625(a); In re Samuel V. (1990) 225 Cal.App.3rd 511; In re Gregory S. (1980) 112 Cal.App.3rd 764.)

2. Driving While Under the Influence of Alcohol and/or Drugs, when any of the following circumstances exist (V.C. § 40300.5):

(a) The person was involved in a traffic accident.

(b) The person is observed in or about a vehicle that is obstructing a roadway.

(c) The person will not be apprehended unless immediately arrested.

(d) The person may cause injury to himself or herself or damage property unless immediately arrested.

(e) The person may destroy or conceal evidence of the crime unless immediately arrested.

(People v. Schofield (2001) 90 Cal.App.4th 968; the metabolic destruction of alcohol in a DUI suspect's body (i.e., the "burn off" rate) qualifies as the "destruction of evidence" for purposes of this exception.)

See also Troppman v. Gourley (2005) 126 Cal.App.4th 755, at pp. 760-761, where it was noted that the prior Supreme Court case of Mercer v. Department of Motor Vehicles (1991) 53 Cal.3rd 753, 768-769, requiring some observation of the vehicle's movement by the arresting officer, was no longer valid case law in light of the amendment to this statute.

Even though the officer did not observe defendant's vehicle moving, where the police officer discovered defendant asleep behind wheel with his foot on the brake, the engine running, and the gear in drive, in the middle of interstate highway, defendant's arrest for driving while under the influence was lawful based upon the circumstantial evidence that defendant had driven there while under the influence. (Villalobos v. Zolin (1995) 35 Cal.App.4th 556.)

The old California rule of requiring a valid arrest, even of an unconscious suspect, prior to the extraction of a blood sample (See People v. Superior Court* [Hawkins] (1972) 6 Cal.3rd 757, 762.), was abrogated by passage of Proposition 8, in June, 1982. Now, so long as probable cause exists to believe that the defendant was driving while intoxicated, a formal arrest is not a prerequisite to a warrantless seizure of a blood sample. (People v. Trotman (1989) 214 Cal.App.3rd 430, 435; People v. Deltoro (1989) 214 Cal.App.3rd 1417, 1422, 1425.)

But see Missouri v. McNeely (2013) 569 U.S. 141 [133 S.Ct. 1552; 185 L.Ed.2nd 696]; requiring a search warrant absent exigent circumstances or consent.

The implied consent provisions under V.C. § 23612(a)(5), where, by statute, blood may be drawn from an unconscious or dead DUI suspect, does not overcome the need for a search warrant without a showing of exigent circumstances. (People v. Arredondo (2016) 245 Cal.App.4th 186, 193-205; no exigency found, pp. 205-206.)

> Note: Petition for Review was dismissed and the case remanded in light of the decision in Mitchell v. Wisconsin (June 27, 2019) __ U.S.__, __ [139 S.Ct. 2525; 204 L.Ed.2nd 1040], where the U.S. Supreme Court held that when a DUI arrestee is unconscious, this fact alone will "almost always" constitute an exigency, allowing for a warrantless blood draw.

Veh. Code § 40300.5, allowing for the arrest of someone who had been driving while under the influence under certain circumstances even though not in the officer's presence, does not violate the Fourth Amendment. (People v. Burton (2013) 219 Cal.App.4th Supp. 9.)

> "The Fourth Amendment supports arrests for misdemeanors when there is objective and reasonable probable cause to justify the arrest, regardless of the 'in the presence' requirement outlined in the Penal Code." (Id., at p. 13.)

3. Battery on School Grounds during school hours. (P.C. § 243.5)

4. Carrying a Loaded Firearm, in violation of P.C. § 25850(a) (formerly P.C. § 12031(a)(1). (P.C. § 25850(g) (formerly P.C. § 12031(a)(5)(A))

5. Assault or Battery Against the Person of a Firefighter, Emergency Medical Technician, or Paramedic, per P.C. §§ 241(b) or 243(b). (P.C. § 836.1)

6. Persons Violating a Domestic Violence Protective or Restraining Order issued under authority of:

- CCP § 527.6 (Harassment Orders);
- Fam. Code, §§ 6200 et seq. (Domestic Violence);
- P.C. § 136.2 (Victim or Witness Intimidation);
- P.C. § 646.91 (Stalking);
- P.C. § 1203.097(a)(2) (Acts of violence, threats, stalking, sexual abuse, and harassment, in Domestic Violence);
- W&I § 213.5 (During Child Dependency Proceedings);
- W&I § 15657.03, (Elder or Dependent Adult Abuse) or
- Similar orders from another state, tribe, or territory;

. . . where the officer has probable cause to believe the suspect has knowledge of the order and has committed an act in violation of the order. (P.C. § 836(c)(1))

Note: This section, and Pen. Code § 13701(b), at least when "domestic violence" (per Fam. Code §§ 2040 et seq., 6200 et seq., or 7700 et seq.) is involved, or when victim or witness intimidation (per Pen. Code § 136.2) is involved, make this arrest mandatory upon the officer, absent "exigent circumstances" excusing the lack of an arrest.

7. Assaults or Batteries upon the suspect's current or former spouse, fiancé, fiancée, a current or former cohabitant (per Fam. Code, § 6209), a person with whom the suspect currently is having or has previously had an engagement or dating relationship (per Pen. Code § 243(f)(10)), a person with whom the suspect has parented a child, or is presumed to have parented a child (per the Uniform Parentage Act; Fam. Code, §§ 7600 et seq.), a child of the suspect, a child whose parentage by the suspect is the subject of an action under the Uniform Parentage Act, a child of a person in one of the above categories, or any other person related to the suspect by consanguinity or affinity within the second degree, when the officer has probable cause and the arrest is made as soon as probable cause arises. (Pen. Code § 836(d))

Pen. Code § 13700(b): "Cohabitant" is defined in the Penal Code as "two unrelated adult persons living together for a substantial period of time, resulting in some permanency of relationship. Factors that may determine whether persons are cohabiting include, but are not limited to,

(1) sexual relations between the parties while sharing the same living quarters,
(2) sharing of income or expenses,
(3) joint use or ownership of property,
(4) whether the parties hold themselves out as husband and wife,
(5) the continuity of the relationship, and
(6) the length of the relationship."

Fam. Code, § 6209: "Cohabitant" is defined in the Family Code as a person who regularly resides in the household. "Former Cohabitant" is defined as a person who formerly regularly resided in the household.

Pen. Code § 243(f)(10): "Dating Relationship" is defined as frequent, intimate associations primarily characterized by the expectation of affection or sexual involvement independent of financial considerations.

Evid. Code § 215: "Spouse" is defined to include a "registered domestic partner" pursuant to Fam. Code § 297.5. (Fam. Code § 297.5 provides that a registered domestic partner has the same rights, protections, benefits, responsibilities, and duties as are granted to and imposed on spouses.)

8. Physical Abuse of an Elder: Assaults or batteries upon any person who is 65 years of age or older and who is related to the suspect by blood or legal guardianship, when the officer has probable cause and the arrest is made as soon as probable cause arises. (Pen. Code § 836(d))

9. Carrying a Concealed Firearm, per Pen. Code § 25400 (formerly Pen. Code § 12025), when a peace officer has reasonable (or probable) cause to believe a violation has occurred within the area of an airport (as "airport" is defined by the Pub. Utilities Code, § 21013) to which access is controlled by the inspection of persons and property, and when the arrest is made as soon as reasonable (or probable) cause arises. (Pen. Code § 836(e))

10. *Operating a Vessel or Recreational Vessel, or Manipulation of Water Skis, Aquaplane or Similar Device, while under the influence of drugs and/or alcohol, or addicted to the use of drugs. (Har. & Nav. Code, § 655(b), (c), (d) or (e)) Upon information from a commissioned, warrant or petty officer of the United States Coast Guard establishing "reasonable cause," a peace officer may arrest for a violation of any the above offenses. (Subd. (g))

11. Operating a Vessel While Under the Influence of Alcohol and/or Drugs, when the person is involved in an accident on the waters of this state, with "reasonable cause," any peace officer may arrest. (Har. & Nav. Code, § 663.1)

Vehicle Code Violations; Exceptions: The Vehicle Code contains limited exceptions, allowing for the option of citing a person for a misdemeanor or infraction even though the offense cited for did not occur in the peace officer's presence:

Veh. Code § 16028(c): A peace officer, or a regularly employed and salaried employee of a city or county who has been trained as a traffic collision investigator upon review by a peace officer, at the scene of an accident, may cite any driver involved in the traffic collision who is unable to provide evidence of financial responsibility.

Veh. Code § 40600(a): A peace officer who has successfully completed a course or courses of instruction, approved by the Commission on Peace Officer Standards and Training (i.e.,

P.O.S.T.) in the investigation of traffic accidents may cite any person involved in a traffic accident when the officer has probable cause to believe the person violated a provision of the Vehicle Code not declared to be a felony or a local ordinance and when the offense cited for was a factor in the occurrence of the traffic accident. Subd. (d) provides that the offense need not occur in the officer's presence. However, subd. (c) provides that such a citation is not considered as an "arrest."

Veh. Code § 14602.6(a)(1): This section specifically authorizes the immediate arrest (i.e., or cite) of a person, even though the driving occurred outside the officer's presence, when the defendant is "driving while his or her driving privilege was suspended or revoked,' driving a vehicle while his or her driving privilege is restricted pursuant to Section 13352 (driving while under the influence or engaging in a speed contest) or 23575 (installation of functioning, certified ignition interlock device) and the vehicle is not equipped with a functioning, certified interlock device, or driving a vehicle without ever having been issued a driver's license." However, no known case has yet to discuss the lawfulness of such an "out of the presence" arrest or citation.

Vehicle Code Parking Citations: Parking violations are "civil infractions" only, enforceable under a separate civil administrative scheme, and subject to civil penalties. (Veh. Code §§ 40200 et seq.) (See Tyler v. County of Alameda (1995) 34 Cal.App.4th 777; United States v. Choudhry (9th Cir. 2006) 461 F.3rd 1097, 1101; 82 Op.Att'y.Gen.Cal. 47 (1999).)

California peace officers are specifically authorized under the Vehicle Code to enforce parking infractions. (Veh. Code §40202(a); People v. Hart (1999) 74 Cal.App.4th 479; United States v. Choudhry, supra.)

A parking violation, even though civil in nature, is cause for a police officer to stop and detain a vehicle's driver despite the fact that such a violation is but a "pretext" for detaining the driver to investigate some other offense for which the officer does not have a reasonable suspicion, per the rule of Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89]. (United States v. Choudhry, supra.)

"Stale Misdemeanor Rule:" The arrest for a misdemeanor must occur at the time, or shortly after, the commission of the offense. (People v. Hampton (1985) 164 Cal.App.3rd 27.) If not, it is a "stale misdemeanor" for which the defendant may not be arrested even if it had occurred in the officer's presence. (People v. Craig (1907) 152 Cal. 42, 47.) What is and what is not stale depends upon the circumstances:

> "No hard and fast rule can, however, be laid down which will fit every case respecting what constitutes a reasonable time. What may be so in one case under particular circumstances may not be so in another case under different circumstances. All that can be affirmed with safety is that the officer must act promptly in making the arrest, and as soon as possible under the circumstances, and before he transacts other business.' . . . . '(W)e hold that in order to justify an arrest without warrant the arrestor must proceed as soon as may be to make the arrest. And if instead of doing that he goes about other matters unconnected with the arrest, the right to make the arrest without a warrant ceases, and in order to make a valid arrest he must then obtain a warrant therefor (sic)." (Oleson v. Pincock (1926) 68 Utah 507, 515-516 [251 P. 23, 26].)
>
> "In order to justify a delay, there should be a continued attempt on the part of the officer or person apprehending the offender to make the arrest; he cannot delay for any purpose which is foreign to the accomplishment of the arrest." (Jackson v. Superior Court (1950) 98 Cal.App.2nd 183, 187; next day, arrest illegal.)
>
> The stale misdemeanor rule applies to arrests by private citizens, under authority of P.C. § 837, as well. (Green v. Department of Motor Vehicles (1977) 68 Cal.App.3rd 536; arrest made some 35 to 40 minutes after the observation held to be lawful; see also Ogulin v. Jeffries (1953) 121 Cal.App.2nd 211; 20 minute delay, arrest lawful.)
>
> A police dispatcher, being subjected to defendant's numerous harassing telephone calls, may delegate to a police officer the responsibility to arrest the defendant for her. The offense, over the phone, was held to be in her presence. Also, the arrest was timely in that officers responded immediately to where defendant was calling from and took him into custody. The arrest was held to be a lawful citizen's arrest. (People v. Bloom (2010) 185 Cal.App.4th 1496.)

Sanctions for Violations: A violation by a peace officer of either the "in the presence," and, arguably, the "stale misdemeanor" rule, or any other statutory (as opposed to constitutional) limitation on taking someone into physical custody, does not require the suppression of any evidence, in that these rules are statutory, or non-constitutionally based case law, only, and evidence is suppressed only when it's discovery is the direct product of a constitutional violation (or a statute that specifically provides for the suppression of any resulting evidence). (Barry v. Fowler (9th Cir. 1990) 902 F.2nd 770, 772; People v. Donaldson (1995) 36 Cal.App.4th 532; People v. Trapane (1991) 1 Cal.App.4th Supp. 10; see also Jackson v. Superior Court (1950) 98 Cal.App.2nd 183; and People v. McKay (2002) 27 Cal.4th 601, 607-619, a violation of V.C. § 21650.1 (riding a bicycle in the wrong direction); and People v. Gomez (2004) 117 Cal.App.4th 531, 539, seat belt violation, citing Atwater v. City of Lago Vista (2001) 532 U.S. 318 [121 S.Ct. 1536; 149 L.Ed.2nd 549]; United States v. Miranda-Guerena (9th Cir. 2006) 445 F.3rd 1233; People v. Bennett (2011) 197 Cal.App.4th 907, 918; People v. Burton (2013) 219 Cal.App.4th Supp. 9, 13.)

> "Under California law, an officer may only make a warrantless arrest for a misdemeanor if he has probable cause to believe that the person committed the offense in the officer's presence. Cal. Penal Code § 836(a)(1). So if Vanegas's arrest was based on § 415(2), then the officers may have violated California law because his conduct was not in Officer Klotz's presence. But that does not change the result. That's because '[t]he requirement that a misdemeanor must have occurred in the officer's presence to justify a warrantless arrest is not grounded in the Fourth Amendment.' Barry v. Fowler, 902 F.2nd 770, 772 (9th Cir. 1990). So to establish a violation of the Fourth Amendment, it does not matter if Officer Klotz was present when Vanegas committed the misdemeanor. Rather, the 'crucial inquiry' is whether Officer Klotz had probable cause to make the arrest. Id. at 773." (Vanegas v. City of Pasadena (9th Cir. 2022) 46 F.4th 1159, 1165; holding that the officer did in fact have the necessary probable cause to effect an arrest even though the misdemeanor offense did not occur in his presence.)

> "(T)he requirement that a misdemeanor must have occurred in the officer's presence to justify a warrantless arrest is not grounded in the Fourth Amendment." (Welsh v. Wisconsin (1984) 466 U.S. 740, 756 [104 S.Ct. 2091; 80 L.Ed.2nd 732]; opinion of Justice White, citing Street v. Surdyka (4th Cir. 1974) 492 F.2nd 368, 371-272.)

> However, "police may not use probable cause for a traffic violation to justify an arrest for an unrelated offense where, under the facts known to police, they have no probable cause supporting the unrelated offense." (People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 765; ruling that just because officers could have arrested defendant for speeding, doesn't mean that that fact justifies an arrest for some other bookable (i.e., a felony) offense for which there was no probable cause. Consent to search obtained without probable cause to justify the arrest for a felony was held to be invalid.)

A violation by a police officer of a state statute, such statute limiting the officer's right to make a custodial arrest or a search, so long as not also in violation of the Fourth Amendment, does not result in the suppression of the resulting evidence unless mandated by the terms of the statute. While a state is empowered to enact more restrictive search and seizure rules, violation of those rules that are not also a Fourth Amendment violation, does not invoke the Fourth Amendment's exclusionary rule. (Virginia v. Moore (2008) 553 U.S. 164 [128 S.Ct. 1598; 170 L.Ed.2nd 559]; People v. Xinos (2011) 192 Cal.App.4th 637, 653.)

Violation of a State Law but not a Constitutional Requirement:

"The violation of a state statute, standing alone, does not form the basis for suppression under the Fourth Amendment." (People v. Hardacre (2004) 116 Cal.App.4th 1292, 1301; United States v. Miranda-Guerena (9th Cir. 2006) 445 F.3rd 1233.)

"It is elemental that the illegality tainting evidence and rendering it inadmissible is illegality flowing from the violation of a defendant's constitutional rights—primarily those involving unlawful searches and seizures in violation of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution and the essentially identical guarantee of personal privacy set forth in Article I, § 19, of the California Constitution. [Citations.] Evidence obtained in violation of a statute is not inadmissible per se unless the statutory violation also has a constitutional dimension." (People v. Brannon (1973) 32 Cal.App.3d 971, 975; People v. Pifer (1989) 216 Cal.App.3rd 956, 962-963.)

See also the same reasoning being used in Rodriguez v. Superior Court (1988) 199 Cal.App.3rd 1453, 1470; suggesting that because a "nighttime" search does not violate any constitutional principles, evidence discovered during a nighttime search without judicial authorization, in violation of the requirements of P.C. § 1533, should not result in suppression of any evidence.

And see People v. Collins (2004) 115 Cal.App.4th 137: Violation of the administrative provisions for the searching of prisoners in a prison, absent a constitutional violation, does not require the suppression of any resulting evidence.

The use of a "Phlebotomist" to draw blood from a "Driving while Under the Influence" (i.e., "DUI") suspect, as opposed to using one of the medical professionals authorized by Veh. Code § 23158, not being a constitutional violation merely due to the violation of the statute, does not result in the suppression of any evidence. (People v. Esayian (2003) 112 Cal.App.4th 1031; People v. McHugh (2004) 119 Cal.App.4th 202; People v. Mateljan (2005) 129 Cal.App.4th 367, 376-377.)

A violation of the "implied consent law," forcing a "DUI" (Driving While Under the Influence") suspect to submit to a blood test instead of a breath test, being a violation of state statutory law only, does not expose the officer to any civil liability. (Ritschel v. City of Fountain Valley (2005) 137 Cal.App.4th 107.)

> California's "implied consent law" is contained in Veh. Code § 23612.
>
> Note People v. Ling (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th Supp. 1, at page 10, where the Court noted that; "although the actions of the arresting officer failed to comply with the requirements of the implied consent law, no court has held that such a failure rises to the level of a constitutional violation, and we do not so hold now."
>
> But, telling a DUI arrestee, who was arrested on federal property (i.e., in a national park) that refusing to submit to a blood test is not a criminal violation in itself, which is the California rule, constitutes a Fifth Amendment "due process" violation when the federal rule, which governed the arrest in this case, is that it is a criminal violation to refuse a blood test (16 U.S.C. § 3), causing a reversal of the defendant's federal conviction. (United States v. Harrington (9th Cir. 2014) 749 F.3rd 825, 828-830.)

While a state may impose stricter standards on law enforcement in interpreting its own state constitution (i.e., "independent state grounds"), a prosecution in federal court is guided by the federal interpretation of the Fourth Amendment and is not required to use the state's stricter standards. (United States v. Brobst (9th Cir. 2009) 558 F.3rd 982, 989-991, 997.)

> Until passage of Proposition 8, California Courts were obligated to follows California's rules that in some circumstances may (and lawfully were allowed to) have been stricter than the federal standards. (See American Academy of Pediatrics v. Lungren (1997) 16 Cal.4th 307, 327-328; Raven v. Deukmejian (1990) 52 Cal.3rd 336. 353.)

Since passage of Proposition 8, California state courts now determine the reasonableness of a search or seizure by federal constitutional standards. (People v. Schmitz (2012) 55 Cal.4th 909, 916; People v. Steele (2016) 246 Cal.App.4th 1110, 1114-1115.)

Note: See "California's Exclusionary Rule; Proposition 8," above.

Mistakenly collecting blood samples for inclusion into California's DNA data base (See P.C. § 296), when the defendant did not actually have a qualifying prior conviction, does not require the suppression of the mistakenly collected blood samples, nor is it grounds to suppress the resulting match of the defendant's DNA with that left at a crime scene. (People v. Robinson (2010) 47 Cal.4th 1104, 1116-1129.)

Arrest for an Infraction or Misdemeanor:

Release Requirement: Persons subject to citation for the violation of a crime deemed to be an "infraction" must be released on a citation, except in limited circumstances. If the person to be cited does not have a driver's license or other satisfactory evidence of identification, the officer may (in lieu of a custodial arrest, at the officer's discretion) require the arrestee to place a right thumbprint, or left thumbprint or fingerprint if the person has a missing or disfigured right thumb, on the promise to appear. (P.C. § 853.5)

P.C. § 853.5 has been held to provide the exclusive grounds for a custodial arrest for an infraction. (Edgerly v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2013) 713 F.3rd 976, 981-985; citing In re Rottanak K. (1995) 37 Cal.App.4th 260, and People v. Williams (1992) 3 Cal.App.4th 1100.)

See "Exceptions," below.

See also Public Resources Code § 5786.17, for the authority for uniformed employees of a Parks and Recreation District to issue misdemeanor and infraction citations for violations of state law, city or county ordinances, or district rules, regulations, or ordinances when the violation is committed within a recreation facility and in the presence of the employee issuing the citation.

Exceptions: The exceptions to the requirement that the subject be released on his written promise to appear when arrested for an infraction, as listed in Pen. Code § 853.5(a), are:

- As specified in Veh. Code §§ 40302, 40303, 40305 and 40305.5 (see below); or
- The arrestee refuses to sign a written promise to appear; or
- The arrestee has no satisfactory identification and refuses to provide an unobstructed view of his or her full face for examination; or
- The arrestee, without satisfactory identification, refuses to provide a thumbprint or fingerprint.

  Because the section is written in the "disjunctive," it is the opinion of the State Attorney General that if the person does not have satisfactory evidence of identification, the officer has the discretion to take the person into physical custody despite the fact that the person is willing to sign a written promise to appear and to provide a thumbprint. (2005, Opn.Cal.Atty.Gen., # 05-206)

  Officers were entitled to summary judgment on plaintiff's false arrest claim failed because it was undisputed that plaintiff refused to sign a notice to appear, and Pen. Code § 835.5(a) authorized plaintiff's arrest and detention for failing to sign the notice to appear. (Agha v. Rosengren (9th Cir. 2008) 276 Fed.Appx. 579; 2008 U.S.App. LEXIS 9934; an unpublished decision.)

  See United States v. Mota (9th Cir. 1993) 982 F.2nd 1384, where it was held that a physical arrest of a person committing a business license infraction was a constitutional violation requiring the suppression of evidence: Questionable authority after Virginia v. Moore (2008) 553 U.S. 164 [128 S.Ct. 1598; 170 L.Ed.2nd 559], holding that booking a suspect for a non-bookable criminal violation is not a Fourth Amendment violation. (See "Sanctions for Violations," above.)

  Pen. Code § 853.5 has been held to provide the exclusive grounds for a custodial arrest for an infraction. (Edgerly v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2013) 713 F.3rd 976, 981-985; citing In re Rottanak K. (1995) 37 Cal.App.4th 260, and People v. Williams (1992) 3 Cal.App.4th 1100.)

Veh. Code § 40302: Mandatory Custodial Arrests: Persons who would otherwise be cited and released for a Vehicle Code infraction or misdemeanor "shall" be arrested and taken immediately before a magistrate when the person:

- Fails to present his driver's license or other satisfactory evidence of his identity for examination and refuses to provide an unobstructed view of his or her full face for examination; or
- Refuses to give his written promise to appear; or
- Demands an immediate appearance before a magistrate; or
- Is charged with violating V.C. § 23152 (i.e., "driving while under the influence.").

"Other Satisfactory Evidence of Identity:" The arresting officer has the discretion to determine what constitutes "other satisfactory evidence of identity," when the subject fails to provide a driver's license as required by the section. (People v. Monroe (1993) 12 Cal.App.4th 1174, 1182; People v. McKay (2002) 27 Cal.4th 601, 619-625.)

> However, that discretion is not unlimited. Identification documents which are an "effective equivalent" are presumptively (i.e., in the absence of contrary evidence) sufficient. This would include a California identity card (issued per Veh. Code § 13000) or any current written identification which contains at a minimum a photograph and description of the person named on it, a current mailing address, a signature of the person, and a serial or other identifying number. (People v. Monroe, supra, at p. 1186.)
>
> The officer is not legally obligated to make radio or other inquires in an attempt to verify the person's oral assertions of identity. (Id., at p. 1189; People v. McKay, supra.)
>
> An officer's refusal to accept oral statements as sufficient evidence of identity will be upheld on appeal. (People v. McKay, supra; People v. Grant (1990) 217 Cal.App.3rd 1451, 1455; see also People v. Anderson (1968) 266 Cal.App.2nd 125, 128.)

> See B&P Code § 25660, describing what is considered to be "bona fide evidence of age*" for purposes of purchasing alcoholic beverages:
>
> (1) A valid vehicle operator's license containing the person's name, date of birth, physical description and picture.

(2) A valid passport issued by the United States or a foreign government.
(3) A valid military identification card that includes a date of birth and picture of the person.

Veh. Code § 40303; Arrestable Offenses: This section lists 17 different circumstances in which an arresting officer has the option of either taking a person "without unnecessary delay" before a magistrate, or releasing the person with a 10-days' written notice to appear:

- Violation of Veh. Code §§ 10852 or 10853, relating to injuring or tampering with a vehicle.
- Violation of Veh. Code §§ 23103 or 23104, relating to reckless driving.
- Violation of Veh. Code § 2800(a), relating to failure to stop and submit to an inspection or test of a vehicle's lights per Veh. Code § 2804.
- Violation of Veh. Code § 2800(a), relating to failure to stop and submit to a brake test.
- Violation of Veh. Code § 2800(a), relating to failure to stop and submit to a vehicle inspection, measurement, or weighing, per Veh. Code § 2802, or a refusal to adjust the load or obtain a permit, per Veh. Code § 2803.
- Violation of Veh. Code § 2800(a), relating to continuing to drive after being lawfully ordered not to drive by a member of the California Highway Patrol for violating the driver's hours of service or driver's log regulations, per Veh. Code § 34501(a).
- Violation of Veh. Code § 2800(b), (c) or (d), relating to failure or refusal to comply with any lawful out-of-service order.
- Violation of Veh. Code §§ 20002 or 20003, relating to duties in the event of an accident.
- Violation of Veh. Code § 23109, relating to participating in a speed contest or exhibition of speed.
- Violation of Veh. Code §§ 14601, 14601.1, 14601.2, or 14601.5, relating to driving on a suspended or revoked license.
- When the person arrested has attempted to evade arrest.
- Violation of Veh. Code § 23332, relating to persons upon vehicular crossings.
- Violation of Veh. Code § 2813, relating to the refusal to stop and submit a vehicle to an inspection of its size, weight, and equipment.
- Violation of Veh. Code § 21461.5, relating to being found on a freeway within 24 hours of being cited for same, and refusing to leave when lawfully ordered to do so by a peace officer after having been informed that he is subject to arrest.

- Violation of Veh. Code § 2800(a) relating to being found on a bridge or overpass within 24 hours of being cited for same, and refusing to leave when lawfully ordered to do so by a peace officer pursuant to Veh. Code § 21962, after having been informed that he is subject to arrest.
- Violation of Veh. Code § 21200.5, relating to riding a bicycle while under the influence of alcohol and/or drugs.
- Violation of Veh. Code § 21221.5, relating to operating a motorized scooter while under the influence of alcohol and/or drugs.

Veh. Code § 40303.5: "Fix-It Tickets:" An arresting officer shall permit a person arrested for any of the following offenses to execute a notice containing a promise to correct the violation in accordance with the provisions of Veh. Code § 40610 unless the arresting officer finds that any of the disqualifying conditions specified in V Veh. Code § 40610(b) exist:

> (a) A registration infraction set forth in Veh. Code §§ 4000 et seq. (Division 3).
> (b) A driver's license infraction set forth in Veh. Code §§ 12500 et seq. (Division 6), Veh. Code § 12951(a), relating to possession of a driver's license.
>
> (c) Veh. Code § 21201, relating to bicycle equipment.

> (f) Veh. Code § 2482, relating to registration decals for vehicles transporting inedible kitchen grease.

Veh. Code § 12801.5(e): The Unlicensed Driver: "Notwithstanding (Veh. Code) Section 40300 or any other provision of law, a peace officer may not detain or arrest a person solely on the belief that the person is an unlicensed driver, unless the officer has reasonable cause to believe the person is under the age of 16 years."

> See Bingham v. City of Manhattan Beach (9th Cir. 2003) 341 F.3rd 939, 944; arresting a person for driving with an expired driver's license, in contravention of this statute, may subject the offending/arresting officer to federal civil liability.

> Note: This is questionable authority after Virginia v. Moore (2008) 553 U.S. 164 [128 S.Ct. 1598; 170 L.Ed.2nd 559], holding that booking a suspect for a non-bookable criminal violation is not a Fourth Amendment violation. (See "Sanctions for Violations," above; and see Harvey v. Coronado (9th Cir. 2012) 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 187471; where an arrest for Veh. Code § 12500 was held to be a lawful arrest.)

The California Supreme Court, in People v. Lopez (2019) 8 Cal.5th 353, at pages 373-374.), lists the three legal alternatives for dealing with the driver of an automobile who is doing so without a driver's license:

> "When an officer has obtained satisfactory evidence of a detainee's identity, he or she may cite and release the detainee. (Pen. Code § 853.5, subd. (a); Veh. Code §§ 40303, 40500, 40504; People v. Superior Court (Simon) (1972) 7 Cal.3rd 186, 199. . . . (fn. omitted) The officer also has discretion to release the suspect with a warning against committing future violations. (Pen. Code § 849, subd. (b)(1); People v. McGaughran ((1979)) 25 Cal.3rd (577) at p. 584.) And finally, if no other path seems prudent or permissible, the officer can arrest the detainee and take him or her to be booked into jail for the traffic violation. (Veh. Code, § 40302; Atwater v. Lago Vista (2001) 532 U.S. 318, 323 . . . ; Knowles (v. Iowa (1998)) 525 U.S. (113) at p. 118; (People v.) McKay ((2002)) 27 Cal.4th (601), at pp. 620-625.) In the end, arrest is one option—but it is certainly not the only alternative to a warrantless search. (fn. omitted)"

Veh. Code § 40305: Non-Residents: A nonresident who is arrested for any violation of the Vehicle Code and who fails to provide satisfactory evidence of identity and an address within this State at which he can be located may be taken immediately before a magistrate.

Veh. Code § 40305.5: Traffic Arrest Bail Bond Certificate: Provisions for the arresting officer to receive a guaranteed traffic arrest bail bond certificate (with the requirements for such a certificate listed) when a nonresident driver of a commercial vehicle of 7,000 pounds or more (excluding house cars) is arrested for violating any provision of the Vehicle Code and fails to provide satisfactory evidence of identification and an address within the State at which he can be located.

Pen. Code § 853.6(i): Misdemeanor Citations: A person arrested for a misdemeanor must also be cited (on a "misdemeanor citation form") and released unless one of the following statutory exceptions applies:

- The person is intoxicated.
- The person requires medical treatment.
- The person was arrested for one or more of the offenses listed in Veh. Code §§ 40302 or 40303 (see above).
- The person has outstanding warrants.
- The person is unable to provide "satisfactory evidence of identification" (see above).
- Prosecution would be jeopardized by immediate release.
- Reasonable likelihood that the offense would continue or that persons or property would be imminently endangered by the release of the person.
- The person demands to be taken before a magistrate or refuses to sign the notice to appear.
- There is reason to believe that the person would not appear on the citation. An arrest warrant or failure to appear that is pending at the time of the current offense shall constitute reason to believe that the person would not appear as specified in the notice.
- The person was subject to Pen. Code § 1270.1.

  Pen. Code § 1270.1 prohibits the release of a person arrested for a specified crime on his or her own recognizance, or on bail in an amount that is either more or less than the amount that is contained in the bail schedule for that offense. This includes the following offenses:

  - Serious felonies, per Pen. Code § 1192.7(c).
  - Violent felonies, per Pen. Code § 667.5(c).
  - Domestic violence with corporal injury, per Pen. Code § 273.5.
  - Witness intimidation, per Pen. Code § 136.1(c).
  - Spousal rape, per Pen. Code § 262.
  - Stalking, per Pen. Code § 646.9.
  - Felony criminal threats, per Pen. Code § 422.
  - Misdemeanor domestic violence, per Pen. Code § 243(e)(1).
  - Restraining order violations, per Pen. Code § 273.6, if the detained person made threats to kill or harm, engaged in violence against, or went to the residence or workplace of, the protected party.

- The person has one or more failures to appear in court on previous misdemeanor citations that have not been resolved.
- The person has been cited, arrested, or convicted for misdemeanor or felony theft from a store or from a vehicle in the previous six months.
- There is probable cause to believe that the person is guilty of committing organized retail theft, in violation of Pen. Code § 490.4.

It is not unconstitutional to make a custodial arrest (i.e., transporting to jail or court) of a person arrested for a minor misdemeanor (Atwater v. City of Lago Vista (2001) 532 U.S. 318 [121 S.Ct. 1536; 149 L.Ed.2nd 549].), or even for a fine-only, infraction. (People v. McKay (2002) 27 Cal.4th 601, 607; see also United States v. McFadden (2nd Cir. 2001) 238 F.3rd 198, 204.)

California's statutory provisions require the release of misdemeanor arrestees in most circumstances. (e.g., see P.C. §§ 853.5, 853.6, V.C. §§ 40303, 40500) However, violation of these statutory requirements is not a constitutional violation and, therefore, should not result in suppression of any evidence recovered as a result of such an arrest. (People v. McKay, supra, at pp. 607-619, a violation of V.C. § 21650.1 (riding a bicycle in the wrong direction); People v. Gomez (2004) 117 Cal.App.4th 531, 539, seat belt violation (V.C. § 27315(d)(1)), citing Atwater v. City of Lago Vista (2001) 532 U.S. 318 [121 S.Ct. 1536; 149 L.Ed.2nd 549]; People v. Bennett (2011) 197 Cal.App.4th 907, 918.)

The United States Supreme Court has recently affirmed this principle:

> A violation by a police officer of a state statute, such statute limiting the officer's right to make a custodial arrest or a search, so long as not also in violation of the Fourth Amendment, does not result in the suppression of the resulting evidence unless mandated by the terms of the statute. While a state is empowered to enact more restrictive search and seizure rules, violation of those rules that are not also a Fourth Amendment violation, does not invoke the Fourth Amendment's exclusionary rule. (Virginia v. Moore (2008) 553 U.S. 164 [128 S.Ct. 1598; 170 L.Ed.2nd 559].)

An otherwise lawful arrest, done without statutory authority, has been upheld in other circumstances:

> Where a federal officer arrested an obviously intoxicated driver just outside a federal enclave and beyond the officer's territorial jurisdiction after a lawful traffic stop, the Fourth Amendment does not require the exclusion of the evidence obtained in a search incident to the arrest because the arrest was supported by probable cause. Therefore, it was not an unreasonable seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment despite the lack of any statutory authority for making the arrest. (United States v. Ryan (1st Cir. 2013) 731 F.3rd 66.)

However, "police may not use probable cause for a traffic violation to justify an arrest for an unrelated offense where, under the facts known to police, they have no probable cause supporting the unrelated offense." (People v. Espino (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 746, 765; ruling that just because officers could have arrested defendant for speeding, doesn't mean that that fact justifies an arrest for some other bookable (i.e., a felony) offense for which there was no probable cause. Consent to search obtained without probable cause to justify the arrest for a felony was held to be invalid.)

With an Existing Warrant of Arrest:

Pen. Code § 818: A peace officer serving upon a person a warrant of arrest for a misdemeanor offense under the Vehicle Code or under any local ordinance relating to stopping, standing, parking, or operation of a motor vehicle and where no written promise to appear has been filed and the warrant states on its face that a citation may be used in lieu of physical arrest, may, instead of taking the person before a magistrate, prepare a notice to appear and release the person on his or her promise to appear. In such a case, issuing a citation is deemed to be compliance with directions of the warrant. The officer shall endorse on the warrant; "Section 818, Penal Code, complied with," and return the warrant to the magistrate who issued it.

Pen. Code § 827.1: A person for whom an arrest warrant has been issued for a misdemeanor offense may be released upon the issuance of a citation, issued per Pen. Code §§ 853.6 to 853.8, in lieu of physical arrest, unless one of the following conditions exists:

- The misdemeanor cited in the warrant involves violence.
- The misdemeanor cited in the warrant involves a firearm.
- The misdemeanor cited in the warrant involves resisting arrest.
- The misdemeanor cited in the warrant involves giving false information to a peace officer.
- The person arrested is a danger to himself or herself or others due to intoxication or being under the influence of drugs or narcotics.
- The person requires medical examination or medical care or was otherwise unable to care for his or her own safety.
- The person has other ineligible charged pending against him or her.
- There is reasonable likelihood that the offense or offenses would continue to resume, or that the safety of persons or property would be immediately endangered by the release of the person.
- The person refuses to sign the notice to appear.
- The person cannot provide satisfactory evidence of personal identification.
- The warrant of arrest indicates that the person is not eligible to be released on a citation.

Arrest Warrants*:

Defined: A warrant of arrest is a written order, signed by a magistrate, and generally directed to a peace officer, commanding the arrest of a named defendant. (Pen. Code §§ 813, 814, 815, & 819)

A warrant will issue "if, and only if, the magistrate is satisfied from the complaint that the offense complained of has been committed and that there is reasonable ground to believe that the defendant has committed it, . . ." (Emphasis added; Pen. Code § 813(a))

"A warrant is a judicial mandate to an officer to conduct a search or make an arrest, and the officer has a sworn duty to carry out its provisions." (United States v. Leon (1984) 468 U. S. 897, 920, fn. 21 [104 S.Ct. 3405; 82 L. Ed.2nd 677].)

Effective January 1, 2022, the authority to make a declaration of probable cause in support of a warrant for arrest (as contained in P.C. § 817(a)(1)) when the defendant is a peace officer has been expanded from a "peace officer" to also include an employee of a public prosecutor's office (e.g., a deputy district attorney, deputy city attorney, or investigator).

The warrant must be supported by a sworn statement made in writing, reflecting the probable cause for the arrest. (Pen. Code § 817(b))

Content: An arrest warrant is directed to "any peace officer, or any public officer or employee authorized to serve process where the warrant is for a violation of a statute or ordinance which such person has the duty to enforce" (Emphasis added), and states the following (Pen. Code § 816):

- The crime, designated in general terms.
- The defendant's name, or, if this is unknown, any name. (E.g., "John Doe.")
- The date and time of issuance.
- Bail.
- The city or county where it is issued.
- The duty of the arresting officer to bring the defendant before the magistrate.
- The judge's signature.
- The court.

Case Law:

An arrest warrant issued solely upon the complainant's "information and belief" cannot stand if the complaint or an accompanying affidavit does not allege underlying facts upon which the magistrate can independently find probable cause to arrest the accused. Pen. Code §§ 806, 813, and 952 do not authorize the issuance of warrants of arrest based solely upon complaints couched in the language of the charged offense and therefore do not violate the Fourth Amendment; (See People v. Sesslin (1968) 68 Cal.2nd 418.)

In a case of mistaken identity, the county did not violate the Fourth Amendment by issuing a warrant without including a number corresponding to the true subject's fingerprints in that the warrant satisfied the particularity requirement as it contained both the subject's name and a detailed physical description. Even if the Fourth Amendment does require the county to include more detailed information in a warrant, the plaintiff failed to show that the county had a policy or custom of failing to do so. Also, the sheriff's deputies were not unreasonable in believing that the plaintiff was the subject of the warrant at the time of arrest given the name and date of birth on the warrant matched the plaintiff's, and the height and weight descriptors associated with the warrant were within one inch and 10 pounds of the plaintiff's true size. (Rivera v. County of Los Angeles (2014) 745 F.3rd 384, 388-389.)

The Rivera Court also found that the mistaken incarceration did not violate defendant's Fourteenth Amendment due process rights absent evidence showing that the civil defendants should have known the plaintiff was entitled to release because: (1) the circumstances indicated to the defendants that further investigation was warranted, or (2) the defendants denied the plaintiff access to the courts for an extended period of time. Neither circumstance applied in this case. (Id., at pp. 389-392.)

A detention pursuant to a valid warrant but in the face of repeated protests of innocence may, after the lapse of a certain amount of time, be held to have deprived the accused of his liberty without due process of law, a Fifth or Fourteenth Amendment violation. A wrongful detention can ripen into a due process violation, but it is the plaintiff's burden to show that "it was or should have been known [by the defendant] that the [plaintiff] was entitled to release." (Gant v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2014) 772 F.3rd 608, 619-623.)

And where the circumstances should have prompted verification of an arrestee's identity (e.g., a different middle name and a significant different physical description), a Fourteenth Amendment due process violation may be found. (Garcia v. County of Riverside (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 635.)

Where officers had an arrest warrant for defendant, their initial entry and protective sweep of defendant's motel room was held to have not violated the Fourth Amendment. An arrest warrant, based on probable cause, implicitly carries with it the limited authority to enter a dwelling in which the suspect lives when there is reason to believe the suspect is inside. A person's hotel or motel room is considered a "dwelling" in this context. To enter a hotel or motel room to execute an arrest warrant, a law enforcement officer must have a reasonable belief that: (1) the room is in fact the suspect's and; (2) the suspect is inside. Once inside the room, officers may perform a protective sweep of the premises and they are allowed to seize any contraband in plain view. (United States v. Ross (11th Cir. 2019) 941 F.3rd 1058.)

Under the procedures followed by an Oregon County Circuit Court, the "defendant release assistance officer" had not been delegated authority to make release decisions. Rather, pursuant to Or. Rev. Stat. § 135.235, he was authorized only to make recommendations to a judge. Therefore, the officer's action in submitting a bare unsigned warrant for plaintiff's arrest to a judge should have been seen as making a recommendation only that the warrant be signed. Accordingly, the officer was not entitled to absolute immunity in plaintiff's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 lawsuit. (Patterson v. Van Arsdel (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 826.)

Types of Arrest Warrants:

Bench Warrant: Pen. Code § 978.5: Bench Warrants; When Available:

(a) A bench warrant of arrest may be issued whenever a defendant fails to appear in court as required by law including, but not limited to, the following situations:

(1) If the defendant is ordered by a judge or magistrate to personally appear in court at a specific time and place.

(2) If the defendant is released from custody on bail and is ordered by a judge or magistrate, or other person authorized to accept bail, to personally appear in court at a specific time and place.

(3) If the defendant is released from custody on their own recognizance and promises to personally appear in court at a specific time and place.

(4) If the defendant is released from custody or arrest upon citation by a peace officer or other person authorized to issue citations and the defendant has signed a promise to personally appear in court at a specific time and place.

(5) If a defendant is authorized to appear by counsel and the court or magistrate orders that the defendant personally appear in court at a specific time and place.

(6) If an information or indictment has been filed in the superior court and the court has fixed the date and place for the defendant personally to appear for arraignment.

(b) The bench warrant may be served in any county in the same manner as a warrant of arrest.

(c) This section shall become operative on July 1, 2026.

Case Law:

A bench warrant, issued by a neutral and detached magistrate upon a defendant's failure to appear, is legal justification for making entry into a residence in which there is probable cause to believe the subject of the warrant is hiding, despite the fact that such a warrant is issued without a finding of probable cause. (United States v. Gooch (9th Cir. 2007) 506 F.3rd 1156.)

Pen. Code § 978.5 does not set forth the elements of any crime. Rather, that section simply establishes when a court may issue a bench warrant for a defendant who has failed to appear in court as required by law. The issuing of the bench warrant is not equivalent to a conviction for failure to appear. There is no requirement that the court must have evidence that a defendant would be held liable under all the elements of willful failure to appear before issuing a bench warrant. And even if a bench warrant is issued, a defendant is arrested under that warrant, and the defendant faces trial on that charge, the prosecution will bear the burden to prove that the defendant's absence at the hearing was willful. In satisfying its burden, the prosecution would no doubt have to show that the defendant knew about the hearing (i.e., had actual notice). However, actual notice of a hearing isn't required before issuing a bench warrant under Penal Code section 978.5. Here, the defendant appeared at hearings for which he had received notice at prior hearings, but his case was continued due to the COVID pandemic. The trial court sent notice to the last address on file on three occasions, before issuing the warrant even though defense counsel asserted the defendant was couch-surfing and did not have a working cell phone to have had actual notice. The Court of Appeal noted it was not too burdensome to require him to check in with the court or his counsel, the trial court provided notice by mail, and courts do not have the resources to track defendants down and provide them notice of a hearing before merely issuing a warrant. "It cannot be, even in dealing with a pandemic, that this defendant, who has been charged with serious crimes, can avoid answering for those charges simply by claiming a lack of actual notice thereby stripping the court of its discretion to issue a bench warrant." (Valderas v. Superior Court (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 172.)

Electronic Arrest Warrant; Pen. Code § 817(b), (c) & (d)**:

Effective January 1, 2019, the requirement of a telephone conversation between a magistrate and an officer/declarant during the obtaining of an arrest warrant, including an oral oath over the telephone from an officer (declarant), has been eliminated. Now, an arrest warrant may be issued completely electronically by facsimile, email, or computer server.

The procedure requires the officer/declarant to sign under penalty of perjury his or her declaration in support of the arrest warrant, with the signature being a digital or electronic signature if email or computer server are used to obtain the warrant.

The statute continues to permit the magistrate to accept an oral statement made under penalty of perjury that is recorded and transcribed, and continues to provide a magistrate with the discretion to examine under oath the person seeking the warrant and any witness that may be produced. A warrant signed by a magistrate and received by the declarant is deemed to be the original warrant.

See Pen. Code § 817(f) for the suggested warrant format.

"Ramey Warrant*:" A term of art used to describe an arrest warrant issued prior to the court filing of a criminal case against a specific defendant. (See People v. Ramey (1976) 16 Cal.3rd 263.)

Note: Ordinarily, a prerequisite to the issuance of an arrest warrant is the filing of a complaint with the magistrate, charging a felony originally triable in the superior court of the county, or where the complaint is presented to a judge in a misdemeanor or infraction case, charging an offense triable in that judge's court.

However, the formal filing of a written complaint is not a condition precedent to issuance of an arrest warrant. (People v. Case (1980) 105 Cal.App.3rd 826, 832.)

Long approved by case law (People v. Case, supra*; and People v. Bittaker (1989) 48 Cal.3rd 1046, 1070-1072.), pre-filing arrest warrants are now authorized by statute. (Pen. Code § 817(a))

Pen. Code § 817 (effective 1/1/22):

(1) Before issuing an arrest warrant, the magistrate shall examine a declaration of probable cause made by a peace officer or, when the defendant is a peace officer, an employee of a public prosecutor's office of this state, in accordance with subdivisions (b), (c), and (d), as applicable. The magistrate shall issue a warrant of probable cause for the arrest of the defendant only if the magistrate is satisfied after reviewing the declaration that there exists probable cause that the offense described in the declaration has been committed and that the defendant described therein has committed the offense.

(2) The warrant of probable cause for arrest shall not begin a complaint process pursuant to Section 740 or 813. The warrant of probable cause for arrest shall have the same authority for service as set forth in Section 840 and the same time limitations as that of an arrest warrant issued pursuant to Section 813.

(b) The declaration in support of the warrant of probable cause for arrest shall be a sworn statement made in writing. If the declarant transmits the proposed warrant and all affidavits and supporting documents to the magistrate using facsimile transmission equipment, email, or computer server, the conditions in subdivision (d) shall apply.

(c) In lieu of the written declaration required in subdivision (b), the magistrate may accept an oral statement made under penalty of perjury and recorded and transcribed. The transcribed statement shall be deemed to be the declaration for the purposes of this section. The recording of the sworn oral statement and the transcribed statement shall be certified by the magistrate receiving it and shall be filed with the clerk of the court. In the alternative, the sworn oral statement may be recorded by a certified court reporter who shall certify the transcript of the statement, after which the magistrate receiving it shall certify the transcript, which shall be filed with the clerk of the court.

(1) The declarant shall sign under penalty of perjury their declaration in support of the warrant of probable cause for arrest. The declarant's signature shall be in the form of a digital signature or electronic signature if email or computer server is used for transmission to the magistrate. The proposed warrant and all supporting declarations and attachments shall be transmitted to the magistrate utilizing facsimile transmission equipment, email, or computer server.

(2) The magistrate shall verify that all the pages sent have been received, that all the pages are legible, and that the declarant's signature, digital signature, or electronic signature is genuine.

(e) A warrant of probable cause for arrest shall contain the information required pursuant to Sections 815 and 815a.

(f) A warrant of probable cause for arrest may be in substantially the following form:

County of ___, State of California.

The people of the State of California to any peace officer of the STATE:

Proof by declaration under penalty of perjury having been made this day to me by (name of declarant),

I find that there is probable cause to believe that the crime(s) of (designate the crime/s) has (have) been committed by the defendant named and described below.

Therefore, you are commanded to arrest (name of defendant) and to bring the defendant before any magistrate in ___ County pursuant to Sections 821, 825, 826, and 848 of the Penal Code.

Defendant is admitted to bail in the amount of dollars ($).

Time Issued: (Signature of the Judge)
Dated: Judge of the Court

(g) Before issuing a warrant, the magistrate may examine under oath the person seeking the warrant and any witness the person may produce, take the written declaration of the person or witness, and cause the person or witness to subscribe the declaration. If the magistrate decides to issue the warrant, the magistrate shall do all of the following:

(1) Sign the warrant. The magistrate's signature may be in the form of a digital signature or electronic signature if email or computer server was used for transmission to the magistrate.

(2) Note on the warrant the date and time of the issuance of the warrant.

(3) Transmit via facsimile transmission equipment, email, or computer server the signed warrant to the declarant. The warrant, signed by the magistrate and received by the declarant, shall be deemed to be the original warrant.

(h) An original warrant of probable cause for arrest or the duplicate original warrant of probable cause for arrest is sufficient for booking a defendant into custody.

(i) After the defendant named in the warrant of probable cause for arrest has been taken into custody, the agency that obtained the warrant shall file a "certificate of service" with the clerk of the issuing court. The certificate of service shall contain all of the following:

(1) The date and time of service.
(2) The name of the defendant arrested.
(3) The location of the arrest.
(4) The location where the defendant was incarcerated.

A "DNA, John Doe" Warrant:

An arrest warrant must identify the subject of the subject of the warrant with reasonable certainty. Describing the subject of an arrest warrant as merely "John Doe" with a description of a particular DNA profile is sufficient to meet this constitutional requirement. (State of Wisconsin v. Dabney (2003) 254 Wis.2nd 43 [663 N.W.2nd 366].)

The California Supreme Court is in agreement, holding that a DNA profile is an accurate, reliable, and valid method of identifying a defendant in an arrest warrant because it is particular in its description. It neither violates the Fourth Amendment, California's statutes authorizing arrest warrants (see P.C. §§ 813, 815, 859, 860), nor a defendant's due process rights. (People v. Robinson (2010) 47 Cal.4th 1104, 1129-1143.)

Pen. Code § 3455(b): Post-Release Supervision Warrant:

> Subd. (1): With probable cause to believe that a subject on "postrelease supervision" is violating any term or condition of his or her release, a peace officer may arrest, with or without a warrant, the person and bring him or her before the supervising county agency established by the county board of supervisors pursuant to P.C. § 3451(a). (See People v. Young (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 972, 979-980.)
>
> > Also, an officer employed by the supervising county agency may seek a warrant and a court or its designated hearing officer appointed pursuant to Gov't. Code § 71622.5 shall have the authority to issue a warrant for that person's arrest.
>
> Subd. (2): The court or its designated hearing officer has the authority to issue a warrant for any person who is the subject of a petition filed under this section who has failed to appear for a hearing on the petition or for any reason in the interest of justice, or to remand to custody a person who does appear at a hearing on the petition for any reason in the interest of justice.

A Federal "Administrative Warrant:"

> Issued pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 4213(a) for the retaking of an alleged parole violator, this type of warrant is not subject to the oath or affirmation requirement of the Fourth Amendment. (United States v. Sherman (9th Cir. 2007) 502 F.3rd 869; noting that the rule is to the contrary when the warrant is for a supervised release violation, per 18 U.S.C. § 3583(i), as held by United States v. Vargas-Amaya (9th Cir. 2004) 389 F.3rd 901.)

Lowest Priority on Gender-Affirming Care Warrant:

> Pen. Code § 819*: *Out of State Arrest Warrant Based on Violating Another State's Law Against Providing, Receiving, or Allowing a Child to Receive Gender-Affirming Health Care or Gender-Affirming Mental Health Care as Lowest Law Enforcement Priority:
>
> (a) It is the public policy of the state that an out-of-state arrest warrant for an individual based on violating another state's law against providing, receiving, or allowing their child to receive gender-affirming health care or gender-affirming mental health care is the lowest law enforcement priority.

(b) California law enforcement agencies shall not knowingly make or participate in the arrest or participate in any extradition of an individual pursuant to an out-of-state arrest warrant for violation of another state's law against providing, receiving, or allowing a child to receive gender-affirming health care and gender-affirming mental health care in this state, if that care is lawful under the laws of this state, to the fullest extent permitted by federal law.

(c) No state or local law enforcement agency shall cooperate with or provide information to any individual or out-of-state agency or department regarding the provision of lawful gender-affirming health care or gender-affirming mental health care performed in this state.

(d) Nothing in this section shall prohibit the investigation of any criminal activity in this state which may involve the performance of gender-affirming health care or gender-affirming mental health care provided that no information relating to any medical procedure performed on a specific individual may be shared with an out-of-state agency or any other individual.

(e) For the purpose of this subdivision, "gender-affirming health care" and "gender-affirming mental health care" shall have the same meaning as provided in Section 16010.2 of the Welfare and Institutions Code.

Notes:

> Subd. (b)(3)(A) of W&I Code § 16010.2 provides the following definition:
>
> > "Gender affirming health care" means medically necessary health care that respects the gender identity of the patient, as experienced and defined by the patient, and may include, but is not limited to, the following:
> >
> > > (i) Interventions to suppress the development of endogenous secondary sex characteristics.
> > > (ii) Interventions to align the patient's appearance or physical body with the patient's gender identity.
> > > (iii) Interventions to alleviate symptoms of clinically significant distress resulting from gender dysphoria, as defined in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, 5th Edition.

Subd. (b)(3)(B) of W&I Code § 16010.2 provides the following definition:

> "Gender affirming mental health care" means mental health care or behavioral health care that respects the gender identity of the patient, as experienced and defined by the patient, and may include, but is not limited to, developmentally appropriate exploration and integration of identity, reduction of distress, adaptive coping, and strategies to increase family acceptance.

Necessity of an Arrest Warrant:

Warrantless arrests, at least at any location other than within one's private home or other area to which the public does not have ready access (see below), have been held by the United States Supreme Court to be lawful, at least when the offense is a felony (whether or not it occurred in the officer's presence), or for any offense (felony or misdemeanor) which occurs in the officer's presence (see below). (United States v. Watson (1976) 423 U.S. 411 [96 S.Ct. 820; 46 L.Ed.2nd 598].)

Surrounding a barricaded suspect in his home is in effect a warrantless arrest, justified by the exigent circumstances. The passage of time during the ensuing standoff does not dissipate that exigency to where officers are expected to seek the authorization of a judge to take the suspect into physical custody. (Fisher v. City of San Jose (9th Cir. 2009) 558 F.3rd 1069; overruling its own prior holding (at 509 F.3rd 952) that failure to obtain an arrest warrant during a 12-hour standoff resulted in an illegal arrest of the barricaded suspect.)

Armed police officers surrounding defendant's home and then ordering him out via a public address system is in effect an arrest within the home, and absent a warrant or exigent circumstances, is illegal. The fact that defendant had just fled into his home, avoiding being arrested on his front porch for a misdemeanor, was held not to be an exigent circumstance. (United States v. Nora (9th Cir. 2014) 765 F.3rd 1049, 1052-1060.)

> See United States v. Mallory (3rd Cir. 2014) 765 F.3rd 373, for the exact opposite conclusion on the lawfulness of entering a residence in hot pursuit under the exact same circumstances, although the firearm should have been suppressed as a product of an unlawful warrantless search after the residence was secured.

With an arrest warrant, no search warrant is needed in order to lawfully enter a house so long as it is a dwelling in which the suspect lives, and when (1) the officers have a reasonable belief that the suspect resides at the place to be entered and (2) reason to believe that the suspect is present when the officers enter. (United States v. Ford (8th Cir. IA 2018) 888 F.3rd 922.)

Service and Return:

Felony arrest warrants may be executed anytime, anywhere, day or night. (P.C. §§ 836(a), 840)

But see Steagald v. United States (1981) 451 U.S. 204 [101 S.Ct. 1642; 68 L.Ed.2nd 38], mandating a search warrant to execute an arrest warrant in a third party's home.

Misdemeanor arrest warrants may be served anytime, anywhere, day or night, except that when the suspect is not in public but not already in custody (e.g., in his residence), the warrant may not be served between 10:00 p.m. and 6:00 a.m. unless the warrant is "endorsed" for "night service" in which case it may be served at any time. (P.C. § 840(4))

"Night Service" must be justified in the warrant affidavit, describing the need to make the arrest in other than the daytime. (See People v. Kimble (1988) 44 Cal.3rd 480, 494; discussing the "greater intrusiveness" of a nighttime search and the need for justifying nighttime service for a search warrant.)

Query: If an officer is already lawfully in the house, may a misdemeanor arrest warrant be executed despite the lack of a nighttime endorsement? Unknown. P.C. § 840 itself does not provide for any such exception. But since this limitation on arrests has been held to be statutory only, and not of constitutional origins (People v. Whitted (1976) 60 Cal.App.3rd 569.), no evidence would likely be subject to suppression anyway, making this question moot.

Necessity of Having a Copy of the Arrest Warrant: The law contemplates that when an arrest is made, the officer should have a copy of the warrant in his possession. (People v. Thomas (1957) 156 Cal.App.2nd 117, 120.) However, it has been held that there is no constitutional violation even though he does not. (P.C. § 842; People v. Miller (1961) 193 Cal.App.2nd 838, 839.)

However, if requested, the arrestee shall be shown a copy of the warrant as soon as it is practicable to do so. (P.C. § 842)

Pursuant to P.C. § 817(g): "An original warrant of probable cause for arrest or the duplicate original warrant of probable cause for arrest shall be sufficient for booking a defendant into custody."

Knock and Notice: The search warrant "knock and notice" rules (see "Searches With a Search Warrant" (Chapter 10), below) apply as well to the execution of an arrest warrant, and for warrantless arrests within a residence. (P.C. § 844; see "Knock and Notice," below.)

The rule that evidence will not be suppressed as a result of a knock and notice violation, as dictated by Hudson v. Michigan (2006) 547 U.S. 586 [126 S.Ct. 2159; 165 L.Ed.2nd 56] (a search warrant case), is applicable as well as in a warrantless, yet lawful, arrest case, pursuant to P.C. § 844. (In re Frank S. (2006) 142 Cal.App.4th 145.)

However, see United States v. Weaver (D.C. Cir. 2015) 808 F.3rd 26, where the D.C. Court of Appeal rejected the applicability of Hudson v. Michigan, supra, in an arrest warrant service situation, and held that federal agents violated the knock-and-announce rule by failing to announce their purpose before entering defendant's apartment. By knocking but failing to announce their purpose, the agents gave defendant no opportunity to protect the privacy of his home. The exclusionary rule was the appropriate remedy for knock-and-announce violations in the execution of arrest warrants at a person's home.

Officers seeking to execute an arrest warrant observed defendant through his open front door. Upon calling to defendant, he attempted to flee out through the back with the officers in pursuit. The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals held that the knock-and-announce rule did not apply in this circumstance. When officers enter a home through an open door of a suspect's home in the execution of an arrest warrant, the court reasoned that the rule's underlying purpose (i.e., to avoid violent confrontations) was satisfied. Requiring officers to follow the knock-and-announce rule when facing an open door would "force [officers] to comply with formalistic rules when the circumstances direct otherwise." (United States v. Sherrod (8th Cir. 2020) 966 F.3rd 748; further holding that following defendant's son through the open door, when they believed the boy was leading them to defendant, was reasonable.)

Procedures After Arrest:

Disposition of Prisoner: An officer making an arrest in obedience to a warrant must proceed with the arrestee as commanded by the warrant, or as provided by law. (P.C. § 848)

In-County Arrest Warrants: If the offense is for a felony, and the arrest occurs in the county in which the warrant was issued, the officer making the arrest must take the defendant before the magistrate who issued the warrant or some other magistrate of the same county. (P.C. § 821)

Note: In reality, an arrestee is typically taken to jail where he or she will await the availability of a magistrate.

Out-of-County Arrest Warrants: If the defendant is arrested in another county on either a felony (P.C. § 821) or a misdemeanor (P.C. § 822) warrant, the officer must, without unnecessary delay:

- Inform the defendant in writing of his right to be taken before a magistrate in that county; and

- Note on the warrant that he has so informed defendant; and

- Upon being requested by the defendant, take him before a magistrate in that county.

That magistrate is to admit the defendant to the bail specified on the warrant, if any. (Pen. Code §§ 821, 822) If the offense is a misdemeanor, and no bail is specified on the warrant, the magistrate may set the bail. (Pen. Code § 822)

If the defendant does not bail out for any reason, law enforcement officers from the county where the warrant was issued have five (5) days (or five (5) court days if the offense is a felony and the law enforcement agency is more than 400 miles from the county where the defendant is being held) to take custody of the defendant. (Pen. Code §§ 821, 822; see 62 Op.Cal.Atty.Gen. 78, 2/16/1979)

Note: There are no similar statutory requirements for an out-of-county arrest made without an arrest warrant (i.e., a "probable cause" arrest), except under Pen. Code § 849(a), below.

Arrests without a Warrant; Pen. Code § 849(a): An officer (or private person) making an arrest without a warrant shall, without unnecessary delay, take the prisoner not otherwise released before the nearest or most accessible magistrate in the county in which the offense is triable, and a complaint stating the charge against the arrested person shall be laid before such magistrate.

Necessity of Having Probable Cause or Reasonable Suspicion Before Entering a Residence: Until recently, it has been held that before a police officer may enter a residence, absent consent to enter, the officer must have "probable cause" to believe the person who is the subject of the arrest warrant is actually inside at that time. (See People v. Jacobs (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 472; United States v. Gorman (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 1105; United States v. Diaz (9th Cir. 2007) 491 F.3rd 1074; United States v. Phillips (9th Cir. 1974) 497 F.2nd 1131; (United States v. Gooch (9th Cir. 2007) 506 F.3rd 1156, 1159, fn. 2; Cuevas v. De Roco (9th Cir. 2008) 531 F.3rd 726; United States v. Mayer (9th Cir. 2008) 530 F.3rd 1099, 1103-1104.)

"It is not disputed that until the point of Buie's arrest the police had the right, based on the authority of the arrest warrant, to search anywhere in the house that Buie might have been found, . . ." (Maryland v. Buie (1990) 494 U.S. 325, 330 [110 S.Ct. 1093; 108 L.Ed.2nd 276, 283].)

An arrest warrant constitutes legal authority to enter the suspect's residence and search for him. (People v. LeBlanc (1997) 60 Cal.App.4th 157, 164; entry lawful while executing a misdemeanor arrest warrant.)

"Because an arrest warrant authorizes the police to deprive a person of his liberty, it necessarily also authorizes a limited invasion of that person's privacy interest when it is necessary to arrest him in his home." (Steagald v. United States (1981) 451 U.S. 204, 214-215, fn. 7 [101 S.Ct. 1642; 68 L.Ed.2nd 38, 46].)

"Thus, for Fourth Amendment purposes, an arrest warrant founded on probable cause implicitly carries with it the limited authority to enter a dwelling in which the suspect lives when there is reason to believe the suspect is within." (Italics added; Payton v.

This "reason to believe" language, in making reference to the likelihood that the subject is home at the time the arrest warrant is served, has until recently been interpreted by both state and federal authority to require full-blown "probable cause" to believe the suspect is there at that time. (See People v. Jacobs, supra; United States v. Gorman, supra; and United States v. Phillips, supra; Motley v. Parks (9th Cir. 2005) 432 F.3rd 1072, 1070; and see "Sufficiency of Evidence to Believe the Suspect is Inside," below.)

Noting that five other federal circuits have ruled that something less than probable cause is required, and that the Ninth Circuit is a minority opinion (see United States v. Gorman, supra.), the Fourth District Court of Appeal (Div. 2) found instead that an officer executing an arrest warrant or conducting a probation or parole search may enter a dwelling if he or she has only a reasonable belief, falling short of probable cause to believe, the suspect both lives there and is present at the time. Employing that standard, the entry into defendant's apartment to conduct a probation search was lawful based on all of the information known to the officers. Accordingly, the court upheld the trial court's conclusion that the officers had objectively reasonable grounds to conclude the defendant/probationer lived at the subject apartment, and therefore the officers had the right to enter the apartment to conduct a warrantless probation search. (People v. Downey (2011) 198 Cal.App.4th 652, 657-662.)

> Also noting that the California Supreme Court, in People v. Jacobs, supra, when read correctly (see pg. 479, fn. 4), did not find that probable cause was required, contrary to the arguments made by some. (Id., at p. 662.)
>
> The Ninth Circuit, in subsequent cases dealing with whether the subject of a Fourth waiver search in fact lives at the place to be searched, stands by the probable cause standard. (United States v. Bolivar (9th Cir. 2012) 670 F.3rd 1091, 1093-1095; United States v. Grandberry (9th Cir. 2013) 730 F.3rd 968, 973-980.)

Defendant having an outstanding arrest warrant issued approximately five-weeks earlier and listing the address in question, postal records indicated that defendant received mail at that address, and several public databases connecting defendant with the address, held to be sufficient to give the officers a "reasonable belief" that defendant lived at that address. It was also reasonable for them to believe that he would be home at 6:00 a.m. (United States v. Hamilton (1st Cir. 2016) 819 F.3rd 503.)

See "Sufficiency of the Evidence to Believe the Suspect is Inside," below.

The "Steagald Warrant*:" If the person is in a third party's home, absent consent to enter, a search warrant (i.e., commonly referred to as a "Steagald warrant*") for the residence must be obtained in addition to the arrest warrant. (Steagald v. United States (1981) 451 U.S. 204, 211-222 [101 S.Ct. 1642; 68 L.Ed.2nd 38]; People v. Codinha (1982) 138 Cal.App.3rd 167; see P.C. § 1524(a)(6).)

Failure, however, to obtain a search warrant will not benefit the subject with the outstanding arrest warrant, but serves only to protect the homeowner (i.e., the "third party") should evidence of criminal activity be discovered during the entry of his residence. The person with the outstanding arrest warrant will generally be without standing to contest the entry of the warrantless entry of the residence. (United States v. Bohannon (2nd Cir. 2016) 824 F.3rd 242.)

Note: Securing such a search warrant will, of course, require "probable cause" to believe that the subject of the arrest warrant is in the place to be searched.

Statute of Limitations: Obtaining an arrest warrant will "toll" (i.e., "stop") the running of the statute of limitations for the charged offense(s). (P.C. §§ 803, 804; People v. Lee (2000) 82 Cal.App.4th 1352.)

Duration: There is no statutory requirement that an arrest warrant be executed within any particular time limit. Therefore, arrest warrants do not expire and do not need to be renewed or extended. They will remain in the system until purged, served, or recalled by the court.

*The All Writs Act:

28 U.S.C. § 1651: The All Writs Act is a United States federal statute, which authorizes the United States federal courts to "issue all writs necessary or appropriate in aid of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the usages and principles of law."

Case Law:

Affirming two district court orders denying petitions to unseal court records, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that neither the First Amendment nor the common law provides a right of public access to third-party All Writs Act technical assistance materials relating to ongoing criminal investigations involving unexecuted arrest warrants. Under the All Writs Act ("AWA"), federal courts may order private parties to provide technical assistance to law enforcement to aid in the execution of arrest warrants. Here, Forbes Media and Thomas Brewster, a journalist and associate editor at Forbes ("petitioners"), filed petitions in the Northern District of California and the Western District of Washington seeking to unseal past All Writs Act orders issued to an online travel-booking technology company related to ongoing criminal investigations in which the United States had obtained arrest warrants but had been thus far unable to make the arrests. The district courts in California and Washington denied petitioners' motions, concluding for similar reasons, that there was no qualified First Amendment or common law right of public access to sealed AWA technical assistance materials relating to active warrants, and that the government had a compelling interest in non-disclosure while the criminal investigations remained ongoing. The Court further held that neither the First Amendment nor the common law rights to public access were so expansive as to encompass the materials sought here—materials that have traditionally been maintained under seal to avoid exposing the government's criminal investigations and compromising its pursuit of fugitives. In determining that the First Amendment's right of access did not attach, the panel applied the "experience and logic" test set forth in Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Court (1986) 478 U.S. 1, 7 [106 S.Ct. 2735; 92 L.Ed.2nd 1, and concluded that it was aware of no historical tradition of public access to proceedings and materials under the AWA to obtain technical assistance from third parties in executing arrest warrants. By all accounts, these proceedings have traditionally taken place ex parte and under seal. Logic likewise militated against a qualified right of access under the First Amendment. Providing public access to AWA technical assistance proceedings in support of unexecuted sealed arrest warrants could easily expose sensitive law-enforcement techniques and endanger active criminal investigations. Addressing whether common law conferred such a right, the Court held that petitioners had not demonstrated an "important public need" justifying disclosure. Given the similarities cross-cutting AWA third-party technical assistance proceedings, grand jury proceedings, and pre-indictment search warrant materials, as a matter of analogical reasoning, the materials petitioners sought here were not within the common law right of access. Finally, and regardless of whether the argument was advanced under the common law, the First Amendment, or both, the panel rejected the petitioners' position that the district courts should have analyzed the right of public access question by focusing on the types of documents petitioners sought (motions, orders, etc.) rather than the nature of the AWA proceedings of which the documents were a part. (Forbes Media LLC v. United States (9th Cir. 2023) 61 F.4th 1072.)

Detention of Other Occupants of a Home While Executing an Arrest Warrant:

Applying the theory of Michigan v. Summers (1981) 452 U.S. 692, 702-703 [101 S.Ct. 2587; 69 L.Ed.2nd 340, 349-350], where the detention of occupants of a residence was held to be lawful during the execution of a search warrant, California has held that the same rule applies to detaining occupants of a residence while serving an arrest warrant. (People v. Hannah (1997) 51 Cal.App.4th 1335.)

The Ninth Circuit disagrees with this theory, holding that the detention of an occupant of a house while executing an arrest warrant is unconstitutional. (Sharp v. County of Orange (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 901, 912-913.)

Use of a Motorized Battering Ram: The California Supreme Court has determined in a case that has never been overruled that at least where a "motorized battering ram" is used to force entry into a building, prior judicial authorization in the search or arrest warrant is necessary. Failure to obtain such authorization is both a violation of the California Constitution and the Fourth Amendment. (Langford v. Superior Court (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 21.)

See "Use of a Motorized Battering Ram," under "Searches With a Search Warrant," (Chapter 10), below.

Effect of an existing Arrest Warrant or a Fourth waiver on the Exclusion of Evidence after an Illegal Detention or Arrest:

The fact that the defendant had an outstanding arrest warrant may, depending upon the circumstances, be sufficient of an intervening circumstance to allow for the admissibility of the evidence seized incident to arrest despite the fact that the original detention was illegal. (People v. Brendlin (2008) 45 Cal.4th 262, an illegal traffic stop; and Utah v. Strieff (2016) 579 U.S. 232, 241-242 [136 S.Ct. 2056; 195 L.Ed.2nd 400], an illegal detention.)

The circumstances to be considered are:

> The temporal proximity of the Fourth Amendment violation to the procurement of the challenged evidence;
>
> The presence of intervening circumstances (e.g., an arrest warrant);
>
> The purpose and the flagrancy of the official misconduct.
>
> (People v. Brendlin, supra, at pp. 269-272; citing Brown v. Illinois (1975) 422 U.S. 590 [95 S.Ct. 2254; 45 L.Ed.2nd 416]; United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 2020) 974 F.3rd 1071, 1076.)

Defendant, the passenger in a motor vehicle stopped for illegally tinted windows (V.C. § 26708(a)), was arrested on an outstanding arrest warrant. Even had the traffic stop been illegal, the discovery of the arrest warrant was sufficient to attenuate any possible taint of an illegal traffic stop. (People v. Carter (2010) 182 Cal.App.4th 522, 529-530.)

Defendant's incriminatory statements obtained some 36 hours after an illegal search of his residence, and recognizing that what was found during the search would be used in defendant's subsequent interrogation, were held to be inadmissible as a direct product of the illegal search. (United States v. Shetler (9th Cir. 2011) 665 F.3rd 1150, 1156-1160.)

> It was also noted that because the government bore the burden of proving that the defendant's confession was not "fruit of the poisonous tree," the government was required to produce evidence demonstrating that the defendant's answers were not induced or influenced by the illegal search. (Id., at pp. 1157-1161.)

See People v. Durant (2012) 205 Cal.App.4th 57, finding that a suspect's Fourth waiver (subjecting him to warrantless search and seizures) attenuated the taint of an illegal traffic stop.

> But see People v. Bates (2013) 222 Cal.App.4th 60, 69-71, ruling to the contrary. The Bates Court both declined to adopt the Durant Court's reasoning, and differentiated the cases on their respective facts. See also People v. Kidd (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 12, 23, agreeing with Bates, but not analyzing the issue.)

The government did not dispute that omissions and distortions in a sheriff office's affidavits for a search warrant were reckless and material, and that the warrant was therefore invalid and that the sheriff's raids that resulted from those reckless and material inaccuracies constituted a Fourth Amendment violation. The results of this illegal search, including records suggesting that the business was employing undocumented immigrants, was passed along to Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). ICE subsequently issued a subpoena requiring the business to produce employer verification forms and other records. Based on information turned over in response to the subpoena, ICE charged the business with violations of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Noting that the Fourth Amendment violations were egregious, the Court held that it was plain that the evidence ICE obtained was the product of the sheriff's illegal activity. ICE's evidence subsequently obtained was the fruit of the sheriff's unlawful search. The sheriff's conduct easily met the flagrancy standard. The exclusionary rule would serve to deter the sheriff from Fourth Amendment violations by the probability that illegally obtained evidence will not be useful to ICE, even in a civil proceeding. (Frimmel Management, LLC v. United States (9th Cir. 2018) 897 F.3rd 1045.)

However, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has held that a mere passage of time, even a significant amount, does not necessarily attenuate the taint of an earlier illegal detention. For instance, after someone at the defendant's address pointed a laser at a police aircraft in flight, officers went to the defendant's home, illegally detained him, interrogated him without Miranda warnings, and after the defendant confessed, seized the laser. Eight months later, an FBI agent approached the defendant outside his home and stated he was there to ask "follow-up" questions about the incident. The defendant repeated his earlier confession. Charged with aiming a laser at an aircraft in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 39A, defendant moved to suppress the inculpatory statements he made to the FBI agent, arguing that the illegality of the first encounter tainted the second. The government did not dispute that the initial encounter violated at least the Fourth Amendment. Agreeing with the defendant, the Ninth Circuit explained that when a confession results from certain types of Fourth Amendment violations, the government must go beyond proving that the later confession was voluntary. It must also show a sufficient break in events to undermine the inference that the confession was caused by the Fourth Amendment violation. After considering together the relevant factors as set forth in Brown v. Illinois (1975) 422 U.S.

590 [95 S.Ct. 2254; 45 L.Ed.2nd 416 (1975), the panel was persuaded that the second encounter, introduced as a "follow up" to the first, was directly linked to the original illegalities. Per the Court, although significant time had passed, and the record does not show that the officers' conduct was purposeful or flagrant, the eight-month time period was collapsed by the agent opening the conversation by stating that he was following up on the original investigation. Without other intervening circumstances that act to separate the incidents, the Court concluded that the government failed to carry its burden of proving that the defendant's statements were sufficiently attenuated from the illegal detention and seizure eight months prior. (United States v. Bocharnikov (9th Cir. 2020) 966 F.3rd 1000.)

After chasing a wanted suspect to defendant's home, and arresting him when he tried to escape via a back window, officers entered defendant's home without a warrant and without consent for the stated purposes of checking the welfare of anyone inside (i.e., the "emergency aid exception") and/or as a "protective sweep" for other suspects. While inside, officers contacted defendant, held him at gunpoint, handcuffed him, and took him outside. Once outside, it was discovered that defendant was subject to probationary Fourth waiver, and subject to warrantless searches. Officers then reentered his home and conducted a full search, discovering methamphetamine and other incriminating evidence. In a previous appeal, both reasons for entering defendant's home were held to have been in violation of the Fourth Amendment, as was defendant's arrest, in an unpublished decision. (See United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 2018) 749 F. App'x 516.) Upon returning the case to the trial court for a determination of whether the "attenuation doctrine" applied; i.e., whether the discovery of the suspicionless search condition was an intervening circumstance that broke the causal chain between the initial unlawful entry and the discovery of the evidence supporting defendant's conviction, the trial court held that it did. In a second appeal, the Ninth Circuit disagreed and ruled that the evidence should have been suppressed after finding that all three of the factors as discussed in Utah v. Strieff, supra, favored suppression. (United States v. Garcia (9th Cir. 2020) 974 F.3rd 1071.)

> "The attenuation doctrine is an exception to the usual rule of exclusion or suppression of the evidence. It applies when 'the connection between the illegality and the challenged evidence' has become so attenuated 'as to dissipate the taint caused by the illegality.'" (Id, at p. 1076; quoting United States v. Gorman (9th Cir. 2017) 859 F.3rd 706, 718.)

In Garcia, in evaluating the three factors as dictated in Utah v. Strieff, supra (see above), the Court determined the following:

> "The temporal proximity factor weigh(ed) in favor of suppression because only a few minutes passed between the officers' unconstitutional entry into (defendant's) home and those very same officers' reentry into his home to conduct the investigatory search." (pg. 1077.)
>
> The presence of intervening circumstances (e.g., a Fourth waiver), also weighed in favor of suppression, noting that "a suspicionless search condition differs from an arrest warrant [as occurred in Strieff] in a significant respect," finding the former to be an optional "exercise of discretionary authority," while the latter is acting on a mandatory court order. (pgs. 1077-1080.)
>
> "The purpose and the flagrancy of the official misconduct" factor was also held to favor suppression in that it was the warrantless entry into a residence and handcuffing defendant before removing him from his own apartment, even if the officers acted in good faith, that was at issue. (pgs. 1080-1082.)

A Recalled or Defective Arrest Warrant:

Arresting a subject with the "good faith" belief that there was an outstanding arrest warrant, only to discover after the fact that the arrest warrant had been recalled, does not require the suppression of any resulting evidence where the mistake is the result of negligence only, and was not reckless or deliberate. (Herring v. United States (2009) 555 U.S. 135 [129 S.Ct. 695; 172 L.Ed.2nd 496].)

If officers making an arrest have probable cause to arrest him and the arrest is otherwise lawful (e.g., in public), then it is irrelevant whether the arrest warrant is later declared to be invalid. (United States v. Jennings (9th Cir. 2008) 515 F.3rd 980, 985.)

Good Faith Reliance on a No Longer Existing Fourth Waiver:

> An officer's good faith reliance on the existence of a subject's waiver of his Fourth Amendment search and seizure rights as a condition of his pre-trial release from custody, where that condition is later (after the search) deleted by an appellate court decision, justifies the search. Evidence recovered as a result of that Fourth waiver search will not be suppressed. (People v. Maxwell (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 546, 558-560.)

Statutory Limitations:

> Daytime and Nighttime Arrests (Pen. Code § 840):
>
> > Felony Arrests: An arrest for the commission of a felony may be made:
> >
> > > Without an Arrest Warrant: Any time of the day or night, in any public place or while already in custody on another charge, whether or not the offense occurred in the officer's presence. (Pen. Code § 836(a)(2))
> > >
> > > *See United States v. Watson (1976) 423 U.S. 411, 423-424 [96 S.Ct. 820; 46 L.Ed.2nd 598]: "Law enforcement officers may find it wise to seek arrest warrants where practicable to do so, and their judgments about probable cause may be more readily accepted where backed by a warrant issued by a magistrate. See United States v. Ventresca, 380 U.S. 102, 106 (1965); Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 111 (1964); Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 479-480 (1963). But we decline to transform this judicial preference into a constitutional rule when the judgment of the Nation and Congress has for so long been to authorize warrantless public arrests on probable cause rather than to encumber criminal prosecutions with endless litigation with respect to the existence of exigent circumstances, whether it was practicable to get a warrant, whether the suspect was about to flee, and the like." (See also A Model Code of Pre-arraignment Procedure, section 120.1, and fn. 11, pg. 423, in Watson.)

Exception: A police officer cannot make a warrantless arrest within the subject's own home (People v. Ramey (1976) 16 Cal.3rd 263, 276; Payton v. New York (1980) 445 U.S 573 [100 S.Ct. 1371; 63 L.Ed.2nd 639].), or the home of another person (Steagald v. United States (1981) 451 U.S. 204 [101 S.Ct. 1642; 68 L.Ed.2nd 38.]; see below.), absent an exception.

Exceptions to Exception: When the officer is already and/or otherwise lawfully in the home, exigent circumstances exist, or defendant is standing in the threshold. (See examples, below.)

With an Arrest Warrant: Any time of the day or night, in any place, including the subject's own home. (Pen. Code § 836(a)):

Exception #1: Cannot make a felony warrant arrest within a third person's home, unless the officer also first obtains a search warrant for the third person's home (See Steagald v. United States, supra, and below.) or is already and otherwise lawfully in the third person's home.

Exception #2: Private persons may not serve arrest warrants. (Pen. Code §§ 813, 816)

Misdemeanor (and Infraction) Arrests:

Without an Arrest Warrant: Any time of the day or night, in any public place or while already in custody. (Pen. Code § 836(a)(1))

Exception #1: Cannot make a warrantless arrest within the subject's own home (People v. Ramey, supra: Payton v. New York, supra.), or the home of another person (Steagald v. New York, supra, and below.), absent an exception.

Exception to Exception: Misdemeanor or infraction committed in the officer's presence or the presence of a private citizen (in the case of a private person's arrest), while already and/or otherwise lawfully in the home. (People v. Graves (1968) 263

Cal.App.2nd 719; see also examples, below, under "Case Law Limitations," *"Ramey.")

Query: If an officer is already lawfully in the house, may a misdemeanor arrest warrant be executed despite the lack of a nighttime endorsement? Unknown. Pen. Code § 840 itself does not provide for any such exception. But since this limitation on arrests has been held to be statutory only, and not of constitutional origins (People v. Whitted (1976) 60 Cal.App.3rd 569.), no evidence will be suppressed anyway, making this question moot.

Exception #2: Cannot make a warrantless arrest for a misdemeanor or infraction not committed in the officer's presence, or the presence of the private person (in the case of a private person's arrest).

But see exceptions, above.

Exception #3: Cannot make a warrantless arrest for a "stale misdemeanor (or infraction)." (Jackson v. Superior Court (1950) 98 Cal.App.2nd 183, 187; see above.)

With an Arrest Warrant: Any time of the day or night, in any place, including the subject's own home. (Pen. Code § 836(a))

Exception #1: Cannot make a misdemeanor warrant arrest at night within the subject's home unless the warrant is "endorsed for night service" by a judge. (P.C. § 840(4)) (See above)

"Nighttime" for purposes of an arrest warrant is 10:00 p.m. to 6:00 a.m. (Pen. Code § 840.)

The need for a nighttime endorsement must be justified before a judge will approve it; i.e.: Why does this defendant need to be arrested at night? (See People v. Kimble (1988) 44 Cal.3rd 480, 494; discussing the need for justifying nighttime service for a search warrant.)

Exception #2: Cannot make a misdemeanor warrant arrest within a third person's home, unless the officer also first obtains a search warrant for the third person's home (See Steagald v. United States, supra.) or is already and otherwise lawfully in the third person's home.

Exception #3: Private citizens may not serve arrest warrants. (Pen. Code §§ 813, 816)

Penal Code § 964: Victim and Witness Confidential Information: Requires the establishment of procedures to protect the confidentiality of "confidential personal information" of victims and witnesses. The section is directed primarily at prosecutors and the courts, but also contains a provision for documents filed by law enforcement with a court in support of search and arrest warrants; i.e., an affidavit.

Subd. (b): "Confidential personal information" includes, but is not limited to, addresses, telephone numbers, driver's license and California identification card numbers, social security numbers, date of birth, place of employment, employee identification numbers, mother's maiden name, demand deposit account numbers, savings or checking account numbers, and credit card numbers.

Live Lineups: An ex parte court order requiring an un-charged criminal suspect to submit to a live lineup, even though there is probable cause to arrest him, is unenforceable. There is no statutory procedure for accomplishing such a procedure. (Goodwin v. Superior Court (2001) 90 Cal.App.4th 215.)

Case Law Limitations:

People v. Ramey*:  Within One's Own Residence: Warrantless arrests within a private residence are restricted because of the constitutional right to privacy interests a person, even a criminal suspect, has within their own home. (See below)

General Rule: Arrests in one's home for a felony or misdemeanor may only be made with prior judicial authorization in the form of an arrest warrant. (People v. Ramey (1976) 16 Cal.3rd 263, 276; Payton v. New York (1980) 445 U.S. 573 [100 S.Ct. 1371; 63 L.Ed.2nd 639].)

Police officers need either (1) an arrest warrant or (2) probable cause and exigent circumstances to lawfully enter a person's home to arrest its occupant. (Kirk v. Louisiana (2002) 536 U.S. 635 [122 S.Ct. 2458; 153 L.Ed.2nd 599].)

However, surrounding a barricaded suspect in his home is in effect a warrantless arrest, justified by the exigent circumstances. The passage of time during the ensuing standoff does not dissipate that exigency to where officers are expected to seek the authorization of a judge to take the suspect into physical custody. (Fisher v. City of San Jose (9th Cir. 2009) 558 F.3rd 1069; overruling its prior holding (at 509 F.3rd 952) that failure to obtain an arrest warrant during a 12-hour standoff resulted in an illegal arrest of the barricaded suspect.)

Armed police officers surrounding defendant's home and then ordering him out via a public address system is in effect an arrest within the home, and absent a warrant or exigent circumstances, is illegal. The fact that defendant had just fled into his home, avoiding being arrested on his front porch for a misdemeanor, is not an exigent circumstance. (United States v. Nora (9th Cir. 2014) 765 F.3rd 1049, 1052-1060.)

See United States v. Mallory (3rd Cir. 2014) 765 F.3rd 373, for the exact opposite conclusion on the lawfulness of entering a residence in hot pursuit under the exact same circumstances, although the firearm should have been suppressed as a product of an unlawful warrantless search after the residence was secured.

Exceptions: There are numerous exceptions to this rule:

Consent: When the occupant of a house consents to the police officers' entry of his or her home. (People v. Superior Court* [Kenner] (1977) 73 Cal.App.3rd 65, 68; People v. Peterson (1978) 85 Cal.App.3rd 163, 171; see also People v. Ramey, supra, at p. 275; and Payton v. New York, supra, at p. 583 [63 L.Ed.2nd at p. 649]; and People v. Newton (1980) 107 Cal.App.3rd 568, 578.)

Limitations:

"(A)n alleged consenter must be aware of the purpose of the requested entry and a consent obtained by trickery or subterfuge renders a subsequent search and seizure invalid." (People v. Superior Court* [Kenner], supra., at p. 69; merely asking for permission to enter "to talk to" the suspect does not justify the warrantless entry and arrest. See also In re Johnny V. (1978) 85 Cal.App.3rd 120, 132.)

Express or Implied Consent: Permission to enter need not be an express consent. Asking the homeowner for defendant and for permission to "come in and look around" when it was denied that he was present was reasonably interpreted by the police as consent to enter to find defendant for any purpose that they desired, including arrest. (People v. Newton, supra.)

Authority to Give Consent: For the officers to validly rely upon consent, they must reasonably and in good faith believe that the person giving consent had the authority to consent to their entry into the residence. (People v. Escudero (1979) 23 Cal.3rd 800, 806.)

Undercover Entries: Consent obtained by officers working undercover, for the purpose of continuing an investigation, is valid. It is the "intrusion into," not the arrest while inside, which offends the constitutional standards under Ramey. Arresting the defendant after having gained lawful entry is not a Ramey violation. (People v. Evans (1980) 108 Cal.App.3rd 193, 196.)

"The Fourth Amendment does not protect 'a wrongdoer's misplaced belief that a person whom he voluntarily confides his wrongdoing will not reveal it.'" (Toubus v. Superior Court (1981) 114 Cal.App.3rd 378, 383.)

And just because the undercover officer has momentarily left the residence, such action followed immediately by the reentry of the arresting officers, does not violate Ramey or Payton. (People v. Cespedes (1987) 191 Cal.App.3rd 768.)

> But the reentry must be simultaneous with, or immediately after, the undercover officer's exit. (People v. Ellers (1980) 108 Cal.App.3rd 943; arrest unlawful when after the "buy," during an undercover narcotics investigation, the police drove to a parking lot one mile away, spent ten to twenty minutes formulating a plan to arrest the defendant, and then returned and reentered the house to make the arrest.)

Plain View Observations; Reentry to Seize the Property Observed: Evidence observed in plain view by officers entering a residence with the suspect's consent and with exigent circumstances, while the officers did a protective sweep and check for victims of a shooting, justified a later warrantless entry to seize and process that evidence so long as the police did not give up control of the premises. (People v. Superior Court* [Chapman] (2012) 204 Cal.App.4th 1004, 1014-1021; officers left one officer inside to secure the scene and the deceased victim while awaiting investigators, criminologists, and the coroner.)

Exigent circumstances: "'(A) warrantless intrusion may be justified by hot pursuit of a fleeing felon, or imminent destruction of evidence [citation], or the need to prevent a suspect's escape, or the risk of danger to the police or to other persons inside or outside the dwelling.' [citations]" (Italics added; Minnesota v. Olson (1990) 495 U.S. 91, 100 [109 L.Ed.2nd 85, 95].)

> Exigent circumstances is defined as "an emergency situation requiring swift action to prevent imminent danger to life or serious damage to property, or to forestall the imminent escape of a suspect or destruction of evidence." (People v. Rubio (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 342, 354, quoting People v. Ramey (1976) 16 Cal.3rd 263, 276; see also People v. Bowen (2020) 52 Cal.App.5th 130, 138; quoting People v. Panah (2005) 35 Cal.4th 395, 465.)
>
> This includes "when an entry or search appears reasonably necessary to render emergency aid, whether or not a crime might be involved." (People v. Ovieda (2019) 7 Cal.5th 1034, 1041-1042; People v. Rubio, supra.)

And the warrantless pinging of a dangerous suspect's cellphone. (People v. Bowen, supra, at pp. 136-139.)

"(F)actors that determine 'whether exigent circumstances support the decision to make' a warrantless arrest in a residence include 'whether probable cause is clear' and 'whether the suspect is likely to be found on the premises entered'" (People v. Rubio, supra, quoting People v. Bacigalupo (1991) 1 Cal.4th 103, 122.)

"The exigency exception permits warrantless entry where officers 'have both probable cause to believe that a crime has been or is being committed and a reasonable belief that their entry is necessary to prevent . . . the destruction of relevant evidence, the escape of the suspect, or some other consequence improperly frustrating legitimate law enforcement efforts.'" (Italics added; Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 878-879; quoting Hopkins v. Bonvicino (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 752, 763; People v. Rubio, supra.)

"The exigency exception permits warrantless entry where officers 'have both probable cause to believe that a crime has been or is being committed and a reasonable belief that their entry is necessary to prevent . . . the destruction of relevant evidence, the escape of the suspect, or some other consequence improperly frustrating legitimate law enforcement efforts.'" (Sandoval v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't. (9th Cir. 2014) 756 F.3rd 1154, 1161; quoting Hopkins v. Bonvicino (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 752, 763.)

> In Sandoval, it was held that because the officers lacked probable cause to believe that a residential burglary was occurring, there was no exigency allowing for the warrantless entry into the residence. (Id., at pp. 1161-1163.)

A warrantless entry into defendant's residence based upon witness information that defendant, an armed robber, had entered the home minutes earlier, was lawful. (Warden, Maryland Penitentiary v. Hayden (1967) 387 U.S. 294 [87 S.Ct. 1642; 18 L.Ed.2nd 782].)

Where defendant, the suspect in an ongoing drug transaction, had been standing in the doorway with a brown paper bag in her hand, retreated into the vestibule of her home as police officers pulled up to her house shouting "police," following her into the house was lawful. (United States v. Santana (1976) 427 U.S. 38 [96 S.Ct. 2406; 49 L.Ed.2nd 300].)

"Exigent circumstances include 'the need to prevent the destruction of evidence.'" (People v. Tran (2019) 42 Cal.App.5th 1, 11, quoting Kentucky v. King (2011) 563 U.S. 452, 455 [179 L.Ed.2nd 865; 131 S. Ct. 1849].)

> "(E)exigent circumstances are more generally described as circumstances that would cause a reasonable officer to believe immediate action is necessary to prevent, among other things, the destruction of relevant evidence or some other consequence improperly frustrating legitimate law enforcement efforts," thus excusing the need to obtain a search warrant before seizing a dash-cam recorder from a reckless driving suspect where a motorcyclist was seriously injured. (People v. Tran, supra, at pp. 12-13, citing United States v. Licata (9th Cir. 1985) 761 F.2nd 537, 543.)

"The foundation of the exigency is 'a belief that society's interest in the discovery and protection of incriminating evidence from removal or destruction can supersede, at least for a limited period, a person's possessory interest in property, provided that there is probable cause to believe that that property is associated with criminal activity. [Citation.]"' (People v. Tran, supra, at p. 13, quoting Segura v. United States (1984) 468 U.S. 796, 808 [104 S.Ct. 3380; 82 L.Ed.2nd 599].)

A reasonable belief in the imminent threat to life or the welfare of a person within the home, with probable cause to believe a missing person was inside, and a reasonable belief that the person inside needed aid, justified a warrantless entry. (People v. Coddington (2000) 23 Cal.4th 529, 580.)

Exigent Circumstances, justifying a warrantless residential arrest, include an evaluation of the following circumstances:

- The gravity of the offense;
- Whether the suspect is reasonably believed to be armed;
- Whether probable cause is clear;
- Whether the suspect is likely to be found on the premises; and
- The likelihood that the suspect will escape if not promptly arrested.

(People v. Williams (1989) 48 Cal.3rd 1112, 1138-1139.)

Entering and securing a residence pending the obtaining of a search warrant was supported by exigent circumstances when officers received information that the occupant was about to destroy or remove contraband from the residence. (United States v. Fowlkes (9th Cir. 2015) 804 F.3rd 954, 969-971.)

> The fact that it took about an hour to coordinate the officers necessary to make the warrantless entry and securing of defendant's apartment was irrelevant; the exigency still existed. (Id., at p. 971.)
>
> Such a "securing" of a house, however, is in fact a Fourth Amendment seizure. (United States v. Shrum (10th Cir. 2018) 908 F.3rd 1219.)

"Fresh or Hot Pursuit," or at the end of a "substantially continuous investigation:" A continuous investigation from crime to arrest of the subject in his home, within a limited time period (e.g., within hours), and without an opportunity to stop and obtain an arrest warrant, is "fresh pursuit." It is not necessary that the suspect be physically in view during the "pursuit." (People v. Escudero (1979) 23 Cal.3rd 800, 809-810; In re Lavoyne M. (1990) 221 Cal.App.3rd 154; People v. Gilbert (1965) 63 Cal.2nd 690; United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2000) 207 F.3rd 538.)

> Where there was a two and a half hour investigation between a robbery-murder and the location of the defendant's home, the officers were found to be in "fresh pursuit," justifying a warrantless entry to look for the suspect. (People v. Gilbert (1965) 63 Cal.2nd 690, 706.)
>
> When officers contact a rape victim half a block from the crime scene, less than an hour after the rape (People v. White (1986) 183 Cal.App.3rd 1199, 1203-1204.), or immediately across the street minutes after she escaped from the sleeping suspect (People v. Kilpatrick (1980) 105 Cal.App.3rd 401, 409-411.), it is "fresh pursuit" when the officers go to the respective suspects' homes, make a warrantless entry, and arrest the suspects. This was found to be necessary to prevent the escape of the suspect and the destruction of evidence.
>
> Tracing an armed robbery suspect by the vehicle description and license number to a particular residence, justifies a warrantless entry. (People v. Daughhetee (1985) 165 Cal.App.3rd 574.)
>
> Exigent circumstances were found where the defendant refused commands to exit his home a short time after he threatened to shoot his neighbor, to light his neighbor's trailer on fire, and to "blow up" the entire trailer park in which the two lived if the neighbor bothered the defendant's family again. Officers were also told that the defendant had also threatened the neighbor with a pistol the day before and had been seen in possession of hand grenades and automatic weapons a few days earlier. However, the Court found the exigency question to be "close." (United States v. Al-Azzawy (9th Cir. 1985) 784 F.2nd 890, 891-893.)

The entry and securing of a home pending the obtaining of a search warrant, immediately following a gang shooting, was justified when it was believed that a second shooter and the firearms used were likely in the house. (In re Elizabeth G. (2001) 88 Cal.App.4th 496.)

> Such a "securing" of a house, however, is in fact a Fourth Amendment seizure. (United States v. Shrum (10th Cir. KS 2018) 908 F.3rd 1219.)

Presence of an armed suspect, who had committed a vicious murder who was likely to flee, with the possibility that defendant would dispose of evidence; warrantless entry and arrest was lawful. (People v. Williams (1989) 48 Cal.3rd 1112, 1138-1139.)

A strong reason to believe that defendant was the killer in the murder of two men, that he was probably armed and at a particular apartment, and that he was likely to flee if not immediately arrested, justified the warrantless entry. (People v. Bacigalupo (1991) 1 Cal.4th 103, 122-123.)

Officers may even pursue a person into his home upon attempting to cite him for an infraction where the suspect flees into his home. The defendant's resistance converts the offense into a misdemeanor "resisting arrest" (i.e., Pen. Code § 148(a)), and allows for a "hot pursuit" into the suspect's house to arrest him on that charge. (People v. Lloyd (1989) 216 Cal.App.3rd 1425, 1428-1430; citing United States v. Santana (1976) 427 U.S. 38, 42-43 [96 S.Ct. 2406; 49 L.Ed.2nd 300]; see also In re Lavoyne M. (1990) 221 Cal.App.3rd 154. 159.)

> But see United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2001) 256 F.3rd 895, 908, fn. 6; where it was held that "hot pursuit" does not allow for the chasing of a suspect into a private residence except where the underlying offense is a felony, or in other identified "rare circumstances."

However, the Ninth Circuit held in United States v. Lundin (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 1151, that officers going to defendant's home 3½ hours after the victim reported that she had been kidnapped and assaulted by defendant was done so without an exigency. Entering the curtilage of defendant's home (i.e., the front porch) at 4:00 a.m., with the intent to make a warrantless arrest, was therefore unlawful. Any exigency created by such an unlawful act (i.e., defendant attempting to escape from the back of the house) did not justify his warrantless arrest in the backyard or the warrantless entry into the house itself.

In Sims v. Stanton (9th Cir. 2013) 706 F.3rd 954, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that entering the curtilage of a home in pursuit of a suspect with the intent to detain him when the subject is ignoring the officer's demands to stop, at worst a misdemeanor violation of Pen. Code § 148, is illegal. The warrantless fresh or hot pursuit of a fleeing suspect into a residence (or the curtilage of a residence) is limited to felony suspects only. The United States Supreme Court, however, reversed this decision in Stanton v. Sims (2013) 571 U.S. 3 [134 S.Ct. 3; 187 L.Ed.2nd 341], without resolving the issue.

> The Ninth Circuit's decision in Sims was based upon that Court's interpretation of the United States Supreme Court decision in Welsh v. Wisconsin (1984) 466 U.S. 740 [104 S.Ct. 2091; 80 L.Ed.2nd 732], and conflicts with the California Supreme Court's reasoning in People v. Thompson (2006) 38 Cal.4th 811 (see "Warrantless entry to arrest a DUI (i.e., "Driving while Under the Influence") suspect," above).
>
> However, the United States Supreme Court, in interpreting its own decision on Welsh, noted that they only held there that a warrantless entry into a residence for a minor offense not involving hot pursuit was an exception to the normal rule that a warrant is "usually" going to be required.

> Per the Court, there is no rule that residential entries involving hot pursuit are limited to felony cases. In this case, there was a "hot pursuit." (Stanton v. Sims, supra, citing Welsh, at p. 750.)

However, observation of defendant holding onto a handgun while on his own front porch, when he'd been observed moments earlier on the sidewalk in front of his house, constituted probable cause of a misdemeanor violation of carrying a loaded firearm in a public place, per Pen. Code § 25850(a) (i.e., the sidewalk). But by ignoring the officers' orders to remain outside, entering the house did not constitute an exigent circumstance that allowed for the officers to arrest defendant inside his house. (United States v. Nora (9th Cir. 2014) 765 F.3rd 1049, 1052-1060; suppressing evidence found on his person and as the result of a search warrant obtained for the house after defendant's arrest.)

> The officers used a public address system to order defendant out of the house. This, the Court ruled, was in effect an arrest within his house although the officers did not enter the house. (Id., at p. 1054.)
>
> Note: The Court made no mention of Stanton v. Sims, supra, or of the doctrine of "hot pursuit," making the validity of this decision questionable.
>
> See, however, the Third Circuit Court of Appeals decision in United States v. Mallory (3rd Cir. 2014) 765 F.3rd 373, for the exact opposite conclusion on the lawfulness of entering a residence in hot pursuit under the exact same circumstances as Nora, although the Court also held that the firearm should have been suppressed as a product of an unlawful warrantless search after the residence was secured.

Having used a tracking device to follow defendants with stolen stereo speakers to a particular house, the immediate warrantless entry and search was justified by the reasonable fear that defendants would disassemble, destroy or hide the speakers, and wash off identifying fluorescent powder if they waited for a warrant. (People v. Hull (1995) 34 Cal.App.4th 1448, 1455.)

Warrantless entry to arrest a misdemeanor DUI (i.e., "Driving while Under the Influence") suspect:

> Illegal: Welsh v. Wisconsin (1984) 466 U.S. 740 [104 S.Ct. 2091; 80 L.Ed.2nd 732], where the state treated a person's first DUI offense as a non-criminal offense, subjecting the suspect to civil forfeiture only.
>
> Legal: People v. Hampton (1985) 164 Cal.App.3rd 27, 34, where a warrantless entry was upheld to prevent the destruction of evidence (the blood/alcohol level) and there was reason to believe defendant intended to resume driving.
>
> > Note: Welsh can be distinguished by the simple fact that California treats DUI cases as serious misdemeanors; see below.
>
> Legal: Entering a house without consent or a warrant to take a suspected DUI driver into custody and to remove him from the house for identification and arrest by a private citizen who saw defendant's driving, held to be legal. The fact that the defendant's blood/alcohol level might dissipate to some degree pending the obtaining of a telephonic arrest warrant, plus the fact that the suspect might leave and drive again, was sufficient cause to establish an exigent circumstance. (People v. Thompson (2006) 38 Cal.4th 811.)
>
> > Note: The Court differentiated on its facts Welsh v. Wisconsin (1984) 466 U.S. 740 [104 S.Ct. 2091; 80 L.Ed.2nd 732], where it was held that a first time DUI, being no more than a civil offense with a $200 fine under Wisconsin law, was not aggravated enough to allow for a warrantless entry into a residence to arrest the perpetrator. The cut off between a minor and a serious offense seems to be whether or not the offense is one for which incarceration is a potential punishment. (People v. Thompson, supra, at pp. 821-824, citing Illinois v. McArthur (2001) 531 U.S. 326, 336, 337 [121 S.Ct. 946; 148 L.Ed.2nd 838]; and noting (at pp. 821-824) that the Ninth Circuit's opinion on this issue is a minority opinion.)

Illegal: The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, arguing the continuing validity of Welsh, held that California's interpretation under Thompson is wrong, and that a warrantless entry into a home to arrest a misdemeanor driving–while-under-the-influence suspect is a Fourth Amendment violation. (Hopkins v. Bonvicino (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 752, 768-769; finding that warrantless entries into residences in misdemeanor cases "will seldom, if ever, justify a warrantless entry into the home.")

Note: See Birchfield v. North Dakota (2016) 579 U.S. 438, 444-450 [136 S.Ct. 2160; 195 L.Ed.2nd 560], for a historical review of the development of DUI statutes and the importance of obtaining a reading of the suspect's "BAC" ("Blood Alcohol Concentration").

Also note the authority authorizing entries into residences to execute misdemeanor arrest warrants from both state (People v. Leblanc (1997) 60 Cal. App.4th 157, 164.) and federal (United States v. Spencer (2nd Cir. 1982) 684 F.2nd 220, 223-224.) courts.

Entering a residence with probable cause to believe only that the non-bookable offense of possession of less than an ounce of marijuana is occurring (H&S § 11357(b)), is closer to the Welsh situation, being a "nonjailable offense," and a violation of the Fourth Amendment when entry is made without consent. (People v. Hua (2008) 158 Cal.App.4th 1027; People v. Torres et al. (2012) 205 Cal.App.4th 989, 993-998; see also United States v. Mongold (10th Cir. 2013) 528 F.3rd 944.)

The Torres Court also rejected as "speculation" the People's argument that there being four people in the defendants' hotel room indicted that a "marijuana-smoking party" was occurring, which probably involved a bookable amount of marijuana. (People v. Torres et al., supra, at p. 996.)

But see People v. Waxler (2014) 224 Cal.App.4th 712, 724-725; rejecting the Hua and Torres argument when the place being searched is a motor vehicle as opposed to a residence.

The issue of the legality of an officer following defendant into his garage, after defendant failed to yield to the officer's use of his emergency lights while attempting to stop defendant after observing him honking his horn excessively (a violation of Veh. Code § 27007), was discussed in Lange v. California (June 23, 2021) __ U.S.__ [141 S.Ct. 2011; 201 L.Ed.2nd 486]. In Lange, the Supreme Court held that whether or not an officer can make a warrantless entry into a fleeing misdemeanant's home depends upon the circumstances, rejecting the argument that an officer may do so as a "categorical" rule. The People must first show that an exigent circumstance allowed for such an entry. Per the Court: "A great many misdemeanor pursuits involve exigencies allowing warrantless entry. But whether a given one does so turns on the particular facts of the case." (Id., at p. __.)

See "Exigent Circumstances," under "Warrantless Searches and Seizures" (Chapter 9), below.

Officers already lawfully inside when probable cause develops. (People v. Ramey, supra; People v. Dyke (1990) 224 Cal.App.3rd 648, 657-659, 661.)

See also United States v. Brobst (9th Cir. 2009) 558 F.3rd 982, 997; and People v. McCarter (1981) 117 Cal.App.3rd 894, 908; both cases with officers inside executing search warrants.

Defendant standing in the threshold: Case law has consistently held that an arrest without a warrant, either outside or even with the suspect standing in the threshold of his own home, is lawful. For example:

A warrantless arrest at the threshold of defendant's motel room, where defendant opened the door in response to the officers' knock and after having looked outside and seeing the officers standing at the door, is lawful. Payton draws a "bright line" at the threshold. So long as the officers did not misidentify themselves or use coercion to get defendant to open the door, and defendant acquiesced in the procedure, he is subject to a warrantless arrest. The fact that defendant was physically inside the door is also irrelevant so long as the officers are outside at the time the arrest is made. (United States v. Vaneaton (9th Cir. 1995) 49 F.3rd 1423, 1426-1427: Where officers use no force, threats, or subterfuge, a suspect's decision to open the door exposes him to a public place, and the privacy interests protected by Payton are not violated.)

Without overruling Vaneaton (leaving the continuing validity of this case "for another case and another day"), the Ninth Circuit noted that its decision here "may be on infirm ground" after deciding United States v. Lundin (9th Cir. Mar. 22, 2016) (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 1151. In Lundin, it was > held that officers going onto defendant's front porch at 4:00 a.m., without a warrant or exigent circumstances, and for the subjective purpose of arresting him, is illegal, and that any exigent circumstances provoked by that illegal act do not justify the entry of defendant's back yard and the seizure of evidence. However, it was also noted that in Vaneaton, the officers were standing in a "common space" of a motel when they knocked, as opposed to a suspect's front porch.

Defendant, standing in her doorway as officers approached, is in public. Further, she may not defeat an arrest which has been set in motion by attempting to escape into a private place. (United States v. Santana (1976) 427 U.S. 38 [96 S.Ct. 2406; 49 L.Ed.2nd 300].)

When the officer attempted to arrest defendant in the threshold of her apartment door, only to have her pull away and into the apartment, the officer may follow her in to complete the arrest he had set in motion on her doorstep. (People v. Hampton (1985) 164 Cal.App.3rd 27, 35-36.)

However, arresting defendant who was still in bed, even though he could (and did) reach the door and open it from his bed, was held to be a violation of Payton. It is irrelevant that the officer was still outside the residence when he pronounced defendant under arrest in that it is the defendant's location, and not the officer's, that is important. (United States v. Quaempts (9th Cir. 2005) 411 F.3rd 1046.)

Also, telling defendant, who was standing just inside the threshold of his home, that he was under arrest, to which defendant then submitted, was held to be a violation of Payton v. New York in that when officers engage in actions to coerce an occupant outside of the home, they accomplish the same effect as an actual entry into the home, which triggers the requirements of Payton. (United States v. Allen (2nd Cir. 2016) 813 F.3rd 76.)

A parolee (and, therefore, presumably, a probationer who is on search and seizure Fourth Amendment waiver conditions; e.g., see United States v. King (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 805, 808-810.) may be arrested in his home without the necessity of a warrant. Police are authorized to enter a house without a warrant where the suspect is a parolee (or probationer on search & seizure conditions) who had no legitimate expectation of privacy against warrantless arrests. (People v. Lewis (1999) 74 Cal.App.4th 662, 665-673; In re Frank S. (2006) 142 Cal.App.4th 145, 151.)

Inviting Defendant Outside: The defendant may even be "invited" outside, even though the officer's intent to arrest is not disclosed. When the defendant leaves the protection of his home, at least if he does so voluntarily, Ramey does not apply and the arrest outside is lawful. (People v. Tillery (1979) 99 Cal.App.3rd 975, 979-980; People v. Green (1983) 146 Cal.App.3rd 369, 377; People v. Jackson (1986) 187 Cal.App.3rd 499, 505; Hart v. Parks (9th Cir. 2006) 450 F.3rd 1059, 1065.)

> A suspect may be arrested without a warrant when he is in public. Case law tells us that anywhere, "whether it be the driveway, lawn, or front porch," which is "open to 'common' or 'general use'" by those wishing to contact the resident of a house, are "public places." (People v. Olson (1971) 18 Cal.App.3rd 592, 598.)
>
> See In re Danny H. (2002) 104 Cal.App.4th 92, for a thorough discussion of the law on "public places" as it relates to the 24 separate statutes where such is an element.
>
> And while it is illegal for a police officer to use a ruse to make a warrantless entry into a suspect's home, it has been held that it is not illegal to trick the suspect out. (People v. Rand (1972) 23 Cal.App.3rd 579, 583.) For example:
>
> > Calling the suspect's house and falsely telling him the police are coming with a warrant, causing defendant, by his own choice, to attempt to flee his residence with the contraband, is lawful. There is no constitutional violation in arresting him when he comes outside. (Ibid.; People Porras (1979) 99 Cal.App.3rd 874; but note this Court's invitation to the California Supreme Court to review the lawfulness of purposely evading Ramey in this manner (pp. 879-880) and the Supreme Court's refusal to do so by denying appellant's petition for a hearing.)

These cases, however, are when an officer has probable cause to arrest the suspect. Where there is no pre-existing probable cause, using a ruse to trick people outside during a narcotics investigation at an apartment complex, for the purpose of confronting as many people as they could lure outside (resulting in the defendant's illegal detention when he was surrounded by a team of officers all dressed in raid gear) is illegal. "A deception used to gain entry into a home and a ruse that lures a suspect out of a residence is a distinction without much difference. . . ." (People v. Reyes (2000) 83 Cal.App.4th 7, 12-13.)

But see In re R.K. (2008) 160 Cal.App.4th 1615, where the Court criticized the police tactic of inviting a drunk suspect out from a non-public location onto the public street and then arresting him for being "drunk in public," ruling that such a tactic is illegal even though he "voluntarily acquiesced" to go to a public place.

Note: It is unknown if this ruling can be applied to a Ramey situation as well.

However, there is even some authority allowing a police officer to order the defendant out of his house, after which he is arrested. Per the Court: Ramey forbids warrantless entries only, and is not a relevant issue when the defendant is arrested in public no matter how he came to be in public. (People v. Trudell (1985) 173 Cal.App.3rd 1221, 1228-1230.)

Ordering a Person to Come Out: The majority rule appears to be that ordering a person to come out of his house is the equivalent of having arrested him while in the house, and is illegal:

> When officers are outside with guns drawn, ordering defendant to come out, he has in effect been seized (i.e., arrested) while in his house. Leaving the house under such coercive circumstances is not an exception to Ramey/Payton. (United States v. Al-Azzaway (9th Cir. 1985) 784 F.2nd 890, 893-895; Fisher v. City of San Jose (9th Cir. 2009) 558 F.3rd 1069, 1074-1075.)
>
> Also, calling inside the residence through a partially open door, "commanding" any occupants to show themselves, and then ordering defendant to back out of the residence when he did show himself, was held to be an illegal detention effected inside the residence in that the warrantless intrusion into the residence was not supported by probable cause. (People v. Lujano (2014) 229 Cal.App.4th 175, 185-189.)
>
> > However, it was also noted that "(i)f (the officer) had invited defendant to step outside of his home to talk, and defendant did so voluntarily, then any detention would be treated as if it occurred outside the home, and our analysis would be quite different." (Italics added) (Id., at p. 188.)
>
> Armed police officers surrounding defendant's home and then ordering him out via a public address system is in effect an arrest within the home, and absent a warrant or exigent circumstances, is illegal. The fact that defendant had just fled into his home, avoiding being arrested on his front porch for a misdemeanor, is not an exigent circumstance, per the Ninth Circuit. (United States v. Nora (9th Cir. 2014) 765 F.3rd 1049, 1052-1060.)
>
> Also, telling defendant, who was standing just inside the threshold of his home, that he was under arrest, to which defendant then submitted, was held > to be a violation of Payton v. New York in that when officers engage in actions to coerce an occupant outside of the home, they accomplish the same effect as an actual entry into the home, which triggers the requirements of Payton. (United States v. Allen (2nd Cir. 2016) 813 F.3rd 76; citing the Ninth Circuit's rule on this issue with approval.)

Sufficiency of the Evidence to Believe the Suspect is Inside: The amount of evidence a law enforcement officer must have indicating that a criminal suspect is in fact presently inside his own residence in order to justify a non-consensual entry, with or without an arrest warrant, has been debated over the years:

> The United States Supreme Court, in Payton v. New York (1980) 445 U.S. 573 [100 S.Ct. 1371; 63 L.Ed.2nd 639], merely states that a police officer must have a "reason to believe" the suspect is inside his residence, without defining the phrase.
>
> A California lower appellate court found that the officers needed a "reasonable belief," or "strong reason to believe," the suspect was home. (People v. White (1986) 183 Cal.App.3rd 1199, 1204-1209; rejecting the defense argument that full "probable cause" to believe the subject was inside is required; see also United States v. Magluta (11th Cir. 1995) 44 F.3rd 1530, 1535, using a "reasonable belief" standard.)
>
> Other authority, most notably from the federal Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, indicates that a full measure of "probable cause" is required. (See Dorman v. United States (D.C. Cir. 1970) 435 F.2nd 385, 393; see also United States v. Phillips (9th Cir. 1974) 497 F.2nd 1131; a locked commercial establishment, at night; United States v. Gorman (9th Cir. 2002) 314 F.3rd 1105; defendant in his girlfriend's house with whom he was living; and United States v. Diaz (9th Cir. 2007) 491 F.3rd 1074; and United States v. Gooch (9th Cir. 2007) 506 F.3rd 1156, 1159, fn. 2.)
>
> It has been argued that the California Supreme Court, interpreting the language of P.C. § 844 (i.e., "reasonable grounds for believing him to be (inside)"), has found that any arrest, with or without an arrest warrant, requires probable cause to believe the subject is inside in order to justify a non-consensual entry into a residence. (People v. Jacobs (1987) 43 Cal.3rd 472, 478-479.)
>
> Noting that five other federal circuits have ruled that something less than probable cause is required, and that the Ninth Circuit is a minority opinion (see United States v. Gorman, supra.), the Fourth District Court of Appeal (Div. 2) found instead that an officer executing an arrest warrant or conducting a probation or parole search may enter a dwelling if he or she has only a reasonable belief, falling short of probable cause to believe, the suspect lives there and is present at the time. Employing that standard, the entry into defendant's apartment to conduct a probation search was lawful based on all of the information known to the officers. Accordingly, the court upheld the trial court's conclusion that the officers had objectively reasonable grounds to conclude the defendant/probationer lived at the subject apartment and was present at the time, and therefore the officers had the right to enter the apartment to conduct a warrantless probation search. (People v. Downey (2011) 198 Cal.App.4th 652, 657-662.)

> Also noting that the California Supreme Court, in People v. Jacobs, supra (pg. 479, fn. 4), did not find that probable cause was required, contrary to popular belief. (Id., at p. 662.)
>
> The Ninth Circuit, in a case dealing with whether the subject of a Fourth waiver search in fact lives at the place to be searched, continues to hold by the probable cause standard. (United States v. Bolivar (9th Cir. 2012) 670 F.3rd 1091, 1093-1095.)

With evidence giving officers "a reasonable belief" that the home entered with an arrest warrant was where defendant lived, it was also reasonable for them to believe that he would be home at 6:00 a.m. (United States v. Hamilton (1st Cir. 2016) 819 F.3rd 503.)

Suspect Within a Third Person's Home; the "Steagald Warrant*:" Probable cause justifying an arrest warrant for one person does not authorize entry into to a third person's home to look for the subject of the arrest warrant. To do so violates the privacy interests of the third party. Therefore, a search warrant, based upon probable cause to believe the wanted subject is in fact in the home of the third party (absent exigent circumstances), is necessary. (Steagald v. United States (1981) 451 U.S. 204 [101 S.Ct. 1642; 68 L.Ed.2nd 38]; People v. Codinha (1982) 138 Cal.App.3rd 167; sometimes referred to as a "Steagald Warrant*." See also P.C. 1524(a)(6); legal authorization for obtaining such a search warrant.)

> The arrestee, if doing no more than merely visiting the lawful resident, probably has no standing to contest the unlawful entry of another's house. (United States v. Underwood (9th Cir. 1983) 717 F.2nd 482.) It is when a police officer obtains evidence against the third party homeowner, while looking for the subject of the arrest, that Steagald becomes an issue. The homeowner, in such a case, has standing to contest the warrantless entry of his house in defense at his own prosecution. (Steagald v. United States, supra, at pp. 212, 216 [101 S.Ct. 1642; 68 L.Ed.2nd at pp. 45, 48].) The person with the outstanding arrest warrant does not. (United States v. Bohannon (2nd Cir. 2016) 824 F.3rd 242.)

But, there is some authority that, as an overnight guest in another's apartment, defendant with an outstanding arrest warrant does have standing to contest the entry of the bedroom in which he is staying when done without a search warrant. (People v. Hamilton (1985) 168 Cal.App.3rd 1058.)

A frequent visitor, with free reign of the house despite the fact that he did not stay overnight, might also have standing to contest an allegedly illegal entry of a third person's home. (People v. Stewart (2003) 113 Cal.App.4th 242.)

> Hamilton and Stewart have some support in Minnesota v. Olson (1990) 495 U.S. 91 [109 L.Ed.2nd 85]; and People v. Tillery (1979) 99 Cal.App.3rd 975, 978-979.

Neither an evicted former tenant, nor her "overnight house guest," have standing to contest the warrantless entry of law enforcement officers who were there checking on a report of trespassers in the vacant apartment. (Woodward v. City of Tucson (9th Cir. 2017) 870 F.3rd 1154, 1159-1161.)

Consequences of a Ramey/Payton Violation:

A warrantless arrest in the home, in violation of Payton v. New York, supra, and People v. Ramey, supra, does not invalidate a later statement made to police which was not "an exploitation of the illegal entry." (New York v. Harris (1990) 495 U.S. 14 [109 L.Ed.2nd 13]; People v. Watkins (1994) 26 Cal.App.4th 19, 29-31; United States v. Manuel (9th Cir. 1983) 706 F.2nd 908, 911-912.)

> Note: What this means is that should a court rule that Ramey/Payton has been violated, any oral or physical evidence seized from the defendant after removing him from the home will not be suppressed, being the product of a lawful arrest and not the product of the illegal entry into the residence.

Tip: In other words, don't question or search the individual until he has been removed from the home in any case where the entry is questionable.

But also note: Earlier case authority has indicated that a Ramey violation is but one factor for the court to consider in determining whether the defendant's subsequent confession is a product of his free will. (E.g., see People v. Trudell (1985) 173 Cal.App.3rd 1221, 1231-1232.)

An FBI agent made a warrantless entry into defendant's hotel room in violation of the Fourth Amendment and arrested him with probable cause, but then did not question him until he was taken to a law enforcement interrogation room where he waived his Miranda rights and made incriminating statements. The statements were held to be admissible under the rule of New York v. Harris, supra. (United States v. Slaughter (11th Cir. 2013) 708 F.3rd 1208, 1212-1213.)

See also People v. Marquez (1992) 1 Cal.4th 553, 569, holding that New York v. Harris, supra, applies to an arrest made with probable cause but in violation of the California Constitution and People v. Ramey, supra.

Even where Ramey and Payton are violated, so long as the police have probable cause to make the arrest, only evidence secured in the home is subject to suppression. Defendant's arrest is not suppressed, nor are his statements later (after leaving the house) made to police as a product of that arrest. (People v. Watkins, supra.)

Similarly, physical evidence recovered from the defendant's person upon searching him at the police station, should also be admissible. (People v. Watkins, supra, at p. 31, fn. 8; citing out-of-state authority.)

This is supported by dicta in People v. Marquez, supra, at p. 569, where the Court noted that a Ramey violation "would require suppression solely of evidence obtained from searching the home at the time of the arrest."

Conducting an illegal parole search within a home where there exists probable cause to arrest the subject (even though he was only detained) will not cause the suppression of a confession obtained after the subject comes to the law enforcement officer's office where he is interrogated. (United States v. Crawford (9th Cir. 2004) 372 F.3rd 1048, 1054-1059.)

Also, note the potential for civil liability for a Ramey violation, even if the damages are only "nominal." (George v. Long Beach (9th Cir. 1992) (973 F.2nd 706.)

Knock and Notice*:

Statutory Rule: "To make an arrest, a private person, if the offense is a felony, and in all cases a peace officer, may break open the door or window of the home in which the person to be arrested is, or in which they have reasonable grounds for believing the person to be, after having demanded admittance and explained the purpose for which admittance is desired." (Pen. Code § 844)

Suppression of Resulting Evidence:

The rule that evidence will not necessarily be suppressed as a result of a knock and notice violation, as dictated by Hudson v. Michigan (2006) 547 U.S. 586 [126 S.Ct. 2159; 165 L.Ed.2nd 56] (a search warrant case.), is applicable as well in a warrantless, yet otherwise lawful, arrest situation, pursuant to P.C. § 844. (In re Frank S. (2006) 142 Cal.App.4th 145; defendant, a parolee, was subject to warrantless searches and seizures.)

See "Knock and Notice;" under "Service and Return" (of an Arrest Warrant), above, and "Searches With a Search Warrant" (Chapter 10), below.

Arrest Issues*:

Arresting for the Wrong Offense:

Rule: The United States Supreme Court has ruled that so long as a police officer has probable cause to arrest for some offense, it matters not that, subjectively, the officer erroneously believed that he only had probable cause for another offense. (Devenpeck v. Alford (2004) 543 U.S. 146 [125 S.Ct. 588; 160 L.Ed.2nd 537]; rejecting the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals' opinion (e.g., see Alford v. Haner (9th Cir. 2003) 333 F.3rd 972; petition for certiorari granted.) that arresting for the wrong offense was only lawful if the two offenses were "closely (or 'factually') related," as described in Gasho v. United States (9th Cir. 1994) 39 F.3rd 1420, 1428.)

The Ninth Circuit was virtually alone on this issue, with other federal circuits following the U.S. Supreme Court's lead. (See United States v. Pulvano (5th Cir. 1980) 629 F.2nd 1151; United States v. Saunders (5th Cir. 1973) 476 F.2nd 5; Klingler v. United States (8th Cir. 1969) 409 F.2nd 299; United States ex rel LaBelle v. LaVallee (2nd Cir. 1975) 517 F.2nd 750; Richardson v. Bonds (7th Cir. 1988) 860 F.2nd 1427; Knight v. Jacobson (11th Cir. 2002) 300 F.3rd 1272.)

Case law:

As long as, when arrested, probable cause to arrest for some offense was present, it is irrelevant that defendant was arrested for, and/or charged with, the wrong offense. (People v. Lewis (1980) 109 Cal.App.3rd 599, 608-609; In re Donald L. (1978) 81 Cal.App.3rd 770, 775; see also People v. Richardson (2008) 43 Cal.4th 959, 988-990; and People v. Carmona (2011) 195 Cal.App.4th 1385, 1391.) No sanctions will be imposed for having selected the wrong charge.

"Subjective intentions (of the arresting officer) play no role in ordinary, probable-cause Fourth Amendment analysis." (Whren v. United States (1996) 517 U.S. 806, 814 [116 S.Ct. 1769; 135 L.Ed.2nd 89, 98]; see also United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 2019) 913 F.3rd 793, 799.)

"(A)n officer's reliance on the wrong statute does not render his actions unlawful if there is a right statute that applies to the defendant's conduct." (In re Justin K. (2002) 98 Cal.App.4th 695; Stopping defendant for his third (rear window) brake light out despite not knowing the correct legal justification for finding that the inoperable light was in violation of the Vehicle Code.)

See also People v. Rodriguez (1997) 53 Cal.App.4th 1250; defendant arrested for homicide for which there was no probable cause, while the officer did have probable cause to believe defendant had in fact committed another homicide; arrest lawful.

Arresting defendant for "littering" (per P.C. § 374.4) for urinating in public was a lawful arrest even though the officer cited the wrong offense. Defendant's actions were in fact a violation of P.C. §§ 370, 372, for having created a public nuisance. (People v. McDonald (2006) 137 Cal.App.4th 521, 530.)

See also District of Columbia v. Wesby (2018) 583 U.S. 48, 54, fn. 2 [138 S.Ct. 577; 199 L.Ed.2nd 453].) "Because probable cause is an objective standard, an arrest is lawful if the officer had probable cause to arrest for any offense, not just the offense cited at the time of arrest or booking."

"It is well-established that '[i]f the facts support probable cause . . . for one offense,' an arrest may be lawful 'even if the officer invoked, as the basis for the arrest, a different offense' which lacks probable cause." (Vanegas v. City of Pasadena (9th Cir. 2022) 46 F.4th 1159, 1165, quoting United States v. Magallon-Lopez (9th Cir. 2016) 817 F.3rd 671, 675; and citing Edgerly v. City & County. of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2010) 599 F.3rd 946, 954; "[P]robable cause supports an arrest so long as the arresting officers had probable cause to arrest the suspect for any criminal offense, regardless of their stated reason for the arrest.").

Exceptions:

An arrest for what the officer believes to be a felony, and which did not occur in the officer's presence, but which is in fact only a misdemeanor, may be an illegal arrest, per Pen. Code § 836(a)(1) (i.e., misdemeanor not in the officer's presence.), and/or the "stale misdemeanor" rule (see above).

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal also reversed a defendant's conviction when he was prosecuted for the wrong offense where The Immigration and Nationality Act has three related but separate categories defining the three different ways a noncitizen may make an unlawful entry, ruling that crossing into the country at a non-designated time or place was not a violation of 8 U.S.C. § 1325(a)(2), the crime of eluding examination or inspection by immigration officers. This particular crime can be committed only where and when examinations or inspections take place—at open ports of entry. The government's broad reading of the statute disrupted its careful structure, its interpretation ran afoul of the presumption that statutory language was not superfluous, and its interpretation of § 1325(a)(2) rendered the entry offense in § 1325(a)(1) superfluous. (United States v. Corrales-Vasquez (9th Cir. 2019) 931 F.3rd 944.)

Also, defendant's conviction for running a stop sign (Veh. Code § 22450) was reversed on appeal to the Appellate Department of the Superior Court when what the defendant actually did was pass a stopped school bus's displayed stop sign and flashing red lights (Veh. Code § 22454(a)), in that the record on appeal did not contain substantial evidence in support of the essential elements of the offense, noting that the purpose of section 22450 is to require a vehicle to stop before it is in a position where it could impede or hit pedestrians who could be in a crosswalk, or cross-traffic that could be in an intersection. (People v. Kruschen (2020) 46

Cal.App.5th Supp. 12: The kind-hearted officer having cited the defendant for the lesser offense to avoid a stiffer penalty.)

Post-Arrest, Pre-Trial Detentions:

A pretrial detainee's claim that he was unlawfully detained in jail after his arrest, based upon a probable cause finding that relied upon fabricated evidence, was properly brought under the Fourth Amendment rather than the Due Process Clause. Pretrial detentions that follows the start of legal process (a magistrate's finding of probable cause, in this case) in a criminal case may violate the Fourth Amendment, depending upon the circumstances. It is only after a trial has occurred that the Fourth Amendment drops out, and a person challenging the sufficiency of the evidence to support both a conviction and any ensuing incarceration does so under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. (Manuel v. City of Joliet (2017) 580 U.S. 357 [137 S.Ct. 911; 187 L.Ed.2nd 312].)

The question was left to the trial court below to decide whether the detainee's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 civil claim accrued for statute of limitations purposes on the date legal process was initiated or on the date the criminal charges were dismissed.

Mistaken Belief in Existence of Probable Cause to Arrest or Search, an Arrest Warrant, or that a Fourth Waiver Exists, Based upon Erroneous Information Received from Various Sources:

The Problem: An officer arrests and/or searches a person under the mistaken belief that there is an arrest warrant outstanding for the person, the person is subject to a "Fourth Waiver*" (i.e., he has previously waived his Fourth Amendment search and seizure rights), or the officer is given other erroneous information through either court, law enforcement, or other official channels.

Generally, a police officer's good faith belief that he has probable cause to arrest will save what is later determined to be an illegal arrest, having been made without sufficient probable cause. However, where a reasonably well-trained officer would, or should, have known that an arrest or search was unlawful, good faith will not save any subsequently discovered evidence. (People v. Macabeo (2016) 1 Cal.5th 1206, 1219-1226; officer should have known that a search of defendant's cellphone could not be justified under the "search incident to arrest" theory in that defendant had not yet been arrested until after the cellphone was searched.)

The Rule: The United States Supreme Court initially held that an officer's "good faith" will validate the resulting arrest and/or search, at least in those cases where the erroneous information came from a "court source." (Arizona v. Evans (1995) 514 U.S. 1 [115 S.Ct. 1185; 131 L.Ed.2nd 34]; see also People v. Downing (1995) 33 Cal.App.4th 1641.)

Extension of the Rule: The United States Supreme Court subsequently ruled (in a 5-to-4 decision) that an officer's good faith reliance on erroneous information will not invalidate an arrest even when that information comes from a law enforcement source, so long as the error was based upon non-reoccurring negligence only. Deliberate illegal acts, or a reckless disregard for constitutional requirements, or reoccurring or systematic negligence, will not excuse the resulting unlawful arrest. (Herring v. United States (2009) 555 U.S. 135 [129 S.Ct. 695; 172 L.Ed.2nd 496].)

> Herring has been interpreted as authority for extending the "good faith" rule to include instances when the erroneous information in a warrant is the result of the officers' own errors. (United States v. Artis (9th Cir. 2019) 919 F.3rd 1123, 1132; "In light of Herring, we can no longer declare the good-faith exception categorically inapplicable whenever a search warrant is issued on the basis of evidence illegally obtained as a result of constitutional errors by the police;" rejecting, nonetheless, the application of the "good faith" rule to this case.
>
> But see United States v. Camou (9th Cir. 2014) 773 F.3rd 932, 944-945, where the Ninth Circuit ruled that "good faith" has never been held to excuse an illegal search where erroneous information did not come from another source, where the negligence was the fault of the searching officer, and just because the searching officer did not act recklessly or intentionally.
>
> The Appellate Department of the San Diego Superior Court has held that the practice of sending blood results to a drug lab in those "driving while under the influence" cases where testing for alcohol failed to show sufficient alcohol to account for the degree that the suspect appeared to be under the influence, and where the defendant had consented only to have her blood tested for alcohol as opposed to drugs, constituted "a procedural recurring or systematic failure by the law enforcement agency's personnel to abide by the Fourth Amendment." As a result, good faith did not prevent a court from suppressing the test result for drugs as being beyond the scope of the consent given where the defendant is told only that her blood will be tested for alcohol. (People v. Pickard (2017) 15 Cal.App.5th Supp. 12, 16-17.)

> Where defendant was arrested and released on bail, subject to the court's imposition of search conditions, and police later relied on those conditions prior to the appellate court invalidating them (in a related appeal), the Court refused suppression, finding that the exclusionary rule's purpose would not be advanced where the officers "had no reason to know the trial court's decision was insufficiently reasoned." (People v. Maxwell (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 546, 558-560.)
> An officer's good faith reliance on the existence of a subject's waiver of his Fourth Amendment search and seizure rights as a condition of his pre-trial release from custody, where that condition is later (after the search) deleted by an appellate court decision, justifies the search. Evidence recovered as a result of that Fourth waiver search will not be suppressed. (People v. Maxwell (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 546, 558-560.)

The Reasoning: This is because the "Exclusionary Rule" was implemented primarily to deter intentional or reckless police misconduct; not misconduct by the courts or other non-law enforcement sources, or even law enforcement when their error was simply non-reoccurring negligence. It is not necessary to suppress the resulting evidence when to do so does not further the purposes of the Exclusionary Rule. (Arizona v. Evans, supra, at pp. 15-16 [115 S.Ct. 1185; 131 L.Ed.2nd at pp. 47-48]; United States v. Leon (1984) 468 U.S. 897, 920-921 [104 S.Ct. 3405; 82 L.Ed.2nd 677, 697]; People v. Willis (2002) 28 Cal.4th 22; People v. Tellez (1982) 128 Cal.App.3rd 876, 880; Illinois v. Krull (1987) 480 U.S. 340 [107 S.Ct. 1160; 94 L.Ed.2nd 364].)

> "(E)vidence should be suppressed 'only if it can be said that the law enforcement officer had knowledge, or may properly be charged with knowledge, that the search was unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment.'" (Illinois v. Krull, supra., at pp. 348-349.)
>
> "To trigger the exclusionary rule, police conduct must be sufficiently deliberate that exclusion can meaningfully deter it, and sufficiently culpable that such deterrence is worth the price paid by the justice system." (Herring v. United States, supra., at p. 144.)

Law Enforcement vs. Non-Law Enforcement Source: After the decision in Arizona v. Evans (1995) 514 U.S. 1 [115 S.Ct. 1185; 131 L.Ed.2nd 34], and before Herring v. United States, supra, California courts debated what was a law enforcement source, and what was not, interpreting Evans as establishing a bright line test for the issue. These cases will likely still be relevant in those cases where it is determined to be a law enforcement source and involves deliberate illegal acts, reckless disregard for constitutional requirements, or reoccurring or systematic negligence.

Law enforcement source cases where the resulting evidence was suppressed:

Police Computer Records: Arrest based upon an arrest warrant which was supposed to have been recalled six months earlier, but which was still reflected as outstanding in the police department's computer system. (People v. Ramirez (1983) 34 Cal.3rd 541, 543-544; People v. Armstrong (1991) 232 Cal.App.3rd 228, 241; Miranda v. Superior Court (1993) 13 Cal.App.4th 1628.)

Parole is a law enforcement source. Erroneous information from a state Department of Corrections parole officer resulted in a belief that the defendant was subject to a Fourth Waiver. The resulting warrantless search was held to be illegal. (People v. Willis (2002) 28 Cal.4th 22.)

But see People v. Tellez (1982) 128 Cal.App.3rd 876, where erroneous information from Parole did not preclude the use of the "Good Faith" exception to the exclusionary rule. This case is of questionable validity given the rule in Willis.

Exception: Where an officer is erroneously told that the defendant is on parole, only to find out later that he was subject to a probationary Fourth waiver instead, the search will be upheld. It is not relevant what type of Fourth waiver applies to the defendant, the officer acting in "good faith." (People v. Hill (2004) 118 Cal.App.4th 1344.)

Probation: Based upon the reasoning of People v. Willis (2002) 28 Cal.4th 22, it was held that an adult Probation Department, even when the error was made by a clerk, is a law enforcement source. This Court questioned the continuing validity of In re Arron C. (1997) 59 Cal.App.4th 1365 (finding Juvenile Probation to be a court source), but noted that Arron C. dealt with "Juvenile Probation," which works closer with the courts than does adult probation departments. (People v. Ferguson (2003) 109 Cal.App.4th 367.)

See In re Arron (1997) 59 Cal.App.4th 1365, below.

Exception; DMV Hearings: Although evidence of a driving under the influence violation is subject to suppression in a criminal prosecution when it is discovered as a product of a traffic stop based upon outdated police records that the vehicle defendant was driving was stolen, that same evidence will not be suppressed in *Department of Motor Vehicles administrative proceedin*gs involving the suspension of defendant's driver's license. (Park v. Valverde (2007) 152 Cal.App.4th 877; see also People v. Arredondo (2016) 245 Cal.App.4th 186, 201; People v. Mason (2016) 8 Cal.App.5th Supp. 11, 29.)

Note: Petition for Review in People v. Arredondo was dismissed and the case remanded in light of the decision in Mitchell v. Wisconsin (June 27, 2019) __ U.S.__, __ [139 S.Ct. 2525; 204 L.Ed.2nd 1040], where the U.S. Supreme Court held that when a DUI arrestee is unconscious, this fact alone will "almost always" constitute an exigency, allowing for a warrantless blood draw.

Non-law enforcement source cases where the resulting evidence was not suppressed:

Fourth Waiver Information from the Courts: Erroneous information concerning whether defendant was still on probation and subject to a Fourth Waiver, the error created by a court clerk, is a "court source." (People v. Downing (1995) 33 Cal.App.4th 1641.)

However, the Court in Downing noted that once law enforcement is on notice of the defects in the court system, "good faith" may not apply the next time. (People v. Downing, supra, at p. 1657, fn. 26; "We caution, however, that where the police department has knowledge of flaws in a record or data base system, it would not seem 'objectively reasonable' to rely solely on it without taking additional steps to ensure its accuracy.")

Reversed Prior Conviction: A probationary Fourth Waiver condition from a prior case that was legally in effect at the time of the search in issue justifies the search. The fact that the prior conviction is subsequently vacated, thus nullifying the search condition, does not retroactively make the search in issue illegal. (People v. Miller (2004) 124 Cal.App.4th 216.)

> Where defendant's prior conviction was overturned on appeal, but only after officers conducted a probationary search based upon that conviction. Same result as in Miller. "(T)he integrity of the process is best served . . . by a rule which determines the validity of the search on the basis of the legal situation which exits at the time the search is made." (People v. Fields (1981) 119 Cal.App.3rd 386, 390.)

Legislative Sources: Relying upon a statute authorizing a warrantless administrative search, after which that statute is later declared to be unconstitutional, is lawful as having come from a "legislative source" (Illinois v. Krull (1987) 480 U.S. 340 [107 S.Ct. 1160; 94 L.Ed.2nd 364].), in that the exclusionary rule was not created to punish the Legislature any more than it was created to punish the courts.

> See also; Michigan v. DeFillippo (1979) 443 U.S. 31, 37-38 [99 S.Ct. 2627; 61 L.Ed.2nd 343, 439-350]; good faith reliance on an ordinance that was later declared to be unconstitutional.
>
> The alleged unconstitutionality of a statute, the violation for which serves as the basis for a search warrant, is irrelevant so long as officers reasonably relied upon the statute's validity at the time of the obtaining of the search warrant. (United States v. Meek (9th Cir. 2004) 366 F.3rd 705, 714.)
>
> Good faith reliance upon the validity of the implied consent provisions of V.C. § 23612(a)(5), for an unconscious or deceased DUI suspect to provide a blood sample, makes admissible defendant's blood/alcohol test results in this case although a search warrant should have been obtained under the Fourth Amendment. (People v. Arredondo (2016) 245 Cal.App.4th 186, 206-210.)
>
> Note: Petition for Review was dismissed in People v. Arredondo and the case remanded in light of the decision in Mitchell v. Wisconsin (June 27, 2019) __ U.S.__, __ [139 S.Ct. 2525; 204 L.Ed.2nd 1040], where the U.S. Supreme Court held that when a DUI arrestee is unconscious, this fact alone will "almost always" constitute an exigency, allowing for a warrantless blood draw.

Department of Motor Vehicles Sources: Invalid information concerning the status of a vehicle's registration, entered into the system by a non-law enforcement "data entry clerk," is a non-law enforcement source. The officer's arrest and search in reasonable reliance upon records showing that the defendant's vehicle's registration was expired and that a fraudulent tab had been placed on the license plate (displaying false registration tabs, per V.C. §§ 20, 31, 4601 and 40000.1), was upheld under the "good faith" exception. (People v. Hamilton (2002) 102 Cal.App.4th 1311.)

Juvenile Probation: At least within the Juvenile Court, probation is more aligned with the courts than law enforcement, and is therefore a "court source." Erroneous information from Juvenile Probation does not preclude application of good faith to save the resulting search. (In re Arron C. (1997) 59 Cal.App.4th 1365.)

Reliance upon a juvenile's Fourth Waiver, valid at the time, justifies a search irrespective of whether the waiver was lawfully imposed. (People v. Rios (2011) 193 Cal.App.4th 584, 597-598.)

But see People v. Howard (1984) 162 Cal.App.3rd 8, at pp. 19-21, where Probation merely failed to inform a police officer of the correct limits of a particular probation search condition. The Court held the resulting search to be illegal. Howard, however, is criticized by both Downing, supra, at p. 1652, fn. 17, and Arron C., supra, at p. 1372.

Arresting and Searching in Ignorance of an Existing Warrant of Arrest: An arrest and search of a person without probable cause cannot be validated after the fact when it is belatedly discovered that an arrest warrant exists for that person. (Moreno v. Baca (9th Cir. 2005) 431 F.3rd 633, 638-641.)

This may no longer be valid authority in light of the decision in Herring v. United States (2009) 555 U.S. 135 [129 S.Ct. 695; 172 L.Ed.2nd 496], excusing an illegal arrest when the officer is acting in good faith; see above.

See "Searching While In Ignorance of a Search Condition," under "Fourth Waiver Searches*" (Chapter 19), below.

Minors:

Curfew Violations: There is a split of authority on the legality of "arresting" a minor for a curfew violation:

> Minors violating curfew may be stopped, detained, and transported to a curfew center, the police station, or other facility where the minor can await the arrival of a parent or other responsible adult. A search of the minor prior to placing him in a curfew center with other children is also reasonable. (In re Ian C. (2001) 87 Cal.App.4th 856.)
>
> Before Ian C., it was held that a curfew violation did not justify the transportation of a minor to a police station for interrogation, such a custodial arrest not being one of the alternatives allowed under the Welfare and Institutions Code, referring to W&I §§ 601, 626, 626 and 626.5. The Court further held that such a transportation, as an illegal arrest, was also a violation of the Fourth Amendment. (In re Justin B. (1999) 69 Cal.App.4th 879.)
>
> In re Justin B. was criticized in the later decision of In re Charles C. (1999) 76 Cal.App.4th 420. The Court in Charles C. held that the arrest and transportation of a minor to a police station for a violation of curfew, at least where the minor's parents could not be located while still in the field, was not improper. Under such circumstances, taking the minor to a police station is the least intrusive alternative left to the officer. (W&I § 626) Further W&I § 207(b)(2) provides that a minor as described by W&I § 601 (which includes curfew violators) may be taken into custody and held in a "secure facility," which includes a police station, so long as not confined with adults, for up to 24 hours while the minor's parents are located. Lastly, the Court held that even if in violation of the Welfare and Institutions Code, the Fourth Amendment is not violated by transporting a curfew violator to a police station, so suppression of any resulting evidence is not required.
>
> > The Court further noted that taking a minor "into temporary custody," as authorized by W&I § 625, is the functional equivalent of an arrest. (In re Charles C., supra, at p. 425, fn. 3; see also In re Thierry S. (1977) 19 Cal.3rd 727, 734, fn. 6; and In re Justin B., supra, at p. 889.)

Note: In re Charles C., supra, is the better rule. In re Justin B., supra, criticized by both Charles C. (at pp. 426-427.) and In re Ian C., supra, at p. 860, is a strained decision at best, and of questionable validity.

Truancy Violations:

Observation of a minor carrying a backpack on the street during school hours within several miles of a high school was sufficient cause to stop and detain the minor and inquiry as to his status as a student. When defendant was unable to provide a satisfactory reason for why he was out of school, and had identification in someone else's name, he was properly arrested for being truant (Ed. Code, § 48264) and searched incident to arrest. (In re Humberto O. (2000) 80 Cal.App.4th 237; recovery of a dagger from his backpack was lawful.)

The Americans with Disabilities Act* ("ADA"):

The Issue: The Americans with Disabilities Act has been held by some authorities (including the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal) to apply to arrests, creating the potential for civil liability should law enforcement violate the Act in making an arrest. (Sheehan v. City & County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2014) 743 F.3rd 1211, 1231-1233; certiorari granted.)

The U.S. Supreme Court, after granting certiorari in this case, dismissed this issue as "improvidently granted" in that the parties changed the issue from whether or not the ADA applies to arrests to whether a mentally ill person being arrested qualified in the first place for the protections of the Act, without this later issue being properly raised and debated below. (City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan (2015) 575 U.S. 600 [135 S.Ct. 1765; 191 L.Ed.2nd 856].) So the issue was left undecided.

Title II of the ADA provides that "no qualified individual with a disability shall, by reason of such disability, be excluded from participation in or be denied the benefits of the services, programs, or activities of a public entity, or be subjected to discrimination by any such entity." (42 U.S.C. § 12132)

Types of Disability: At least two types of Title II claims may be applicable to arrests:

Wrongful arrest, where police wrongly arrest someone with a disability because they misperceive the effects of that disability as criminal activity; and

Unreasonable accommodation, where, although police properly investigate and arrest a person with a disability for a crime unrelated to that disability, they fail to reasonably accommodate the person's disability in the course of investigation or arrest, causing the person to suffer greater injury or indignity in that process than other arrestees.

(See the Ninth Circuit's decision in Sheehan v. City & County of San Francisco, supra., at p. 1232; certiorari granted.)

> The U.S. Supreme Court, after granting certiorari in this case, dismissed this issue as "improvidently granted" in that the parties changed the issue from whether or not the ADA applies to arrests to whether a mentally ill person being arrested qualified in the first place for the protections of the Act, without this later issue being properly raised below. (City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan (2015) 575 U.S. 600 [135 S.Ct. 1765; 191 L.Ed.2nd 856].) So the issue is left undecided.

What Qualifies as a "Disability:"

Under the ADA, "disability" is defined as "a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more major life activities of such individual."

Obesity is not considered, at least by some courts, to be a disability under the ADA. (Lumar v. Monsanto Co. (5th Cir. 2020) 795 F.Appx. 293.)

An ADA complaint filed by transgender woman with "gender dysphoria" stated an actionable claim because plaintiff plausibly alleged that gender dysphoria fell within the safe harbor for gender identity disorders due to physical impairments, such that dismissal for failure to state an actionable claim was not warranted. (Williams v. Kincaid (4th Cir. 2022) 45 F.4th 759.)

> Note: Gender dysphoria describes an uncomfortable conflict between a person's assigned gender and the gender with which the person identifies, according to the American Psychiatric Association.

Case Law:

Police officers responded to a 911 call reporting that plaintiff had experienced an epileptic seizure, was trying to break windows, and had fled his home naked. In apprehending plaintiff on a sidewalk after he refused to comply with commands to stop, officers struggled physically with plaintiff, using a "reverse reap throw" to bring him to the ground where, after further struggle, he was finally subdued and arrested. In Plaintiff's federal 42 U.S.C. § 1983 lawsuit following his arrest, the city was properly granted summary judgment on his ADA claim for failure to accommodate his epilepsy because he had not shown that a lesser amount of force would have been reasonable under the circumstances. Plaintiff's ADA failure to train claim likewise failed because he had not shown how personnel with different training would have acted differently given the exigencies of the situation. (O'Doan v. Sanford (9th Cir. 2021) 991 Cal.App.5th 1027.)

> Note: The "reverse reap throw" is described in the decision as a take-down tactic where an officer essentially trips the subject from behind to throw him off balance and then guides him to the ground with both hands. (Id., at p. 1033.)

The Second District Court of Appeal (Div. 1) held that the trial court correctly sustained a demurrer to a civil complaint alleging a violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act, Civ. Code, § 51 et seq., which was based on maintaining a retail website that was inaccessible to the visually impaired by reason of a lack of compatibility with screen reading software, because neither the discriminatory effects of facially neutral conduct nor the failure to ameliorate such effects could support inferring intentional discrimination under the Unruh Act. The complaint in this case failed to allege intentional discrimination. Also, because a standalone website is not a "place of public accommodation under 42 U.S.C. §§ 12181(7), 12182, the complaint failed to state a claim under the Unruh Act based on an alleged violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12101 et seq., which does not require proof of intentional discrimination. (Martinez v. Cot'n Wash, Inc (2022) 81 Cal.App.5th 1026.)

In a suit brought by two deaf plaintiffs who alleged that a hospital failed to afford them effective communication during a series of hospital stays, in violation of Title III of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act, Section 1557 of the Affordable Care Act (ACA), and California's Unruh Civil Rights Act, the Court held that in light of the circuit court's conclusion that the Rehabilitation Act does not require "primary consideration," the circuit court was persuaded that it would be anomalous to interpret the ACA as having imposed a primary consideration requirement before a Health and Human Services (HHS) rule applying ADA Title II's effective communication standards became effective. Therefore, the circuit court held that the district court did not err in declining to apply such a requirement when analyzing the claims of one of the plaintiffs. And because plaintiffs' ACA claims were otherwise subject to the same analysis as their Rehabilitation Act claims, the district court did not err in concluding that plaintiffs failed to establish a violation of section 1557 of the ACA.

Information Provided to an Arrested Person*:

Pen. Code § 841*:

Information to be Provided: The person making the arrest must inform the person being arrested of the following:

- The intention to arrest him;
- The cause of the arrest (i.e., the charges); and
- The authority to make it.

(See People v. Superior Court (Logue) (1973) 35 Cal.App.3rd 1, 5.)

Exceptions: There is no need to comply with the above when:

- The person making the arrest has reasonable cause to believe that the person to be arrested is actually engaged in the commission of, or an attempt to commit, an offense (See People v. Darnell (1951) 107 Cal.App.2nd 541 545; People v. Thomas (1957) 156 Cal.App.2nd 117, 130; People v. Valenzuela (1959) 171 Cal.App.2nd 331, 333.);

  Applies as well in a citizen's arrest situation. (See Lowrey v. Standford Oil Co. (1942) 54 Cal.App.2nd 782, 791-793.); or

- The person to be arrested is pursued immediately after commission of the offense, or after an escape. (See People v. Pool (1865) 27 Cal. 572, 576; Allen v. McCoy (1933) 135 Cal.App. 500, 508; People v. Campbell (1972) 27 Cal.App.3rd 849, 854; and Johanson v. Department of Motor Vehicles (1995) 36 Cal.App.4th 1209, 1218.)

  Even where an exception applies, if the arrestee asks what he or she is being arrested for, he or she must be told. (P.C. § 841)

Sanctions for Violations:

There is little authority describing what sanctions might apply should the Pen. Code § 841 requirements be violated. But see People v. Villareal (1968) 262 Cal.App.2nd 438, at p. 446, where the Court notes that "even assuming (the officer) failed to comply with section 841 of the Penal Code, and that such failure did not come within the exemption provisions of said section, such failure would not affect the admissibility of the evidence secured by a search incidental to an otherwise lawful arrest." (Citing People* v. Maddox (1956) 46 Cal.2nd 301, 305; and People v. *Cove (1964) 228 Cal.App.2nd 466, 472-473.)

And see People v. Olguin (1981) 119 Cal.App.3rd 39, 44-45, involving an arrest with excessive force used by the officer, where it was held that such a situation gives the arrestee the right to use self-defense, and negates the element of "acting in the performance of his or her duties" for any potential charge where this element must be proved. (E.g.; P.C. §§ 148(a), 243(b) & (c), and 245(c) & (d). By analogy, an officer violating the P.C. § 841 requirements, where none of the exceptions apply, is not acting in the performance of his or her duties.

> ""[T]he lawfulness of the officer's conduct is an essential element of the offense" of resisting a police officer' because the police officer is not engaged in 'duties' if the officer is engaged in unlawful conduct." (In re T.F.-G. (Aug. 24, 2023) __ Cal.App.5th __, __ quoting People v. Fuentes (2022) 78 Cal.App.5th 670, 676.)

Foreign Nationals; P.C. § 834c(a)(1)*:

Vienna Convention on Consular Relations: Pen. Code § 834c(a)(1) is a statutory enactment of the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, Article 36; a Treaty signed by the United States and 169 other countries.

> Note: If the subject is a foreign "diplomat," entitled by "diplomatic immunity" from arrest and prosecution, then the "Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations" (22 U.S.C. § 245) is the controlling document. (See https://www.state.gov/documents/organization/150546.pdf, and https://travel.state.gov/content/dam/travel/CNAtrainingresources/CNA_Manual_4th_Edition_August2016.pdf.)

Advisal to Arrestee/Detainee: Upon the arrest and booking or detention for more than two (2) hours of a known or suspected foreign national, the arrestee/detainee shall be advised "without delay" that he or she has a right to communicate with an official from the consulate of his or her native country. If the arrestee/detainee chooses to exercise that right, the peace officer shall notify the pertinent official in his or her agency or department of the arrest or detention and that the foreign national wants his or her consulate notified. (People v. Enraca (2012) 53 Cal.4th 735, 756-758; People v. Mendoza (2007) 42 Cal.4th 686, 709.)

> The officer's department is responsible for making the requested notification. (Pen. Code § 834c(a)(2))
>
> The law enforcement official in charge of a custodial facility where a foreign national is housed shall ensure that the arrestee is allowed to communicate with, correspond with, and be visited by, a consular officer of his or her country. (Pen. Code § 834c(a)(3))
>
> Local law enforcement agencies are to incorporate these requirements into their respective policies and procedures. (Pen. Code § 834c(c))
>
> The Vienna Convention also provides that any communication addressed to the consular post by the person arrested, in prison, custody or detention shall be forwarded by the authorities "without delay." (Art. 36(1)(b))

Standing:

> Although there is some disagreement, it is generally accepted that a foreign national has the "standing" necessary to invoke the provisions of the Vienna Convention in so far as they require notice to an arrestee/detainee of his right to contact his consulate. (See United States v. Superville (Vir. Islands, 1999) 40 F.Supp.2nd 672, 676-678.)
>
> The United States Supreme Court, until recently (see below), declined to decide whether a foreign national who had not been advised of his rights under the Vienna Convention had an enforceable right in U.S. courts. (Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon (2006) 548 U.S. 331, 343 [126 S.Ct. 2669; 165 L.Ed.2nd 557]; assuming for the sake of argument that they did, while specifically declining to decide the issue. Four dissenting opinions would have held that the defendants had a right to raise these issues. (At pp. 369-378.)

Automatic Notice to Foreign Country: Fifty-six (56) countries are listed in subdivision (d) which must be notified of the arrest or detention (pursuant to subd. (a)(1); i.e., more than 2 hours) of one of their foreign nationals "without regard to an arrested or detained foreign national's request to the contrary."

> Note: Although Mexico is one of the 170 (which includes the United States) countries that signed the Convention, it is not one of the countries listed that must be automatically notified of the arrest, booking or detention of a foreign national.

Sanctions for Violations: It has been generally accepted that a violation of the provisions of the Vienna Convention and, presumably, this statute, will not result in the suppression of any evidence. (United States v. Lombera-Camorlinga (9th Cir. 2000) 206 F.3rd 882; People v. Corona (2001) 89 Cal.App.4th 1426; United States v. Rodriguez-Preciado (9th Cir. 2005) 399 F.3rd 1118, 1130.)

Not informing a Japanese national of his right to contact the Japanese consulate upon his arrest is not a violation of the Japan Convention, Article 16(1). Even if Article 16(1) could be interpreted as requiring such notification, a violation would not result in the suppression of the defendant's later statements nor any physical evidence recovered as the result of a consensual search. (United States v. Amano (9th Cir. 2000) 229 F.3rd 801, 804.)

Japan, although a signatory to the Vienna Convention, is not one of the 56 countries listed in Pen. Code 834c that must be notified upon the arrest or detention of one of their citizens.

The United States Supreme Court, until recently, has rejected appeals on this issue on procedural grounds, declining to decide this issue on its merits. (See Breard v. Greene (1998) 523 U.S. 371 [523 S.Ct. 371; 140 L.Ed.2nd 529].)

However, a number of justices have expressed dissatisfaction with avoiding the issue, in general, and not sanctioning states for violating the Convention, in particular. (See also Torres v. Mullin (2003) 540 U.S. 1035 [124 S.Ct. 562; 157 L.Ed.2nd 454].)

The "International Court of Justice" (ICJ), in a lawsuit brought against the United States by Mexico and decided on March 31, 2004, found that there are 54 death row inmates (27 of which are in California) who were not provided with a notification of their consular rights, in violation of the Vienna Convention. The Court concluded that the offending state and local jurisdictions violating these requirements were "obligated" to review and reconsider these cases. (See Mexico v. United States of America* [Avena] (2004) 2004 I.C.J. No. 128.)

The United States Supreme Court, in Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon (2006) 548 U.S. 331, 351-356 [126 S.Ct. 2669; 165 L.Ed.2nd 557], while finding that the rulings of the ICJ deserved "respectful consideration," held that they were not binding upon U.S. courts and declined to follow their guidance on this issue.

In May, 2005, the United States Supreme Court dismissed as improvidently granted a writ of certiorari in a Texas case challenging state law enforcement officers' failure to provide a capital defendant, and Mexican national, with a Vienna Convention notification. (Medellin v. Dretke (2005) 544 U.S. 660 [161 L.Ed.2nd 982].)

> The Court in Medellin v. Dretke did not dismiss the writ out of a lack of interest, however, but rather because the defendant initiated new proceedings in the Texas' courts, based upon the ICJ's latest pronouncement (Mexico v. United States of America* [Avena], supra.) and an executive order issued by President Bush for American courts to review violations of the Vienna Convention (see International Herald Tribune (3/4/05)), that might well resolve the issues.
>
> Even so, four U.S. Supreme Court justices dissented, noting that "(n)oncompliance with our treaty obligations is especially worrisome in capital cases," and that the defendant in this case had raised some "debatable" issues that "suggest the very real possibility of his victory in state court." (Medellin v. Dretke, supra.)
>
> Both the U.S. and the California Supreme Courts have noted that "'neither Avena nor the President's Memorandum constitutes directly enforceable federal law' binding on state courts." (People v. Maciel (2013) 57 Cal.4th 482, 505; see also In re Martinez (2009) 46 Cal.4th 945, 949-950; and citing Medellin v. Texas (2008) 552 U.S. 491 [128 S.Ct. 1346; 170 L.Ed.2nd 190].)

The United States Supreme Court finally ruled on the issues of (1) the proper remedy for an Article 36 violation and (2) whether failing to raise the issue at the trial court level precluded the raising of the issue post-conviction. (Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon (2006) 548 U.S. 331 [126 S.Ct. 2669; 165 L.Ed.2nd 557] (joined with Bustillo v. Johnson (#05-51), a case from the Virginia Supreme Court). In these two cases, the Court held that a violation of the Vienna Convention does not warrant the suppression of evidence, including a defendant's statements. The Court also held (in the Bustillo v. Johnson portion of the decision) that failing to raise the issue in the state courts will preclude, procedurally, the defendant from litigating the issue by way of a federal writ of habeas corpus.

> Not decided was whether the Vienna Convention grants individuals enforceable rights in a state court, or whether the provisions of the Convention are something to be enforced via political channels between countries, the Court assuming, for the sake of argument, that such rights were enforceable without deciding the issue. (Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon, supra., a p. 343.) Four dissenting opinions would have specifically held that the defendants had a right to raise these issues. (Id., at pp. 369-378.)

But note: An extradited defendant has standing to seek enforcement of an extradition treaty's restrictions on the potential punishment to which he may be subjected. (Benitez v. Garcia (9th Cir. 2007) 476 F.3rd 676; extradited from Venezuela under the understanding that he would not be subjected to the death penalty or a life sentence.)

The Vienna Convention does not provide a foreign national any rights that are enforceable in a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 civil rights suit against law enforcement for violating the person's rights provided for under the Convention. (Cornejo v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2007) 504 F.3rd 853.)

In November, 2006, the Texas appellate court refused to comply with the president's command to provide defendants whose Vienna Convention rights were violated with a hearing on the issue, deciding that it would not allow Jose Ernesto Medellin to file a second habeas petition seeking relief. (Medellin v. Texas, 06-984.)

The United States Supreme Court upheld Texas on this issue, finding that the terms of the Vienna Convention are not "self-executing," did not have the force of domestic law, and were not binding on U.S. Courts. The Court also held that the President had no authority to dictate the procedures to be used in state court and therefore could not legally order state courts to give prisoners hearings on this issue. (Medellin v. Texas (2008) 552 U.S. 491 [128 S.Ct. 1346; 170 L.Ed.2nd 190].)

See also In re Martinez (2009) 46 Cal.4th 945, where the California Supreme Court concluded that petitioner was precluded from renewing his Vienna Convention claim because he had previously raised the issue and the court had denied relief on its merits. Therefore, his petition was successive, and he failed to demonstrate any change of circumstance or the applicability of any exception to the procedural bar of successiveness to warrant reconsideration of his claim.

The California Supreme Court has held that even assuming a defendant is not advised of his consular rights in violation of the Vienna Convention, relief will not be granted absent a showing of prejudice. (People v. Mendoza (2007) 42 Cal.4th 686, 709-711.)

Failing to advise an arrested Filipino murder suspect of his right to have his consulate notified of his arrest does not, by itself, render a confession inadmissible. (People v. Enraca (2012) 53 Cal.4th 735, 756-758.)

> Using the same reasoning, defendant's claim under the United States bilateral consular convention with the Philippines also failed. (Id, at p. 758.)

Defendant, a Mexican national, was convicted of murder and sentenced to death by a Texas court. The International Court of Justice (ICJ) held that the United States had violated the Vienna Convention by failing to notify him of his right to consular assistance. The Mexican national and the United States sought to stay the execution so that Congress could consider whether to enact legislation implementing the ICJ decision. The Supreme Court determined that a stay of execution was not warranted because (1) neither the ICJ decision nor the President's Memorandum purporting to implement that decision constituted directly enforceable federal law, (2) the Due Process Clause did not prohibit Texas from carrying out a lawful judgment and executing him in light of un-enacted legislation that might someday authorize a collateral attack on that judgment, (3) it had been seven years since the ICJ ruling and three years since the Supreme Court's previous decision, making a stay based on the bare introduction of a bill in a single house of Congress even less justified, and (4) the United States studiously refused to argue that he was prejudiced by the Vienna Convention violation. (Garcia v. Texas (2011) 564 U.S. 940 [131 S.Ct. 2866; 180 L.Ed.2nd 872].)

A foreign national claiming relief pursuant to the provisions of the Vienna Convention is not entitled to relief via a direct appeal. He must proceed by way of a habeas corpus petition even though he will be required to establish prejudice under such a petition where the standard in a direct appeal is considerably less. (People v. Maciel (2013) 57 Cal.4th 482, 504-506; People v. Mendoza (2016) 62 Cal.4th 856, 917.)

A "defendant can raise an Article 36 claim as part of a broader challenge to the voluntariness of his statements to police," but alone is not grounds for the suppression of his statements. (People v. Sanchez (2019) 7 Cal.5th 14, 51.)

Suppression was not required by the failure of officers to alert defendant to his right to have the Mexican consulate notified of his detention, as required by the Vienna Convention and Pen. Code § 834c because failure to notify does not, in itself, render a statement inadmissible. (People v. Leon (2020) 8 Cal.App.5th 831, 845-847.)

Although law enforcement officials involved in questioning defendant, a Mexican national, technically violated the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, defendant did not suffer prejudice as he had neither shown that the Mexican consulate would have provided him with resources that were not otherwise accessible, nor that those resources would have affected the outcome of his trial. (People v. Vargas (2020) 9 Cal.5th 793, 830-835.)

"Although the failure to notify a suspect of his or her consular rights does not by itself require suppression of the suspect's statements, this court and the United States Supreme Court have recognized that "[a] consular notification claim may be raised as part of a broader challenge to the voluntariness of a confession." (Miranda-Guerrero (2022) 14 Cal.5th 1, 20, citing People v. Leon (2020) 8 Cal.5th 831, 846, which in turn cited Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon (2006) 548 U.S. 331, 350 [165 L.Ed.2nd 557; 126 S.Ct. 2669].)

In Miranda-Guerrero, even though defendant claimed on appeal that he would have invoked his right to silence and to consult with the Mexican consulate had he been advised of his right to do so, the Court found that this was "too speculative." Defendant failed to show any prejudice caused by the officers having failed to advise him of the right to consult with the Mexican consulate was held not to require the suppression of admissions he made during his interrogation. (People v. Miranda-Guerrero, supra, at pp. 20-23.)

United States/Mexico Treaty for Mutual Legal Assistance*:

Treaty on Cooperation for Mutual Legal Assistance (Dec. 9, 1987, T.I.A.S. No. 91-503, effective May 3, 1991) between the United States and Mexico.

This treaty provides for mutual legal assistance between the United States and Mexico in criminal matters, including "the prevention, investigation and prosecution of crimes." (Art. 1, Par. 1.)

The formal provisions of this treaty are not mandatory, providing but one means of insuring cooperation between the United States and Mexico in the investigation of crimes. The failure to follow the formal protocols of the treaty, not being mandatory, is not evidence of the involved detectives' bad faith and does not establish a "due process" violation. (People v. Flores (2020) 9 Cal.5th 371, 395-396.)

Miranda*:

Rule: Any person who is arrested, or who is subjected to a contact with law enforcement which has the formal attributes of an arrest, and is questioned, must first be advised of, acknowledge his understanding of, and freely and voluntarily waive, his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, pursuant to Miranda v. Arizona (1966) 384 U.S. 436 [86 S.Ct. 1602; 16 L.Ed.2nd 694]: See "Miranda and the Law."

Real and Physical Evidence:

> The Fifth Amendment right "does not protect a suspect from being compelled by the State to produce 'real or physical evidence.'" (Pennsylvania v. Muniz (1990) 496 U.S. 582, 589 [110 S.Ct. 2638; 110 L.Ed.2nd 528]; see also Schmerber v. California (1966) 384 U.S. 757, 766 [86 S.Ct. 1826; 16 L.Ed.2nd 908, 917]; People v. Elizalde et al. (2015) 61 Cal.4th 523, 532; People v. Sudduth (1966) 65 Cal.2nd 543, 546; blood or breath in a DUI case.)
>
> Examples of "real or physical evidence" include fingerprints, photographs, handwriting exemplars, blood samples, standing in a lineup, or speaking for voice identification. (People v. Elizalde et al., supra; citing Pennsylvania v. Muniz, supra, at pp. 591–592.)

Arrested Minors: A minor who is taken "into temporary custody," as authorized by W&I § 625, has been arrested. (In re Charles C. (1999) 76 Cal.App.4th 420, 425; see also In re Thierry S. (1977) 19 Cal.3rd 727, 734, fn. 6.)

> Wel. & Inst. Code § 625(c): In any case where a minor (person under the age of 18) is taken "into temporary custody" with probable cause to believe he or she is in violation of W&I §§ 601 or 602 (i.e., delinquent or status offender), or that he or she has violated an order of the juvenile court or escaped from any commitment ordered by the juvenile court, the officer shall advise such minor that anything he says can be used against him or her, and shall advise the minor of his or her constitutional rights including the right to remain silent, the right to have counsel present during any interrogation, and the right to have appointed counsel if he or she is unable to afford counsel.
> >
> > This admonishment, under the terms of the statute (W&I 625(c)), is to be made whether or not the minor is to be subjected to a custodial interrogation. However, there is no sanction for a failure to comply with the requirements of this statute, unless, of course, the minor is in fact interrogated in which case the standard Miranda rules apply.

Note: The statute does not require that this admonishment be made "immediately" upon arrest, and in fact, does not specify when between the arrest and the minor's release such admonishment must be performed, so long as done before the initiation of any custodial interrogation.

Welf. & Inst. § 625.6*: Minors and Mandatory Attorney Consultations: With amendments effective January 1, 2021 (SB 203), section 625.6 of the Welfare and Institutions Code now provides the following protections for all minors (17 years of age and younger) from potentially coercive interrogations by requiring the following:

(a) Prior to a custodial interrogation, and before the waiver of any Miranda rights, a youth 17 years of age or younger shall consult with legal counsel in person, by telephone, or by video conference. The consultation may not be waived.

(b) The court shall, in adjudicating the admissibility of statements of a youth 17 years of age or younger made during or after a custodial interrogation, consider the effect of failure to comply with subdivision (a) and, additionally, shall consider any willful violation of subdivision (a) in determining the credibility of a law enforcement officer under Section 780 of the Evidence Code.

(c) This section does not apply to the admissibility of statements of a youth 17 years of age or younger if both of the following criteria are met:

(1) The officer who questioned the youth reasonably believed the information he or she sought was necessary to protect life or property from an imminent threat.

(2) The officer's questions were limited to those questions that were reasonably necessary to obtain that information.

(d) This section does not require a probation officer to comply with subdivision (a) in the normal performance of his or her duties under W&I §§ 625, 627.5, or 628.

Case Law:

Welf. & Insti. Code § 625.6, requiring minors 17 years of age and younger, be given access to an attorney prior to being advised of his Miranda rights and authorizing a trial court to consider a failure to do so as a factor in determining the admissibility of the minor's statements, due to enactment of California's Proposition 8 (Cal. Const. art. I, § 28(d)), does not authorize a court to exercise its discretion to exclude statements if those statements are admissible under federal law. (In re Anthony L. (2019) 43 Cal.App.5th 438, 448.)

Wel. & Inst. Code § 627.5*: Minor Taken Before a Probation Officer*:

When a minor taken before a probation officer pursuant to W&I § 626 (Alternative Dispositions for Minors in Temporary Custody When Juvenile Court Proceedings are not Required), and it is alleged that the minor is a person described in W&I §§ 601 (Status Offender) or 602 (Delinquent), the probation officer "shall" immediately advise the minor and his parent or guardian of rights equivalent to those provided in the Miranda decision.

See also 18 U.S.C. § 5033, for a similar federal requirement.

Section 5033 requires that federal law enforcement agents also notify the parents of a juvenile's rights, and that it be done "immediately" after the child is taken into custody.

A one-hour delay in notifying the parents of the juvenile's Miranda rights was not unreasonable given the fact that it was done as soon as it was discovered that the arrested subject was a juvenile. (United States v. Wendy G. (9th Cir. 2001) 255 F.3rd 761.)

Follow-Up Requirements After Arrest*:

Other Rights of the Arrestee:

Right to Access to an Attorney, per Pen Code § 825(b): Any attorney entitled to practice in the courts of record of California may, at the request of the prisoner or any relative of the prisoner, visit the prisoner.

Any officer having charge of the prisoner who willfully refuses or neglects to allow that attorney to visit a prisoner is guilty of a misdemeanor, and "shall forfeit and pay to the party aggrieved the sum of $500, to be recovered by action in any court of competent jurisdiction." (Ibid.)

While the section does not specify when an attorney, at the request of the prisoner or a relative, should be allowed to see the prisoner, it is suggested the request be honored as soon as is practical. The courts tend to be critical of any purposeful delay in allowing an in-custody suspect to consult with his attorney. (See People v. Stroble (1951) 36 Cal.2nd 615, 625-626; "The conduct of the officers (refusing to allow defendant's attorney access to him while officers obtained a confession) . . . was patently illegal.")

It was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court judge to order that confidential attorney-client contact visits be allowed at the county jail absent circumstances justifying a suspension of such visits in individual cases. In this case, there was substantial evidence that the partitioned rooms limited or prevented an inmate from privately confiding facts that might incriminate or embarrass the inmate and create an impermissible chilling effect on the Sixth Amendment constitutional right to counsel. There was also evidence that additional locks, cameras, and training could address the county's security concerns. Lastly, the record showed that the jail allowed ministers and teachers to meet with inmates in non-partitioned rooms, indicating that the jail's restrictions for visits by counsel were an exaggerated response the county's legitimate security concerns (County of Nevada v. Superior Court (2015) 236 Cal.App.4th 1001, 1007-1011.)

However, see People v. Ledesma (1988) 204 Cal.App.3rd 682, 695-696, and fn. 8: Violating P.C. § 825(b) is not a constitutional violation requiring the suppression of the defendant's statements where the defendant had otherwise waived his rights under Miranda.

Right to Access to a Physician or Psychiatrist: Pen Code § 825.5: Any physician or surgeon, including a psychiatrist, or psychologist with a doctoral degree and two years' experience, licensed to practice in this state, employed by the prisoner or his attorney, shall be permitted to visit the prisoner while he or she is in custody.

Note: The statute provides no sanction for failing to comply with this provision.

Right to Telephone Calls, per Pen Code § 851.5(a):

Rule: An arrested person has the right, immediately after booking and, except when physically impossible, no later than three (3) hours after arrest, to make at least three (3) completed telephone calls. The calls are to be free if completed in the local calling area, and are at the arrestee's expense if outside the local area. The calls must be allowed immediately on request, or as soon as practicable. The calls may be made to:

- An attorney of the arrestee's choice, public defender, or other attorney assigned to assist indigents (which may not be monitored).
- A bail bondsman.
- A relative or other person.

This information, including the phone number of the public defender or other attorney assigned to assist indigent defendants, must be posted. (Subd. (b))

An arresting or booking officer is also required to inquire as to whether an arrested person is a custodial parent with responsibility for a minor child and if so, to notify the arrestee that he or she is entitled to make two additional telephone calls (for a total of 5) to arrange child care. (Subd. (c))

Police facilities and places of detention shall post a sign stating that a custodial parent with responsibility for a minor child has the right to two additional telephone calls. (Subd. (d))

If the arrestee so requests, the three telephone calls shall be allowed "immediately," or as soon as is practicable. (Subd. (e))

The signs posted pursuant to the above shall make the specified notifications in English and any non-English language spoken by a substantial number of the public, as specified in Gov't. Code § 7296.2, who are served by the police facility or place of detainment. (Subd. (f))

The rights and duties set forth in this section shall be enforced regardless of the arrestee's immigration status. (Subd. (g))

This section is not intended to "abrogate a law enforcement officer's duty to advise a suspect of his or her right to counsel or of any other right." (Subd. (h))

It is a misdemeanor to willfully deprive an arrested person of these rights. (Subd. (i))

Case Law:

The only recognized exception to this rule is "physical impossibility." (Carlo v. City of Chino (9th Cir. 1997) 105 F.3rd 493.)

> Plaintiff's civil rights were violated by denying her access to a telephone while she was jailed after her arrest on charges of driving while under the influence of alcohol. The state right to a post-booking telephone call (P.C. § 851.5) creates a liberty interest protected by the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution; and due process protections of prisoners' liberty rights were clearly established long before plaintiff was arrested in 1991. (Ibid.)

The alleged fact that defendants were denied right to call an attorney immediately after they were booked had no bearing on admissibility of any extrajudicial statements made prior to time when defendants were booked. (People v. Stout (1967) 66 Cal.2nd 184.)

Withholding permission to a motorist, arrested for driving a motor vehicle on a public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, from telephoning an attorney within the statutory three-hour period after his arrest (Pen Code § 851.5), was not a denial of due process where booking procedures commenced approximately two hours and twenty-five minutes from the time of arrest and where, if defendant had been permitted to make the call then, and as a result of legal advice consented to submit to a chemical test, the results of such test would have little or no probative value. (Lacy v. Orr (1969) 276 Cal App 2nd 198.)

Police may require arrestee first to disclose telephone number of person to whom call is being placed, and then place the call and overtly listen to defendant's side of any non-attorney-client conversation without invading defendant's right to privacy and without implicating his privilege against self-incrimination. (People v. Siripongs (1988) 45 Cal.3rd 548.)

Denial of arrested person's right to make telephone call to bail bondsman did not prejudice him where there was no sufficient showing that such a denial resulted in denial of fair trial in the matter or prevented him from obtaining and presenting evidence of his innocence. (In re Newbern (1961) 55 Cal 2nd 508.)

Phone access may be restricted under unusual circumstances, such as to preclude a defendant and a potential witness (i.e., defendant's attorney) from fabricating evidence. (See People v. Clark (2016) 63 Cal.4th 522, 549-550; "Not every restriction on counsel's time or opportunity . . . to consult with his client or otherwise to prepare for trial violates a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel;" citing Morris v. Slappy (1983) 461 U.S. 1, 11 [103 S.Ct. 1610; 75 L. Ed.2nd 610.)

W&I § 627(b): Right to Make Phone Calls: Arrested juveniles shall be advised of, and have the right to make two (2) completed telephone calls upon being taken to a place of confinement and, except when physically impossible, within one (1) hour after being taken into custody.

The calls are to be to a parent or guardian, a responsible relative, or to the minor's employer, and the second call to an attorney.

The calls are to be at public expense, if local, and made in the presence of a public officer or employee.

Willfully depriving a minor of his or her right to make these calls is a misdemeanor.

Violating this section is not grounds, however, for excluding evidence. (People v. Castille (2003) 108 Cal.App.4th 469, 489-490; vacated and remanded on other grounds. See also People v. Lessie (2010) 47 Cal.4th 1152, 1161, fn. 2, and 1169-1170.)

Subd. (a) requires an officer to "take immediate steps" to notify a parent, guardian or responsible adult of the fact and location of a minor taken to juvenile hall (i.e., to a probation officer) or other place of confinement.

Other Statutory Obligations of the Arresting Officer:

Pen. Code § 848: Arrests by Warrant: An officer making an arrest in obedience to a warrant must proceed with the arrestee as commanded by the warrant, or as provided by law.

Pen. Code § 849(a): Arrests Without a Warrant: An officer (or private person) making an arrest without a warrant shall, without unnecessary delay, take the prisoner not otherwise released before the nearest or most accessible magistrate in the county in which the offense is triable, and a complaint stating the charge against the arrested person shall be laid before such magistrate.

Pen. Code § 849(b): Release From Custody: Any peace officer may release from custody, instead of taking such person before a magistrate, any person arrested without a warrant whenever:

> The officer is satisfied that there are insufficient grounds for making a criminal complaint against the person. (Subd. (b)(1))
>
> The person arrested was arrested for intoxication only, and no further proceedings are desirable. (Subd. (b)(2))
>
> The person was arrested only for being under the influence of a controlled substance or drug and such person is delivered to a facility or hospital for treatment and no further proceedings are desirable. (Subd. (b)(3))
>
> "The person was arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs and the person is delivered to a hospital for medical treatment that prohibits immediate delivery before a magistrate." (Subd. (b)(4))
>
> "The person was arrested and subsequently delivered to a hospital or other urgent care facility, including, but not limited to, a facility for the treatment of co-occurring substance use disorders, for mental health evaluation and treatment, and no further proceedings are desirable." (Subd. (b)(5))
>
> A release under (b)(1), (3), and (5) is to be deemed a detention only.
>
> See also Pen. Code § 851.6, requiring the releasing officer to issue to the arrestee a certificate describing the contact as a detention only.

Note: It is also arguable that a law enforcement officer may choose to release a subject for whom probable cause does exist. There is nothing in the case or statutory law that says that Pen. Code § 849(b) is the exclusive authority for releasing an arrested prisoner.

Note, however, Pen. Code § 4011.10, prohibiting law enforcement from releasing a jail inmate for the purpose of allowing the inmate to seek medical care at a hospital, and then immediately re-arresting the same individual upon discharge from the hospital, unless the hospital determines this action would enable it to bill and collect from a third-party payment source.

Pen. Code § 849(c): Detention Only: Any record of arrest of a person released pursuant to P.C. § 849(b)(1) or (3) shall include a record of release, and shall thereafter be deemed a detention only.

Undocumented Aliens*:

Gov't. Code §§ 7283, 7283.1, & 7283.2*: The "Transparent Review of Unjust Transfers and Holds" (TRUTH) Act:

The so-called "TRUTH Act" limits Immigration & Customs Enforcement (ICE) access to criminals in jail by imposing specific duties on local law enforcement, including requiring that local law enforcement provide a written consent form to an inmate before an ICE interview that explains the purpose of the interview, that it is voluntary, that the interview may be declined, and that the inmate can choose to be interviewed with an attorney present.

Also, a local law enforcement agency that receives an ICE hold, ICE notification, or ICE transfer request, must provide a copy of it to the inmate and to tell the inmate whether the local law enforcement agency intends to comply with the request.

If a local law enforcement agency is to provide ICE with a release date for an inmate, the agency must also provide notice of the release date to the inmate in writing and to the inmate's attorney.

All records relating to ICE access provided by a local law enforcement agency, including all communication with ICE, are public records for purposes of the California Public Records Act (Gov't. Code §§ 6250–6276.48), "including the exemptions provided by that act," and including the number of inmates to whom the agency provided ICE access, the date ICE access was provided, and whether ICE access was provided through a hold, transfer, or notification request.

Beginning January 1, 2018, the local governing body of a local law enforcement agency that provides ICE access to at least one individual in the previous year is to hold a community forum in order to provide information to the public about ICE's access to inmates and to receive and consider public comment.

Gov't. Code § 7283.2 provides: "Nothing in this chapter shall be construed to provide, expand, or ratify the legal authority of any state or local law enforcement agency to detain an individual based upon an ICE hold request."

Civil Code § 1670.9: Detentions of Noncitizens for Purposes of Civil Immigration Custody:

Any city, county, city and county, or local law enforcement agency that, as of January 1, 2018, does not yet have an existing contract with the federal government or any federal agency or a private corporation, to house or detain "noncitizens" for the purposes of civil immigration custody, shall not hereafter enter into any such contract. Nor shall such a contract, if already existing, be renewed or expanded.

Nor shall any such entity approve or sign a deed, instrument, or other document conveying land, or issuing permits to build or reuse existing buildings by any private corporation, contractor, or vender, for the purpose of housing or detaining such noncitizens for purposes of civil immigration proceeding unless public hearings, as described in the section, are first held.

Gov't. Code § 7282.5: Limitations On Law Enforcement's Cooperation with Immigration Authorities:

Law enforcement's cooperation with federal immigration authorities is limited to that which is permitted by the "California Values Act" (i.e., Gov't. Code §§ 7284-7284.12; see below). Such cooperation that is prohibited by Gov't. Code § 7284.6(a)(1)(C) (providing information regarding a non-citizen's release date or responding to requests for notification by providing release dates not available to the public) and Gov't. Code § 7284.6(a)(4) (transferring a non-citizen to immigration authorities without judicial warrant or judicial probable cause determination) is permitted with respect to the crimes listed in Gov't. Code § 7282.5.

See Gov't. Code § 7282.5(a) & (b), below.

In no case shall cooperation with immigration authorities occur for individuals arrested, detained, or convicted of misdemeanors that were felonies (or felony-wobblers) prior to the passage of Proposition 47 (the "Safe Neighborhood and Schools Act of 2014")

See also Gov't. Code § 7282 (Amended) for definitions of "hold request," "notification request," and "transfer request," replacing "immigration hold," making reference to Gov't. Code § 7283, noting that these "requests" include requests made by U.S. Immigrations and Customs Enforcement (ICE), U.S. Customs, and Border Protection, or by any other immigration authorities.

Gov't. Code §§ 7284-7284.12: The "California Values Act:"

Gov't. Code § 7284: Title of Chapter:

This chapter (i.e., Title 1, Division 7, Chapter 17.25) shall be known, and may be cited, as the California Values Act.

Note: Also, as a part of SB 54, known as the "Sanctuary State" bill.

Gov't. Code § 7284.2: Legislative Findings and Declarations:

The Legislature finds and declares the following:

(a) Immigrants are valuable and essential members of the California community. Almost one in three Californians is foreign born and one in two children in California has at least one immigrant parent.

(b) A relationship of trust between California's immigrant community and state and local agencies is central to the public safety of the people of California.

(c) This trust is threatened when state and local agencies are entangled with federal immigration enforcement, with the result that immigrant community members fear approaching police when they are victims of, and witnesses to, crimes, seeking basic health services, or attending school, to the detriment of public safety and the well-being of all Californians.

(d) Entangling state and local agencies with federal immigration enforcement programs diverts already limited resources and blurs the lines of accountability between local, state, and federal governments.

(e) State and local participation in federal immigration enforcement programs also raises constitutional concerns, including the prospect that California residents could be detained in violation of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, targeted on the basis of race or ethnicity in violation of the Equal Protection Clause, or denied access to education based on immigration status. See Sanchez Ochoa v. Campbell, et al. (E.D. Wash. 2017) 2017 WL 3476777; Trujillo Santoya v. United States, et al. (W.D. Tex. 2017) 2017 WL 2896021; Moreno v. Napolitano (N.D. Ill. 2016) 213 F. Supp. 3rd 999; Morales v. Chadbourne (1st Cir. 2015) 793 F.3rd 208; Miranda-Olivares v. Clackamas County (D. Or. 2014) 2014 WL 1414305; Galarza v. Szalczyk (3rd Cir. 2014) 745 F.3rd 634.

(f) This chapter seeks to ensure effective policing, to protect the safety, well-being, and constitutional rights of the people of California, and to direct the state's limited resources to matters of greatest concern to state and local governments.

(g) It is the intent of the Legislature that this chapter shall not be construed as providing, expanding, or ratifying any legal authority for any state or local law enforcement agency to participate in immigration enforcement.

Gov't. Code § 7284.4: Definitions: For purposes of this chapter, the following terms have the following meanings:

Sec. 1101), or is identified by the United States Department of Homeland Security's Immigration and Customs Enforcement as the subject of an outstanding federal felony arrest warrant.

(6) In no case shall cooperation occur pursuant to this section for individuals arrested, detained, or convicted of misdemeanors that were previously felonies, or were previously crimes punishable as either misdemeanors or felonies, prior to passage of the Safe Neighborhoods and Schools Act of 2014 as it amended the Penal Code.

(b) In cases in which the individual is arrested and taken before a magistrate on a charge involving a serious or violent felony, as identified in subdivision (c) of Section 1192.7 or subdivision (c) of Section 667.5 of the Penal Code, respectively, or a felony that is punishable by imprisonment in state prison, and the magistrate makes a finding of probable cause as to that charge pursuant to Section 872 of the Penal Code, a law enforcement official shall additionally have discretion to cooperate with immigration officials pursuant to subparagraph (C) of paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of Section 7284.6.

Gov't. Code § 7284.6: Prohibited Activities; Exceptions; Annual Report; Information Exchange; Jurisdiction:

(a) California law enforcement agencies shall not:

(1) Use agency or department moneys or personnel to investigate, interrogate, detain, detect, or arrest persons for immigration enforcement purposes, including any of the following:

(A) Inquiring into an individual's immigration status.

(B) Detaining an individual on the basis of a hold request.

(C) Providing information regarding a person's release date or responding to requests for notification by providing release dates or other information unless that information is available to the public, or is in response to a notification request from immigration authorities in accordance with Gov't. Code § 7282.5. Responses are never required, but are permitted under this subdivision, provided that they do not violate any local law or policy.

(D) Providing personal information, as defined in Civ. Code § 1798.3, about an individual, including, but not limited to, the individual's home address or work address unless that information is available to the public.

(E) Making or intentionally participating in arrests based on civil immigration warrants.

(F) Assisting immigration authorities in the activities described in 8 U.S.C. § 1357(a)(3).

(G) Performing the functions of an immigration officer, whether pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1357(g) or any other law, regulation, or policy, whether formal or informal.

(2) Place peace officers under the supervision of federal agencies or employ peace officers deputized as special federal officers or special federal deputies for purposes of immigration enforcement. All peace officers remain subject to California law governing conduct of peace officers and the policies of the employing agency.

(3) Use immigration authorities as interpreters for law enforcement matters relating to individuals in agency or department custody.

(4) Transfer an individual to immigration authorities unless authorized by a judicial warrant or judicial probable cause determination, or in accordance with Gov't. Code § 7282.5.

(5) Provide office space exclusively dedicated for immigration authorities for use within a city or county law enforcement facility.

(6) Contract with the federal government for use of California law enforcement agency facilities to house individuals as federal detainees, except pursuant to Gov't. Code §§ 7310 et seq. (Chapter 17.8).

(b) Notwithstanding the limitations in subdivision (a), this section does not prevent any California law enforcement agency from doing any of the following that does not violate any policy of the law enforcement agency or any local law or policy of the jurisdiction in which the agency is operating:

(1) Investigating, enforcing, or detaining upon reasonable suspicion of, or arresting for a violation of, 8 U.S.C. § 1326(a) that may be subject to the enhancement specified in 8 U.S.C. § 1326(b)(2) and that is detected during an unrelated law enforcement activity. Transfers to immigration authorities are permitted under this subsection only in accordance with subdivision (a)(4).

(2) Responding to a request from immigration authorities for information about a specific person's criminal history, including previous criminal arrests, convictions, or similar criminal history information accessed through the California Law Enforcement Telecommunications System (CLETS), where otherwise permitted by state law.

(3) Conducting enforcement or investigative duties associated with a joint law enforcement task force, including the sharing of confidential information with other law enforcement agencies for purposes of task force investigations, so long as the following conditions are met:

(A) The primary purpose of the joint law enforcement task force is not immigration enforcement, as defined in Gov't. Code § 7284.4(f).

(B) The enforcement or investigative duties are primarily related to a violation of state or federal law unrelated to immigration enforcement.

(C) Participation in the task force by a California law enforcement agency does not violate any local law or policy to which it is otherwise subject.

(4) Making inquiries into information necessary to certify an individual who has been identified as a potential crime or trafficking victim for a T or U Visa pursuant to 8 U.S.C. §§ 1101(a)(15)(T) or 1101(a)(15)(U) or to comply with 18 U.S.C. § 922(d)(5).

(5) Giving immigration authorities access to interview an individual in agency or department custody. All interview access shall comply with requirements of the TRUTH Act (Gov't. Code §§ 7283 et seq. (Chapter 17.2).

(c)

(1) If a California law enforcement agency chooses to participate in a joint law enforcement task force, for which a California law enforcement agency has agreed to dedicate personnel or resources on an ongoing basis, it shall submit a report annually to the Department of Justice, as specified by the Attorney General. The law enforcement agency shall report the following information, if known, for each task force of which it is a member:

(A) The purpose of the task force.

(B) The federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies involved.

(C) The total number of arrests made during the reporting period.

(D) The number of people arrested for immigration enforcement purposes.

(2) All law enforcement agencies shall report annually to the Department of Justice, in a manner specified by the Attorney General, the number of transfers pursuant to subdivision (a)(4), and the offense that allowed for the transfer, pursuant to subdivision (a)(4).

(3) All records described in this subdivision shall be public records for purposes of the California Public Records Act (Gov't. Code §§ et seq. 6250; Chapter 3.5), including the exemptions provided by that act and, as permitted under that act, personal identifying information may be redacted prior to public disclosure. To the extent that disclosure of a particular item of information would endanger the safety of a person involved in an investigation, or would endanger the successful completion of the investigation or a related investigation, that information shall not be disclosed.

(4) If more than one California law enforcement agency is participating in a joint task force that meets the reporting requirement pursuant to this section, the joint task force shall designate a local or state agency responsible for completing the reporting requirement.

(d) The Attorney General, by March 1, 2019, and annually thereafter, shall report on the total number of arrests made by joint law enforcement task forces, and the total number of arrests made for the purpose of immigration enforcement by all task force participants, including federal law enforcement agencies. To the extent that disclosure of a particular item of information would endanger the safety of a person involved in an investigation, or would endanger the successful completion of the investigation or a related investigation, that information shall not be included in the Attorney General's report. The Attorney General shall post the reports required by this subdivision on the Attorney General's Internet Web site.

(e) This section does not prohibit or restrict any government entity or official from sending to, or receiving from, federal immigration authorities, information regarding the citizenship or immigration status, lawful or unlawful, of an individual, or from requesting from federal immigration authorities immigration status information, lawful or unlawful, of any individual, or maintaining or exchanging that information with any other federal, state, or local government entity, pursuant to 8 U.S.C. §§1373 and 1644.

(f) Nothing in this section shall prohibit a California law enforcement agency from asserting its own jurisdiction over criminal law enforcement matters.

Case Law:

This statute, also known as California's "Sanctuary State Law," was held to constitutionally apply to so-called "Charter Cities" in City of Huntington Beach v. Becerra (2020) 44 Cal.App.5th 243.)

Gov't. Code § 7284.6, which prohibits state and local law enforcement from engaging in certain specifically identified acts related to immigration enforcement, is constitutional as applied to charter cities because it addresses matters of statewide concern (including public safety and health, effective policing, and protection of constitutional rights), is reasonably related to resolution of those statewide concerns, and is narrowly tailored to avoid unnecessary interference in local government. (Ibid.)

Gov't. Code § 7284.8: Model Policies for Other Governmental Entities; Database Use Guidance:

> (a) The Attorney General, by October 1, 2018, in consultation with the appropriate stakeholders, shall publish model policies limiting assistance with immigration enforcement to the fullest extent possible consistent with federal and state law at public schools, public libraries, health facilities operated by the state or a political subdivision of the state, courthouses, Division of Labor Standards Enforcement facilities, the Agricultural Labor Relations Board, the Division of Workers Compensation, and shelters, and ensuring that they remain safe and accessible to all California residents, regardless of immigration status. All public schools, health facilities operated by the state or a political subdivision of the state, and courthouses shall implement the model policy, or an equivalent policy. The Agricultural Labor Relations Board, the Division of Workers' Compensation, the Division of Labor Standards Enforcement, shelters, libraries, and all other organizations and entities that provide services related to physical or mental health and wellness, education, or access to justice, including the University of California, are encouraged to adopt the model policy.
>
> (b) For any databases operated by state and local law enforcement agencies, including databases maintained for the agency by private vendors, the Attorney General shall, by October 1, 2018, in consultation with appropriate stakeholders, publish guidance, audit criteria, and training recommendations aimed at ensuring that those databases are governed in a manner that limits the availability of information therein to the fullest extent practicable and consistent with federal and state law, to anyone or any entity for the purpose of immigration enforcement. All state and local law enforcement agencies are encouraged to adopt necessary changes to database governance policies consistent with that guidance.
>
> (c) Notwithstanding the rulemaking provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act (Gov't. Code §§ 11340 et seq.; Title 2, Division 3, Part 1, Chapter 3.4), the Department of Justice may implement, interpret, or make specific this chapter without taking any regulatory action.

Gov't. Code § 7284.10: Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation Duties and Responsibilities:

(a) The Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation shall:

(1) In advance of any interview between the United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and an individual in department custody regarding civil immigration violations, provide the individual with a written consent form that explains the purpose of the interview, that the interview is voluntary, and that he or she may decline to be interviewed or may choose to be interviewed only with his or her attorney present. The written consent form shall be available in English, Spanish, Chinese, Tagalog, Vietnamese, and Korean.

(2) Upon receiving any ICE hold, notification, or transfer request, provide a copy of the request to the individual and inform him or her whether the department intends to comply with the request.

(b) The Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation shall not:

(1) Restrict access to any in-prison educational or rehabilitative programming, or credit-earning opportunity on the sole basis of citizenship or immigration status, including, but not limited to, whether the person is in removal proceedings, or immigration authorities have issued a hold request, transfer request, notification request, or civil immigration warrant against the individual.

(2) Consider citizenship and immigration status as a factor in determining a person's custodial classification level, including, but not limited to, whether the person is in removal proceedings, or whether immigration authorities have issued a hold request, transfer request, notification request, or civil immigration warrant against the individual.

Gov't. Code § 7284.12: Severability:

The provisions of this act are severable. If any provision of this act or its application is held invalid, that invalidity shall not affect other provisions or applications that can be given effect without the invalid provision or application.

Gov't. Code § 7310: Contracts with Federal Government to Detain Non-Citizens:

> (a) A city, county, city and county, or local law enforcement agency that does not, as of June 15, 2017, have a contract with the federal government or any federal agency to detain adult noncitizens for purposes of civil immigration custody, is prohibited from entering into a contract with the federal government or any federal agency, to house or detain in a locked detention facility owned and operated by a local entity, noncitizens for purposes of civil immigration custody.
>
> (b) A city, county, city and county, or local law enforcement agency that, as of June 15, 2017, has an existing contract with the federal government or any federal agency to detain adult noncitizens for purposes of civil immigration custody, shall not renew or modify that contract in such a way as to expand the maximum number of contract beds that may be utilized to house or detain in a locked detention facility noncitizens for purposes of civil immigration custody.

Gov't. Code § 7311: Contracts with Federal Government to House or Detain Non-Citizen Minors:

> (a) A city, county, city and county, or local law enforcement agency that does not, as of June 15, 2017, have a contract with the federal government or any federal agency to house or detain any accompanied or unaccompanied minor in the custody of or detained by the federal Office of Refugee Resettlement or the United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement is prohibited from entering into a contract with the federal government or any federal agency to house minors in a locked detention facility.
>
> (b) A city, county, city and county, or local law enforcement agency that, as of June 15, 2017, has an existing contract with the federal government or any federal agency to house or detain any accompanied or unaccompanied minor in the custody of or detained by the federal Office of Refugee Resettlement or the United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement shall not renew or modify that contract in such a way as to expand the maximum number of contract beds that may be utilized to house minors in a locked detention facility.
> (c) This section does not apply to temporary housing of any accompanied or unaccompanied minor in less restrictive settings when the State Department of Social Services certifies a necessity for a contract based on changing conditions of the population in need and if the housing contract meets the following requirements:

(1) It is temporary in nature and nonrenewable on a long-term or permanent basis.

(2) It meets all applicable federal and state standards for that housing.

Gov't. Code § 12532: Review of Detention Facilities:

Subd. (a) & (b)(2): The California Attorney General is required to "engage in reviews" of county, local, and private detention facilities in which "non-citizens," (including minors) are housed or detained for purposes of immigration proceedings, and report its findings to the Legislature and the Governor by March 1, 2019.

Sub. (b)(1): This review shall include, but not be limited to, the following:

(A) A review of the conditions of confinement.

(B) A review of the standard of care and due process provided to the individuals described in subdivision (a).

(C) A review of the circumstances around their apprehension and transfer to the facility.

Subd. (c): The Attorney General, or his or her designee, shall be provided all necessary access for the observations necessary to effectuate reviews required pursuant to this section, including, but not limited to, access to detainees, officials, personnel, and records.

Pen. Code § 679.015: Victim and Witnesses' Protection from being Turned over to Immigration Authorities:

(a) It is the public policy of this state to protect the public from crime and violence by encouraging all persons who are victims of or witnesses to crimes, or who otherwise can give evidence in a criminal investigation, to cooperate with the criminal justice system and not to penalize these persons for being victims or for cooperating with the criminal justice system.

(b) Whenever an individual who is a victim of or witness to a crime, or who otherwise can give evidence in a criminal investigation, is not charged with or convicted of committing any crime under state law, a peace officer may not detain the individual exclusively for any actual or suspected immigration violation or turn the individual over to federal immigration authorities absent a judicial warrant.

Use of Force in Making an Arrest*: "Use of Force" (Chapter 6), below.

Failure to Collect and/or Preserve Evidence*:

The Rule of Trombetta:

> Drivers, who had been stopped on suspicion of drunk driving on California highways, had submitted to a breath-analysis test, had registered blood-alcohol concentrations substantially higher than the concentration which gives rise to a presumption of intoxication under California law, and had been charged with driving while intoxicated under California law, filed motions to suppress the breath-analysis test results on the ground that the arresting officers had failed to preserve samples of the drivers' breath. All of the motions to suppress were denied by the trial court. Two of the drivers were subsequently convicted, and petitioned the California Court of Appeal for writs of habeas corpus, while two other drivers did not submit to trial but sought direct appeal from the trial court orders, and their appeals were eventually transferred to the Court of Appeal to be consolidated with the other drivers' habeas corpus petitions. The California Court of Appeal ruled in favor of the drivers. After implicitly accepting that breath samples would be useful to the drivers' defenses, and determining that the arresting officers had the capacity to preserve breath samples for the drivers, the California Court of Appeal concluded that due process demands simply that where evidence is collected by the state, as it is with the breath-analyzer, law enforcement agencies must establish and follow rigorous and systematic procedures to preserve the captured evidence or its equivalent for the use of the defendant (People v. Trombetta (1983) 142 Cal App 3rd 138; Certiorari granted).
>
> On certiorari, the United States Supreme Court reversed and remanded. In an opinion by Marshall, J., expressing the unanimous view of the court, it was held that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not require law enforcement agencies to preserve breath samples of suspected drunk drivers in order for the results of breath-analysis tests to be admissible in criminal prosecutions. O'Connor, J., concurred, stating that the failure to preserve breath samples does not render a prosecution fundamentally unfair, and thus cannot render breath-analysis tests inadmissible as evidence against the accused, and that the failure to employ alternative methods of testing blood-alcohol concentrations is of no due process concern, both because persons are presumed to know their rights under the law and because the existence of tests not used in no way affects the fundamental fairness of the convictions actually obtained. (California v. Trombetta (1984) 467 U.S. 479 [81 L.Ed.2nd 413; 104 S.Ct. 2528].)

Case Law:

> In People v. Fultz (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 395, two co-defendants accepted plea agreements on the condition that they testify against the sole remaining defendant (i.e., Fultz), and that they do so truthfully. Unfortunately, the pre-trial interview of these two co-defendants, although recorded, was muted. Law enforcement argued that the muting was accidental. The trial court disbelieved them, finding the muting to have occurred in bad faith. The Appellate Court upheld the trial court's determination that this constituted a failure to preserve relevant evidence in violation of California v. Trombetta (1984) 467 U.S. 479 [81 L.Ed.2nd 413; 104 S Ct. 2528], and a "due process" violation. (Id., at pp. 426-429.)
>
> > In Fultz, supra, at p. 425; the Court noted that "there may be an appropriate case where the failure to collect evidence might warrant due process considerations," citing People v. Montes (2014) 58 Cal.4th 809, at p. 838; and Miller v. Vasquez (9th Cir. 1989) 868 F.2nd 1116, 1119.)
> >
> > The Fultz Court made similar findings as to law enforcement's loss of a photograph of a co-conspirator's (who testified with immunity) shoe and her taped interview. (Id., at p. 430.)

See "Duty to Preserve Evidence," under "Procedural Rules" (Chapter 2), above.

Post-Arrest Procedural Due Process*:

> Plaintiff was arrested on suspicion of a DUI and his driver's license was suspended due to his refusal to consent to a blood test. After an administrative hearing before an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ), where the arresting officer testified that plaintiff did not recant his refusal to submit to a blood test, the license suspension was initially upheld. However, at a second hearing, an ALJ found that the arrestee had recanted his refusal to consent to the test when a video of his doing so was discovered, and voided the license suspension. The plaintiff later sued. The Ninth Circuit upheld the civil trial court's granting of summary judgment for the arresting officer, noting that the plaintiff's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment due process suit failed because there was no "procedural due process" violation in that the plaintiff received all of the process he was due as he challenged the license suspension before an ALJ on two occasions. Regardless of whether the arresting officer testified falsely at the first hearing in his claim that the plaintiff did not recant his blood test refusal, the state's post-deprivation procedures were meaningful and sufficient as the plaintiff was allowed to present new evidence and arguments at a second hearing. (Miranda v. City of Casa Grande (9th Cir. 2021) 15 F.4th 1219.)

See "Kneeling on a Suspect's Back or Neck," below.

An officer violates the Fourth Amendment when he uses "gratuitous force" against an arrestee who is fully secured, not resisting arrest, and not posing a safety threat to the officer. Despite the plaintiff's repeated verbal threats not to comply with the arresting officers' commands, plaintiff repeatedly did comply. Hitting the plaintiff in the face after plaintiff was secured inside his cell, as he was commanded, and despite his verbal refusals, was excessive, subjecting the offending officer to potential civil liability. (Johnson v. City of Miami Beach (11th Cir. FL 2021) 18 F.4th 1267.)

See Baude v. Leyshock (8th Cir. 2022) 23 F.4th 1065, where the Court held that the plaintiff, who alleged that he was unlawfully caught up in a crowd of rioters who, earlier, had been ordered to disburse but who now were being denied the right to leave the area, were being forced into a group and pepper sprayed, handcuffed through the use of zip ties, and arrested, had been "seized" for Fourth Amendment purposes. The issue to be decided by a jury was whether plaintiff's seizure was lawful, and whether the force used was excessive.

Applying the Graham v. Connor factors (see below), the Tenth Circuit held that the officers, in a civil use-of-force case, were not entitled to dismissal of the lawsuit filed against them when the evidence, as alleged by the plaintiff, showed that the officers had no more than a reasonable suspicion to believe that the plaintiff, at the worst, committed only a misdemeanor offense (having physical control of a vehicle while intoxicated), that plaintiff did not constitute an immediate threat after he was taken to the ground and held there by three officers, and plaintiff did not resist nor attempt to flee. Nor were the officers entitled to qualified immunity in that the law was well-settled at the time that the force they were alleged by plaintiff to have used was excessive. (Wilkins v. City of Tulsa (10th Cir. 2022) 33 F.4th 1265.)

The Fourth Amendment claim of excessive force in effectuating the arrest failed when there was no evidence that the officer should have been aware of plaintiff's existing back injury. (Demarest v. City of Vallejo (9th Cir. 2022) 44 F.4th 1209, 1226; also noting that there was no evidence to the effect that the use of handcuffs constituted excessive force.

The reasonableness of the force used by a police officer must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene. Also, the court must allow for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving. The ultimate question is whether an officer's actions are objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting him, the force allowed under the circumstances encompassing a range of conduct. The availability of a less intrusive alternative will not, by itself, render an officer's conduct as unreasonable. (Wilkinson v. Torres (9th Cir. 2010) 610 F.3rd 546, 550-554.)

"O)fficers must act 'without the benefit of 20/20 hindsight,' and must often make "split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.'" (Nehad v. Browder (9th Cir. 2019) 929 F.3rd 1125, 1135, quoting Gonzalez v. City of Anaheim (9th Cir. 2014) 747 F.3rd 789, 794; see also Seidner v. De Vries (9th Cir. 2022) 39 F.4th 591, 596; and Estate of Strickland v. Nevada County (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 614, 619.)

An officer's pre-shooting conduct is properly included in the totality of the circumstances surrounding his use of deadly force. The officer's duty to act reasonably when using deadly force extends to pre-shooting conduct. (Hayes v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 1223, 1231, 1235-1236 (a negligence civil action); officers shot a suicidal person who approached them with a knife in hand.)

> In 2011, the Ninth Circuit, in Hayes v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2011) 638 F.3rd 688, remanded the case back to the California Supreme Court on the issue of the relevance of the reasonableness of the eventual use of force, of an officer's pre-use-of-force "tactical conduct," under California negligence law. Upon this invitation, the California Supreme Court decided that "tactical conduct and decisions preceding the use of deadly force are relevant considerations under California law in determining whether the use of deadly force gives rise to negligence liability." (Hayes v. County of San Diego (2013) 57 Cal.4th 622, 639.) The case then went back to the Ninth Circuit for it's December, 2013, decision on the issue, per the above cited decision.

The use of deadly force is lawful whenever an officer has a "reasonable belief" that defendant poses a threat of death or serious harm. However, this language does not negate the need for "probable cause" in that the later refers to the quantity of evidence required for such a reasonable belief. (Price v. Sery (9th Cir. 2008) 513 F.3rd 962.)

The potential civil liability of an officer who shot a handcuffed prisoner, seated in the backseat of a patrol car with a semiautomatic pistol, killing him, under the mistaken belief that she was using her stun gun, is an issue for a civil jury to decide. The question was whether her conduct in mistakenly applying deadly force was objectively unreasonable under the totality of the circumstances. Instead of finding that the circumstances forced her to make a split-second judgment about firing a weapon, a reasonable jury could conclude that her own poor judgment and lack of preparedness caused her to act with undue haste. (Torres v. City of Madera (9th Cir. 2011) 648 F.3rd 1119.)

"To determine whether an officer used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment, we balance 'the nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against the countervailing governmental interests at stake.' Felarca v. Birgeneau, 891 F.3d 809, 816 (9th Cir. 2018) (quoting Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 396, 109 S. Ct. 1865, 104 L. Ed. 2d 443 (1989)). This requires us to take into account the totality of the circumstances, including the 'type and amount of force inflicted,' 'the severity of injuries,' 'the severity of the crime at issue,' 'whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others,' and 'whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.' Id. at 817 (quotations omitted). We may also consider 'the availability of less intrusive alternatives to the force employed and whether warnings were given." Id. Whether the suspect poses a threat is 'the most important single element.' Smith v. City of Hemet, 394 F.3d 689, 702 (9th Cir. 2005) (en banc) (quotation omitted). We do not, however, consider these factors with clinical detachment. We must evaluate them appreciating that 'police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.' Graham, 490 U.S. at 396-97." (Hopson v. Alexander (9th Cir. 2023) 71 F.4th 692, 698.)

> "The most important factor is whether the suspect posed an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others." (Thomas v. Dillard (9th Cir. 2016) 818 F.3rd 864, 889.)
>
> In Hopson, an experienced detective observed an individual in a gas station/convenience store parking lot, nervously move his vehicle several times and look around furtively as it to see if he might be observed by surveillance cameras, and eventually parking it in reverse, all as if he might want to make a quick exit and without any indication that he intended to buy anything from the store. From this the detective concluded that that subject was "casing" the gas station and that "an armed robbery was about to occur." After the eventual plaintiff drove into the lot and parked next to the first individual, that first individual got out of his car and sat in the passenger seat of the plaintiff's car. After the two conversed for a while, and upon seeing them exchange unknown items, the detective (later defendant in the resulting civil suit) and other covering officers approached the plaintiff—with guns drawn—and his co-suspect and physically arrested both without ever having identified themselves as police officers. Plaintiff alleged in a subsequent civil suit that the detention/arrest was illegal and that excessive force was used. The Ninth Circuit determined (in a split, 2-to-1 decision) that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity, holding that "it was not clearly established that the officers lacked an objectively reasonable belief that criminal activity was about to occur." (Italics added; at p. 698.)

Defendant police officers not entitled to qualified immunity on the issue of whether they used unreasonable force by ordering an 83-year-old, 5'2", 117-pound, unarmed, completely compliant woman, to get on her knees and handcuffing her when it was suspected that she might be driving a stolen car. (Brown v. County of San Bernardino (9th Cir. 2023) 2023 U.S.App. LEXIS 2941; Unpublished; Petition denied by U.S. Supreme Court, Dec. 11, 2023, 2023 U.S. LEXIS 4763.)

But see the dissenting opinion, where it was argued that the constitutionality of doing so was not "'beyond debate' by existing precedent," and that therefore, the officers were entitled to qualified immunity on the issue of whether the force used was unreasonable.

Note also, however, that the panel was unanimous on the issue of whether the officers were entitled to qualified immunity on the lawfulness of detaining (or arresting) the woman for auto theft, until it could be determined whether she was lawfully driving the car in question.

Where the plaintiff experienced only an inadvertent cut on his head from a take-down on the grassy lawn, under circumstances where the officers reasonably believed that they were dealing with a possible kidnapping, the Court concluded that the injuries were minimal and that the force used under the circumstances were reasonable. (Hill v. City of Fountain Valley (9th Cir. 2023) 70 F.4th 507, 517-518.)

Note: The use of excessive force under the Fourth (seizure), Fifth and Fourteenth (due process violations) and Eighth (cruel and unusual punishment) Amendments all involve the possibility of the suppression of any resulting evidence in a criminal case, as well as the spectre of civil liability in a civil suit. The issue of excessive force is, for the most part, the same in both criminal and civil cases. The cases below, therefore, and considered interchangeable.

Additional Note: The Ninth Circuit in Hopson v. Alexander, supra, at p. 709, offers some sage advice:

"The parties' competing perspectives underscore the competing considerations at stake when law enforcement officers approach a suspect. Police must be cautious not to point guns at people in haste when the circumstances do not warrant it. Such conduct can lead to accidents or violent escalations that might not otherwise have occurred. It can also under our precedents produce harm of a constitutional magnitude, even > when no physical injury results. At the same time, police officers must have some latitude in relying on their judgment and experience to anticipate criminal conduct that may be about to occur. Officers are allowed and expected to be proactive. And when they have a basis for intervening, they are not inevitably required to use only the most minimal force and hope for the best."

Use of 42 U.S.C. § 1983*:

> 42 U.S.C. § 1983 is the federal statute by which a party, alleging that his constitutional rights were violated by a state actor under color of law, brings a civil suit asking for a redress of his or her grievances. Factors to consider in determining the amount of force that may be used include:

- The severity of the crime at issue;

- Whether the suspect posed an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others;

> "Of all the use-of-force factors, the 'most important' is whether the suspect posed an 'immediate threat.'" (Estate of Strickland v. Nevada County (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 614, 620, quoting Bryan v. MacPherson (9th Cir. 2010) 630 F.3rd 805, 826, and holding that "the objective facts must indicate that the suspect pose[d] an immediate threat to the officer or a member of the public."

> >
> > "At the other end of the spectrum, the Constitution does not tolerate the use of lethal force to "seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead" in the absence of probable cause of a threat of serious physical harm." (Id., at p. 621; citing Torres v.

Officers, under such circumstances, are entitled to reasonable mistakes. (Ibid., quoting Saucier v. Katz (2001) 533 U.S. 194, 206 [121 S.Ct. 2151; 150 L.Ed.2nd 272].)

In Estate of Strickland v. Nevada County, the Court held that the decedent's act of pointing what turned out to be a plastic, airsoft replica gun, complete with the tip of the barrel being painted orange, and despite the decedent's verbal claims to the officers that it was nothing but a BB gun, was sufficient to create a reasonable conclusion on the officers' part that defendant was in fact armed with a real firearm, justifying their act of shooting and killing him. - Warning before force is used.

The Ninth Circuit has also found that whether or not officers provided a warning prior to the use of force is a factor to consider when determining the reasonableness of the force used. (Nelson v. City of Davis (9th Cir. 2012) 685 F.3rd 867, 882; citing Deorle v. Rutherford (9th Cir. 2001) 272 F.3rd 1272, 1283-1284; and Forrester v. > The Court in Nehad further noted that whether or not the officer ordered the deceased to halt (Id, at p. 1137.) as he was slowly approaching the officer, as well as the officer's failure to identify himself (Id, at p. 1138.), were factors for a jury to consider in determining the reasonableness of the eventual use of lethal force.

See also Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1, 11-12 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1]; "(I)f the suspect threatens the officer with a weapon or there is probable cause to believe that he has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm, deadly force may be used if necessary to prevent escape, and if, where feasible, some warning has been given." (Italics added)

However, where an officer arrives late at an ongoing police action and witnesses shots being fired by one of several individuals in a house surrounded by other officers, and that officer then shoots and kills an armed occupant of the house without first giving a warning, the officer did not violate clearly established law based on his failure to provide a verbal warning before utilizing deadly force: "No settled Fourth Amendment principle requires that officer to second-guess the earlier steps already taken by his or her fellow officers in instances like the one [the officer] confronted here." (White v. Pauly (2017) 580 U.S. 73 [137 S.Ct. 548; 196 L.Ed.2nd 463].)

In Betts v. Brennan (5th Cir. 2022) 22 F.4th 577, the Fifth Circuit found the officer's repeated warnings that defendant would be tased if he did not comply with the officer's commands during what should have been a simple traffic stop except for the defendant's refusal to cooperate and comply with the officer's commands, was a factor to consider in determining that the officer's eventual use of his Taser was reasonable.

"We have also repeatedly stated that an officer must give warning before using deadly force "whenever practicable*."* (Smith v Agdeppa (9th Cir. 2023) 56 F.4th 1193, 1201; officer held not to be entitled to qualified immunity when he shot an unarmed (naked) resisting suspect who refused to submit to being handcuffed, and who was pummeling his partner at the time. The only warning given (which was also contested) was to "stop.")

However, see dissenting opinion at pgs. 1205 to 1220, as described at "Duty to Warn," below.

See "Duty to Warn," below.

- The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals adds, in addition to the giving of a warning, yet two more factors to consider; "'the availability of less intrusive alternatives to the force employed, . . . and whether it should have been apparent to officers that the person they used force against was emotionally disturbed." (Estate of Strickland v. Nevada County (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 614, 618; quoting S.B. v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2017) 864 F.3rd 1010, 1013.)

  The factors considered under Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1, 9-12 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1] are:

  - The immediacy of the threat;
  - Whether force was necessary to safeguard officers or the public; and
  - Whether officers administered a warning, assuming it was practicable.

    (See also George v. Morris (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 829, 837.)

  Three-Step Evaluation of an Excessive Force Claim, by "Stages:"

  - The severity of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment rights is assessed by evaluating the type and amount of force inflicted.

  - The government's interests are evaluated by assessing (1) the severity of the crime; (2) whether the suspect posed an immediate threat to the officers' or public's safety; and (3) whether the suspect was resisting arrest or attempting to escape.

  - The gravity of the intrusion on the individual is balanced against the government's need for that intrusion.

De Vries (9th Cir. 2022) 39 F.4th 591, 596, 599.)

Upon Making an Arrest, the factors to consider in determining the reasonableness in using force are as follows:

- The severity of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment rights by evaluating the type and amount of force inflicted;

- The government's interest in the use of force; and

- The balance between the gravity of the intrusion on the individual and the government's need for that intrusion.

General Principles*; Fourth Amendment Use of Force Issues:

General Case law:

See Tatum v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2006) 441 F.3rd 1090, where the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal meticulously discussed the issue of law enforcement's use of force:

> When a court analyzes excessive force claims, the initial inquiry is whether the police officer's actions were objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting him. A police officer had probable cause to arrest a suspect for being under the influence of a controlled substance or for disorderly conduct where the officer observed the suspect kicking the door to a police station for no apparent reason, the suspect disobeyed commands to stop, and when he was verbally unresponsive, perspiring heavily, and had bloodshot eyes. Whether a particular use of force was objectively reasonable depends on several factors including the severity of the crime that prompted the use of force, the threat posed by a suspect to the police or to others, and whether the suspect was resisting arrest. An arresting officer's use of a control hold on an arrestee in order to place him in handcuffs was held to be objectively reasonable in this case and thus did not support an > excessive force claim; the officer had probable cause to arrest, the arrestee was behaving erratically, and the arrestee spun away from the officer and continued to struggle after officer told him to calm down. Detention of the arrestee after the arrest did not rise to the level of excessive force even though the officers positioned the arrestee on his stomach for approximately 90 seconds, then positioned him on his side, and failed to perform emergency resuscitation on the arrestee after the arrestee kicked and struggled so that the brief restraint on his stomach was necessary to protect the officers and the arrestee himself, the officers monitored the arrestee, and they called for an ambulance as soon as they noticed that arrestee was breathing heavily. Just as the Fourth Amendment does not require a police officer to use the least intrusive method of arrest, neither does it require an officer to provide what hindsight reveals to be the most effective medical care for an arrested suspect. (Id., at pp. 1095-1100.)

"'We must judge the reasonableness of a particular use of force "from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight."' (Citation). It is also well-established that police officers "are not required to use the least intrusive degree of force possible."'" (Williamson v. City of National City (9th Cir. 2022) 23 F.4th 1146, 1151; quoting Graham v. Connor (1989) 490 U.S. 386, 396 [109 S.Ct. 1865; 104 L.Ed.2nd 443]; and Lowry v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 2017) 858 F.3rd 1248, 1259.)

Where a police officer shot and killed plaintiff's mentally disturbed son seven times after the two were involved in a physical altercation, the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court's summary judgment for defendant police officer on plaintiff's state law negligence claim. The Court first noted that California negligence law regarding the use of deadly force overall is broader than federal Fourth Amendment law. Under California law, an officer's pre-shooting decisions can render his behavior unreasonable under the totality of the circumstances, even if his use of deadly force at the moment of the shooting might be reasonable in isolation. Federal law, however, generally focuses on the tactical conduct at the time of shooting, though a prior constitutional violation may proximately cause a later excessive use of force. The Court held that in this case, the district court erroneously conflated the legal standards under the Fourth Amendment and California negligence law. Specifically, the district court; (1) inaccurately concluded that plaintiff did not point to any evidence probative of the fact that the decedent exhibited symptoms of mental illness that would have been apparent to the officer; (2) did not consider that a jury could find the officer's pre-shooting conduct unreasonable under California law, given the decedent's potential mental illness; and (3) misinterpreted the Ninth Circuit precedent set forth in Billington v. Smith (9th Cir. 2002) 292 F.3rd 1177, in assessing the reasonableness of Officer Esparza's conduct at the time of the shooting. The Court held that in considering all the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, a reasonable jury could conclude that the officer should have suspected the decedent had mental health issues and that he unreasonably failed to follow police protocol when dealing with potentially mentally ill persons before using force. Finally, the officer's decision to shoot without warning six times—and then a seventh—could be found by a jury to be unreasonable. (Tabares v. City of Huntington Beach (9th Cir. 2021) 988 F.3rd 1119.)

Re: Billington v. Smith, supra, see "Provocation Rule," below.

"False arrest" issues are completely separate from whether excessive force was used in the arrest, even though both are Fourth Amendment "seizure" issues and both involve the same physical acts by the one accused of using excessive force. (Sharp v. County of Orange (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 901, 916.)

> In being arrested, plaintiff argued that deputies violated the Fourth Amendment by using excessive force by yanking his left arm behind his back—thereby causing a rotator-cuff tear which required surgery—and then applying handcuffs that were tight enough to break the skin. While the degree of force here was held to be significant, the Court held that the deputy sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiff failed to offer not offer anything other than general legal propositions which cannot clearly establish that the deputy's particular conduct was unlawful. (Id., at pp. 916-917.)

The use of force to affect an arrest is evaluated in light of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable seizures. (Graham v. Connor (1989) 490 U.S. 386 [109 S.Ct. 1865; 104 L.Ed.2nd 443]; see also Felarca v. Birgeneau (9th Cir. 2018) 891 F.3rd 809, 816.)

> The issue of reasonableness is assessed by "balancing 'the nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against the countervailing governmental interests at stake.'" (Ibid; citing Graham v. Connor, supra, at p. 396.)

A seizure is a "governmental termination of freedom of movement through means intentionally applied." (Jensen v. City of Oxnard (9th Cir. 1998) 145 F.3rd 1078, 1083.)

This includes the accidental use of the wrong weapon; e.g., accidentally using a firearm when the officer intended to use a Taser. (Torres v. City of Madera (9th Cir. 2008) 524 F.3rd 1053.)

"A police officer may use force, including blocking a vehicle and displaying his or her weapon, to accomplish an otherwise lawful stop or detention as long as the force used is reasonable under the circumstances to protect the officer or members of the public or to maintain the status quo." (People v. McHugh (2004) 119 Cal.App.4th 202, 211.)

The reasonableness of the force used to affect a particular seizure of a person is determined by a "careful balancing of 'the nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests' against the countervailing governmental interest at stake." (Graham v. Connor, supra, at p. 396 [109 S.Ct. 1865; 104 L.Ed.2nd at p. 455], quoting Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1, 8 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1, 7]; Jackson v. The use of a reasonable amount of force necessary in handcuffing and searching the plaintiff during a lawful arrest is not a battery. (Fayer v. Vaughn (9th Cir. 649 F.3rd 1061, 1065.)

Taking an otherwise compliant 11-year-old juvenile into physical custody (i.e., a "seizure") and handcuffing him while transporting him from his school to a relative (unreasonable "use of force"), based upon no more than an unsubstantiated report from school officials that he was "out of control" and off his meds, violates the juvenile's Fourth Amendment rights. (C.B. v. City of Sonora (9th Cir. 2014) 769 F.3rd 1005, 1022-1040.)

> The officers under these circumstances were held (by a 7-to-5 majority) to be entitled to qualified immunity on the first issue (illegal seizure), it not being a settled issue of law, but not as to the reasonableness of handcuffing the minor. (Id., at pp. 1026-1031, 1038-1040.)

The use of reasonable force in extracting blood, when done in a medically approved manner, is lawful. (Ritschel v. City of Fountain Valley (2005) 137 Cal.App.4th 107; a misdemeanor case.)

Officers had reasonable cause under the Washington statutes to take plaintiff for a mental evaluation on the basis of her paranoid comments to the officers and the 911 reports that she had been hiding under a car with her son, screaming that someone was trying to kill her and that she would kill herself. The officers' use of force in arresting and detaining her was reasonable. There was no genuine dispute from the evidence that she posed a threat to herself, her neighbors, and the officers. The evidence was undisputed that she was actively resisting arrest. (Luchtel v. Hagemann (9th Cir. 2010) 623 F.3rd 975.)

Thomas and Rosalie Avina sued the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) for assault and battery and intentional infliction of emotional distress after agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) executed a search warrant at their mobile home. Upon entering the home, the agents pointed guns at Thomas and Rosalie, handcuffed them and forcefully pushed Thomas to the floor. The agents handcuffed the Avina's fourteen-year-old daughter on the floor and then handcuffed their eleven-year-old daughter on the floor and pointed their guns at her head. The agents removed the handcuffs from the children approximately thirty minutes after they entered. The court held that the district court properly granted summary judgment in favor of the United States as to Thomas and Rosalie because the agents' use of force against them was reasonable. The agents were executing a search warrant at the residence of a suspected drug trafficker. This presented a dangerous situation for the agents and the use of handcuffs on the adult members of the family was reasonable to minimize the risk of harm to the officers and the Avinas. In addition, the agents did not act unreasonably when they forcefully pushed Thomas Avina to the floor. At the time of the push, Avina was refusing the agents' commands to get down on the ground. Because this refusal occurred during the initial entry, the agents had no way of knowing whether Avina was associated with the suspected drug trafficker, whom they thought lived there. The court however, found that the district court improperly granted summary judgment to the United States concerning the agents' conduct toward the Avinas' minor daughters. The court held that a jury could find that when the agents pointed their guns at the eleven-year-old daughter's head, while she was handcuffed on the floor, that this conduct amounted to excessive force. Similarly, the court held that a jury could find that the agents' decision to force the two girls to lie face down on the floor, with their hands cuffed behind their backs, was unreasonable. Genuine issues of fact existed as to whether the actions of the agents were excessive in light of girls' ages and the limited threats they posed. (Avina v. United States (9th Cir. 2012) 681 F.3rd 1127, 1130-1134.)

Whether four to six officers pointing guns (and one shotgun) at the plaintiff during a felony "high risk" traffic stop, after an "automated license plate reader" had misidentified the plaintiff's car as being stolen, when the plaintiff was compliant and posed no threat to the officers, constituted excessive force is a jury question. (Green v. City & County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2014) 751 F.3rd 1039, 1049-1051.)

The degree of force used under any particular set of circumstances includes a consideration of the lawfulness of the arrest in the first place. "(T)he facts that gave rise to an unlawful detention or arrest can factor into the determination whether the force used to make the arrest was excessive." However, the fact that a particular arrest may have been unlawful (i.e., without probable cause) does not mean that any amount of force used in making that arrest is necessarily excessive. (Velazquez v. City of Long Beach (9th Cir. 2015) 793 F.3rd 1010, 1023-1027.)

Responding to a domestic violence radio call, given the fact that more officers are killed at such situations than any other, is a factor a court can consider in determining the reasonableness of the use of deadly force. (George v. Morris (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 829, 839, 844; Mattos v. Agarano (9th Cir. 2011) 661 F.3rd 433, 450; United States v. Martinez (9th Cir. 2005) 406 F.3rd 1160, 1164.)

The use of expert testimony (pursuant to Evid. Code § 801) regarding police tactics and training and whether the officers, under the circumstances, used excessive force, is generally permissible, at least where the evidence offered relates to issues outside the scope of a lay juror's knowledge. (People v. Sibrian (2016) 3 Cal.App.5th 127.)

Upon plaintiff calling 9-1-1 to summon an ambulance for her son's apparent suicide attempt, plaintiff refused to allow a deputy sheriff into her house with the emergency rescue crew. As a result, the deputy handcuffed plaintiff as she attempted to drive her son to the hospital. The deputy sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity as to plaintiff's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim because it was objectively reasonable for the deputy to execute three head slams and to use her knee to pin plaintiff to the ground since the deputy was acting in her community caretaking capacity, plaintiff presented an immediate danger to the deputy and others, and plaintiff was actively interfering with her son's medical treatment. Deputies were also entitled to qualified immunity as to plaintiff's unlawful search claim because they searched her truck in furtherance of their duties to assist in resolving an active medical emergency; i.e., an apparent overdose. (Ames v. King County (9th Cir. 2017) 846 F.3rd 340.)

Where a sheriff's deputy was alleged to have aggressively grabbed plaintiff by the arm and pull him toward the curb, swinging him around, and then kick his feet out from under him causing him to fall to the pavement, after which a knee went into his back and a boot pushed his head into the pavement before being handcuffed, a jury found the force to be unreasonable under the circumstances. However, citing the United States Supreme Court's decision in White v. Pauly (2017) 580 U.S. 73 [137 S.Ct. 548; 196 L.Ed.2nd 463], the Court held that where no case could be identified that would have put the sheriff's deputy on notice that the force he used was unreasonable, entitling the deputy to qualified immunity, the jury's verdict and damage award was set aside. (Shafer v. County of Santa Barbara (Padilla) (9th Cir. 2017) 868 F.3rd 1110, 1115-1118.)

Handcuffing plaintiffs at the scene of an officer-involved shooting of a teenager (one of the plaintiffs), and holding them at the scene while handcuffed for five hours while the shooting was investigated—long after probable cause had dissipated—is a Fourth Amendment violation. The fact that the defendant officer (Gutierrez), who was the shooting officer, was pulled aside (per department policy) and monitored during the investigation of the shooting, and no longer had any control over the scene, does not prevent that officer from being liable for the unlawfully prolonged detention. The Court held that an officer need not have been the sole party responsible for a constitutional violation before civil liability may attach. "An officer's liability under (18 U.S.C.) Section 1983 is predicated on his 'integral participation' in the alleged violation. Officers, like other civil defendants, are generally responsible for the 'natural' or 'reasonably foreseeable' consequences. Thus, an officer can be held liable where he is just one participant in a sequence of events that gives rise to a constitutional violation." The trial court's denial of qualified immunity for that officer was upheld. (Nicholson v. City of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2019) 935 F.3rd 685: The officer's potential civil liability for shooting the one plaintiff was not at issue in this appeal.)

The force that one officer applied to the detainee/plaintiff (i.e., shooting him with a beanbag shotgun) was held to be objectively reasonable under the circumstances; i.e., defendant reported to have threaten family members with a chainsaw, exited the house with a visible knife in his pocket, and lowered his hands toward the knife despite being told to keep his hands up. However, by the time the second officer put pressure on the detainee's/plaintiff's back, holding him to the floor with his knee for about eight seconds as he was being handcuffed, a majority of the Court held that he no longer posed a risk, making such force unreasonable. If the use of force was excessive and there is a case on point that alerted the officer to the unconstitutionality of his conduct, then there was no added requirement for a specific level of damage or injury. The detainee's allegations that he now suffered ongoing neck and back pain, headaches, and emotional distress on account of the officer's actions was sufficient to create a genuine dispute of material fact that required resolution by a jury. As for the potential liability for a third officer who observed the incident, he was held to lack any realistic opportunity to intercede. (Cortesluna v. Leon (9th Cir. 2020) 979 F.3rd 645; a split 2-to-1 decision, with dissent arguing that a video showed that plaintiff, while held to the floor, continued to struggle and still constituted a potential danger to the officers.)

After plaintiff was stopped for failing to properly signal before changing lanes, he declined to give the officer his driver's license (showing it to him through the window) and car registration. Backup officers pulled plaintiff out of his car, tripped him so that he fell, pinned him to the ground and handcuffed him, resulting in plaintiff suffering some long-term physical injuries. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal ruled that the district court erred in granting the defendant police officers' summary judgment motion, noting that genuine factual disputes of material fact precluded summary judgment as to whether the officers were entitled to qualified immunity in the arrestee's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 Fourth Amendment excessive force lawsuit. Per the Court, a reasonable jury could find that the plaintiff engaged in passive resistance only, and that the officers' take-down involved unconstitutionally excessive force. The right to be free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance was clearly established at the time of the arrest, thus, the officers are not immune from being civilly liable. (Rice v. Morehouse (9th Cir. 2021) 989 F.3rd 1112.)

A protester who disrupted a city council meeting and was forcibly removed, going limp, had only herself to blame for injuries she incurred from being pulled and handcuffed. The trial court's denial of qualified immunity for the officers was reversed by the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which so held. The totality of the circumstances established that the type and amount of force that the officers used was minimal where the officers did not strike the protestor, throw her to the ground, or use any compliance techniques or weapons for the purpose of inflicting pain on her. The risk posed by the protestors was not zero and was relevant in assessing the circumstances that the officers faced when they decided to remove the protestors participating in the demonstration. Also, plaintiff/protestor could have avoided or reduced the pain and injury she alleged she suffered by cooperating with the officers and leaving the room under her own power. Her choice in not doing so did not render the officer's conduct unreasonable. (Williamson v. City of National City (9th Cir. 2022) 23 F.4th 1146.)

In Betts v. Brennan (5th Cir. 2022) 22 F.4th 577, the Fifth Circuit found the officer's repeated warnings that defendant would be tased if he did not comply with the officer's commands during what should have been a simple traffic stop except for the defendant's refusal to cooperate and comply with the officer's commands, was a factor to consider in determining that the officer's eventual use of his Taser was reasonable.

Henderson, Nevada, detectives forcibly tackled plaintiff to the ground with enough force to fracture his hip, resulting in excruciating pain and requiring two surgeries, such that the use of force by the detectives was substantial and, therefore, had to be justified by the need for the specific level of force employed. In this case, the detectives knew beforehand that plaintiff was not armed (despite being wanted for robbery) when they tackled him as he exited the courthouse. Plaintiff was not exhibiting any aggressive behavior, and there was no dispute that he was not resisting arrest or attempting to flee. Because any immediate threat to safety was minimal, the nature of the crime at issue (robbery) provided little, if any, basis for the officers' use of physical force. (Andrews v. City of Henderson (9th Cir. 2022) 35 F.4th 710.)

"Because deadly force involves a serious intrusion on Fourth Amendment rights, deadly force is reasonable only if the officer has probable cause to believe the suspect poses an immediate and significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others." (Smith v Agdeppa (9th Cir. 2023) 56 F.4th 1193, 1200-1201.)

Plaintiff brought a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 action after her son was shot and killed by a City of Minneapolis Police Officer; Officer Neal Walsh. The district court found the defendant officer and the City were entitled to qualified immunity as to the officer's initial use of deadly force but not the continued use of force after the deceased dropped his knife and had fallen to the ground. In this interlocutory appeal, defendant officer asserted he is entitled to qualified immunity as to the entire encounter, which lasted a total of about two seconds. The Eighth Circuit reversed the denial of qualified immunity. The Court explained that its review of the videos of the incident establishes that the defendant officer never paused during the shooting, which lasted less than two seconds, and he continued shooting for only approximately one second after plaintiff's son fell to the ground, dropping the knife. Given the swift and continuous progression of the incident and defendant officer's limited time to observe and process the circumstances, a jury could not find reasonably that the officer had sufficient time to reassess the threat presented before he stopped firing. Further, the court explained that even if plaintiff's son's emotional condition perhaps mitigated the threat he posed to the responding officers, a question we need not reach, this detail does not sufficiently distinguish this case from prior cases law such that the defendant officer would have had "fair warning" that his conduct violated a constitutional right. (Ching v. City of Minneapolis (8th Cir. 2023) 73 F.4th 617.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals held that two officers who shot and killed an unarmed man who was physically charging them down a hallway at the scene of a domestic violence call were entitled to qualified immunity under circumstances where it was not obvious that the officers' use of force was objectively unreasonable "in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them." (Citing Graham v. Connor (1989) 490 U.S. 386, 397 [109 S.Ct. 1865; 104 L.Ed.2nd 443].) "Even assuming that (the decedent) was unarmed and not reaching for a weapon, there is no dispute that he used aggressive language with the officers, ignored an order from the officers, and rushed towards them in a small and confined space. It is not obvious that the officers were constitutionally precluded from firing in this situation, where they were responding to an active domestic violence situation, lacked the benefit of having time to fully assess the circumstances, and needed to make split-second decisions as they were being charged." (*Waid v. County of Lyon (9th Cir. 2023) 87 F.4th 383, 389.)

> However, see the well-reasoned dissenting opinion at pp. 393-404, arguing a number of factors indicating that shooting any unarmed man was excessive and unreasonable under the circumstances of this case.

An officer was properly denied qualified immunity for having shot an individual twice after ordering him to show his hands. The victim initially appeared to reach for something in his pocket but then (as it appeared in the officer's bodycam) raised both hands (that were empty) when the officer shot and killed him. Per the Court, a jury could well find that, at the moment he was shot, (1) Mr. Lopez presented no immediate threat to Officer Wright and (2) Officer Wright's use of deadly force was a violation of Mr. Lopez's Fourth Amendment rights. Kneeling on a Suspect's Back or Neck:

In a case where an officer grabbed the plaintiff, knocked him to the ground, straddled him, and handcuffed him, followed by another officer then "forcefully put his knee into LaLonde's back, causing him significant pain" and a lingering back injury, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal reversed the summary judgment entered in favor of the officers because the allegations, if true, "constitute[d] a clear violation of plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights." (LaLonde v. County of Riverside (9th Cir. 2000) 204 F.3rd 947, 962.)

and then kick his feet out from under him causing him to fall to the pavement, after which a knee went into his back and a boot pushed his head into the pavement before being handcuffed, a jury found the force to be unreasonable under the circumstances. However, citing White v. Pauly (2017) 580 U.S. 73 [137 S.Ct. 548; 196 L.Ed.2nd 463], the Court held that where no case could be identified that would have put the sheriff's deputy on notice that the force he used was unreasonable, entitling the deputy to qualified immunity, the jury's verdict and damage award was set aside. (Shafer v. County of Santa Barbara* (Padilla) (9th Cir. 2017) 868 F.3rd 1110, 1115-1118.)

Upon plaintiff calling 9-1-1 to summon an ambulance for her son's apparent suicide attempt, plaintiff refused to allow a deputy sheriff into her house with the emergency rescue crew. As a result, the deputy handcuffed plaintiff as she attempted to drive her son to the hospital. The deputy sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity as to plaintiff's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim because it was objectively reasonable for the deputy to execute three head slams and to use her knee to pin plaintiff to the ground since the deputy was acting in her community caretaking capacity, plaintiff presented an immediate danger to the deputy and others, and plaintiff was actively interfering with her son's medical treatment. (Ames *v. King County (9th Cir. 2017) 846 F.3rd 340.)

After ruling that shooting defendant with a beanbag shotgun was reasonable under the circumstances, a majority of the Court held that a second officer putting pressure on the detainee's/plaintiff's back, holding him to the floor with his knee for about eight seconds as he was being handcuffed, was unreasonable. If the use of force was excessive and there is a case on point that alerted the officer to the unconstitutionality of his conduct, then there was no added requirement for a specific level of damage or injury. > In ruling that kneeling on a suspect's back was unreasonable in this case, the Court limited its ruling by specifically noting that: "We hold only, as we have before, that police may not kneel on a prone and non-resisting person's back so hard as to cause injury." (Id., at p. 656.)

In a civil suit where plaintiffs claimed that officers used excessive force against an arrestee (decedent Aguirre) by contorting and holding his body in a prone, hog-tie-like "maximal restraint position" for five-and-a-half minutes (described as placing him prone on his stomach, while an officer pushed his legs up and crossed them near his buttocks and kneeled forward on his legs, holding them near his bound hands in a hog-tie-like position, while another officer knelt with one knee on the ground and the other on the decedent's back, causing him to die from asphyxiation), the Court held that defendant officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. First, the court noted the lack of visible resistance by decedent, the presence of numerous officers surrounding him, and the fact that the officers had already blocked off several lanes of traffic, all weighed against the inference of any immediate safety threat or other need that would justify holding the decedent down as described above. Second, the court held that, at the time of the incident, it was clearly established that when a suspect is not resisting, it is unreasonable for an officer to apply unnecessary, injurious force against a restrained individual, even if the person had previously not followed commands or initially resisted the seizure. Evidence presented by the officers to the contrary was contradicted by dashcom videos. The court added that, in this case, a jury could credit the plaintiff's version of the incident and conclude "that no reasonable officer would have perceived [Aguirre] as posing an immediate threat to the [O]fficers' safety or thought that he was resisting arrest." Therefore, if a jury believed: 1) that the officers unnecessarily placed the decedent in the maximal restraint position when there was no reason to believe he had committed a serious crime; 2) that he posed a continuing threat to the officers or public safety; or, 3) that he was resisting arrest, the officers violated the decedent's clearly established constitutional rights (Estate of Aguirre v. City of San Antonio (5th Cir. 2021) 995 F.3rd 395.)

In subduing a fighting, kicking, resisting inmate in a holding cell, at least one of the officers applied pressure to the inmate's back (referred to as a "prone restraint") for a full 15 minutes after the inmate was already handcuffed, hands and feet, until he quit resisting, despite the inmate's complaint that "it hurts." The inmate died as a result. In the subsequent civil suit pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983, brought by the decedent's parents, the U.S. Supreme Court (in a 6-to-3 per curiam decision) reversed the Eight Circuit Court of Appeal's upholding of the district court's summary judgement in favor of the defendant officers. In so ruling, the Court noted the Eight Circuit's failure to consider as "significant" "well-known police guidance recommending that officers get a subject off his stomach as soon as he is handcuffed" due to the risk of suffocation. It was also noted by that same guidance that "the struggles of a prone suspect may be due to oxygen deficiency, rather than a desire to disobey officers' commands." It was held, therefore, that "such evidence, when considered alongside the duration of the restraint and the fact that inmate was handcuffed and leg shackled at the time, may be pertinent to the relationship between the need for the use of force and the amount of force used, the security problem at issue, and the threat—to both (the decedent) and others—reasonably perceived by the officers." "Such a per se rule would contravene the careful, context-specific analysis required by this Court's excessive force precedent." (Lombardo v. City of St. Louis (June 28, 2021) __ U.S. __ [141 S. Ct. 2239; 210 L.Ed.2nd 609]; remanding the case to the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeal for a reconsideration of certain factors.

> The Eight Circuit cited its own prior precedent—Ryan v. Armstrong (8th Cir. 2017)850 F.3rd 419—in which that court found reasonable a resisting detainee being held in a prone position for three minutes until officers were able to get him handcuffed.

With five officers, two paramedics, and two private security guards, all present, and with the plaintiff's son (i.e., Timpa, who was exhibiting signs of extreme mental distress, perhaps aggravated by ingestion of cocaine), who was already handcuffed, being held face down to the ground by an officer (Dallas P.D. Officer Dillard), kneeling on the subject's back for fourteen minutes and seven seconds, Timpa eventually quit breathing. Upon moving him to a paramedic's gurney, it was finally noticed that the subject was deceased. Plaintiff and others sued Dillard and other officers at the scene in federal court for using excessive force, resulting in Timpa's death. The trial court found all the civil defendant's to be entitled to qualified immunity, and dismissed the lawsuit. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeal reversed as to all but one of the officers who had left the scene early in the confrontation. As for the others, the Court (using body camera evidence) described the fourteen minute ordeal, minute by minute, finding that the officers should have noticed that Timpa was slowly suffocating. Other officers not directly involved had a duty to intervene but did not only fail to do so, instead mocked Timpa when it appeared that he had passed out. The court held that a jury could find that the use of a prone restraint with bodyweight force on an individual with three apparent risk factors—obesity, physical exhaustion, and excited delirium—constituted unreasonable deadly force. The court based this holding on the fact; (1) that the officers involved in this case were trained that the prolonged use of a prone restraint on subjects in a state of excited delirium can result in positional asphyxia death; (2) prominent guidance from the Department of Justice concerning risks, including sudden death, associated with prone handcuffing and positional asphyxia; and (3) expert witness testimony from the plaintiffs concerning the substantial risks of a prone restraint with weight on an obese and physically exhausted person in a state of excited delirium. (Timpa v. Dillard (5th Cir. 2021) 20 F.4th 1020.)

Kneeling on a subject's back (that subject being high on drugs and physically resisting) for approximately four to five minute until he was no longer breathing raised an issue of excessive force that must be decided by a jury. Summary judgment in favor of the defendant officers on an allegation of excessive force was denied by the federal district court. Per the Court: "'Prevailing precedent in the Ninth Circuit is that law enforcement officers' use of body weight to restrain a "prone and handcuffed individual[ ] in an agitated state" can cause suffocation "under the weight of restraining officers," therefore, such conduct may be considered deadly force.'" Garlick v. Cnty. of Kern, 167 F. Supp. 3d 1117, 1155 (E.D. Cal. 2016) . . . "[K]nown as 'compression asphyxia,' prone and handcuffed individuals in an agitated state have suffocated under the weight of restraining officers." Id.'" (Quinto-Collins v. City of Antioch (Dist.Ct. Feb. 25, 2024) __ F. Supp. 3rd __ [2024 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31860]; quoting Drummond ex rel. Drummond v. City of Anaheim (9th Cir. 2003) 343 F.3rd 1052, 1056-1057.)

Gang Tackle:

"The Fourth Amendment requires police officers making an arrest to use only an amount of force that is objectively reasonable in light of the circumstances facing them. Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 7-8, 105 S. Ct. 1694, 85 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1985). Neither tackling nor punching a suspect to make an arrest necessarily constitutes excessive force. Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 396, 109 S. Ct. 1865, 104 L. Ed. 2d 443 (1989) ('"Not every push or shove, even if it may seem unnecessary in the peace of the judge's chambers," . . . violates the Fourth Amendment') (quoting Johnson v. Glick, 481 F.2d 1028, 1033 (2d Cir. 1973)). But 'even where some force is justified, the amount actually used may be excessive.' Santos v. Gates, 287 F.3d 846, 853 (9th Cir. 2002). The question in all cases is whether the use of force was 'objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting' the arresting officers. Graham, 490 U.S. at 397 (internal quotation marks omitted)." (Blankenhorn v. City of Orange (9th Cir. 2007) 485 F.3rd 463, 477; noting at p. 478 that "A rational jury could find that the use of a gang tackle by (the officers involved) under these circumstances was unreasonable.")

The Blankenhorn Court eventually held (at p. 481) that under the circumstances of this case, "this clear principle would have put a prudent officer on notice that gang-tackling without first attempting a less violent means of arresting a relatively calm trespass suspect—especially one who had been cooperative in the past and was at the moment not actively resisting arrest—was a violation of that person's Fourth Amendment rights.

Two plain-clothed detectives "gang-tackled" plaintiff under circumstances where, despite knowing that he was a suspect in a series of armed robberies, they knew he was not armed (having just left a courthouse where metal detectors were being used) and did not resist. As alleged by the plaintiff, he was tackled to the ground with enough force to fracture his hip. The injury resulted in "excruciating pain" and required two surgeries. Under these circumstances, the Court concluded that this use of force by the detectives was "substantial" and, therefore, "must be justified by the need for the specific level of force employed." The civil defendants having failed to justify the need for such force, and because a jury could reasonably determine that such force was excessive, summary judgment in the defendants' favor was not appropriate (upholding the trial court's decision on this issue). (Andrews v. City of Henderson (9th Cir. 2022) 35 F.4th 710, 715-718.)

PIT ("Pursuit Intervention Technique") Maneuver:

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal affirmed the district court's summary judgment for law enforcement officers in an action alleging, in part, that defendants violated Remi Sabbe's Fourth Amendment rights by entering his private property without a warrant, using an armored vehicle to intentionally collide with Sabbe's pickup truck while he was inside, and shooting and killing him. Defendant officers responded to calls from Sabbe's neighbor that Sabbe was driving a pickup truck erratically on a rural field on his own property, that he was drunk and belligerent and may have fired a gun. An hour after thirty officers arrived at the property in marked police cars with their overhead lights on, defendants used an unmarked armored vehicle to twice execute a "Pursuit Intervention Technique" ("PIT") maneuver by intentionally colliding with Sabbe's truck in the field. The officers reportedly shot Sabbe after they thought they heard a gunshot and saw a rifle pointed at them. The Court first rejected plaintiff's argument that defendants violated Sabbe's Fourth Amendment rights by entering the property without a warrant. Sabbe's response to the warrantless entry was a superseding cause of his death and unforeseeable given the circumstances. Accordingly, the officers' decision not to obtain a warrant before entering the property—regardless of whether that decision constituted a Fourth Amendment violation—was not the proximate cause of Sabbe's death. The Court next held that a jury could find that defendants' second PIT maneuver constituted deadly and excessive force because (1) it created a substantial risk of serious bodily injury, (2) Sabbe did not pose an imminent threat to the officers or others at that point, and (3) less intrusive alternatives were available. Nevertheless, no clearly established law would have provided adequate notice to reasonable officers that their use of the armored vehicle to execute a low-speed PIT maneuver under these circumstances was unconstitutional. The Court held that the district court correctly ruled that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity for shooting and killing Sabbe because the officers' split-second decision to open fire did not constitute excessive force. Finally, the panel rejected plaintiff's failure-to-train claim against the County, finding that the record did not give rise to a genuine dispute that the County's failure to establish guidelines for using the armored vehicle to execute PIT maneuvers rose to the level of deliberate indifference. Concurring in part and dissenting in part, Judge Berzon stated that, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Sabbe, he did not point a rifle or shoot at the officers, nor did the officers reasonably believe that he did. Defendants therefore were not entitled to summary judgment as to whether the fatal shooting of Sabbe was excessive force. Additionally, defendant officers' mode of entry onto Sabbe's property in an unmarked military vehicle was a proximate cause of his death. Although Judge Berzon concurred in the conclusion that a reasonable jury could find that the second PIT maneuver constituted excessive force, she would deny qualified immunity because a reasonable officer would have understood that the action was likely to cause death or serious injury. Finally, Judge Berzon agreed that the district court properly dismissed plaintiff's failure-to-train claim against the County. (Sabbe v. Washington County Board of Supervisors (9th Cir. 2023) 84 F.4th 807.)

Statutory Unlawful Restraint*: Gov't. Code § 7286.5; The "Carotid Restraint:"

On January 1, 2021, Calif. Gov't. Code § 7286.5 became effective via AB 1196, prohibiting a law enforcement agency from authorizing the use by its officers of either the "carotid restraint" (defined as "a vascular neck restraint or any similar restraint, hold, or other defensive tactic in which pressure is applied to the sides of a person's neck that involves a substantial risk of restricting blood flow and may render the person unconscious in order to subdue or control the person") or the "choke hold" (defined as "any defensive tactic or force option in which direct pressure is applied to a person's trachea or windpipe"). Effective January 1, 2022, via AB 490, the section was expanded with the addition of a new subd. (a)(2), adding a prohibition on "techniques or transport methods that involve a substantial risk of positional asphyxia." "Positional asphyxia" is defined as "situating a person in a manner that compresses their airway and reduces the ability to sustain adequate breathing. This includes, without limitation, the use of any physical restraint that causes a person's respiratory airway to be compressed or impairs the person's breathing or respiratory capacity, including any action in which pressure or body weight is unreasonably applied against a restrained person's neck, torso, or back, or positioning a restrained person without reasonable monitoring for signs of asphyxia."

The Third Circuit Court of Appeal reviewed a lower court's denial of qualified immunity status for officers involved in the arrest of the deceased Thomas. Upon Thomas' arrest, he appeared to have recently ingested a large amount of crack cocaine for the purpose of hiding it from the arresting officers. Each officer present, two initially, and later five total, concluded that Thomas had likely ingested the drugs. Upon his arrest, but in violation of department policy, he was not taken to a hospital but booked into jail instead. Two hours after booking, Thomas passed out in his cell and was finally taken to the hospital. He died three days later without regaining consciousness. His Estate sued in federal court, claiming two separate Fourteenth Amendment causes of action: (1) Failure to Render Aid and Fourteenth Amendment and (2) Failure to Intervene. Thomas's Estate claimed a violation of the well-established constitutional right to medical care. To plead a violation of the right to medical care, an individual must allege (1) "a serious medical need" and (2) "acts or omissions by [individuals] that indicate a deliberate indifference to that need." In inadequate medical care cases, courts have specifically found deliberate indifference where objective evidence of a serious need for care was ignored and where "necessary medical treatment is delayed for non-medical reasons." The Court found the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on the claim of failure to render medical care. The Appeals Court then conducted a separate analysis regarding the second claim that "failure to intervene" involved a constitutional violation. However, it also concluded that no previous appeals court has recognized any such right, nor has the Supreme Court. Though courts have recognized a right to have a government actor intervene when the underlying constitutional violation involves excessive force or sexual assault of a person in custody or detention, courts have since concluded that there is no precedent, let alone a clearly established right to intervention in other contexts. Because there is not a clearly established right to intervention to prevent a violation of the right to medical care, the Officers were entitled to qualified immunity as to Thomas's Estate's second claim failure to intervene. (Thomas v. City of Harrisburg (3rd Cir. 2023) 88 F.4th 275.)

Statutory Law:

See also Gov't. Code § 7286 (SB 230): By January 2, 2021, all California law enforcement agencies are required to have established a policy that provides a minimum standard on the use of force and to make the policy accessible to the public which is to include a requirement that an officer intercede when seeing another officer use excessive force.

Gov't. Code § 7286(a)(4) (effective Jan. 1, 2023): "Intercede" is defined as "includ(ing), but . . . not limited to, physically stopping the excessive use of force, recording the excessive force, if equipped with a body-worn camera, and documenting efforts to intervene, efforts to deescalate the offending officer's excessive use of force, and confronting the offending officer about the excessive force during the use of force and, if the officer continues, reporting to dispatch or the watch commander on duty and stating the offending officer's name, unit, location, time, and situation, in order to establish a duty for that officer to intervene."

Provocation Rule*:

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal invented a so-called "provocation rule," holding that even when it is held that reasonable force is used by law enforcement, the officers using that force may still be civilly liable if they provoked the need to use force by violating some other constitutional principle, at least when that earlier violation was done intentionally or recklessly. (See Billington v. Smith (9th Cir. 2001) 292 F.3rd 1177.)

The provocation rule permitted a civil claim for excessive force under the Fourth Amendment where an officer intentionally or recklessly provoked a violent confrontation, so long as the provocation is an independent Fourth Amendment violation. (See Mendez v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2016) 815 F.3rd 1178; certiorari granted, reversed and remanded.)

The U.S. Supreme Court overruled the Ninth Circuit on this issue in County of Los Angeles v. Mendez (2017) 581 U.S. 420, 430-432 [137 S.Ct. 1539; 198 L.Ed.2nd 52], finding that there is no basis for such a rule, but rather that a court must determine whether a warrantless entry, conceded to have been in violation of the Fourth Amendment, was the "proximate cause" of a plaintiff's injuries.

On remand, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed in part and reversed in part the district court's judgment in an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and state law because police officers violated the Fourth Amendment by entering a home without a warrant, consent, or exigent circumstances while searching for a parole-at-large. The unlawful entry itself, as well as the failure to comply with the "knock and announce" rules, were held to be separate and distinct proximate causes of the homeowners being shot by the officers and seriously injured. The homeowner's action of moving a BB gun so that it was pointed in the officers' direction was held not to be a superseding or intervening cause. The officers were also held to be negligent, under California law, as their conduct in entering the residence on high alert, with guns drawn, and without announcing their presence, was reckless. They were not entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to knock and announce under California law. Lastly, immunity under California Government Code §§ 821.6 and 820.2 did not apply. (Mendez v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2018) 897 F.3rd 1067, 1074-1084.)

> In so-holding, the Court provided a discussion on the issue of "proximate cause." Specifically: "We have held that 'the touchstone of proximate cause in a (42 U.S.C.) § 1983 action is foreseeability.' Phillips v. Hust, 477 F.3rd 1070, 1077 (9th Cir. 2007), vacated on other grounds, 555 U.S. 1150, 129 S.Ct. 1036, 173 L.Ed.2nd 466 (2009). The Supreme Court has observed that '[p]roximate cause is often explicated in terms of foreseeability or the scope of the risk created by the predicate conduct.' Paroline v. United States, 572 U.S. 434, 134 S.Ct. 1710, 1719, 188 L.Ed.2nd 714 (2014). 'A requirement of proximate cause thus serves, inter alia, to preclude liability in situations where the causal link between conduct and result is so attenuated that the consequence is more aptly described as mere fortuity.'" (Id., at p. 1076.)

Even prior to Mendez, it had been noted by the U.S. Supreme Court that the provocation rule has been "sharply questioned" outside the Ninth Circuit. (County of Los Angeles v. Mendez (2017) 581 U.S. 420, 427 [137 S.Ct. 1539; 198 L.Ed.2nd 52]; citing City and County of San Francisco v. Bond (Oct. 18, 2021) __ U.S. __ [142 S.Ct. 9; 211 L.Ed.2nd 170], where the U.S. Supreme Court rejected the argument advanced by the Ninth Circuit that by stepping towards the decedent and cornering him in the garage, the officers "recklessly" caused him to react when the decedent grabbed the hammer and took a fighting stance. The Court reversed the Ninth Circuit's ruling in this case that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity where the officers shot and killed the decedent.

Intervening* (or Superseding) Circumstances:

The U.S. Supreme Court in County of Los Angeles v. Mendez (2017) 581 U.S. 420, at p. 427 [137 S.Ct. 1539; 198 L.Ed.2nd 52]; cites City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan (2015) 575 U.S. 600, [135 S.Ct. 1765; 191 L.Ed.2nd 856, 869], where at pg. 615, footnote 4, the Court states: "[I]f the officers' use of force was reasonable given the plaintiff's acts, then despite the (officers') illegal entry, the plaintiff's own conduct would be an intervening cause." (Further citing Livermore v. Lubelan (6th Cir. 2007) 476 F.3rd 397, 406-407; and Hector v. Watt (3rd Cir. 2001) 235 F.3rd 154, 160.)

In discussing the fact that the plaintiff pointed what appeared to be a firearm (but turned out to be a BB gun) at officers who were illegally (i.e., without a warrant, consent, or exigent circumstances) entering the plaintiff's residence, causing the officers to shoot him (and his wife), the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that plaintiff's action of pointing what appeared to be a gun at the officers was not a superseding or intervening cause sufficient to negate the officers' potential civil liability for the injuries caused. (Mendez *v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2018) 897 F.3rd 1067, 1081-0183.)

> "To be sure, officers are free from liability if they can show that the behavior of a shooting victim was a superseding cause of the injury. A superseding or intervening cause involves a shifting of responsibility away from a party who would otherwise have been responsible for the harm that occurs. (Citing W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser and Keeton on Torts § 44 (5th ed. 1984) If a resident sees that an officer has entered and intentionally tries to harm the officer, who in turn draws his weapon and shoots, the resident's intentional action would be a superseding cause of the injury. See, e.g., Bodine v. Warwick, 72 F.3rd 393, 400 (3rd Cir. 1995) (noting that if a suspect were to shoot at persons known to be officers, the suspect's act would be a superseding cause absolving the officers of liability for harm caused as a result of an unlawful entry)." (Id., at p. 1081.)
>
> In Mendez, the Ninth Circuit ultimately sustained the district court's finding that plaintiff Angel Mendez's act of pointing the BB gun at the officers was not intentional; that the act of picking up the BB gun to be merely "normal efforts" enabling him to sit up on the futon. As such, per the Court, plaintiff's actions was not a superseding act relieving the officers of their liability. (Id., at p. 1082.)

Violation of "Familial Rights:

While plaintiff asserted a claim for "civil rights violations," which he defined as "a constitutionally protected liberty interest under the Fourteenth Amendment in the companionship and society of the parent/child relationship without governmental interference," stemming from his arrest which plaintiff argued was illegal and accomplished through unnecessary force, the Court held that the defendant had a potential cause of action and that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity in that the right is clearly established. (Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ, 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006; holding that a jury could conclude that the Officers had a "purpose to harm" plaintiff outside of legitimate law enforcement objectives.

The decedent being the plaintiffs' adult brother (a "non-cohabitating sibling") does not give the plaintiffs a familial right sufficient to bring a lawsuit seeking damages, having failed to show that the "objective characteristics" of the relationship in question were "sufficiently personal or private to warrant constitutional protection." (Mann v. City of Sacramento (9th Cir. 2022) 2022 U.S.App. LEXIS 16453, unpublished.)

A child of a decedent has a constitutionally protected liberty interest under the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause in the "companionship and society" of her father or mother. "'Official conduct that shocks the conscience' in depriving [a child] of that interest is cognizable as a violation of due process." (Hayes v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 1223, 1229-1231; quoting Wilkinson v. Torres (9th Cir. 2010) 610 F.3rd 546, 544; A. D. v. State of California Highway Patrol (9th Cir. 2013) 712 F.3rd 446, 453.)

> In Hayes, it was discussed how where actual deliberation by the officer using deadly force is practical, an officer's "deliberate indifference" may suffice to "shock the conscience." Where, on the other hand, the officer must make a "snap judgment" due to a rapidly escalating situation, then his conduct may be found to shock the conscience only if the officer acts with a purpose to harm unrelated to legitimate law enforcement objectives. (Ibid; where decedent came at the officer from about 8 feet away with a knife in hand, giving the officer only 4 seconds to react, was determined to be a "snap judgment" situation.)
> "Shocking the conscience," by the way has been defined elsewhere as actions that are those taken with (1) "deliberate indifference" or (2) a "purpose to harm . . . unrelated to legitimate law enforcement objectives." (See A. D. v. State of California Highway Patrol (9th Cir. 2013) 712 F.3rd 446, 453.)

In a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 action, judgment for decedent's father on Fourth Amendment excessive use of force claim was affirmed because the jury found the officer retreated from decedent after firing the first shot and that decedent did not have scissors as he approached the officer before the second shot. The district court was correct in denying qualified immunity as a matter of law because the law was clearly established at the time of the shooting that an officer could not constitutionally kill a person who did not pose an immediate threat. The law was also clearly established at the time of the incident that firing a second shot at a person who had previously been aggressive, but posed no threat to the officer at the time of the second shot, would violate the victim's rights. (Lam v. City of Los Banos (9th Cir. 2020) 976 F.3rd 986.)

Officers who entered a decedent's house and, within seconds, were confronted by an uncooperative and angry male half of a reported domestic violent situation, and who was out of control and who charged the officers despite the officers' commands to go to the floor, did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause when they shot and killed the decedent. Per the Court: "Liability turns on 'whether the circumstances are such that 'actual deliberation is practical.' Moreland v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't, 159 F.3d 365, 372 (9th Cir. 1998) (quoting County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 851, 118 S. Ct. 1708, 140 L. Ed. 2d 1043 (1998)). '[W]here a law enforcement officer makes a snap judgment because of an escalating situation, his conduct may only be found to shock the conscience if he acts with a purpose to harm unrelated to legitimate law enforcement objectives.'" (Waid v. County of Lyon (9th Cir. 2023) 87 F.4th 383, 392.)

Duty to Warn*:

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal has held a number of times that where it is possible to do so, the officer must warn a person before applying force, at least when the force is likely to cause injury. (Deorle v. Rutherford (9th Cir. 2001) 272 F.3rd 1272, 1283-1284, beanbag; Bryan v. MacPherson (9th Cir. 2010) 630 F.3rd 805; Taser; Hayes v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 1223, 1234-1235, firearm.)

> See also Nelson v. City of Davis (9th Cir. 2012) 685 F.3rd 867, 882; and Forrester v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 1994) 25 F.3rd 804.)
> See also Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1, 11-12 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1]; "(I)f the suspect threatens the officer with a weapon or there is probable cause to believe that he has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm, deadly force may be used if necessary to prevent escape, and if, where feasible, some warning has been given." (Italics added)

However, where an officer arrives late at an ongoing police action and witnesses shots being fired by one of several individuals in a house surrounded by other officers, and that officer then shoots and kills an armed occupant of the house without first giving a warning, the officer did not violate clearly established law based on his failure to provide a verbal warning before utilizing deadly force: "No settled Fourth Amendment principle requires that officer to second-guess the earlier steps already taken by his or her fellow officers in instances like the one [the officer] confronted here." (White v. Pauly (2017) 580 U.S. 73 [137 S.Ct. 548; 196 L.Ed.2nd 463].)

> In a case where the civil defendant (an off-duty correctional officer) shot the plaintiff, who had been threatening a crowd of people with a firearm, shooting into the air and in the general direction of the crowd, the court noted that even if the officer did not identify himself as a police officer or warn the plaintiff before firing, he was not required to do so. Officers are > only required to warn "where feasible," and not under all circumstances. (Lopez v. Sheriff of Cook County (7th Cir. 2021) 993 F.3rd 981.)

"(A)n important consideration in evaluating the City's interest in the use of force is 'whether officers gave a warning before employing the force.'" (Lowry v. City of San Diego (9th 2017) 858 F.3rd 1248, 1259; quoting Glenn v. Washington County (9th Cir. 2011) 673 F.3rd 864, 876.)

> In Lowry, an officer did in fact give a warning that he was about to deploy a service dog although plaintiff, who was asleep inside a darkened commercial business, was asleep and did not hear it.

The officers' failure to warn a subject carrying a firearm before shooting him, when the subject, as he approached the officers, was pointing it at the ground, even though the officers had already seen the subject hit his daughter with it moments earlier, was held to be unreasonable, requiring a reversal of the trial court's summary judgment motion granted in favor of the defendant officers. (Hensley v. Price (4th Cir. 2017) 876 F.3rd 573.)

The failure to warn a thirteen-year-old boy who was observed carrying what appeared to be an AK-47 (but turned out to be a toy with the bright orange tip removed), and who failed to drop the weapon when ordered but who did not act aggressively toward the officer or ever point the weapon at the officer, was a factor in denying the officer qualified immunity in a resulting civil suit for having shot and killed the victim. (Estate of Lopez v. Gelhaus (9th Cir. 2017) 871 F.3rd 998, 1011.)

An officer's failure to warn that lethal force was about to be used absent compliance with the officer's orders, a "seemly obvious principle," held to be significant factor in whether the officer's use of lethal force (i.e., shooting him) was reasonable under the circumstances. (Nehad v. Browder (9th Cir. 2019) 929 F.3rd 1125, 1137-1138.)

> The Court further noted that whether or not the officer ordered the deceased to halt (Id, at p. 1137.) as he was slowly approaching the officer, as well as the officer's failure to identify himself (Id., at p. 1138.), were factors for a jury to consider in determining the reasonableness of the eventual use of lethal force.

An officer's failure to warn a subject before shooting him may be a factor for a civil jury to consider on the issue of the officer's state-based negligence in a civil action. (Tabares v. City of Huntington Beach (9th Cir. 2021) 988 F.3rd 1119.)

In a different context (i.e., a government agency's "duty to warn" a potential victim), it was held that the trial court erred by denying the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation's motions for nonsuit and judgment notwithstanding the verdict after a jury found the Department was partially at fault for a parolee's crimes (raping and murdering the victim) based upon the Department's failure to warn the victim of the parolee's dangerous propensities. The Court ruled that the evidence was insufficient to establish that a "special relationship" existed between the parole agents and the victim. Absent evidence that either agent who had been assigned to supervise the parolee had made an express or implied promise of protection causing detrimental reliance by the victim, who was the parolee's grandmother, in opening her home to the parolee, the Department had no civil liability. The evidence also did not demonstrate that either agent had created a foreseeable peril that was not readily discoverable by the victim because neither agent was shown to have been aware that the parolee posed a particularized threat of harm to the victim. (Russell v. Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 916.)

Failing to warn the plaintiff before gang-tackling him where the officers knew he was not armed (having just exited a courthouse where metal detectors were in use) and he was not resisting is a factor for the Court to consider in determining whether the force used in taking him into custody was reasonable. (Andrews v. City of Henderson (9th Cir. 2022) 35 F.4th 710, 717.)

"We have also repeatedly stated that an officer must give warning before using deadly force "whenever practicable." (Smith v Agdeppa (9th Cir. 2023) 56 F.4th 1193, 1201.)

> An officer who shot and killed a resisting suspect was held not to be entitled to qualified immunity despite the fact that the suspect refused to submit to being handcuffed, and who was allegedly pummeling his partner at the time. The only warning given (which was also contested) was to "stop," or "words to the effect that Dorsey (the deceased) needed to stop*."* (pg. 1204.) "It (was) uncontested that Dorsey posed some danger to the officers' safety by actively resisting arrest, but our case law required (Officer) Agdeppa to give a deadly force warning if doing so was practicable." (Pg. 1203.) But per the Court: *"*Because the officers had tased Dorsey at least five times, a command to 'stop' would have done nothing to warn Dorsey that Agdeppa was preparing to ramp up to use deadly force." (Pg. 1204.)
>
> However, see the lengthy dissent (at pgs. 1205-1220) where it was argued that the deceased had been warned a number of times to cease resisting while conceding that he had never actually been warned that he would be shot. It was also noted that the deceased was nearly twice the size of either of the officers (6'1" tall and weighing 280 pounds, vs. approximately 145 pounds each and 5'1" and 5'5", respectively.) and that the officers were losing a fight which ultimately resulted in serious injuries to the officers, while also noting that when deadly force was finally used, "it was objectively reasonable to believe that there was an imminent threat to the officers of death or serious bodily injury." (Pg. 1214.) Ultimately, the dissent argues that it was not "clearly established that the officers in this extreme situation were required to give a further warning before using deadly force." (Pgs. 1215, 1220.)

See "On the Issue of a Government Agency's 'Duty to Warn' a Potential Victim and 'Special Relationships,'" under "Procedural Rules" (Chapter 2), above.

"Suicide by Cop" Situations*:

No reasonable trier of fact could find that police officers involved in a lethal shooting were negligent or had acted unreasonably, as the officers patiently waited approximately 40 minutes before resorting to less-than-lethal weapons, negotiations with the decedent had been futile, he was armed with a deadly weapon—a knife with a long blade—and was behaving erratically, the officers reasonably used less-lethal weapons in an attempt to safely subdue him, and despite stabbing himself three times in the abdomen and slashing his throat with the knife, the decedent was unable to kill himself and thus provoked the police into killing him. (Villalobos v. City of Santa Maria (2022) 85 Cal.App.5th 383.)

Applicable Statutes*:

Pen. Code § 147: Inhumanity to Prisoners:

"Every officer who is guilty of willful inhumanity or oppression toward any prisoner under his care or in his custody, is punishable by fine not exceeding four thousand dollars ($4,000), and by removal from office."

An officer who uses excessive force is subject to prosecution for a felony (Pen. Code § 149) and/or, if the victim is a prisoner and the officer is guilty of "willful inhumanity or oppression towards (the) prisoner," a $4,000 fine and removal from office (Pen. Code § 147), in addition to any other applicable assault or battery violations. (See People v. Perry (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 444.)

Pen. Code § 149: Assaults by Officers Under Color of Authority:

Every public officer who, under color of authority, without lawful necessity, assaults or beats any person, is punishable by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars ($10,000), or by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding one year, or pursuant to subdivision (h) of Section 1170, or by both that fine and imprisonment.

An officer who uses excessive force is subject to prosecution for a felony (Pen. Code § 149) and/or, if the victim is a prisoner and the officer is guilty of "willful inhumanity or oppression towards (the) prisoner," a $4,000 fine and removal from office (Pen. Code § 147), in addition to any other applicable assault or battery violations. (See People v. Perry (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 444.)

Pen. Code § 196: Homicide: Use of Justifiable Deadly Force by Police Officers:

Homicide is justifiable when committed by peace officers and those acting by their command in their aid and assistance, under either of the following circumstances:

(a) In obedience to any judgment of a competent court.

(b) When the homicide results from a peace officer's use of force that is in compliance with Section 835a. (See below)

Pen. Code § 197: Justifiable Homicide: Homicide is also justifiable when committed by any person in any of the following situations:

1. When resisting any attempt to murder, commit a felony, or to do great bodily injury upon any person; or

2. When committed in defense of habitation, property or person, at least in cases of violent felonies; or

3. When committed in defense of person, or of a wife or husband, parent, child, master, mistress, or servant of such person, at least in cases of violent felonies; or

4. When necessarily committed in attempting to apprehend any person for any felony, or in suppressing any riot, or in keeping and preserving the peace.

Pen. Code § 692: Lawful Resistance to the Commission of a Public Offense may be made:

1. By the party about to be injured;
2. By other parties.

Rule:

A defendant is not required to retreat. He or she is entitled to stand his or her ground and defend himself or herself, and if reasonably necessary, to pursue an assailant until the danger of (death/bodily injury/insert crime) has passed. This is so even if safety could have been achieved by retreating. (See below)

Case law:

A defendant has a right of self-defense if he "reasonably believed that he was in imminent danger of suffering bodily injury" through the application of unreasonable force applied by a person attempting to make a citizen's arrest. (People v. Adams (2009) 176 Cal.App.4th 946.)

"Self-defense" does not justify an assault absent a "an immediate threat of unlawful force, and the need for the action to be commensurate with the threat, with no more force used than reasonably necessary to meet it." Harsh, insulting, nor demeaning words alone are insufficient to trigger the right to use self-defense in return. (United States v. Urena (9th Cir. 2011) 659 F.3rd 903, 906-907; being called a "bitch" hours earlier did not justify a preemptive strike by defendant.)

Belief in future harm is not sufficient, no matter how great or likely the harm is believed to be. For the definition of "imminent," the jury instruction refers to the definition in People v. Arias (1989) 215 Cal.App.3d 1178, 1187 (overruled on another ground in People v. Humphrey (1996) 13 Cal.4th 1073, 1089), meaning that the danger is "immediate and present" and "must be instantly dealt with."

After defendant shot and killed his father and three other men who he believed were plotting to kill him, he was charged with multiple counts of special circumstance murder. He pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity and claimed that his delusional state caused him to believe that he was acting in self-defense. The Court held that an instruction on self-defense in the sanity phase must inform the jury that a defendant's delusion caused him to believe that he was in danger of great bodily injury or death that required the use of deadly force and that he would be legally justified in doing so. The trial court erred when it instructed the jury that defendant's beliefs also had to be reasonable; an "objective" standard. (People v. Leeds (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 822, 829-833.)

A trial court abused its discretion and deprived defendant, who was homeless, of his constitutional right to present a complete defense by excluding expert testimony concerning chronic homelessness during defendant's first degree murder trial, including a homeless man's "heightened perception" of a deadly threat. The expert's proposed opinion was relevant to defendant's actual belief, as well as the reasonableness of his belief, in the need to use lethal force to defendant himself. The expert's opinion was relevant to defendant's credibility. Because the subject of the expert opinion was sufficiently beyond common experience that it would have assisted the jury, and a reasonable probability existed that if presented with the expert's testimony on chronic homelessness the jury would have found defendant guilty of a lesser included offense, the error was prejudicial. (People v. Sotelo-Urena (2016) 4 Cal.App.5th 732.)

To justify an act of self-defense for [an assault charge], the defendant must have an honest and reasonable belief that bodily injury is about to be inflicted on him. (People v. Minifie (1996) 13 Cal.4th 1055, 1064; "[A]ny right of self-defense is limited to the use of such force as is reasonable under the circumstances.' " (Id. at p. 1065.)

> The reasonableness requirement "is determined from the point of view of a reasonable person in the defendant's position." (Ibid.)

Displays of deadly force are an unreasonable means of defending property where there is no home invasion or threat of death or serious bodily harm. Whether or not defendant's neighbors complied with civil rules and statutes did not entitle defendant to brandish a shotgun to protect against the removal of a fence. (People v. Chen (2020) 50 Cal.App.5th 952, 958-960.)

In a murder prosecution, evidence of the victim's propensity for violent aggression should have been admitted under Evid. Code § 1103(a)(1), because it was relevant to defendant's claim of self-defense. It did not matter whether defendant knew of the victim's arrests for domestic violence. The error in excluding the evidence in the close case was not harmless. Defendant was the only eyewitness and testified that he shot after the victim aggressively racked and aimed a semiautomatic at him. (People v. DelRio (2020) 54 Cal.App.5th 47.)

Defendant, who was 73 years of age and charged with shooting the victim, was entitled to have the jury consider his spinal problems and fear of paralysis in determining whether his belief in the need for self-defense was objectively reasonable. Those circumstances bore on what a reasonable person in a similar situation, with similar knowledge, would believe. (People v. Horn (2021) 63 Cal.App.5th 672.)

In a case where it was held that there was sufficient evidence of second degree murder to sustain defendant's conviction, the court noted that no error occurred in instructing on self-defense without adding "imminent danger of robbery" as a basis for self-defense since self-defense requires danger of death or great bodily injury—not danger of being robbed. It was also held that there was no error in not modifying the "imperfect self-defense" instruction to apply when a defendant's belief he needed to use deadly force was reasonable but the sort of force used was excessive and more than necessary to repel the attack, as no authority for distinguishing between kinds of deadly force. Also, there was no error in the trial court refusing an instruction on voluntary intoxication as the witness doctor talked about effects of methamphetamine and the lab results showed methamphetamine in defendant's blood but neither defendant nor the doctor discussed how effects of methamphetamine would have impacted the defendant. One justice wrote a concurring opinion explaining why on some other record he might not rule out the possibility that a threatened robbery could be sufficiently serious to qualify for a self-defense instruction. (People v. Morales (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 978.)

"Under the doctrine of self-defense, 'a homicide is justifiable and noncriminal where the actor possessed both an actual and reasonable belief in the need to defend.'" (Quoting People v. Stitely (2005) 35 Cal.4th 514, 551.) Because the defendant testified that he killed the victim in self-defense, the prosecution was required to prove he did not act in self-defense or imperfect self-defense. (People v. Morales (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 978, 988; citing People v. Frye (1992) 7 Cal.App.4th 1148, 1158–1159; prosecution required to disprove justifications or excuses.)

Defendant was charged with first degree murder. It was further alleged that defendant had personally used and discharged a firearm causing death. Defendant pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity and the case proceeded to trial. The jury found defendant guilty of first degree murder. The second jury found that defendant was legally sane at the time of the shooting. On appeal, defendant argued the trial court erred in refusing to instruct on imperfect self-defense because the evidence showed his fear of the victim was not based purely on delusion. The Court of Appeal, Third Dist., affirmed the conviction, agreeing with defendant that the trial court erred in refusing to instruct on imperfect self-defense because defendant's account of the shooting was not entirely delusional.

However, the Court of Appeal held that the error was harmless under Chapman v. California (1967) 386 U.S. 18 [17 L.Ed.2nd 705; 87 S.Ct. 824]. The California Supreme Court reversed, holding that when the record contains substantial evidence of imperfect self-defense, the trial court's failure to instruct on that theory amounts to constitutional error and is thus subject to review under the federal Chapman standard. The Court further held that the court of appeal's harmless error analysis did not comport with the standards for evaluating prejudice required under the Chapman "beyond a reasonable doubt standard." Without an instruction on imperfect self-defense, the jurors were never informed that if they harbored a reasonable doubt whether defendant was operating under an actual but unreasonable belief in the need for self-defense, they would have had to acquit him of murder for lack of malice. The court of appeal's harmless error analysis demonstrated that it misapprehended the standard that Chapman requires. (People v. Schuller (2023) 15 Cal.5th 237.)

Pen. Code § 693: Party About to be Injured; circumstances in which force is authorized: By the party, in what cases and to what extent:

1. To prevent an offense against his person, or his family, or some member thereof.

2. To prevent an illegal attempt by force to take or injure property in his lawful possession.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code § 245, for assault with a deadly weapon (i.e., a knife), the video evidence supported the jury's rejection of a self-defense claim for want of an objective reasonableness because it showed that the victim did not advance on defendant or otherwise act in a physically threatening manner but rather was looking away from defendant when he was stabbed. peace officer, it is the duty of such person to refrain from using force or any weapon to resist such arrest."

> Every citizen has duty to submit to lawful arrest, and when an arrest is lawful, the offense of resisting officer can be committed without employing actual violence or direct force. (In re Bacon (1966) 240 Cal. > > In People v. Southard, supra, the Court held that the rule of In re Richard G. and People v. Cox pertain to a "motion to suppress" (pursuant to P.C. § 1538.5) only. At trial, the fact of a defendant's commission of an illegal act (such as battery on the arresting officer) subsequent to, or during an officer's illegal act (e.g., use of excessive force or an illegal arrest) is not excused by the fact that the officer had acted illegally. (An exception to this rule is when the defendant is reasonably acting in self-defense.) Neither case supports the argument that the same rule applies to trial, where the prosecution is obligated to prove beyond a reasonable doubt, each element of a charged offense, and the relevant jury instructions that are to be given to a jury in determining guilt or innocence.

Also, an excessive use of force used by the officer after the arrest does not itself negate the "in the performance of his (or her) duties" element of P.C. §§ 148(a) (or 69). (People v. Williams (2018) 26 Cal.App.5th 71.)

The use of deadly force is unreasonable if used after an arrestee has submitted and is no longer resisting. (Strand v. Minchuk (7th Cir. IN 2018) 908 F.3rd 300.)

Where police officers act unlawfully (e.g., using excessive force, or arresting or detaining a suspect without sufficient probable cause or reasonable suspicion, respectively), it has been held that the officers are not acting in the performance of their duties (an element of the resisting arrest statute; P.C. § 148(a)(1); see CALCRIM Nos. 2656 & 2670.)), and that as such, a suspect may use reasonable force in defending himself from the use of unreasonable force or in resisting the detention or arrest. Pen. Code § 835: Restraint of Detained or Arrested Person: "The person arrested may be subjected to such restraint as is reasonable for his arrest and detention."

Pen. Code § 835a: Reasonable Force to Effect Arrest; Resistance:

(a) The Legislature finds and declares all of the following:

(1) That the authority to use physical force, conferred on peace officers by this section, is a serious responsibility that shall be exercised judiciously and with respect for human rights and dignity and for the sanctity of every human life. The Legislature further finds and declares that every person has a right to be free from excessive use of force by officers acting under color of law.

(2) As set forth below, it is the intent of the Legislature that peace officers use deadly force only when necessary in defense of human life. In determining whether deadly force is necessary, officers shall evaluate each situation in light of the particular circumstances of each case, and shall use other available resources and techniques if reasonably safe and feasible to an objectively reasonable officer.

> Note: This, in effect, raises the standard for when the use of deadly force is lawful from one of "reasonableness" (see Graham v. Connor (1989) 490 U.S. 386, 396-397 [109 S.Ct. 1865; 104 L.Ed.2nd 443].) to "when necessary in defense of human life;" arguably, a higher threshold.

(3) That the decision by a peace officer to use force shall be evaluated carefully and thoroughly, in a manner that reflects the gravity of that authority and the serious consequences of the use of force by peace officers, in order to ensure that officers use force consistent with law and agency policies.

(4) That the decision by a peace officer to use force shall be evaluated from the perspective of a reasonable officer in the same situation, based on the totality of the circumstances known to or perceived by the officer at the time, rather than with the benefit of hindsight, and that the totality of the circumstances shall account for occasions when officers may be forced to make quick judgments about using force.

(5) That individuals with physical, mental health, developmental, or intellectual disabilities are significantly more likely to experience greater levels of physical force during police interactions, as their disability may affect their ability to understand or comply with commands from peace officers. It is estimated that individuals with disabilities are involved in between one-third and one-half of all fatal encounters with law enforcement.

(b) Any peace officer who has reasonable cause to believe that the person to be arrested has committed a public offense may use objectively reasonable force to effect the arrest, to prevent escape, or to overcome resistance. (Italics added.)

(c)

(1) Notwithstanding subdivision (b), a peace officer is justified in using deadly force upon another person only when the officer reasonably believes, based on the totality of the circumstances, that such force is necessary for either of the following reasons:

(A) To defend against an imminent threat of death or serious bodily injury to the officer or to another person.

(B) To apprehend a fleeing person for any felony that threatened or resulted in death or serious bodily injury, if the officer reasonably believes that the person will cause death or serious bodily injury to another unless immediately apprehended. Where feasible, a peace officer shall, prior to the use of force, make reasonable efforts to identify themselves as a peace officer and to warn that deadly force may be used, unless the officer has objectively reasonable grounds to believe the person is aware of those facts.

(2) A peace officer shall not use deadly force against a person based on the danger that person poses to themselves, if an objectively reasonable officer would believe the person does not pose an imminent threat of death or serious bodily injury to the peace officer or to another person.

(d) A peace officer who makes or attempts to make an arrest need not retreat or desist from their efforts by reason of the resistance or threatened resistance of the person being arrested. A peace officer shall not be deemed an aggressor or lose the right to self-defense by the use of objectively reasonable force in compliance with subdivisions (b) and (c) to effect the arrest or to prevent escape or to overcome resistance. For the purposes of this subdivision, "retreat" does not mean tactical repositioning or other de-escalation tactics.

(e) For purposes of this section, the following definitions shall apply:

(1) "Deadly force" means any use of force that creates a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily injury, including, but not limited to, the discharge of a firearm.

(2) A threat of death or serious bodily injury is "imminent" when, based on the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable officer in the same situation would believe that a person has the present ability, opportunity, and apparent intent to immediately cause death or serious bodily injury to the peace officer or another person. An imminent harm is not merely a fear of future harm, no matter how great the fear and no matter how great the likelihood of the harm, but is one that, from appearances, must be instantly confronted and addressed.

(3) "Totality of the circumstances" means all facts known to the peace officer at the time, including the conduct of the officer and the subject leading up to the use of deadly force.

Case Law:

An officer is not required to desist in his or her efforts merely because the accused offers some resistance. (People v. Hardwick (1928) 204 Cal. 582, 587.)

Use of excessive force by an officer gives the arrestee the right to use self-defense, and negates the element of "acting in the performance of his or her duties" for any potential charge where this element must be proved. (E.g.; P.C. §§ 148(a), 243(b) & (c), and 245(c) & (d); see People v. Olguin (1981) 119 Cal.App.3rd 39, 44-45.)

However, an excessive use of force used by the officer after the arrest does not itself negate the "in the performance of his (or her) duties" element of P.C. §§ 148(a) (or 69). (People v. Williams (2018) 26 Cal.App.5th 71.)

Pen. Code § 843: *Arrest by Warrant; Use of Force: "When the arrest is being made by an officer under the authority of a warrant, after information of the intention to make the arrest, if the person to be arrested either flees or forcibly resists, the officer may use all necessary means to effect the arrest."

Pen. Code § 844: Knock and Notice: "To make an arrest, a private person, if the offense is a felony, and in all cases a peace officer, may break open the door or window of the house in which the person to be arrested is, or in which they have reasonable grounds for believing the person to be, after having demanded admittance and explained the purpose for which admittance is desired."

Note: This is California's "knock and notice" statute, for making arrests. (See "Knock and Notice," under "Arrests" (Chapter 5), above, a "Knock and Notice," under "Searches With a Search Warrant (Chapter 10), below.

Pen. Code § 845: Use of Force to Exit a House: "Any person who has lawfully entered a house for the purpose of making an arrest, may break open the door or window thereof if detained therein, when necessary for the purpose of liberating himself, and an officer may do the same, when necessary for the purpose of liberating a person who, acting in his aid, lawfully entered for the purpose of making an arrest, and is detained therein."

Pen. Code § 846: Securing Weapons: "Any person making an arrest may take from the person arrested all offensive weapons which he may have about his person, and must deliver them to the magistrate before whom he is taken."

Pen. Code § 490.5(f)(2): Use of Force by Merchant, Library Employee or Theater Owner: A merchant, library employee or theater owner may use a reasonable amount of non-deadly force necessary to protect himself and to prevent escape or prevent loss of tangible or intangible property.

Use of Force in Making a Blood Draw*:

Rule: Where otherwise lawful (see McNeely, below), using physical force to effect a blood draw, so long as the officers "act reasonably and use only that degree of force which is necessary to overcome a defendant's resistance in taking a blood sample," is lawful. (People v. Rossetti (2014) 230 Cal.App.4th 1070, 1077-1079; quoting Carlton v. Superior Court (1985)170 Cal.App.3rd 1182, 1187-1191.)

Examples:

In Rossetti, four officers held a handcuffed defendant on the floor when defendant was "kicking around and not doing what [he was] told to do," while a licensed phlebotomist drew blood. The use of force was upheld as reasonable. (People v. Rossetti, supra.)

Also, in Carlton, a struggling defendant was held by six officers to the floor in a "temporary carotid restraint" position, with his face to the floor, as blood was withdrawn by a registered nurse. The force used was upheld as reasonable. (Carlton v. Superior Court, supra.)

The force used was upheld as reasonable when a resisting defendant was restrained by five police officers as a technician removed the blood sample from his left arm, without any showing that the officers "introduced any wantonness, violence or beatings." (People v. Ryan (1981) 116 Cal.App.3rd 168.)

But see People v Kraft (1970) 3 Cal.App.3rd 890, where defendant refused to submit to a blood test. Taken to a hospital, defendant resisted being taken inside, resulting in an officer striking him in the cheek with a closed fist. While being carried to a bed in an examination room, defendant fell or was pushed to the floor. While on the floor, police immobilized him while a physician withdrew blood. One officer held defendant's arm while also holding a scissor lock on his legs. It was acknowledged in testimony that defendant's behavior had not been aggressive but was "defensive." The court concluded that the officers' "strong arm" tactics were "aggressive beyond all need" and exceeded the limits of permissible force. (Id., at pp. 895-899.)

McNeely Limitation*: The Supreme Court has held that being arrested for driving while under the influence does not allow for a non-consensual warrantless blood test absent exigent circumstances beyond the fact that the blood was metabolizing at a normal rate. (Missouri v. McNeely (2013) 569 U.S. 141 [133 S.Ct. 1552; 185 L.Ed.2nd 696].)

See "Searches of Persons" (Chapter 11), below.

Deadly Force, In General:

"Deadly Force" Defined: "Force that the actor uses with the purpose of causing or that he knows to create a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily injury." (Emphasis added; See Model Penal Code § 3.11(2) (1962))

See P.C. § 835a(a)(2), above: "(I)t is the intent of the Legislature that peace officers use deadly force only when necessary in defense of human life. In determining whether deadly force is necessary, officers shall evaluate each situation in light of the particular circumstances of each case, and shall use other available resources and techniques if reasonably safe and feasible to an objectively reasonable officer." (Italics added).

Note: To be classified as "deadly force," it is not necessary that death actually occur. See below.

Causing Death: When the use of force results in the death of another person, a "homicide," or a "killing of a human being by another human being," has occurred. (People v. Antick (1975) 15 Cal.3rd 79, 87.)

CALCRIM, #500, "Homicide: General Principles."

A Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Violation occurs only if a police officer's actions deprive the decedent's children of a "liberty interest;" i.e., their "right to familial association." Per prior case law, all children have a Fourteenth Amendment due process "liberty interest" in the "companionship and society" of a parent. The due process clause is implicated if an officer's actions "shock the conscience." Conscience-shocking actions are those taken with (1) "deliberate indifference" or (2) a "purpose to harm . . . unrelated to legitimate law enforcement objectives." The former involves those circumstances where the officer has the opportunity to deliberate; i.e., think about what he is doing. The latter involves those circumstances where an officer cannot practically deliberate, such as where he has to make a "snap judgment because of an escalating situation." (A. D. v. State of California Highway Patrol (9th Cir. 2013) 712 F.3rd 446, 452-454, 456-460; where a CHP officer shot and killed the plaintiffs' mother following a high-speed chase after she was boxed in and had no means of escape, but was continuing to ram a CHP vehicle with her car. A jury verdict for the plaintiffs was upheld. The officer was determined not to be protected by qualified immunity. (Id., at pp. 453-460.)

Non-Criminal Homicides: Not all homicides, however, are criminal. The non-criminal homicides are commonly grouped into two general categories; "excusable" (Pen. Code § 195; when committed by "accident or misfortune") and "justifiable" (Pen. Code §§ 196 et seq.), when authorized by law.

Case Law:

> The use of deadly force, and the resulting killing of a human being, may be "justifiable" (i.e., not illegal) when committed as authorized by statute, and as limited by case law. (See People v. Velez (1983) 144 Cal.App.3rd 558, 566-568, People v. Frye (1992) 7 Cal.4th 1148, 1155; and CALCRIM # 505-509 (Justifiable) and # 510-511 (Excusable*) Homicide.)
>
> "Self-defense, when based on a reasonable belief that killing is necessary to avert an imminent threat of death or great bodily injury, is a complete justification, and such a killing is not a crime." (People v. Elmore (2014) 59 Cal.4th 121, 132.)
>
> See People v. McNally (2015) 236 Cal.App.4th 1419, 1425, upholding a second degree "implied malice" murder conviction where defendant claimed the shooting was an accident: "(T)here is a difference between an 'accidental discharge' and a 'negligent discharge' where the shooter is doing something he or she should not be doing with the firearm. Appellant brandished the loaded pistol and pointed it at (the victim). The jury was instructed that the killing is an accident if appellant 'was doing a lawful act in a lawful way' and 'acting with usual and ordinary caution.' (CALCRIM No. 510.) There is no evidence that appellant (in this case) was doing a lawful act in a lawful way. Appellant's intentional act of pointing a loaded pistol at the victim was, at the least, negligent. It was dangerous to human life. The natural and probable consequences of the act created a probable risk of harm."

The trial court's refusal to give the standard jury instruction related to self-defense (See CALCRIM # 505: "If you find that ___ <insert name of decedent/victim> threatened or harmed the defendant [or others] in the past, you may consider that information in deciding whether the defendant's conduct and beliefs were reasonable].") because "no evidence showed defendant was aware of [the victim's] prior conduct." (People v. Bates (2019) 35 Cal.App.5th 1.)

Despite evidence that an officer's fatal shooting of the deceased was unreasonable, absent evidence that it done with an improper motive (e.g., in retaliation for something the deceased may have done), the force used was held not to constitute a due process violation. (Nehad v. Browder (9th Cir. 2019) 929 F.3rd 1125, 1139-1140.)

"Although '[o]bjective reasonableness is one means of assessing whether' conduct meets the 'shocks the conscience' standard, an unreasonable use of force does not necessarily constitute a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process violation. Brittain v. Hansen, 451 F.3rd 982, 991 n.1 (9th Cir. 2006) (citing Moreland v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Dep't, 159 F.3rd 365, 371 n.4 (9th Cir. 1998) ('[I]t may be possible for an officer's conduct to be objectively unreasonable yet still not infringe the more demanding standard that governs substantive due process claims.')." (Ibid; citing Gonzalez v. City of Anaheim (9th Cir. 2014) 747 F.3rd 789, 793.)

Officers' use of deadly force (shooting at armed robbers' fleeing vehicle) during a high speed chase was reasonable as a matter of law under Pen. Code, § 835a (as it read prior to January 1, 2020). Therefore, a hostage taken from a bank robbery did not have claims against them for injuries sustained when she jumped from the fleeing vehicle to avoid being shot by the police during the chase. One of the robbers was firing an assault rifle, providing probable cause to believe that he posed a significant threat to pursuing officers and to bystanders. A general order on when officers were prohibited from firing at moving or fleeing vehicles did not establish the standard of care for using deadly force. To the extent the claims against the city were vicarious to the officers' actions, the city's motion for summary judgment was also properly granted. (Koussaya v. City of Stockton (2020) 54 Cal.App.5th 909.)

However, where the speed of the deceased's vehicle was reasonable, and despite him carrying an officer off with him and while refusing to stop, the officer's use of deadly force was held to be unreasonable and a violation of the Fourth Amendment. But because there was no legal precedent in the Sixth Circuit for such a situation, the officer was entitled to a finding of qualified immunity. (Stewart v. City of Euclid (6th Cir. OH, 2020) 970 F.3rd 667.)

If deputy sheriffs did indeed shoot the sixty-four-year-old decedent without objective provocation, as the decedent was holding onto his walker with his gun trained on the ground, as plaintiff alleged, then a reasonable jury could determine that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment by shooting and killing him. The officers were therefore not entitled to qualified immunity. (George v. Morris (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 829, 836-839.)

> Where it is shown, however, that the suspect did in fact point a firearm at officers, the use of deadly force is justified. (Id., at p. 838; "When an individual points his gun 'in the officers' direction,' the Constitution undoubtedly entitles the officer to respond with deadly force."

The use of deadly force by shooting into a subject's vehicle in a dangerous high-speed chase situation is lawful so long as the danger continues to exist (Plumhoff v. Rickard (2014) 572 U.S. 765, 766 [134 S. Ct. 2012; 188 L.Ed.2nd 1056].), but not so when the subject is surrounded and poses no immediate danger to others. (A.D. v. State of California Highway Patrol (9th Cir. 2013) 712 F.3rd 446.)

A police officer violates the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause if he kills a suspect when acting with the purpose to harm, unrelated to a legitimate law enforcement objective. An officer was properly found to be civilly liable after shooting and killing the decedent (plaintiffs' mother) at the end of a high speed chase, but where the decedent was blocked in without a means of escape, and where no weapons were observed. (Id, at pp. 452-454, 456-460.)

> The officer held not to be entitled to qualified immunity. (Id., at pp. 454-455.)

Where officers shot and killed the plaintiff's father, there was no violation of the plaintiff/minor's Fourteenth Amendment rights because there was no evidence that the deputies acted with a purpose to harm unrelated to the legitimate law enforcement objective of defending themselves when the decedent approached with a knife in his hand. However, remand of the plaintiff/minor's negligent wrongful death claim was required because a reasonable jury could conclude that the use of deadly force was not objectively reasonable under the circumstances. (Hayes v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 1223, 1229-1235; a negligence civil action.)

> An officer's pre-shooting conduct is properly included in the totality of the circumstances surrounding his use of deadly force.

> The officer's duty to act reasonably when using deadly force extends to pre-shooting conduct when officers shot a suicidal person who approached them with a knife in hand. (Id., at pp. 1235-1236; see also Mendez v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2018) 897 F.3rd 1067, 1073, 1082-1084.)

> See Tabares v. City of Huntington Beach (9th Cir. 2021) 988 F.3rd 1119, holding that California's negligence rules are different than the Fourth Amendment excessive (i.e., "deadly") force rules, holding that the former may be violated despite an officer's use of force being reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. Citing Hayes, supra, at pg. 254, the Court noted that "(o)fficers are liable (under California's negligence standards) 'if the tactical conduct and decisions leading up to the use of deadly force show, as part of the totality of circumstances, that the use of deadly force was unreasonable.'" (Italics in original.) Fourth Amendment rules generally preclude the consideration of pre-incident decisions. (See Scott v. Henrich (9th Cir. 1994) 39 F.3rd 912, 914.)
> > "Thus, California negligence law regarding the use of deadly force overall is 'broader than federal Fourth Amendment law.'" (Tabares v. City of Huntington Beach, supra, at p. 1125; quoting Villegas ex rel. C.V. v. City of Anaheim (9th Cir. 2016) 823 F.3rd 1252, 1257, fn.6.)

A police officer who shoots a person is not entitled to qualified immunity from a father's Fourteenth Amendment claim for deprivation of a familial relationship where the evidence shows that the decedent was already subdued, creating a genuine issue as to whether the officer's actions were required by a legitimate law enforcement purpose. (Johnson v. Bay Area Rapid Transit Dist. (9th Cir. 2013) 724 F.3rd 1159, 1168-1170.)

Shooting a mentally ill, mid-50's year-old-woman who threatened to kill the officers as she aggressively moved towards them (coming to within two to four feet) while wielding a knife, held to be legally justified as a matter of law under the circumstances. (City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan (2015) 575 U.S. 600, 612-617 [135 S.Ct. 1765; 191 L.Ed.2nd 856].)

> The Court declined to decide whether making a second entry of plaintiff's room, having initially backed out when confronted by the knife-wielding plaintiff, was constitutional under the circumstances, it not having been briefed on appeal, but rather (in overruling the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal) found that the officers had qualified immunity from civil liability in that the officers' choice to reenter the room without waiting for backup or otherwise planning a strategy did not violate clearly established law. (Id., at pp. 612-616.)

Where a police officer shot and killed plaintiff's mentally disturbed son seven times after the two were involved in a physical altercation, the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court's summary judgment for defendant police officer on plaintiff's state law negligence claim. The Court first noted that California negligence law regarding the use of deadly force overall is broader than federal Fourth Amendment law. Under California law, an officer's pre-shooting decisions can render his behavior unreasonable under the totality of the circumstances, even if his use of deadly force at the moment of the shooting might be reasonable in isolation. Federal law, however, generally focuses on the tactical conduct at the time of shooting, though a prior constitutional violation may proximately cause a later excessive use of force. The Court held that in this case, the district court erroneously conflated the legal standards under the Fourth Amendment and California negligence law. Specifically, the district court; (1) inaccurately concluded that plaintiff did not point to any evidence probative of the fact that the decedent exhibited symptoms of mental illness that would have been apparent to the officer; (2) did not consider that a jury could find the officer's pre-shooting conduct unreasonable under California law, given the decedent's potential mental illness; and (3) misinterpreted the Ninth Circuit precedent set forth in Billington v. Smith (9th Cir. 2002) 292 F.3rd 1177, in assessing the reasonableness of Officer Esparza's conduct at the time of the shooting. The Court held that in considering all the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, a reasonable jury could conclude that the officer should have suspected the decedent had mental health issues and that he unreasonably failed to follow police protocol when dealing with potentially mentally ill persons before using force. Finally, the officer's decision to shoot without warning six times—and then a seventh—could be found by a jury to be unreasonable. (Tabares v. City of Huntington Beach (9th Cir. 2021) 988 F.3rd 1119.)

Specific Weapons or Techniques in the Use of Force:

The Taser (or "Electronic Control Weapon" ["ECW"]):

"TASER" is an acronym for "Thomas A. Swift's Electric Rifle." (Marquez v. City of Phoenix (9th Cir. 2012) 693 F.3rd 1167. 1170, fn. 1.)

"When a taser is used in drive[-]stun mode, the operator removes the dart cartridge and pushes two electrode contacts located on the front of the taser directly against the victim. In this mode, the taser delivers an electric shock to the victim, but it does not cause an override of the victim's central nervous system as it does in dart-mode." (Mattos v. Agarano (9th Cir. 2011) 661 F.3rd 433, 443; Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 869, fn. 2.)

Sometimes referred to as a "conductive electrical weapon" ("CEW"), or stun gun. (People v. Mackreth (2020) 58 Cal.App.5th 317, 323, fn. 5.)

Pen. Code § 13660 (AB 1406); effective January 1, 2023: Wearing of an Electroshock Device by Law Enforcement:

(a) Any law enforcement agency that authorizes peace officers to carry an electroshock device shall prohibit that device from being holstered or otherwise carried on the same lateral side of the officer's body as the officer's primary firearm is holstered or otherwise carried.

(b) As used in this section, the following terms have the following meanings:

(1) "Electroshock device" means a taser, stun gun, or similar weapon that is designed to temporarily incapacitate a person through the controlled delivery of an electric shock, and is designed to be held in a manner similar to a pistol and operated using a finger trigger.

(2) "Law enforcement agency" means any agency or department of the state, or any political subdivision thereof, that employs any peace officer described in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2.

Note: The purpose of this statutory requirement is to reduce "weapon confusion," whereby an officer intends to use a Taser or stun gun but mistakenly draws a firearm instead.

Case Law:

An officer used a Taser to subdue the plaintiff after he was stopped for a seat belt violation. The Taser, model X26, using compressed nitrogen to propel a pair of "probes" (i.e., aluminum darts tipped with stainless steel barbs connected to the X26 by insulated wires) at its target, was held to be a form of "non-lethal force," constituting an "intermediate or medium, though not insignificant, quantum of force." (Bryan v. MacPherson (9th Cir. 2010) 630 F.3rd 805, 823-833.)

> Plaintiff was obviously irate, yelling expletives and other "gibberish," and hitting his thighs, while dressed only in boxer shorts and tennis shoes. Plaintiff got out of his car after being ordered to stay in it. He also may have taken a step towards the officer although he was still 15 to 25 feet away from him. Use of the Taser on the plaintiff, who never verbally threatened the officer nor made any attempt to flee, was held to be excessive under these circumstances. (Ibid.)

The use of a Taser to subdue non-threatening, although uncooperative, suspects, depending upon the circumstances, absent a threat to the safety of the officers or others, may constitute excessive force and a Fourth Amendment violation. (Mattos v. Agarano (9th Cir. 2011) 661 F.3rd 433: Two cases; one involving the Tasing of the victim in a domestic violence situation where she was the victim, and the other being of an uncooperative driver who refused to sign a traffic citation. Both cases resulted in a finding of a Fourth Amendment excessive force violation, but with qualified immunity for the officers, the incidents happening before there was any relevant case law.)

> The Court cited three prior cases, being the only federal cases on the issue, where it had been held that the use of a Taser was not a Fourth Amendment violation; i.e., Russo v. City of Cincinnati (6th Cir. 1992) 953 F.2nd 1036; Hinton v. City of Elwood (10th Cir. 1993) 997 F.2nd 774; and Draper v. Reynolds (11th Cir. 2004) 369 F.3rd 1270. These three cases, respectively, involved officers being attacked by a suicidal, homicidal, mental patient who was armed with two knives, a violently resisting suspect who was flailing at, kicking, and biting the arresting officers, and a lone officer being confronted by an angry, confrontational, and agitated truck driver who refused five times to produce certain documents as he paced back and forth, yelling at the officer. (Id., at pp. 446-448.)

Punching and Tasing a non-resisting and compliant arrestee who the officer knew was emotionally troubled and physically ill, and continued to do so when the arrestee did no more than flinch from the pain and cry for help, and then asphyxiating him by sitting on his chest, was unreasonable force. The officer also was not entitled to qualified immunity under the circumstances. (Mendoza v. City of West Covina (2012) 206 Cal.App.4th 702, 714-720.)

Using a Taser in nine five-second cycles, two while it was ineffectively deployed in probe mode and seven when it was deployed in drive-stun mode, was held to be reasonable where officers were attempting to rescue a three-year-old child from a suspect's grasp (a "chokehold"), and to subdue the violently resisting suspect who died as a result. (Marquez v. City of Phoenix (9th Cir. 2012) 693 F.3rd 1167, 1173-1177.)

> The Court further determined that the warnings provided on the Taser itself, which included the possibility of death, were sufficient as a matter of law, at least in so far as required under Arizona statutory law. (Id., at pp. 1172-1173.)

An officer was held not to be entitled to qualified immunity from Fourth Amendment claims in a federal civil rights lawsuit arriving out of a detention of individuals during an investigation of a completed misdemeanor because there was no likelihood for repeated danger and there was a dispute as to whether it was reasonable to threaten to use a Taser under the circumstances. (Johnson v. Bay Area Rapid Transit Dist. (9th Cir. 2013) 724 F.3rd 1159, 1168-1170.)

Use of a Taser in dart mode "(involves) an intermediate level of force with 'physiological effects, high levels of pain, and foreseeable risks of physical injury.' (Citation omitted)" Using a Taser on a subject who was standing up to 37 feet away, and who hadn't reacted quickly enough when told to "back away," held to be excessive force under the circumstances. (Gravelet-Blondin v. Shelton (9th Cir. 2013) 728 F.3rd 1086, 1090-1092.)

> The Court further noted that the officer in this case was not entitled to qualified immunity in that the rules on the use of Tasers is now well-established in the law. (Id., pp. 1092-1096; describing the many cases on this issue.)

Use of a Taser on a jail prisoner in order to subdue him preparatory to an extraction of a baggie from his rectum during a visual body cavity search held to be unreasonable. (United States v. Fowlkes (9th Cir. 2015) 804 F.3rd 954, 967-968.)

Using a Taser to remove a non-threatening mental patient from his grip onto a pole held to be excessive. The Court held that a Taser, being a "serious use of force," like a gun, a baton, or other weapon, is expected to inflict pain or injury when deployed. It, therefore, may only be deployed when a police officer is confronted with an exigency that creates an immediate safety risk and that is reasonably likely to be cured by using the Taser. The subject of a seizure does not create such a risk simply because he is doing something that can be characterized as resistance, even when that resistance includes physically preventing an officer's manipulations of his body. Erratic behavior and mental illness do not necessarily create a safety risk either. To the contrary, when a seizure is intended solely to prevent a mentally ill individual from harming himself, the officer effecting the seizure has a lessened interest in deploying potentially harmful force. (Estate of Armstrong v. Village of Pinehurst (4th Cir. 2016) 810 F.3rd 892; officers held to have qualified immunity, however, in that the true was not yet well-settled in the law.)

"Using a Taser in dart mode constitutes an "intermediate, significant level of force." (Citation). ¶ The pain is intense, is felt throughout the body, and is administered by effectively commandeering the victim's muscles and nerves. Beyond the experience of pain, Tasers result in immobilization, disorientation, loss of balance, and weakness, even after the electrical current has ended. Moreover, tasering a person may result in serious injuries when intense pain and loss of muscle control cause a sudden and uncontrolled fall. (Citation) The experience of being shot with a Taser is a "painful and frightening blow." (Thomas v. Dillard (9th Cir. 2016) 818 F.3rd 864, 889-991; holding that the use of a Taser on an uncooperative, but illegally detained suspect, even though the suspected crime might have been domestic violence-related, was excessive.)

In confronting a very large man (more than six feet tall and over 250 pounds) who was likely under the influence of drugs and was violently resisting arrest, the officer, in the resulting civil suit, was entitled to qualified immunity for his use of a Taser even under plaintiff's version of the facts, particularly where the officer used the Taser only once and in the less incapacitating drive-stun mode. (Isayeva v. Sacramento Sheriff's Department (9th Cir. 2017) 872 F.3rd 938, 947-950.)

Continually tasing a subject for over 90 seconds, even after he was on the ground and had gone limp, while being subdued by five officers, actions which contributed to the subject's death, was held to present a triable issue in a subsequent civil suit brought by the decedent's parents. *(Jones v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Department (9th Cir. 2017) 873 F.3rd 1123, 1128-1132.)

Reversing a trial court's granting of summary judgment, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that the evidence did not support the conclusion that no reasonable jury could find the use of force within the home excessive. Plaintiff remained inside the home. He did not threaten or advance toward the officers. Despite plaintiff's lack of resistance, an officer threw plaintiff across the back room while another officer tasered him several times in drive-stun mode. A reasonable jury could find this, under the circumstances, to be excessive force. (Bonivert v. City of Clarkston (9th Cir. 2018) 883 F.3rd 865, 879-881.)

Using a Taser in dart mode on an auto-theft suspect when the suspect, who complied with orders to get down on his knees but refused numerous demands to lie on the ground all the while becoming more belligerent, was held to be reasonable force. The offending officer was entitled to qualified immunity for tasing him under these circumstances. (Shanaberg v. Licking County (6th Cir. OH, 2019) 936 F.3rd 453: The plaintiff was subsequently determined to be the lawful owner of the car, the car having been recovered but the computerized records not updated.)

The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals held that civil defendant officers acted reasonably under the circumstances where they tased plaintiff's son (i.e., the "victim"), high on methamphetamine and acting erratically, about eight times, contributing to his demise. The Court concluded that the officers did not violate the victim's right to be free from excessive force and were therefore entitled to qualified immunity. The Court found that the officers were justified in their use of force against the victim because the victim's aggression did not stop until after the final shot of the Taser. The court added that the fact that the victim was tased three times in drive-stun mode while handcuffed was reasonable because the victim continued to resist the officers while he was in handcuffs. The court recognized that a handcuffed suspect can still pose a danger to the officers and that it has "allowed the use of Tasers on detainees in handcuffs in appropriate circumstances." Finally, the court held that the officers' decision to remove the victim's handcuffs before securing him in the isolation cell was reasonable. First, the officers testified that they wanted the victim to be able to move about the cell freely, as they were concerned that if he remained handcuffed in his drug-influenced state he may have fallen while cuffed and possibly injure his arms, wrists or head. Next, the court found that it was reasonable for the officers to be concerned that the victim might be able to maneuver his hands and body in such a way as to use the cuffs as a weapon when someone entered the cell. (Franklin v. Franklin County (8th Cir. 2020) 956 F.3rd 1060.)

The use of a Taser by a police officer on a non-violent misdemeanant who is not actively resisting arrest and without giving subject an opportunity to comply with the officer's command to roll over and submit to being handcuffed, is objectively unreasonable. The officer was held not to be entitled to qualified immunity when sued by the person who was tased. (Emmett v. Armstrong (10th Cir. 2020) 973 F.3rd 1127.)

Following a high speed chase where the vehicle plaintiff was in (as a passenger) crashed into another car, the pursuing officer Tased the plaintiff who was sitting in the back seat, rocking back and forth, and ignoring the officer's commands to show his hands. The Court held that the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity in that there was no sign of verbal hostility or physical resistance by the plaintiff. While the officer might have had a suspicion that the plaintiff was armed (based upon ammunition being thrown from the car during the chase), he did not attribute the plaintiff's rocking back-and-forth as verbal hostility or physical resistance. In addition, it was not disputed that plaintiff was found slumped over in the backseat following the collision. The court added that at the time of the incident it was clearly established that plaintiff had a constitutional right not be tased where he showed no resistance other than a passive failure to respond to an order to show his hands, and where an obvious reason not to respond was the shock of the collision. (Browning v. Edmonson County (6th Cir. KY 2021) 18 F.4th 516.)

In Betts v. Brennan (5th Cir. 2022) 22 F.4th 577, the Fifth Circuit found the officer's repeated warnings that defendant would be tased if he did not comply with the officer's commands during what should have been a simple traffic stop except for the defendant's refusal to cooperate and comply with the officer's commands, was a factor to consider in determining that the officer's eventual use of his Taser was reasonable.

The use of a Taser in dart mode constitutes an intermediate, significant level of force. (Citing Bryan v. MacPherson (9th Cit. 2010) 630 F.3rd 805, 826.) In contrast, a Taser used in drive stun mode "delivers an electric shock to the victim, but it does not cause an override of the victim's central nervous system as it does in dart-mode." (Citing Mattos v. Agarano (9th Cir. 2011) 661 F.3d 433, 443.) (Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ, 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006, at p. 15; finding the six uses of a Taser, including four drive stuns and two darts, as well as the foot strikes, constitutes serious intrusions upon the plaintiff's liberty and thus must be justified by a commensurately serious state interest.)

Chemical Irritants; Pepper Spray, Pepperball Guns and Tear Gas:

Case Law:

The use of pepper spray on non-violent demonstrators was determined to be excessive where there were less intrusive alternatives. (Headwaters Forest Defense v. County of Humboldt (9th Cir. 2002) 276 F.3rd 1125.)

It has been held that squirting pepper spray randomly into a crowd of demonstrators where there was insufficient cause to believe the demonstrators posed an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others might be excessive and expose the offending police officers to civil liability. (Lamb v. Decatur (C.D. Ill. 1996) 947 F.Supp. 1261.)

However, the use of a "chemical irritant" against party-goers who are impeding a lawful arrest and fighting with law enforcement officers, particularly after a warning, was not improper, or excessive. (Jackson v. City of Bremerton (9th Cir. 2001) 268 F.3rd 646, 651-653.)

The use of pepper spray on fighting prison inmates in a maximum security prison, in an attempt to stop the fight, was held to be reasonable, although the failure to provide medical attention to other inmates who might also have been affected by the pepper spray vapors, showing a "deliberate indifference" to their health, will subject correctional authorities to potential civil liability. (Clement v. Gomez (9th Cir. 2002) 298 F.3rd 898.)

The use of pepper spray and a baton on a non-combative, albeit uncooperative, citizen during a traffic stop is excessive force and a Fourth Amendment violation. (Young v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2011) 655 F.3rd 1156.)

In an appeal of a denial of a summary judgment motion, it was ruled that intentionally firing a pepperball projectile at a group of demonstrators, hitting plaintiff in the eye, was a seizure of the plaintiff despite the fact that he was not specifically targeted.

Also, absent evidence that the crowd was violent, committing a crime, threatening the officers, or actively avoiding arrest, the use of force by firing pepperballs into a crowed of party goers was excessive. (Nelson v. City of Davis (9th Cir. 2012) 685 F.3rd 867.)

> Pepperball guns are similar to paintball guns that fire rounds containing oleoresin capsicum ("OC") powder, also known as pepper spray. These rounds are fired at a velocity of 350 to 380 feet per second, with the capacity to fire seven rounds per second. They break open on impact and release OC powder into the air, which has an effect similar to mace or pepper spray. Pepperballs therefore combine the kinetic impact of a projectile with the sensory discomfort of pepper spray. (Id., at p. 873.)

Officers are not entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity as to an inmate's Eighth Amendment excessive force claim because, under the Hudson factors (citing Hudson v. McMillian (1992) 503 U.S. 1, 4 [112 S.Ct. 995; 117 L.Ed.2nd 156].), a significant amount of force was employed without significant provocation from the inmate or warning from the officers since (1) his injuries caused by the pepper spray were moderate, though relatively enduring, (2) it was not clear that the application of force was required under his version of the facts, and (3) the force used seemed quite extensive and disproportionate relative to the disturbance posed by his fingertips on the food port, and (4) it remained a disputed fact whether he posed a threat to the officers. (Furnace v. Sullivan (9th Cir. 2013) 705 F.3rd 1021, 1026-1030.)

> The "Hudson Factors" mentioned are listed as follows" (1) the extent of injury suffered by an inmate; (2) the need for application of force; (3) the relationship between that need and the amount of force used; (4) the threat reasonably perceived by the responsible officials; and (5) any efforts made to temper the severity of a forceful response. (Hudson v. McMillian, supra., at p. 6.)

Officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability for using a chokehold and pepper spray on a non-resisting subject. (Barnard v. Theobald (9th Cir. 2013) 721 F.3rd 1069, 1075-1076.)

Under the circumstances of this case, the defendant county of Tuolumne was immune from civil liability for the conduct of its officers. Once officers decided to arrest plaintiff's son, they were vested with the discretion in determining the best way to accomplish that goal, using personal deliberation, decision, and professional judgment. This discretion included the possible use of tear gas as a way to determine whether plaintiff's son was in plaintiff's mobile home. Given the potential impact of liability on such decisions, Gov't. Code § 820.2 provided immunity for the officers' actions. (Conway v. County of Tuolumne (2014) 231 Cal.App.4th 1005, 1013-1021.)

In a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 civil action against a city (Clovis) and a county (Fresno), whose SWAT teams had caused substantial damage to plaintiffs' property while attempting to make an arrest, the federal district court was held to have properly found that the plaintiffs' evidence failed to create a genuine issue of fact because record evidence showed that the city and county defendants had a general policy of obtaining warrants prior to entry, of using reasonable force, and the reasonable use of tear gas. The plaintiffs failed to establish a triable issue that any of these policies caused any constitutional injuries, or that there was a persistent and widespread violation of these policies. The district court did not err in concluding that the defendants were immune from liability for negligence because public entities like defendants were immune if the alleged injuries were caused by the officers' "discretionary acts," pursuant to Cal. Gov't Code §§ 820.2 and 815.2(b). (Jessen v. County of Fresno (9th Cir. 2020) 808 F. Appx. 432; unpublished.)

Two police officers attempted to arrest plaintiff for disorderly conduct. After plaintiff refused to place her hands behind her back to be handcuffed, one of the officers kicked her legs out from under her, causing her to fall to the ground. While plaintiff was on the ground, one of the officers used his hand to push her face onto the pavement as she continued to struggle with the officers. After the officer twice administered a burst of pepper spray directly into plaintiff's face, the officers were able to handcuff her. The officer warned plaintiff before each application of the pepper spray. The Second Circuit Court of Appeal held that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. Following the guidance provided by the Supreme Court, the court held that no precedential decision of the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit Court of Appeal clearly established that the officers' use of force, viewed in the circumstances in which they were taken, violated the Fourth

Amendment. (Brown v. City of New York (2nd Cir. N.Y. 2017) 862 F.3rd 182.)

Relevant Statutes:

Gov't. Code § 820.2: "Except as otherwise provided by statute, a public employee is not liable for an injury resulting from his act or omission where the act or omission was the result of the exercise of the discretion vested in him, whether or not such discretion be abused."

Pen. Code § 13652: Use by Law Enforcement of Kinetic Energy Projectiles and Chemical Agents:

> This new section limits law enforcement's use of "kinetic energy projectiles" and chemical agents, requiring a law enforcement agency to publish on its website a summary of all instances in which a kinetic energy projectile or chemical agent is used.
> "Kinetic energy projectile" is defined as a device designed to be launched as a projectile that may cause bodily injury and blunt force trauma, including, but not limited to, items commonly referred to as rubber bullets, plastic bullets, beanbag rounds, and foam tipped plastic rounds.
>
> "Chemical agent" is defined as a chemical that can rapidly produce sensory irritation or disabling physical effects, which disappear within a short time, including, but not limited to, CN tear gas, CS gas, and items commonly referred to as pepper spray, pepper balls, and oleoresin capsicum.
>
> The use of kinetic energy projectiles and chemical agents may be used only by a peace officer who has received training on their proper use for crowd control by the Commission on Peace Officer Standards and Training (POST), if the use is objectively reasonable to defend against a threat to life or serious bodily injury, or to bring an objectively dangerous and unlawful situation safely and effectively under control, and then only when the following requirements are met:
>
> 1. De-escalation techniques or other alternatives to force were attempted and failed;

2. Repeated, audible announcements are made about the intent to use kinetic energy projectiles and chemical agents, and the announcements are made in multiple languages, if appropriate;

3. Persons are given an objectively reasonable opportunity to disperse and leave the scene;

4. An objectively reasonable effort has been made to identify persons engaged in violent acts and those who are not, and projectiles and chemical agents are targeted toward those engaging in violent acts. Projectiles are prohibited from being "aimed indiscriminately into a crowd or group of persons;"

5. Projectiles and chemical agents are used only with the frequency, intensity, and in a manner that is proportional to the threat;

6. The possible incidental impact of projectiles and chemicals on bystanders, medical personnel, journalists, and other unintended targets is minimized;

7. An objectively reasonable effort has been made to extract individuals in distress;

8. Medical assistance is promptly provided, if properly trained personnel are present, when it is reasonable and safe to do so; and

9. If the chemical agent to be deployed is tear gas, only a commanding officer at the scene of the assembly, protest, or demonstration may authorize its use.

Aiming projectiles at the head, neck, or vital organs is prohibited. Also prohibited is the use of projectiles and chemicals solely due to a curfew violation, a verbal threat, or noncompliance with a law enforcement directive.

This new section does not apply to any county detention facility or to any correctional facility of the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation.

Pen. Code § 13652.1: A Published Summary of the Use of Kinetic Energy Projectiles and Chemical Agents:

> A law enforcement agency, within 60 days of an incident involving the use of kinetic energy projectiles or chemical agents for crowd control, is required to publish a summary of the incident on its Internet Web site. The summary may be posted as late as 90 days after the incident if the agency demonstrates just cause for the delay.
>
> The summary must include a description of the assembly, protest, demonstration, or incident, including the approximate crowd size and number of officers; the type of projectile or chemical agent used; the number of rounds or quantity of agent dispersed; the number of documented injuries resulting from the projectiles or chemicals; the justification for using the projectiles or chemicals; and a description of the de-escalation tactics and other measures used to avoid the need for projectiles or chemicals. The Department of Justice is also to post on its Internet Web site a compiled list, linking each agency's posted reports.

Chokehold and Carotid Restraint:

Defined:

Gov't. Code § 7286.5(b)(1): "Carotid restraint" means a vascular neck restraint or any similar restraint, hold, or other defensive tactic in which pressure is applied to the sides of a person's neck that involves a substantial risk of restricting blood flow and may render the person unconscious in order to subdue or control the person.

Gov't. Code § 7286.5(b)(2): "Chokehold" means any defensive tactic or force option in which direct pressure is applied to a person's trachea or windpipe.

> A "chokehold" is sometimes confused with a "carotid restrain." (See Tuuamalemalo v. Greene (9th Cir. 2019) 946 F.3rd 471, at p. 475.) The latter is more correctly described as a "lateral vascular neck restraint" ("LVNR"), which, by applying pressure to the carotid arteries at the sides of one's neck, restricts the flow of blood to the brain rather than restricting air flow. (Ibid.)

Note: A "carotid restraint," if properly applied, is an effective technique used by some law enforcement agencies to subdue an otherwise uncooperative subject for the purpose of rendering him unconscious for 20 or 30 seconds; long enough to handcuff or otherwise secure him. If improperly applied, a carotid restraint can cause serious injury or even death to the subject. In fact, a version of the chokehold taught by the military, which includes violently pushing the subject's head forward, is capable of breaking the subject's neck and paralyzing, or even killing him. For this reason, many law enforcement agencies have ceased using this technique to subdue an individual. However, there is no current case law holding the use of the carotid restraint to be unconstitutional except when applied to a non-resisting, already restrained, suspect (see below). Law enforcement agencies are now prohibited from authorizing their officers to use of either the choke hold or the carotid restraint. A "choke hold," on the other hand, puts pressure on one's trachea, and can cause serious injury. (See Gov't. Code § 7286.5(b)(1) & (2), below.

Case Law:

An officer who uses excessive force is subject to prosecution for a felony (Pen. Code § 149) and/or, if the victim is a prisoner and the officer is guilty of "willful inhumanity or oppression towards (the) prisoner," a $4,000 fine and removal from office (Pen. Code § 147), in addition to any other applicable assault or battery violations. (See People v. Perry (2019) 36 Cal.App.5th 444.)

The district court properly denied a police officer qualified immunity from civil liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 in Tuuamalemalo v. Greene (9th Cir. 2019) 946 F.3rd 471, because it was "clearly established" that the use of a chokehold on a non-resisting, already restrained person violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on the use of excessive force.

The district court also properly denied the police officer qualified immunity under Nevada law because applying a chokehold to a non-resisting, pinned person violated the arrestee's clearly established federal rights, and a jury could have concluded that the officer's decision was so excessive that it amounted to willful or deliberate disregard of those rights. (Id., at pp. 477-478.)

"(A)ny reasonable person . . . should have known that squeezing the breath from a compliant, prone, and handcuffed individual despite his pleas for air involves a degree of force that is greater than reasonable." (Drummond ex rel. Drummond v. City of Anaheim (9th Cir. 2003) 343 F.3rd 1052, 1059.)

Officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability for using a chokehold and pepper spray on a non-resisting subject. (Barnard v. Theobald (9th Cir. 2013) 721 F.3rd 1069, 1075-1076.)

See also Coley v. Lucas Cty. (6th Cir.) 799 F.3rd 530, 541, "Chokeholds are objectively unreasonable where an individual is already restrained or there is no danger to others."; United States v. Livoti (2nd Cir 1999) 196 F.3rd 322, 324-327, finding that use of a chokehold against a handcuffed, non-resistant subject was an excessive use of force; and Valencia v. Wiggins (5th Cir 1993) 981 F.2nd 1440, 1447, holding the use of a "choke hold and other force . . . to subdue a non-resisting [detainee] and render him temporarily unconscious was unreasonable and was an excessive use of force."

A district court's denial of qualified immunity and upholding the jury's finding that defendant officers used excessive force and violated California's Tom Bane Civil Rights Act and that defendant city was liable under the Monell test was affirmed since substantial evidence supported the jury's finding of excessive force in violation of the deceased's Fourth Amendment rights as the officers kept the deceased in multiple, extended chokeholds even as he gagged, wheezed, turned purple, and screamed he could not breathe, substantial evidence supported the jury's finding of Monell liability against the city, and that the three officers knew the "carotid hold" could cause serious injury or death, all three were aware of the department's limits on its use, but, nonetheless, they applied multiple, extended holds against the deceased, even while he was lying down and restrained. (Valenzuela v. City of Anaheim (9th Cir. 2021) 2021 U.S.App. LEXIS 22933; an unpublished decision.)

Relevant Statutes:

Gov't. Code § 7286.5: (Effective as of Jan. 1, 2021 (AB 1196), as amended Jan. 1, 2022 (AB 490)): Use of the Carotid Restraint and Chokehold:

Subd. (a)

(1) Law enforcement agencies are now prohibited from authorizing the use of a "carotid restraint" or "choke hold" by any peace officer employed by the agency.

(2) A law enforcement agency shall not authorize techniques or transport methods that involve a substantial risk of positional asphyxia.

Subd. (b) As used in this section, the following terms are defined as follows:

(1) Carotid restraint" means a vascular neck restraint or any similar restraint, hold, or other defensive tactic in which pressure is applied to the sides of a person's neck that involves a substantial risk of restricting blood flow and may render the person unconscious in order to subdue or control the person.

(2) "Choke hold" means any defensive tactic or force option in which direct pressure is applied to a person's trachea or windpipe.

(3) "Law enforcement agency" means any agency, department, or other entity of the state or any political subdivision thereof, that employs any peace officer described in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2 of the Penal Code.

(4) "Positional asphyxia" means situating a person in a manner that compresses their airway and reduces the ability to sustain adequate breathing. This includes, without limitation, the use of any physical restraint that causes a person's respiratory airway to be compressed or impairs the person's breathing or respiratory capacity, including any action in which pressure or body weight is unreasonably applied against a restrained person's neck, torso, or back, or positioning a restrained person without reasonable monitoring for signs of asphyxia.

Pain Compliance, "Take Down" Maneuvers, and other Control Holds:

The use of "pain compliance" to arrest passively resistant demonstrators was upheld as reasonable in that it was used only after a warning, was not applied any more than necessary to gain compliance, and was something that could be ended instantaneously when the protestor submitted. (Forrester v. City of San Diego (9th Cir. 1994) 25 F.3rd 804.)

In a 42 U.S.C. § 1983, Fourth Amendment excessive force case involving two police officers who had responded to a 911 domestic disturbance call, and where one of the officers "took him . . . to the ground and handcuffed him," the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal erred, again, in reversing and remanding the district court's ruling where both officers had been granted qualified immunity. As to one officer, the Ninth Circuit offered no explanation for its decision, which was erroneous in light of the district court's conclusion that only the other officer was involved in the excessive force claim. The Ninth Circuit also erred as to the other officer because it defined the clearly established right at a "high level of generality" by saying only that the "right to be free of excessive force" was clearly established, and this formulation of the clearly established right was too general, particularly as the Circuit Could made no effort to explain how the case law prohibited the officer's actions in this case. (Escondido v. Emmons (Jan. 7, 2019) __ U.S. __ [139 S.Ct. 500; 202 L.Ed.2nd 455].)

Causing plaintiff to go to the ground where she was handcuffed (and breaking her collarbone in the process) was held not to be unreasonable when plaintiff had been told that she was to be arrested but refused to comply with the officer's demands that she not walk away. "Even if a jury could find that (plaintiff) posed no danger to anyone at the time of the seizure, a reasonable officer in (Officer) Ernst's position could have believed that it was important to control the situation and to prevent a confrontation between patrons that could escalate." The officer was entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability under the circumstances. (Kelsay v. Ernst (8th Cir. NE 2019) 933 F.3rd 975; certiorari denied.)

Citing local and U.S. Supreme Court precedent (i.e. Escondido v. Emmons, supra.), the Eight Circuit held that "it was clearly established that an officer could use force against an uncooperative suspect who refused to follow the officer's orders. . . ." In this case, the officer was alleged to have forced plaintiff (stopped as a possible DUI suspect) to the ground (breaking her knee in the process) when she refused the officer's commands to remain in the patrol vehicle while he checked the validity of her driver's license. The officer was held to be entitled to summary judgement on plaintiff's excessive force claim. (Murphy v. Engelhart (8th Cir. MO 2019) 933 F.3rd 1027.)

"Hard pulling and twisting" used to remove a fleeing armed robbery suspect from a car was held to be a "minimal intrusion" under the circumstances. (Johnson v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2003) 340 F.3rd 787, 793.)

Handcuffing and lifting demonstrators who had gone limp, done for the purpose of removing them from a city council meeting where they disrupted the meeting to the point where the meeting had to be discontinued, was held to be reasonable under the circumstances even though the plaintiff suffered a sprained wrist, mild swelling, and a torn rotator cuff. Although such injuries were not trivial, they were minimal under the circumstances. The injuries caused are but one factor to consider in determining the reasonableness of the force used. (Williamson v. City of National City (9th Cir. 2022) 23 F.4th 1146, 1151-1155.)

The arm bar, a type of control hold, is a minimal use of force. (Donovan v. Phillips (9th Cir. 2017) 685 F. App'x 611, 612-613; officer's use of a control hold when plaintiff exited his car by grabbing his wrist, and pulling his arm downward, causing him to roll onto the ground, was a "relatively minimal" use of force.) However, the use of "foot strikes" (i.e., kicking) may constitute a significant use of force. (Wheatcroft v. City of Glendale (U.S. Dist. AZ, 2022) 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57006; citing Lopez v. City of Imperial (S.D. Cal. 2015) [2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87441]; where the use of fist and knee strikes was found to likely be "a significant use of force")

Flashbang Devices:

While officers were executing a search warrant for stolen goods by an armed robber, one officer, without looking, tossed a flashbang device near the front of the door where the resident was sleeping, resulting in an injury to the resident when the device exploded. The resident sued and the trial court granted summary judgment to the defendant officers. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal ruled that for summary judgment purposes, the use of the device was excessive force because the officers knew that up to eight people were asleep in the apartment. However, because the few cases dealing with the use of such devices are conflicting as to whether the use of a flashbang device constitutes excessive force, the resident's rights with respect to those devices was not clearly established. Thus, the offices were entitled to qualified immunity. Also, because there was no evidence that the city deliberately failed to train its officers in the use of a flashbang device, the city also had immunity. (Boyd v. Benton County (9th Cir. 2004) 374 F.3rd 773, 778-784.)

See also Dukes v. Deaton (11th Cir. Ga. 2017) 852 F.3rd 1035; failing to look before throwing the device constitutes an unreasonable use of force, but the officers were entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability.

Batons:

The use of pepper spray and a baton on a non-combative, albeit uncooperative, citizen during a traffic stop is excessive force and a Fourth Amendment violation. (Young v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2011) 655 F.3rd 1156.)

Where the facts are in dispute, a police officer does not have qualified immunity for using his baton to break the plaintiff's car window and pulling him out of the car through the window. Such force may be excessive. (Coles v. Eagle (9th Cir. 2012) 704 F.3rd 624, 627-631.)

Use of a baton in subduing a resisting subject, striking him eleven times, may have been excessive despite a civil jury's finding to the contrary. The jury verdict was overturned in that the trial court improperly removed from consideration an unlawful arrest allegation, precluding the jury from considering whether the force used was excessive under the circumstances; the lawfulness of the arrest being one of the factors necessarily relevant to the excessive force claim. (Velazquez v. City of Long Beach (9th Cir. 2015) 793 F.3rd 1010, 1023-1027.)

"While baton blows are a type of force capable of causing serious injury, (Young v. County of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 2011) 655 F.3rd 1156,) at 1162, jabs with a baton are less intrusive than overhand strikes. Defendants' expert opined that officers are trained that tip end jabbing, pushing, shift striking, and chopping are reasonable uses of force when individuals actively resist lawful orders. (The University of California) PD's crowd management policy permitted the use of batons 'in a crowd control situation' 'to move, separate, or disperse people,' except to strike intentionally a prohibited area, such as the head, unless confronting deadly force." (Felarca v. Birgeneau (9th Cir. 2018) 891 F.3rd 809, 817; finding the use of such force to be "minimal.")

Beanbag Firearms:

"A beanbag shotgun is a twelve-gauge shotgun loaded with beanbag rounds, consisting of lead shot contained in a cloth sack. . . . By design, beanbag shotguns typically cause serious injury rather than death, although death can result." (Cortesluna v. Leon (9th Cir. 2020) 979 F.3rd 645, 650, fn. 2, citing Deorle v. Rutherford (9th Cir. 2001) 272 F.3rd 1272, at p. 1277 & fn. 8.)

> "(B)ecause beanbag rounds are 'potentially lethal at thirty feet and could be lethal at distances up to fifty feet,' they are 'not to be deployed lightly.'" (Cortesluna v. Leon, supra, at p. 652, quoting Deorle v. Rutherford, supra, at pp. 1279-1280.)
>
> Use of "less-lethal" cloth-cased beanbag shot against an unarmed, mentally deranged suspect, particularly when not warned first, may be excessive. (Deorle v. Rutherford, supra.)
>
> "Their use 'is permissible only when a strong governmental interest compels the employment of such force.' (Deorle v. Rutherford, supra, at 1280.) In assessing the governmental interest, we consider '(1) "whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others," (2) "the severity of the crime at issue," and (3) "whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight."'" (Cortesluna v. Leon, supra, at p. 652, quoting Glenn v. Washington County (9th Cir. 2011) 673 F.3rd 864, 872 [below].)

As a "less lethal" weapon, the lawfulness of the use of a beanbag shotgun is dependent upon a determination that its use was reasonable under the circumstances. In this case, where the out-of-control subject wasn't threatening anyone but himself, its use was held to be unjustified. (Glenn v. Washington County (9th Cir. 2011) 673 F.3rd 864, 878-880.)

> In assessing the governmental interest, a court is to consider "(1) whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, (2) the severity of the crime at issue, and (3) whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight." (Id., at p. 872; quoting Graham v. Connor (1989) 490 U.S. 386, 396 [109 S.Ct. 1865; 104 L.Ed.2nd) 443]; see also Cortesluna v. Leon, supra, at p. 652.)

See also Pen. Code §§ 13652 & 13652.1, restricting the use of beanbag firearms, and similar devices, under "Use by Law Enforcement of Kinetic Energy Projectiles and Chemical Agents," above under "Chemical Irritants."

Brandishing (or Pointing) a Firearm:

It has been held that an officer "pointing of a gun at someone may constitute excessive force, even if it does not cause physical injury." (Tekle v. United States (9th Cir. 2007) 511 F.3rd 839, 845.

Pointing a gun at close range at an unarmed, unresisting suspect who is only being detained, is probably excessive, and could result in civil liability. (Robinson v. Solano County (9th Cir. 2002) 278 F.3rd 1007.)

"(P)ointing a loaded gun at a suspect, employing the threat of deadly force, is use of a high level of force." (Espinosa v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2010) 598 F.3rd 528, 538.)

"(W)here the officers have an unarmed felony suspect under control, where they easily could have handcuffed the suspect while he was sitting on the squad car, and where the suspect is not in close proximity to an accessible weapon, a gun to the head constitutes excessive force." (Thompson v. Rahr (9th Cir. WA 2018) 885 F.3rd 582, 586-587.)

> However, the officer was held to be entitled to qualified immunity, in that this rule was not "clearly established" at the time it occurred. (Id., at pp. 587-590.)

Similarly, pointing a firearm at a suspect while he's being arrested when it is apparent that the arrestee is not a threat to officer safety is excessive force sufficient to create civil liability. (Hopkins v. Bonvicino (9th Cir. 2009) 573 F.3rd 752, 776-777.)

See also Stamps v. Town of Framingham (1st Cir. 2016) 813 F.3rd 27: A reasonable officer would have understood that pointing a loaded rifle at the head of a prone, non-resistant individual, with the safety off and a finger on the trigger, constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Consequently, when the officer accidentally shoots and kills the suspect, the office is not entitled to qualified immunity in the resulting civil action.

A SWAT team holding children at gunpoint after officers gained control of a situation is unreasonable, and could result in civil liability. (Holland v. Harrington (10th Cir. 2001) 268 F.3rd 1179.)

Pointing and "training" a firearm at a five-week-old infant while conducting a Fourth Waiver search is excessive, and a Fourth Amendment violation. (Motley v. Parks (9th Cir. 2005) 432 F.3rd 1072, 1088-1089.)

Recognizing that even lawful arrests may be unreasonably executed, such as when excessive force is applied, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal found that plaintiff may have a valid claim that using "SWAT-like" tactics, with guns drawn and pointed at her, was excessive given that only a non-violent credit card offense was alleged. Whether or not the victim's claims that plaintiff was "violent and unstable" were sufficient to justify the force used is something a civil jury should be allowed to determine. (Cameron v. Craig (9th Cir. 2013) 713 F.3rd 1012, 1020-1022.)

Pointing a gun at the head of an 18-year-old occupant of a residence where there was no probable cause to support the officer's belief that he was committing a burglary held to be in violation of clearly established law. (Sandoval v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't. (9th Cir. 2014) 756 F.3rd 1154, 1165; citing Robinson v. Solano County (9th Cir. 2002) 278 F.3rd 1007.)

See also Avina v. United States (9th Cir. 2012) 681 F.3rd 1127, 1130-1134, below, under "Use of Handcuffs."

Use of Handcuffs:

An IRS agent was not entitled to qualified immunity where he handcuffed a nonviolent resident of a house during an IRS search of the premises, and further that he was not entitled to qualified immunity where there was a genuine issue of fact as to whether he handcuffed the resident in a manner that caused her pain. "(H)andcuffing substantially aggravates the intrusiveness of a detention." The use of handcuffs must be "justified by the totality of the circumstances." (Meredith v. Erath (9th Cir. 2003) 342 F.3rd 1057, 1061-1063.)

The lawfulness of the use of any type of force, including handcuffs to secure criminal suspects, requires a balancing of the "nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against the countervailing governmental interests at stake." Handcuffing individuals without any probable cause to believe they have committed a crime may be excessive, giving rise to potential civil liability. And even if lawful, the handcuffing of a detainee may be found to be unreasonable if it is unnecessarily painful. (Sandoval v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't. (9th Cir. 2014) 756 F.3rd 1154, 1165-1167.)

Handcuffing an otherwise complaint 11-year-old minor (even though reported to be out of control, uncooperative, and "off his meds" by school officials) and transporting him from his school to a relative held to be an excessive use of force under the circumstances, and an unlawful seizure. Officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. (C.B. v. City of Sonora (9th Cir. 2014) 769 F.3rd 1005, 1029-1031, 1039-1040.)

Thomas and Rosalie Avina sued the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) for assault and battery and intentional infliction of emotional distress after agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) executed a search warrant at their mobile home. Upon entering the home, the agents pointed guns at Thomas and Rosalie, handcuffed them and forcefully pushed Thomas to the floor. The agents handcuffed the Avina's fourteen-year-old daughter on the floor and then handcuffed their eleven-year-old daughter on the floor and pointed their guns at her head. The agents removed the handcuffs from the children approximately thirty minutes after they entered. The court held that the district court properly granted summary judgment in favor of the United States as to Thomas and Rosalie because the agents' use of force against them was reasonable. The agents were executing a search warrant at the residence of a suspected drug trafficker. This presented a dangerous situation for the agents and the use of handcuffs on the adult members of the family was reasonable to minimize the risk of harm to the officers and the Avinas. In addition, the agents did not act unreasonably when they forcefully pushed Thomas Avina to the floor. At the time of the push, Avina was refusing the agents' commands to get down on the ground. Because this refusal occurred during the initial entry, the agents had no way of knowing whether Avina was associated with the suspected drug trafficker, whom they thought lived there. The court however, found that the district court improperly granted summary judgment to the United States concerning the agents' conduct toward the Avinas' minor daughters. The court held that a jury could find that when the agents pointed their guns at the eleven-year-old daughter's head, while she was handcuffed on the floor, that this conduct amounted to excessive force. Similarly, the court held that a jury could find that the agents' decision to force the two girls to lie face down on the floor, with their hands cuffed behind their backs, was unreasonable. Genuine issues of fact existed as to whether the actions of the agents were excessive in light of girls' ages and the limited threats they posed. (Avina v. United States (9th Cir. 2012) 681 F.3rd 1127, 1130-1134.)

Handcuffing plaintiffs at the scene of an officer-involved shooting of a teenager (one of the plaintiffs), and holding them at the scene while handcuffed for five hours while the shooting was investigated—long after probable cause had dissipated—is a Fourth Amendment violation. The fact that the defendant officer (Gutierrez), who was the shooting officer, was pulled aside (per department policy) and monitored during the investigation of the shooting, and no longer had any control over the scene, does not prevent that officer from being liable for the unlawfully prolonged detention. The Court held that an officer need not have been the sole party responsible for a constitutional violation before civil liability may attach. "An officer's liability under (18 U.S.C.) Section 1983 is predicated on his 'integral participation' in the alleged violation. Officers, like other civil defendants, are generally responsible for the 'natural' or 'reasonably foreseeable' consequences. Thus, an officer can be held liable where he is just one participant in a sequence of events that gives rise to a constitutional violation." The trial court's denial of qualified immunity for that officer was upheld. (Nicholson v. City of Los Angeles (9th Cir.

2019) 935 F.3rd 685: The officer's potential civil liability for shooting the one plaintiff was not at issue in this appeal.)

Roadblocks as a Use of Force:

Where a motorcyclist fled from law enforcement and reached speeds "as high as 100 miles per hour during the chase," to end the pursuit, an officer pulled his police car across both lanes of the divided highway. The motorcycle crashed into the police car and the two riders suffered "severe and permanent" injuries. The Sixth Circuit characterized this roadblock as deadly force because the officer that created the blockade did not turn on his overhead lights and pulled out in front of the motorcycle seconds before impact. (Buckner v. Kilgore (6th Cir. 1994) 36 F.3rd 536.)

The First Circuit held that a roadblock "brightly illuminated and located at the end of a long straightaway" that the suspect could have avoided hitting if the brakes on his vehicle were working properly was not deadly force. (Seekamp v. Michaud (1st Cir. 1997) 109 F.3rd 802.)

A partial roadblock created to stop a fleeing motorcyclist traveling at high speeds that caused an unavoidable collision was held to be an unreasonable use of force. (Hawkins v. City of Farmington (8th Cir. 1999) 189 F.3rd 695, 698-702.)

A so-called "rolling roadblock," where several police vehicles "surrounded" the suspect's fleeing vehicle, began braking, and stopped the suspect's vehicle with a "low-impact collision," was characterized as "de minimis force." (Tucker v. McCormack (M.D. Tenn. 2010), 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94157.)

A police officer's use of his vehicle to stop the plaintiff on his bicycle who had refused to stop when commanded to do so constitutes a use of force. The officer accomplished this by pulling his patrol car in front of plaintiff, knocking him off his bike, causing plaintiff suffer an injured wrist. The Court here classified the officer's use of force as "intermediate" described by the Court (at p. 599) as "force capable of inflicting significant pain and causing serious injury." Even so, the force used under the circumstances was held to be excessive and a violation of the Fourth Amendment. However, given the slow speed of the bike, the Court held that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability. The fact that the plaintiff did not have working brakes on his bike is a fact the officer could not have known. (Seidner v. De Vries (9th Cir. 2022) 39 F.4th 591.)

Factors the Court considered in reaching this conclusion included that the blockade was not obscured, the officer activated his overhead lights well before maneuvering his car to block plaintiff's path, and the car was also continuously within plaintiff's view. Additionally, plaintiff was not traveling at anything near the speeds involved in other cases where deadly force was found. (Id, at p. 598.)

Despite the above, the Court concluded that the officer was not entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law. However, because the issue was not clearly defined, he was entitled to a finding of qualified immunity. (Id, at pp. 601-603.)

Applicable Statutes*:

Pen. Code § 196: Justifiable Homicide: Homicide is justifiable when committed by peace officers and those acting by their command in their aid and assistance, under either of the following circumstances:

(a) In obedience to any judgment of a competent court.

(b) When the homicide results from a peace officer's use of force that is in compliance with (P.C.) Section 835a.

See Kortum v. Alkire (1977) 69 Cal.App.3rd 325, 333; Foster v. City of Fresno (N.D. Cal. 2005) 392 F.Supp.2nd 1140, 1159; and CALCRIM # 507: "Justifiable Homicide: By Public Officer."

Pen. Code § 197: Justifiable Homicide: Homicide is also justifiable when committed by any person in any of the following situations:

1. When resisting any attempt to murder, commit a felony, or to do great bodily injury upon any person; or

2. When committed in defense of habitation, property or person, at least in cases of violent felonies; or

3. When committed in defense of person, or of a wife or husband, parent, child, master, mistress, or servant of such person, at least in cases of violent felonies; or

4. When necessarily committed in attempting to apprehend any person for any felony, or in suppressing any riot, or in keeping and preserving the peace.

The trial court was not required to instruct the jury sua sponte on the law of justifiable homicide in making an arrest, per Pen. Code § 197(4), where defendant himself claimed he chased the victim for about a quarter of a mile with an axe and killed him, not in an attempt to arrest him for burglary, but rather because the victim looked like he was not a good person. (People *v. Zinda (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 871, 877-880.)

The Court further rejected defendant's argument that he was also entitled to a "mistake of fact" instruction, arguing that he believed his victim had burglarized his home. (Id., at pp. 880-881; "The defense of mistake of fact requires, at a minimum, an actual belief in the existence of circumstances, which, if true, would make the act with which the person is charged an innocent act," quoting People v. Lawson (2013) 215 Cal.App.4th 108, 115, in that even if the victim had burglarized defendant's home, killing him would not have been legally justified.

See also CALCRIM # 508: "Justifiable Homicide: Citizen Arrest (Non-Peace Officer),"and # 509: "Justifiable Homicide: Non-Peace Officer Preserving the Peace."

History*: The wording in the statutes, referring to felonies seemingly without limitation, comes from the "Common Law" which, in its early history, made all felonies, of which there were only a few, capital offenses and, arguably, subject to the use of deadly force. (See People v. Williams (2013) 57 Cal.4th 776, 782.)

The Common Law justification for this rule has been quoted, for historical value only, by more recent cases: "'Ordinarily, an officer or private person, in making an arrest for a felony, may use whatever force is reasonably necessary to overcome a resisting felon or to stop a fleeing felon, even to the extent of taking his life; and, if deadly force is used, the homicide is justifiable. The supportive theory is that "felons ought not to be at large, and that the life of a felon has been forfeited; for felonies at common law were punishable with death."'" (See People v. Martin (1985) 168 Cal.App.3rd 1111, 1115.)

Today, with the law vastly expanded, there are many non-violent, non-capital felonies for which deadly force is not an appropriate response. (People v. Ceballos (1974) 12 Cal.3rd 470; Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1].)

Limitations On the Lawful Use of Deadly Force*: In reading these statutes (P.C. §§ 196 & 197) (at least as these statutes existed prior to January 1, 2010), a literal interpretation would seem to indicate the conclusion that killing a suspect in any felony situation, even if only a property offense, to prevent the commission of a felony against a person, or to arrest or stop any fleeing felony suspect, nonviolent as well as violent, is lawful.

Forcible and Atrocious Crimes: Although maybe true at one time, modern case law no longer allows such a liberal application of the justifiable homicide defense. Today, the use of deadly force is specifically limited to defending against, or in the attempt to arrest someone, for "forcible and atrocious" crimes only (defined below). (People v. Ceballos (1974) 12 Cal.3rd 470, 478; Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1, 12-15 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1, 10-12]; People v. Martin (1985) 168 Cal.App.3rd 1111, 1124; and CALCRIM # 509: "Justifiable Homicide: Non-Peace Officer Preserving the Peace.")

The Fourth Amendment: The restrictions on the use of deadly force have their genesis in the United States Constitution. A Fourth Amendment "seizure" occurs whenever "there is a governmental termination of freedom of movement through means intentionally applied." (Brower v. Inyo (1989) 489 U.S. 593, 597 [109 S.Ct. 1378; 103 L.Ed.2nd 628, 635].)

> "The use of deadly force to prevent the escape of all felony suspects, whatever the circumstances, is constitutionally unreasonable." (Emphasis added; Tennessee v. Garner, supra, at p. 11 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd at p. 9].)
> Similarly, the indiscriminate use of a "booby trap" (a felony, per P.C. § 12355) (or a "trap gun," a misdemeanor per Fish & Game Code, § 2007), set up in the house or elsewhere to ward off expected intruders, has been held to constitute an illegal use of force which, by its very nature, cannot be limited to those trespassers who constitute a threat of death or great bodily injury. (People v. Ceballos, supra.)
>
> See CALCRIM # 500 et seq.

"Forcible and Atrocious Crime" Defined: A "forcible and atrocious crime," warranting the use of deadly force; "is any felony that by its nature and the manner of its commission threatens, or is reasonably believed by the "defendant" (i.e., the victim of an assault who uses deadly force in response, and who is now being charged with a homicide) to threaten life or great bodily injury so as to instill in him or her a reasonable fear of death or great bodily injury." (Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1, 12-15 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1, 10-12].)

> Forcible and atrocious crimes have been held to include murder, rape, robbery (at least, when the suspect is armed) and mayhem. (People v. Ceballos (1974) 12 Cal.3rd 470.)
>
> Depending upon the circumstances, they might also include the so-called "inherently dangerous felonies" (with the exception of burglary; discussed below) listed in the "felony murder" statute; i.e., arson, carjacking, kidnapping, train wrecking, torture, felony child molest and other forcible sex offenses, and murder perpetrated by means of discharging a firearm from a motor vehicle with the intent to inflict death. (See P.C. § 189)
>
> > Note: Viable arguments might be made to include other felonies as well, depending upon the circumstances of an individual case.

"(T)he crime of vehicular theft . . . without more, does not support a finding that [the suspect] pose[s] a threat" justifying the use of force when the suspect is outnumbered, unarmed, and compliant." (Green v. City & County of San Francisco (9th Cir 2014) 751 F.3rd 1039, 1049-1051).

Similarly, contrary to a literal reading of the justifiable homicide statutes (e.g., P.C. § 197.2), killing someone in defense of property, even one's own home, when not provoked by a threat of death or serious bodily harm to any person, is probably not justifiable. (People v. Ceballos, supra.) (But, see P.C. § 198.5, below.)

Although a trespasser may be physically ejected, using whatever non-deadly force is reasonably necessary under the circumstances should he or she refuse to leave when requested, killing the nonviolent trespasser is only likely to leave the landowner, who thought he had a right to defend his property interests at all costs, facing possible civil and criminal penalties. (People v. Corlett (1944) 67 Cal.App. 27, 35-36; CALCRIM # 506: "Justifiable Homicide: Defending Against Harm to Person with Home or on Property.")

Burglary of a Residence was considered at Common Law to be a dangerous felony. Modernly, however, burglary is not normally considered a forcible and atrocious crime, at least where the character and manner of the burglary does not reasonably create a fear of death or great bodily harm to any person within the home. (People v. Ceballos (1974) 12 Cal.3rd 470, 479.)

Pen. Code § 198.5; the "Home Protection Bill of Rights:" California has enacted a statutory presumption that a resident of a home is in fact in reasonable fear of death or great bodily injury to himself, his family, or any member of the household, when someone, not a member of the family or household, has forcibly and unlawfully entered the residence, thus legalizing the resident's use of deadly force within the residence, absent evidence tending to rebut the presumption. (People v. Owen (1991) 266 Cal.App.3rd 996, 1003-1004.)

The "resident" need not necessarily be living there lawfully. (People v. Grays (2016) 246 Cal.App.4th 679; defendant not legally subletting the unit where he'd been staying for four to five months, paid rent, and had a key.)

This presumption, however, is rebuttable. Should the homeowner have known under the circumstances that the burglar was not a threat, he might very well be criminally and civilly liable for using deadly force against the intruder. (See People v. Owen, supra, at

pp. 1003-1007; and CALCRIM # 506 ("Justifiable Homicide: Defending Against Harm to Person Within Home or on Property.")

Case Law:

Being the victim of a residential burglary is not sufficient to arouse sufficient "heat of passion" to reduce a killing of someone believed to have been the burglar from murder to voluntary manslaughter. The defendant (victim of the burglary) himself must reasonably believe that the homicide victim provoked defendant's heat of passion. Where defendant arrived home to find a burglary in progress, and chased a person he believed to be one of the burglars with an axe, killing him, a jury verdict of second degree murder was upheld. A person who acts in the heat of passion—without reflection in response to adequate provocation—does not act with malice. An unlawful killing in such a circumstance is reduced from murder to voluntary manslaughter. But the provocation must be caused by the victim or be conduct reasonably believed by defendant to have been engaged in by the victim. The Court here, where the homicide victim was not one of the burglars, concluded that "a reasonable person in defendant's position, even under the stress of coming home to find his house being burglarized, would have more carefully assessed the situation . . . before concluding [that the victim] was involved in the burglary." (People v. Zinda (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 871, 877-880.)

Federally, it is not necessary for a trial court to instruct the jury that: "In the home, the need for self-defense and property defense is most acute." The standard federal self-defense jury instructions (9th Cir. Model Crim. Jury Instr. 6.7) are sufficient. (United States v. Morsette (9th Cir. 2010) 622 F.3rd 1200.)

Although P.C. § 198.5 allows for the use of deadly force in defense of habitation, "it is never acceptable to use or threaten deadly force solely to defend property." Absent evidence that the victim neighbors forcibly entered defendant's home or that they committed any felonies, or that they threatened death or serious bodily harm (intending only to remove and replace a shared fence), defendant's use of deadly force was unjustified. Accordingly, whether or not the neighbors complied with the homeowners' association rules or the Civil Code, defendant was not legally justified in brandishing a deadly firearm. (People v. Chen (2020) 50 Cal.App.5th 952, 960.)

The Court found it not to be error to refuse to instruct the jury on the so-called Home Protection Bill of Rights (Pen. Code § 198.5), which creates a presumption that persons using force within their residence while believing an unlawful forcible entry occurred had a reasonable fear of imminent death or GBI to a member of their household, where the use of force occurred outside at a gate between the stairs to the porch and not within the residence. (People v. Wilson (2021) 67 Cal.App.5th 819.)

Self-Defense and Defense of Others:

General Rules:

"Self-defense, when based on a reasonable belief that killing is necessary to avert an imminent threat of death or great bodily injury, is a complete justification, and such a killing is not a crime." (People v. Elmore (2014) 59 Cal.4th 121, 132.)

Any person, including a peace officer, may use deadly force against another when the circumstances reasonably create a fear of imminent death or serious bodily harm to the person, and the use of deadly force reasonably appears necessary to resist the threat. (People v. Humphrey (1996) 13 Cal.4th 1073, 1082; People v. Hardin (2000) 85 Cal.App.4th 625, 629-630; People v. Harris (1971) 20 Cal.App.3rd 534, 537.)

In defending oneself or another, deadly force may only be used in response to the illegal application of deadly force from the aggressor. Thus, "a misdemeanor assault must be suffered without the privilege of retaliating with deadly force." (People v. Jones, supra, at p. 482; People v. Clark (1982) 130 Cal.App.3rd 371, 380.)

Exception: A personal assault which itself is not sufficient to cause a reasonable apprehension of death or great bodily injury, even if the assault constitutes a felony, is insufficient to justify the use of deadly force against the assailant. "(T)he felony contemplated by the (justifiable homicide) statute is one that is more dangerous than a personal assault." (People v. Jones (1961) 191 Cal.App.2nd 478, 481-482; and see P.C. §§ 197.1, 197.3, above; see also CALCRIM # 500 et seq.

Examples: An assault by fists does not justify the person being assaulted in using a deadly weapon in response unless that person reasonably believes that the assault is so aggravated that it is likely to result in the infliction of death or great bodily injury.

See People v. Ramirez (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 940, 945-953: In a murder case where one of the two defendants shot and killed a rival gang member during what was up until then merely a fistfight, the trial court erroneously instructed the jury, pursuant to CALCRIM # 3472 (Right of Self-Defense: May Not Be Contrived; see below), that a person does not have the right to claim self-defense if the person provokes a fight or quarrel with the intent to create an excuse to use force. The problem with contrived self-defense instruction in this case was that it did not include the word "deadly." Thus, the instruction "erroneously required the jury to conclude that in contriving to use force, even to provoke only a fistfight, defendants entirely forfeited any right to self-defense" even if the victim escalated the force used in return to "deadly force."

In a trial for assault and battery, the jury was properly instructed pursuant to CALCRIM # 3472, i.e., that a person does not have the right to self-defense if he or she provokes a fight or quarrel with the intent to create an excuse to use force because the jury could have rationally concluded that defendant provoked the conflict and continued to be the aggressor until the victim finally responded, at which point defendant knocked her out with a series of punches. The instruction is a generally correct statement of the law, and the facts of this case did not implicate case law relating to an intent to use only non-deadly force and an adversary's sudden escalation to deadly violence because defendant's claim of self-defense and defense of another was not based upon his use of deadly force. (People v. Eulian (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 1324, 1332-1335.)

An officer who shot and killed the decedent (without first providing a warning) when the decedent had already turned away from his intended victim (the victim having entered his own home and shut the door), was held to be unreasonable despite the decedent holding a rifle (which, was pointed either at the ground or the sky). The officer was not entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability. (Cole v. Hutchins (8th Cir. 2020) 959 F.3rd 1127.)

Elements of Self-Defense: In order for the defense of self-defense to apply, it must be shown that there existed:

- A reasonable belief that the use of force was necessary to defend oneself against the immediate use of unlawful force; and

- The use of no more force than was reasonably necessary in the circumstances. (People v. Minifie (1996) 13 Cal.4th 1055, 1065; and see United States v. Biggs (9th Cir. 2006) 441 F.3rd 1069; rejecting the argument that the defendant must also show that there were no reasonable alternatives to the use of force.)

Important Issues:

Imminent Peril: Deadly force is justified only when the apparent peril is imminent; meaning at the very time of the deadly response. A threat of future harm does not legally justify the application of deadly force in self-defense. (But see "Fleeing Felon," below.)

"Imminent peril" refers to the situation which, from all reasonable appearances, must be instantly dealt with. (People v. Aris (1989) 215 Cal.App.3rd 1178, 1187-1188; In re Christian S. (1994) 7 Cal.4th 768-783.)

The homicide of the defendant's grandfather was not mitigated (which would have reduced the offense to a voluntary manslaughter under a "heat of passion" theory) by the fact that the grandfather had been overly critical and "mean" to the defendant in the past. (People v. Kanawyer (2003) 113 Cal.App.4th 1233.)

A person using a firearm to scare off attacking dogs may have a viable self-defense argument. (People v. Lee (2005) 131 Cal.App.4th 1413; conviction for discharging a firearm with gross negligence reversed for failure of the court to allow a self-defense argument.)

A convicted felon, charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm (P.C. §§ 29800 et. seq.; formerly § 12021), may use the defense of self-defense where he grabbed a firearm when confronted with an imminent danger in those instances where "the firearm only became available during an emergency and was possessed temporarily in response to the emergency and there was no other means of avoiding the danger," and the firearm was then immediately thereafter transported to or given to law enforcement. (People v. King (1978) 22 Cal.3rd 12, 24; see also P.C. § 29850, formerly P.C. § 12021(h).)

Similarly, an inmate of a penal institution has a potential defense to a P.C. § 4502 (Inmate in Possession of a Weapon) charge when the possession was in response to an imminent danger, where there is no opportunity to seek the help of authorities, and the weapon is given to authorities as soon as the danger has passed. (People v. Saavedra (2007) 156 Cal.App.4th 561, 568-570.)

But note that the danger has to be imminent. A threat of some future harm is not justification for possessing a prohibited weapon in violation of P.C. § 4502. (People v. Velasquez (1984) 158 Cal.App.3rd 418, 420.)

In attempting to stop the driver of a motor vehicle from driving away, the officer was holding onto the driver's side open door, leaving into the vehicle. As this occurred, the officer shot the driver twice, killing him. After a grand jury returned a "no bill," the estate of the driver sued. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeal upheld the trial court's finding of qualified immunity for the officer, ruling that "at the moment of the threat," the officer was in reasonable fear for his life. Per the court, it is well-established that the excessive-force inquiry is confined to whether the officer or other persons were in danger at the moment of the threat that resulted in the officers' use of deadly force. This "moment of threat test" means that "the focus of the inquiry should be on the act that led the officer to discharge his weapon." Any of the officers' actions leading up to the shooting are not relevant for the purposes of an excessive force inquiry. The court determined that the moment of threat occurred in the two seconds before the driver of the vehicle in this case was shot. At that time, the officer was still hanging onto the moving vehicle and believed it would run him over, which could have made him "reasonably believe his life was in imminent danger." (Barnes v. Felix (5th Cir. 2024) 91 F.4th 393.)

Bare Fear, or the killer's subjective fear, by itself, is not sufficient to justify self-defense or the defense of others.

Not only must the person attempting to exercise the right to self-defense or defense of others honestly feel the need to use force, but the circumstances must be sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable person as well. (People v. Sonier (1952) 113 Cal.App.2nd 277, 278; People v. Lopez (1948) 32 Cal.2nd 673, 675; People v. Williams (1977) 75 Cal.App.3rd 731, 739; P.C. § 198; CALJIC # 5.14; "Homicide in Defense of Member of Family.")

Apparent Necessity is all that is required. As long as the person is acting reasonably, he may act on appearances even though it is later discovered that there in fact was no real need for self-defense. (People v. Dawson (1948) 88 Cal.App.2nd 85, 96; People v. Pena (1984) 151 Cal.App.3rd 462, 475-478.)

For example, in using deadly force to prevent a residential burglary, whether or not the deceased actually had the intent to commit a burglary is irrelevant to the issue of whether the person who killed him could legally use deadly force. (People v. Walker (1973) 32 Cal.App.3rd 897.) The issue will be what the person who applied the force reasonably believed the circumstances to be.

However, an honest but unreasonable belief, while insufficient to establish a claim of self-defense in a murder case, might be enough to negate malice aforethought and thus reduce murder to a non-statutory voluntary manslaughter, sometimes referred to as "imperfect self-defense." (People v. Flannel (1979) 25 Cal.3rd 688, 674; People v. Uriarte (1990) 223 Cal.App.3rd 192; see also People v. Saille (1991) 54 Cal.3rd 1103, 1107, fn. 1; McNeil v. Middleton (9th Cir. 2005) 402 F.3rd 920; People v. Morales (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 978, 988.)

The California Supreme Court has held that such an "honest, but unreasonable belief" theory applies to the commission of a homicide in the defense of a third person as well. (See People v. Randle (2005) 35 Cal.4th 987.)

But see P.C. § 835a(a)(2), as amended effective 1/1/2020, where the use of deadly force by law enforcement has been limited to "when necessary in defense of human life," presumably imposing a standard stricter than "when reasonable."

Imperfect Self-Defense:

"Under the doctrine of imperfect self-defense, '[a]n unlawful killing involving either an intent to kill or a conscious disregard for life constitutes voluntary manslaughter, rather than murder, when the defendant acts upon an actual but unreasonable belief in the need for self-defense.'" (People v. Morales (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 978, 988; quoting People v. Stitely (2005) 35 Cal.4th 514, 551.)

The theory of an "imperfect self-defense" is not available where the defendant's acts are based only upon his own delusions. (People v. Mejia-Lenares (2006) 135 Cal.App.4th 1437.)

The "imperfect self-defense" theory did not apply where the victim had the right to use force to try to escape an unlawful, hour's long imprisonment and to protect himself and the other victim when defendant's accomplice attacked the other victim in another room. Thus, when the victim charged defendant upon the sound of the accomplice snapping the other victim's neck, defendant had the option of fleeing, stepping out of the way, or taking what he had coming to him. He did not have the right to defend himself from the victim's lawful resort to self-defense and the defense of the other victim. (People v. Frandsen (2011) 196 Cal.App.4th 266.)

It was also held that there was no error in not modifying the "imperfect self-defense" instruction to apply when a defendant's belief he needed to use deadly force was reasonable but the sort of force used was excessive and more than necessary to repel the attack (driving a knife 5½ inches into the victim's torso), as there is no authority for distinguishing between kinds of deadly force. (People v. Morales (2021) 69 Cal.App.5th 978.)

A trial court erred during defendant's first-degree murder trial in refusing to instruct a jury on voluntary manslaughter based on imperfect self-defense because while defendant's testimony included evidence of delusion (i.e., he shot his friend in the head nine times, then set his body on fire, claiming that the victim had a knife and he feared an attack by him), his account pertaining to the actual shooting was not entirely delusional and thus provided substantial evidence of an actual but unreasonable belief in the need for self-defense. The instructional error was harmless, however, because a more favorable result was not reasonably probable given the overwhelming evidence that defendant was not acting in any form of self-defense. (People v. Schuller (2021) 72 Cal.App.5th 221.); review granted.)

Original Aggressor Claiming Self-Defense: Goading another into a deadly quarrel also imposes some restrictions on the use of self-defense.

The one who initiates a quarrel with the intention of forcing a deadly response in an attempt to justify the use of deadly force in return cannot claim self-defense when he kills his victim. (People v. Garnier (1950) 95 Cal.App.2nd 489, 496.)

In a murder case where one of the two defendants shot and killed a rival gang member during what was up until then merely a fistfight, the trial court erroneously instructed the jury, pursuant to CALCRIM # 3472 (Right of Self-Defense: May Not Be Contrived), that a person does not have the right to claim self-defense if the person provokes a fight or quarrel with the intent to create an excuse to use force. The problem with contrived self-defense instruction in this case was that it did not include the word "deadly." Thus, the instruction "erroneously required the jury to conclude that in contriving to use force, even to provoke only a fistfight, defendants entirely forfeited any right to self-defense" even if the victim escalated the force used in return to "deadly force." (People v. Ramirez (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 940, 945-953.)

> See CALCRIM # 3471: "Right to Self-Defense: Mutual Combat or Initial Aggressor," and CALCRIM # 3472: "Right to Self-Defense: "May Not Be Contrived."

However, in People v. Eulian (2016) 247 Cal.App.4th 1324, 1332-1335, it was held that CALCRIM # 3472 is a correct statement of the law and that the instruction was properly given under the facts in this case (i.e., where no deadly force was used), and that the reasoning of Ramirez, supra, has no application where the party claiming a right to self-defense did not use deadly force.

Similarly, a person who starts the confrontation with an unjustifiable attack or who voluntarily engages in a fight or mutual combat, and suddenly finds himself losing, cannot claim self-defense unless he first attempts to withdraw from the affray and communicates that withdrawal to his adversary. (People v. Bolton (1979) 23 Cal.3rd 51, 68; P.C. § 197.3.)

An "original aggressor," or a person engaged in "mutual combat," may claim the right to self-defense if he first effectively communicates (or attempts to communicate) by words or conduct that he wants to both (1) stop the fighting and (2) is in fact stopping the fighting. (People v. Hernandez (2003) 111 Cal.App.4th 582.)

> See People v. Nem (2003) 114 Cal.App.4th 160, at pp. 166-167, disagreeing with Hernandez's conclusion that the word "inform," in former CALJIC 5.54, was misleading because it necessarily caused a jury to believe that the original aggressor's words were the only way to communicate an intent to withdraw.

Also, if the original aggressor used less than deadly force, his intended victim may not respond with deadly force, and if he does, then the original aggressor has the right to use deadly force in self-defense. (People v. Hecker (1895) 109 Cal. 451, 464.)

On the other hand, the one originally attacked has no duty to attempt to withdraw. He may stand his ground and need not take advantage of an opportunity to escape from, or avoid another's attack or any attempt to use deadly force against him. (People v. Dawson (1948) 88 Cal.App.2nd 85, 95; People v. Gonzales (1887) 71 Cal. 569, 578.)

> "(W)hen a man without fault himself is suddenly attacked in a way that puts his life or bodily safety at imminent hazard, he is not compelled to fly or to consider the proposition of flying, but may stand his ground, and defend himself to the extent of taking the life of the assailant, if that be reasonably necessary. (People v. Newcomer (1897) 118 Cal. 263, 273.)
>
> This "rule applies even though the assailed person might more easily have gained safety by flight or by withdrawing from the scene." (People v. Dawson, supra.)

Self-Defense is not available to a person charged with murder under the felony murder statute; i.e., one who kills another during the commission of one of the dangerous felonies listed in the murder statute; P.C. § 189. The purpose of the "felony murder rule" is to deter even accidental killings by imposing strict liability on anyone who causes another's death while committing any one or more of the specified felonies. (People v. Loustaunau (1986) 181 Cal.App.3rd 163, 170.)

Neither self-defense nor defense of property is available to one who uses force to resist a lawful arrest or to deter a lawful entry upon one's land. (See P.C. § 693)

Mutual Combat:

"Mutual Combat" has a legal definition. It consists of fighting by mutual intention or consent, as most clearly reflected in an express or implied agreement to fight. There must be evidence from which the jury could reasonably find that both combatants actually consented or intended to fight before the claimed occasion for self-defense arose. (People v. Ross (2007) 155 Cal.App.4th 1033, 1043-1047.)

> Also, "mutual combat" means not merely a reciprocal exchange of blows but one pursuant to mutual intention, consent, or agreement preceding the initiation of hostilities. . . . In other words, it is not merely the combat, but the preexisting intention to engage in it, that must be mutual." (People v. Nguyen (2015) 61 Cal.4th 1015, 1044; quoting People v. Ross, supra, at p. 1045.)
>
> > In Nguyen, evidence that rival gangs had a preexisting intention to engage in hostilities whenever the opportunity presented itself supported a finding that a murder of one gang member was a part of "mutual combat." (People v. Nguyen, supra.)

"[A]s used in this state's law of self-defense, 'mutual combat' means not merely a reciprocal exchange of blows but one pursuant to mutual intention, consent, or agreement preceding the initiation of hostilities. . . . In other words, it is not merely the combat, but the preexisting intention to engage in it, that must be mutual." (Italics in original: People *v. Nguyen, supra, at pp. 1048-1052; quoting People v. Ross, supra, at p. 1045.)

Note, however, that a "public officer" does not lose his or her right of self-defense due to initiating a confrontation through the use of reasonable force to affect an arrest, prevent escape, or overcome resistance. (P.C. § 836.5(b))

Once the aggressor makes a good faith attempt at withdrawal, and attempts to inform his opponent of this fact, he regains his right to claim self-defense should the original victim continue the attack. (People v. Button (1895) 106 Cal. 628, 632-635; People v. Hecker (1895) 109 Cal. 451, 463-465.)

See CALCRIM # 3474: "Danger No Longer Exists or Attacker Disabled."

A jury instruction based upon a mutual combat theory is erroneous when it infers that one engaged in mutual combat must be successful in communicating his intent to withdraw. It need only be shown that the defendant "really and in good faith have endeavored to decline any further struggle . . . ." (People v. Quach (2004) 116 Cal.App.4th 294, 300-303; see also P.C. § 197.3)

An "original aggressor," or a person engaged in "mutual combat," may claim the right to self-defense if he first effectively communicates (or attempts to communicate) by words or conduct that he wants to both (1) stop the fighting and (2) is in fact stopping the fighting. (People v. Hernandez (2003) 111 Cal.App.4th 582.)

See People v. Nem (2003) 114 Cal.App.4th 160, at pp. 166-167, disagreeing with Hernandez's conclusion that the word "inform," in former CALJIC 5.54, was misleading because it necessarily caused a jury to believe that the original aggressor's words were the only way to communicate an intent to withdraw.

If the one who originally had a right to self-defense continues the altercation after the aggressor has broken off his assault and there is no longer imminent peril to the original victim, that victim cannot claim the defense when he catches and assaults the former aggressor. (People v. Smith (1981) 122 Cal.App.3rd 581, 590; People v. Perez (1970) 12 Cal.App.3rd 232, 236.)

See also CALCRIM # 3474: "Danger No Longer Exists or Attacker Disabled."

However, if the original victim reasonably and in good faith feels that he must pursue his attacker in order to effectively secure himself from further danger, then self-defense is still applicable. (People v. Hatchett (1942) 56 Cal.App.2nd 20, 22.)

The pursuit, however, must not be motivated by revenge nor after the necessity for self-defense has ceased. (People v. Finali (1916) 31 Cal.App. 479; People v. Conkling (1896) 11 Cal. 616, 626.)

See also CALCRIM # 3471; "Right to Self-Defense: Mutual Combat or Initial Aggressor."

Burden of Proof: Under federal law, it has been held that justification for possessing a firearm (otherwise illegal under 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1)) in self-defense is an affirmative defense for which the defendant must prove by a "preponderance of the evidence" the necessity for doing so. (United States v. Beasley (9th Cir. 2003) 346 F.3rd 930.)

Fleeing Felon: The use of "deadly force" to stop a "dangerous person" fleeing from the scene of a "forcible and atrocious crime," or suspected of having committed such a crime, is legally justifiable. (See Tennessee v. Garner, (1985) 471 U.S. 1 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1]; P.C. §§ 196.3, 197.4, above.)

See CALCRIM # 507: "Justifiable Homicide: By Public Officer."

An officer may not use deadly force to apprehend a suspect in those circumstances where the suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer or others. But on the other hand, it is constitutionally reasonable to use deadly force to prevent an escape whenever an officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others. In making this decision, a court must consider:

(1) The severity of the crime at issue;

(2) Whether the suspect poses an immediate threat of serious physical harm to the officers or others; and

(3) Whether the suspect is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.

(Wilkinson v. Torres (9th Cir. 2010) 610 F.3rd 546, 550-554.)

A "dangerous person" is one who "poses a significant threat of death or serious bodily injury to the person attempting the apprehension or to others, or has committed a forcible and atrocious felony." (People v. Martin (1985) 168 Cal.App.3rd 1111, 1124.)

Police may use deadly force to stop an escaping violent felony suspect who would pose a substantial risk to others if apprehension is delayed. (Forrett v. Richardson (9th Cir. 1997) 112 F.3rd 416; deadly force used to stop a "home invasion" suspect who had previously shot and wounded a victim.)

While the commission of a violent crime in the immediate past is an important factor, it is not justification for using deadly force "on sight." (Harris v. Roderick (9th Cir. 1997) 126 F.3rd 1189, 1203.)

See also Hopkins v. Andaya (9th Cir. 1992) 958 F.2nd 881, 887; holding that an officer's second use of deadly force was unreasonable even though the suspect had violently assaulted the officer a few minutes before, but by the time of the second use of deadly force, although he was advancing towards the officer, he was wounded and unarmed.

The force used must still be no greater than necessary under the circumstances. The use of so-called "less lethal" (e.g., bean bag ammunition) force may still be deadly, and not necessarily appropriate despite the fact that the suspect upon which it is used is threatening violence. (Deorle v. Rutherford (9th Cir. 2001) 272 F.3rd 1272, 1283-1284; imposing a duty to warn, where appropriate, before using potentially deadly force.)

Absent circumstances that elevate an incident into a dangerous felony assault, deadly force is not lawful in attempting to arrest a misdemeanor suspect. (People v. Wild (1976) 60 Cal.App.3rd 829, 832-833.)

However: "(T)he harm resulting from failing to apprehend him does not (by itself) justify the use of deadly force to do so." (Espinosa v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2010) 598 F.3rd 528, 537; quoting Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1, 11-12 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1].)

A police officer's use of deadly force is constitutional where an escaping suspect constitutes a threat of serious physical harm to officers or others. (Wilkinson v. Torres (9th Cir. 2010) 610 F.3rd 546, 550-554; attempts to flee in a stolen vehicle endangered two officers lying on the ground and/or standing nearby.)

Where an off-duty correctional officer (defendant, in this civil suit) shot and wounded the plaintiff (who had been shooting into the air and in the general direction of an angry crowd), and then after the plaintiff dropped his gun one second later, but then turned and started to run, after which the officer fired for two more seconds, with all three shots occurring in the span of three seconds, the Court held that plaintiff could not point to a case that clearly established that a reasonable officer could not use lethal force over the span of three seconds on an individual he had just seen fire his weapon, who had not surrendered, and was still moving to evade capture. The Court emphasized that while it had the benefit of reviewing security footage, it would have been tempting to parse the multiple shots into separate individual events. However, the Court recognized that it had to consider the shots together in light of how quickly the incident transpired, recognizing that "police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments — in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving — about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation." Qualified immunity from civil liability was upheld for the officer. (Lopez v. Sheriff of Cook County (7th Cir. 2021) 993 F.3rd 981.)

But see newly amended (effective 1/1/20) P.C. § 835a(b) & (c)(1)(B):

> (b) Any peace officer who has reasonable cause to believe that the person to be arrested has committed a public offense may use objectively reasonable force to effect the arrest, to prevent escape, or to overcome resistance. (Italics added.)
>
> > (1) Notwithstanding subdivision (b), a peace officer is justified in using deadly force upon another person only when the officer reasonably believes, based on the totality of the circumstances, that such force is necessary for either of the following reasons:

(B) To apprehend a fleeing person for any felony that threatened or resulted in death or serious bodily injury, if the officer reasonably believes that the person will cause death or serious bodily injury to another unless immediately apprehended. Where feasible, a peace officer shall, prior to the use of force, make reasonable efforts to identify themselves as a peace officer and to warn that deadly force may be used, unless the officer has objectively reasonable grounds to believe the person is aware of those facts. (Italics added.)

Note: This new statute appears to severely limit the circumstances where an officer can use deadly force to stop a fleeing felon.

See "P.C. § 835a," under "Applicable Statutes," and under "Fleeing Felon," above, seriously limiting when a police officer may use deadly force.

Doctrine of Transferred Intent: In attempting to determine the legality of a claim of self-defense, and presumably the other legal justifications for committing a homicide, it is important to note that the doctrine of transferred intent applies.

E.g.: Accidentally shooting an innocent person while lawfully attempting to defend oneself from someone else's use of deadly force is a "justifiable homicide," there being no criminal intent. (People v. Mathews (1979) 91 Cal.App.3rd 1018, 1024; People v. Levitt (1984) 156 Cal.App.3rd 500, 507-508.)

Use of Deadly Force by Police Officers*:

Rule: "When someone points a gun at a law enforcement officer, the Constitution 'undoubtedly entitles the officer to respond with deadly force.'" (Estate of Strickland v. Nevada County (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 614, 617; quoting George v. Morris (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 829, 838.)

"So it's well-settled that lethal force is justified if an officer has 'probable cause to believe that [a] suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'" (Estate of Strickland v. Nevada County, supra, at p. 620; quoting Long v. City & County. of Honolulu (9th Cir. 2007) 511 F.3rd 901, 906.)

In Fourth Amendment excessive force cases, (a court must) examine whether (the) police officers' actions are objectively reasonable given the totality of the circumstances." (Nehad v. Browder (9th Cir. 2019) 929 F.3rd 1125, 1132; citing Byrd v. Phoenix Police Dep't (9th Cir. 2018) 885 F.3rd 639, 642; and Bryan v. MacPherson (9th Cir. 2010) 630 F.3rd 805, 823.)

"Deadly force is reasonable if 'the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'" (Lam v. City of San Jose (9th Cir. 2017) 869 F.3rd 1077; civil jury verdict of officer liability upheld where the officer shot the victim in the back (paralyzing him) when the victim would not drop a knife he held, and even though the victim had turned away from the officer, holding the knife to his own stomach while threatening to hurt himself.)

The Suspect's Mental Condition:

As a factor to consider when determining the reasonableness of an officer's use of deadly force, the courts are now recognizing that whether or not the target of the force was "emotionally disturbed" must be considered. (Tabares v. City of Huntington Beach (9th Cir. 2021) 988 F.3rd 1119, 1126, citing Glenn v. Washington County (9th Cir. 2011) 673 F.3rd 864, 872; ". . . whether it should have been apparent to officers that the person they used force against was emotionally disturbed.")

> The Tabares Court noted that a reasonable jury could find that the officer failed to "deescalate" the situation by not following P.O.S.T. (Peace Officers Standards and Training) recommendations for the handling of mentally disturbed individuals (i.e., "request backup, calm the situation, avoid physical contact, determine if the person is taking medication, acknowledge the person's feelings, and not to make threats."). Such a failure to handle the situation properly was a factor in finding possible negligence on the officer's part. (Id., at p. 1128.)

"Even when an emotionally disturbed individual is 'acting out' and inviting officers to use deadly force to subdue him, the governmental interest in using such force is diminished by the fact that the officers are confronted, not with a person who has committed a serious crime against others, but with a mentally ill individual." (Deorle v. Rutherford (9th Cir. 2001) 272 F.3rd 1272, 1283.)

> "[W]here it is or should be apparent to the officers that the individual involved is emotionally disturbed, that is a factor that must be considered in determining, under Graham, the reasonableness of the force employed." (Ibid. See also Estate of

Punching and tasing a non-resisting and compliant arrestee who the officer knew was emotionally troubled and physically ill, and continued to do so when the arrestee did no more than flinch from the pain and cry for help, and then asphyxiating him by sitting on his chest, was unreasonable force. The officer also was not entitled to qualified immunity under the circumstances. (Mendoza v. City of West Covina (2012) 206 Cal.App.4th 702, 714-720.)

Plaintiff brought a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 action after her son was shot and killed by a City of Minneapolis Police Officer; Officer Neal Walsh. The district court found the defendant officer and the City were entitled to qualified immunity as to the officer's initial use of deadly force but not the continued use of force after the deceased dropped his knife and had fallen to the ground. In this interlocutory appeal, defendant officer asserted he is entitled to qualified immunity as to the entire encounter, which lasted a total of about two seconds. The Eighth Circuit reversed the denial of qualified immunity. The Court explained that its review of the videos of the incident establishes that the defendant officer never paused during the shooting, which lasted less than two seconds, and he continued shooting for only approximately one second after plaintiff's son fell to the ground, dropping the knife. Given the swift and continuous progression of the incident and defendant officer's limited time to observe and process the circumstances, a jury could not find reasonably that the officer had sufficient time to reassess the threat presented before he stopped firing. Further, the court explained that even if plaintiff's son's emotional condition perhaps mitigated the threat he posed to the responding officers, a question we need not reach, this detail does not sufficiently distinguish this case from prior cases law such that the defendant officer would have had "fair warning" that his conduct violated a constitutional right. (Ching v. City of Minneapolis (8th Cir. 2023) 73 F.4th 617.)

Responding to a call concerning a man in the street carrying a possible shotgun, officers found Gabriel Strickland—who the officers recognized as one with serious mental issues—carrying a possible rifle, but which had an orange-painted tip, indicating that the weapon may be a replica firearm (i.e., a BB gun). Told the drop the weapon, Strickland refused, slapping its side (sounding more like plastic than metal) while telling the officers that it was a BB gun. Strickland continued to refuse to drop the weapon, eventually pointing it at the officers. Three officers fired, killing Strickland. When the officers were later sued in federal court, the Ninth Circuit upheld the district court's decision that the officers acted reasonably in killing Strickland, finding that the officers had probable cause to believe that the weapon could have been a firearm. Of primary importance was that "the objective facts . . . indicate(d) that the suspect pose[d] an immediate threat to the officer or a member of the public." Despite indications that the weapon could have been a replica firearm, the officers were not required to delay while attempting to verify that fact. The shooting was held to be reasonable under the circumstances. (Estate of Strickland v. Nevada County (9th Cir. 2023) 69 F.4th 614.)

See "Pen. Code § 835a," under "Applicable Statutes," above.

Balancing Test:

"Our analysis must balance the nature of the intrusion upon an individual's rights against the countervailing government interests at stake, without regard for the officers' underlying intent or motivations." (Nehad v. Browder (9th Cir. 2019) 929 F.3rd 1125, 1132; citing G*raham v. Connor (1989) 490 U.S. 386, 396-97 [109 S.Ct. 1865; 104 L.Ed.2nd 443].)

> "Whether a use of force was reasonable will depend on the facts of the particular case, including, but not limited to, whether the suspect posed an immediate threat to anyone, whether the suspect resisted or attempted to evade arrest, and the severity of the crime at issue. [Citation] Only information known to the officer at the time the conduct occurred is relevant." (Nehad v. Browder, supra.)

Case Law:

"(P)ointing a loaded gun at a suspect, employing the threat of deadly force, is use of a high level of force." Espinosa v. City and County of San Francisco (9th Cir. 2010) 598 F.3rd 528, 538.)

The use of a police dog may be "deadly force." (Smith v. City of Hemet (2005) 394 F.3rd 689; overruling prior authority to the contrary and defining deadly force as "force that creates a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury.") But it depends upon the circumstances. (Thompson v. County of Los Angeles (2006) 142 Cal.App.4th 154.)

The survivors of an individual killed as a result of an officer's excessive use of force may assert a Fourth Amendment claim on that individual's behalf if the relevant state's law authorizes a survival action. "A cause of action that survives the death of the person entitled to commence an action or proceeding passes to the decedent's successor in interest . . . , and an action may be commenced by the decedent's personal representative or, if none, by the decedent's successor in interest." (CCP § 337.30) (See Hayes v. County of San Diego (9th Cir. 2013) 736 Fd.3rd 1223, 1228-1229.)

Leaving open the question of whether the Fourth Amendment was violated by shooting a female suspect who was observed walking towards another female with a knife in hand, after the suspect had been reported hacking at a tree with the knife and acting erratically, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the officer was "at least" entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability. (Kisela v. Hughes (Apr. 2, 2018) __ U.S. __, __ [200 L.Ed.2nd 449; 138 S. Ct. 1148].)

Where police responded to a call about a man behaving erratically and brandishing a pair of scissors at a convenience store, and where the shooting happened while the police were deciding how to handle the situation and when the victim/suspect unexpectedly charged the store's doorway with what appeared to be a weapon raised above his head, there were disputed factual issues relevant to an excessive force (Fourth Amendment) claim. A reasonable jury could conclude that the government's interest were insufficient to justify the use of deadly force. In particular, the officers were not responding to the report of a crime; once the officers were at the scene, there was little opportunity for the victim/suspect to flee; the victim/suspect did not appear to pose an immediate threat to the officers; and a reasonable jury could conclude that the use of less-lethal force might have been effective. (Vos v. City of Newport Beach (9th Cir. 2018) 892 F.3rd 1024, 1030-1036.)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal, in overruling the trial court's granting of the police officer-defendant's motion for summary judgement in a case where the officer shot and killed the decedent who had threatened another with a knife, held that a triable issue remained regarding the reasonableness of the police officer's use of deadly force. More specifically, there were genuine disputes about: (1) the officer's credibility; (2) whether the decedent posed a significant, if any, danger to anyone; (3) whether the severity of the decedent's alleged crime warranted the use of deadly force; (4) whether the officer gave or the decedent resisted any commands; (5) the significance of the officer's failure to identify himself as a police officer or warn the decedent of the impending use of force; and (6) the availability of less intrusive means of subduing the decedent. (Nehad v. Browder (9th Cir. 2019) 929 F.3rd 1125, 1133-1137.)

A federal district court's denial of qualified immunity for officers in a Fourth Amendment excessive force case was reversed because a reasonable officer under the circumstances would have perceived the decedent's actions to constitute a significant and immediate threat to the officers in the path of her vehicle and to other members of the public who were in the vicinity. The officers' use of deadly force was objectively reasonable at the time of the shooting. The determination that the officers'

use of force was objectively reasonable necessarily also resolved the state law battery and Bane Act claims. With respect to state law negligence and wrongful death claims—which "may be premised on a broader set of conduct than conduct amounting to excessive force under federal law"—the district court on remand should consider whether the officers acted unlawfully prior to and at the time they shot at the decedent and her vehicle. (H.B. v. City of Torrance (9th Cir. 2019) 790 Fed.Appx. 60; unpublished.)

> The underlying facts, shown on video and which led to the decedent being shot and killed by officers, proved that "the decedent drove in an erratic manner, including by swerving repeatedly into oncoming traffic, that posed a danger to members of the public in a busy metropolitan area. The videos also show that the decedent, having been boxed in by the police officers, accelerated outward in the direction of at least one of the officers, toward a lane for oncoming traffic and a nearby gas station. Because the decedent accelerated toward the officers from only a few feet away, a reasonable officer under these circumstances would have perceived the decedent's actions to constitute a significant and immediate threat to the officers in the path of her vehicle and to other members of the public who were in the vicinity." Shooting her, therefore, was held by the Ninth Circuit to be "reasonable," and not in violation of the Fourth Amendment. (Ibid.)

An officer shot and killed the decedent (plaintiff's father) as he attempted to arrest him. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeal first noted the rule: "(I)f a reasonable officer in (the officer's) shoes would have believed that (the decedent) posed an imminent threat of serious physical harm, or that he had committed a crime involving serious physical harm and was about to escape, the Officer's use of force was reasonable." In this case, when the officer shot and killed the decedent, it was undisputed that: (1) At the tail end of an extensive chase (by vehicle and on foot), the decedent, ignoring the possibility of escape through an open garage door, had belligerently defied the officer's command by daring the officer to shoot him. (2) The decedent stepped towards the officer while holding something in his hand. (3) The decedent was a young man (26 years old) and significantly larger (6'4" and 243 pounds) than the officer (42 years old, 5'7" and 155 pounds) and had a reputation for physical violence. (4) The decedent refused every opportunity to surrender during an extensive chase, and had decided to change the status quo of a standoff. (5) Despite the fact that the officer had his pistol in his hand, the decedent became aggressive, thus causing the officer to reasonably believe he was at risk of being overcome and disarmed. Based on these facts, the court found that it was reasonable for the officer to use deadly force to protect himself and the other individuals in the garage from the threat posed by the decedent. (Siler v. City of Kenosha (7th Cir. 2020) 957 F.3rd 751.)

In a civil rights action brought by the family of a van driver shot by police and the van occupant against the city and police officers following a police chase that ended when the van crashed into a cruiser and the driver was killed, the trial court properly granted summary judgment to defendant officers on the 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983 and Fourth Amendment claims. The Court held that the use of deadly force was reasonable where the driver was actively resisting arrest and attempting to drive toward the officers, who were on foot. The severity of the crime weighed in favor of the use of force. Also the officers did not use excessive force when they deployed a canine to physically apprehend the detainee after the shooting. Plaintiffs' state claims also failed because they could not show battery where the officers did not use unreasonable force. The negligence claim required the court to assess the reasonableness of the officers' actions. Lastly, the Bane Act claim failed where plaintiffs failed to show the officers interfered with any constitutional rights using threats, intimidation, or coercion. (Monzon v. City of Murrieta (9th Cir. 2020) 978 F.3rd 1150.)

In granting summary judgment to a police officer on the basis of qualified immunity, the trial court did not err in finding that no controlling precedent had clearly established that plaintiff's son's right under the Fourth Amendment to be free from the excessive use of deadly force by police would be violated when he was shot and killed as he advanced toward an individual he had earlier that day assaulted, while carrying a drawn knife and while defying specific police orders to stop. (Ventura v. Rutledge (9th Cir. 2020) 978 F.3rd 1088.)

Shooting and killing the decedent in an attempt to stop him from escaping in his car was held to be lawful where the decedent had fled from the officer during rush hour in the middle of a major road in a populated Detroit suburb, adjacent to residential neighborhoods and businesses. It was also noted that the officer saw the decedent make a reckless left turn in the face of oncoming traffic near a busy intersection in order to escape, causing oncoming cars to brake to avoid colliding with decedent as he turned into the a restaurant's parking lot. Third, several cars were parked in the parking lot and multiple patrons and employees were inside the establishment when the officer blocked the decedent at the drive-thru window, decedent reversed into the occupied vehicle behind him before accelerating forward and hitting the officer's police vehicle. The Court concluded that, while decedent's contact with those vehicles occurred at a relatively low speed, his conduct showed a willingness to strike both police and civilian vehicles to effectuate his escape from the police. Based on these facts, the Court held that the decedent's reckless driving posed a materially higher risk of harm to the surrounding public than in at least one similar case where the streets were deserted and no one else was in the area. (Gordon v. Bierenga (6th Cir. MI 2021) 20 F.4th 1077.)

In granting summary judgment to a police officer on the basis of qualified immunity, the trial court did not err in finding that no controlling precedent had clearly established that plaintiff's son's right under the Fourth Amendment to be free from the excessive use of deadly force by police would be violated when he was shot and killed as he advanced toward an individual he had earlier that day assaulted, while carrying a drawn knife and while defying specific police orders to stop. (Ventura v. Rutledge (9th Cir. 2020) 978 F.3rd 1088.)

Officers shot and killed the deceased when he violently drove his car into a police car and, alternatively, towards an officer on foot, while intoxicated, refusing to stop and surrender. The deceased's estate sued, alleging the unreasonable use of deadly force. The Court held that the officers' use of force was objectively reasonable for three separate reasons. First, the deceased was using his car as a weapon. Second, he exhibited volatile behaviors that contributed to the officers' justification in firing to prevent death or great bodily harm to the officers. Specifically, before the incident, the decedent was drinking and using drugs; he pepper sprayed his girlfriend and her daughter in a fit of rage; he stole his girlfriend's wallet and drove away while intoxicated; he repeatedly told his girlfriend and the officers that he was suicidal; he repeatedly yelled, "Kill me!" at one officer while ignoring commands from other officers; and he repeatedly rammed his car into a patrol unit and a concrete pillar while only inches away from hitting the one officer on foot. Third, the plaintiffs did not produce any evidence that suggested the officers might have had a reasonable alternative course of action, the Court ruling that "whatever reasonable alternatives officers might've had, doing nothing and praying for the best [was] not one of them." (Jackson v. Gautreaux (5th Cir. 2021) 3 F.4th 182.)

During a lawful traffic stop conducted by one officer, a second officer contacted the occupants through the passenger side window, stepping onto the running board as he did so. (Harmon was the passenger in the right front seat.) As the officer talked with the vehicle's occupants, the driver started the engine and began to drive away, ignoring the officer's commands to turn the engine off again. Within a second of the vehicle starting to move forward, the officer shot the driver four time, killing him. As the the car continued to move forward, the officer fell off and was almost hit by the back wheels of the car. Both the estate for the driver and plaintiff Harmon sued in federal court. The 5th Circuit upheld the trial court's dismissal of the case, ruling that the officer's actions were lawful, and that either way, he was entitled to qualified immunity. The Court held that it was reasonable for the officer to believe that he was at risk of serious physical harm while he was clinging to the accelerating vehicle. The court concluded that common sense dictated that falling off a moving vehicle onto the street can result in serious physical injuries. The fact that nearly running over the officer occurred after the officer shot the driver was irrelevant, as it confirmed that the officer could reasonably perceive a serious threat of harm as the driver drove away with him holding onto the car. Finally, the court noted that, in previous opinions, it had recognized the obvious threat of harm to an officer on the side of a fleeing vehicle. (Harmon v. City of Arlington (5th Cir. TX 2021) 16 F.4th 1159.)

Responding to a call concerning a man with a gun, police confronted a man named Dillon Taylor who matched the description given by the caller, and who was in the presence of two others. Ordered to stop and raise their hands, the other two men complied while Taylor walked away, ignoring the officers' repeated demands to show his hands. Taylor, instead, held his hands at or near his waistband, concealed by an untucked shirt, finally turning towards the defendant officer and making a move consistent with drawing a pistol. Taylor was shot and killed. He was found to be unarmed. Sued by Taylor's estate, the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals noted that a police officer is entitled to qualified immunity as long as the officer's conduct does not violate a clearly established constitutional right. In excessive use of force claims, the plaintiff must establish that the officer's use of force was objectively unreasonable. In evaluating whether an officer used unreasonable force, the courts must consider: 1) the severity of the crime at issue; 2) whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officer or others; and 3) whether the suspect is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight. Finding the first and third factors favored the decedent in this case, the Court held that the second factor—whether there was an immediate threat to safety—weighted heavily in the officer's favor. An officer's use of force is justified if the officer has "probable cause to believe that there was a threat of serious physical harm to himself or others." In this case, Taylor's lack of cooperation while moving his hands into a position where it appeared he was about to draw a firearm made the officer's decision to use deadly force reasonable. "Officers cannot be mind readers and must resolve ambiguities immediately." As a result, the court held that the officer's split-second decision to use deadly force against Taylor was reasonable, entitling the officer to qualified immunity. (Estate of Taylor v. Salt Lake City (10th Cir. UT 2021) 16 F.4th 744.)

Where a law enforcement officer is falsely yet publicly accused of using deadly force, note that the officer may have civil recourse in seeking civil damages against his or her accuser, at least where the adverse public accusations identify the officer sufficiently so that those public comments can reasonably be interpreted to be "of and concerning" the plaintiff officer. In this case, a city council member accused the plaintiff officers of being guilty of a "brutal (and) . . . blatant murder," demanding that the officers be brought to justice. Although the civil defendant counsel woman did not specifically identify the officers in her public statements alleging this, corresponding newspaper articles did. The Court held that whether this fact was sufficient to find that the defendant's comments could be interpreted to be "of and concerning" the plaintiffs (i.e., publicly identifying them) was a jury question; reversing the trial court's conclusion to the contrary. (Miller v. Sawant (9th Cir. 2021) 18 F.4th 328.)

Officers were entitled to qualified immunity when they shot and killed an armed, fleeing (on foot) suspect who refused orders to stop and drop his gun. The officers had a report that a suspect matching the decedent's description had been brandishing a firearm at an apartment complex. Upon arriving at the scene and observing him get out of his vehicle visibly armed with a pistol, the first officer ordered him to drop his weapon. Instead, he turned and ran. He was eventually cornered with the help of a second officer. The decedent, however, continued to run, and continued to ignore demands that he drop his pistol until he was finally shot and killed. Applying the rules of Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1], the Court held that the officers were not required to "wait until a defendant turns towards them, with weapon in hand, before applying deadly force to ensure their safety." Similarly, the court added, "officers need not wait until a fleeing suspect turns his weapon toward bystanders before using deadly force to protect them." (Wilson v. City of Bastrop (5th Cir. 2022) 26 F.4th 709.)

Officers, however, are not entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability where the plaintiff's version of the force used—arguing that it was unreasonable—is supported by some evidence, even if that evidence is from one witness only, and even if that one witness is contradicted by other witnesses. The court is bound to accept as true the plaintiff's version of the facts in such a circumstance. Where officers used Tasers, blunt instruments (i.e., flashlights), kicking, and eventually a firearm (shooting and killing the decedent), to subdue the decedent who was violently resisting until finally shot and killed, the reasonableness of the force used by the officers must be left to a jury to decide. (Gambrel v. Knox County (6th Cir. 2022) 25 F.4th 391.)

Where an officer responding to a "shots fired and woman screaming" 911 call to a non-specified address ("two or three houses" down from the caller's house), at night and in the dark, and is suddenly confronted by the home owner (apparently being at the wrong house) coming out of his garage with a pistol in his hand, and where the home-owner starts to raise his firearm towards the officer (who is in the shadows and presumably unrecognizable as a police officer), the officer shooting and killing the home-owner was held to be reasonable under the circumstances. Per the Eleventh Circuit: Although the "mere presence of a gun or other weapon is not enough to warrant the exercise of deadly force and shield an officer from suit," when a suspect's gun is "available for ready use"—even when the suspect has not "drawn his gun"—an officer is "not required to wait and hope for the best." In addition, the Court reiterated that the law (citing Tennessee v. Garner (1985) 471 U.S. 1 [105 S.Ct. 1694; 85 L.Ed.2nd 1]) does not require an officer to always provide a warning before using deadly force but, instead, only "if feasible." An officer in this officer's position during the rapidly unfolding events on that dark night reasonably could have believed that the man raising a pistol in his direction was about to shoot him. While in hindsight, that decision might have been a mistake, courts "do not view an officer's actions with the 20/20 vision of hindsight," as qualified immunity leaves "room for mistaken judgments." The Court also explained that under these circumstances, Eleventh Circuit case law establishes that the officer could "respond with deadly force to protect himself" and was not required to wait until the home owner fired his gun to return fire in self-defense. In conclusion, the court recognized that "the shooting was tragic, as such shootings always are, but tragedy does not equate with unreasonableness under clearly established law." (Powell v. Snook (11th Cir. 2022) 25 F.4th 912.)

Following a high speed chase, ending with plaintiff crashing into a tree, plaintiff was slow to exit his vehicle. Upon doing so, however, officers shot him, severely wounding him. Upon plaintiff's lawsuit for the use of excessive force, plaintiff claimed that he was shot without justification in that he was not armed and offered no resistance, and that he reached for his wallet to provide identification as he was commanded to do so. The defendant police officers claimed that plaintiff reached for his waistband where a dark handled object could be seen. The Court found that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity in that their defense was based upon their version of the facts where the Court is required to accept as true the plaintiffs. Factual issues, therefore, had to be left for a jury to decide. (Bayon v. Berkebile (7th Cir. 2022) 29 F.4th 850.)

Officers are also not entitled to qualified immunity were it was disputed as to whether the decedent—shot and killed by officers after a foot pursuit—had dropped his gun. In this case, one frame of an officer's body-camera footage appeared to look directly at the items dropped by the decedent—including the gun—while the officers ran after him. In addition, the autopsy results and re-creations of the scene supported the plaintiff's claim that the decedent was nearly prone on the ground when he was fatally shot, rather than in the upright "firing position" as alleged by the officer. The Court held that this evidence presented by the plaintiff, if credited by the jury, would support a finding that the officer used excessive force against the decedent. The Court added that if the jury believed that the officer used excessive force against decedent, it was clearly established in 2017 that the use of deadly force against a fleeing suspect who does not pose a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officers or others is unlawful. (Williams v. City of Burlington (8th Cir. 2022) 27 F.4th 1346.)

The district court did not err by denying the officer qualified immunity in a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 action filed by the decedent's children because a question of fact remained regarding the level of threat the decedent posed immediately before he died. While the officer's use of excessive force, shooting the decedent six times with no warning, violated the Fourth Amendment, a key disputed fact was whether the decedent was facing the officer and on the attack as the officer contended, or whether he was turned away from the officer as indicated by the coroner's report. (Estate of Aguirre v. County of Riverside (2022) 29 F.4th 624.)

If deputy sheriffs did indeed shoot the sixty-four-year-old decedent without objective provocation, as the decedent was holding onto his walker with his gun trained on the ground, as plaintiff alleged, then a reasonable jury could determine that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment by shooting and killing him. The officers were therefore not entitled to qualified immunity. (George v. Morris (9th Cir. 2013) 736 F.3rd 829, 836-839.)

> Where it is shown, however, that the suspect did in fact point a firearm at officers, the use of deadly force is justified. (Id., at p. 838; "When an individual points his gun 'in the officers' direction,' the Constitution undoubtedly entitles the officer to respond with deadly force."
